

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

MODERN SONG WRITERS.

I.—ROBERT FRANZ.

By FR. NIECKS.

ROBERT FRANZ occupies an altogether unique position among composers, and not only among composers of his own time. There probably never was a musician in the same measure endowed with the creative faculty and equipped with the craftsmanship of his art who like him confined the exercise of his powers to so narrow a sphere of action. Excepting a Kyrie a cappella for four-part chorus and solo voices, a setting of the 117th Psalm a cappella for eight-part double chorus, and twelve vocal quartets (six for male and six for mixed voices), his original compositions with which the public has been made acquainted consist entirely of songs for one voice with pianoforte accompaniment. But as a song composer his fruitfulness has been such as to be surpassed only by Franz Schubert,* for the number of his published songs exceeds 250. Nor is it quantity alone which distinguishes his achievements in minstrelsy. According to the almost unanimous opinions of the ablest judges and the noblest of his brother-artists, he ranks indisputably with the foremost in this branch of the art—with Franz Schubert and Robert Schumann, whose Christian names curiously enough coincide respectively with his Christian name and surname. I shall not attempt to characterise Robert Franz by epigrams and antitheses. Epigrams and antitheses are false even when true—true only to those who have a full knowledge of the men and things in question and view them from the same standpoint, false to every one else. Moreover, it would hardly be possible to find a subject less fit for epigrammatic and antithetic treatment than our composer. For though he possesses a distinct individuality—a style of expression and a domain of thought and feeling of his own—his excellence manifests itself not in glaring qualities, but in delicate harmonies and subtle gradations.

Every noteworthy work of art embodies more or less the personality of the artist: it is bone of his bone, flesh of his flesh, brain of his brain; the forms, passions, and thoughts of the one being reproduced in the other. Without a noble, without an interesting personality, a noble, an interesting work of art is impossible. The qualities of an artist's work may be at variance with those of his social acts—as he need not, and indeed rarely does, express his whole self in art; but, unless they be mere shams, and consequently of small value, they must correspond to originals in his inward life. Even good formal (not mechanical) work requires ethical qualities: purity in the work presupposes purity in the worker; strength presupposes strength; delicacy, delicacy; and so on. The power of music is commensurate with its lyrical contents. To be vital and effective the lyrical contents must be genuine, that is, must spring from the artist's personality. This, however, does not mean that he has always to express his individual feelings, his own joys and woes. Nothing could be farther from the truth. Nay, it means that he must have sensibility, and a capacity for sympathy, as otherwise he cannot truly understand and interpret the feelings of others. More than nine-tenths of our modern music (dramatic and symphonic music included) is lyrical. All that in dramatic music is not lyrical is a poor make-shift necessitated by the requirements of the verbal language and the limitations of the musical language; and all that in symphonic music is not lyrical is merely accessory, or ought to be so—as, for instance, that kind of tone-painting which we may distinguish by the epithet "material." What constitutes the superiority of J. S. Bach's fugues over those by Kirnberger, Fuchs, Albrechtsberger, and id genus omne? Chiefly and mainly the lyrical element with which he vivified the formal structure, or rather out of which the formal structure grew like a tree from a seed-corn, his personality being the rich soil which nourished it. Unless the artist infuses some of his best blood into his work his assiduities and ingenuities avail him naught or little. Indeed, wherever we find real greatness of any kind, enduring power, there we find also a close connection between the artist and the man. Hence it cannot but be always profitable to inquire as far as possible into the life-circumstances, actions, sayings, and mental experiences of an artist. In the case of Robert Franz this is especially interesting, as he gives so much of himself, and subordinates the artist so entirely to the man, his technique being solely and in the most literal sense a means of expression. Though the biographical facts which I have been able to cull here and there from this and that publication* are insufficient for a finished portrait, they go far towards supplying the needful material for an outline sketch that may serve as a key to not a few peculiarities of this composer's mode of feeling and workmanship.

Robert Franz was born at Halle, the birthplace of Handel, on June 28, 1815. He himself relates that his first musical impression, of which, as he was then only two years of age, he has naturally only a very faint recollection, coincided with the ter-centenary commemoration of the Reformation. "Also in Halle the festival was observed with great solemnity, and I imagine I hear yet, as if in a dream, the sounds of a trombone choir—which, as I of course only afterwards learned, performed Luther's immortal hymn 'Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott'—descending from the towers of the principal church of the town." The most important of his early musical impressions Robert Franz owed to his father, who occasionally sang to his little ones his favourite religious hymns, and did so with a pure intonation and a proper accentuation of the quaint melodic graces fashionable in his youth. The children took so much pleasure in his singing that whenever he was in good humour they asked him to sing to them. This, however, he was by no means always, or even frequently. Indeed, he seems to have been a somewhat morose and hard man; at all events a man devoid of sympathy with art, and shut in by the narrow horizon of the practical. Though inimical to music and the rest of the idle, beggarly sisterhood, he was yet the means of laying in his son's heart the foundation of the love which afterwards produced such exquisite fruits. None of the children listened, of course, to the father's singing with more attention than little Robert, who, now grown an old man, has some of the tunes, with all the details of the rendering, still ringing in his ears. For the further development of the germ thus involuntarily implanted nothing was to be hoped for from the father, who, moreover, took even less pleasure in occupying himself with his grown-up children than with the little ones. That, however, Robert's general education was not neglected is sufficiently proved by the fact that he was sent first to the Bürgerschule of the Francke Institute, and afterwards attended the Latin school of the same institute. In the singing lessons of the former he drew upon himself many punishments by his attempts at adding a second part to the unison performances of the class.

It was not till his fourteenth year, when he discovered an old piano at the house of one of his relatives, that the hitherto dormant passion for music was awakened, and a wish for proper musical instruction made itself felt. His father, however, was not easily induced to second his son in what appeared to him a frivolous and unprofitable pursuit. So the boy had to go on by himself and do as best he could. At last the father relented. He provided him with a teacher, probably not a very good one. At any rate, this first teacher was soon followed by a second, the second before very long by a third, and so on. In short, our young musician is said to have had as many as four teachers, more emphatic writers even say that he was successively under all the teachers of the town. But whether their number was four or more, none of them gave satisfaction. Perhaps the thrifty father was not alone to blame. I suspect our friend Robert was at that time, and for some time to come, one of those enthusiasts whose impatience causes them to shun the long and apparently dreary path of method; and who waste their time in attempts to fly to the top of Parnassus which can only be reached by slow climbing. Art is a fortress that cannot be taken by storm, it yields only after a long siege. Be this as it may, Robert got little good out of his numerous preceptors. He became more indebted to cantor Abele, the singing-master of the Francke Institute, who noticed the boy's love for music, began to take an interest in him, and appointed him accompanist of a select class which he had formed of the most musical pupils for the study of classical music—music of Handel, Haydn, and Mozart among the rest. Here a new world opened to the young artist-soul, and excited his imagination to such a degree that, without the slightest notion of either harmony or counterpoint, he began to compose. The results of his creative efforts, however, were by no means distinguished by any admirable qualities. As he grew older his love for the art went on deepening; he had meetings with congenial spirits for the purpose of practising choral playing; ran on Sundays from church to church and asked the organists to allow him to take their places; and at last told his parents of his ardent, irresistible desire to study music thoroughly, to become, in fact, a musician.* It is needless to say that he met with strong opposition; but shy and meek as he was he kept his ground, fighting till the battle was won. His parents yielded, though reluctantly, and he got permission to go to Dessau where the celebrated Friedrich Schneider, the composer of the oratorio "The Last Judgment," and a great number of other choral, orchestral, and chamber works, had, in 1829, founded a music-school.

Robert Franz left Halle in 1835, and therefore had reached the age of twenty when he began to study music seriously. Liszt, and others after him, speak somewhat slightly of the efficiency of Schneider's teaching, insinuating that he was too much of a pedant to give the kind of help which talent, and more especially genius, stands in need of. Franz himself and some of his fellow-students thought so likewise, and formed a secret society at the meetings of which they cultivated music according to their own fancy. Likely enough, therefore, that Franz was not a persona grata with Schneider. There is now, and there has been for the last fifty years, a great deal of nonsense talked about the pedantry of teaching. I say "nonsense" with a full consciousness of the weight of the word. The object of teaching is the mastery of the resources of the art. Now how is this mastery to be acquired except by a wise restraint and guidance, a focussing of the powers, which brings their whole strength to bear on the object the possession of which is a sine quâ non of a successful exercise of the creative faculty? The attainments of the master, Robert Franz—the purity of his harmony, the excellence of his contrapuntal style—show clearly that his two years' pupilage at Dessau were not lost time. A brochure, "Die Musikschule zu Dessau" (1837), gives full information about Schneider's institution; for our purpose it will suffice to note that, except æsthetics, all the branches of practical and theoretical music were taught. We of the second half of the nineteenth century may not be inclined to ratify the judgment of our fathers of the first half—as indicated, for instance, by the words of a writer in Schilling's Lexicon, who said: "Schneider, a man plain and simple in his exterior, is distinguished only by a remarkably vivacious and glittering eye, in which the whole high heavenly fire of his great genius mirrors itself"—but unless we are wholly submerged in the fashions and conceit of the present we cannot withhold from him our high esteem and even admiration. Franz Brendel, in his "Geschichte der Musik," seems to me to take the right view of Schneider as a teacher. "Schneider," he writes, "has formed a considerable number of notable pupils in his music-school. This was less the immediate result of the not very communicative teacher's instruction than the consequence of the fact that the pupils got sight of a strong personality, which exercised a generally invigorating and quickening influence." One other matter connected with Franz's stay at Dessau deserves to be noted. It is his friendship with a young man of the name of Reupsch, who had a wonderful facility in improvising interesting basses and figures as accompaniments to choral melodies, a talent which Franz admired much and which incited him to practise the same art.

After two years' study, Robert Franz returned in 1837 to Halle. Then followed six years of severe trial, out of which he issued triumphant. His shyness, reserve, and taciturnity, which in his school-days made his fellow-pupils shun him and even scoff at him, prevented his talent and accomplishments from being recognised. With regard to his shyness, he himself made on one occasion the remark that he "always began to thaw when it was too late." We must, however, not overlook the fact that he was a plant of slow growth, and that in those days his artistic individuality was as yet wholly undeveloped. Scorned by some of his fellow-townsmen, pitied by others, neglected by all or almost all, and getting little comfort at home, except perhaps from his mother, he was more than ever thrown upon himself. At first he had a stay in the belief in his own ability, but that vanished when he became more intimately acquainted with Bach, Beethoven, and Schubert, to the study of whose works he now devoted himself. Philosophical studies, too, occupied his attention. Halle took in those days a leading part in these matters. It was there that the editors of the "Hallische Jahrbücher" (afterwards continued as "Deutsche Jahrbücher"), Arnold Ruge and Theodor Echtermeyer, for a time resided; there also taught at the University the Hegelian philosopher, Professor H. F. W. Hinrichs. From what has been said about Franz's position and disposition it should not be concluded that he avoided or was excluded from all social intercourse. Indeed, soon after his return to Halle he joined a society which, like the circle that at Heidelberg gathered around Thibaut, had for its object the cultivation of the music of the old Italian and German masters. It was there that the greatness of J. S. Bach first revealed itself to him in the motett "Fürchte dich nicht, ich bin bei dir," and thenceforth the immortal cantor's compositions, especially his chorals, became, as A. Saran relates, the young musician's daily food. In this society Franz made also the acquaintance of Professor Hinrichs, an acquaintance which before long ripened into friendship and led to an important event in his life.

After having for several years abstained from creative work, Schubert's compositions gave him an impulse that made him try his strength again. The songs which he now composed were quite in the style of the master who had inspired them, and therefore were never published. According to Liszt, who on account of his poetic tendencies cannot always be trusted as a biographer, disappointed love had something to do with this new phase of our composer's development. "He loved with a devotion such as could germinate only in his pure, noble nature. He dreamt of a happiness . . . gently its wing touched him . . . and then it fled. This catastrophe of his inner happiness decided his full maturity." After Schubert, Mendelssohn's and Schumann's influence made itself felt, and the study of their works brought about a fermentation which led to the final development. At last, in 1843, at the age of twenty-eight, was published his Op. 1, twelve songs, which a contributor to Mendel's Lexicon says Franz composed in the blissful state of a bridegroom, the bride being a daughter of his friend, Professor Hinrichs. Schumann gave them in the "Neue Zeitschrift für Musik" a hearty welcome, pointing out that the composer's aim was the rendering of the poem to its inmost depth, and not merely more or less euphonious music, adding that were one to particularise all the beautiful traits one would never get done.

The success which these songs had outside Halle opened at last the eyes of the composer's fellow-townsmen. He was appointed organist at the Ulrich's Church, and conductor of the Singakademie. In later years the Prussian ministry conferred upon him the title of Royal Music-director, and the University of Halle, at which he lectured,* that of Doctor, the latter title being given in recognition of his meritorious labours in connection with the revival of the works of the old masters. Franz's life would have been a happy one had not the most terrible of calamities by which a musician can be visited befallen him. As early as 1841 an affection of his organs of hearing made itself felt, which, aggravated in 1853 by a nervous complaint, assumed a more and more serious aspect, and in 1868 compelled him to give up one post after another. Destitution was staring him in the face, when in 1872 Joseph Joachim, Franz Liszt, and Helene Magnus set to work to free their brother-artist from this ghastly incubus. Concerts were given, and the proceeds, amounting to 30,000 thalers (£4,500), presented to the unfortunate composer.

In the Op. 1 the real Franz is but faintly visible. But after this the consolidation of his personality went on apace, a continued study of Bach, and a wider acquaintance with Schumann, being important factors in this process.

In passing, allusion has been made to a part of Franz's artistic activity which was productive of achievements almost as precious as his songs—namely, his Bearbeitungen, that is, his reconstructions or supplementation of the unwritten but necessary accompaniments of works by Bach, Handel, Astorga, and Durante, more especially by the two first-named masters. "Inclination," writes Franz, "perhaps also natural disposition, led me for years to Bach's and Handel's music. My modest sphere of action in Halle was not altogether unfavourable to these pursuits; they became soon the chief aim of the choral society which I directed. At that time—I speak of the first year of the fifth decade of this century—one had to put up with the existing conditions. Our knowledge of Handel's oratorios was confined to those touched up by Mozart and Mosel; of Bach's cantatas and masses we knew only those edited by Marx. We performed the works as they lay before us, and naively enough thought that their contents were thus fully exhausted. The public would indeed now and then open their eyes when the flute and double-bass performed a dialogue, or when the continuo treated them to a surly monologue. Such matters, however, did not trouble us; we put them down to the good old time, which had to be accepted just as it was." The appearance of the editions of the works of the two great German masters published by the Bach and Handel Societies opened Franz's eyes. For the richly figured bass proved that the composers intended more than they had taken the trouble to write down. By-and-by it began to dawn upon him that the figures did not indicate all the composers intended, which was not merely a succession of chords, but a "web of parts." We, therefore, can easily believe what Franz says with regard to the difficulties of the reconstructions undertaken by him with no other guides than these inadequate hints. "Bach's figuring especially penetrates often to the minutest details—it requires only an acute eye and a skilled hand to be enabled to take confidently the ultimate measures. Nevertheless, the work does not always proceed so easily. Many a time have I sat for days helplessly before a couple of bars, and I know pieces which the present art-technique will hardly succeed in satisfactorily solving."

Notwithstanding the excellence of his Bearbeitungen, Franz encountered much adverse criticism, mostly from pedants and from people who did not understand the facts of the case. But it was not only as a Bearbeiter that he had good reason to complain of scanty recognition. His songs found at first but a small public, and for a long time the number of their admirers increased very slowly, though steadily. It was not till about ten years ago that a more general interest began to be taken in them. I am speaking of the composer's native country. Outside Germany, if we except America and, perhaps, also England, he has been almost entirely ignored. As thoroughly characteristic may be instanced the notice in the second edition of the "Biographie universelle des Musiciens" (1860-65), where Franz is spoken of as "un des meilleurs compositeurs allemands de chanson," and "the melodies of his composition" are said to "have had much success, especially in Saxony." To Liszt belongs the honour and merit of having first borne witness to Franz's high position and significance as a song composer. His article in the "Neue Zeitschrift für Musik," of 1855, since then reprinted as a brochure, is still the best that has been written on the subject. Next to Liszt, but coming much later, has to be named the historian, * Robert Franz was appointed Music-director of the University in 1858, on the death of Dr. J. F. Nauc; the duties of the office he had previously discharged.

Ambros,* the close of whose essay I must quote. "The day which I spent in the late autumn of 1871 with Robert Franz, at Halle, will never be forgotten by me. We wandered through the valley of the Saale, near Giebichenstein. The picture of the lovely landscape and that of Robert Franz have become so intimately united in my memory that I am unable to separate them. The beautiful, sunny day put my friend in good spirits; he spoke with animation of art and of life—often words which, as Schumann said of Mendelssohn, 'I should have liked to engrave in gold!' We entered Reichardt's † garden, we saw the rose-bush which Goethe had one day planted, and whose branches now already begin to embrace the plain country dwelling-house. Then I felt as if Reichardt stepped forth to meet us and spake to the master: 'Thou hast completed what we once began.'"

The first of a series of Albums of German Song, which Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co. have lately published, will be instrumental in popularising Robert Franz's compositions in this country. It contains thirty of that composer's finest songs, selected with judgment and taste by Mr. Francis Hueffer, who has also furnished an English translation of the original German text, adapting the words skilfully to the music. Did Mr. Hueffer's translations present themselves as independent poems, I should object to some of the words employed, and more especially to certain points in his rhyme theory. But in a poem wedded to song, lingual rhythm, melody, and cadences are of small account, as they are always overpowered and not unfrequently set aside by their musical counterparts. Moreover, perfect lyrical poems—Goethe's or Heine's, for instance—are untranslatable: you cannot transfer without injury such crystallisation of sound and sentiment from one language to another. Even a Tennyson must here fail. The difficulties, however, are at least doubled in the case of the translator who is fettered hand and foot by the scheme of a musical composition. To return to Mr. Hueffer, he has given us an eminently singable translation; and I think, all things considered, it will be admitted that he has acquitted himself of his onerous task with considerable success. As a specimen of his poetic craftsmanship, let me quote "Will she come to-day?" which, though it has not exactly the charm of Heine's original, is yet a charming poem:—

Rising when the dawn still faint is,
Asking, Will she come?
Late at eventide my plaint is,
Ah! she did not come.

In the night-time with my sorrow
Waking still I lie,
And the day-dream of the morrow
Passes sadly by.

In the remarks on Franz's music which I am now going to make, I shall confine myself to an exposition of its chief characteristics, as a minute criticism of all his songs would be impossible, and a discussion of only a few of them probably misleading. Parenthetically I may mention that those songs the title of which I give in English are contained in Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co.'s "Robert Franz," No. 1 of the Albums of German Song.

First let us hear what Franz says about himself. "That I almost exclusively cultivated the song-form and wrote only very little else, was at first the consequence of an irresistible need; afterwards I became convinced that in this form culminated my most individual contents. It was, therefore, a matter of principle with me not to leave this path, and it is not likely that I shall try my fortune on other roads." Franz acted wisely in following his instinct; for, though master of the technical resources of the art, he had not, I think, the stuff of a creator in the larger forms, such as the symphony, opera, and oratorio. Indeed, comparing him with a Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Mendelssohn, and Schumann, one may even be tempted to ask whether he possessed genuine creative power at all. The unproductivity of his youth and the slowness and chiefly assimilative nature of his development seem to suggest a negative answer. But a careful consideration of the outcome of his artistic activity must lead one to the conclusion that, though lacking the abundance and spontaneity of those mighty masters, he did possess creative power, limited, it is true, but effective and precious in its limitation. Franz is reported to have said: "Richard Wagner is the man of distant throws; I disdain such slings, and prefer to attack one point with a pick-hammer." If he really said "I disdain" (ich verschmähe), he either misused the word or misjudged himself. Had he attempted the distant throws of Wagner his missiles would surely have fallen short of his aims. But Franz is so modest a man and so little likely to over-estimate his strength that I am inclined to think that he said, or meant to say, that his "mission" or his "specialty" was to work with the pick-hammer. In this form the remark strikingly characterises the nature and style of his compositions which are, above all, delicate in thoughts and feelings as well as in workmanship.

Franz's greatness, his success with the few and unsuccess with the many, rest especially on these bases—(1) the pure, gentle, loving nature of his personality; (2) the fine perception of, and self-abandoning sympathy with, the poetical contents of his subjects; (3) the perfection of his technique; (4) the unselfish employment of this technique exclusively for interpretative purposes.

From what has already been said, Franz's choice of subjects may be easily guessed. Nowhere in his works do we meet with boisterous merriment, wild frolicsomeness, compelling energy, terrifying fury, or fierce passion of any kind—in short, with signs of "rude health." The three elements which attracted Schumann's attention in the Op. 1 make themselves much more prominently felt in the subsequent works. They are: the dreamy, the naïve, and an almost ever-present pensiveness. Liszt, who wrote later, and consequently was in a better position to judge, has on this point some eminently illustrative remarks in his essay on Robert Franz. "He is," Liszt writes, "a psychical colourist, and, as with certain painters, the outline is only a necessity to which he yields as little as possible." And again: "In his pictures the atmosphere is the essential; he seems to forget the earth in his endeavour to paint the heavens, its colours, its clouds, its transparency, its alluring and mysterious infinitude." And lastly: "His songs are mostly moods which are absorbed in themselves, and rarely tend dramatically beyond themselves [die sich in sich vertiefen, und selten dramatisch über sich hinausstreben]." Franz is a lyricist par excellence, whilst Schubert is contradistinguished by Liszt as a "dramatic lyricist." Not with the view of detracting from his character, but of defining it, I add that Franz lacks Schubert's width of range, youthful bloom, freshness, and copiousness, as well as Schumann's glow of passion and splendour of romantic picturesqueness. But Franz has beauties of his own, beauties not possessed at all, or only in a less measure, by other songsters. "As a founder of a new dynastic line of lyricists," says Liszt, "he is the heir of nobody, and dethroned nobody. He discovered an unknown planet, a stray island in the wide ocean, and stepping ashore with the lyre in his hand he intoned an equally new song. His gentle, far-reaching, euphonious voice touched without wounding, and the multitude listened with emotion, unconscious of how unusual these sounds and how strange this language were." Liszt divides Franz's songs into tragic, naïve, narrative and descriptive, and humorous and comic; the first being the most numerous class, the second coming next in this respect, and the last containing only a few. I mention this division only to point out that if the terms "tragic" and "comic" are taken in their usual acceptation they can hardly be applied to any of the composer's songs; and that in the humorous songs he pleasantly smiles, but never heartily laughs or gives way to bright merriment. Franz likes to tinge his joy with sadness. Indeed, he is never at his best where this latter element is wanting. Still, though rather a singer of autumn than of spring, many of his spring songs are cheerful and some of them astir with the influences of that season. The name of Franz has been often coupled with that of Chopin. As there exists no kinship at all between these two, but only a very vague and general likeness, the comparison was not worth making. Franz has neither Chopin's intensity of passion nor his morbidity of feeling. Moreover, the Polish musician was a more strongly marked individuality, and specifically as a creative artist, more richly gifted. They had only two things in common—subtlety of feeling and delicacy of workmanship.

* In England the composer has been made more widely known by a sympathetic essay of Mr. Hueffer's (see his "The Music of the Future").

Franz's emotional compass, then, is not very extensive. He makes use, so to speak, only of the medium colours, and of mellowed lights and shadows. But what an infinitude of exquisite gradations within these comparatively narrow limits! He is demonstrative only on exceptional occasions. The passionately elated "Lo, he has come" (Op. 4, No. 7), the bitter, despairing "Yea, thou art blighted" (Op. 7, No. 6), and the unrestrainedly joyous "Willkommen mein Wald!" (Op. 21, No. 1) are instances from three different registers of the emotional compass. Usually, however, Franz is contemplative, pensive, dreamy. This quiet inwardness, in fact, is the key-note of his individuality, or rather it is his peculiar mode which he sets forth in all manner of keys. But what are words? Hear the sad "Autumn sorrow" (Op. 4, No. 20), the perfume-laden "The rose has made sad moan to me" (Op. 42, No. 5), the devout "Rest on me, thou eye of darkness" (Op. 9, No. 3), the low, sweet "Will she come to-day?" (Op. 25, No. 4), the tender "Sweetest maid with lips like roses" (Op. 5, No. 5), the mysterious "Not a star" (Op. 2, No. 3), the simple "In the Rhine's broad rolling waters" (Op. 18, No. 2), the popular "The Swiss Soldier's complaint" (Op. 12, No. 2), the deep-felt "When my despair is deepest" (Op. 5, No. 1), and you will know more about Franz than volumes of eloquent description can tell you.

On turning from the contents to its embodiment, we will direct our attention first to the melody. This latter does not assume in Franz's songs the same importance as, for instance, in Schubert's. It has been called by most critics (Liszt, Ambros, &c.) "declamatory." I do not think that this epithet is appropriate. Franz's melodies are with rare exceptions really tuneful, but in most cases they lack the swing and continuity which makes melodies impressive. Although the greater number of them have an existence apart from the harmony, are singable without the accompaniment, you never think of them as separate entities. Franz's songs are apt to haunt you for days, weeks, months; but it is not the melody, it is the tout ensemble that haunts you. Generally speaking his melodies, whilst beautiful in themselves and true to the rhythm and sense of the words, are unobtrusive, one might almost say self-effacing. Whether consciously or unconsciously adopted, the peculiar tone of the folk-song rings through almost all his melodies. The most striking peculiarity about them, however, is their sequential construction. It is a favourite method of the composer to form his melodies by repetitions at a different pitch and with modifications here and there of a short phrase. Reissmann, the most adverse of Franz's critics, condemns this process absolutely; A. Saran, on the other hand, who discovers its prototype in the old German folk-song, looks upon it as the source of one of the greatest beauties. There is truth on both sides. The manner, though generally by no means objectionable, is occasionally productive of a peculiar charm, but oftener of weakness and lameness.

Franz's accompaniments are marvels of delicacy and perfection. To judge of their variety we need only take up any dozen songs of his. We find simple chords, contrapuntal combinations, and all the contrivances of the modern pianoforte style. The composer, however, is particularly fond of writing in what we may call the vocal or organ style—i.e., for (generally four) individual parts. Many of his accompaniments are complete in themselves, and may be played as songs without words. The melody is frequently, nay mostly, played as well as sung; the composer intended, perhaps, thereby to amalgamate better the different timbres of the pianoforte and human voice. As the part-writing is flowing, so the harmonic connection and modulations are free from awkwardness and harshness. Sometimes he concludes effectively in another key than that in which he begins; indeed, his harmonies are abounding in subtle traits of exquisite beauty and expressiveness. Franz rarely makes use of tone-painting, and when he does so he uses it with great moderation and due subordination—for instance, in "Not a star" (Op. 2, No. 3), "Auf dem Meere" (Op. 25, No. 6), "Ach wenn ich doch Immchen wär" (Op. 3, No. 6), "Im Frühling" (Op. 17, No. 5), and "Am Rheinfall" (Op. 44, No. 6).

As regards the form of Franz's songs, they are almost always strophic. Sometimes the music is literally the same in all verses ("The rose has made sad moan to me," Op. 12, No. 5), or slight, but generally expressive, changes are introduced, either in both parts (vocal and instrumental) or in one of them. As an example of a through-composed song, I will mention the Romance "Und wo noch kein Wanderer 'gangen" (Op. 35, No. 4). Conciseness characterises Franz's style. Repetitions of words are very rare with him, and always significant. As to his subjects, he is most felicitous in his settings of Heine's, Lenau's, and Osterwald's poems. Next to them may be named those of J. von Eichendorff, E. Geibel, and Mirza-Schaffy. Burns, too, is one of his favourite poets.

I have already briefly alluded to Franz's unselfish employment of the resources of his art over which he has so thorough a mastery. This unselfishness springs partly from his self-abandoning sympathy with his subjects, partly from the honesty and sincerity of his nature. His sole interest is always to raise the emotional treasures buried in the poem; the temptation to add extraneous matter, to write for effect, does not exist for him, or at least is successfully resisted. To this simplicity is owing much of the peculiar charm of Franz's songs. It is also the chief cause that the composer fails to attract the attention of the unobservant, and to engage the attention of the vulgar.

In conclusion, let me say this to those who do not yet know or do not yet love the subject of my essay. Robert Franz is like one of those quiet, unpretentious people you are apt to pass heedlessly by in a crowd, but who, if you once come in close contact with them, fascinate you, draw you to their hearts, and there hold you with fetters light as gossamer, strong as iron.

DR. HANSLICK AND GOUNOD'S "REDEMPTION."

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

THE recent performance of Gounod's new oratorio in Vienna gave the famous critic of the Neue Freie Presse an opportunity of expressing his opinion about the work. For that all connoisseurs waited with an anxiety more or less keen, according as they themselves felt more or less interested by the subject matter. No one pretends to ignore the importance of Dr. Hanslick's judgment. Concerning his zeal for the good of art no question can arise; the admirable balance of his intellect and feeling is on all hands recognised as a supreme qualification for critical work, while his literary power and extensive knowledge give weight to whatever he writes. True, the admirers of this distinguished man are not always able to agree with him, and it must be confessed that he has often put to a severe test the respect of those who follow the cult of Wagner and his congeners. No pen has been used with more perseverance and force against what some of us regard as musical heresy than that of Dr. Hanslick. The present writer certainly does not complain thereof. He has followed, longo intervallo, on the same line. Many others feel very keenly the trenchant remarks of the Viennese critic upon the gods worshipped in temples dedicated to the Zukunft. Yet even these, I venture to think, temper their irritation with respect, or, to put the case more correctly perhaps, view his action with the greater concern because of the estimate they set upon his honesty and influence. When, therefore, Dr. Hanslick speaks about the "Redemption," it behoves us to listen, not only for the actuality of what is said, but for its potentiality also. Wellington used to declare that Napoleon's presence in the field was equivalent to a force of 50,000 men. Similarly Dr. Hanslick's vote is not the vote of one person only. Thousands of musical readers entrust to him their consciences and their judgment. His pockets are full of proxies.

I propose now to examine Dr. Hanslick's remarks upon Gounod's oratorio, not in a spirit of cavil, but of pure criticism—the spirit which alone enters as of right into such a case.

Dr. Hanslick begins an article in the Neue Freie Presse, of November 11, by pointing out the early tendency of the French composer to church work. He refers to the sacred music written by him when at Rome, to the interesting evidence given by Fanny Hensel in a now well-known letter (see Die Familie Mendelssohn), and to his having been occupied, when at Berlin in 1843, with the text of an oratorio on the subject of Judith. Subsequently the master devoted himself to the lyric stage, "but," says Dr. Hanslick, "of late years even Gounod's operatic music began to take a religious colouring, as is shown by a decided leaning towards oratorio style in 'Polyeucte.'" The critic accepts this leaning—and, in the light of after events, he is entitled to do so—as evidence of Gounod's disposition towards ses premiers amours. Approaching old age, the sentiments that in early years were powerful began again to exercise authority. "The mysteries of the Church, which ruled Gounod's youth, and had already turned him towards spiritual things, seemed now, in his sixty-sixth year, to break forth with renewed force." All this must be accepted as a statement of fact, to which, indeed, M. Gounod would willingly confess. There can be no doubt that he is extremely susceptible to religious emotionalism. The artistic nature is necessarily emotional, and, in the French composer's case, a tendency towards mysticism brought all his individuality under the influence of religious ideas and feelings. It may be questioned whether he ever shook off the yoke. At any rate, we know that he has passed under it again, in obedience to a process which has almost the force and regularity of law. The youth and the old man in one and the same person often join hands across the gulf of time, so that, if "our little life is rounded with a sleep," our dreams at the end of it take the same texture as those which fascinated its beginning.

A question arises as to the purpose of Dr. Hanslick in dwelling upon a fact so well known as Gounod's pietism. The answer soon comes. Our critic contends that the composer, in an excess of religious feeling, wrote the "Redemption" more as a devotee than as a musician. "Genuine piety, so we believe, urged the operatic composer at last towards the work called the 'Redemption,' and ordained that in it his devotion should stand out more conspicuously than his talent." The writer presently adds: "This consideration carries us straight to the kernel of Gounod's oratorios—they are the work of a man who is pious, but, on account of so much piety, feeble as a composer. It would almost seem that he wrote in full view of Heine's words—'the less church music attracts notice the better it is.'" Dr. Hanslick then goes on to contend that an oratorio written for the concert-room belongs to a different category. Church music, we are told, is dominated by religious devotion, whereas other sacred music should be an exemplification of æsthetic devotion. The one contributes to the worship of God; the other to the worship of Art. Here I dare to join issue with my distinguished confrère, and decline to recognise the distinction he has set up.

What is the practical purpose of Church song? We cannot for a moment suppose that its acceptableness to the Divine Being depends upon its artistic form. He to Whom it is addressed looks only at the heart and takes nothing amiss "when simpleness and duty tender it." In this regard the ornate service of the cathedral and the uncultured offering of the village chapel have the same sweet savour. The difference lies in the reflex action upon ourselves. The more perfect the art, the more complete its influence over, not the worshipped Deity, but the worshipping man. If this be the case, upon what basis rests the argument for a distinction between the sacred music of the church and the sacred music of the concert-room? The one has a clear right to all of æsthetic culture that the other possesses—even, if possible, a greater right, since that which we devote to the God we worship should be the best which the powers He has given enable us to offer. This simple fact is recognised everywhere, and, in greater or less measure, by all churches. I must, therefore, decline to admit the distinction Dr. Hanslick sets up, and, consequently, to join with him in applying it as a test to the "Redemption." The question is not whether that work belongs to the church or the concert-room. If, as an oratorio, it be not fit for the one, I fail to see how it can be adapted for the other. Let me now carry the argument a step further.

Dr. Hanslick charges Gounod with having forgotten that in an oratorio we expect first of all, not religious devotion, but æsthetic; and he intimates that such a work is not elevated by Church surroundings so much as by the genius of the composition. I answer that these considerations are intimately affected by the nature of the subject treated. Dr. Hanslick appears to have made no distinction whatever between one religious theme and another. For anything he has to say on the matter they are all alike, and will all take the same sort of musical illustration. The instinctive feeling of the vast majority of English readers tells them that this is not so. They believe in a material difference, and the objection that once largely existed against countenancing oratorio at all was but an exaggeration of the sentiment upon which that belief is based. Take, for example, the story of Elijah and that of the Redeemer. In one case we have matter open to well nigh the same free treatment as a secular subject. All the devices of art are fitly applicable for the heightening of an effect which may be made strongly dramatic without reproach, since the events are those of human experience. It is different with the other narrative, wherein is an appeal to the profoundest emotions that sway the religious nature. The Incarnation, the Suffering, the Death, the Resurrection, the Ascension—at the very thought of these things all true Christendom becomes inspired with love, reverence, and awe. Approaching them, the composer enters a Holy of Holies, and must be careful how he treads. He had better leave outside every form of æstheticism that cannot be made strictly subordinate to his religious devotion. He may not use this theme as a mere vehicle for his art. From that course he is barred by the simple decencies of the case, and all he can do is so to treat the subject as to heighten its power without distracting the mind from contemplation, or supplanting devotion by artistic perceptiveness. Dr. Hanslick will perhaps reply, that if the life and work of the Redeemer may only be treated thus, the subject does not belong to the concert-room for which M. Gounod wrote. I fail to see where a limit to the religiousness of the concert-room comes in, and Dr. Hanslick can hardly contend that religiousness has no place there, since the argument would banish sacred works entirely, or lay their performance open to the charge of gross irreverence. The point of the matter lies here—religious subjects are to be treated by the musician, not with an eye to fancied distinction between the church and the concert-room, but with strict regard for their essential character. If they may be surrounded with all the sumptuous things of art, then let those properties be forthcoming, but if their awfulness forbid such decorative effects, music should minister humbly, and to the glory of its theme alone.

It is to the praise of M. Gounod, rather than his reproach, that, in Dr. Hanslick's words, he "carried out all through an intention to make the music of his sacred subject as simple and unostentatious as possible," doing his utmost to "turn the attention of the hearers as little as possible to the composition in order that it may be the better concentrated on the Biblical narrative." The result we all know. In England, at any rate, the "Redemption," because of the intensely devotional spirit to which its music ministers, has taken a place among the highest things of well-judged and rightly applied art. Its effect, some will argue, is religious rather than artistic. Granted, but no other effect would meet with acceptance. A "Redemption" which shall be artistic rather than religious is scarcely conceivable.

I trust it has been shown that Dr. Hanslick's argument against Gounod's work on the grounds above set forth will not stand, either in its distinction between music for the concert-room and music for the Church, or in its insistence upon the dominant claims of æstheticism in the matter of this particular oratorio.

Dr. Hanslick goes on to describe the purport of M. Gounod's Preface to his work, and then to deal with particulars of the work itself. Here also he finds evidence of a false basis. The illustrious critic touches, for example, upon certain avowedly descriptive passages, such as the March, which pictures the brutality of the Saviour's persecutors, and, in the narrative of the Resurrection, the skip of a third which M. Gounod uses to express the fact that "Christ, by His Divine power, has triumphed over the grave and over subjection to death." Dr. Hanslick applies to these pretensions the hard word unheilvolle, but in the act of accounting for their failure he pays a compliment to the composer, whom he describes as "by nature too really musical to agree seriously with the descriptive tendencies of Liszt and Berlioz, and to break away from true musical form." Next in order of mention comes the theme typical of the Redeemer. According to Dr. Hanslick this is not, strictly speaking, a leit-motive, but a separate melody, and he rightly describes its character as sweet and yearning. Let me add, by the way, that he notes what, as far as I am aware, had not previously been pointed out—the typical melody occurs nine times, and in Christianity nine, it appears, is a mystical number.

Little of all the foregoing calls for answer. Dr. Hanslick will hardly deny that descriptive music is legitimate, though its rank may not be the highest, and he cannot for a moment suppose that M. Gounod regards a skip of a third, or any other interval, as musically equivalent to the Resurrection. Admitting descriptive music, its significance must lie somewhere within itself, and must spring from a certain adaptation or arrangement of technical resources. M. Gounod simply tells us what he means by the skip in the case referred to, and the question is, not whether the interval of a third can describe a raising from the dead, but whether, coming at the right moment after a sequence of tones and semitones, it is suggestive and appropriate. Dr. Hanslick's contention that the Redeemer theme would just as well represent in "Faust" the longing of the rejuvenated Doctor for his victim, or that of Romeo for Juliet, seems to me hardly worthy of so able a writer. Dr. Hanslick, it is true, admits that this is owing rather to the essential vagueness of music than to the composer's inability, but the consideration should have led him to withhold the objection altogether, since, as criticism, it cannot be pertinent.

Dr. Hanslick enters into further particulars regarding the constructive peculiarities of Gounod's work, and betrays a tendency to exaggeration rather surprising in one usually so careful. He says that "the two Narrators adhere firmly almost throughout to one tone, only now and then venturing a step up or down." He charges the choral numbers with the same poorness and monotony, because "for the most part they are sung in unison, while even in those which employ four voices almost all the parts progress in the same way, without fugal or contrapuntal device or characteristic figuration." I leave the readers of THE MUSICAL TIMES, who know the "Redemption," to say whether Dr. Hanslick has here given a perfectly accurate description, or whether, in stating a rule, he has overlooked many and important exceptions. The Viennese critic does not dwell long upon such details as the foregoing. He soon reverts to general observations, and closes his notice with remarks which are severe almost to bitterness.

After comparing the oratorio to a plain on which no natural feature arrests special attention, he intimates that it must be accepted as wholly beautiful or not beautiful at all. Hardly a page of the work, we are told, can be praised as skilful, genial, or original, and hardly another condemned as faulty, vulgar, or ugly. Consequently, only very pious and musically very appreciative hearers will leave a performance of the "Redemption" with a wish "to be redeemed by Gounod a second time." It seems to me that this last sentence contains the French composer's justification. Music that is one with its subject will be little cared for by those to whom the subject is indifferent, and as in the "Redemption" art enters into the story to be there absorbed, rather than to carry on a consciously independent existence, it follows as of course that those to whom religion means nothing approach the work without interest and leave it without satisfaction.

Dr. Hanslick should have stopped here; but unfortunately his notice has a coda, and therein is found a sting, sharp and acrid beyond common. He says: "We will not enquire whether it has been simply religious meekness and humility that have kept him (Gounod) so far from art and brilliancy in the 'Redemption.' . . . A man may become a monk from piety, also from poverty. One thing is clear—that with the measure of talent Gounod now possesses he can hardly hope to write a good opera; but he could certainly trust himself to compose an oratorio of such harmless respectability (harmlose Anständigkeit) as the 'Redemption.' So he has at least shown himself as much a self-critic as a religious enthusiast." With great respect for Dr. Hanslick, I believe this to be the kind of criticism that is better left unanswered. M. Gounod can defend himself from sneers if he think it worth while, and the best reply to whatever argument the quoted words contain is discoverable in the profound impression made by the "Redemption" upon the vast majority of its hearers—an impression quite miraculous as the result of a work which is no more than one of "harmless respectability." The appeal is from Dr. Hanslick's opinion to the verdict of a great religious and musical community, by whom alone such an oratorio as the "Redemption" can be judged. That verdict has been given, and I, for one, am satisfied with it.

HANDEL'S ORCHESTRATION.

By EBENEZER PROUT.

IN no other country of Europe are the works of Handel so admired, nowhere else is his genius so venerated, as in England. Yet even here, out of the enormous number of compositions which he produced, there are certainly not a dozen, probably hardly more than half-a-dozen, which can be said to be thoroughly familiar to the general public; while even of professional musicians there are very few who are acquainted with the whole series of the oratorios, to say nothing of the operas. Consequently, while amateurs have a fairly adequate idea of Handel's grandeur of style, few have any conception of his almost exhaustless variety. In saying this, I am not denying that in one sense he repeats himself a great deal. There are certain formulæ, certain cadences, belonging to the age when they were written, which recur in nearly every work. There is also much which is now antiquated; and there are few people who would have the patience to sit out any of Handel's oratorios (excepting "Israel in Egypt") if given unabridged. The operas are as a whole still more old-fashioned, consisting almost entirely of songs connected by interminable recitatives; and, in spite of the many beauties which they contain, the revival of one of them now would be an intolerable anachronism. Yet, after making every deduction for that which possesses only an historical interest, there remains in the collection of Handel's works a mine of beauty of which few but those who have made a special study of him know anything at all.

One of the commonest misconceptions among musicians with regard to Handel is that his orchestration is wanting in variety, especially in the songs. It has occurred to me that it may be worth while to endeavour to prove the fallacy of this view; and I propose in this series of papers to enter into a somewhat detailed examination of Handel's scores from the point of view of their instrumentation only, leaving out of consideration all questions of musical beauty, except in so far as that may be connected with the treatment of the orchestra. I hope to prove conclusively that it is an entire mistake to suppose that Handel's instrumentation is monotonous. It will be necessary to enter into technical details to such an extent that I have a strong suspicion these articles will be found dry and tedious by all except those specially interested in the subject. It is to such that I address myself; and I advise all other readers to pass to something more likely to prove interesting.

The earlier editions of Handel's scores—those of Walsh, Randall, Wright, and Arnold—are so inaccurate, and especially so incomplete (instruments being often omitted altogether), as to be virtually useless for my purpose. The only reliable edition is that now in course of publication by the German Handel Society, under the superintendence of Dr. Chrysander. As there are still between twenty and thirty volumes wanting to complete that edition, I shall be unable to notice the whole of the oratorios and operas; but in some seventy volumes which I have examined I have found amply sufficient for my purpose.

The composition of the orchestra which Handel employed differed radically from that of the present day, not only in the fact that (as will be seen presently) it contained many instruments now entirely obsolete, but also in the proportion of the various masses. We find in Rousseau's "Dictionnaire de Musique" a plan of the opera orchestra of Dresden, as it existed under Hasse in 1754—five years before Handel's death—and there is every reason to believe that the composition of the orchestra in London at the same date was very similar. The orchestra at Dresden consisted of two harpsichords, at one of which the conductor and at the other the accompanist sat, eight first and seven second violins, four violas, three violoncellos, three double-basses, two flutes, five oboes, five bassoons, two horns, two trumpets, and drums. I shall be able to prove, to all but absolute certainty, from Handel's scores that the proportion between wind and strings could not have been very dissimilar in his orchestra. We have also the documentary evidence of the list of performers at the Foundling Hospital, when "The Messiah" was given there on May 3, 1759, immediately after Handel's death. The list is preserved at the Foundling, and it shows that there were twelve violins, three violas, two violoncellos, two double-basses, four oboes, four bassoons, two horns, two trumpets, and drums—the proportions, it will be observed, being nearly the same as at Dresden. It may be worth noting, as bearing on the question of "additional accompaniments," that there are no bassoons or horns in Handel's score of "The Messiah," and that the oboes are only to be found in the chorus "Their sound is gone out."

One sometimes hears a wish expressed for the performance of one of Handel's works in its original form. Were it possible to realise such an idea, it would doubtless be most interesting, if only from an archæological point of view; but those who cry out against all additional accompaniments either do not know or do not choose to remember that what they are clamouring for is unattainable. In the first place, one would require two harpsichords, with two good players, able to fill up Handel's harmonies as the composer did himself, sometimes without even a figured bass to guide them. Where are they to be found? And even supposing them found, what guarantee can we possibly have that the filling-up is the same which Handel used? Besides, the only harpsichord now obtainable would probably be at least a hundred years old, and the tone would be no more like that of a new instrument than would be that of a piano of the same age if played in a concert-room; while the substitution of a modern piano for the harpsichord would not realise Handel's effect in the least. And how will the old harpsichords mix with our modern instruments? To come to another point: suppose the number of oboes to be increased so as to have one-third as many as there are violins, we still do not realise Handel's effects; for the oboe of the last century (as is shown by Dr. Stone, in his article "Oboe," in Grove's Dictionary) was played with a different kind of reed from that now used, and possessed a quality of tone more like that of the musette played by itinerant Tyrolese musicians than like that of the modern oboe. Four of our oboes against twelve violins will not reproduce Handel's effect at all accurately. Again, what shall we do for the two organs prescribed in the score of "Israel," to say nothing of the teorba and arciliuto wanted for "Esther" and "Athalia," or of other instruments used by Handel which are as extinct as the dodo? It is no more possible to reproduce the orchestra of Handel precisely than that of the ancient Greeks and Romans; and those who object to a certain amount of modernisation of his scores must be content to go without hearing his music at all.

I have digressed somewhat from my course, but the remarks on the impossibility of giving one of Handel's works exactly as he gave it himself seemed a natural corollary to the statement (which requires no proof beyond an examination of the scores) that his orchestra was fundamentally different from that of our day. And this brings me to my next point—that his system of treating the orchestra also differed widely from that of modern composers. With the exception of the clarinet, ophicleide, tuba, and some of the percussion instruments (such as the triangle), all the instruments of an ordinary modern score may be found in Handel's works, besides many not now employed. But, of all these, only strings, oboes, and bassoons are used frequently; the flutes, horns, trumpets, and drums are reserved for special effects; sometimes they are only in one or two numbers of a work. When they appear, they are treated in such a way as to show that the composer thoroughly understood their capabilities, and that the moderation in their introduction was the result of system. The songs are sometimes accompanied only by basses and a harpsichord—the simplest form of Handel's scoring; sometimes to these are added violins in unison, not unfrequently doubled by the oboes, especially in the symphonies; sometimes the string quartet is used for accompaniment, occasionally without, though more frequently with, the harpsichord. These are the most frequent combinations in solo music; though as we proceed to examine the scores we shall find many songs in which important solo parts are given to the wind. The score of "Saul" proves beyond a doubt that in accompanying songs the organ was not used at all—except, of course, in the rare cases in which it is treated as an obbligato instrument and to play the bass (tasto solo) with the basses of the orchestra. The choruses are mostly accompanied by strings, oboes, and bassoons, to which is added the organ in oratorios and the harpsichord in operas. The oboes usually double either the violins or the treble voices in unison, though we shall find places where they have independent parts giving fuller harmony; the bassoons generally play with the violoncellos, sometimes with the bass voices; and occasionally they double the violas, if these instruments have an important part. The horns and trumpets are not treated in the modern style, but have mostly melodic passages, which frequently lie very high, as is also the case with Bach's horn and trumpet parts. The drums are only exceptionally used for solo effects, or for dramatic colouring; usually they play with the trumpets in the *tutti*s.

It will probably surprise many of my readers when I say that there are few modern effects of orchestration which have not been at some time or other anticipated by Handel, or of which the germ at least may not be found in his scores; yet this is the simple truth. The contrasts of the different departments of the orchestra—strings, reeds, and brass—the effects of sustained wind harmonies against moving strings, the combinations of solo instruments with the voice, the use of sordini and of the pizzicato for the strings: we find them all—less frequently, no doubt, than in modern scores, but to a degree that proves Handel's perfect mastery of the orchestra of his day. Had he lived a century later, he would have been in instrumentation the rival of Berlioz and Wagner.

In my next paper I propose to commence the examination of Handel's scores, taking them as far as possible in chronological order, so as to trace better the gradual enlargement of orchestral resources by his genius.

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

No. XIII.—CHERUBINI (concluded from page 654).

It is now time to speak of the compositions which Cherubini gave to the world in his last years—that is to say, between 1830, when the choir of the Chapel Royal and his office connected therewith were suppressed, and 1839 when he ceased to write. During that period, the master, as may be supposed, was several times tempted to resume work in connection with the lyric stage. M. Pixérecourt, author of the drama, "Les Mines de Pologne," from which the libretto of "Faniska" was taken, had previously sought Cherubini's help in an adaptation of the work for the Opéra Comique. The composer consented, but found, on looking at the score, that it could not be made to suit a French audience, and the project consequently fell through. Indeed his zeal for opera had abated, in presence of increasing love for the music of the Church. It was, therefore, with no great hope of success that Scribe and Mélesville approached him on the subject of his opera, "Koukourgi," written in 1793, and never produced. M. Pougín gives a very clear account of the transaction that ensued, and his words may be quoted with advantage:—

"Why was the work never brought out? That is what no one to-day can tell. One thing, however, is certain: The libretto was supplied by Duveyriér, father of the ingenious and fertile dramatic author who made himself known under the name of Mélesville, and who, wishing to derive some profit from the paternal prose, suggested to Scribe, his usual literary colleague, the idea of joining him in re-arranging the book of 'Koukourgi,' which no longer suited the taste of the day, and of making the public acquainted with Cherubini's music. The two authors called upon the composer, and explained to him their desire, which he seems to have agreed to without much pressure. As is invariably the case under such circumstances, they were to follow almost exactly the original course of the story, so that the situations might be reproduced, and the sense of the music and the form of the numbers not changed. But, as is also invariably the case, changes and modifications cropped up in the course of the work, and the musician was bound to have his share of them. Thus Cherubini was obliged to write a large number of new pieces. Then 'Koukourgi' was in three acts only, while 'Ali Baba'—such were the new title and subject adopted—was in four, with a prologue; moreover, the work was remodelled, and first destined for the Opéra Comique, was eventually taken to the Opéra, and naturally subjected to fresh modifications and important alterations. It was not, consequently, till after the lapse of several years that it could possibly be brought out."

Fétis states that the work thus laboriously put together was "almost entirely new" and that the manuscript ran to no less than a thousand pages. He adds, with great truth and force: "It is something marvellous that a master whose first compositions are dated 1773 should have been able to write with the spirit of youth, sixty years afterwards, an immense musical work; modify his talent with rare facility, without ceasing to be himself; find fresh and brilliant ideas, when only experience and learning were expected from him, and light upon accents of love and passion in a septuagenarian heart." We have seen that the work was carried to the Opéra, but it must not be supposed that the authorities of the grand theatre were very anxious to have it. Dr. Véron, the then director, accepted "Ali Baba" against his own judgment, entirely out of respect for an illustrious old composer. Nor does it appear that Cherubini himself cherished very sanguine hopes. We learn from Halévy that, though he attended the rehearsals—and at times made his presence very much felt there—he ran away from the performance, going to Versailles, and, watch in hand, letting his fancy follow what was at the moment being done in Paris. "At five-and-twenty minutes past eleven 'Ali Baba' was over by his watch, which, he said, went very well and kept Opéra time. He retired to bed, slept soundly, returned to Paris only after having received a re-assuring despatch, and never went to see this opera, of which he never spoke again, except to observe "It is too old to live long. It was forty when it came into the world." Readers of the Memoirs of Berlioz may remember that, according to his own account, that excellent hater of Cherubini greatly distinguished himself by offering an increasing number of francs for an idea, and it must be said in some sort of justification that the Parisians generally had no great opinion of "Ali Baba." It was played four times, set aside for two months while Nourrit took his holidays, reproduced on that artist's return, and soon finally withdrawn. Mr. Bellasis quotes from Boigne's "Petits Memoires de l'Opéra" a rather amusing account of its first night's reception:—

"In 'Ali Baba' everything was wearisome and soporific—poem, music, and ballet; the airs of which were, however, composed by Halévy. Those fastidious forty thieves had better have rested eternally in their jars and in the works of Galland. Cherubini demanding hospitality at the Opéra for 'Ali Baba' has the same effect with me as would Belisarius holding out his helmet to the passers by. 'Ali Baba' is one of those fossilised operas which a director only accepts when they are thrust down his throat by illustrious old age, and for fear of being declared a vandal, the director had to pass it off for a chef d'œuvre, and with a loss of fifty to sixty thousand francs. But the public, who were not bound by the same considerations as M. Véron, yawned so much and so widely, under Ali Baba's very nose, that real hissing would have spoken less eloquently. The public condemned without appeal, and executed pitilessly those forty thieves who had not stolen anything."

The same writer tells us—we may accept the statement or not—that Cherubini laid all the blame of failure on the chorus, remarking "With such miserable choristers as those of the Opéra no success is possible. I could never make one of my forty thieves sing, or even march, in time." Mendelssohn, as readers of his letters may recollect, criticised the music of the piece with his usual freedom, declaring that, though "enchanted" with many parts, he could not accept Cherubini's new-fangled orchestration, in which it seemed "as if the instruments were nothing and the effect everything. . . . As if it were the audience who had skins of parchment instead of the drums." On the other hand, a writer in the Niedersheinische Musik Zeitung said: "Cherubini was seventy-three years of age, but both his head and his heart had remained young, and his latest dramatic production displayed, in conjunction with the maturest knowledge and the most beautiful form, the loveliest blossoms of profound feeling and youthful passion. That the work did not retain its place in the repertory was not astonishing in the case of a public intoxicated by the perfumes arising from the flowery path which Rossini and his imitators had forced the opera to take." This was not the only mark of German appreciation. "Ali Baba," produced in Paris, July 22, 1833, was performed in Berlin, February 27, 1835, "with great success." Thenceforth the old master wrote no more for the stage.

It has been stated in an earlier chapter that Cherubini diversified his labours, when about fifty years of age, by writing a string Quartet in E flat. We now find him, nearly a quarter of a century later, returning with almost youthful zest to that form of composition, which, no doubt, he found better suited to his years than the more exciting labour of operas and masses. "It occupies and amuses me," he said to Ferdinand Hiller, "for I have not the least pretension in the matter." About the value of this music connoisseurs differ greatly. For example, Professor Macfarren, having before him the Quartet in E flat (1814) and that in C (1829), founded on Cherubini's London Symphony, writes in the "Imperial Dictionary" as follows: "Their merit entitles them to no distinction, and it is scarcely to be supposed that his several subsequent works of the same class which have not been printed can possess any greater interest, since these prove the author's entire want of feeling for the style, and aptitude for the form of, instrumental chamber music." On the other hand, Hiller describes the Quartet as "full of delicacy and piquancy," which indeed it is; Schumann speaks of it as "full of life," and adds that the Finale sparkles "like a diamond when you shake it;" while Fétis remarks of all the Quartets: "These compositions are of a very high order. Cherubini has here a style of his own, as in all his works. He imitates neither the manner of Haydn, nor that of Mozart; nor that of Beethoven." Between Professor Macfarren and the majority opposed to him, we shall not pretend to decide; but simply express a modest opinion that Cherubini's instrumental works for the chamber are not only interesting, as, bearing his name, they must needs be, but a distinct and valuable addition to the repertory of their class, because so full of fresh and charming individuality. The revival of the old master's regard for this form of music seems to have been due to the eminent violinist, Baillot, who introduced the Quartet in E flat at one of his Quartet parties with much applause. Then, as we have seen, Cherubini founded a second upon the symphony, written in London, and subsequently composed four others, three of which, it appears, still remain in manuscript. Concerning the Quartet in C, Schumann says: "A few dry bars, the work of the intellect alone, there are, as in most of Cherubini's works, but even in these there is always something interesting in the passage, some ingenious contrivance or imitation, something to think about. There is most spirit in the Scherzo and last movement, which are both full of wonderful life. The Adagio has a striking individual A minor character, something romantic and Provençalish. After hearing it several times its charms grow, and it closes in such a manner as to make you begin listening again, though knowing that the end is near at hand." The master's last chamber composition was a Quintet, written in 1836. Of this Ferdinand Hiller tells us:—

"When I left Paris in 1836, Cherubini was writing a Quintet for stringed instruments, and told me with perfect simplicity that he intended to write half-a-dozen more. . . . The Quintet was executed in his own room, when he was seventy-eight, and greatly surprised the artists of Paris."

Fétis adds to this:—

"In the winter of 1838, Cherubini invited to his house a few artists, and had performed for them the Quintet he had just finished. They all experienced the liveliest emotion at the work, the author of which was then seventy-eight years old. Even if we grant that this great age was not entirely without influence on the impression produced, it is no less true that every one perceived in the work a freshness of ideas which, it might have been thought, could scarcely belong to an old man on the brink of the grave. Cherubini's hand trembled when tracing these last emanations of his talent, but his mind had preserved all its clearness and all its vigour."

Following the Quintet came a few solfeggi, and when Cherubini, in 1839, had written an arietta for an album, the old man's work was done; the pen dropped for ever from his tired fingers, and the few years of life remaining belonged to his family and friends alone.

Respectful interest and admiration naturally desire to follow him into his home, and happily we are not left to imagine what sort of a place it was, and how its master bore himself amid relatives and friends. It need not be pointed out, after what has already been said as to Cherubini's personal character, that he was no surly misanthrope, shutting himself up and growling like a bear in his den. On the contrary, "the grim Florentine" never pulled his latch string in against artists, colleagues, and friends. However apparently stern and unsympathetic in his official relations, at home and in the social circle he was genial and even gay. Under his roof, if we may believe M. Pougin, "There prevailed an affectionate neighbourly feeling, a charming familiarity, and an intercourse entirely free from restraint, revealing a new and unknown Cherubini—a Cherubini who had lost all his ruggedness; smiling because he had thrown off the last trace of his official positions; attentive to every one, and ready to enter into friendly conversations—in a word, quite another Cherubini to the one we have always been shown up to the present time, and very different to the by no means flattering portrait biographers have been pleased to draw of him." How many distinguished artists used to visit the old man thus revealed to us as happy and lovable in his home! At times might have been met there Boiëldieu and his wife, Carafa, Berton, Bordogni, the singing-master, and his wife, Madame Rigault; Narderman, the harpist, Zimmermann, the pianist; Viotti, Kalkbrenner, Heller, Chopin, Thalberg, Rossini, and a host of others. These—Viotti excepted, for Cherubini could never forget the affair of the Opéra direction—were admitted into the inner circle, and made free of the house. Most welcome of all, perhaps, to the quiet self-contained Cherubini was boisterous expansive Rossini—les extrêmes se touchent. "He who brought with him life, movement, and gaiety; he whose beaming and sonorous laugh, and meridional fluency of speech, together with his vibrating and re-echoing voice, came to disturb with a sort of violence the ordinarily discreet echoes of the always calm and half-silent household was Rossini—Rossini, then in all the prime of age and health, jocosely by nature and by taste, always indulging in raillery and banter; an inexhaustible narrator of good stories, never at a loss for anecdotes and piquant tales; a man who appeared unable to look at anything seriously; who had always a bit of sly malice to slip into the conversation, and whom two men only, Cherubini and Boiëldieu, could induce to speak of art in a reasonable manner, and without laughing at people." This great, full life must indeed have come into the house like a whirlwind, making everything whirl and dance in rhythm with itself. When Rossini entered at the door, quietness flew out at the window. "Tranquillity was impossible. He set every one off with his good-humoured sarcasm and rollicking high spirits!" But when Rossini was not there, order prevailed. "The ladies talked among themselves. Sometimes the company played at cards: bouillotte, all-fours, or whist, Cherubini willingly taking a hand, especially at whist, of which he was particularly fond; sometimes, also, he would play backgammon, either with Salvador or Gide. On other occasions, when Boiëldieu and Cicéri were there, he would join them. All three then began drawing, and all three being very clever, produced some charming things. Sometimes, again, it happened that Cherubini, leaving his wife to look after his guests, would retire a little to work. He used to seat himself at the table placed against his old Erard piano, and there, with a quantity of music paper under his hand, absorbed and abstracted in his inspiration, he would write a piece of music without a single erasure or correction, and afterwards carefully put it away in one of his portfolios. It mattered nothing to him that twenty persons went on talking, laughing, and arguing; provided they did not sing, it was immaterial to him what they did."

Into this haven of rest and enjoyment Cherubini retired, when his work in the world was done, and there he awaited the angel of Death. He was prepared for the coming of the good spirit, which Gothic fancy has so horribly misrepresented in more than one way. He had, for example, got ready his own "Requiem," moved thereto by a somewhat singular circumstance. When his pupil, Boiëldieu, died in 1834, it was intended to perform the "Requiem" in C minor as the funeral service. This purpose, however, could not be carried out. The then Archbishop of Paris, like Cardinal Manning amongst ourselves, had a very strong objection to the presence of females in church choirs, and as the work just named could not be given without women's voices, there was no alternative but to withdraw it. Cherubini naturally felt a little annoyed at this. He loved Boiëldieu much—"J'ai perdu un ami, un frère!" he exclaimed at the grave—and the performance of his music on the last occasion when honour could be directly paid, would have been a consolation in grief. The master seems then to have looked forward and anticipated some such difficulty on the occasion of his own obsequies. He is reported to have said: "I shall do one for myself which will play them (the priests) a good turn, and to which there will be no objection." Thus originated the "Requiem" in D minor, for male voices in three parts—one of the severest, noblest, and most impressive things in the whole repertory of church music. The old master did not keep his work by him, as sacred to the purpose for which he primarily intended it. According to Mr. Bellasis, the "Dies Iræ" was performed at a Conservatoire concert, in March, 1837, and, a year later, the whole Mass was given under the same auspices. Previously to this Mendelssohn had heard of it, with perfect faith in its worth, for we find him writing to the directors of the Lower Rhine Festival, in January, 1838, as thus: "With regard to the second day, I may first enquire whether you intend to apply to Cherubini for his grand 'Requiem'; it must be translated (!) and is entirely for men's voices; but as it will only last an hour, even less, that would not much matter, and, according to the universal verdict, it is a splendid work."

The events of Cherubini's life between the composition of the Quintet—in effect his last work—and the day when he passed away were naturally few. Moscheles tells of a visit to him in 1839, and of the aged composer saying that "with the exception of the Directorship at the Conservatoire, he had nothing more to do with music; he couldn't write another note; he wasn't strong enough to hear and enjoy musical impressions." In 1841 Cherubini sat for his portrait to Ingres, and the result was the well-known picture, half literal, half allegorical, wherein the master appears in his ordinary dress, while Polyhymnia, in classic attire, stretches her hand over her votary. In February, 1842, the old man voluntarily put an end to his long connection with the great school he had helped to found in the stormy days of the Revolution. Failing health made it impossible for him to discharge the duties of his high office, and so strict a disciplinarian was not likely to sanction in himself, for whatever reason, the neglect he had never allowed in others. So he sent in his resignation and insisted on its acceptance, refusing point-blank to avail himself of "unlimited leave of absence." On this, King Louis Philippe, never very ready at generous and graceful acts, woke up to a perception of what was fitting, and bestowed upon Cherubini the Commander's Cross of the Legion of Honour—a dignity never before awarded to a musician. The master enjoyed it but a little while. He rapidly became weaker, and on March 12, 1842, while his family and friends, among whom was the faithful Halévy, stood around his bed, he peacefully fell asleep, in the eighty-second year of his age.

Cherubini's death, though naturally looked for, made a profound impression in musical Europe. The master had lived so long and filled so great a place, that he was instinctively regarded almost as an institution. His departure created a void that nothing seemed able to fill, and from all quarters came the tribute of grief and respectful sympathy. In one English journal it was said: "Cherubini is no more! The founder of the French Conservatoire, the instructor of a thousand eminent musicians, the composer of innumerable undying productions, who for more than forty years has been loved by those who knew him personally, and admired by all Europe, who has outlived all rivals, and sustained the highest undisputed glory of his art." Another English writer compared the master's death to "the extinguishment of the sacred fire upon an altar, which overspreads the whole temple with a sudden gloom, and leaves but the sweet odour of the incense, which shall burn no more." After saying that it would be idle grief to lament for one who lived so long and nobly, the same writer went on: "Still, one cannot help an emotion almost amounting to awe, when we learn that such a man has passed away from among us; when we are brought to contemplate the rational miracle of a human mind which, for more than seventy years, has continually poured forth its beautiful imaginings in countless variety. When we but surmise how rich and vast the reminiscences and associations of such a mind must be, mingling as it has done with all the brightest and best of its kindred nature during three-quarters of a century; and when we are forced to know that such a man and such a mind, and such a treasury of golden tokens are henceforth to be themselves but a memory." On the other side of the Channel the deceased composer's pupil, Adolphe Adam, lifted up an eloquent voice and said: "That name shall be immortal, that glory will not perish, for, though Cherubini may cease to be numbered among the first of composers, where is the master who has produced such scholars? The excellence of his system is best proved by the diversity of talent developed in those who have enjoyed the advantage of his admirable lessons. To each he gave an individuality, but to all, that unaffected purity of style of which his own works furnish such beautiful examples, and which it is delightful to see reflected in the compositions of the musical generation he has created."

Cherubini's funeral was worthy of so great a man. The body, after lying in state in the great hall of the Conservatoire, was escorted to the Church of St. Roch by a procession of over three thousand persons in some way or other connected with the musical art. The cortège was preceded by two regiments of infantry in compliment to the rank of the deceased as a Commander of the Legion, a band of sixty-five instruments playing the Dead March written by him for the funeral of General Hoche, and the pall being borne by Auber, Halévy, Ingres, and Raoul-Rochette. In the church the "Requiem" for male voices was performed by the artists of the Opéra, the Italian Opera and the Opéra Comique, and, at its conclusion, the honoured remains were carried to Père la Chaise. The grave was dug near those of Grétry and Boiëldieu, and standing above it Raoul-Rochette Lafont, Halévy, and a pupil of the Conservatoire eulogised the deceased and bade him farewell, great crowd listening unaffected by a downpour of hail. So, with fitting rites, passed from the world a great and remarkable man, whose fame will outlive all changes of taste, because the principles his work exemplify are the eternal principles of true art.

RUBINSTEIN'S "SULAMITH."

It is remarkable that the idyllic story of the Hebrew poem known as "The Song of Songs" should have escaped, till lately, the notice of those who hunt after untouched Biblical subjects for music. Almost every other narrative in the Sacred Writings came long ago under observation, and now very few indeed remain, but no one appears to have thought of the sweetest among them all. This may be explained, perhaps, by the obscurity of the text, regarded as that of a drama, and by the fact that the elucidation it has received from modern Hebrew scholars is yet known to few. Even more noteworthy perhaps, is it that after such prolonged neglect "song" has been almost simultaneously chosen by Herr Julius Rodenberg, in Germany, as the subject of an opera, and by Mr. Joseph Bennett, in England, as the theme of an oratorio. Both, it would appear, have gone to the same source, namely, the commentary of Ewald, whose learned and fascinating interpretation of the ancient poem is, in the main, supported by M. Rénan and others. They have, however, treated it very differently, though on some points the book of the German opera and that of the English oratorio are in accord. It may be of some interest to show how the two librettists, each, of course, working independently, have dealt with the delightful Eastern story.

Mr. Bennett divides the text of "The Rose of Sharon" into four scenes, whereas "Sulamith" has five. He lays the first scene in Lebanon, showing how the cavalcade of King Solomon and the princes of Israel passes near the vineyards in which Sulamith and her beloved are labouring, and how the beauty of the maiden so charms the spectators that she is at once taken away to Jerusalem to the harem of the king. In the second scene we find Sulamith in the palace, dwelling upon the thought of her shepherd lover, while her attendants vaunt the glory of Solomon, and promise her a share. She sees that glory at its greatest, as the Ark is solemnly borne to the newly-built Temple in magnificent procession; yet she remains firm. The third scene brings complete victory over temptation. Solomon pleads his cause in person, but all in vain; and the last scene shows the return of Sulamith to her native mountains, where she is received with joy and thanksgiving. Such is, in outline, the story of the oratorio upon which Mr. A. C. Mackenzie now labours.

Herr Rodenberg places his first scene in the palace at Jerusalem, beginning what time Sulamith speaks fondly of her lover to the women, who seek to turn her heart towards the King. Presently, the voice of the Beloved is heard from behind the scenes, and Sulamith would fly to him, but the women perceive the King approaching, and check her. Solomon enters, and presses his suit in glowing language. She answers with passionate emotion, and presently sleeps exhausted on the divan, where, watched by the King and the women, she dreams, and invokes her lover. Solomon commands that she be not disturbed; the women repeating his words as the curtain falls. The second scene is laid in Lebanon, where vineyard-tenders and shepherds sing and dance. To them comes the Beloved calling for his "little dove." The men answer enigmatically with the vineyard song, "Kill we the foxes that ravage the vines," but the women plainly tell the unhappy Shepherd how and by whom his Sulamith has been taken away. He has then a song of grief and despair, and the curtain falls upon an ensemble. When next it rises we again see the interior of the palace. Sulamith, alone, repeats the incidents of the dream in which she seeks her lover through the city. Soon she hears him calling to her from without. She flies to the window, and a passionate dialogue follows, at the end of which the Shepherd climbs the balcony and appears on the stage; the inevitable love duet of course follows, and is carried on at much length. Presently, the voices of Solomon's guards are heard without, but the lovers escape by the terrace, and as they do so the scene closes. The fourth scene shows an open space before the palace, at early morning, just as the Captain of the Watch and his men call upon the citizens of Jerusalem to rise and hold high Festival. The Captain sees the lovers flying from the Palace and orders them to be brought before him. They declare their relation to each other, but the soldiers laugh at and mock them. The ensemble, an animated and prolonged one, ends, as does the scene, in the lovers being haled to prison. In the final act we see the hall of Solomon's Palace. The women are lamenting the flight of Sulamith, but presently the stage fills with a festive throng, eager to witness the marriage of their King. Dances, processions, patriotic choruses, and so on, come in due course; and presently Solomon commands the women to bring in the Bride, while the "daughters of Jerusalem," all unconscious of what has taken place, prepare to escort her. At that moment the Watchmen enter with their prisoners. The Bride is there, in bonds and shame. A long scene of explanation follows; the heart of Solomon is touched by so much constancy; he sets the lovers free, withdraws his own pretensions, and all ends happily.

It appears from the foregoing outline that Herr Rubinstein's librettist has taken many liberties with the story as laid down by Ewald, but he has done nothing alien to its spirit or for which some sort of excuse cannot be found in the original. His difficulty was, of course, to obtain sufficient action for the stage, and it is clearly this that he kept in view when departing from the strict line of the poem. In the oratorio, of course, Mr. Bennett had no such exigence to consider; his special duty, from which Herr Rodenberg was in turn free, being to envelop the whole drama in an atmosphere as religious as circumstances would allow.

In a subsequent article we shall call attention to Herr Rubinstein's music, upon which, let us only say now, regard will not be wasted.

A NEW EDITION OF SCHUBERT'S SONGS.

CONSIDERING the popularity of Schubert's songs, it might at first sight appear as if a new edition of them could mean nothing more than a reprint. An interesting article contributed by Herr Max Kalbeck to the Presse of Vienna, however, proves that difficulties as to various questions connected with Schubert's songs have been felt for some time by those best qualified to speak on the matter. For example—but let Herr Kalbeck speak for himself: "We remember well a beautiful day in May, on which we entered early and left late the house at Frankfort of the celebrated singer of Schubert, Julius Stockhausen. It was a day as beautiful and suggestive as that day must have been on which the dreamy song 'Ich hört' ein Bächlein rauschen' was heard for the first time, and Stockhausen sang us all the favourite songs, which we had so long wished in vain to hear. In the pauses between the songs there was much talk of the mistakes of great and small musicians, and of various traditional errors that were printed and sung. . . . Stockhausen had sung 'The Wanderer,' and I quoted from memory the melancholy introductory verses of the poem by Schmidt of Lubeck. . . . Why did Schubert alter that beautiful poem in so many places? And why did he not set these, the best lines of all, to music? Stockhausen knew no more than I did." It would appear that conversations such as these led the well-known Leipzig publishers, Messrs. C. F. Peters, to commission a pupil of Stockhausen, Herr Max Friedländer, to prepare a critical edition of Schubert's songs. Herr Friedländer seems to have devoted himself to his task with even more than Teutonic industry and earnestness, and the first fruits of his labours may be expected with the New Year. The new edition, we are told, will correct "hundreds of errors," and amongst these "hundreds of errors" are to be found such serious matters as alterations of marks of expression, the insertion or omission of ties, and, above all, changes in the harmony, so that it is clear Schubert's music has been tampered with to a very great and probably hitherto unsuspected extent. As an instance of the thorough-going nature of Herr Friedländer's work, we may select his solution of the difficulty already mentioned with regard to the apparently inexplicable alterations made in the song of "The Wanderer." A version similar to that set by Schubert appeared in Becker's "Taschenbuch zum geselligen Vergnügen" (1808). Then Prof. Deinhardstein placed the song in his "Dichtung für Kunstredner" (1815), making a number of injudicious alterations and giving Z. Werner as the author's name. It follows that Schubert merely set the poem as he found it, and is completely freed from the imputation of having spoiled it.

A work of this kind is, of course, only rendered possible by co-operation, and in this matter Herr Friedländer has been very fortunate. Amongst those who have rendered most material assistance are to be found the names of Professor Max Müller, Count von Bauernfeld, Madame Schumann, Sir George Grove, Brahms, Nicolaus Dumba, Lachner, Carl Meinert, Stockhausen, and Count Victor Wimpffen, and by their aid and the kindness of owners of Schubert autographs, the original MSS. of great numbers of the songs have been collated. In some cases research has up to the present time been baffled; the MS. of the "Müllerlieder," for example, not being forthcoming, a most unfortunate circumstance, as there is reason to believe our present versions are very incorrect. It will be seen, by reference to our correspondence columns, that Herr Friedländer disclaims the statement which has appeared in certain journals that he has discovered both the score and the separate parts of the missing third en'tracté to "Rosamunde."

If it were not for the series of master-pieces in sacred musical art that commenced with the sixteenth century, one would be tempted to say, considering the extraordinary anthems that are too often sung, that there must be some strange and occult repugnance between music and theology. The true object of this composition should undoubtedly be the expression of praise or prayer, but now-a-days it seems to be thought that any excerpt from an oratorio will do for an anthem. It has been our misfortune to hear an anthem consisting of "The enemy said" and "But as for his people," from "Israel in Egypt." We have also heard a choir boisterously asserting "We never, never, will bow down to the rude stock or sculptur'd stone," though certainly no one had ever suspected any of them of idolatry. So reckless are some people in this matter that even a complete grammatical sentence is not always to be obtained from the words of an anthem. For instance, we have heard of one being sung which consisted of the first chorus in "The Messiah" by itself. The most terrible musical jumbles are also perpetrated. What is to be said of "Be thou faithful" ("St. Paul") followed by "He that shall endure" ("Elijah")? It would be idle to tell those who choose these pieces that there is a difference between devotional and dramatic music, that the oratorio and the anthem have quite diverse aims, and that there are probably not above six excerpts from oratorios that are suitable for anthem use; but it might have been hoped that they would have abstained from rendering Divine Service almost ridiculous. An incident which occurred during the month of November in the Chapel of Queen's College, Oxford, forbids even this hope. One day in that month the astonished congregation there found that the anthem consisted of "Deeper and deeper still" ("Jephtha") and "Waft her, angels," sung by an ambitious young amateur some nineteen or twenty years of age, followed by "The Son of God goes forth to war" to Sullivan's arrangement of St. Ann's tune! After this we may expect to hear that "Baal, we cry to thee," has been sung as an anthem. But, seriously, is there no power capable of putting some check on vagaries which outrage at once Religion and Art? There surely ought to be somebody able to prevent the introduction of such works into the Service, and to prohibit displays which run perilously near to being positively blasphemous.

WE have on several occasions commented upon the important subject of the choice of an organist, but a correspondent reminds us that we have as yet said nothing of one equally important—the choice of an organ. Without doubt if those "influential members of the congregation" who usually band themselves into a Committee to debate upon these matters happened to have any knowledge of music, they would be competent to select a satisfactory instrument, as well as a satisfactory person to play upon it; but this not often being the case, their actions are usually ruled either by their prejudices for or against "sacred music," or by an earnest desire to save money. The correspondent to whom we have alluded states a case which unfortunately may be regarded as a type of many others. The singing at a certain church having become intolerably bad, in consequence of the want of any instrumental aid, the subject was at length taken into mature consideration. An ordinary church organ was decided to be "ungodly and wicked"; but subscriptions were forthwith raised for an American organ, which—most having "pipes"—could cause no offence to the most orthodox; and eight gentlemen were chosen to form a Committee for carrying out this object. When the evening for the meeting arrived every person in the room presented a paper detailing the exact quantity of nails, &c., used in the construction of their instruments by certain companies, each of which was declared to be the "largest in the world." At last a member announced his conviction that "K.'s organs" must be good, because he had bought a piano of him for his daughter, and suggested that a "K. organ" should be procured. "But I should like to ask you one question," said a refractory Committeeman: "Has your organ got any manuals?" "Manuals," said the other, in disgust, "why it has got nineteen." The amateur organist who furnished us with this account, and was the only person in the room who understood music, ventured to suggest that a good sized ladder would be required for the performer to reach the top manuals, but he was promptly put down, and a resolution carried that so perfect an instrument should be immediately purchased. Whether the members of this Committee have yet found out the difference between "manuals" and "stops" we have not been informed.

If anything were necessary to prove that song-composers, as a rule, think too little of the verses to which they wed their music, we may cite the fact that the literary partner in these productions is usually spoken of as the author of the "words." Latterly attention has been much directed towards this subject, and we are beginning to acknowledge that so long as music is written to "words," instead of "poetry," we are by no means likely to raise the standard of vocal composition. Of course, it may be said that poets rarely supply verses suitable for musical colouring; but this is in a great measure because composers are so plentifully provided with just such material as can easily be made up into a fashionable article which will wear as long as the fashion lasts, whilst high-class poetry would inevitably demand high-class music. We are led to make these observations by the appearance of a periodical called "The Lark," professedly containing "Songs, Ballads, and Poems for the People," by Dr. W. C. Bennett. There can be no occasion here to reiterate the admitted truth that Dr. Bennett is one of the most charming lyric poets of the day. This has been fully shown by his "Contributions to a Ballad History of England," "Songs by a Song Writer," "Sea Songs," and "Songs for Sailors," the last-named work having been set to music with remarkable success by Mr. J. L. Hatton. But this new collection of original poems contains such exquisite little pieces, especially designed to gladden and refine the family circles of the people, that we cannot too heartily recommend it. "Baby May," "The Seasons," and "The Worn Wedding-ring" prove how deeply sympathetic is this writer with the domestic affections, and so musical are his verses that the work of the composer is half accomplished. Indeed, the simple beauty of "The Worn Wedding-ring" should suggest a melody as tender and as truthful to the poetry as that to the well-known home-song, "John Anderson, my Jo."

SOME time ago we endeavoured to urge upon the members of the "Musical Association" the necessity of considering whether it would be possible to issue the papers read at the monthly meetings at a price which would place them within the reach of all those interested in the art. The publication of the volume of "Proceedings" for the last session so strengthens our opinion of the desirability of extending a knowledge of the useful action of the Association that we make no apology for returning to the subject. The number and variety of papers contained in this book show how earnestly the members work in the cause; and as some of them touch upon the vital principles of the art, they appeal to the consideration not only of those to whom they are read, but to the whole musical world. We may mention one more particularly which invites wide discussion: Mr. Ferdinand Praeger's paper "On the Fallacy of the Repetition of Parts in the Classical Form." In this the author strongly deprecates the custom of part-repetition, regarding it as a "concession grudgingly granted to precedent," and candidly says, "I am forced to admit that many musicians of note, who agree with me and whose names would add great weight to my argument, timorously recede when pressed to publicly avow their assent." Undoubtedly this may be the case where such avowal takes place in a room filled with a small section of their brother artists; but were the subject ventilated before the musical public many of the most timorous believers in Mr. Praeger's doctrine would, we are certain, gladly come forward to adduce arguments in its favour. It would of course appear invidious for the Association to make a selection of papers for publication at a cheap rate. It would be better, therefore, that they should appear monthly at a merely nominal price. In time we believe that they would be remunerative, but in any case the Society would be extensively spreading its influence by inviting opinions upon questions the discussion of which is now virtually confined to its own members.

We all know the story of the tradesman who, on a customer expressing surprise at his disposing of articles considerably under cost price, replied that he made his profit by the quantity he sold. Those, however, who take interest in the progress of music cannot avoid being struck with the fact that this principle is constantly acted upon by the many who are ready to sell violins at an exceedingly small price, labelled with the name of a maker who would unmistakably guarantee the enormously high value of the instrument; and by those who are willing to part with almost new pianofortes, by eminent manufacturers, at only one quarter of their original worth. Let us hope that, like the trader already alluded to, they may also remunerate themselves by the quantity they sell. But where can we find the motive—save that of merely benefiting their fellow-creatures—which actuates those individuals who cannot possibly gain anything by their dealings with the public? Daily do we read advertisements from persons who are desirous of giving lessons gratuitously to pupils wishing to appear in public, in order to "encourage" musical talent; and still more extraordinary is this, considering that these announcements are from professional teachers, who live, we may presume, by the exercise of their talent. Then we find that a "Musical Agency" gives away "one thousand pounds' worth of new music," every applicant being presented with "a four shilling song, full music size." These kindly offers—evidently springing from a kindly nature—appear to be rather on the increase in the present day. Of course, as the proverb tells us never to look a gift horse in the mouth, we should not too curiously test the worth either of the lessons or the music thus proffered, and we merely, therefore, place such benevolent actions upon record.

CONSIDERING the number of persons who have unconsciously rendered themselves liable to a fine for singing or playing musical works the performing right of which is protected, it is gratifying to find that by the recent Act every new composition can be safely presumed to be public property unless the contrary is stated upon the title-page. Unfortunately, however, the law is not retrospective; and we cannot but think, therefore, that, whilst fully acknowledging that the creations of musical composers, when executed in a concert-room, should be placed on the same level as those of the dramatic author, when acted in a theatre, the fact of permission being necessary to present them before a paying audience should be duly notified upon all copyright popular songs and pieces published before the passing of the Act. This of course could be easily done by adding a line to this effect upon all existing plates, so that purchasers of new copies may be made perfectly aware of the matter; but we would earnestly suggest that upon every copy offered for sale such information should also appear. This would involve but little trouble and expense; yet the boon to those still in ignorance of the law, and to the many who cannot discover to what works the law applies, would be invaluable; and the music-publisher would be amply repaid by the restoration of that confidence with the public which recent events have perhaps somewhat shaken.

ONCE more the subject of "street music" has been brought into one of our police courts. Two members of a German band were summoned by a professor of music for annoying him by playing before his door, and it appears that on his asking them to desist, although they affected to understand no language but German, one of them managed, in perfectly intelligible English, to state that they "wanted money before they would leave." In reply to the magistrate, the complainant said that he was giving a pianoforte lesson at the time, but he did not mention this as a reason for requiring the band to go away; and as, under the Act, it is obligatory that a reason should be given, the prisoners were discharged, with a caution. It may certainly be a great hardship that the anguish of mind produced by the playing of a German band in front of your house should not be accepted as a sufficient excuse for requesting these disturbers of the peace to "move on"; but if such is the state of the law it is well that the public should know it, and we should recommend those who suffer from the infliction to learn as much German, in order to make their persecutors leave off, as they evidently do of English to declare that they mean to go on.

WITH reference to the list of musical works protected by copyright which appeared in our last number, we have now received the following information, upon which we can rely. Mr. Carl Rosa has the exclusive right over the "Bohemian Girl," but has never exacted fees or penalties for the singing of one or two songs from the Opera in a concert-room. Amateurs, therefore, will run no risk in selecting one, or even two, vocal pieces from the work; but nothing like a recital of the Opera, or a portion of it, would be permitted. The "Lily of Killarney" is the property of Messrs. Chappell, but they will be always ready to give permission for any of the songs to be sung. This permission is a perfect answer to any claim that may be made by Mr. Harry Wall; but without such authority from the publishers a demand for fines can be enforced. Mr. Alfred Mellon's Opera "Victorine" has not, we believe, yet appeared in any list, and we therefore call attention to the fact that no song from it may be sung without permission being first obtained.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.

WHEN M. Gounod's "Redemption" was first produced it was confidently predicted by those to whom the peculiarities of the work gave offence that when public curiosity had been satisfied it would no longer attract large audiences. That time is long in coming, and there are no signs as yet of its approach, for at the performance of the sacred trilogy at the Albert Hall, on November 28, there were nearly 9,000 persons present. In the opinion of those who have had opportunities for making comparison, the rendering on this occasion was the finest since M. Gounod conducted his cherished opus at the Birmingham Festival. To what a pitch of excellence Mr. Barnby has trained his choristers, amateurs are well aware, and no better choral singing could be desired or even imagined, perfection being attained in tone, vigour, delicacy, and every other desirable quality. In the mocking choruses of priests and people the detached phrases came out with almost electrical effect, and for once the pitch was sustained in the chromatic "Lamentations." The idea of concealing the celestial choir from sight was justified by its results, the veiled and distant effect being extremely felicitous. Regarding the efforts of the principal vocalists, it is necessary to say very little. Mr. Maas, who sang the tenor music for the first time in London, must be highly praised for the purity and chaste expression of the delivery of his portion of the narration, Mr. R. Hilton giving satisfaction in that allotted to a bass voice. Madame Albani, Miss Hilda Wilson, and Mr. Santley were of course everything that could be desired. Mr. Barnby deserves so much congratulation for the general excellence of the performance that it is a pity he left one point to which objection must be taken. If the audience forgot the respect due to the work and its subject by asking for an encore of the solo and chorus "From Thy love as a Father," the conductor should have taken no heed of the applause, but proceeded at once with the performance.

The Albert Hall Choral Society's performance of "Elijah" is a treat which does not tire by repetition, and the enormous building was crowded to its utmost capacity on the 12th ult. No remarks are needed concerning the general interpretation, which was as fine as ever, nor as regards the efforts of Madame Albani, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley. The contralto music was divided between Miss Emily Dones and Miss Hilda Wilson, both performing their tasks in a satisfactory manner.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

THE first Crystal Palace Concert of the month (the 1st ult.) witnessed the most important event of the winter season; for important the performance (albeit not the first performance) of so remarkable a work as Berlioz's Requiem Mass must undoubtedly be called, and the fact of this being so was evidently felt not only by the musicians who mustered in full force, but also by the general public, which, in spite of raised prices, filled the concert-room to the last seat and listened to Berlioz's music with breathless attention from beginning to end. The "Messe des Morts" has by this time taken its rank amongst the representative works of sacred music, and so much has been said of it in connection with the first rendering at the Crystal Palace that further remarks—such, at least, as would be possible in a notice of this kind—would seem superfluous. It is more important to dwell upon the great improvements which have taken place in that rendering since the first attempt. Mr. Manns had evidently made it a point of honour to place the French composer's sacred master-piece before the English public in as perfect a manner as circumstances would allow, and at the same time to blot out the not altogether satisfactory reminiscences of his previous endeavour. He was not able to turn his concert-room into a vast cathedral, or to produce such effects of distance as Berlioz intended when he conceived the notion of four different brass orchestras echoing the "Tuba mirum spargens sonum" of the last day, but what he could do and what he had done was to drill his forces into perfect consonance of text and time, and, with one or two exceptions, of tune. He had, moreover, facilitated his task by employing in the more intricate passages a semi-chorus, recruited, we believe, from the students of the Royal Academy, which did excellent service. The result was a performance which, if not absolutely perfect, reflected the highest credit on every one concerned, not excluding Mr. Harper Kearton, who declaimed the tenor solo of the "Sanctus" with due emphasis and sonorous voice. The Concert of the 8th ult. contained only one novelty, placed where no novelty should be placed, at the end of a long and fatiguing Concert. It Mr. Villiers Stanford who, in the absence of Mr. Manns, conducted the Concert found it impossible to give us more of Mr. Parry's incidental music to Aristophanes' "Birds," and to place what he did give in a better position, he would have done better to leave it alone altogether. That even in such circumstances the suave Entr'acte in F, with its beautiful horn effect, and the solemn Hymeneal March, produced a very favourable impression upon those even who had not witnessed the performance of the entire work at Cambridge, redounded vastly to the credit of Mr. Parry. Mr. Stanford's Orchestral Serenade in G, produced at Birmingham, and since heard at the Richter Concerts, was another very attractive feature of the programme. It was on this occasion played with delicacy and spirit under the direction of the composer, who wisely refrained from repeating the Intermezzo as had been done on both previous occasions. Warm applause followed the end of the work, which, it will be remembered, winds up with a gentle lullaby, regardless of the applause sure to be elicited by a boisterous finale. Madame Montigny Rémaury at the same Concert gave a remarkably finished reading of Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in C minor, Miss Alexandra Ehrenberg and Signor Foli acting as vocalists. The final Concert of the year (the 15th ult.) introduced a novelty of some importance in the shape of a Pianoforte Concerto by M. Auguste Dupont, the distinguished Belgian musician and professor of the pianoforte at the Brussels Conservatoire. While listening to this finished and in places truly inspired music, one was struck with the fact that talent of a high class and sound scholarship are in these days as abundant as genius proper is rare. Here is a composer, esteemed in his own country but almost unknown out of it, who writes no end of music—the present Concerto is his forty-ninth work—to which one can listen not only with interest, but with delight, and which thirty or forty years ago would have secured a European reputation. The truth is that the standard of music in general has been perceptibly raised within the last three decades. Of the three movements of M. Dupont's Concerto the first is the most interesting, the second the weakest, and the last the most piquant in a rhythmical sense; but in each the hand of the skilful musician who masters the orchestra as well as his own instrument is discovered. The performance by Madame Frickenhaus, a pupil of M. Dupont, may be briefly described as perfect. Two charming orchestral sketches, "The Ebbing of the Tide" and "Elf-land," by Mr. John Francis Barnett, were very favourably received. Miss Thudichum gave "Softly sighs" and two songs by Mr. Cowen, and Herr Georg Ritter, a German tenor and pupil of Delle Sedie, who comes to us with strong testimonials from M.M. Gounod and Saint-Saëns, made a favourable impression in his selections.

MONDAY AND SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

AMONG the most admired chamber works by modern composers are the two String Sextets in B flat and G by Brahms. The earlier and simpler of these was performed for the eleventh time at the Popular Concerts on Saturday, the 1st ult., and as usual met with a warm reception, the scherzo being encored. Still greater enthusiasm was aroused by M. de Pachmann's rendering of Chopin's second Sonata in B minor (Op. 58), a work which, however unequal in itself, is calculated to display the special qualities of the Austro-Russian pianist in the most favourable light. Mr. Santley was encored in Gounod's "Medjé," and Mozart's beautiful Pianoforte Quartet in G minor concluded a remarkably successful Concert.

The programme of Monday, the 3rd ult., included one item which should have been sufficient in itself to draw a concourse of amateurs to St. James's Hall, but as a matter of fact the audience was the smallest of the season. Is it possible to establish any relation between cause and effect? We trust not in the way indicated, else it will be impossible to remonstrate with Mr. Arthur Chappell should he resolve henceforth to turn a deaf ear to demands for the recognition of native art. Fortunately it would be unreasonable to attribute the scantiness of the attendance to the fact that Mr. Hubert Parry's Pianoforte Quartet in A flat was announced to be performed for the first time. There was another novelty, namely, Mozart's Trio in D minor, No. 2, and no one would venture to declare that amateurs dislike Mozart. The truth of the matter is that the public have their favourite works and their favourite artists, and the name of one of these will be more instrumental in filling a concert-room than a programme of high average material carried out by executants of sufficient but not phenomenal ability. We may regret that this is so, but it is of no use to blink the facts. Reverting to Mr. Parry's Quartet, it must be distinctly understood that the work was composed at least five years ago, and it would therefore be erroneous to regard it as one of the ripest of his achievements. At Mr. Parry's age mental progress is frequently swift, and if the A flat Quartet is found inferior to some of his later compositions the circumstance redounds to his credit. No fault can attach to him for adhesion to the modern school of writing if, as there is no reason to doubt, his principles are sincere. The composer from whom he has obtained most of his inspiration in the present instance is undoubtedly Brahms, but in some respects he has gone beyond his model. Brahms is prone to clothe his themes with accompaniments which render their outline misty and indistinct; but Mr. Parry merges subjects and details together with irritating persistence, the ear becoming wearied in the effort to follow the music through all the intricacies of its path. Of the four movements we greatly prefer the Andante in D flat, in which the composer shows his power of writing expressive melody. But the whole work is full of clever device, to fully comprehend which it must be followed score in hand. It is something to have an English musician who is not afraid to obey the dictates of his own inner consciousness, notwithstanding that by so doing he is sacrificing immediate popularity and critical approval. The performance of the Quartet by Miss Zimmermann, Madame Norman-Néruda, Herr Hollander, and Signor Piatti could not have been better, and it was much applauded, but the composer did not respond to the call made for his appearance. The Trio of Mozart is full of that master's charming melody, and it should not have been neglected for twenty-five years. The rest of the programme may pass without comment, but a word of welcome must be given to Miss Ambler, who made her first appearance as the vocalist, and rendered her songs in a very acceptable manner.

The Concerts of the 8th, 10th, and 15th need only formal record. On the first occasion the concerted works were Mozart's Quintet in G minor, Beethoven's Serenade Trio in D (Op. 8), and three of Heller and Ernst's Pensées Fugitives for piano and violin. Miss Zimmermann played some pieces by Brahms, and Miss Thudichum was a highly commendable vocalist. On the following Monday, Brahms's Sextet in G (Op. 36) headed the programme, and Haydn's Quartet in D minor (Op. 42) formed the climax. M. de Pachmann, who is generally wise enough to recognise the direction in which his strength lies, played three of Chopin's smaller compositions, and Miss Hilda Wilson contributed songs by Beethoven and Gounod. The selection on the 15th was even more familiar in its nature. Beethoven's Rasoumowski Quartet in C, and Schubert's Trio in B flat must be known almost by heart by the frequenters of these Concerts. Miss Zimmermann's chaste rendering of two of the "Novellettes," and the "Traumeswirren" of Schumann met with its due meed of applause, and Signor Piatti and Mr. Edward Lloyd received encores for their respective solos.

On Monday, the 17th ult., the most interesting feature was the performance of Schumann's Sonata in G minor (Op. 22) by M. de Pachmann. The work stands midway between the classical and romantic styles, and it appeared to suit the pianist well, his rendering on the whole being brilliant and expressive, as well as technically accurate. The finale was especially well played, and the enthusiastic applause of the audience was quite justifiable until it grew to a demand for an encore. M. de Pachmann then gave Moscheles' Etude in G in his most refined manner, and there was a strenuous attempt to induce him to play a third time, but this happily failed. Schubert's Quartet in A minor (Op. 29), as led by Madame Néruda, is always an artistic treat; and Beethoven's String Trio in C minor concluded a brief but excellent concert. Mr. Santley, who was in good voice, sang Gounod's "Noël" and two of Schumann's Lieder.

A very attractive and popular programme was put forward to finish the ante-Christmas season on Saturday, the 22nd ult. Beethoven's Septet maintains its position as the most generally admired work in the entire repertory of these Concerts, and it was performed for the thirty-seventh time on this occasion. The only other concerted item was Mendelssohn's posthumous fragments of a quartet. M. de Pachmann was encored after playing Schumann's Carnival, and the same compliment was paid to Madame Néruda after Leclair's Sarabande and "I am comin'." Miss Santley introduced a lovely Irish Lullaby, adapted from an old air by Mr. Villiers Stanford.

MR. WILLING'S CHOIR.

SOCIETIES for the performance of Oratorios and other choral works on a large and complete scale are not so numerous in London that we can afford to regard with indifference the welfare of any body of this description. The customary period of public distrust towards new undertakings has not yet been passed in the instance of Mr. Willing's Choir, partly perhaps because last season words of welcome to the young Association had to be mingled with words of warning, if not of rebuke. It is therefore pleasurable to be able to state that at the opening Concert of the present season, on the 11th ult., the shortcomings complained of had well-nigh disappeared, Choir and Conductor alike proving their efficiency as well as their zeal and enterprise. This means a great deal, for Sir George Macfarren's "King David" is neither a familiar nor an easy work, and the rehearsals must have been long and numerous to produce such good results. It would be ridiculous to expect perfect refinement and unity of feeling from a body so recently formed, but the excellent attack, vigour, and general precision with which the most complex choruses were delivered call for hearty commendation. The higher qualities of choral singing will come in good time if Mr. Willing continues to improve as he has hitherto done in the art of conducting. From the public point of view, the list of principal vocalists was not perhaps so attractive as it might have been, but to musicians it was interesting, as, with one exception, the singers had not been heard previously in the work. Miss Anna Williams again rendered the soprano airs in a thoroughly efficient manner, and Miss Hilda Wilson gave those for contralto with artistic feeling, though a slight want of declamatory power was perceptible in the recitatives. The arduous music of the title-character was entrusted to Mr. F. King, who proved his capacity to interpret it in an able and fairly impressive style. But the finest solo singing of the evening was afforded by Mr. W. Shakespeare, who appeared at short notice in place of Mr. Vernon Rigby. As delivered by him, the tenor music derived a new charm, the lack of mere voice power being scarcely felt. It is unnecessary to return to the subject of the merits of "King David" as a work of art. Whatever position, if any, in public regard it may eventually assume, musicians will ever esteem it with reverence, not only on account of its composer, but by reason of its own intrinsic qualities, which appeal forcibly to the cultivated mind.

MADAME SAINTON-DOLBY'S VOCAL ACADEMY.

THE Concerts given at the close of every term of this valuable educational establishment are always interesting from the opportunities they afford of hearing young vocalists who are undergoing a course of training for a professional career. It is not in the power of preceptors to command gifted pupils, but it may be safely asserted that Madame Sainton-Dolby makes the very most of the natural endowments of those committed to her charge. The students who appeared at the Concert given at the Steinway Hall, on the 13th ult., varied considerably in the qualities essential to success in the musical world, but with all of them the results of the excellent tuition they had received were perceptible in the all-important matter of voice production, and in the clear and distinct enunciation of the words. Perhaps the greatest success was won by Miss Amy Foster, who in Handel's "Up the dreadful steep," displayed a fine contralto voice and a well-formed style. Miss Willis, mezzo-soprano, and Miss Scott, contralto (the latter an amateur), also sang with artistic finish, and not far behind these may be placed Miss F. Moody a soprano gifted with a singularly sympathetic and flexible voice. It is not rash to predict a brilliant future for this young lady, should she persevere with her studies in the proper spirit. Miss Florence New, a débutante, created a very favourable impression, and her progress will be watched with interest. The concerted music, conducted by M. Sainton, included Schubert's fine chorus "God in Nature," and Madame Sainton's effective composition "The glove on the snow," in which clever use is made of the French air "Partant pour la Syrie." A good word must also be said for the wonderfully clever violin playing of Miss Winifred Robinson, a pupil of M. Sainton at the Royal Academy of Music.

M. DE PACHMANN'S RECITALS.

THE musical lion of the autumn season has undoubtedly been M. Vladimir de Pachmann, the announcement of his name being sufficient to fill a concert-room, let the general character of the entertainment be what it may. This hero worship is not altogether to be admired, but in the present instance it may be regarded with equanimity, as its object is not in any sense a sensational performer. M. de Pachmann excels in one branch of pianoforte playing to a remarkable degree, and the programme of his first Recital at St. James's Hall, on the 10th ult., was in the main selected with prudence and foresight. Emmanuel Bach's Sonatas are too rarely heard in the concert-room, and the player might be unreservedly thanked for bringing forward one of them on this occasion had he not adopted Hans von Bülow's modern version without notification. Greater cause for animadversion occurred in the rendering of Schumann's "Carnaval," some of the movements being caricatured out of all recognition. It may be granted that the work itself is eccentric, but a composer's plain directions should be respected, and showers of false notes are under no circumstances commendable. M. de Pachmann recovered himself completely in the next piece, Rubinstein's Barcarole in G, this being played with such delicate charm that it was asked for a second time. Brahms's Capriccio (Op. 76, No. 2) and items by Henselt and Chopin also displayed his ability in the most favourable light. There was one trifling novelty, a Nocturne by a composer named Leideritz. It is a rambling piece without definite form or meaning, but it seemed to please the audience, and the composer appeared to bow his thanks for the applause.

At the second Recital, on the 19th ult., the inequalities of M. de Pachmann's execution were again apparent, though to a less serious extent. The "Moonlight" Sonata of Beethoven and the Rondo in A minor of Mozart suffered from the exaggerated sentiment infused into the playing, a simpler and broader style being preferable in the music of the pre-romantic period. That M. de Pachmann can be vigorous when he pleases was proved by his rendering of Brahms's fine Rhapsodie (Op. 79, No. 1) and Schumann's Novellette (No. 7). The greatest successes, however, were won in Henselt's Wiegenglied, the first section of Liszt's "Bénédiction de Dieu" and three Etudes, the Nocturne in G minor, and the Fantasia in F minor of Chopin. In all of these the pianist exhibited his unrivalled beauty of touch, which has gained him so many admirers in this country. The hall was crowded to its utmost extent.

ST. GEORGE'S HALL.

A PERFORMANCE was given in this hall, on the 3rd ult., under the direction of Lady Arthur Hill, the object being to assist the fund for restoring Easthamstead Church. A considerable audience attended, and were regaled, first, with Balfe's Cantata "Mazeppa," and, next, with a little operetta, "The Ferry Girl," for which the Dowager Marchioness of Downshire had written words and Lady Arthur Hill music. "Mazeppa," a very good specimen of Balfe's skill and fancy when at their best, was well received, though not very well performed; the soloists being Miss Phillips, Miss Howell, Mr. Trelawney Cobham, and Mr. Gabriel Thorp, who were supported by a small chorus, and accompanied by Mr. S. Southgate (piano) and Mr. Coward (harmonium). The plot of "The Ferry Girl" is a mere sketch, involving very little action but giving occasion for some pretty lyrics, to which Lady Arthur Hill has set some melodious, bright, and attractive strains. The chief of these were nicely sung by Mrs. Godfrey Pearse, while the concerted pieces for male voices gave much satisfaction. Lady Arthur Hill presided at the piano, and Mrs. Forbes Eden, Signor Morganti, Mr. Barrington Foote, and Mr. Godfrey Pearse were prominent on the stage.

BOROUGH OF HACKNEY CHORAL ASSOCIATION.

THE second Concert of the season was given in the Town Hall, Shoreditch, on the 10th ult., before a large audience. Rossini's "Stabat Mater" occupied the first part of the programme, the principal vocalists being Miss Thudichum, Miss Amy Foster, Mr. Henry Guy, and Mr. Robert Hilton, all of whom were warmly and most deservedly applauded. Mozart's Symphony in D, which commenced the second part, was excellently played; and this was followed by a selection from "Oberon," the melodious beauty of each piece thoroughly enlisting the sympathies of the audience. Cowen's "Yellow Jasmine (Language of the Flowers), and Handel's Chorus of noble "Ye tutelary Gods," from "Belshazzar," completed an interesting Concert, which was conducted with his usual ability by Mr. Ebenezer Prout.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

The second Concert of the Festival Choral Society, on November 29, was signalled by the first production here of Mr. F. H. Cowen's Norwich Cantata, "St. Ursula," which was supplemented by the "Spring" and "Summer" sections of Haydn's "Seasons." Mr. Cowen's Cantata impressed the audience chiefly by the excellence of the choral writing, more particularly in the second scene, in which the musical interest of the work culminates. The bustling "Sailors' Chorus," with descriptive colouring, which opens this section, and is afterwards combined with the "Lament of the people," was capably given, and the female voices came out well in the fine prayer of "Ineth and her maidens." The finale of this section, in which the various "motives" are blended and worked up together, afterwards dying away as the voyagers recede, proved very dramatic and effective. Miss Annie Marriott as the heroine exhibited dramatic qualities of an unexpected order, and sang throughout with great earnestness and impressive effect, more particularly in describing Ursula's vision and in her stormy interview with the Chief of the Huns. Miss Margaret Hancock, who replaced Miss Helen D'Alton at short notice in the part of Ineth, possesses a pleasing contralto voice, and sings with artistic finish and intelligence. Mr. Henry Piercy's tenor voice was heard to advantage in Conan's air "The river sings," and Mr. Hilton, who doubled the parts of Dionotus and the Chief of the Huns, acquitted himself very creditably. The playing of the band was even better than the singing of the choir, which, though smooth and satisfactory, was occasionally wanting in dramatic spirit.

Special interest attached to the Concert given by the musical section of the Midland Institute on the 1st ult., which was signalled by the first appearance of the newly formed Madrigal Society. The choir is a numerous and well balanced one, composed of picked voices and evidently trained musicians, and nothing but experience is needed to insure the most satisfactory results. The selection comprised many favourite madrigals old and new, such as John Wilbye's "Flora gave me fairest flowers," of the Elizabethan period; "Down in a flowery vale," which dates from the early years of Edward VI.; "In pride of May," illustrating the somewhat laboured manner of the Stuart period, and Benedict's admired setting of "The Wreath," in which the singing of the choir was especially praiseworthy. Mr. Stockley conducted and Miss Agnes Miller, whose firm, clear method was never shown to more advantage, was the solo pianist.

On the 5th ult. the members of the Amateur Harmonic Association gave a miscellaneous Concert, in which they were assisted by Miss Agnes Larkcom, Miss Grace Damian, Mr. Sidney Tower, and Mr. T. Horrex, principal vocalists; Miss Lillian Dixon, solo violin; Mr. F. T. Cox, pianist; and Mr. Simpson, organist; Mr. Stockley conducting. The programme comprised, among other pieces, Mendelssohn's setting of the 98th Psalm, "Sing unto the Lord"; Crotch's Anthem, "Methinks I hear the full celestial choir," and Mendelssohn's Motett, "Ave Maria." One of the novelties of the evening was a new part-song by Mr. Gaul, "The Erl King," with an invisible sub-chorus, which was much applauded. A new part-song by Mr. H. W. Wareing, "When daffodils begin to peer," though tastefully written, proved less effective. The choir is scarcely powerful enough for so large a building as the Birmingham Town Hall, but in quality of voices and finish of execution it leaves very little to be desired. Of the solo performances the most noteworthy were those of Mr. Horrex in Crotch's Anthem, and of Miss Damian in the declamatory passages of Beethoven's "Creation's Hymn."

Mr. Stratton's third Chamber Concert, on the 11th ult., presented as usual a happy combination of novelties and standard works, comprising among the former several examples of the modern Genoese composer, Rinaldi, and a Sonata in G for pianoforte and violoncello, by Mr. Praeger, and among the latter Beethoven's grand Rasoumouki Quartet in C (Op. 59, No. 3), and a Quintet for piano and strings, by John Field. Mr. Stratton was the pianist on this occasion and played throughout with great refinement and technical skill, especially distinguishing himself by the delicacy and poetical grace of his performance in the charming little pieces by Rinaldi, and by the earnestness and intensity he displayed in Mr. Praeger's somewhat turgid Wagnerian Duo. The Rasoumouki Quartet, though familiar to Birmingham concert-goers, had not previously been heard at this series, where its introduction accordingly excited much interest. It was capably played by Messrs. Ward, Abbott, Priestley, and Owen, who were especially happy in the lovely minuetto and the rapturous finale. Rafi's Octet in C (Op. 176), which formed the concluding item, excited much enthusiasm, owing to its rhythmical grace and melodic beauty, but the vigorous saltato, with which the work concludes, appeared somewhat wanting in dignity.

Mr. Stockley's second Orchestral Concert, on the 15th ult., was one of the most meritorious and enjoyable which has been given here for a long time. The band of eighty performers was in excellent form, and acquitted itself throughout with remarkable steadiness, unity, and precision, and the selection was of the highest order, comprising Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, his Concerto in C minor (with Miss Agnes Miller as the pianist), the Overtures to "Stradella" and "Semiramide," and a new Intermezzo by Mr. Elgar, a Worcester musician. The "Eroica" was performed on this occasion for the first time in Birmingham in its completeness, and, in spite of its length, it appeared to give great delight to nearly every section of the audience. The new Intermezzo Moresque of Mr. Elgar is a tuneful and graceful Andante in 6-8 time, with Moorish colouring of cymbals, triangle, and drums, but not conspicuous for originality of theme. Miss Miller's playing in the Concerto was remarkable for clearness of execution and breadth of style. In the Grand Polonaise of Chopin, in F sharp minor, later in the programme she deepened the excellent impression produced by her previous performance. The vocalists were Miss Clara Samuëll and Miss Helen D'Alton.

At the Concert given by the Edgbaston Amateur Musical Union on the 12th ult., in aid of the funds of the Birmingham Dental Hospital, the pièce de résistance was Gounod's "Messe Solennelle" (St. Cecilia), which was followed by two movements from Beethoven's Fourth Symphony in D flat. New songs by Mr. Sutton and Mr. T. Anderton, both local composers, were introduced on this occasion and met with a fair measure of applause; and a young amateur produced a very favourable impression in De Beriot's Seventh Violin Concerto.

M. Vladimir de Pachmann, the young Russian pianist, whose playing at Messrs. Harrison's second Subscription Concert last month produced so deep an impression, gave a Pianoforte Recital in the Masonic Hall, on the 20th. His selection comprised Bach's Fantaisie Chromatique and Fugue; Beethoven's Sonata (Op. 101); Schumann's Toccata (Op. 7) and Novellette (No. 7); Brahms's Capriccio (Op. 76, No. 2); Henselt's Danklied nach Sturm, La Fontaine, and Toccatina (Op. 25); Rubinstein's Barcarole (No. 4); and a group of pieces by Chopin, including a Nocturne, Mazurka, Valse, three Etudes (Op. 10, No. 2, Op. 25, Nos. 6 and 8), and Polonaise. Of the excellence and refinement of his performance throughout it would be superfluous to speak.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

OUR annual season of Choral and Orchestral Concerts is again in progress. The scheme, it may be mentioned, is carried on in conjunction with the Glasgow Choral Union, the band being the same as in the West, and Mr. Manns conducting the instrumental Concerts. The orchestral programmes are identical, too, with those of Glasgow, but the Choral Concerts are different, each of the cities being left to its own choice and taste in that respect. The first Concert of the series (an orchestral one) took place on the 10th ult., Cherubini's "Anacreon" Overture, Berlioz's "King Lear" Overture, and Mendelssohn's ever-welcome Italian Symphony being included in the programme. Mr. Joseph Maas was the vocalist on the occasion, and there was a large attendance. On the following evening the second Concert took place, Haydn's "Seasons" being performed. The choruses were rendered by the Edinburgh Choral Union, the number of executants, with the orchestral being about 300. The performance generally, which was under the guidance of Mr. T. H. Collinson, recently appointed to the Conductorship of the Union, was a fairly good one. Not very much, indeed, was to be expected from the Society, considering how greatly it has fallen off of late years in strength and experience, but a most meritorious effort was made on the occasion, and there is every reason to believe that under Mr. Collinson's skilful and earnest training something of the old prestige will be regained. Miss Mary Davies, Mr. J. Maas, and Mr. J. Bridson were very acceptable exponents of the solo music of Haydn's melodious work.

Of the other Concerts of the series taking place during the month, it may suffice to say that they included such excellent selections as Bennett's Symphony in G minor (Op. 43), Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture, ballet music from Gluck's "Orpheus," the Hungarian Rhapsody "Telemi" by Liszt, and Mr. Villiers Stanford's new Serenade for orchestra; Miss Elly Warnots (vocalist, from Brussels), Signor Papini, and Madame Montigny-Rémaury (pianists) were among the artists who have appeared. The season promises to be the most successful of any hitherto in Edinburgh.

There have been but few other musical events during the past month worth noticing, everything yielding to the choral and orchestral scheme of Concerts, which will run for a month or so yet. Mention may be made, however, of an excellent Chamber Concert, given by Mr. Waddell, on the 8th ult. Also, of a Concert given on the 15th ult., in the Freemasons' Hall, by Mr. Kirkhope's private choir, in aid of the Summerbank Home for Little Children, at which Mendelssohn's "Festgesang" and Motett "Hear my Prayer," with the third part of Schumann's "Faust," were performed with orchestral accompaniment. Sir Herbert Oakeley gave his second Organ Recital in the University Class-room, on the 13th, with selections from Bach, Haydn, and Mozart, the programme including a Minuet of Sir Herbert's own composition, "In olden style."

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT).

In few cities has the art of music made more rapid progress than in Glasgow. The commercial metropolis of Scotland, as it is to be considered, Glasgow can now boast of the possession of musical organisations little, if at all, inferior to those in more leisured centres, or where, as a rule, the circumstances may have been more favourable to the growth of musical taste. Our distance from London has for one thing militated not a little against our general musical advancement, but this and many other retarding influences have been overcome by perseverance and energy, and by not a little sacrifice of money as well as of time. The Glasgow Choral Union is, as is well known, the first Society in the western city—indeed, in Scotland—and that not only in point of numerical strength, but in point of enterprise. Formed by the union of two associations some thirty years ago, the Society, numbering usually about 400 members, none of whom, it may be noted, derive any pecuniary benefit from connection with it, for many years was in the habit of giving three or more Subscription Concerts during the year, these ordinarily being performances of oratorios. In 1861, and again in 1873, a Musical Festival was held with its assistance, and, through the success of the latter event, and in emulation of the Orchestral Concerts in Manchester and elsewhere, an annual series of Choral and Orchestral Concerts was instituted in the following year (1874) under the joint management of the Festival Committee and the Choral Union Council, the present season, of which I am about to send you some account, as far as it has yet proceeded, being the tenth. For some years, it may be mentioned, the Concerts were carried on at considerable loss, but the turning point was fortunately reached at last, and a surplus every year of no mean amount is now a calculable certainty. Conducted in turn by Mr. Henry Lambeth, Sir Arthur Sullivan, Dr. Von Bülow, and Herr Julius Tausch, of Dusseldorf, the Concerts are now, and have been for the last four years, under the very successful charge of Mr. August Manns; Mr. Allan Macbeth, a rising young musician, being chorus-master to the Union. The present scheme comprises twelve Subscription Concerts, four being choral and eight orchestral, while what are called "Popular Concerts" are given every Saturday evening, the programmes, which are nearly always orchestral on these last named occasions, being every whit as important and as severe, so to speak, as those of the Subscribers' set. An outline of the scheme was given in THE MUSICAL TIMES of November. The band is this year augmented to eighty performers, M. Victor Buziau being the leading violinist.

The first Concert of the series took place on the 4th ult., in St. Andrew's Hall, in presence of a very numerous audience. The Overture to "Anacreon," by Cherubini; Cowen's Suite in D, for strings; the "King Lear" Overture of Berlioz, and Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony were among the selections performed. For a first night, the members of the band being probably strangers to each other, and playing, many of them, under a strange baton, the performance was a remarkably good one, the Symphony, in particular, being especially satisfactory in point both of execution and taste. Miss Griswold, from the Grand Opera of Paris, sang at this Concert, and made a good impression.

Following this came, on the 8th ult., the first Saturday Evening Popular Concert, when the large hall (it holds about 3,000 seated) was occupied in every corner, platform included, many being unable to gain admission. The "Waverley" Overture of Berlioz headed the programme, and the music of the Ballet Divertissement in Saint-Saëns's "Henry VIII." concluded it. The former composition, to a Scotch audience at least, would, I think, be more suggestive of "Ivanhoe" than of "Waverley," unless, indeed, the series generally was meant to be musically reflected, and not merely the initial novel of that name. The "Henry VIII." excerpt was enjoyed very much; but excited a smile now and then because of the introduction of Scottish national music most unlikely to be known in England at the period, if indeed then in existence. Beethoven's No. 4 Symphony was played with great success, and of course in its entirety, a point to which our Saturday evening audiences have long ago arrived. Mr. Joseph Maas contributed some vocal solos, with, it must be said, somewhat unequal effect.

On the second Subscription night of the series—namely, on the 12th ult.—"Acis and Galatea" and Mendelssohn's "First Walpurgis Night" were performed, Mr. Manns conducting as usual. The choruses in the melodious Serenata were as a rule excellently rendered; "Mourn all ye muges" being sung with much expression, and "Wretched lovers" with smoothness, precision, and force. Miss Mary Davies (a model Galatea, musically speaking), Mr. J. Maas, Mr. G. Chilly (whose good method was much admired), and Mr. J. Bridson were the principals in "Acis," which it may be noted was last performed by the Union in 1869. From the lateness of the hour at which it was entered upon, Mendelssohn's music was probably heard at some disadvantage. The performance appeared to be hurried somewhat, though the subject naturally tends to that idea. "The Walpurgis Night" is not unfamiliar in Glasgow, but was given on this occasion, for the first time, by the Choral Union. The splendid and complete orchestral accompaniments and symphonies lent special value to the performance, and the choruses were sung with taste and vigour. The solos were taken by Mr. Maas, Mr. Bridson, and Miss Fyfe, a popular local contralto.

The Saturday Popular Concert, on the 15th ult., comprised the Scherzo from Mr. Villiers Stanford's "Elegiac" Symphony, and the Garden Scene from the same composer's "Veiled Prophet," including Fatima's air "There's a bower of roses," both these examples of the new British school being warmly received. Schubert's No. 8 Symphony in B minor (unfinished), a favourite at these Concerts as elsewhere, was included, and a most sympathetic interpretation obtained. The selections from Mr. Hubert H. Parry's music to "The Birds" of Aristophanes proved very enjoyable, the humorous and dignified being happily contrasted. Madame Montigny-Rémaury played the solo part in Beethoven's Concerto No. 3, in C minor, for piano and orchestra, and made an excellent impression. Mr. Stanford conducted on this occasion, in place of Mr. Manns.

The programmes of the Subscription Concerts immediately following, included Stanford's Serenade in G major, for orchestra; Bennett's Symphony in G major; the "Euryanthe" Overture of Weber; the ballet music from Gluck's "Orpheus," and the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven.

The Choral Union scheme may be said to overshadow everything musical here at present, but next month the opportunity may arise of referring to other organisations in a similar walk, of importance in their way if on a smaller scale.

MUSIC IN THE WEST.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

MUSIC in Bristol began on the 1st ult. with one of Mr. Riseley's delightful Organ Recitals at Colston Hall. This was followed on the 3rd by a good Concert by the People's Concert Society. It had been intended to perform Dr. Stainer's work "St. Mary Magdalen," but, owing to unforeseen circumstances, the programme was hastily changed, and selections from "The Messiah" and "Elijah" were given instead.

A large audience assembled in Colston Hall on the 10th ult., on the occasion of Mrs. Ellicott's Concert in aid of the funds of the Mission Church of St. Maurice, Newport, Gloucestershire. A varied and attractive programme was provided. The vocalists were Miss Ambler, Mrs. Arthur Goodeve, Mrs. Ellicott, Miss Ellicott, Mr. Anstice and Dr. Roxburgh. Miss Amy Hare was the substitute at the pianoforte for Lady Benedict, who, in consequence of the death of a near relative, was unable to be present. The male-voice choir of forty members, conducted by Mr. Riseley, gave several glees in finished style, and contributed greatly to the success of the evening. Miss Ambler's lovely voice and Miss Hare's thoroughly artistic playing gave especial pleasure. Mr. Burnett gave some highly effective solos on the violin, and Mr. Riseley played a Sonata by Corelli on the organ in his usual masterly style.

On the same evening Mrs. Viner Pomeroy gave her second Classical Chamber Concert for this season at Victoria Rooms. The dismal emptiness of the room was partly accounted for by the fact of Mrs. Ellicott's Concert being fixed for that night; but however scant, the audience was an appreciative one, and seemed thoroughly to enjoy the music provided for them. The executants were Mr. H. Holmes (first violin), Mr. Rice (second violin), Mr. Hill (viola), and Mr. Pomeroy (violoncello). Spohr's Quartet in C major was announced as the first item, but that in B flat major was substituted. This was followed by Mozart's Trio in E major for piano, violin, and 'cello, in which Mrs. Pomeroy's clear execution appeared to great advantage, and Mr. Pomeroy then gave a violoncello solo, by Francomme, in the most artistic manner. The evening terminated with Beethoven's String Quartet in C major, splendidly played.

The first of the special Advent services was held in the Cathedral on the 6th ult., the voluntary choir of 300 voices assisting the Cathedral choir. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were sung to Wesley's Chant Service in F, and the Anthem was Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion." The Rev. Precentor Mann conducted, and Mr. George Riseley was at the organ. The choir sang with care and good expression, but the effect in the body of the church was occasionally weak and unsteady, doubtless owing to the fact of the conductor and organist being unable to see each other. The same ragged singing was noticeable on the 13th ult., when Spohr's "God, Thou art great" was the anthem, although Mr. Riseley's spirited playing did much to cover these defects. The voluntary choir is seated at the farthest possible distance from the congregation, while the organ is almost in the midst of the latter, so that it is often hard to realise that so large a body is actually singing. At the last service, on the 20th ult., selections from "The Messiah" were given, and as the position of the voluntary choir was altered on this occasion, the effect was greatly improved, the voices being far more distinctly heard.

I have much pleasure in being able to state that a "Monday Popular Concert Society" has been formed for the purpose of carrying on Mr. Riseley's Orchestral Concerts. A large Committee of many of the leading gentlemen of the city is now actively working and making arrangements for a series of six Concerts to be given during the present season, commencing early in January. Mr. Riseley has, in the most generous manner, offered his services to the Society as honorary Conductor for three years. The control of the musical arrangements is therefore placed entirely in his hands, subject to such limitation of expenditure as the Executive Committee may from time to time deem necessary. Membership in the Society is constituted by a donation of not less than £1 is. to a Reserve Fund. Membership shall continue for life, or until dissolution of the Association; and after payment of their one donation, members incur no further liability.

The Clifton College Musical Society gave its twentieth annual Concert at the College, on the 20th ult. The first part of the programme consisted of selections from "Judas Maccabæus." The Overture and March were admirably played by the band. The duties of organist were divided between Mr. Oakeley and Mr. Braun, and the choruses were given in a highly creditable manner by the choir, Mr. Trimmell efficiently filling the post of Conductor.

The performance of the "Redemption" at Plymouth, on the 12th ult., was a grand success. The Guildhall was filled to overflowing; and we hear that, by general desire, the work is to be repeated, probably in Lent. The singing of the chorus reflected the greatest credit on Mr. Löhr's unremitting exertions during several months past. The chorals were especially well given, the solemn and sustained effect making a deep impression on the audience. There were 270 performers in the orchestra, including the band, sixty-five strong. Special credit is due to Mr. Faul, the honorary organist; Mr. Pardew, Mr. Rice, Mr. Halfpenny, and Mr. Lidiard (principal violins), Mr. Lockwood (harp), Mr. Pomeroy (Bristol), principal 'cello; and Mr. Binding, principal double-bass. The soloists were Miss Marriott, Miss Marian McKenzie, Mr. Redfern Hollins, and Signor Foli. The latter gentleman was so severely indisposed by cold that Mr. Wills, an amateur of Plymouth, kindly consented to share the bass solos with him, and by his admirable singing laid the Society and Signor Foli under a great debt of gratitude. A presentation to Mr. Löhr of a handsome coffee pot and a set of fish knives and forks took place on the same day, and this recognition, on the part of the choir, of his valuable services as honorary Conductor for fifteen years, was highly gratifying.

At Salisbury, the series of Classical Chamber Concerts, which has been given by Miss Aylward at intervals during the past year, was concluded on the 13th ult., when a well-selected programme was given, which ought to have drawn a larger audience. The executants were Messrs. Burnett, Moberly, Hill, and Whitehouse. The first item was Beethoven's String Quartet in C, for two violins, viola, and 'cello. Brahms's Quintet for piano and strings was one of the principal features of the evening, and was thoroughly well rendered. Miss Aylward was the pianist, and Miss Amy Aylward and Miss Annie Butterworth the vocalists. It is to be hoped that these Concerts will be resumed at some future date, though the inadequate support which they have received is calculated to discourage Miss Aylward in her praiseworthy efforts to awaken in Salisbury a taste for high-class music.

On the 20th ult., a Special Service was held in Salisbury Cathedral, at which Spohr's "Last Judgment" was sung by the Cathedral choir, this being the first occasion on which an Oratorio has been given in this Cathedral. The work was excellently rendered, and was listened to by a very large congregation. Mr. South, the newly-appointed Organist, ably presided at the organ, and did full justice to the difficult accompaniments.

On the 10th ult., Mr. Sinkins gave an excellent Concert at the Victoria Hall, Exeter. The vocalists were Miss Robertson, Mdlle. José Sherrington, Miss McKenzie, Mr. Bernard Lane, Mr. Sinkins, and Signor Foli; and the instrumentalists were Mr. Woolhouse ('cello), Mr. Howard Reynolds (cornet), and Signor Bisaccia (pianoforte).

"The Messiah" was performed by the Oratorio Society on the 18th ult., and the usual Organ Recitals are continued.

The Madrigal Society's Concert is postponed, in consequence of the death of one of the officers.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

IN a musical sense December has been a busy month in at least two of the great towns of the West Riding—Leeds and Bradford. If one may judge from the eagerness with which Concert Rooms are now being thronged, the every day musical life of Leeds seems to have been very greatly stimulated by the recent Musical Festival. Perhaps the most convincing proof of this freshened interest was to be found in the crowded condition of the Albert Hall, at the opening of Mr. Rawlinson Ford's Chamber Concert season. Previously Mr. Ford's courage has been sorely tried by the want of sympathy with his efforts to promote intellectual music. It is probably at this moment the most gratifying feature of musical feeling here to find that his magnanimous labours have been more adequately rewarded. Mr. Carodus was a great attraction, and the Concert was also distinguished by the appearance of Miss Zimmermann and other artists of prominence. Mr. Brereton was the vocalist. The number of Mr. Ford's Concerts has been reduced for this season to three. For the remaining Concerts excellent performances are in store.

Further musical development is to be found in the announcement of a series of popular Concerts for Hunslet. This is a thickly-crowded district inhabited by a labouring population, among whom the cultivation of music other than of the lowest type has hitherto been neglected. The new movement is an honest endeavour on the part of the employers of labour in that district to interest the people in something higher and more refined than that to which they have been accustomed. The scheme has been floated on a sound basis, money sufficient to cover the cost of the performances having been already subscribed. At the first performance, which took place on the evening of the 13th, an excellent programme was rendered by Miss Winifred Payne, Madame Bolingbroke, Miss Florence Jones (violinist), Mr. Brereton, Mr. Alfred Broughton (the Leeds Musical Festival accompanist), and the Band of the Leeds Rifles, under the direction of Mr. Sydney Jones. There was a good audience, and the appreciation, which it exhibited, was encouraging to the promoters of the venture.

The Philharmonic Society, which is under the direction of the popular chorus-master of the Leeds Festival, Mr. James Broughton, gave its first Concert of the season on the 5th ult., in the Victoria Hall. These Concerts are held in good repute, and the occasion was one of exceptional interest; consequently the hall was well filled. It was generally felt that Mr. Broughton had attempted too much in giving at one Concert three such works as those which constituted the programme, namely, Bach's "Magnificat," "The Mount of Olives," and "Psyche." The first of the three proved a dead weight, while, owing to the lateness of the hour at which Gade's work was reached, the latter portion of it was somewhat hurried, and a general departure of the audience meanwhile helped to confuse the effect. With these drawbacks, the Concert was nevertheless a great treat, and brought back recollections of Festival performances. The "Magnificat" and Beethoven's oratorio, having occupied important places in the programme of the Leeds Festival of 1877, were still fresh in the minds of many, who were especially grateful for the opportunity of renewing an acquaintance with Bach's scholarly work. As for the audience generally, nothing could have been more uninteresting than the "Magnificat," and the choir evidently but half relished its task. The soloists were Miss Fenna, Miss Sellers (a member of the Society), Madame Fassett, Mr. Piercy, and Mr. Wood Higgins. The sympathies of the audience revived under the congenial influence of Beethoven, interpreted as his music was with all the skill which Mr. Broughton's superior forces could command, and, so far as the solo work was concerned, with most agreeable artistic quality. Mr. Piercy sang the tenor music with great refinement; the other leading part was admirably rendered by Miss Fenna; and Mr. Wood Higgins sang the music allotted to Peter. At this Concert Gade's beautiful Cantata was heard for the first time in Leeds, and the verdict here as elsewhere was one of unanimous approval. The audience was enraptured with the gracefulness and refinement of the music. The performance was of the finest order, and it was most unfortunate that the closing part was marred by circumstances already alluded to. Mr. Oswald and Miss Fenna sang the music of Eros and Psyche respectively. The rendering of the music of Proserpine by Madame Fassett was a performance of unexpected beauty. The band was much too weak, but otherwise highly efficient.

Mr. Archibald Ramsden's Concert, at which was given "The Messiah," took place on the 18th ult., in the Victoria Hall, which was literally packed. This was the first of the numerous performances of this oratorio which invariably accompany the Christmas Festival in Yorkshire, where Handel, and "The Messiah" especially, are so deeply revered. Mr. Burton was the Conductor, and his choir consisted chiefly of members of the Bradford Festival Choral Society, the remainder being drawn from different parts of the county. The band was that which Mr. Burton has organised at Harrogate. Madame Albani was the chief vocal attraction, and she received a most generous welcome, the expression of which, in view of the terms of her relationship with the Leeds Festival Committee, must have been reassuring to her. She rewarded the audience by one of the most perfect performances of her part ever heard in Leeds. Miss Hilda Wilson also won much approval, and Mr. Barton McGuckin and Mr. Bridson rendered their solos admirably. The work of the chorus and band was here and there loose, and had evidently not been sufficiently rehearsed. Mr. J. P. Bowling was at the organ. With Miss Mary Davies, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Bridson as principals, "The Messiah" was performed on the following evening, in St. George's Hall, Bradford. Mr. Burton was the Conductor. The chorus was that of the Bradford Festival Choral Society.

The Bradford Subscription Concert season opened on November 30 with a performance, for the first time in Bradford, of Rossini's "Moses in Egypt." The principals were Miss Thudichum (Anais), Miss Fenna (Sinai's), Miss Hilda Wilson (Zillah), Mr. Lloyd (Amenophis), Mr. Bridson, Mr. F. King, Mr. Harper Kearton, Mr. Blower, and Mr. C. Blagbro, all of whom sang well. Miss Thudichum, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Bridson, upon whom the more trying solos fell, especially distinguished themselves. The melodious orchestral music was charmingly played by Mr. Hallé's band, and the choruses were given by the Festival Choral Society with excellent effect, though they were occasionally wanting in refinement. The work was received with enthusiasm. Mr. Hallé conducted. The chorus-master was Mr. Burton.

Mr. Edward Misdale gave an interesting Pianoforte Recital, on the 3rd ult., at the Bradford Church Institute. The programme included Bach's Prelude and Fugue in G major, Raff's Suite (Op. 204), Beethoven's Sonata in B flat (Op. 22), Studies from Scarlatti and Henselt, and Mendelssohn's Rondo in B minor.

On the 13th ult., the late William Jackson's oratorio "Isaiah" was performed in Mannville Chapel, Bradford. Mr. Jackson's name was always popular in Bradford, where he had a great share in the promotion of good music. His two oratorios, which are comparatively unknown even in the town where he settled, were both written at Masham, in Yorkshire, his birthplace. The second, "Isaiah," was performed at Bradford in 1861, and brought much credit to Mr. Jackson, who came to be regarded as a composer of uncommon skill. He was a self-taught musician, and was endowed with much individuality of thought, while his work shows the possession of remarkable contrapuntal ability. His instrumental scoring, especially, is varied and graceful. The performance was an efficient one. The choir consisted of 150 voices selected from the Old Choral Society and the Festival Choral Society, and the band was forty strong. The principals were Miss Wheeler, Mrs. S. Arnold, Mrs. Clarke, Mrs. H. Byles (a daughter of the composer), Mr. C. Blagbro, and Mr. G. H. Hartley, some of whom were pupils of Mr. Jackson. Mr. T. Ward was the Conductor, and Mr. S. Ward presided at the organ. The Concert proved, as it was intended, a genuine tribute to the memory of a man to whom the musical society of Bradford is much indebted.

The third Subscription Concert, which took place on the 14th ult., was devoted to Chamber music. There were several new features. The Schubert Quintet in C major (Op. 163), which was heard for the first time in Bradford, was the most interesting item, and received the fullest justice at the hands of Mr. Hallé, Madame Norman-Néruda, Herr Speelman, and Signor Piatti. Another novelty was the Pianoforte Quartet of Zdenko Fibich, which made upon the whole a good impression. Grieg's Sonata in F (Op. 8) and Mendelssohn's Sonata in B flat—which served to bring out the finest artistic qualities of Signor Piatti—were among the other items. Mr. Maas was the vocalist. Mr. Mackenzie's "Jason" and Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night" are announced for the 11th instant.

The first Concert of the new Skipton Choral Society took place on the 13th ult., when Mendelssohn's "42nd Psalm," and Macfarren's "May Day" were performed, under the direction of Mr. Sydney Hardcastle.

MUSIC IN AMERICA.

NEW YORK, DECEMBER 7, 1883.

THE "operatic war" continues without any features that can interest a remote public. Indeed, our own people are becoming tired of innumerable rumours, which arise, from time to time, whenever the necessity of fresh advertising appears. Most of these, I ought in justice to say, may be traced to the irrepressible Mr. Mapleson. Mr. Abbey preserves comparative quiet. Yet on every fresh occasion either he or some of his people must be "interviewed," and so the comment runs on, to an extent impertinent and vexatious, till the thoughtful public cries "A plague o' both your houses."

One ill effect of so much comment is that it has, to an extent unusual even here, taken the place of criticism, of which, as concerning either the schemes of the representations or the manner of particular performances, there has been but little worthy of the name.

Nothing, however, has been done of very great consequence. Since my last letter to you Madame Patti has returned to the Academy stage, appearing first in "La Gazza Ladra," revived for her after long suspension of animation, and proving not very animated, or animating, after all. Madame Patti has sung also in "Aida," and this is the only other quasi-new thing about Mr. Mapleson's season.

At the new Opera House "Lohengrin" has been several times given, with the result of crowding the vast space on each occasion. "Robert" has been revived, and "Don Giovanni" has been given with a cast which may be worth noting: Zerlina, Madame Sembrich; Donna Anna, Madame Fursch-Madi; Donna Elvira, Madame Nilsson. The other parts were by no means so well filled, and at the first performance the playing of the orchestra and stage-band was abominable. Madame Sembrich, who has had fair opportunity, is very steadily growing in favour and may almost be said to hold the position before the general public which from the first was allotted to her by the judges. Madame Trebelli is kept strangely obscured, though upon every appearance she deepens the impression of her excellence.

Mr. Mackenzie's Scotch Rhapsody, "Burns," which excited so much interest at the first Philharmonic Concert of this season, has been played with unvarying success (under the direction of Mr. Theodore Thomas) at Washington, Richmond, Charleston, Savannah, and other southern cities during his recent tour.

Mr. Cowen's "St. Ursula" was produced at the Oratorio Society's first Concert. The Times said: "It is a careful, musicianly work, undoubtedly the production of a composer of talent. It contains many passages of considerable beauty and seldom fails to be graceful. On the other hand, it is evidently without inspiration, and occasionally betrays the mechanism of its construction. The instrumentation deserves especial mention."

The Tribune said: "If we were to give in a few words the impression made by listening to this work they would be these: 'St. Ursula' is interesting as an illustration of the bent of an industrious young musician. It does not appear to be a fruit of warm inspiration but of well-intended and intelligent study. It shows its author to be proficient in writing, more particularly for instruments. Its most patent lack is spontaneity; its greatest fault is a wearisome monotony in movement and melody."

The Musical Courier said: "The Scandinavian Symphony by this composer was extremely well received last season, as it contained some fine polyphonic orchestral writing. If Cowen has in 'St. Ursula' failed to write for voices, he has simply failed where a great many modern German composers also have failed, and especially those who have followed in the path indicated by Liszt. . . . It was simply impossible to make such musical common places appear as deeply conceived musical thoughts. Were a poet to say:

Divine expression of painful pleasure,
Oh, unutterable joy of woe—

we might say he speaks prettily, knows grammar, and can join words very neatly, but what does he mean? Similarly, a musician may write grammatically and make pleasant sounding phrases, but the eternal craving of the human soul for intelligible idea in word or tone will not be satisfied with them if they are meaningless."

The Evening Post calls it "a work which confirms the composer's reputation as a scholarly musician of excellent taste and no little facility in handling his material. At the same time that 'St. Ursula' is interesting throughout, and presents happy hits at frequent intervals, the work as a whole lacks sturdiness and nervous strength."

I may remark that Mr. Cowen's orchestral Suite "The Language of the Flowers" was given in Boston, at a Concert of the Apollo Club, on the 5th ult. The Transcript critic says it is "wholly charming. Fanciful it is from the outset. Yet the composer has not been content to be merely fanciful, but has given his work musical coherence and beauty. If, in his picturesque suggestiveness, he do not show a quite boundless wealth of resource, he has known how to be fascinating by simple and easy means."

The programme of the second Brooklyn Philharmonic Concert was as follows:—

Music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" . . . . .	Mendelssohn.
Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 5 . . . . .	Beethoven.
Professor Carl Baermann.
Symphony, No. 1, B flat, Op. 38 . . . . .	Schumann.

The vocal numbers were exquisitely sung by the ladies of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Chorus. The playing of the Schumann Symphony was something to be remembered. Herr Baermann's performance of the "Emperor" Concerto was conceded to be finer than could be possible to any other artist now in America. This was Herr Baermann's first appearance here, though he is well-known and much respected in Boston.

The different series of our Chamber Music Concerts are in full swing. I shall shortly have some observations to offer you on this topic.

OBITUARY.

GIUSEPPE MARIO, MARCHESE DI CANDIA.—On Tuesday, the 11th ult., the famous operatic tenor, Signor Mario, died at Rome, where he had lived for some years discharging the light duties and receiving the equally light emoluments of a museum conservator. Estimated by the rapid rate of modern life, it is a long time since Mario took his leave of our lyric stage, but no figure is better remembered than his, and no artist in retiring left behind him more vivid and pleasant memories. His death, therefore, came as a shock, and excited more than the conventional regret which the world usually feels for those who have outlived their capacity for rendering service or giving pleasure. According to some authorities, he was born at Genoa in 1812, his father being, as well as of noble rank, an officer in the Piedmontese army. Little is known about his early years, for the reason, perhaps, that there is little to tell. Mario grew up much as other Italian youths of his class, and in due time chose the profession of arms, becoming an officer in the Royal Guard. He was, however, better fitted for the salon than the tented field, and for the delights of a great city than the hard knocks of battle. Hence, about 1836, he appeared in Paris, where his handsome presence, beautiful voice, and gallant bearing made him a great favourite. At this time he had little money but expensive tastes, and it soon became a question whether to obtain more of the one or be content with fewer of the other. The question pressed more and more for a solution, till at last it was answered by the young Italian going on the lyric stage. The affair cost him a struggle, for though poor he was proud, and seems to have considered it more like a noble to do nothing and run into debt than work and keep out of it. It is said that Duponchel, the then Director of the Opéra, offered Mario 1,500 francs a month, and this was the sum for which, putting his pride in his pocket, he contracted. After receiving some lessons from Bordogni, Ponchard, and others, Mario made his first public appearance on November 30, 1838, the part selected for or by him being that of Robert in Meyerbeer's gloomy opera. Though no better than an amateur he was quite successful. The voice, the appearance, the air of refinement, captivated the French public, and Mario settled down to his new life with every prospect of a brilliant future.

He did not, however, remain at the Opéra. Eminently adapted to shine on his native stage, he passed over to the Italiens in 1840, after having (June 6, 1839) appeared in London, where his personal charms more than atoned for whatever of amateurishness still clung to him. Thenceforward he fulfilled yearly engagements in the capitals of France and England, not playing many parts, but steadily improving in those he assumed, till, in 1846, according to Mr. Chorley, writing much later, "he took the place of which no wear and tear of time has been able to deprive him." Mario's life was not one of stirring incident, and there is little more to tell. Long associated with Madame Grisi on the stage, he married that artist on the dissolution of her previous union, and by her had three daughters. His brilliant public career ended, as far as England was concerned, in 1871, and, after a period of hesitation, he settled down in Rome, where the small post already referred to was found for him, his friends having once or twice been called upon to help him out of pecuniary difficulties. Mario and Grisi together earned for years a princely income, but he, certainly, had no more idea of monetary prudence than a child. Open-hearted and free-handed, he was the willing victim of all sorts of schemers, and, as he never parted with his costly tastes, the result was as we have said.

Mario is chiefly remembered as an artist for the complete efficiency with which he represented certain parts. Several times he failed to meet the expectations of his admirers, notably in "Don Giovanni"; but as Raoul in "Les Huguenots," Faust in Gounod's opera of that name, Almaviva in "Il Barbiere," Jean of Leyden in "Le Prophète," and Fernando in "La Favorita," not to speak of others, he left all rivalry far behind. This was due to a variety of circumstances, or perhaps we should say a combination of excellencies not met with before or since. In addition to voice and appearance, Mario had an instinctive artistic taste, which charmed all the more because its working seemed spontaneous. He was not the result of study, but, so to speak, of natural necessity. He could not help doing the right thing; every movement was artistic, and if he threw a cloak around him the garment seemed at once to adjust itself as an artist would have it. Over all there was the incommunicable air of refinement, exercising a subtle charm and delighting good taste as much as a picturesque person delighted the eye.

Mario's death was sudden. On December 10, he appeared in good health and spirits, but, on retiring to rest, an attack of angina pectoris came on, and soon all was over. He survived the night; rallying sufficiently to receive his friends, with whom he conversed, it is said, calmly and even cheerfully. On learning that no hope remained, he gave directions as to the disposal of his small possessions, and then quietly waited for the end. "He devoutly received the last comforts of religion. At a little before eight he asked for a glass of water, drank a little of it, and, sinking back on the pillow, died without any sign of suffering." It is pleasant to know that England was represented at his bedside in the person of Mr. W. G. Cousins, who happened to be staying in Rome. Mario, on seeing him, enquired after the Queen, and gave utterance to all the gratitude he felt for generous treatment from the English people. Furthermore, he begged Mr. Cousins to send his dying expressions of respect to her Majesty. This, of course, was done; the Queen, with her unvarying sympathy, at once directing Mr. Cousins to attend the funeral as her representative, and to place a wreath in her name on the grave. The remains were interred on the 13th, when, besides the Queen's token, a wreath was sent by the English visitors to the Eternal City.

CHARLES WILLIAM CORFE.—The death was announced, on the 16th ult., of the musician known all the country over as "Dr. Corfe of Oxford." He belonged to a musical family, long settled at Salisbury, where his grandfather, who became organist of the Cathedral there, was born in 1740. This Corfe (Joseph) died in 1820, leaving a son (Arthur Thomas), who had succeeded his father as organist sixteen years earlier. Arthur Thomas Corfe, born in 1773, died in 1863, at the good old age of ninety, leaving thirteen surviving children, one of whom was the Professor who has so recently passed away. Charles William Corfe first saw the light, like his father and grandfather, in Salisbury (July 13, 1814), and spent many of his early years as assistant-organist in the Cathedral. In 1846 he removed to Oxford, as organist of Christ Church, and held that post till 1882, when he resigned through ill-health, and was succeeded by Mr. C. Harford Lloyd. He became Mus. Bac. in 1847 and proceeded to Mus. Doc. in due course, presenting as his exercise a setting of Psalm 65, which was afterwards published. In 1860, Dr. Corfe became Choragus of the University, in that capacity acting ex officio as an examiner in music. He resigned that dignified position only a day before his death. On the occasion of his interment, a choral service was celebrated at the Cathedral and at the grave in Cowley Churchyard.

The remains of Mr. George Milnes, a well-known gentleman in musical circles in Huddersfield, who died on November 25, were interred in the Cemetery on the following Wednesday, in the presence of a number of sorrowing relatives and friends. The members of the St. Paul's Church Choir attended and sang the musical portion of the service, consisting of the hymn "Thy will be done," which was given to a tune composed by the deceased. Then followed the 103rd Psalm, chanted by the choir, and after the lesson they also sang the "Nunc dimittis," which was succeeded by the anthem "Blest are the departed." Mr. Milnes took part as a chorus singer in the York Festivals of 1823, 1825, 1828, and 1835; and in the latter year came to Huddersfield. He sang in the Queen Street Chapel Choir for about two years, and then went to the Parish Church. He continued a member of the Parish Church Choir until the year 1840, when he joined that at St. Paul's Church. Of this choir he was a member for 17 years, and since then has regularly attended the services there. He was one of the founders of the Huddersfield Choral Society, was also principal alto at the George Glee Club during its palmy days, and assisted in the performance of the prize glees, including Battye's "Hail, memory," and Jackson's "Sisters of the sea."

THE first examination for the degree of Bachelor in Music, at the University of Oxford, will commence on Tuesday, February 5, 1884, at ten o'clock, in the Schools. Attention is directed to the following clause of the Statute (Statt. Univ., Tit. V. [VI.], Sect. III., sec. 1) relating to this Examination:—"Nemini sese examinandum sistere liceat, nisi qui aut Magistris Scholarum aut Examinatoribus in prævia quam vocant examinatione in Universitate Cantabrigiensi satisfecerit, aut testimonium a Delegatis secundum Statutum Tit. XIX. xv. creatis acceperit, aut examinatorebus seniorum candidatorum qui non sunt de corpore Universitatis in literis Anglicis in Mathematica in lingua Latina et vel in lingua Græca vel in una saltem lingua moderna (videlicet Gallica vel Germanica vel Italica) satisfecerit: cujus rei testimonium exhibetur Professori Musicæ."—The names of gentlemen who intend to present themselves will be received by Mr. Geo. Parker, the clerk of the schools, on or before Saturday, February 2, 1884, on payment of the statutable fee of £2. Candidates who are not already members of the University must matriculate before the day of examination. Subjects of Examination:—Harmony and Counterpoint, in not more than four parts. Text-books—Ouseley's "Treatise on Harmony," and his "Treatise on Counterpoint, Canon, and Fugue."

WE quote the following concerning the Westminster Abbey Organ from the Times: "This celebrated instrument, which many have doubtless observed to have been missing during the past year from its old site on the screen, is now being replaced in the Abbey, after complete reconstruction and enlargement at the hands of Messrs. Hill and Son, who were the original builders of the greater portion of the organ, and have had charge of it since the beginning of this century. Although all old pipes of any value have been retained, the organ must now be regarded as a new one in every other respect, possessing all the latest scientific appliances, and a collection of stops surpassed in completeness by few other English instruments. The old site, at the two extremities of the screen, is again used, but the two main structures are almost twice their original height, rising to near the crowns of the two arches. This is a great improvement architecturally and acoustically. The organist will sit at a detached console in the centre of the screen, the great and solo organs being north of him, the swell behind him, and the choir occupying also a separate place on the screen, though practically hidden from sight. The pedal organ will be situated partly inside the screen and partly underneath the great and swell organs. The entire communication between the player and the various organs, as regards manuals, pedals, and draw-stops, is by means of tubular pneumatic action. The great organ contains 13 stops, the choir 11, the swell 14, the solo 8, and the pedal 10, while there are 20 additional mechanical movements. These stops include 10 of 16 ft. pitch and 2 of 32 ft. pitch, the last named being the double diapason, and the somewhat rare contra posane of metal on the pedal. Four different pressures of wind are employed for the stops, and the whole of the blowing apparatus, consisting of feeders acted upon by a gas-engine, is placed in a specially constructed vault in the Cloister Green, from whence the wind is conveyed by three iron pipes, under ground, to the reservoirs in the organ itself. Mr. J. L. Pearson, R.A., the architect to the Chapter, has designed two fine cases for the organ, but as the capitolary body have now only very scanty funds at their disposal, they are unable to have these carried out. It is to be hoped, therefore, that the public may come forward and help the Chapter to invest their reconstructed organ with an appearance that is better than a mere skeleton of woodwork and pipes. The cases will have some of the character which gives such striking effect to the large organs in the Cathedrals on the Continent, as, for instance, at Chartres, and it is a matter of the utmost importance to the organs and to the Abbey especially that the pipes should not be left without the clothing, which would mark out and distinguish their various arrangements, and which would add such an ornamental effect to the Church. The backs of the two main structures, as seen from the aisles, will likewise form ornamental features. There are many outsiders, we are glad to think, who, as lovers of the Abbey and patrons of music, will be glad to contribute to so excellent an object, for which a sum of about £1,500 will be required."

THE following programme of the approaching Worcester Musical Festival is issued subject to revision. In the Cathedral: Saturday, September 6, full rehearsal; Sunday, 7, special opening service, with band and chorus; Monday, 8, at 10 o'clock, rehearsal; Tuesday, 9, "The Redemption" (Gounod); Wednesday, 10, Part I., Mass in D minor (Cherubini); Part II., Cantata for Pentecost (Bach); Cantata—"The Christian's Prayer" (Spohr); Motett—"Glory, Honour, Praise" (Mozart); The Song of Miriam (Schubert); Wednesday evening, "Elijah" (Mendelssohn); Thursday, 11, Part I., "Stabat Mater" (Dvorák); Part II., "St. Paul," Part I. (Mendelssohn); Friday, 12, "The Messiah" (Handel); Friday, 12 (evening), at 6.30, special closing service, with band and chorus. Evening, in the College Hall: Saturday, September 6, 7 o'clock, rehearsal; Monday, 8, 7 o'clock, rehearsal; Tuesday, 9, grand Concert; Part I., Overture, "Egmont" (Beethoven), and a selection; Part II., Symphony, No. 3 (Mendelssohn), and a selection; Thursday, 11, grand Concert, Part I., Overture (Mozart); short Cantata, "Hero and Leander" (C. H. Lloyd), composed for this Festival, and a selection; Part II., Symphony in D (Beethoven), and a selection.

MR. DANNREUTHER gave another series of his excellent musical evenings, on Thursdays, November 22 and 29, December 6 and 13. The interest of these entertainments consists in the novelties presented which do not gain a hearing elsewhere. The programmes of the recent series were rich in works of this description, perhaps the most important being a Sonata in A minor for pianoforte and violoncello, by Grieg (Op. 36). This must be placed very high in the catalogue of the Norwegian composer's productions. In all the three movements the themes have a striking individuality, and in the first and second the development is likewise effective. Attention must also be called to a Trio in A minor, by Tschaiikowski (Op. 50), which in respect of length and elaboration merits even higher consideration. It is inscribed "A la memoire d'un grand homme," but the name of the hero is not stated. The style is elegiac throughout, and as the music appears to come from the heart as well as the head, it appeals forcibly to the listener in spite of certain palpable though not unpardonable eccentricities of form. For some reason not stated only the first movement was performed, though the remainder of the Trio is no less interesting. Concerning Mr. Henry Holmes's String Quartet in C, and Herr H. von Herzogenberg's Sonata in A for violin and pianoforte, we must take a future opportunity of speaking. The executants included the names of Messrs. Holmes, Rappoldi, Gibson, Carl Jung, Lasserre, Albert, and Dannreuther.

THE Musical Artists' Society gave its 30th performance of new compositions at Aberdeen House, on Saturday, the 15th ult. The first work in the programme was a String Quartet in C, by Mr. F. Adler, in which the composer exhibits considerable technical ability, with a slight leaning towards the modern German school in the first and last movements. A Sonata Piacevole, for pianoforte and flute, by Mr. C. E. Stephens (Op. 25), deserves commendatory notice for its flow of lively and agreeable melody, and the musicianly neatness of its construction. The next instrumental item, a Pianoforte Quintet in E flat, by Mr. Alfred Gilbert, was omitted for reasons unstated. Decidedly the most interesting work in the list was a Cantata, "By the waters of Babylon," by Mr. J. Parry Cole. Though we believe an early effort, and showing unmistakable Mendelssohnian influences, the Cantata displays so much skill and knowledge of effect that we are surprised it has not been more prominently brought before the notice of the public. Songs by Mr. George Gear and Mr. W. J. Bailey completed the scheme. The execution of the various compositions was, on the whole, fairly good, but in some instances injustice was done owing to insufficient preparation.

MR. T. H. FRIEND, who has recently terminated a successful provincial tour with the Royal English Opera Company, has concluded arrangements with the Royal Italian Opera Company (Limited) for a month's season of Opera in English, the opening night being announced for the 7th inst. Amongst the novelties to be produced will be Nessler's Opera "The Piper of Hamelin" (with which the season will commence) and Gounod's "Irene" ("La Reine de Saba"). The repertory will also include "Satanella," "The Lily of Killarney," "The Rose of Castille," "Lurline," "Carmen," "Victorian" (a new work by Julian Edwards), "Le Pré aux Clercs," and Paladilhe's "Suzanne." Popular prices of admission will be charged, and there will be a large pit. It is understood that an efficient band and chorus will be engaged, and as the scenic and other resources of the Covent Garden establishment will be placed at Mr. Friend's disposal, there is every reason to anticipate a successful season.

ON Monday evening, the 17th ult., Miss Emma Walker, pupil of Madame Bodda, gave her second annual concert at Gresham Hall, Brixton. In the vocal portion of the programme warm applause was gained by Miss Annie Lea for Bellini's "Casta Diva" and Vivien's "Market Day," the latter eliciting a double encore. Rankin's Romance for violoncello was very commendably played by Miss Gertrude Nunn, and the remaining artists, each of whom met with marks of approval, were the beneficiaire, Mr. J. F. Jones, Mr. James Budd, and a youthful violinist, Miss Ida Stamm. Mr. Daniel Bradford presided at the organ with marked efficiency.

THE Report of the Committee of the Cork School of Music for the session 1882-83 shows that the educational work carried on in the Institution, both in the executive and theoretical departments, has been extremely satisfactory. During the session, two of the ordinary Recitals were held, in which the students took part; and on the invitation of the Executive Committee of the Cork Exhibition, a special Concert was given in the Exhibition Buildings, when Spohr's Oratorio "The Last Judgment" was performed by a choir of one hundred voices, selected from past and present pupils of the School of Music, assisted by an orchestra of local professors and amateurs, under the direction of Mr. T. J. Sullivan, Conductor of the Choral Class. The Examinations were again entrusted to Mr. Henry R. Eyers, of the Royal Academy of Music, London, who by printed papers and viva voce tests, extending over four days, made a thorough investigation of the results of the course of study in the School; and in the Report, the warm thanks of the Committee are given to him for his indefatigable labours in the cause.

A CONCERT was given at the Vestry Hall, Hampstead, on the 8th ult., when some of the leading members of the musical profession very generously gave their services, the Concert being in aid of the widow and children of James Redfern, the sculptor. The solo vocalists were Miss Anna Williams, Miss Emily Spiller, Miss Marian McKenzie, Mr. Alfred Smith (in place of Mr. Vernon Rigby, absent through indisposition), and Mr. Santley; Instrumentalists: pianoforte, Madame Frickenhaus; violin, Mr. J. Skuse; accompanist, Mr. W. G. Wood; Conductor, Mr. James Shaw. The programme commenced with a Thanksgiving Ode, "Non Nobis Domine," composed by the Conductor, the Overture to which, written for four hands, was brilliantly rendered by Miss Agnes Phillips and Mr. W. G. Wood. The choir, numbering about 60 voices, was very efficient, and Mr. Shaw's work was well sung throughout, and enthusiastically received. We are glad to say that the pecuniary result of the Concert was highly satisfactory.

UNDER the auspices of the People's Entertainment Society, a very successful Concert was given on the 1st ult., at Bermondsey Town Hall, the building being occupied by a crowded and appreciative audience. The vocal portion of a well-chosen programme received able support from Lady Folkestone, who labours untiringly in the cause, Miss Mordaunt, Mr. Henry Yates, and Mr. James Budd, each of whom met with warm applause. Mr. J. J. White played with considerable skill a composition of his own, "Délires de Sapho," "Home, sweet home," and Paganini's difficult "Danse des Sorcières." A couple of choruses from Handel's "Messiah," and other choral music were excellently sung by the local branch of the Society's Choral Union, under the steady conductorship of Mr. W. H. Leslie, who merits high praise for the result of his efforts in training the choir. Lady Folkestone and Mr. Edward Morton acted as accompanists.

THE usual Meeting of the East Dulwich Presbyterian Church Literary Society was held on Monday evening, the 10th ult., in Norland House, Goose Green, when a very excellent paper on "The Pianoforte: The Theory of its Construction, and Notes on Key-board Instruments of the Sixteenth to Eighteenth Centuries," was read by Mr. Filmer Rook. Mr. Rook's paper showed great care in the composition, and the diagrams of the early instruments with pianoforte key-boards were worthy of great praise. An overstrung iron grand pianoforte, and various parts of the same, were kindly lent by Mr. Justin Browne, pianoforte manufacturer, Euston Road, for purposes of illustration, and the musical selections were played by Miss M. Onyon. At the close of the meeting a vote of thanks was awarded to Mr. Rook and Mr. Justin Browne.

AT St. Paul's, Bow Common, on the 14th ult., the Choir of the church gave an excellent rendering of Spohr's "Last Judgment," the solos being sung with much artistic feeling by Masters A. Hooker, Craddock, and Constable, and Messrs. F. Edgar, G. Huggins, Fairfax, T. Grieves, and E. W. Giles, all members of the choir. The performance was listened to with the utmost attention by a large congregation. Mr. Horace Buttery (Organist and Director of the Choir) accompanied at the organ.

THE members of the East Finchley Choral Society opened their second season on Tuesday, the 11th ult., by a performance of the first and second parts of "The Creation," at the Lecture Hall, under the conductorship of Mr. Greenslade. The solo vocalists were Miss Margaret Hoare, R.A.M., Mr. Edmund Snell, and Mr. Frank Salter. Miss James presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. Drewett, R.A.M., at the American organ. The choruses were rendered in a highly efficient manner, and reflected great credit on the Conductor. The second part of the programme, under the conductorship of Mr. Jeayes, consisted of part-songs, including Gaul's "Footsteps of Angels," by the Society, and solos by Miss Hoare, Miss Bickley, and Mr. Percival Hart. Herr Heinrich Koehler contributed two piano solos. The Concert was thoroughly appreciated.

WE take the following from the Paris Correspondence of the Daily Telegraph of the 4th ult.: "M. Proust's report on the Fine Arts' Budget, which has just been published, contains some interesting information as to the cost of the operas and ballets performed at the Opera House. 'L'Africaine' heads the list at the sum of £12,000; 'Jeanne d'Arc' cost £11,100; 'Polyeucte,' £11,000; 'La Reine de Chypre,' £11,000; 'Le Roi de Lahore,' £10,900; 'Aida,' £9,320; 'Françoise de Rimini,' £9,300; 'Le Prophète,' £9,000; 'La Juive,' £7,600; 'Robert le Diable,' £7,600; 'Faust,' £7,500; 'Le Tribut de Zamora,' £7,300; 'Don Juan,' £7,300; 'Henri VIII.,' £7,000; and 'Les Huguenots,' £6,950. The various ballets cost large amounts: 'Yedda,' £6,000; 'Sylvia,' £5,550; 'Namouna,' £4,400; 'La Source,' £3,500; 'La Korrigan,' £3,000; and 'Coppelia,' £1,750."

A CONCERT, in aid of the Choir Fund of St. John the Baptist's Church, Great Marlborough Street, was given in the Lecture Room of the church on the 17th ult., under the direction of Mr. G. F. Bruce, the Organist. Miss Elise Worth, Miss Annie Wilson, Mr. Arthur Vitton, and Mr. Stewart Beckley were the soloists, and acquitted themselves in excellent style. Mr. H. Judd contributed two humorous songs, and Mr. Frank Braine gave two recitations. Miss D'Almaine and Mr. Bruce played a very effective pianoforte duet. Herr Herman Koenig and Herr Rudolf Koenig met with an excellent reception in their violin and pianoforte solos, and the Belle Sauvage Glee Union were thoroughly appreciated for their artistic rendering of part-songs. The hall was full, and the Concert was highly successful.

ON Wednesday, the 5th ult., an Evening Concert was given at the Wellington Hall, Islington, which attracted a large and attentive audience. A miscellaneous programme was well rendered by the following artists: Madame Frank Richardson, Miss Marie Stuart, Miss L. Myddelton, Miss Lucas, Mr. Weldon Hydon, Mr. George Clues, Mr. J. Robinson, and Mr. J. A. Maitland (vocalists); Miss Purser, Miss Halton, Mr. Patrick, and Mr. C. H. Challen (piano); Mr. W. S. Lynch, Mr. A. A. Akermann (violin), and Mr. Pettit (violoncello). Madame Richardson was well received in all her songs, and Mr. Hydon's singing was highly appreciated. The instrumental pieces were performed with good execution and precision, and were much applauded, a violoncello solo by Mr. Pettit being a special feature of the evening.

A CONCERT was given in the Brixton Hall, on November 26, in aid of the Organ Fund of St. Jude's, East Brixton, by Mr. Arthur Jarratt, A.R.A.M., assisted by Madame Jarratt, Miss Roby, Miss Alice Heale, Mr. Dyvid Lewis, Mr. Turner Rule, Miss Gyde (pianist), Mr. H. R. Starr (violinist), and the Amphion Quartet Club. Especial favour was shown to Miss Gyde's solos and duet "Guillaume Tell" with Mr. H. R. Starr, Mr. Lewis's song, a duet by Mr. and Madame Jarratt, and the quartets by the Amphion Club.

A CHRISTMAS entertainment was given by Mr. Stow's Choral Class, at the Camden Lecture Hall, on the 17th ult. The programme consisted of songs, duets, part-songs, and G. Fox's comic Cantata "John Gilpin." The soloists were Miss Edith Stow, Miss Agnes Smout, Miss Amy Sargent, Mr. W. Toomer, and Mr. Frank May. Mr. James Matthews was the Conductor.

On the eve of going to press we have received a prospectus from Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel, of Leipzig, stating that they are about to publish a new and complete Subscription Edition of Franz Schubert's works in the same form as their editions of Bach, Palestrina, Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Chopin, and Schumann. Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel, who date their prospectus "on the anniversary of Schubert's death, 1833," have been fortunate in securing the co-operation of some of the greatest living authorities on Schubert, including Johannes Brahms, Ignaz Brüll, Anton Door, Julius Epstein, J. N. Fuchs, Josef Gänsbacher, Josef Hellmesberger, Eduard Kremser, Eusebius Mandyczewski, and last, but not least, Sir George Grove. The issue will comprise no less than twenty-two series, into which the immense number of Schubert's works will be divided. The prospectus shows that this most fertile composer wrote no fewer than 314 larger works, without counting the hundreds of pieces for voice and pianoforte only. We shall return to this subject in our next issue.

A MUSICAL Service was held at the Church of St. Michael and All Angels, North Kensington, on Advent Sunday, when a complete orchestra was engaged at Even-song. The slow movement from Beethoven's Symphony in D opened the Service, which was fully choral. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were Eaton Fanning's setting in the key of C. Gounod's "Meditation" was performed during the offertory, and the second part of Haydn's "Creation" took the place of the anthem. The whole was rendered with efficiency, under the conductorship of Mr. Sidney Naylor, his place at the organ being taken by Mr. T. L. Forbes. The church was crowded, a large number of people being unable to gain admission. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Canon Duckworth.

THE sudden blow which struck down Mr. Frederic Clay two days after the production of his musical piece "The Golden Ring" at the Alhambra has occasioned widespread regret. He had been working very hard at rehearsals, &c., and the effort proved too much for him, apoplexy, involving paralysis, supervening with deadly energy. Since the attack Mr. Clay has remained in a very serious state, but we are happy to know that his physicians, if not sanguine, are able to report an improvement more satisfactory than was at first anticipated. At the moment of writing we hear that the improvement continues. Mr. Clay's recovery will be gladly hailed, his agreeable manners and graceful talent having endeared him to a large circle of friends.

CONCERTS by the members of the Violin Classes conducted by Mr. W. Fitzhenry took place on the 11th ult., at the South London Institute of Music, and on the 20th ult. at the City of London College. The members of the classes (numbering about eighty) on both occasions acquitted themselves admirably, and the execution of their selections—Fantasia for Violins in three parts (S. Jarvis), Gavotte (S. Clark), March (B. Tours), and Cornelius March (Mendelssohn)—showed evidences of excellent training on the part of the teacher. At both Concerts a popular selection of songs, glees, and instrumental solos were given, the artists being Miss Mary Beare, Mr. Edwin Bryant, Mr. Stanley Smith, and Mr. Tabb (vocalists); Mr. J. Beare (flute), and Mr. P. Hawkins (piano).

THE tenth season of the Crouch End Choral Society opened with a performance of Handel's "Judas Maccabæus" on the 11th ult., at Christ Church Schoolroom, Crouch End, before a large and appreciative audience. The principal vocalists were Mrs. Alfred Dye, Miss A. Scott, Miss Long, Mr. A. Lawrence Fryer, and Mr. Henry Pyatt, all of whom acquitted themselves in a highly satisfactory manner. The band and chorus numbered 100 performers, the former being led by Mr. S. Dean Grimson. Mr. W. Miller presided at the harmonium and Mr. Charles W. Lovejoy at the piano. Mr. Alfred J. Dye conducted, as usual. Mr. J. F. Barnett's "Ancient Mariner" is announced for the next Concert, on February 12.

THE prospectus of the Apollo Musical Club, at Chicago, Illinois, announces for its twelfth season three Subscription Concerts, to be given in Central Music Hall. At the first, on the 4th inst., Haydn's "Creation" will be performed, under the direction of Mr. Theodore Thomas, the solo vocalists being Madame Eugenie Pappenheim, Mr. Theodore J. Toedt, and Mr. Franz Remmert; Organist, Mr. H. Clarence Eddy. The second concert will comprise popular miscellaneous selections; and at the third concert Handel's Oratorio "Judas Maccabæus," and Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's Cantata "The Bride," will be given. The conductorship of the Club remains in the able hands of Mr. William L. Tomlins.

THE performance of Dr. W. E. Taylor's Oratorio, "St. Stephen," at the Sheldonian Theatre, Oxford, was attended by a crowded audience, and the work, which was written for the composer's musical degree at the University, was received with the utmost favour. The part of St. Stephen was well sung by Mr. Hodgson, and the Recitatives of the Narrator were impressively delivered by Mr. Bonell. At the conclusion of the Oratorio, Dr. Taylor had to bow his acknowledgments again and again, and he was also complimented by the musical Professor of the University, Sir F. G. Ouseley.

MISS ALICE ALOOF brought her third series of Concerts to a successful termination on Tuesday evening, the 11th ult., at Brixton Hall, the programme, as on previous occasions, consisting almost entirely of classical music. The bénéficiaire gained a warm reception for each of her solos, which were selected from the works of Mozart, Schumann, Rubinstein, Silas, and Mendelssohn. Miss Marie Schumann played with decided ability the violin part in Schubert's Rondo Brillant (Op. 70) and the Andante and Finale from Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto. The vocalists were Miss Edith Aloof and Mr. Robert Hilton. Mr. John Harrison accompanied with his accustomed ability.

THE 179th Monthly Concert of the St. George's Glee Union was held at the Pimlico Rooms, on the 7th ult. The artists were Miss Clara Denison, Miss Louisa Augarde, Miss Clara Myers, Mr. Hirwen Jones, and Mr. Thurley Beale, all of whom were very successful. The part-songs by the choir included "'Tis silent eve" (Watson), "The lass of Richmond Hill" (Leslie), "You stole my love" (W. Macfarren), "The Sailor's Song" (Hatton), and the Soldiers' Chorus from "Faust" (Gounod). The programme also included pianoforte solos by Miss Matilda Crimp and Miss Clara Denison. The accompaniments were played by Mr. F. R. Kinkee, and Mr. Joseph Monday conducted.

THE Clapham Choral Society gave its first Concert of the season on the 11th ult., at Belmont Hall. The audience was large and appreciative. Sir Arthur Sullivan's "Martyr of Antioch" and C. Gounod's "Gallia" were excellently rendered by the choir, conducted by Mr. Clement Colman. Master Frank Charlton sang the solo in "Gallia," and Madame Worrell, Miss Dence, and Messrs. J. Tapley and H. Blower rendered in admirable manner the solos in "The Martyr of Antioch." Mr. T. Goodwin officiated at the piano, and Mr. James Hallé at the harmonium.

THE annual performance of "The Messiah," for the benefit of the Royal Society of Musicians, took place at St. James's Hall, on the 14th ult., under the able conductorship of Mr. Randegger. The principal vocalists were Miss Anna Williams, Miss Santley, Miss Hilda Wilson, Madame Isabel Fassett, Mr. W. H. Cummings, Mr. Hirwen Jones, Mr. Lucas Williams, and Mr. W. H. Breton. There was a good choir and an excellent orchestra; and in every respect the work was rendered in a manner worthy of a Society so identified with the name of the great composer.

THE usual Advent performance of Spohr's "Last Judgment," in St. Paul's Cathedral, took place on Tuesday evening, the 4th ult., when the standard of excellence attained in previous years was fully maintained. The Cathedral choir received no external assistance, nor any accompaniment beyond that of the organ, at which Dr. Stainer presided. A performance of the same Oratorio also took place in the Church of St. Clement Eastcheap, King William Street, on Wednesday evening, the 12th ult.

IN aid of the choir fund of St. Saviour's, Herne Hill Road, a Concert was given in the school connected with the church on Friday evening, the 14th ult., under the conductorship of the Organist, Mr. J. F. Boardman. Chorus were commendably sung by the members of the St. Saviour's Choral Society. The principal item in the programme consisted of the incidental music to "Macbeth." The soloists were Miss Patten, Miss Tomlins, Mr. Iver McKay, Mr. W. Wilding, and Mr. Lee. Miss Withall accompanied.

WE understand that the Committee of the "Earl of Wilton memorial," to be placed in St. Margaret's Church, Holyrood, Prestwich, near Manchester (a building erected almost entirely at his own expense, and dedicated to his wife Mary Margaret Countess of Wilton), have decided upon a stained glass window to be executed by the firm of Ward and Hughes, of Frith Street, Soho, London. The memorial has been subscribed for by the members of the congregation, neighbours, and many friends in London and Manchester.

MISS ROZEL AYERS gave an evening Concert in the Town Hall, Wandsworth, on Tuesday, the 4th ult., which was well attended. The vocalists were Miss Hipwell, Miss M. Gwynne, Miss E. Blair, Mr. E. Levetus, Mr. J. Budd, and Mr. J. King. Mr. Sternberg contributed violin solos with good effect. Several duets and solos were excellently played by Miss Ayers, Mr. Bambridge, Miss L. Potter, and Mr. H. G. Heydemann. The Conductors were Mr. Stafford Trego, Mus. Bac., Oxon.; and Mr. E. M. Flavell, R.A.M.

A CONCERT of Sacred Music was given at the Sydenham Baptist Chapel, on November 28, in aid of the Organ Fund. The soloists were Miss C. Offor (who was especially successful in Gounod's "Ave Maria"), Miss Young (who received an encore for her rendering of Gounod's "There is a green hill"), and Mr. Frank May (who was heard to great advantage in "Why do the nations" and "Rolling in foaming billows"). Instrumental solos and anthems by the choir completed the programme.

MR. FREDERIC PENNA, who is favourably known as a teacher of singing as well as a vocalist, gave a miscellaneous Concert, on the 10th ult., at the Steinway Hall. There was nothing in the programme to call for criticism, but favourable mention should be made of the singing of Madame Catherine Penna, Miss Isabel Chatterton, and Signor Ria, as well as the concert-giver. Herr Pollitzer, Signor Tito Mattei, and Herr Oberthur's instrumental solos gave relief to the vocal music.

MENDELSSOHN'S 13th Psalm has been sung at St. John the Evangelist, Waterloo Road, each Thursday in Advent, by the choir of the Church, slightly augmented for the occasion, under the direction of Mr. Henry J. B. Dart. The solos were sung by Master Lewis, of the Temple Church, and Master Thornton, of St. John's. The Monthly Organ Recital was given on Tuesday, the 4th ult., by Mr. James Loaring, F.C.O., with Mr. Charles James as vocalist.

THE members of the Herne Hill Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. J. T. Hutchinson, A.R.A.M., gave their first Concert at the Lecture Hall, Mayall Road, on Wednesday, the 12th ult. The part-songs were well rendered. The solo vocalists were Mr. J. T. Hutchinson, Mr. Percy Palmer, and Miss Edith Drown (of the Guildhall School). Pianoforte solos were contributed by Miss Minnie Drown, R.A.M.

THE Belle Sauvage Glee Union held its fourth annual Supper and Concert at Anderton's Hotel, Fleet Street, on November 29. Several part-songs were given in good style under the direction of Mr. C. H. Hewitt; and Mr. R. Flegg, Mr. S. W. Beckley, and Mr. H. Judd contributed songs. Mr. J. M. Lee and Mr. G. F. Bruce were effective in their pianoforte solos, the latter gentleman acting as accompanist throughout.

MR. NELSON VARLEY, the tenor singer, for five years a member of Mr. D'Oyly Carte's opera company, died on the 1st ult., at his lodgings in Cardiff, at the early age of thirty-nine. His funeral took place at the New Cemetery, Cardiff, on the 5th ult. A subscription is now on foot to raise a tombstone over the grave.

DR. STAINER'S new Cantata "St. Mary Magdalen" will be performed by the St. Stephen's Choral Society, at the Poplar Town Hall, on Monday evening, the 28th inst. The solos will be rendered by Mdle. Philippine Siedle, Madame Lenssen, Mr. A. Kenningham, and Mr. W. H. Brereton.

A PAPER on "The Position of the Science of Music and the Status of its Profession" was read at the College of Organists, on the evening of the 4th ult., by Mr. Samuel Gee, A.R.A.M., the chair being taken by Mr. J. Higgs, Mus. B., Oxon.

DR. GLADSTONE'S sacred Cantata "Philippi" is to be given, on the 30th inst., at St. Margaret's Church, Westminster. The choir of the church will be considerably augmented, and an efficient orchestra will assist, under the direction of the composer.

DR. JOHN HULLAH, who for some weeks past has been very seriously ill at Malvern Wells, has so far recovered as to be permitted to undertake a journey to a milder climate.

THE Dedication Festival Service at St. Paul's Cathedral, when a part of Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" is performed with full orchestra, will take place on Friday afternoon, the 25th inst. The service commences at four o'clock.

WE understand that Mr. E. A. Sydenham has been appointed to the post of Organist and Director of the Choir at All Saints', Scarborough, vacant by the appointment of Dr. Naylor to York Minster.

THE music for the Cantata, which will form an important feature in the opening ceremonial of the forthcoming International Exhibition at the Crystal Palace, will be composed by Sir George Macfarren.

THE Archbishop of Canterbury has conferred the degree of Doctor of Music on Mr. Langdon Colborne, Mus. Bac., Cantab., Organist of Hereford Cathedral.

REVIEWS.

The Westminster Abbey Hymn Book.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

WE very often hear in these days that the multiplication of hymn books is undesirable. But, as in most other questions, there are two sides to this. The difficulty is to determine whether in the matter of hymns, as of old in services, there shall be various "uses" for various places; or whether all individuality shall be merged into one common fund. It surely is appropriate that in places where the possibilities of rendering music well are many, something more may be attempted, even in the matter of hymns, than can be undertaken by ordinary parochial choirs. To adopt one book for the whole of the Church of England is an impossibility, because there are many divergent views in matters of doctrine; it must also be considered undesirable, as it would probably stop the supply of new hymns. Demand and supply keep pace one with the other. Hymns would soon cease to be written if there were no chance of their being incorporated into some collection, or, if written, they would perchance be hidden away, to be burnt by the literary or other executors as valueless. The Dean of Westminster has determined upon the first alternative, and for the Abbey over whose destinies he is called to preside he has sanctioned a special hymn book, compiled by the Rev. Dr. Troutbeck, one of the Minor Canons of the Abbey, and Priest-in-Ordinary to the Queen.

It seems plain upon the surface that this book, though primarily intended for the congregational element in the Abbey Services, has a second and subsidiary service to render—viz., to enshrine the memory of one who for many years presided over its fortune: the late Dean Stanley. The collection consists of 400 hymns. In its arrangement it follows the course of the Church Seasons, and therefore will meet the wants not only of the Abbey and other Cathedrals, but also of parish churches. One feature we notice is that in every case (with the exception of four anonymous hymns) the author's name is given—a satisfaction, surely, to all who, struck with a hymn, may desire to know its author. There are four indices, which make the task of reference easy and expeditious. The first is the index of subjects, even the general hymns being sub-divided into Praise, Prayer, Faith, Hope, and Love; so that an appropriate hymn ought not to be hard to find. The second is that of the authors and translators, with their dates—useful at least in a literary sense. The third is an index of the metres, with the numbers of the hymns in the collection which are written in each metre. This will be of use in quickly settling upon another tune if the one to which a special hymn is written be found too elaborate or unsuitable. The fourth is the usual index of first lines. There is nothing to be desired in this part of the Hymn Book, in a sense the key of the whole. The words of the hymns only are before us. The final character and acceptableness of the book can only be truly determined when it is completed with its music. It has great possibilities of being made a most excellent Hymn Book, and it is to be hoped that much care and time and deliberation will be given to this final step; that the old favourites be not separated from their traditional tunes, and that the new ones be worthily matched with music fitted to them. It is satisfactory to see that the favourite hymns of the Church of England are included.

We have made a careful comparison of this book with the two others which are used principally in the Church of England, "Ancient and Modern" and "Church Hymns," and we find that the "Westminster Abbey Hymn Book" and "Ancient and Modern" have 165 hymns in common, and the still larger number of 200 are common to this and "Church Hymns." The most striking feature, perhaps, in the book is the contribution—thirteen in number—from the late Dean Stanley's hymns, originals and translations. They are all strongly marked with their author's individuality, pure and refined English, evenly flowing versification, sometimes an inadequate expression of the doctrine which the hymns are supposed to embody. See, for instance, 143 for Maunday Thursday; and 147 for Good Friday. They are most of them long, and will not readily lend themselves to singing. They are more poems than hymns. Many will be grateful for this collection of most of the late Dean's hymns, and will gladly possess the book because of it. There are no words which can adequately express the extreme beauty of two of these hymns, 186 for Ascensiontide, "He is gone—beyond the skies"; and No. 189 for Whitsuntide, a translation from the Latin of the eleventh century:—

Come, Holy Spirit, from above,
And from the realms of light and love
Thine own bright rays impart.

There are various contributions from other members of the Abbey Chapter and Body, past and present. Archbishop Trench's one hymn, "Some murmur when their sky is clear," might well be brought out of its place among hymns for "private use" and sung in the congregation. The Bishop of Lincoln, once a Canon of the Abbey, contributes six hymns, all well known and much sung, fit echoes of a life which did so much for the Abbey in past days, and is still doing so much for the Church in a larger sphere. They are all marked by his deep erudition and piety. The late Dean Milman, of St. Paul's Cathedral, once a Canon of the Abbey, is also represented by six hymns, most of them well known (139), "Ride on, ride on in majesty"; (248), "When our heads are bowed with woe." We are glad to see his very beautiful hymn for the "Burial of the Dead" included, (245), "Brother, thou art gone before us," than which there is nothing in the whole range of hymnology capable of giving more comfort. Is it asking too much to suggest that the beautiful music of Goss, to which it is set, may be retained, even if it be found necessary to compose simpler music for less musical choirs and congregations? Another past member of the Chapter, Ernest Hawkins, is represented by hymn 210, "Lord, a Saviour's love displaying." Archdeacon Farrar contributes two hymns (224), "For St. Michael and All Angels"; (380), "God and Father, great and holy," marked by the strong poetic imagination which is seen in all that he writes and says. Canon Barry, Bishop Elect of Sydney, will leave behind him, in addition to his many unrecorded services to the Abbey, one hymn by which he will be recalled (36), for Sunday, "As Thou didst rest, O Father," comprehensive, thoughtful, and devotional. The Precursor, Mr. Flood Jones's hymn for Holy Matrimony, "Father of life," we are glad to see included in this collection. The compiler contributes a translation of "Ein feste Burg," whose traditional music fetters considerably the possibilities of translation.

We cannot pass by without special notice and commendation three hymns by the Rev. J. Gregory Smith: (362) "Adown the river year by year," (375) "The day-beam dies," and (268) "Comes at times a stillness as of even." Those who have heard the last to the beautiful setting by Sir H. Oakeley may well wish that no other music be apportioned to this hymn, and further, since musician and poet are so much in sympathy, that in the other hymns the partnership may not be dissolved. The Archbishop of Canterbury is represented by one very fine hymn (177), "O throned, O crowned with all renown." We are glad also to notice that the Bishop of Bedford's four hymns for "Spring," "Summer," "Autumn," and "Winter," now so well known through "Church Hymns," are included. They are worthy of a place in any collection of hymns. Next to Dean Stanley, the largest contribution of new hymns is from Francis T. Palgrave's collection. They are twelve in number, and much that has been before said of Dean Stanley's is applicable to these. They are more poems than hymns, bearing strong marks of the writer's individuality and experience. He is seen through them all constantly "struggling upwards towards the light," at times losing the path, but always regaining it and coming back to the faith again. The Rev. S. J. Stone contributes four. His powers as a hymn writer are so well known as to need no praise. We wish he could see his way to altering the first line of verse 5 in hymn 258—"O once for men, of Man the Son"—it appears to us hardly worthy of one who can write so well. One of our best hymn writers—the Rev. J. Ellerton—has six in this collection. No collection would be complete without his Funeral Hymn "Now the labourer's task is o'er." We have no space to notice several others which deserve mention. Their fame is already established. We find several hymns more fully given and others curtailed, among which latter we are sorry to see that two verses of 321, "Hark, my soul, it is the Lord," are omitted: a short hymn at the best, we can hardly spare the omissions. We are glad to see two hymns by Henry J. Buckoll for the beginning and ending of school terms (Nos. 277, 278), both in the same metre. There is no reason why with good music such hymns should not become traditional in all our public schools. There are a few hymns at the end of the book for "private use," though we do not see why they should not, many of them, be used in the public services of the Church. Cowper's "O for a closer walk with God" (366) is found in the "Temple Hymn Book," and is used for public worship. Hymns are meant to be ideals to be aimed at, and not only the expression of people's experiences. But we must draw to a close.

The book is a good one. It has preserved the balance well between the past and present. There are "treasures new and old" to be found in it. It is particularly adapted for the place for which it is primarily intended. We shall look anxiously for its final form, the words with the music complete. Its position as an important factor in the public services of the Church depends greatly upon the care and trouble expended upon this final step.

Italian and other Studies. By Francis Hueffer.
[Elliot Stock.]

THE preface to a volume of Essays by Mr. Hueffer, published three years ago, contains some remarks which the author considers so applicable to the work before us as to justify his reprinting them as a sort of apologetical Introduction to a second collection of papers which have already met the public eye in various magazines and newspapers. In the present day it is by no means necessary to crave the indulgence of the reader for the presentation of material the only fault of which is that it has been once before set up in type. The thoughts of some of our best authors are now so scattered throughout periodical literature that journals are often carefully preserved for the worth of the articles they contain; and it is a boon to the public, when accredited writers will render this proceeding unnecessary by occasionally issuing a collection of their choicest papers in a volume. Mr. Hueffer is an acute and intelligent thinker; and, an advocate of what is termed the "advanced" school of music, never loses an opportunity of endeavouring to prepare the public mind for the representative works of this class now so constantly placed before us. Although there are few articles in the book under notice exclusively upon music, it is easy to perceive that the feeling we have mentioned underlies the whole of them; and notwithstanding that there may be many readers who do not entirely agree with the artistic theory he enforces, there can be no doubt of the attractive character of the illustrations he has selected to strengthen his cause, or of the skilful manner in which he has used them. The paper on "The Poets of Young Italy," which originally appeared in the "Fortnightly Review," gives an admirable sketch of the state of Italian poetry in modern times; and in proof of the sympathetic appreciation of the Wagnerian School of Music amongst the young bards of Italy, we are reminded that "Lohengrin," at Bologna, was received by them with "poetic acclamations of the highest enthusiasm." In "A Literary Friendship of the Fourteenth Century" we have an excellent account of the rare affection which existed between Boccaccio and Petrarch, the bond of union being, no doubt, as our author observes, their "common love of poetry," although their writings proved the essential difference between their real natures. "The Renaissance in Italy" and "Exhibitions of Rossetti's Pictures" will have much interest to all artistic readers, the latter indeed showing most vividly the impression produced upon the author by one of the most original of latter-day painters. "Troubadours Ancient and Modern"—an attempt to disprove the notion that these wandering bards were merely minstrels of love, "going from land to land twanging their guitars with no object in view but the praise of beauty, and no rule to entrap their passionate effusions"—has some very good thoughts on the construction of the Sonnet and Sestina; and proves that the author's knowledge of various verse forms is the result of some years of loving study. "Music and Musicians" is a review of Grove's well-known "Dictionary," to which Mr. Hueffer does every justice. We quite agree with him, however, in saying that a little more prominence might have been given, in an English Dictionary, to Beethoven's relations with this country. We know that the composer was always desirous of visiting England, where his works were so highly appreciated, and in 1824 he wrote to Neate—whom, by the way, Mr. Hueffer calls Sir Charles Neate—respecting an offer made to him by the Philharmonic Society of the sum of 300 guineas and a benefit, guaranteed at £500, on condition that he brought with him a new Symphony and Concerto. Beethoven had accepted these terms, and made arrangements for his journey, but the idea was afterwards abandoned in consequence of a domestic difficulty. "The Literary Aspects of Schopenhauer's Work" is avowedly a sequel to an Essay which appeared in the collection of papers referred to at the commencement of our notice. In this we have a truthful abstract of the doctrines of the Pessimist philosopher, of whom, we fear, too little is generally known. Considering his powerful influence upon the "music of the future," the following paragraph reads strangely: "Of Wagner, the representative musician of modern times, and one of Schopenhauer's staunchest adherents, the philosopher peremptorily declared, 'He does not know what music is,' and of his taste with regard to the fine arts, it may be cited as characteristic that beauty of design appealed to him more than truth and richness of colouring." That he was rarely satisfied with those who professedly based their artistic aims upon his creed is positively asserted by Mr. Hueffer, who tells us that "the most faithful and most intelligent adherents of his philosophy are men whose views of art, literature, and politics he attacks with immoderate warmth." The remaining papers are "Musical Criticism," a Lecture delivered at the Royal Institution, and "Mr. Pepys the Musician," which appeared in THE MUSICAL TIMES from January to July, 1881. The majority of the papers contained in this volume, although really reviews contributed, as we have said, chiefly to periodicals, have not too much reference to the books or events which called them forth to injure their value as abstract articles; and though termed by their author "fugitive pieces," we shall be glad if the shape in which they are now brought to judgment should effectually arrest their flight, and ensure them a permanent welcome amongst art-loving readers.

Six Original School Songs, easy of execution. Written by C. M. L. Composed by Odoardo Barri. [Hutchings and Romer.]

THE necessity of including singing in the educational movement of the present day seems generally acknowledged by teachers, and we are glad to see that composers and authors are lending their aid to the cause by supplying children with songs within their powers both of execution and comprehension. The six little vocal pieces before us are a welcome contribution to the store, for the words are healthy, and just such as a happy child would be pleased to sing. The titles—"The School Treat," "The Monkey," "Skating in the park," "My garden," "The soldier," and "A dream"—sufficiently indicate their character; and we may say that the verses—especially Nos. 1, 4, and 6 on our list—are extremely attractive, and truly sympathetic with the juvenile mind. Mr. Barri has proved a worthy musical ally, for he has not only made the melodies pleasing and singable, but has accompanied them with simple harmonies, which will help the vocalist on his way.

Eine Studie zum Stabat Mater. Von C. H. Bitter. [Leipzig: Robert Seitz.]

THOUGH but little known in this country, Herr Bitter has made for himself a reputation in Germany by numerous works, chief among which may be named his "Life of J. S. Bach," his "C. P. E. Bach und W. F. Bach, und Seine Brüder"; and his "Beiträge zur Geschichte des Oratoriums." His present little book—it can hardly be called a volume, as it contains only ninety-two pages—contains in a compressed form the result of a very large amount of research. Few hymns of the Roman Catholic Church have enjoyed a wider popularity than the "Stabat Mater dolorosa," and none probably have been more frequently set to music. Herr Bitter gives a list of more than a hundred different settings, commencing with Josquin de Près and Palestrina, and coming down to the work of Dvorák, recently performed in London. The attractiveness of the text for composers is shown by the fact that several musicians have set the poem more than once, while, to give one remarkable instance, Nicolo Zingarelli is said to have written twenty-eight different versions.

Before speaking of the music Herr Bitter enumerates no fewer than eighty-two different German translations of the poem, most of which have been adapted, with more or less success (often with less), to the various musical settings. As this part of the book will be less interesting to English readers, we pass it over with an expression of regret that the author should have more than once gone out of his way to attack Richard Wagner. The great composer translated the hymn for his edition of Palestrina's "Stabat Mater." Herr Bitter gives Wagner's rendering in full; and, after pronouncing it neither better nor worse than the majority of the others, enters upon a tirade against the diction of the "Ring der Nibelungen," which is entirely uncalled for and out of place.

It would have been, of course, impossible to give any account of all the musical settings of the hymn which our author has catalogued within the limits of this little work; and, as Herr Bitter says, even if possible it would have been tedious both to writer and readers. Only the most important versions are described. We have first a notice of two or three of the simpler choral forms of the hymn; those selected are that of the Paderborn Hymnal (1678), and of Kirnberger, Sebastian Bach's pupil, both of which are given in full. An extract from Steffan's "Stabat Mater" for two voices is in curious contrast to the preceding, being in the melodious form of the old Italian arias. A most extraordinary composition is that by Saracini (1620), in which meaninglessly, not to say absurd, "divisions," and the most tasteless ornaments abound. The passage "In die judicii" which Herr Bitter quotes is simply astounding, and to our modern ideas absolutely grotesque. The two versions by Palestrina, one for two and the other for three choirs next come under notice, as specimens of the pure ecclesiastical style of the old master. The "Stabat" of Haydn and that of Pergolese, both representative works, receive a full and appreciative analysis. Next follow notices, with quotations, of the settings by Astorga, Bernard Klein, Caldara, Franz Lachner, and Rungenhagen. Rossini's popular work would naturally be hardly sympathetic to a German musician; but, on the whole, one can scarcely accuse Herr Bitter of injustice in his criticisms. The last two works noticed in detail are the settings by Friedrich Kiel and Dvorák. The latter is unquestionably one of the most striking and original yet produced, and our author shows himself fully alive to its merits. We can cordially recommend Herr Bitter's book to those who are acquainted with the German language as an interesting and valuable contribution to musical literature.

Toccata in F major. For the Pianoforte. Composed for the Pianoforte by Arthur O'Leary.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

We may hope that as so few Toccatas are written by English composers this piece will receive the attention it merits. Amongst the multitudes of compositions fashioned merely for modern requirements it is not always that the best can make their way to the surface; but the form in which Mr. O'Leary has cast his musical thoughts should awaken a new interest in such pieces; and, if so, this specimen may fitly serve as a model for future workers. In every respect it is an excellent composition, and we cordially commend it to the attention both of pianists and teachers.

Novello, Ewer and Co.'s Pianoforte Albums. Vol. 4. Gavottes, Minuets, &c., by various composers. Edited by Berthold Tours. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

It is good that the many amateur pianists who play the Gavottes, Minuets, and other old dance tunes by modern writers should be well acquainted with those of the old masters; and we especially direct attention, therefore, to these Pianoforte Albums, the early numbers of which contain some of the best specimens of such pieces by Bach and Handel. The volume now before us includes the works of some of the composers of our own day, and the very highest praise that we can bestow upon them is that they suffer not by comparison with those which have received the sanction of time. Amongst the contents of this book we find a few extracts from Symphonies, Orchestral Suites, Quartets, and also the Minuet from Beethoven's Trio for violin, viola, and violoncello, Op. 9, No. 2, all of which are so well arranged as to form highly attractive pianoforte pieces. The very best Gavottes, Minuets, Sarabandes, Bourrées, and Giges have been collected from all sources; and one commendable feature in the volume is that where the name of a transcriber has become identified with a composition, this arrangement remains intact, as for example the Minuet from Mozart's Symphony in E flat, by Schulhoff, and the well known Gavotte of Louis XIII., by Henri Ghys. We need scarcely say that the music is excellently printed, and most carefully edited.

The Professional Pocket Book; or Daily and Hourly Engagement Diary for 1884. Published under the direction of Sir Julius Benedict. [Rudall, Carte and Co.]

THE edition of this useful Pocket Book for the present year has all the salient features of its predecessors. We could wish that a few more musical events had been included, even at the expense of leaving the dates of the principal races unchronicled; but as the work is entitled the "Professional" Pocket Book, perhaps we must not think too exclusively of what interests the musical professor.

FOREIGN NOTES.

THE great Wagner lawsuit brought by the German impresario, Herr Neumann, well-known in this country by his performances of Wagner's operas at Her Majesty's Theatre, against M. Lamoureux, the conductor of orchestral concerts in Paris, has been decided by the Paris tribunal in favour of the latter. Herr Neumann had, by a contract with the late composer, secured all rights of representation of his operas in France, and M. Lamoureux having performed some fragments of "Lohengrin" at one of his orchestral concerts, this suit was instituted for the purpose of restraining such performances. The court, however, held that Herr Neumann's rights had not been infringed, the two principal points in the judgment being: (1) The representation of a dramatic work, such as an opera, is understood to be a performance with scenery and costumes of the whole or part of the work: a simple performance of the music without costumes, scenery, or action does not constitute a representation, and in consequence (2) The proprietor of a right of representation of an opera cannot prevent (as interfering with his rights) a mere performance by the orchestra only of a part of the said opera. Herr Neumann has to pay M. Lamoureux 500 francs damages, besides costs.

Hans von Bülow is creating unbounded enthusiasm on his Concert tour through South Germany. One of the most remarkable manifestations of his genius was given at a Concert at the Cursaal, in Wiesbaden, when the programme consisted entirely of pieces by the late Joachim Raff. The orchestral portion of the Concert was excellently rendered by the Kurkapelle under the able conductorship of Herr Louis Lüstner. There is hardly a concert institute in Germany which produces so many novelties, and it was here that nearly all Herr Raff's Symphonies were given for the first time. We may add that the late composer was for many years an inhabitant of Wiesbaden.

A great many musical and other papers lately announced the death of the celebrated composer of dance music, Josef Gung'l, who will be remembered in this country as having conducted the performances of his own compositions at the Promenade Concerts at Covent Garden Theatre some years since. It now appears that Herr Josef Gung'l, so far from being dead, is living and in good health at his daughter's house in Cassel. The mistake arose from the fact of a relation of his, the bandmaster, Johann Gung'l, having died some time since.

Herr Martin Roeder, a well-known critic on musical matters, and the writer of several books describing his sojourn in Italy, recently gave a Concert at Berlin, consisting entirely of his own compositions. The principal work performed was a new oratorio, entitled "St. Mary Magdalene." The Berlin papers report that the fasco experienced by this composition has not been equalled for many years in the German capital.

Dr. Hase (the proprietor of the celebrated publishing firm of Breitkopf and Härtel) was recently in Vienna to make arrangements for a complete edition of Schubert's works, on the model of the editions of Mozart and Beethoven published by the same house.

Délibes' opera "Lakmé" was performed for the first time in Germany at the Opera House of Frankfurt, on the 3rd ult., and was received with great enthusiasm. The principal singers, as well as the orchestra and scenery, left nothing to be desired, and the repetitions of the work, of which several have taken place, have proved equally successful.

A new opera, "Helianthus," by Herr Adalbert Goldschmidt, who, following the example of Wagner, has written his own libretto, is announced for production at Leipzig.

Brahms's new Symphony (No. 3) was performed for the first time in Vienna on the 2nd ult., under the conductorship of Herr Hans Richter, and proved an immense success.

The new National Opera House, at Prague (the old house having been burnt down last year), was opened on November 18, with Smetana's opera "Libussa."

The valuable musical library left by the late Joachim Raff has been bought by the publisher, C. F. Heckel, of Mannheim.

Italian Opera was revived in Paris, after a lapse of many years, at the Théâtre des Nations, on November 28. This spacious theatre, situated in the Place du Chatelet, has been converted into a splendid opera-house, under the direction of MM. Maurel and Corti. Verdi's "Simon Boccanegra," re-written for this occasion, was the work selected for the opening. The theatre presented an imposing spectacle, President Grévy with his family, and nearly all the leading members of Parisian society, including the whole of the Italian Embassy, being present. The performance proved a great success, the principal parts being in the able hands of the prima donna, Madame Fidès-Devriès, M. Maurel (in the title rôle), and M. De Reszké. Signor Faccio, the famous conductor of La Scala, in Milan, directed the orchestra with his usual skill, and was received with great applause. The opera was splendidly mounted, and among the most effective tableaux were the Council hall in the second act, in which the Doge and his councillors are disturbed by the revolutionary cries of the populace; and the view of Genoa illuminated in the last act.

Among the novelties produced by M. Padeloup at his Concerts, at Paris, during the past month, has been a poem symphonique, entitled "Pologne," by Madlle. Augusta Holmes. The piece, which is described as abounding in melody and bright orchestral colour, was rapturously received and encored, and its repetition on the following Sunday commanded by the audience.

At one of M. Lamoureux's Concerts at the Château d'Eau, during the past month, Bach's dramatic cantata "Der Streit zwischen Phœbus und Pan" was performed. Both work and rendering are very highly praised. Madlle. Clotilde Kleeberg, a young pianist, who appeared successfully in London last season, has made a brilliant success at these Concerts in Beethoven's Concerto in C minor.

We learn that the Grand Prize for composition offered by the City of Paris is in future only to be given triennially, instead of, as hitherto, every two years.

M. Camille Saint-Saëns recently gave an interesting lecture at the Académie des Beaux Arts, at Paris, on fourteen pictures of ancient instruments. The pictures were found in a manuscript contained in the Angers Public Library, and the instruments represented date from the time of Charlemagne. The publication of the pictures is being prepared.

Our Paris contemporary, "L'Art Musical," has changed proprietors, and is now being published by M. Alfonse Leduc.

In a lengthy article describing the works going on at the great Exhibition buildings, to be opened in Turin next spring, the Illustrazione Italiana thus alludes to the department of music: "Along the three grand aisles there will be a small gallery destined for the display of musical instruments. A vestibule will lead to a grand saloon, in the form of a rotundo, of severe but simple architecture, as large as the San Carlo Theatre at Naples, and therefore capable of containing no less than 3,000 people. We shall thus have in Turin, as at the Trocadéro in Paris, that which was wanted at the late Milan Exhibition—a grand saloon which may be used for festivals, concerts, and musical performances generally, and which will be furnished with two grand organs. Alongside of the vestibule, or atrium, and around the grand saloon, there will be rooms for the performance of chamber music, rooms for artists, reception rooms, instrument rooms, and other conveniences."

Bizet's "La Jolie Fille de Perth" has been given with great success at the Argentina Theatre, Rome.

Arrigo Boito is engaged on a new opera entitled "Pur Luigi Farnese." As in the case of his former work, "Mefistofele," Signor Boito is the author of the words as well as the music.

We understand that Herr G. A. Heinze, of Amsterdam, has finished the composition of an oratorio entitled "St. Vincent von Paula."

Wagner's "Ring des Nibelungen" is to be given next spring at St. Petersburg and Moscow.

The death is announced at Rome of Signor Mario in his 75th year. An obituary notice appears in another portion of our columns.

Auguste Offenbach, the only son of the celebrated composer of French operettas, died on the 7th ult., at Cannes, at the early age of twenty-one.

Dominique Rubini, formerly bandmaster to the Emperor of Russia, and a celebrated professor of singing, died on November 22, at Reuil, near Paris, at the age of 77 years.

Gustav Hölzel, a very popular song composer and once famous singer, died lately at Vienna at the age of seventy.

SCHUBERT'S MANUSCRIPTS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Permit me to say a few words as to the notice of my Schubert discoveries contained in No. 490 of your highly-esteemed paper. The first discovery of the whole music to "Rosamunde" belongs to no one but Sir George Grove, whose biography of Schubert (in his "Dictionary of Music and Musicians") is, with Nottebohm's Thematic Catalogue, the most valuable contribution which we possess to the Schubert Literature.

The new Schubert discoveries which have been ascribed to me by some Austrian papers have only regard to songs of the master.—Yours very truly,

MAX FRIEDLÄNDER.

Frankfort-on-Main, December 18, 1883.

BAPTIE'S "BIOGRAPHY OF MUSICIANS."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—In reply to your correspondent "P. Q.," of December 1, I beg to state that he appears to be sure of what he evidently knows nothing about.

I am quite aware that Sir Robert is a half Vicar-Choral (the other half is held by Mr. John O'Rourke, tenor) of St. Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin, but is not, and never has been, Organist. If "P. Q." will take the trouble to provide himself with one of the printed lists containing the names of the entire staff at St. Patrick's, he will there find Sir Robert's name as a Vicar-Choral, and that of Mr. Charles Marchant as Organist and Choirmaster.

I am, Sir, yours, &c.,

R. Y.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—The difference between Mr. Baptie and "R. Y." is easily explained. The organist of St. Patrick's, Dublin is a stipendiary not on the foundation. Sir Robert Steward held the office from 1852 till 1861, when he was placed on the foundation as a Vicar-Choral, and was succeeded as organist by Mr. W. Murphy. In 1879 Mr. C. G. Marchant was appointed, in the place of Mr. Murphy. Sir Robert however, continued to officiate at the principal services and may thus be regarded as practically the organist although, as a member of the Cathedral, he is a Vicar only. He is organist of Christ Church Cathedral and of the Chapel of Trinity College.—Yours faithfully,

December 22, 1883. G. A. C.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

* Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after its occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur. Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all Subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

BANBURY.—The members of the New Philharmonic Society at the first Concert of the season on Tuesday, the 4th ult., at Exchange Hall. The programme consisted of Mendelssohn's Psalm, Costa's Serenata The Dream, and a miscellaneous selection. The solo vocalists were Miss Ferrari, Miss Strong, Mr. John Probert, and Messrs. P. S. Edmunds, F. P. Edmunds, W. Thompson, and Walkley. Mr. M. J. Monk conducted, Miss Lewis presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. W. Clough at the organ.

BARNSELY.—A very successful Subscription Concert was given by the members of the Barnsley St. Cecilia Society, in the Assembly Room Public Hall, on Wednesday, the 12th ult. The first part of the programme was devoted to Gade's Psyche and the second part was miscellaneous. The principal vocalists were Miss Agnes Larkcom and Mr. William Riley, who sustained the parts of "Psyche" and "Eros" respectively in a very excellent manner. The choruses in Psyche and part-songs in the second part were creditably performed by the choir, which now numbers over 100 voices, under the able conductorship of Mr. R. S. Burton.

BELFAST.—The members of the Philharmonic Society gave the first Concert of the season on Friday, November 23, in the Ulster Hall, under the conductorship of Herr Beyschlag. The orchestral pieces, including Schubert's Rosamunde ballet music, were well played, and the part-songs and choruses were excellently rendered. The solo vocalists were Miss Ella Lemmens, Mr. Henry Guy, and Mr. Santley; solo violinist, Mr. Carrodus. Mr. J. J. Shillington accompanied on the organ, and the pianoforte accompaniments were divided between Herr Beyschlag and Herr Werner.

BERKHAMSTED.—The fifth annual Concert of the Philharmonic Society, which is in connection with King Edward VI.'s Grammar School, was given on November 28, in the Town Hall. Mr. James Turpin was Conductor, and the Concert was a great success, fully sustaining the high reputation of the Society. Bennett's May Queen formed the first part, Miss Clara Field, Miss A. Bartrum, Mr. W. B. Bartrum, and Mr. P. Tuckwell sustaining the solo parts. Part two was miscellaneous, and comprised a selection of songs, part-songs, violin and piano solos, &c.

BIRMINGHAM.—On the 5th ult. the Sunday School Union Choral Society gave its annual Concert, at which Mr. Alfred R. Gaul's Cantata The Holy City was performed, conducted by the composer. The principal vocalists were Miss A. Willford, R.A.M., Miss Jeanie Rose, Miss L. Mills, Miss Hetherington, Mr. Boulcott Newth, and Mr. T. Horrex. The band was led by Mr. T. M. Abbott. Mr. J. Stimpson presided at the organ and Mr. Walter Wale at the pianoforte. The choir was reinforced by members of the Conductor's various classes. The band and chorus numbered over 400. The audience was large, and thoroughly appreciated the merits of the work.

BISHOP AUCKLAND.—Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's Jason was performed by the Auckland Musical Society on Tuesday, the 18th ult., with full band and chorus. The work, which is of an exacting character, taxed the powers of the executants to the fullest extent, but on the whole a fine rendering of the Cantata was given. The choir sang with great intelligence and refinement, and making due allowance for the difficulties of their parts, the band was thoroughly satisfactory. The solo vocalists were Miss Farnol, Mr. Abercrombie, and Mr. Lucas Williams. Mr. Williams' singing in the remarkable scene "Now my firm soul" was truly excellent. The other principal artists engaged were Mdlle. Bertha Brouil, Mr. J. A. Brouil, Mr. J. H. Beers, Mr. W. Lax, Mrs. Priscilla Frost, &c. Mr. J. H. Brotherton was leader of the band, and Mr. Kilburn, the Society's director, conducted.

BLACKBURN.—The first Concert of the ninth season of the St. Cecilia Society was given in the Exchange Hall, on Monday evening, the 10th ult., and proved to be one of the most successful yet given by the Society. The programme consisted of Dr. Stainer's Cantata The Daughter of Jairus, Sir Arthur Sullivan's On Shore and Sea, and a miscellaneous selection of songs and orchestral music. The principal vocalists were Miss Fanny Bristowe, Mr. Seymour Jackson, and Mr. Higginson. The choruses in both Cantatas were sung with the greatest care, and Henry Leslie's part-song "Lullaby of life" gained a unanimous encore. The band was selected from Mr. Chas. Halle's and Mr. De Jong's orchestras. Mr. James H. Rooks (of Bradford), the Society's Conductor, deserves the highest praise for the able manner in which he fulfilled his duties, much of the success of the Concert being due to his untiring energy and tact.

BRECON.—The Philharmonic Society gave its second evening Concert (sixth season), on Tuesday, the 11th ult., in the Town Hall, when Smart's Bride of Dunkenon was performed with full band and chorus. The solo vocalists were Miss Jones, Mr. Percy Palmer, and Mr. A. J. Tuckwell. The second part was miscellaneous and included Eaton Fanning's new Chorus "Daybreak," with orchestral accompaniment. The Hall was full, many being unable to obtain admittance, and the performance was a great success throughout. The chorus sang with precision and care. The Conductor was Mr. R. T. Heins; pianist, Mrs. Heins; organ, Rev. T. Simmons.

BRIGHTON.—At a special service on St. Andrew's Day a new organ was opened at Holy Trinity Church, West Brighton, when the qualities of the instrument were tested to much advantage by Mr. J. Crape, F.C.O., who played a well-selected programme of classical music. At the service the Psalms, Canticles, Responses, and Anthem ("O Lord, our Governor") were well rendered by the new choir, the training of which reflects much credit upon the Choirmaster, Mr. Charles Kelly.

BURTON-ON-TRENT.—On Tuesday, the 4th ult., a very successful performance of Dr. Stainer's Cantata St. Mary Magdalen was given by the members of St. Paul's Institute Choral Society. The principal vocalists were Miss Blanthorne, Miss Harris, Mr. R. Clarke, and Mr. G. Harris. The work was well rendered, the singing of the choruses being especially noticeable. The band was led by Mr. F. Ward; Mr. G. A. Barnes presided at the organ, and Mr. A. B. Plant, Mus. Bac., Oxon., F.C.O., conducted. There was a large audience.

BURY ST. EDMUNDS.—The first Concert of the season was given by the Choral Society, at the Athenæum Hall, on the 6th ult., when Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise was most successfully performed. The second part of the programme was miscellaneous. The band and chorus numbered 130, and the principal vocalists were Madame Lita Jarrett, R.A.M., and Mr. J. Probert, of London. Mr. T. B. Richardson was an efficient Conductor.

CANTON, CARDIFF.—A Concert was given in the National School-room, on the 5th ult., by the Madrigal Society, under the patronage of the Right Rev. The Lord Bishop of Llandaff. The room was full, and many were unable to obtain admittance. There was a good programme, including Morley's "My Bonny Lass," Cooke's "Strike the Lyre," and other standard compositions, which were excellently rendered by the members of the Society under the conductorship of Mr. R. Gould Thorac. The St. Mary's string band played some admirable selections, Mr. Mackadam conducting, and the remainder of the programme comprised songs by the Misses S. J. Smith, R.A.M., Grace H. Williams, Harriet B. Jones, and Messrs. C. P. Voit, Frank H. Williams, and Alfred Jenkins, all of whom won loud applause. Mr. Herbert Parry played a flute solo, accompanied on the pianoforte by Mr. Thorne.

CAPE TOWN.—The 400th anniversary of the birth of Martin Luther was celebrated in the Evangelical Lutheran Church, Strand Street, on Sunday, November 11. The Rev. W. F. Gohl preached. A special choir, under the direction of Mr. J. H. Ashley, sang Mendelssohn's Praise Jehovah. Mr. J. B. Smithers, the former Organist of the church, accompanied. The soprano solos were sung by Mrs. Sedewick. The chorals and voluntaries were played by Mr. Thomas, the present Organist.

CHELMSFORD.—On November 28, the annual Concert by the St. Mary's Church Choir took place at the Shire Hall. Madame Clara West, Miss Lottie West, Major Meares, Herr Stromeyer (violin), and Miss R. M. Copland (pianoforte), were the principals; Mr. Frye, F.C.O., Organist of St. Mary's Church, conducted. An interesting feature was Beethoven's Duet for piano and violin in A minor (Op. 23), by Mr. Frye and Herr Stromeyer. The choir was encored for its singing of Barnby's Sweet and low.—On the 11th ult., the Chelmsford Musical Society gave Haydn's Creation at the Corn Exchange. The band and chorus numbered about ninety performers. Miss Jessie Royd, whose singing gave much satisfaction, Mr. Sinclair Dunn, and Mr. Theodore Distin were the soloists. The Conductor was Mr. Frye, F.C.O. The performance was of a high standard, the chorus singing being refined and of good volume.

CHELtenham.—A Concert of sacred music was given in Salem Chapel on Wednesday, the 5th ult., conducted by Mr. J. O. Smith. The programme was well selected, and included a new song, written expressly for the occasion by Mr. Smith, which was well sung by Miss C. Smith. Mr. S. Gorton presided at the organ.

CHEPSTOW.—On Wednesday, the 12th ult., the members of the Choral Society gave their first Concert of the season in the Beaufort Assembly Room. The Society is under the able tuition of Mr. Kingsford, Organist of the Parish Church. The first part of the programme consisted of Van Bree's Cantata St. Cecilia's Day, which was excellently rendered, the recitatives being taken by Miss Marian Williams, R.A.M. The second part was miscellaneous and included several songs by Miss Williams and Mr. Miller (of Llandaff Cathedral), which were well received. Mr. Brooksbank, Organist of Llandaff Cathedral, presided at the pianoforte, assisted by Misses H. S. Watkins and Thomas. The other instrumentalists were: organ, Mr. Kingsford; flute, Mr. E. Williams; and clarinet, Mr. J. G. Ewance.

CHICHESTER.—The first Concert given by the newly-formed Glee Choir took place on the 19th ult., under the conductorship of Mr. Seymour Kelly. The glees and part songs were rendered very effectively. The choir was assisted on this occasion by Mr. C. E. Pillow (tenor), who made a marked success, and Miss Gatehouse (solo pianoforte). Miss M. Osmond acted as accompanist with much ability.

CIRENCESTER.—The Parish Church was crowded to excess on the 6th ult., the occasion being the holding of a special Advent service, when Spohr's Oratorio The Last Judgment was given, with full orchestral accompaniments. At five o'clock the members of the Parish Church and Holy Trinity choir, having assumed their surplices in the Town Hall, walked in procession on the south door to their seats in the chancel, and then the service opened with the well-known Advent hymn "Lo! He comes in clouds descending" sung to the tune of Helmsley. This was succeeded by the Suffrages from the Order of Daily Prayer, intoned by the Ven. Archdeacon Hayward, the responses being sung to Tallis. The Collects for the First and Third Sundays in Advent, for Good Friday, the Collect for Unity, the Prayer for all sorts and conditions of men, and the General Thanksgiving followed, and then the hymn "The Advent of our King" was given with organ accompaniment before the sermon. After an address by the Ven. Archdeacon Hayward, the Oratorio was sung, the solos being well rendered by Miss Mary Bearre, Miss Lizzie Hellis, Mr. John Probert, and Mr. Thomas Brandon. Mr. Brind conducted with much ability.

DUBLIN.—The opening Concert for the present season of the University Choral Society was given at the Examination Hall, on the afternoon of November 24. Great interest was felt in the appearance of two Australian ladies—Miss Eno Orr, a pupil of Signor Sgambati, who gave Beethoven's Sonata Appassionata and a Berceuse and Polonaise of Chopin with exquisite taste and finished execution, and Miss Frederica Mitchell, who displayed an excellent mezzo-soprano voice in several songs, one written expressly for her. Both débütantes were received with warm and well-deserved applause. The other soloists were Mr. Walter Bapty (who sung two hitherto unknown Irish melodies, arranged for him by the Rev. J. P. Mahaffy), a lady amateur, and a promising male pupil of the School of Music. The choral music was given with admirable precision and effect.

DUNDEE.—A Concert was given by the Broughty Ferry Choral Union, on the 4th ult., in the Volunteer Hall, when Mr. John More Smetton's new Cantata Ariadne was performed with much success, under the conduct rship of Mr. Neale, Mr. R. Stiles presiding at the pianoforte and the composer of the work at the harmonium. The principal vocalists were Mrs. A. C. Haden, Mr. Bernard Lane, and two members of the Choral Union, all of whom were highly efficient. The choruses were excellently sung. The second part of the programme was miscellaneous.

EDINBURGH.—Sir Herbert Oakeley gave his second Organ Recital for this season, on the 13th ult., in the Class-room, Park Place. There was a large audience including the students, several of the University Professors, and the Lord Provost. The programme, which was well selected, included Luther's Advent Hymn, a selection from Mozart's Twelfth Mass, and a Minuet by Professor Oakeley, which was enthusiastically redemanded. Bach's Prelude and Fugue in C major was well played by a student—Mr. Clive Baynes.

ENNIKILLIN.—Mr. Arnold's benefit Concert was given on November 28, in the Town Hall, before a crowded audience. The Church Choir, augmented for the occasion, sang with much effect an excellent selection of glees, two of which were accompanied by the band of the 13th Somersetshire Light Infantry. The following artists assisted: Misses C. McTiernan, M. Cooney, Weaver, McKeague, Benson, E. Graham, and Lockname; Messrs. Vevers and Mercer. The band selections were exceedingly well rendered. Mr. Vevers conducted, and Mrs. Valentine and Miss Gunning presided at the pianoforte. A purse of gold has been presented to Mr. Arnold (who has recently recovered from a severe illness) by the parishioners, in recognition of his valuable services as Organist and Choirmaster.

EPPING.—A Concert was given at the Town Hall, on the 13th ult., under the conductorship of Mr. Arthur Dorsey (late Organist of the Alexandra Palace). The following artists assisted: Miss Edith Stow, Miss Rosa Leo, Miss Elsa Odell, Mr. W. Toomer, and Mr. Frank May (vocalists), and Miss Alice Ivimy (violinist). The first part of the programme consisted of selections from the Oratorios, the second part being a varied selection of modern songs. Special mention is due to Miss Rosa Leo, Miss Elsa Odell, and Mr. Frank May, who were very successful.

FINCHLEY.—On November 29, Mr. A. A. Yeatman gave an Organ Recital at the Parish Church. The programme included Organ Concerto, No. 1 (Handel); Sonata, No. 4 (Mendelssohn); Fugue in G minor and Sonata, No. 1 (Bach); Fantasia with Choral (Smart), &c. —At a special Advent Service in the Parish Church, on the 14th ult., the members of the Finchley Choral Society gave an excellent performance of Spohr's oratorio The Last Judgment. The choruses were exceedingly well rendered, and the solos were taken by Messrs Lewis and Cozens, Mr. H. Parkin, and Mr. A. Caink, of the Temple Church Choir. Mr. A. A. Yeatman, Organist of the Church and Conductor of the Choral Society, presided at the organ.

GEORGETOWN, DEMERARA.—The first Concert of the Musical Society was given in the Philharmonic Hall, on Monday evening, November 12. The programme, which was miscellaneous, included a selection from Sullivan's Iolanthe. The solo vocalists were Mrs. Arnold, Mr. Castell, Mr. Brown, Mr. Vecock, and Mr. Baldwin. The orchestra was led by Mr. J. Miller, Mr. W. R. Colbeck conducted, and Mr. G. Nusum accompanied.

GLOUCESTER.—The Choral Society gave its first Concert of the season, on the 18th ult. As this was the Society's first Concert under its new régime and rules, it was looked forward to with considerable interest. Mr. Barnett's Cantata The Building of the Ship occupied part I., and was very fairly given, the chorus being exceptionally good and strong, but the band at times was unsteady and evidently found the music difficult. Mr. Barnett conducted his own work. Part II. included Mendelssohn's Overture The Sea and Stranger and Cornelius March, a Madrigal by Pearsall, and a part-song by Mr. C. L. Williams. Handel's Largo for strings and organ was given with much taste, the solo being played with good effect by Mr. E. G. Woodward. The soloists were Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Wollaston, Mr. M. Worlock, and Rev. C. H. Murphy—the latter gentleman singing with great ability. Mr. C. L. Williams was the Conductor.

GOSPORT.—The Choral Society gave its first Concert on the 4th ult., in the Star Assembly Rooms, High Street. The programme consisted of Mozart's First Mass, in C, and a miscellaneous selection. The Mass was given with full orchestral accompaniment, the band and chorus numbering ninety performers. Mr. W. E. Churcher was the leader of the band, Mr. T. Wolfe presided at the harmonium, and Miss Batchelor at the pianoforte, Mr. Howlett conducting. The choruses were well sung, and the general rendering of the work bore testimony to the careful training the Society has undergone under its Conductor (Mr. Howlett), to whom the greatest praise is due. One of the best pieces was the "Agnus Dei," which was most effectively given by Miss Scorey, a young lady of fifteen. The hall was crowded to its utmost extent.

GRAHAMSTOWN.—Handel's Messiah was given with much success at the Commemoration Chapel, on October 26. The overture and accompaniments were ably performed by Mr. Winny. The solo vocalists—Miss Davies, Mrs. Chapman, Miss Wedderburn, Miss Howse, Miss Stirik, Mr. Pryce, Mr. Creed, and Mr. Kay—were thoroughly successful, and the choral music was most effectively rendered by Mr. Atwell's Choir.

GREENOCK.—Dr. Spark gave an Organ Recital in St. John's Episcopal Church, on November 29, assisted by a Quartet party. The programme was highly interesting, and was listened to by a large audience with the utmost attention. The offertory was for the Church Building Fund.—Dr. Spark gave an interesting lecture before the members of the Philosophical Society, on November 30, the subject being "Bach to Gounod, or Music, Ancient and Modern." The illustrations were given with much success by Madame Pauline Evison, Miss Emmeline Kennedy, Mr. Jackson, and Mr. T. Dodds; and the admirable manner in which the lecturer sketched the history of music for the last 150 years was thoroughly appreciated by a most attentive audience, Dr. Spark's pianoforte performances being also a highly attractive feature.

HALIFAX.—A successful Concert was given in the Mechanics' Hall, on November 27, by Mr. Herbert F. Sharpe. The Concert-giver played Chopin's Ballade, Op. 47, some pieces of his own composition, Beethoven's Kreutzer Sonata, with Mr. Carrodus, and Goetz's Trio in G minor and Mendelssohn's Trio in C minor, with Messrs. Carrodus and Edward Howell. The vocalists were Miss Eleanor Farnol and Mr. Gawthrop, the latter of whom was especially successful in Sullivan's Distant Shore.—A Pianoforte Recital was given by Mr. W. H. Whitaker, on Saturday, the 8th ult., at the Music Saloon of Messrs. Pohlmann and Sons, Princess Street. The room was crowded, and the various items were received with well-merited applause. The vocal portion of the programme was contributed by Mr. H. Rickard.

HURSTPIERPPOINT.—The Choral Society gave its opening Concert of the season in the Music Room, on the 5th ult. The first part was miscellaneous, and the second consisted of Mr. Pattison's Cantata The Ancient Mariner, which was much admired by a large audience. The solos were sung by Mrs. Warne, Mrs. Campion, Miss Rose, Mr. Benford, and the Rev. J. P. Crawley. Mr. H. C. Young, B.A., Organist of the Parish Church, conducted, and Miss White accompanied.

KNUTSFORD.—The first Concert of the Parish Church Choral Society for the present season took place in the Town Hall on the 4th ult. An excellent rendering of Mr. Alfred R. Gaul's Cantata Ruth was given, the principal vocalists being Miss Conwy, Mrs. Bebbington, Miss Jessie Banner, and Mr. Bebbington. The Cantata was followed by a miscellaneous selection, in which the above mentioned singers and Mr. Seymour Jackson took part with much success. Mr. G. W. Bebbington conducted, and shared with Miss Banner the duties of accompanist.

LEICESTER.—The first of the second series of Mr. Harry Löhr's Chamber Concerts was given on November 29, in the Lecture Room of the Museum, before a crowded audience. Beethoven's Quartet in C minor (Op. 18, No. 4) and Haydn's Quartet in G major (Op. 17, No. 5), were finely played by Mr. W. Frye Parker, Mr. W. Easton, Mr. W. V. Waud, and Mr. W. Buels. Mr. Parker also performed Beethoven's Romance in F, for the violin, with pianoforte accompaniment; Mr. Löhr and Mr. Buels gave an excellent rendering of Chopin's Introduction and Polonaise in C, for pianoforte and violoncello, and a feature in the programme was the thoroughly artistic interpretation of Mendelssohn's Prelude and Fugue in E minor, for the pianoforte, by Mr. Löhr, which was received with warm and well deserved applause. The vocalist was Miss Ambler, who in the Lorelei ballad, by Liszt, a Mélodie by Gounod, and Der Herrliche (Schumann), made a highly favourable effect.

LIVERPOOL.—On Saturday, the 15th ult., Mr. W. H. Jude, the Organist and Principal of the Liverpool Organ School, Mill Lane, was the recipient of a presentation made by the pupils of his pianoforte classes. The testimonial consisted of a splendid silver-mounted instand of polished oak, in the form of a railway wagon, and a set of writing materials, including knife, pencil, and paper-knife. The present was accompanied by a beautiful Christmas card and an address with the signature of several of the pupils of the school. As another instance of the great respect and esteem in which Mr. Jude is held, we may mention that a few months ago a similar presentation was made by the students in his organ class.

LLANELLY.—Mr. Arthur W. Swindell, assisted by his pupils, gave his first Concert at the Museum Room, Nevill Memorial, on the 10th ult. The programme was well selected and received a good rendering, the efforts of the pupils giving the greatest satisfaction to a large audience.

MARGATE.—On the 13th ult. the Cliftonville Choral Society gave its first Concert for the present season, at the Cliftonville Hall, when Mendelssohn's Athalie was performed with much success. The principal vocalists were Miss Clementine Ward, Miss Evelyn Ward, and Miss J. Mortlock, all of whom were highly efficient. The band was under the leadership of Mr. C. Gann, and the work was rendered additionally interesting by the excellent reading of the narrative portions by the Rev. W. W. Talfourd, M.A. The second part of the Concert was miscellaneous. Mr. J. W. Pearson was an able Conductor.

MIDDLESBRO'—Gounod's Redemption was performed by the Middlesbrough Musical Union, on Wednesday, the 10th ult., with great success, under the conductorship of Mr. Kilburn, the Society's Director. This work had not before been heard in the North, and while the committee were by no means sanguine as to the pecuniary result of their venture, they, one and all, from the excellent secretaries, Messrs. Hornung and Hood, to the humblest of the Society's adherents, resolved to work with right good will to secure the fullest possible degree of artistic success. It is gratifying to be able to report that this was very fully accomplished. The band and chorus rendered this very remarkable setting of the deep and sublime mysteries of the Christian religion in that spirit of earnestness and devotion to the work which such a composition surely demands, and the soloists, with one or two irritating exceptions, were also satisfactory in their respective parts. The soprano solo, "From Thy love as a Father," by Miss Farnol received the usual warm applause. It was remarkably well sung, and repeated in response to the clamorous wishes of the audience. The other principal artists were Madame Poole, who gave an excellent rendering of her part; Mr. Abercrombie, Mr. Lucas-Williams, Mdlle Bertha Brousil, Mrs. Priscilla Frost, Mr. J. A. Brousil, &c.

MIDSOMER-NORTON.—On Tuesday evening, the 11th ult., a excellent Concert was given in the Market Hall to a large and appreciative audience. The principal vocalists were Miss Marie Gane, M. Walter Clinch, and Mr. F. Aquith. The programme was well selected and effectively rendered. Mr. W. Gool was the violinist. Mr. C. S. Oxley presided at the American organ, and Miss Florence M. Fear was the pianist, her rendering of the various pieces being a important feature of the Concert.

MIRFIELD.—The Batteford Amateur Musical Society, assisted by the Manningham Vocal Union, gave the opening Concert of the session on November 23, in the Town Hall, before a large audience. The works selected were The Building of the Ship, for the first part, and Mendelssohn's Psalm, Hear my Prayer, and a miscellaneous selection for the second part. The solos were taken by Miss Norton Mrs. Clarke, Messrs. Peacock and Riley. A well-selected band, led by Mr. Dawson, was highly satisfactory in the accompaniments. This is the second Concert which the Society has given under the training of Mr. J. H. Rooks, of Bradford, and we must congratulate the members on having for their Conductor a man of so much energy and ability.

MORLEY.—The Amateur Vocal Society gave its seventh Concert on November 24, when Beethoven's Mount of Olives and Mendelssohn's Lorelei were performed, with a miscellaneous second part. The soloists were Miss Annie Cockcroft, Mr. Charles Blagbro, and Mr. Rhodes. The chorus of about sixty voices was under the conductship of Mr. S. Smith. The accompaniments were given on the piaand American organ by Mr. F. W. Sykes, F.C.O., and Mr. J. A. Earnshaw respectively. The soloists were highly successful, and all the choruses received a very careful rendering, the Concert being thoroughly appreciated by a large audience.

NEWBURY.—Two very successful Concerts were given on Tuesday, November 27, by the members of the Amateur Orchestral Union, assisted by Madame Mudie-Bolingbroke and Miss Agnes Larkcom. The orchestra, numbering thirty-five performers, including several lady members, played excellently. The leader, Mr. T. E. Gatehouse, received well-merited applause for his performance of De Beriot's Concerto No. 1, for violin and orchestra. Both Madame Bolingbroke and Miss Larkcom were most enthusiastically applauded. Mr. Alex. Walton, Mus. Bac., accompanied, and Mr. W. Eatwell conducted.

NEWPORT, I.W.—A high-class evening Concert was given in the Drill Hall, on Monday, the 3rd ult., by Mr. Riechelmann's Concert party, consisting of Madame Riechelmann, Miss E. Rees, Herr Ritter, and Mr. E. Birch. The audience was a highly appreciative one, and several encores were insisted upon.

NEW YORK.—The Members of the Philharmonic Club gave a very successful Concert at Chickering Hall, on the 4th ult. Mr. Richard Hoffman's pianoforte solos were special features of the evening.

OXFORD.—The Musical Society gave an excellent performance of Handel's Judas Maccabæus in the Town Hall, on Thursday evening, the 13th ult. The principal soprano part was sung by Madame Clara West (of London), who elicited the heartiest applause. The other solos were well sustained, mostly by local artists; and the band and chorus acquitted themselves admirably. Mr. R. Horsley conducted.

PAISLEY.—Haydn's Seasons was performed by the Choral Union on the 6th ult., in the George A. Clark Town Hall, before a large audience. The solo vocalists were Madame Rose Hersee, Mr. Henry Guy, and Mr. W. H. Bretoner. On the whole, the work was successfully rendered, many of the choruses being given with admirable precision and effect.

PENDLETON.—Miss Ada Duxbury gave a Pianoforte Recital in the Town Hall, on the 3rd ult., which was well attended. The programme was selected from the works of Beethoven, Bach, Cherubini, Chopin, Mendelssohn, Rubinstein, Schubert, Schumann, Wagner, Liszt, and Raff. The various items were excellently rendered. The Recital also included duets for pianoforte and violin, in which Miss Duxbury was joined by Mr. S. Speilmann. Miss Marie Hughes was the vocalist.

PERTH.—The increasing interest taken in the performance of high-class music for the organ was evinced by the large gathering in Kinnoull Church, on Saturday, the 15th ult., when Mr. R. Woodthorpe Browne gave the sixth of the series of monthly Recitals. The programme, which was listened to with much attention, included Spohr's Adagio and Finale from the Quartet in C, Op. 4; Sonata in D, No. 5 (Mendelssohn); Andante in G (Battiste); and Offertoire in D (Wély).

SALE, CHESHIRE.—A successful performance of Sophocles' Antigone, with Mendelssohn's music, was given at the Public Hall, on the 22nd ult. The tragedy was recited by Mr. Charles Fry, who prefaced the Recital with some interesting remarks on the subject of the Greek Drama. The Recital was listened to throughout with great interest by an appreciative audience, who warmly applauded the reader at the conclusion of each scene, especially after that between Tiresias and the King. The Choruses were very efficiently sung by a choir of forty voices selected from the Sale Vocal Union, Stretford Choral Society, and other local choirs, whose training reflected considerable credit on Mr. R. H. Wilson, the singing of the quartet "O Eros" by members of the choir calling for special commendation. Mr. R. H. Wilson accompanied throughout with much ability, the accompaniment being occasionally strengthened by the addition of a second pianoforte and harmonium.

SALISBURY.—The members of the Vocal Union gave a performance of Dr. Stainer's Cantata The Daughter of Jairus, on November 28, in the Hamilton Hall, which was crowded in every part, many persons being unable to obtain admission. The soloists were Miss Julia Jones, Mr. J. A. Acott, and Mr. Arthur Crick. The second part was miscellaneous, and in addition to the above named vocalists, Mr. Wm. Marr, Mr. J. M. Hayden, and Mr. Charles Kelsey gave solos, which were well received. Miss Harwood presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. Alfred Foley at the organ. The Vocal Union sang several part-songs, unaccompanied, with much success. Mr. John M. Hayden, conducted.

SANDHURST.—Two miscellaneous Concerts were given by the Members of the Choral Society in the Gymnasium, Royal Military College, on Friday, November 30, in aid of the Royal Military College Compassionate Fund. The programme included instrumental selections by the band of the College, conducted by Mr. Miller. The Concerts were highly successful, both musically and financially, about £60 being cleared for the Fund. After the evening Concert, Sir Richard Taylor, on behalf of the Society, presented Mr. Miller with a handsome baton.

SHANKLIN, I.W.—On Tuesday, the 4th ult., the Choral Society gave its third Concert, when Haydn's Creation was performed. The solos were sung by Madame Wilson-Osman, Mr. C. E. Pillow, and Mr. Seymour Kelly. Madame Osman is a great favourite with a Shanklin audience, and her efforts on this occasion were thoroughly appreciated, as were also those of the other principal vocalists. The choruses were well sung by the members of the Society, numbering 100 voices, and the accompaniments were excellently rendered by Mrs. Bishop (piano) and Mr. F. H. Simms (harmonium). The performance of the work reflected the greatest credit on the Conductor, Mr. F. G. Baker, Organist of St. Saviour's-on-the-Cliff. The room was crowded.

SOUTHSEA.—On the 4th ult., two Concerts were given by Mr. Riechelmann, assisted by his Quartet party, Madame Riechelmann, Miss E. Rees, Herr Ritter, and Mr. E. Birch, on the South Parade Pier. All the artists met with a most favourable reception, and several numbers of the interesting programme had to be repeated.

STRATFORD.—On Monday, the 3rd ult., the Upton Choral Society gave its third Concert in the Town Hall, before a large and appreciative audience. The Programme comprised Spohr's Cantata God,

Thou art great, and a miscellaneous selection. Mr. Joseph Proudman conducted. The principal vocalists were Miss Helen D'Alton, Miss F. Jones, and Mr. Arthur Thompson, all of whom were much applauded. The choruses were excellently rendered, Mendelssohn's 43rd Psalm, Judge me, O God, being especially good. Herr Mahr (violin) proved himself a skilful executant, and Messrs. Kitson and Gilbert were efficient accompanists at the pianoforte and harmonium respectively.

UPPER NORWOOD.—The Saturday evening Entertainment for the People, on the 15th ult., was provided by Miss Harriette Morgan, the proceeds being devoted to the Norwood Cottage Hospital. Miss Bower, Miss Harriette Morgan, Mrs. Höhne, Miss Lizzie Sullivan, Mr. H. Bower, Mr. Barton Bouquet, Mr. Dubber, and Mr. Joseph Hall were the soloists, and all received warm applause. Mr. F. E. A. Cavell contributed four excellent recitations.

UXBRIDGE.—The members of the Choral Society gave the first Concert of the present season, at the Town Hall, on Thursday evening, the 13th ult. The first part of the programme consisted of selections from Handel's works, and the second part was miscellaneous. The solo vocalists were Miss Helen Weber, Miss Minna Vivian, and Mr. Gawthrop; Miss Stephenson presided at the pianoforte, Mr. J. Walsh, A.T.C.L., at the harmonium, and Mr. T. Pettit, A.R.A.M., conducted.

WARE.—The Musical Society, under the conductorship of Mr. James L. Gregory, F.C.O., gave its first Concert of the season on Tuesday evening, November 27. The works performed were Haydn's Spring and Macfarren's May Day, both of which were executed in a very satisfactory manner. The solos were rendered by Miss Florence Norman, Mr. Trelawny Cobham, and Rev. S. W. P. Webb. A small band, under the leadership of Mr. Hilton, added much to the effect of the performance. Mr. Livesey Carrott presided at the pianoforte and Mr. G. H. Gregory, Mus. B., Oxon., at the harmonium. The sixth Organ Recital of the present series was given in the Parish Church, on Thursday, November 29, by Mr. James L. Gregory, F.C.O., assisted by Mr. A. E. Gregory, A. Mus., T.C.L., who contributed vocal solos. An excellent programme was provided, and the performance was thoroughly appreciated.

WATFORD.—An evening service was held in St. Matthew's, Oxhey, on Monday evening, the 3rd ult., when Spohr's Oratorio The Last Judgment was given in place of the anthem. The work was conducted by Mr. J. Turpin, Mus. Bac., of St. Andrew's; Mr. E. H. Turpin presided at the organ, and played the Overture and Symphony with good effect. The choruses were admirably given, especially "Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of Hosts," and "Destroyed is Babylon." Miss Alice Brooks sang the soprano part; the tenor airs were divided between Mr. Evans, of Ruislip, and Mr. G. Young; and the bass solos were given by the Rev. T. M. Everett, of Ruislip. The second of the series of Organ Recitals on the new organ in St. Andrew's Church was given on Tuesday evening, the 11th ult., by Mr. E. H. Turpin, Organist of St. George's, Bloomsbury, &c. A well-arranged programme, calculated to display the resources of the excellent instrument, and including works by Handel, Mendelssohn, Bach, Eberlin, Lemmens, &c., was thoroughly appreciated by a large congregation.

WELLINGTON, N.Z.—The annual meeting of the Harmonic Club was held on October 26. The report of the fourth season's work showed that the usual private Concerts had been successfully given, and that the following works had been performed: Mendelssohn's First Walpurgis Night, the same composer's music to Athalie, Barnett's Building of the Ship, and Bennett's May Queen. Mozart's Pianoforte Concerto in D minor and Bennett's in F minor had also been played, with orchestra, by lady members of the Society; and various Madrigals and Part-songs had been included in the programmes. All the Cantatas had been given with full orchestral accompaniments. The services of the musical director (Mr. Robert Parker) were warmly acknowledged by the committee, and he was unanimously re-elected for the coming season. Dr. Hector, C.M.G., F.R.S., was elected president in place of the Hon. Randall Johnson, who was leaving for England. Handel's Acis and Galatea was announced as the opening work of the fifth season.

WESTON-SUPER-MARE.—The Philharmonic Society gave a fine performance of Haydn's Creation, on the 13th ult., to a large and appreciative audience. The soloists were Miss Eleanor Farnol, Mr. J. M. Hayden, and Dr. Roxburgh. Mr. F. Gawner, of Bristol, led the band; Miss Poole presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. A. W. Harris at the harmonium. Mr. Edward Cook, of Clifton, conducted. The choruses were rendered in a manner which showed great zeal and attention on the part of the members of the Society.

WEYMOUTH.—The members of the Oratorio Society gave their first Concert of the season at the Royal Hotel Assembly Rooms, on Thursday evening, November 29, Dr. Stainer's Daughter of Jairus being performed with much success. The solo vocalists were Madame Eva Scorey, Mr. John Hayden, and Mr. Hopkins, R.A.M., all of whom were highly appreciated. The second part was miscellaneous. The Concert was in every respect a decided success.

WHITBY.—The members of the Choral Society gave a Concert in St. Hilda's Hall, on the 12th ult. A miscellaneous programme was well rendered, the singing of the choir being worthy of praise. The solo vocalists were Miss Smalles, Miss Barnard, Mrs. Newbitt, Mr. A. Varley, and Mr. R. O. Bishop; Mr. Hallgate (solo violin), the Conductor of the Society; and Mr. Ellison, Organist of St. John's Church, accompanied and contributed a pianoforte solo.

WINDSOR.—The members of the Windsor and Eton Choral Society gave their first Concert of the season at the Albert Institute, on Wednesday, the 5th ult., when Handel's Oratorio Samson was excellently rendered. The solo vocalists were Madame Worrell, Master Davies, Mr. James Gawthrop, and Mr. F. Bevan. Herr Gustav Morsch led the band, Mr. H. R. Coudrey presided at the harmonium, and Mr. S. Smith conducted. The trumpet obligato to "Let the bright Seraphim" was well played by Mr. Bosworth.

WORCESTER.—Mr. Spark's second Concert was given at the Public Hall, on November 27, before a numerous audience. The vocalists were Miss Annie Marriott, Madame Enriquez, Mr. Redfern Hollins and Mr. Bridson, and valuable aid was given by the Worcester Amateur Vocal Union, for the first time in connection with these Concerts. All the solo singers were thoroughly successful, and the choral music was finely rendered and warmly applauded.

The Pedals and Patent Action supplied by the above well-known Inventor are giving a great impetus to the present generation of Organists and Students in the art of Pedalling, and, as it is well known that most, if not all, of our great Organ Players had the advantage of a Pianoforte with Pedals attached by the old and cumbersome roller-board system, it should be known that by this new invention the Pedals can be purchased and attached at a small cost with a Mahogany Action which is perfectly noiseless, and without any springs or intricate parts to get out of repair. Organ music can thus be enjoyed and practised without the usual trouble and expense of an Organ blower. This Invention is quite different to any other Patent Action, and, being the most recent, it is as great an improvement over others as the Steam Engine is over the old Stage Coach.

Send to the Inventor, as below, for the Drawings and Prices to the Profession and Trade.

DR. F. E. GLADSTONE says:—

"I have much pleasure in stating my opinion that Mr. WM. CHINNOCK DYER'S Patent Action for attaching Organ Pedals to a Pianoforte is likely to prove very valuable to Organists and Students of the Organ. It possesses several advantages over other actions which have come under my observation, and I shall have no hesitation in recommending the invention to my friends and pupils."

All is sent complete, with full printed "Directions for Attaching," and the Action, being placed under the keyboard of the instrument, is easily attached to any Pianoforte. £ s.

ADDRESS—WM. CHINNOCK DYER,
 WESTON-SUPER-MARE.

To show the popularity gained by this invention, and the way it is making in the houses of organists and students, the last Patent Action sent out previous to March 1 was numbered 2,024; thus it will be seen that the turn-out for six months as above will give a total of over 4,000 per annum.

CAUTION.—This being the latest Patent Pedal Action, intending purchasers should note that it is the most perfect and reliable, as it contains every improvement; and being manufactured solely of well-seasoned mahogany, carefully bushed with red cloth, will continue to give the very best Pedal practice to Organists and Students.

Kindly read the testimonial above.
 Before purchasing send to the Inventor for the drawings and prices of this the most recent Patent Pedal Action.

Organists should recommend these Pedals and Patent Action to their Pupils.

MUSIC carefully COPIED or TRANPOSED at 4d. per page. F., 24, Harvey Street, Folkestone.

HOW TO LEARN TO PLAY THE PIANO WELL. By ONE WHO HAS TAUGHT HIMSELF.

"Here, in the compass of fourteen pages, is matter calculated to produce better results than half-a-dozen years' teaching."
 "Shows clearly the way to success in pianoforte-playing."

THE ART OF PLAYING AT SIGHT. By ONE WHO HAS TAUGHT HIMSELF.

"The author believes his system to be infallible; after a fair trial, we must say, we believe so too."
 "We have almost practised our finger-ends off, but could never read half-a-dozen bars correctly. The few hints in this little manual have shown us the way to accomplish it."

LITTLE DIFFICULTIES WHICH OCCUR IN PIANOFORTE PLAYING, ILLUSTRATED AND EXPLAINED. By ONE WHO HAS TAUGHT HIMSELF. Price 1s.

"The little difficulties which occur to the average player, and which make playing so irksome, are here fully illustrated and explained. It is astonishing what an amount of information is conveyed in a small compass."

HOW TO FORM AND TRAIN A VILLAGE CHOIR. By AN ORGANISING CHOIRMASTER. Price 1s.

"By far the greater number of those who have the management of village choirs are amateurs. They will find their task considerably lightened after a perusal of this book."

THE HARMONIUM, AND HOW TO PLAY IT. Price 1s.

RUDALL, CARTE & CO.'S INDESTRUCTIBLE EBONITE
CLARINETS.

The difficulty there is in preventing Cocoa-wood from cracking has induced Messrs. RUDALL CARTE and Co. to turn their attention to the manufacture of Clarinets in Ebonite, or Vulcanised India-rubber, which they have been for some time using for the New System Flutes, &c., with the most satisfactory results.

Ebonite has no grain, and is impervious to moisture. It can therefore neither warp nor crack, and the top of the mouthpiece is practically unchangeable. The only reason this material has not been more generally introduced before by Messrs. RUDALL, CARTE and Co. has been the great difficulty in working it.

The Clarinets in Ebonite which have been made to order for professional players and others during the last few years, and the numerous Flutes that have been made of this material by this firm for orchestral and other purposes, have thoroughly tested it in every way. Some poor kinds of Ebonite have been made abroad with not very satisfactory results; but professional and amateur players may order these instruments with perfect confidence, as during the whole period that Messrs. RUDALL, CARTE and Co. have been using it—i. e., upwards of twelve years—they have not had one instance of an instrument cracking.

The difficulty of making instruments in Ebonite has now been overcome, and, as experience has shown them to be eminently durable and very beautiful in tone, there is no doubt that they will now carry all before them.

THE HOLY CITY

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"The work is an honour to English Art, and has elevated its composer into a place of distinction amongst native musicians."—Queen.

"A good sound musical work is this 'Holy City.' I have no hesitation in saying that it creditably represents English art, and does honour not only to the skill but to the judgment and taste of Mr. Gaul."—Daily Telegraph.

"The reception was favourable in the extreme, and the Cantata must henceforth be classed among the successes which the Birmingham Musical Festivals have brought to light."—Standard.

"The 'Holy City' is evidently the work of a thoughtful as well as a clever composer, and should make its mark among thoroughly English productions of a sacred character."—Musical Times.

"We hope and believe that the reception given last night to Mr. Gaul and to his 'Holy City' Cantata will prove an earnest of its popularity and acceptance throughout the length and breadth of the land."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"A most interesting, tuneful, and scholarly work."—Manchester Courier.

"This fine work will considerably enhance Mr. Gaul's reputation as a musician."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

Vocal Score, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; Ditto, paper boards, 3s.; Voice parts, for the use of Choral Societies, each 1s. A selection of Soprano and Contralto Movements for School Use, 1s. 3d. Band Parts on Loan. Tonic Sol-fa Edition, 1s.

BEAUTY AND THE BEAST

Humorous Cantatas for Solo Voices, Chorus, and Orchestra, by EDMUND ROGERS.

"Skilful construction, refined humour, and a spontaneous flow of graceful melody characterise Mr. Rogers's cantatas."—Queen.

"Mr. Rogers, by the successful composition of his clever cantatas, has done much towards the advancement of humorous music in our day."—Musical Standard.

"We cordially commend this Cantata ('Beauty and the Beast') to the attention of choral societies."—Musical Times.

OR, THE BRIDE OF THE GREEK ISLE

A DRAMATIC IDYL

FOR

SOLO VOICES, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

BY

WILLIAM CRESER, MUS. DOC., OXON.

"There are many touches of melody and brightness and powerful concerted passages."—Leeds Mercury.

"The chorus for women's voices only, 'Gloomy lies the shore,' is not merely an attempt, but a successful adaptation of music to the spirit of the words. Not the least important part of 'Eudora' is its orchestration."—Yorkshire Post.

"The music has a charming freshness which, combined to the touching story of the book, cannot but be thoroughly admired. It is a clever production, and the composer, it is evident, has a vigorous comprehension of dramatic effect."—Newcastle Daily Chronicle.

Price 2s. 6d.

LONDON: NOVELLO, EWER AND CO.

Price 2s., paper cover; 3s., boards.

THE GOLDEN LEGEND

DRAMATIC CANTATA

BY

HENRY EDWARD HODSON.

LICHFIELD MERCURY.—"A musical work of very considerable importance. . . The work, which was enthusiastically received, is entirely successful."

BIRMINGHAM DAILY POST.—"The composer has won laurels beyond the grasp of the ordinary amateur. The work is one destined to live."

THE ERA.—"Mr. Hodson has displayed more than ordinary ability in his treatment of the subject."

LONDON: NOVELLO, EWER AND CO., 1, BERNERS STREET, W., AND 80 & 81, QUEEN STREET, E.C.

Miss Kilmansegg & her Golden Lo

CAROLINE HOLLAND

Words by THOMAS HOOD.

Performed by Mr. Henry Leslie's Choir at Oswestry, October 31.

"Mr. Leslie said, at the close of the concert, that he had had many and such strong expressions of a desire for the repetition of 'Miss Kilmansegg' that he felt he must comply, and had announced the performance for to-night at the popular prices of shilling and of sixpence. It is to be hoped that the shortness of notice will not deprive the managers of a bumper house and public of a rare treat."—Oswestry Advertiser.

"Miss Kilmansegg' is not only a very musical composition, but is also full of those subtle touches of art which can 'raise or quicken the feelings of the listeners. . . Is at times tender as we comic, and never wanting in refinement."—Morning Post.

"Miss Holland's music is extremely tuneful and pleasing, and overflows with fun. The Cantata may be cordially recommended to all Choral Societies."—Athenaeum.

LONDON: WEEKES AND CO., HANOVER STREET, W.

ERNEST BERGHOLT'S NEW SONG
GIVE ME THY HEART

In consequence of the rapidly increasing demand for this song, it is now published in two keys:—No. 1, in F (compass C to E). No. 2, in E flat (compass B flat to D).

Saturday Review says:—"A really charming song by Ernest Bergholt is the one entitled, 'Give me thy heart.' The music, with its simple and clever contrapuntal effects, renders this one of the most pleasing lyrical productions that we have heard for some time."—October 6, 1883.

"Madge" writes to her cousin in Truth: "'Give me thy heart,' by Ernest Bergholt, is a fine setting of a love song. . . It will well suit your contralto."—October 4, 1883.

Orchestra and Musical Education says:—"The words are beautifully simple, fresh, and healthy. Mr. Bergholt has well grasped their spirit, and coloured them with great effect. The pianoforte accompaniment contributes considerably to this effect."—November, 1883.

Selected for special mention in the Athenaeum, of October 6, 1883, as an amatory ballad for baritone. See also the Graphic, October 27 and November 3, 1883. Society, November 10, 1883.

Words by the celebrated Marquis of Montrose (1612-50).

IMPORTANT to all TEACHERS of the PIANOFORTE.—The old method of teaching Music is now entirely superseded by a far more excellent method, which claims to be the only correct and reasonable method for teaching Pianoforte-playing. Mr. Felix Sommer, one of the most efficient music-masters in the neighbourhood of London, writes as follows concerning this NEW PIANOFORTE TUTOR. (For particulars see below.)

"Sutton Lane, Chiswick, October 30, 1883.

"Dear Herr Hoering,—I am very much obliged to you for your pamphlets and specimen copy of 'Tutor.' I have only had time to look rapidly through the latter, but I have seen sufficient to show me that it contains everything you claim for it; and I shall cordially recommend it as far as it may be in my power. It is conscientious, and thoroughly musicianlike, and I feel quite sure that it will be much appreciated by the majority of the musical profession."

Now ready.

BOOKS I. and II. of A. HOERING'S NEW METHOD FOR THE PIANOFORTE, on an entirely new principle:—

OPINIONS FROM PROFESSIONALS.

"I like it immensely."

"An excellent method, and worthy of all teachers' notice."

"I find your method excellent."

"Infinitely superior to all I have tried before."

"I think your system wonderfully good, and just the thing that was wanted."

"Comparison only shows the merits of your system to greater advantage."

OLD IRELAND

A COLLECTION OF ANCIENT IRISH MELODIES

AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN"

THE SYMPHONIES AND ACCOMPANIMENTS BY

BERTHOLD TOURS.

Price 2s. 6d.

PREFACE.

Some years ago I found, among the Petrie Collection, many rare and beautiful Irish airs, to which from time to time I wrote words.
The result is the present publication.

Mr. Berthold Tours has, in his symphonies and accompaniments, done exactly what should be done with national melodies—namely, as little as possible. For such music, simplicity is the truest art.

Being myself an Irishwoman, my work has been a work of love;
hoping to sing—not sermonise—into the English heart a tenderer feeling towards Old Ireland. I prefer to dwell, not on the faults, but the virtues of my people; their domestic purity, their strong affections, their innate loyalty, courage, and fidelity; also, last, not least, their indomitable gaieté de cœur, which implies neither hardness, shallowness, nor selfishness of heart, yet enables the Celtic nature to tide over trouble in a way which the more sombre Saxon can hardly understand. If I can do this, I shall go on singing. Thus taking up Thomas Moore's harp, I may lay it down, as he did, with his own farewell words—

"I was but as the wind passing heedlessly over,
And all the wild sweetness I waked was thine own."

THE AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."

June, 1883.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"The melodies—six in number—are all characteristic and unmistakably Celtic. The words are good throughout, and we agree with the author of 'John Halifax' that, by doing as little as possible in the way of accompaniment, Mr. Tours has best performed the task entrusted to him. Students of national music will not refuse to give
'Old Ireland' a place in their collection."

MORNING POST.

"The musical part of the work has been admirably done, the harmonies, chiefly tonal, eminently fit the nature of the melodies, of which there are only six in the collection. Their natural beauty excites a wish for more."

SIR JOHN GOSS

In St. Paul's Cathedral.

CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEE—SIR ARTHUR SULLIVAN.

Subscriptions in aid of the above object should now be sent to Mr. W. H. Cummings, Hon. Treasurer, Brockley Villa, Dulwich; or to Mr. T. L. Southgate, Hon. Sec., Epsaleade, Gipsy Hill, S.E.; or to Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co., 1, Berners Street, W.

TESTIMONIAL to SIR MICHAEL COSTA.

A Committee formed of the friends and admirers of Sir Michael Costa having determined to present him with a Testimonial on the occasion of his retirement from public life, in recognition of his eminent services to the public and the musical profession in England for a period of Fifty-three Years, invite Subscriptions for that purpose. It is proposed that the Testimonial should take the form of a gift of a sum of money, as the one most calculated to prove acceptable to the distinguished Conductor and Composer.

The Pedals and Patent Action supplied by the above well-known Inventor are giving a great impetus to the present generation of Organists and Students in the art of Pedalling, and, as it is well known that most, if not all, of our great Organ Players had the advantage of a Pianoforte with Pedals attached by the old and cumbersome roller-board system, it should be known that by this new invention the Pedals can be purchased and attached at a small cost with a Mahogany Action which is perfectly noiseless, and without any springs or intricate parts to get out of repair. Organ music can thus be enjoyed and practised without the usual trouble and expense of an Organ blower. This invention is quite different to any other Patent Action, and, being the most recent, it is as great an improvement over others as the Steam Engine is over the old Stage Coach.

Send to the Inventor, as below, for the Drawings and Prices to the Profession and Trade.

DR. F. E. GLADSTONE says:—

"I have much pleasure in stating my opinion that Mr. WM. CHINNOCK DYER'S Patent Action for attaching Organ Pedals to a Pianoforte is likely to prove very valuable to Organists and Students of the Organ.

"It possesses several advantages over other actions which have come under my observation, and I shall have no hesitation in recommending the invention to my friends and pupils."

All is sent complete, with full printed "Directions for Attaching," and the Action, being placed under the keyboard of the instrument, is easily attached to any Pianoforte. £ 5

ADDRESS—WM. CHINNOCK DYER,

WESTON-SUPER-MARE.

To show the popularity gained by this invention, and the way it is making in the houses of organists and students, the last Patent Action sent out previous to March 1 was numbered 2,024; thus it will be seen that the turn-out for six months as above will give a total of over 4,000 per annum.

CAUTION.—This being the latest Patent Pedal Action, intending purchasers should note that it is the most perfect and reliable, as it contains every improvement; and being manufactured solely of well-seasoned mahogany, carefully bushed with red cloth, will continue to give the very best Pedal practice to Organists and Students.

Kindly read the testimonial above.

Before purchasing send to the Inventor for the drawings and prices of this the most recent Patent Pedal Action.

EXTRACT FROM THE PROSPECTUS OF THE SERIES:—

"The intention of 'Novello's Primers of Musical Biography' is to convey, as clearly as the limits of an elementary work will allow, a just idea of each composer's personality, and to record the principal events of his life. Knowledge of what a man is helps the understanding of what he does. These little books may serve, therefore, as a first step towards acquaintance with the genius and compositions of the masters to whom they are devoted."

SCHUBERT AND HIS WORKS

THE TENTH SYMPHONY

By H. F. FROST.

Few more welcome announcements affecting the musical world have been made recently than that of the intended issue of a complete edition of the works of Franz Schubert. The fact that Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel's advertisement immediately succeeded a statement that Herr Friedländer was preparing a critically correct edition of the composer's Lieder may be taken as evidence of the general recognition of Schubert's claims to consideration as one of the most divinely gifted among musicians. Thus time has brought about a grand revenge for the poor and despised Viennese schoolmaster, who wore himself out in the task of bestowing inestimable treasures upon a world as yet unprepared to receive them. The multitudinous nature of these treasures is the first point to strike the observer with amazement, considering that Schubert died at an age when the majority of men are but just settling down to the serious business of life. Knowing that a large proportion of the master's works still remain hidden from the eyes of musicians, notwithstanding the stream of publication which has flowed unceasingly for half a century, and knowing further that the eminent Leipzig firm would not fail to scrape together every fragment of manuscript to render their undertaking complete and exhaustive, we turn with interest and expectation to the list of compositions given in their prospectus. We find that the edition will consist of twenty-one series, not including a supplement, and that, exclusive of the six hundred or so Lieder for one voice, there are exactly three hundred finished works. A prodigious mass truly! And yet on proceeding to analyse the list the reader is struck at the outset by a sense of disappointment. The first series is thus described: "Symphonies, Nos. 1—7." Obviously the sketch in E, generally known as No. 7, and that most precious fragment in B minor, will appear in the supplement among other unfinished compositions. But what about the Gastein Symphony, concerning which Sir George Grove published statements which startled the musical world rather more than two years ago? The absence of any reference to this work implies either that the publishers have no faith in its existence, or else that the search for it has been given up as fruitless. The matter is one of such surpassing interest that no apology is needed for returning to it at the present juncture. Hitherto it may be said that musicians have maintained an attitude of expectancy, trusting that Sir George Grove, whose enthusiastic labours in the cause of Schubert's music had already been rewarded by a wonderful find, would be successful in unearthing a treasure of even greater value than the "Rosamunde" music. It seemed the height of presumption to question in the smallest degree the opinion of one who had accomplished so much, and who has a greater authority than any living musician to speak on the subject of Schubert and his works. Hope strengthened into something like assurance when the frequenters of the Crystal Palace Concerts found that Sir George Grove had altered the numbering of the great Symphony in C from No. 9 to No. 10. It was felt that he would not have adopted so grave a course without warrant, and there was nothing for it but to wait with patient confidence for the discovery of the missing Symphony itself, or at any rate for clearer evidence as to its existence. Such evidence is not yet forthcoming, and its absence is very discouraging, for we may be sure that no stone has been left unturned by the zealous enquirer who first called attention to the subject. As matters stand, however, there need no longer be any hesitation in calmly considering the value of the testimony already adduced; nor will Sir George Grove feel aggrieved if such consideration should result in the adoption of views less sanguine than those held by himself. In order to put the case as clearly as possible, it will be necessary to recapitulate as briefly as may be the points of the discussion which arose in the autumn of 1881. The question whether Schubert wrote a symphony in 1825 and presented it to the Vienna Musik-Verein in 1826, hardly admits of a doubtful answer. In a letter written to Leopold Kupelweiser, March 31, 1824, the composer, speaking of two quartets and the octet, says: "In this manner I shall prepare the way to the Grand Symphony," proving that he had such a work in his mind as early as that time. The next link in the chain is supplied by Schwind, in a letter to Schubert, dated August 14, 1825, wherein he says: "To your Symphony we are looking forward eagerly." This was evidently in reference to some remarks concerning the work by Schubert himself, who was then staying at Gastein, in upper Austria. After Schubert's death, his friend Bauernfeld wrote a biographical sketch of him for a Vienna periodical, in which occurs the following sentence: "Among the larger works of his later years is a Symphony written in 1825 at Gastein, for which Symphony he had a peculiar affection." Proceeding onward chronologically, we come to the statement of Herr Pohl, in his history of the Vienna Musik-Verein, that in 1826 the committee were informed that Schubert was anxious to dedicate a Symphony to the Society, and, about October 9, the composer addressed a letter to the committee, in which he says: "Convinced of the noble desire of the Society to give its best support to every effort in the cause of art, I venture, as a native artist, to dedicate this my Symphony to the Society, and most respectfully to recommend myself to its protection." It must therefore be obvious to the meanest comprehension that he wrote a Symphony somewhere between March, 1824, and September, 1826. But from here the difficulties of the case commence. Up to this point we can piece the evidence together, but now we are confronted with some surprising discrepancies and contradictions in the statements of those to whom we have to look for enlightenment. In the first place there is grave doubt whether Schubert actually sent in his MS. with the letter quoted above. The archives of the Society contain no reference to any Symphony received in 1826, nor do we hear anything of the performance of a Schubert Symphony at that time. This is the first stumbling-block, but a far more curious paradox has to be encountered. In 1828 Schubert composed his great Symphony in C, known as No. 9, according to the evidence of the score itself, the first page bearing the date "March, 1828." Kreissle tells us emphatically that this Symphony was presented to the Musik-Verein in acknowledgment of a present of 100 gulden to the composer in 1826. In 1838, however, Schumann found the score of the work at Ferdinand Schubert's house, carried it away with him to Leipzig, and had it performed forthwith. So the story goes; but Herr Pohl declares that the score was placed in the archives of the Musik-Verein in 1828, that its number is XIII., 8,024, and that if Schumann saw the symphony at Ferdinand Schubert's "it must have been a copy or the autograph lent for copying." There is very great significance in the sentence quoted. It is not at all likely that Ferdinand borrowed the original from the Society in 1838 for the purpose of copying, for at that time all interest in Schubert had died out in his native city. But if it was a copy that Schumann carried away, what has become of it? Is it known to be in existence, and has it ever been compared with the original? It is obvious that the statements of Schumann and of Herr Pohl are irreconcilable, and it is of the highest importance that the truth on this point should be elucidated, for the score of the No. 9 Symphony in the Society's library is full of alterations and corrections in the first three movements. In his analysis of the work for the Crystal Palace Concerts Sir George Grove says: "The fact of their existence at all is remarkable, because in general Schubert did not make alterations. His scores are usually very free from them. . . . The C major Symphony, however, alone of all his Symphonies, is an exception to this rule. . . . The first three movements are crowded with afterthoughts." The only explanation he gives for these emendations is that the composer may have had some presentiment of his approaching departure which induced him to be more than usually careful with his work. But that is a mere sentimental supposition, and cannot be brought forward as a serious argument. Surely it is more reasonable to suppose—putting all the above facts together—that Schubert wrote the symphony in 1825 but did not send it to the Society with his dedicatory letter in 1826. Further, that when early in 1828 it was proposed to perform the work, he made the alterations in the score and sent it in with the new date at its head. It would be interesting to know whether the writing shows any sign of an erasure on the same spot. If it does not, the difficulty is again increased; but there is one circumstance tending strongly against the theory of two Symphonies which appears to have been generally overlooked. The parts of the Symphony in C were duly copied out and the work was placed in rehearsal; but it was found to be too long and too difficult, and the composer recommended the substitution of one of his earlier works. Here then was a chance for the Gastein Symphony, which was dedicated to the Society, and for which "he had a peculiar affection." But he ignored this work, and proposed instead the Symphony in C, No. 6, dating as far back as 1818, and which he did not regard as one of his best compositions. This does not prove that the Gastein Symphony and the No. 9 are one and the same work; but it is a very strong piece of circumstantial evidence in favour of that view. The several points of the case may be summed up as follows: 1. That Schubert certainly contemplated writing a grand Symphony in 1824. 2. That he probably wrote such a work at Gastein in 1825. 3. That he certainly dedicated a Symphony to the Vienna Musik-Verein in 1826. 4. That he probably did not send in the MS. score with the dedicatory letter. 5. That he probably revised the work in March, 1828, with a view to performance, and then sent in the score to the Society, in whose library it still remains. This chain of reasoning is put forward with the utmost diffidence, and no one would rejoice more heartily than the present writer if his rashness in venturing to differ with so illustrious an authority as Sir George Grove were to be exposed by the discovery of another Schubertian Symphony, dating from almost the same period as the magnificent quartets in D minor and G.

A brief glance at the other series in the forthcoming Breitkopf and Härtel edition will suffice. Series two, "Overtures and other Orchestral works," will consist of ten numbers, nearly all of which will appear for the first time. Among them will be the first Overture in the Italian style in D, several early Overtures, and some Minuets and Trios. One of the two numbers of series three, "for violin and orchestra," will doubtless be the Violin Concerto in D, 1816, composed for "brother Ferdinand." The only new item worthy of note in series four, "for five and more instruments," will be the Octet for wind, 1813, supposed to have been composed for his mother's funeral. Series five will consist of 20 String Quartets, of which only nine are already published. The others, however, are only juvenile works, the latest dating from 1816. Series six will contain two String Trios composed in 1816 and 1817, the latter of which was played at the Monday Popular Concerts, February 15, 1869. The seventh series will only include one manuscript work—a Piano-forte Trio, 1812. All the items in the eighth series, "for Pianoforte and one instrument," are already known, and so are all those of importance in the ninth series "for Pianoforte, four hands," with the exception of a Sonata in E flat minor, composed, according to Nottebohm, in 1828. The Sonatas for pianoforte solo, twenty-one in all, will form the tenth series. The amateur will be surprised at the high number, but he must not look for any new treasures of importance, as the eleven works hitherto unpublished are more or less fragmentary, and the latest of them dates from 1818. Series eleven, "Fantasias, Impromptus, and miscellaneous piano pieces," and series twelve, "Dances for piano," may be passed over without comment. The eight Masses, series thirteen, will doubtless include the two arrangements of the Deutsche Messe, as the fragment of a Requiem, 1816, will be more in place in the supplement. The fourteenth series, containing "smaller sacred works," will include a Magnificat in C for voices and small orchestra, 1816, and two settings of the "Stabat Mater," 1815 and 1816. The latter of these has a German text by Klopstock. One of the most interesting series will be the fifteenth, consisting of the Dramatic music. There are eight unpublished Operas and Operettas, of which the most important are "Des Teufels Lustschloss," 1815, "Die Zauberharfe," 1820, "Alfonso und Estrella," 1821-2, and "Fierabras," 1823. It is unlikely that any of these would gain much popularity if placed on the stage, but the presentation of one of them would have much interest for musicians and the better class of amateurs. Series 16 to 20 will include the various compositions for male, female, and mixed voices. Among these will be found several birthday and other Cantatas, and, in fact, a mine of wealth for choral societies. Lastly comes the enormous mass of Lieder for a single voice. Neither of the three so-called complete editions of the songs published respectively by Peters, Senff, and Litloff, contains everything that has been printed, and there are upwards of a hundred songs yet remaining in manuscript. These are mostly juvenile compositions of the years 1811 to 1817, but as some of Schubert's finest creations date from this period it is reasonable to look for some gems of the first water, which have been hitherto overlooked. In the last, or supplemental series, will doubtless be found the unfinished Symphonies in E and B minor, and portions of several incomplete Operas and other works of magnitude. It is anticipated that the whole will extend to something like 8,000 pages of music; so much did this richly endowed musician accomplish in a life which, gauged in the ordinary manner, seems cruelly brief, though it was not so in a better and truer sense. Schubert might have done more had he been spared to reach even middle age; but he could not have more fully earned his right to a place by the side of the greatest tone-poets.

By EBENEZER PROUT.

In my first article I pointed out briefly the general system which Handel adopted in his orchestration. I now propose to illustrate what I then said by an examination of the entire series of his scores, so far as they are at present published in the edition of the German Handel Society. As the operas consist almost entirely of solo pieces, while in the oratorios and large cantatas the choruses are of considerable importance, and as this difference has had much influence on the instrumentation, it will be more convenient to deal with the two classes of works separately. I shall therefore first go through the series of operas from "Almira" (1704) to "Berenice" (1737), reserving the oratorios and other works for subsequent notice.

It is very curious that, in examining Handel's works from the point of view of their instrumentation, some volumes will be found in which there are only one or two points worthy of mention, while others abound in features of interest. The explanation may perhaps be that Handel only introduced special effects for the orchestra where such seemed to be suggested by the words; and as he was by no means particular in his choice of libretti, apparently setting to music almost any rubbish that was offered him, it is not surprising that commonplace texts should evoke from his fertile brain only commonplace musical effects.

Handel's first opera, "Almira," written at Hamburg in 1704, and produced there in January, 1705, is chiefly interesting in its scoring as foreshadowing many of the composer's later effects. In the short chorus "Viva Almira" (p. 5) we find three trumpets and drums in the accompaniment. The third trumpet is marked "Principale," a term also used for it in the Dettingen Te Deum. The explanation of the term is that in Handel's time there were two classes of trumpeters—those who practised the upper register of the instrument, and played such solo passages as we find in "The trumpet shall sound" and "Let the bright Seraphim," and those who took principally the lower parts. The former were called "Clarinbläser" and the latter "Principal-bläser"—i.e., players of the Clarino and players of the Principal. In this chorus the first and second trumpets are indicated in the score as "Clarino 1," "Clarino 2," and they have florid semiquaver passages in thirds, such as we find in the opening symphony of "To Thee cherubin," in the Dettingen Te Deum; the third, as already mentioned, is marked "Principale," and its part is confined to the five lower notes G, C, E, G, C. It is worth noting also that in this work Handel has written the trumpets and drums as transposing instruments, in the key of C, the chorus being in D. This plan was always adopted by Bach. In his later works Handel writes the actual notes sounded, leaving the transposition to the players themselves.

In the Chaconne which follows this chorus we meet for the first time with one of Handel's most frequently used effects—the contrast of oboes and bassoons with the strings. The parts for the wind are not written on separate staves; but some passages are marked "Tutti," others "Hautb. senza Viol.," and others again "Viol. senza Hautb.," while the bass line is sometimes for "Basson," and at others "Bassi." This particular effect is so frequently used by Handel that it would be tedious to point it out every time it occurs. I shall only mention it when it is so treated as to present some special features for notice. As one of the instances most familiar to general readers, I may refer to the scoring of the popular duet "The Lord is a man of war" in "Israel."

A very celebrated number of Meyerbeer's "L'Etoile du Nord" is the trio for soprano voice and two flutes. Probably nobody would have been more surprised than Meyerbeer himself had he been told that his effect had been anticipated a century and a half before by Handel; yet, on page 15 of the score of "Almira," we meet with precisely the same combination. The piece is a soprano song, the first part of which (G major, C) is accompanied only by strings and harpsichord—the part for the latter being, according to custom, only a figured bass. The middle portion of the song (in E minor, 6-8) begins with a symphony for two flutes, with two solo violins, in arpeggio. Nearly the whole of the voice part is accompanied only by the two flutes, the voice singing the lowest part of the harmony, and the two flutes being above, with a charming effect. The first subject then recurs, the first violins being now reinforced by the oboes.

In the tenor song "Liebliche Wälder" (p. 23) we find two flutes used again, but in quite a different manner. Here the two flutes and harpsichord are used alternately with the strings, much as the oboes and bassoons are employed in the chaconne just mentioned. In the symphonies the flutes sometimes double the violins in unison—a favourite effect with Handel in his operas, though seldom to be found in the oratorios.

The bass song in the second act, "Lass ein sanftes Händedrücken" (p. 47), is accompanied only by two oboes, basses, and harpsichord. The use of the oboes, or indeed of any other wind instruments, without any violins throughout a whole movement is rather rare with Handel, though common enough with Bach. In the present piece the whole voice part, excepting two short phrases, is accompanied by the harpsichord, and the use of the oboes is almost entirely confined to the symphonies. In the third act of this opera is another song, "Kommt, vermehrt der Thorheit Ruhm," also accompanied by two oboes and basses, but in an entirely different way. Here the voice (a tenor) sings the bass of the harmony in unison with the basses of the orchestra, and the two oboes have the upper notes, making a three-part harmony throughout. The use of the oboes is here continuous, there being not one bar's rest for them; and though the occasional figures in the bass would seem to show that the harpsichord was also employed, the music would be perfectly complete without that instrument.

The tenor air "Sprich vor mir ein süßes Wort" (p. 51) presents the unusual accompaniment of two flutes and a solo viola, the latter instrument being indicated in the score as "viola di braccio," to distinguish it from the "viola da Gamba," then still in use, which we shall find in the scores of the "Resurrezione" and "Giulio Cesare." The air also has the usual part for bass and harpsichord, many of the phrases of the voice being accompanied by these instruments only. The flutes have mostly sustained melodic passages, while the viola accompanies with arpeggios and scales in quavers. Handel sometimes uses the flutes with all the violas in three-part harmony, as in the recitative "Thus long ago" in "Alexander's Feast"; but this is the only instance I have found of a solo viola being thus employed.

One more song still remains to be noticed in this interesting score. The tenor air "Was ist des Hofes Gunst?" is accompanied, in addition to the harpsichord and basses, by a solo violin and violoncello, which sometimes accompany and sometimes alternate with the voice in a most effective manner.

Unlike "Almira," the next opera to be noticed contains hardly any points requiring mention. This is "Rodrigo," the first Italian opera which Handel wrote, which was produced at Florence in 1707. The original manuscript is incomplete, parts of the first and third acts being wanting. No trumpets or drums are found in the score, the consequence being, as pointed out by M. Schoelcher in his "Life of Handel," that in the air "Stragi, morti" (p. 30), where the trumpet is indicated by the words "Già grida la tromba," the accompaniment is given to the oboe. It must be borne in mind, however, that the tone of the oboe in use at the time, being fuller and coarser, formed a much better substitute for the trumpet than would be the case with a modern instrument. One of the airs in "Rodrigo" is accompanied by the first and second violins, doubled by the flutes in unison, basses and harpsichord. In this piece (p. 15 of the score) the indications "senza cembalo" and "con cembalo" on the bass line prove that the harpsichord was used as a matter of course in the songs, unless directions to the contrary were given. Of this fact an examination of the scores of the operas can leave no reasonable doubt whatever.

The soprano song "Fredde cenere d' amor" (p. 58) is scored, like the number just noticed, for two violins with two flutes in unison; but an effect of great lightness is obtained by giving the lowest part throughout to the violas, neither violoncellos nor double-basses being used at all. The following number (p. 59), accompanied only by violins in unison and basses, has the violin part written in the alto clef, an unusual method which Handel occasionally adopted, but which is more frequently to be found in Bach's scores. It would seem not unlikely that the violas also played the part, though this is not indicated.

"Agrippina" (1709) presents us with a few new combinations. In the overture we find three violin parts, instead of the more usual two, and at the close is an adagio with a florid oboe solo, in the style of an impassioned recitative. The song "Non hò cor" (p. 53) is interesting from its having separate parts for violoncellos and double-basses, in addition to which there are various solo effects for oboe, solo violin, and solo violoncello. An examination of the score of this air would probably astonish some who think Handel's orchestration wanting in variety. In the chorus "Di timpani e trombe" (p. 67) we find Handel's notation for these instruments in the transition stage. The piece is in D. The trumpet parts are here written in D, but the drums have still C and G.

The song "Vaghe fonti" (p. 83) is scored for two flutes, which mostly play in octaves with the first and second violins, "Violini surdi" (sic), viola, and "Bassi pizzicati, senza Cembalo." The word "surdì," which will be found again in the "Resurrezione" as "sordì," no doubt means "con sordini"; we find the same combination used by the composer nearly twenty years later in "Partenope," where the usual term "con sordini" is employed. The present song is interesting as being the first in which either the pizzicato or the mutes are met with. Handel utilised the music later in "Time and Truth," where it appears, with considerable modification, as the air "Mortals think that Time is sleeping."

There only remain two more points to notice in this opera. The soprano air "Pensieri" (p. 94) has a remarkably dramatic and expressive oboe solo, descriptive of Agrippina's agitated feelings, and in a symphony to a song on p. 124 will be found parts for two solo violoncellos, continuing a passage in thirds for the violins in the lower octave.

"Rinaldo," the first of the many Italian operas which Handel wrote for the London stage, and one of the finest, was produced on February 24, 1711. The score of the air "Augelletti, che cantate" contains an elaborate and florid piccolo obbligato (the first instance of the employment of this instrument by Handel), in addition to two flutes. In Rinaldo's song "Venti, turbini" (p. 46), we meet with the rather unusual combination of a duet for solo violin and bassoon. The air "Vo' far guerra" has a harpsichord solo, which, however, is not printed in the score; Dr. Chrysander informs us in his preface that here Handel showed his brilliant talent for improvisation. It is but rarely that Handel employs trumpets and drums in the accompaniment of a solo, but two instances are found in "Rinaldo"—the songs "Sibillar gli angui d'Aletto" (p. 13) and "Or la tromba in suon festante" (p. 104); the latter has parts for four trumpets, as also has the March (p. 101) and the Battle Symphony (p. 109). Handel's desire to increase the resources of the orchestra is already showing itself.

"Il Pastor Fido" (1712) will not detain us long; for the only number calling for much remark is the overture. This is entirely different in form from most of Handel's preludes to his operas, which generally consist of an introduction and fugue, sometimes followed by a minuet, or some other dance-tune. The overture to "Il Pastor Fido" consists of six movements, and approaches the form of the oboe concertos. The first movement, the themes of which Handel used subsequently for the overture to "Time and Truth," has no special features in the orchestration, excepting two passages of duet for oboe and violin, but in the following largo (p. 3) we find an anticipation of the modern use of wind instruments in the independent holding notes for oboes and bassoons, against moving parts for the strings. The allegro on p. 5 is very interesting in its scoring. We find three-part harmony, the two upper parts given to the oboes, and the lower part to the first and second violins in unison; there is also a bassoon solo, accompanied only by the harpsichord and the double-basses, another bassoon solo of eight bars entirely unaccompanied, and yet a third in which to the harpsichord and double-bass is added a long holding note for the first oboe. There are other points worth noticing in this overture; but I must pass on and leave my readers to examine the score themselves.

Two movements of "Teseo" (1712), the duet "Si ti lascio" (p. 35), and the song "Le luci del mio bene" (p. 51) have parts for two violas, the first instance to be found in Handel of the division of these instruments. The duet is curious from the fact that while the violas are divided, the violins are in unison; consequently, in the three-part harmony for these instruments, which forms an important feature of the opening symphony, the upper part must have been much stronger than those beneath it. No doubt this effect was intended.

One more number in "Teseo" should be noticed—the song "Vieni, torna" (p. 56). Besides the strings this number has important parts for two bassoons, which sometimes double the first and second violins in the octave below, and in the second part of the song have solo passages supporting the voice. The effect of the use of the instruments is so modern as almost to remind one of Mozart's scoring.

BY JOSEPH BENNETT.

No. XIV.—MEYERBEER.

THE date of Giacomo Meyerbeer's birth, like that of many other eminent musicians, is matter of dispute. M. Blaze de Bury, who had ample opportunity to question the master on the subject, gives it as 1794, and M. Fétis is on the same side, but others hesitate between 1794 and 1791. The difference is little, and signifies less; enough that shortly after the eighteenth century had entered upon its last decade, a son and heir was born to Herz Beer and Amalie Wulf, his wife. Beer, a rich Jew banker of Berlin, does not appear to have made any mark save as a rich Jew banker. He moved to Berlin from Frankfurt, and was, no doubt, a worthy member of a proverbially shrewd fraternity, none of whom ever slept without keeping one eye open and steadily fixed upon the "main chance." But if Herz Beer was merely a successful man of business, his wife took higher rank. She appears to have been a true "mother in Israel"—one of those grand characters in whom we still recognise the heroic outlines of the women of the Bible. With great faith and a large heart, of austere morals and tenderest feelings, Amalie Beer was just the woman to have great sons, and to develop in them the qualities they derived from herself. The mother's influence over her eldest boy was immense. She loved him passionately and guided him wisely, while he, in return, felt for her absolute veneration. A characteristic story is told of their relationship in after life. Just before "Robert le Diable" was produced in Paris, Meyerbeer received from his mother a letter marked "To be opened after the first representation of 'Robert.'" In returning from the theatre at the close of an eventful night, the composer eagerly broke the seal and read: "The Lord bless thee and keep thee. The Lord lift up the light of His countenance upon thee and be gracious unto thee. The Lord cause His face to shine upon thee and give thee peace." Profoundly touched at receiving, under such circumstances, the ancient benediction of his people, Meyerbeer ever afterwards kept the letter on his person as a talisman. This tender love of mother and son continued till Amalie Beer was called to the reward of her faithful service, and it would be well if the letters she wrote to the composer during the years of their separation were collected and given to the world. Other sons she had, and two of them became eminent—one, Wilhelm, as an astronomer (he made a famous map of the moon); the other, Michael, is still remembered by his dramas "Parià" and "Struensee," for the last-named of which Jacob Beer composed music.

It is said that young Jacob showed musical tendencies at the very early age of four years. We do not lay too much stress upon this. All infants are wonders, more or less, in the eyes of the home circle, and record of their precocity is duly made for the benefit of a posterity which shall have learned to admire their developed greatness. Let it stand, however, that the baby Beer picked out upon the pianoforte tunes he had invented or heard in the street, accompanying them with such harmony as instinct prompted him to make. Father Beer—unlike his fellow Hebrew, Father Mendelssohn, sixteen or seventeen years later—was pleased to note in his little son such signs of a true vocation, and straightway put the child under one Lauska, a pupil of Clementi, and a favourite teacher in the Prussian capital. Under his care the little fellow soon developed into a prodigy. All his friends, being sensible people, were proud of him, and one, Meyer (or Mayer), went so far as to leave him a considerable fortune on condition that he assumed the benefactor's name. In consequence of this Jacob Beer became Jacob Meyer Beer—afterwards Italianised and consolidated into Giacomo Meyerbeer.

It may be that the pride of the Beers in their young scion was greater than the wisdom that regulated it, even than the wisdom of the good mother, who must have consented to the public appearance of her boy when he was only in his seventh year. One is reminded of baby Mozart by the apparition on a public platform of this little Hebrew, at a time when he should have been in the nursery eating bread and butter and generally building up a sound fleshly temple for the spirit that was in him. Genius, however, must not be submitted to ordinary rules, and so probably thought the Beers as they decked out little Jacob for the show. The child played at a concert given on October 14, 1800, and obtained the honour of a flattering press notice. What did he play? Only the D minor Concerto of Mozart! At any rate, so declare his biographers, and those who doubt may consult the contemporary journals for satisfaction. Young Meyerbeer appeared again in December, 1803, and January, 1804, by which time he had become famous, and was spoken of as one among the best pianists in Germany. His execution was facile and correct, his style elegant, his grasp of the work set before him firm and comprehensive to a marvellous degree considering his age, and he could improvise with rare power, although, as he had never taken lessons in harmony, his progressions were not always correct. Owing to his growing repute, little Jacob came under the eye of two remarkable men at this period. Abbé Vogler saw and heard him, and prophesied for the youthful Israelite a brilliant career, while Clementi was so struck that, despite an aversion to teaching, he gave him lessons during the whole of his stay in Berlin. All this the Beers noted and were glad of their first born. "The Lord hath blessed him," said the fond mother.

Meyerbeer was about twelve years old when his parents placed him under a master for harmony and composition. Some biographers tell us* that he was first sent to Zelter, "whose rigid severity was insupportable to the young prodigy." This statement, however, derives no authority from Fétis or Blaze de Bury, who assert that Bernard Weber first took young Jacob in hand. Weber—who must not be confounded with Carl Maria's friend, Gottfried of that ilk—had a high position in Berlin, where, indeed, he reigned as chef d'orchestre at the Opera. He was a pupil of Abbé Vogler, but, according to Fétis, did that eminent contrapuntist little credit. The authority just named states that, while able to enlighten his pupil in matters of taste and style, Weber was a weak harmonist, and so far unacquainted with the different kinds of counterpoint and fugue as to be a very incompetent teacher. In these matters Meyerbeer tried to teach himself, and out of this arises a story which we may allow Fétis to tell:—

"One day he (Meyerbeer) brought a fugue to his teacher, and Weber was so struck that, proclaiming it a masterpiece, he sent it off to Vogler, as a proof that he also could turn out learned pupils. For some time there was no reply, but at length came a voluminous packet which was opened with ardour. O doleful surprise! instead of the hoped-for praises was found a kind of treatise on fugue, written by Vogler, and divided into three parts. The first part succinctly laid down the rules for the construction of a fugue; the second, entitled 'The Pupil's Fugue,' contained that of Meyerbeer, analysed in full and proved to be anything but good. The third part, called 'The Master's Fugue,' contained one by Vogler himself on the theme and counter-subjects of Meyerbeer. It was also analysed, bar by bar, the master setting forth reasons why he had adopted such and such a form and no other."

* See article "Meyerbeer" in Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians.

In this elaborate manner did the Abbé abate the pride of his ex-pupil—no doubt deriving a grim satisfaction from the process. As to whether he was right or wrong, connoisseurs can judge for themselves, the paper having been published as a "System für den Fugenbau." In any case, it had a great effect upon Meyerbeer. The scales fell from his eyes, and he saw what Bernard Weber had never been able to make clear. At once the lad set about composing a fugue in eight parts. This he sent himself to the Abbé, who wrote back: "There is a great future for you in art. Come to me, come to Darmstadt; I will receive you as a son, and will cause you to drink from the fountains of musical knowledge." There was no more question of Bernard Weber after this. The boy set his heart upon going to Vogler, and his indulgent parents were not long in granting his prayer. Jacob was fifteen when he went to Darmstadt.

Abbé Vogler was a curious individual. He had in his nature more than a little of the charlatan; he was vain to excess, and subordinated the better part of himself to the unworthy object of making a figure in the eyes of the world. Educated by the Jesuits, he knew how to touch the weak points of those whom he wished to turn to account; he imposed upon the imagination by studied eccentricities, and trusted as much in tricks and dodges as in his undoubted musical talent. Briefly, Vogler was a "bit of a humbug." Till the Darmstadt period he had led a wandering life; turning up unexpectedly in the great European capitals, getting pupils round him (for he was a born teacher), and then suddenly vanishing—all for the purpose of exciting wonder and making talk. Vogler thus became a famous personage, and as such was much desired by Ludwig of Hesse, whom fate had made a Grand Duke but nature a Capellmeister. Ludwig's Court was nothing if not musical, since every official and his family were obliged to play or sing, while his Highness himself acted as teacher and conductor. Naturally, Grand Duke Ludwig cast a covetous eye upon Abbé Vogler, who, once caught and secured, would make Darmstadt like "a city set upon a hill." The Abbé was not unwilling to be caught for a consideration, and, a bargain concluded, he went to reside in the Grand Ducal capital, with the title of Privy Councillor, the grand cross of the Hessian order, a handsome pension, a good house, dinners and suppers from the Palace kitchen, and four wax candles a day. All these fine things consoled him for being, in a musical sense, kept at a distance by the Grand Duke. His Highness rejoiced to have Vogler attached to his court, but wanted none of his advice, and went on drilling his artistic forces and conducting at the Opera in his own way. Meanwhile the Abbé was an imposing presence in the streets of Darmstadt. "His appearance," writes Baron Max von Weber, "was not prepossessing, however. The old Abbé was short and corpulent; his features were strongly marked, but of no very friendly expression. His peculiarly long arms and enormous hands, which enabled him to stretch with ease two octaves on the organ, gave him somewhat the aspect of a large fat ape. Vanity was one of his ruling passions, and, vainer now than ever, he delighted to exhibit himself in all the elegance of black satin breeches, red silk stockings, and gold buckles in his shoes, with the great cross of the Order of Ludwig on the left breast of his rich broad black coat, and his black silk ecclesiastical mantle jauntily hung over his right shoulder." Such was the man to whom young Meyerbeer went as pupil to master.

Through Max von Weber we get a good view of Jacob as he was on entering Abbé Vogler's school:—

"In the Abbé's house Carl Maria (Von Weber) was destined, moreover, to make acquaintance with another young musical genius as yet unknown to him. This was Jacob Mayer Beer (more generally known under the name of Mayerbeer), the son of a rich banker in Berlin. Mayerbeer was then scarcely sixteen years of age, but his eminent musical talents had developed themselves so early that he already possessed a very considerable reputation as a pianist. He was now studying music under the Abbé Vogler, in whose house, for the better furtherance of his labours, he was lodged and boarded. His master was enchanted with his unwearied industry and zeal, his restless activity, and his almost incredible quickness of conception, which, in all the technical portion of the science, seemed to amount to divination. Although but a boy as yet, he possessed such powers of execution on the piano that he might already have earned a handsome independence as a professional performer had not fortune raised him above any such necessity. He was able to play the most elaborate instrumental scores at sight, with a full mastery of every part, which amounted to the marvellous, and this peculiar talent he was accustomed to exercise upon the principal scores of all the great masters, which he was fortunate enough to possess, bound with care, in his great musical library, to the envy and to the great benefit also of his young fellow-labourers. So untiring was his industry that, for weeks together, he would never leave his room or put off his dressing gown, when fascinated by some new branch of musical study. His four-part 'Sacred Songs of Klopstock' had already been published, and had entitled him to respect as a composer. Such was the little insignificant looking boy-artist, Mayerbeer, at this period. His amiable and friendly disposition soon attracted him to the young, joyous, animated, high-spirited, 'sucking' maestro, who had dashed over from Mannheim, although his colder and more reserved North German nature was never able to express that warmth and more demonstrative affection which had bound Carl Maria's expansive heart to such friends as Gänsbacher."

The musician just named—the dear and life-long friend of the composer of Der Freyschütz—was also studying under Vogler at this time, so that young Meyerbeer had companions of his own age in his new home, which seems, indeed, to have been a happy one. Vogler's system of teaching was highly stimulative in character, its main features being severe critical attacks upon every exercise, the author of which had to defend it as best he could, and was, therefore, most unlikely to put anything down without thought as to how he would meet the demand for a reason. Regularly, after morning mass, the Abbé met his pupils to give them an oral lesson in counterpoint; and then he announced a theme or themes for development in one or other of the musical forms. Later in the day these exercises were taken one by one and severely analysed by the master, who also required the pupils to do the same. Then, perhaps, Vogler and the boys would sally forth to the cathedral, which had two organs, at each of which a pupil was placed with orders to improvise in turn against the other on some given theme, the old Abbé, who was accounted the best organist in Germany, winding up with an effusion of his own. Weber used to say in after years that "Never did the Abbé pour forth such wondrous angel-tones or thunder peals on the instrument in such rich beauties of fancy, as when he thus sat and played alone for his 'three dear boys.'

Life at Darmstadt was not all hard work, though the lads had to make play for themselves. The Grand Ducal capital was a very severe and formal place at that time, and terribly dull. "I only take up my goose-quill," writes Weber in one of his letters, "to tell you in the dullest words, how dull I feel in this dull Darmstadt." Nevertheless, Vogler's boys contrived a good deal of fun, for, thank heaven, "youth will be served." Sometimes they would enter a beer garden, where Weber, standing on a table and twanging his guitar, would sing "roguish songs," to the huge delight of the public. Anon they would go out "melody hunting"—picking up snatches of popular tunes for the purpose of expanding and beautifying them. To this, it is said, we owe the theme of Weber's "Invitation à la Valse." Or they would sit on a public bench and eat cherries for a wager, or take Mam'selle, Weber's dog, with them, and call the creature's name whenever a young lady passed, to enjoy seeing her look enquiringly round. Occasionally the lads would go to Heidelberg or Mannheim and drink more wine than was good for them. Merry parties they had in the two old towns, a special feature always being the improvisation of Meyerbeer and Weber on two pianofortes, one taking up the other in the middle of a passage or interrupting his cadences with incongruous matter. This fun over, the entire company would fall upon Meyerbeer's Berlin delicacies (Father Beer kept his son well supplied with hampers of good things) and often young Jacob found it difficult to get a scrap for himself.

In such manner young Jacob passed two happy years, for, with all his faults of taste and temper, the old Abbé secured the love of his pupils, by whom he was invariably called Papa. On one occasion the lads resolved to do their master's birthday special honour by jointly composing an ode. Weber acted as poet, a distinction for which lots were drawn, and also wrote a part of the music, the rest being done by Meyerbeer and Gänsbacher—the share of the former being a terzet and chorus, of which we read, "Nothing, even at that time, could exceed the glow and simple fervour of the boy Meyerbeer's birthday composition." Amateur performers, among them Jacob's sister, Theresa, were easily obtained in the town, and on the morning of the day, Vogler being busy at the Opera rehearsing his "Samori," his apartments were decorated by the three pupils, and a banquet prepared. By and by the old Abbé returned home to be astonished at the aspect of things—at the music and the feasting, the lights and the flowers. Unhappily he was out of temper. The Grand Duke had taken no notice of the event, and the old man's vanity, deeply wounded, would not permit him to be gracious even to the loving attentions of his "dear boys."

The Grand Duke's slight upon Vogler may have had something to do with reviving the master's wandering spirit, but from whatever cause his restlessness increased. He desired once more to roam from city to city, and have the fire of his vanity fed by new admirers. But he would take his boys with him, and enlarge their experience of men and things, while continuing to watch over their musical development. The boys were naturally charmed with the idea, and in due time the little party left dull old Darmstadt for the comparatively reckless gaiety of Leipzig and Munich. But before quitting the Grand Ducal capital, young Meyerbeer produced a work and gained a distinction, the one being an oratorio entitled "God and Nature" (the manuscript score may be seen in the Conservatoire Library, Prague), the other the title of Court Composer. "God and Nature," let it be added here, was performed in Berlin, May 8, 1811, "at a concert given by Weber," says Fétis, but this Weber could not have been Carl Maria, who was then living in Munich. Carl Maria, however, had something to do with the oratorio, since he wrote a detailed criticism, or rather eulogy, afterwards pronounced by his son, Baron Max, to be "a sacrifice of truth to friendship."

Meyerbeer appears to have left Vogler at the close of their tour, and we next find him in Munich, where, at the age of eighteen, he produced a Biblical lyric drama, "The Daughter of Jephtha." The work was a failure, for reasons perfectly intelligible. Vogler's teaching had aimed at nothing more than scholastic perfection. It sought to make the pupil conversant with all the technical devices and operations of the art, but there was little culture of the imagination or of the power of dramatic expression. Hence "The Daughter of Jephtha" more resembled a series of exercises than an exposition of human feeling. It was, therefore, rejected by the public, and Meyerbeer received his first check. Authorities differ about his next work. According to the writer of the article "Meyerbeer" in Grove's Dictionary, our young master composed and produced at Munich a comic opera, "Alimelek, or the Two Caliphs," which made no success in the Bavarian capital, but was bespoken and put in rehearsal by the manager of the Kärnthnerthor theatre, Vienna, a circumstance which drew Meyerbeer to the Kaiserstadt. This statement seems scarcely probable, or else the Vienna manager was an exception to the general run of his kind. Indeed, the writer observes in his next sentence that Meyerbeer went to Vienna "with the intention of making his appearance there as a pianist." Fétis says nothing about "Alimelek" at Munich, nor does Blaze de Bury, while in Max von Weber's memoir of his father, the opera is spoken of as "given in Vienna under the title of 'The Two Caliphs.'" When Fétis does mention "Alimelek"—by the way, he calls it "Abimelek"—it is to tell us that the work was written to order in Vienna, consequent upon the success of a monodrame, entitled "The Loves of Theclinde," sung by Mdle. Harlas. The truth, no doubt, is that Meyerbeer went to Vienna as a pianist, and not as a composer. At that time (1813) the Austrian capital was the headquarters of music. There alone could supreme distinction be gained, and all who were ambitious of it had to challenge the judgment of a public educated up to the highest point. Meyerbeer soon saw that, able player as he was, no immediate hope existed for him. On the very evening of his arrival in the city he heard Hummel play with the facility, exquisite finesse, and subtle charm that distinguished him. At once Meyerbeer formed a resolution. He would go into strict training and not show himself in public till he could meet Hummel on his own ground. For ten months the young man persevered in carrying out this resolve, and then he challenged public judgment with striking success. Among those who heard him was Moscheles, who told Fétis that had Meyerbeer chosen to rely upon his talents as a virtuoso, few pianists would have stood a chance of successful rivalry. At this time the lad, for he was little more, composed a great many pianoforte pieces, some of which he committed to paper, but kept most of them in his memory only. Among his works at the early period under notice was also a symphony concertante for violin, piano, and orchestra.

Meyerbeer left Vienna under circumstances not unlike those which caused his departure from Munich. His "Abimelek" or "Alimelek," or "The

Two Caliphs," was too old-fashioned and German for a public that had tasted the Italian music of Rossini, and it failed completely. The composer took his second check much to heart, but found a friend and comforter in Saliéri, who had quite a fancy for the young Jew. Saliéri's advice was the best possible for one who desired to succeed, and had no rigid musical principles as a preventive of elasticity in action. "You have learning enough," said Meyerbeer's counsellor; "Go to Italy and study how to write melodies for the voice. You possess the gift of tune, but do not know the instrument through which the theme finds expression. Learn it!" "I will," answered Meyerbeer, and he did.

LA SCALA AT MILAN

BY FILIPPO FILIPPI.

ENGLISH readers will, I hope, feel some interest in perusing a condensed sketch of the great theatre of La Scala, its historical and artistical vicissitudes. The fame of this ancient temple of art is so great that we Italians are wont to call it the first theatre in the world, nor does this appellative seem to us exaggerated or unmerited. Strangers find the Scala one of the most interesting sights in Italy, even when empty, but doubly so when open for performances of opera and ballet. The English visitors in particular constantly frequent it, especially those who have come to Italy to learn singing. Numbers of the inhabitants of Milan may be seen roaming about its streets, the ladies remarkable for their serious and ladylike demeanour, carrying with a loving embrace the score of some of the most fashionable operas.

The Scala is both loved and feared by all artists, singers, dancers, and composers, whose fate leads them to submit on this stage their talent to the appreciation of an intelligent public, often very severe and sometimes capricious. These feelings can easily be accounted for. A century's glories and uninterrupted artistic traditions have an undoubted value. Studying the history of this theatre, it will be found that, notwithstanding inevitable irregularities, partial ignorance and obstinacy, unjust failures, and excessive enthusiasms, art has always triumphed there in its most noble and sometimes also in its boldest manifestations.

The great theatre was built in 1776 on the spot formerly occupied by the church of Santa Maria della Scala; this church, anciently called La Veronica, had been rebuilt in a larger and altogether more sumptuous style, with a canonry attached to it by Beatrice Visconti, wife of Barnabo, and daughter of the Lord of Verona, Mastino della Scala, whence the name in honour of the pious founder, which by strange force of habit passed to the new theatre.

The architect was Guiseppe Piermarini, one of the least afflicted by the mania for Barocco in fashion in those days, but affected by that timidity which in art approaches dryness. The protruding arcades on the façade awkwardly enlarge it, but then they are convenient to shelter carriages as they drive up to the theatre. The interior is admirable for the harmony of its proportions, the elegance of its curve, and especially for its marvellous sonority (perhaps unique in the world), so that singers, even with small voices, can be heard there to advantage. A few years ago the decorations were renewed, the auditorium freshly painted, and the house now looks bright and cheerful in every part. The theatre can accommodate 3,600 spectators, it contains 240 boxes, and its largest diameter is twenty-two metres. An admirable feature, too, is the curtain painted in 1863 by Bertini and Casnedi, and representing the chariot of Theſpis. Although lately restored, it is to be regretted that daily use and the deleterious atmosphere of the gas are gradually wearing it out. In the general restorations was also comprised the lobby, now most elegant and convenient, with fine statues of Rossini, Donizetti, Bellini, and Verdi.

One of the great marvels of La Scala is its vast stage, so well adapted to grand performances such as those immense ballets which, from Vigario to Manzotti, have created such enthusiasm. Four hundred persons can move freely on that wonderful stage, which lends itself to the most fanciful and bold attempts in scenic art.

It must be admitted that if the actual artistic and administrative organisation of the theatre has grave defects which often impede the perfect success of the performances, that organisation is an almost inevitable consequence of the primitive foundation of the theatre, half private, half official, and now municipal, from which has sprung syndics, overseers, directors, commissaries, with their respective presidents, having once upon a time the chief of the state and now the head of the Municipality, in the person of the Mayor and Senator Count Giulio Belinzaghi, to preside over the whole edifice of administration.

The existence of La Scala is, in a certain manner, related to that of the preceding Milanese theatres, as far back as the year 1598, when for the passage through Milan of the Archduchess Margaret of Austria, bride of Philip III., King of Spain, was erected by the side of the ducal palace, via Restrelli, a kind of theatre, in which were given festivals and representations according to the custom of the times. This theatre, improved by the governor, Charles Henry, of Lorraine, was destroyed by fire in 1708 and again in 1717. A company of noblemen then erected on the same spot a new theatre, which was entitled Ducale, and for which, if I do not err, Mozart wrote his first operas, "Mitridate," "Lucio Silla" and "Ascanio in Alba." This new theatre was burnt in 1776, and the boxholders determined on building two solid monumental theatres, which became those of La Scala and La Canobbiana. These new theatres, according to compacts made between the Patrician Society and Government, were to be royal appurtenances, the first four rows of boxes to belong to the company, and the boxholders to pay an annual rent which, together with the Government donation, was to defray the necessary expenses of grand operas and ballets. These original conditions, of which I only give the outline, are still in existence, only the Municipality has taken the place of the Government, and the subsidies have to be voted each year in council against many adversaries who will not understand that to cut off those subsidies is equivalent to voting the closing of La Scala, and that Milan, deprived of its greatest theatre, would suffer an immense loss both morally and materially. The Society of the Boxholders exists yet, and is represented by a Commission. The Mayor of the town answers for the Municipality. The direction of the performances is entrusted to excellent, zealous, much respected persons, who, however, are generally wanting in musical competency. Finally, there is an artistic commission, whose duty should be to watch over the exactitude of the costumes, the propriety of the scenes, of the mechanisms, of everything, in short, that is art and taste. I say should be, for we have but too often seen it approve mere patchwork for scenes, and tolerate unpardonable anachronisms in dress.

The theatre is let each year to an impresario, whose business ought to be the choice of the performances to be given, the expense attached to them, the speculation on new productions, and the details which elsewhere are the exclusive attributes of managers; but the impresario of La Scala must submit to a continual syndicate, to the approbation of all the complication of authorities, directions, and commissions, which oblige him to resign his right to free activity and content himself with taking his money if the receipts are favourable, or with paying from his own pocket if the cash box is empty. Business being thus in the hands not of real directors but of managers, who have nothing to lose, it often happens that when the receipts are poor the artists do not get paid; and as in Italy the system is to pay in four instalments, which are called quartale, it is generally understood that the fourth quartale is uncertain, unless the artist has taken the precaution to have a guarantee from the Municipality for the whole of his salary.

The institutions belonging to La Scala are worthy of the highest praise; they are the school of dancing, that of choristers of both sexes, and its orchestra. The dancing school is the oldest; it was formed in 1813, divided into two classes, with masters and mistresses of the ballet, of the mimic art and of perfected dancing. The instruction lasts eight years, after which the best pupils take the title of emerite (licensed) and as such remain attached three years to the theatre with a fixed stipend. The excellence of this school is proved by the corps de ballet of La Scala, the best, it may be asserted, as regards talent, composed as it is for the most part of pupils of the school, and from which have sprung many stars of the choreographic art; the names of Grisi, Pocchini, Fuoco, Baderna, Ferraris, Cucchi are familiar to all Europe, and many more without reaching the culminating point of celebrity have held the rank of first dancers in the best theatres. The choral school recently formed was at first meant for women only, but now men have been admitted also. This school owes its existence to the maestro Zarini who began it on sound principles. Cairati has now succeeded Zarini, and is also a distinguished leader of the chorus. The execution of the choruses at La Scala is everything that could be desired, and the most difficult operas perfectly executed testify to the excellence of the school.

The orchestra of La Scala never had a true character of stability and unity. It was for a long while composed of wandering and adventurous elements, subject to the whims of the impresarii, who sometimes for economy's sake engaged inferior artists, with worse leaders. Things have changed since the present director, Franco Faccio, took his orchestra to Paris, obtaining there a complete triumph. After this immense success the orchestra of La Scala formed itself into a society, which gives annual concerts, and in this way has acquired a unity and stability which it did not before possess, retaining for its director the great artist Faccio, who is bound to the theatre by contract, not to the impresario but to the municipality.

MUSICAL MEN OF THE TIME.

THE life of Mr. Thompson Cooper, editor of "Men of the Time," is not, we imagine, a happy one. When he inserted the name of a contemporary in the eleventh edition of his famous compilation, which has just been published, he must have thought as Louis XIV. when he appointed a great functionary of state, that he was making "vingt ennemis et un ingrât." Unlike the grand monarque, moreover, he has not the power to silence these enemies by sending one to the Bastille, another to Vincennes, a third perhaps to the Château d'If, by way of change and sea air. The clamours of Mr. Cooper's disappointed clients are echoed, not by prison walls, but by the columns of the newspapers. They are mostly wielders of the pen, and this is the way in which they proceed: Mr. Brown, writing in the Eastonswill Gazette, will point out that "a biography of contemporaries omitting the name of that able and trenchant writer, Mr. Robinson, is not worth the space it occupies on the bookshelf." Mr. Robinson will echo in the Independent, of the same city, that "omitting the great Brown from the list of illustrious Men of the Time implies either gross ignorance or malice prepenon on the editor's part," and so forth, ad infinitum.

But Mr. Cooper's troubles do not end here. Besides being like Louis XIV. he is also like Hegel, the German philosopher. Hegel was supposed to be the most learned man in the world; he knew everything; as to that all his disciples agreed—collectively. Separately, however, each made a certain mental reservation. Astronomers would say that he was the greatest authority on music and the fine arts; artists would praise his marvellous grasp of osteology and the paleozoic strata of fossiliferous rocks; natural scientists affirmed that he was unrivalled as an expounder of modern history. Only in his own particular specialty each would admit the master to be deficient. Somewhat similar treatment, we are afraid, Mr. Cooper will receive, and in some quarters has already received, at the hands of his critics. Politicians will look upon the truly astonishing omission of Mr. Burne Jones as a venial sin, but will ask the reason why Lord Randolph Churchill, Mr. Mundella, and the Duke of Westminster are not counted amongst Men of the Time? Lawyers will care little about the neglect shown to Dr. Carpenter, Professor Romanes, and other scientific celebrities, but will cast him in heavy damages for the contempt of the Solicitor-General, Mr. Charles Russell, and Sir Henry Thring; and so forth, ad infinitum.

Before we ourselves assume the part of advocatus diaboli in the cause of Music v. Cooper, let us first of all admit that the comparative neglect with which our client has been treated does not proceed from any malice, but merely from an error of judgment. That such an error has been committed we propose to prove, not from the point of view of the artist, but from that of the man of the world, from Mr. Cooper's own in fact. The editor of a compilation of this kind cannot be expected to be in profound sympathy with every branch of science and art incidentally mentioned in his pages; the only criterion by which he naturally is guided is the importance attached to each of these subjects and its representatives by the generality of readers. It is on such grounds that we venture to assert that he has not given to musicians the prominent place they can justly claim. In this respect the new edition can scarcely be said to have been brought up to date; the change which has come over the public mind with regard to music within the last ten or even the last four years has not been sufficiently taken into account. Such a meeting as that convened by the Prince of Wales, at St. James's Palace, might have convinced the most casual observer of the social position which the art at present occupies. The time when well-born Englishmen took a kind of pride in their ignorance of music, or, as Lord Chesterfield would have said, contemptuously and collectively "fiddling," is fortunately past. Apart from this let us draw Mr. Cooper's attention to the columns of the daily papers, the truest reflex of current opinion. We are not aware that many or any of the directors of these important organs of public thought are fanatici per la musica, who practise the violoncello or even the German flute in their leisure hours, and would be likely to sport their hobby-horse at the expense of prestige and circulation. And yet it may be safely affirmed that during the year 1883 it has occupied more space in the daily press than the drama and painting and sculpture taken together. If this is not a sign of the times we should like to know what is.

In investigating the manner in which the representatives of the art have been and have not been dealt with, let us divide them into three categories: first (and least), writers on music; second, writers of music; third, executants. Of professional musical critics two are mentioned, Dr. Hueffer and Mr. Sutherland Edwards; of authors who have dealt more or less cursorily with the theory or the history of the art we have four, Sir George Grove, the Rev. H. R. Haweis, the Rev. Thomas Helmore, and Dr. Cox. All of these are known in connection with other branches of literature and science apart from music, and it must be doubtful whether without these their claims to notice would have been considered sufficiently strong. Such at any rate are the limits within which musical literature in England is confined. We are, for obvious reasons, little inclined to prove that these limits were too narrowly drawn and that a dozen or a score more names should have been added to those just enumerated. It is not pleasant to play the part of Pevi at the gates of Paradise looking wistfully at those inside, or to be suspected of the Brown-Robinsonian motives above specified. Let us transfer the discussion to the less delicate ground of foreign parts. The most musical country in the world is no doubt Germany, and the most influential critic of Germany is Dr. Hanslick. One may think Dr. Hanslick a greatly over-rated man, who, although a clever journalist, sadly collapsed when he assumed the philosopher's cloak, and tried to expound the "musically-beautiful" on Hegelian principles. This is a question of merit; of his name and position there can be no question, and name and position must necessarily determine the balance in which "men of the time" are weighed; as to the higher qualities posterity must decide. Signor Filippi is the leading critic of Italy, as Dr. Hanslick is of Germany; in Belgium M. Gevaert has acquired world-wide reputation as a musical critic and historian; in France M. Reyser is the successor of Hector Berlioz on the Débats, which, in matters of high art, continues to be the leading journal; he is also well known as the composer of "Sigurd," recently performed at Brussels with great éclat. None of these men have found a place in the volume before us. If the old and selfish proverb "solamen miseris socios habuisse malorum" is true, English critics should be comforted; they suffer in excellent company.

In the matter of composers, Mr. Cooper has evidently been intent upon doing his best. He has stinted neither space nor trouble in endeavouring to do them justice. The earlier musicians are, indeed, very fully treated, and Sir Frederick Ouseley occupies one of the longest articles in the book—four times as long as that devoted, for example, to Charles Reade, the novelist. It is only when he comes to deal with the younger masters that the editor's knowledge and judgment find their limits. Mr. John Barnett, the composer of the "Mountain Sylph," is treated with the respect due to his age and his industry, but not a niche has been found for Mr. John Francis Barnett. Equally whimsical is the selection made in other instances. Mr. Goring Thomas and Mr. Mackenzie established their reputation as dramatic composers in one and the same season. The former is honoured by a brief notice, the latter is ignored, although "Colomba" is twice incidentally referred to in the course of the volume.

Mr. Stanford and Mr. Hubert Parry are likewise refused a local habitation and a name in this volume, and Mr. Cusins is referred to neither as a composer nor as the late conductor of the Philharmonic Society and Master of the Music of Her Majesty the Queen. Here again, however, no undue attention has been shown to foreigners at the expense of native talent. Robert Franz, Kiel, Goldmark, Dvorák, Boito, Ponchielli, and Sgambati are assigned to the same limbo of nonentity. Of Scandinavian masters, Grieg is mentioned; Svendsen is not; Russia, according to Mr. Cooper, knows not her Tschaikowski. But perhaps France has most reason to complain. Even the existence of so distinguished a man as Camille Saint-Saëns is never referred to with a syllable; Massenet, the leader of the modern school, is ignored; Gounod and Ambroise Thomas, together with Lecocq, Hervé, and one or two more of that genus (not including Delibes), are the sole representatives of musical France.

Musical execution is in these pages to a large extent identified with the prima donna. Of that delightful species many delightful specimens are found. Their charms, their chief parts, their honours, and in some cases even their years, are duly recorded. Once or twice Mr. Cooper's gallantry entirely overpowers his discretion. Madame Gerster is his special favourite. Her Ophelias, Sonnambulas, and Lucias are all perfectly delightful, and "her triumph at Berlin created such a furor as had never been previously known in the German capital"; and this of the city which witnessed the triumphant birth of "Der Freischütz!" In the case of Madame Albani, Mr. Cooper finds it too painful to mention her marriage with Mr. Gye, whose name accordingly is not mentioned amongst leading impresarii, although Mr. Rosa receives the honour due to the champion of English opera. The editor having expended all his enthusiasm on these fascinating songsters, not unnaturally forgets to mention such artists as Bülow, Pachmann, or Wilhelmj, who, unfortunately for them, belong to the stronger sex. We may add that amongst music publishers Mr. Cooper very properly singles out Mr. Alfred Novello, the Doyen of the trade.

We have, the reader will perceive, dwelt exclusively upon the sins of omission found in Mr. Cooper's volume. Those of commission are indeed very slight. It would be needless to correct such trifling slips of the pen as that Mr. Charles Hallé "sang" at Mr. Ella's matinée, or that Sir Julius Benedict was at any time the "director" of the Monday Popular Concerts. As a rule, the notices are correct and to the point. Let us, before concluding, lay down our brief as advocatus diaboli, and frankly acknowledge that, in spite of its shortcomings, "Men of the Time" is one of the most useful compendia of general biography in existence, in most respects equal, and in some respects superior, to Vapereau.

IN making a new start in English Opera, after years of comparative inaction, it is rather hard on our native composers that they should be placed, as it were, between two fires. If they write in the style of the period, as accepted in any continental country, they are accused of doing little to promote the interests of the musical art in England. If the style they adopt be more antiquated, or if it be supposed to be more national, they are set down as provincials, or perhaps ridiculed as being still inspired by the melting strains of our lyric theatres forty years ago; and the truth is, we have no other indigenous operatic models. If we want anything better, we are bound to seek it elsewhere, or go back to Arne and Purcell. Music in different ages has its various literary styles, as well as the more permanent differences in dialects. If a man speak in Italian or German, or French, there is no question of mistaking his respective nationality; but music, like Latin in the middle ages, is the one common language of the cultivated world; and the most we can do, if it is our fashion to be ill-natured, is to criticise the dialect, or brogue, as it will be called, when either the accent or dialect is not that in use amongst the dominating or the most refined people or classes. Taking all Europe as one musical nation, each province, such as Germany, Italy, or France, will have its own dialect; but the brogue is only very noticeable in more isolated districts, where the science of music is neglected, or where there are the remains of some ancient people, Celt, or Slav, or Arab; and, as a rule, where the brogue is the most pronounced the art will be least advanced. How difficult it is, in some cases, to detect any innate national characteristic may be tested by a very simple experiment. If, for instance, we take the Nordische Tänze as arranged by Grieg, or, still better, a volume of songs by Franz, and transpose them into the natural key and write the melodies on the violin clef, we have apparently a collection of English or Scottish popular tunes; with this difference, that the Scottish tunes at least, as a matter of pure melody, are infinitely superior. Yet if we hear an English song with the accompaniment usually written for it, and played and sung as it too often is, the distinction between the English and the more elaborately harmonised German song is simply beyond the bounds of definition. The one is idealised by the harmony; the other is a crude outpouring of natural sentiment. If the particular mixture of races in the wider territory of Germany has endowed the Teuton with a richer nature and a higher musical organisation than the English, there is an end of the subject; we must be content to yield and admire. Should that not be so, the point narrows to what musicians call "treatment," which is gradually recognised as a specific national quality, but its origin and growth are artificial; and are in fact a process of gleaning from earlier fertilised fields. From these, our insular position, and even our higher civilisation in other respects, which has generated an intense national pride, have until recently, when we began to acknowledge our defects, excluded us to a considerable degree. We have, therefore, in music, fallen a little behind; and none of us can be blamed for adopting any foreign model we choose to select, in the desire of impressing little by little a new as well as national character on our art-made music. To affect at the present day the mere Anglicisms of an earlier date, would not be less fatal than the affectation of the modern-antique, or of the devilries of semi-Asiatic races that mingle freely with our kinsmen in Central Europe. Whilst expressing our thoughts in a common or universal language like music, we can remain English at heart, without making a particular dialect obtrusive. To perpetuate a brogue, out of sheer jingoism, is not by any means to promote the interests of art in England.

THERE are conflicting opinions upon the effect of those nocturnal minstrels, "the Waits," who, time out of mind, have been privileged, once a year, to arouse us from our first sleep with strains considered to be appropriate to the season. Some persons rail at them as licensed disturbers of the peace, who ought to be summarily "put down," with the many similar customs sanctioned only by age. Others would not part with them for worlds; lying awake, even, to catch the first notes of their welcome serenade, and resigning themselves to rest only when they find that the sound has hopelessly faded in the distance. A paragraph in the Paris Temps, a short time since, shows us that India can boast of at least one enthusiast who goes far beyond the most earnest admirer of slumber-music in this country, and would indeed have the "Waits" all the year round. A "musical bed," we are informed, has been ordered of one of the most noted houses in the French capital by an East Indian Rajah. It is in every respect a magnificent and luxurious article of curiously sculptured wood, inlaid with silver plating, and decorated after the Indian style. The cost of the metal employed in it is 18,000 francs, the price for the entire piece of furniture being 70,000 francs. The Rajah desired that the elastic mattress should be a kind of musical box on a large scale, which, by the simple weight of a person's body, would strike up operatic airs. It may certainly be a special merit in this contrivance that, unlike many eminent performers, when pressed to play it cannot refuse; but whether it is equally easy to make it leave off is not stated. Presuming that the more restless the Rajah becomes upon his mattress the more violent will become the music, it would be absolutely necessary for him to get out of bed to gain peace and quiet. But these are of course mere details; and after all we must remember that he has at least this advantage over many of his fellow-creatures, that he only listens to the music he chooses for himself.

EVEN those who believe, with ourselves, that there is no "royal road" to the acquisition of sound musical knowledge must feel grateful to all who can render the ordinary road less rugged, so that the student may travel upon it more comfortably, if not more expeditiously. What then would be the debt of gratitude to the individual who can guarantee that we may all arrive at the desired end without journeying on the road at all? Such a person, however, exists, and will forward, "by parcels post," an instrument which he truly terms a "musical marvel," enabling us to effect instantly the wished-for result. The advertisement, after giving the name of this extraordinary effort of ingenuity, says: "Any person can play the above charming instrument without study or tuition; thus the purchaser at once becomes on an equality with practical musicians without any musical knowledge whatever." We are also informed that it can be so altered and adjusted that the melodies produced may be "deep and rich as the violoncello, plaintive as the flute, melodious as the clarinet, or sonorous as the oboe." Having read thus far, we are naturally anxious to know whether, in order to evoke such exquisite music, any complicated course of action will be demanded on the part of the possessor of the instrument. On this point we are at once enlightened by the following beautifully simple instructions: "Decide on the air you wish to play, then drop the paper disc into the resonating chamber, and screw down, as explained in the printed directions." The adjustment of the machinery in order to produce the effects of the violoncello, flute, clarinet, or oboe may perhaps be attended with some little difficulty; but it is evident that merely to place yourself "on an equality with practical musicians," all you have to do is to drop a paper disc in the resonating chamber and screw it down. This is satisfactory, and will assuredly save so many years of deep and laborious study that it cannot be too generally known.

UNTIL reading a paragraph in a recent number of the Medical Press and Circular, we had no idea that amongst the many methods of training the vocal organs chemistry would ever occupy a recognised position. At Glasgow, however, it appears that Dr. Moffat delivered a lecture to a large audience, composed principally of professional men and musical critics, in which he maintained that the presence of peroxide of hydrogen in the air and dew of Italy had some connection with the beauty of the Italian vocal tone. A series of illustrations by people taken from the audience, who inhaled a chemical compound made to represent Italian air, were eminently satisfactory, "a full, clear, rich, mellow tone being produced by one application." Dr. Moffat's own illustrations were said to be quite unique. Taking what was originally a voice of power and resonance, but destitute of intonation, he showed by chemical means this could become a tenor of great compass. Some twenty notes, ranging from the lower to the higher register, were sung without any effort by the possessor of a voice of this character. That the air of Italy has not only "some connection," but a very influential one, with the beauty of the Italian voice, we never doubted; but that by inhaling a chemical compound resembling the air we can obtain a "full, clear, rich, mellow tone" from a very ordinary voice with only one application, leads us to anticipate the most extraordinary results where such application can be constantly repeated. One important question, however, is whether a permanent Italian quality of voice can be guaranteed by the use of a certain number of bottles; so that when you have made yourself a perfect vocalist you may completely dispense with the means by which you became so. If not, it would be of course necessary for a singer to carry his "Italian air" about with him; and we much fear that it might prove most inconvenient, either at the Opera or in a Concert-room, to inhale it slyly whenever some high notes are coming.

BIRMINGHAM seems resolved to take the lead in matters musical. When Mr. Jesse Collings was Mayor of the great Midland town he projected and carried out a system of threepenny concerts; and now we find that a series of free Promenade Concerts has been organised by Mr. Alderman White, the present Mayor, during the winter months. An article in the Daily Telegraph, commenting upon this praiseworthy movement, calls public attention to the difference between the head of the Corporation in Birmingham and the Lord Mayor of London, truly remarking that there is no valid reason why our city dignitary should not do the same thing. "In London," says the writer, "during the long nights of the coming winter, our poorer people must either stand at public-house bars drinking their senses away, or stay at home in narrow incommodious rooms, while folk of their own station in life, who have the better fortune to belong to Birmingham, will be able, after the day's work is over, to stroll into a large, well ventilated hall, and listen to the strains of the best composers adequately rendered, and at the expense of the municipality." It is true that heavy duties and heavy dinners press both upon the time and the resources of our monarch of the city, and it is also true that he has much to do in keeping up the dignity of the many Guilds and Companies so long the boast of London citizens; but we can ill afford to be rivalled by provincial towns in providing for the intellectual wants of the people, and although, perhaps, it might have been better if we had initiated so excellent a project as that which has given such satisfaction at Birmingham, it is never too late to mend, and we may still have—as the Telegraph half jestingly shadows forth—"penny concerts" at Guildhall, with the Lord Mayor of London in the chair.

"COLOMBA" IN GERMANY.

(FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

Hamburg, January 27.

ENGLISH musical art has again been honoured in Germany by the production here to-night, at the Stadt Theatre, of Mr. Mackenzie's "Colomba." The work is written in so earnest and dignified a style that it seems well suited to the German taste in operatic music, and its success here was, therefore, to a certain extent assured. An excellent translation of Mr. F. Hueffer's drama had been made by Herr Ernst Franck. The crowded audience assembled for the first representation was drawn chiefly from the general public. The applause became increasingly enthusiastic as the Opera proceeded, the curtain being raised in all fourteen times, and Herr Sucher, the conductor, being compelled to bow his acknowledgments at the conclusion of the performance. It is much to be regretted that Mr. Mackenzie was unable to be present to receive in person the congratulations so justly due to him; but the necessity for devoting the whole of his attention to the work which he is composing for the Norwich Festival rendered this impossible. The performance gave evidence of the care which had been bestowed on the production of the work, both by the Conductor, Herr Sucher, and the Director, Herr Pollini. Frau Sucher gave a powerfully dramatic rendering of the character of Colomba, and showed an earnest appreciation of the significance of the part. Frau Brandt-Goertz sang well as Lydia, and Frau Heintz was dramatically effective as Chilina. The part of Orso was efficiently represented by Herr Wolff, and the other solo parts were filled by competent artists. The band and chorus left nothing to be desired; but the scenic arrangements were not of the best. "Colomba" will probably be produced next in Hanover.

ROYAL ENGLISH OPERA COMPANY.

This organisation, known in the provinces for some time past, made its first appearance in London, at Covent Garden Theatre, on the 7th ult., and will close a season of four weeks to-morrow night. Its members are chiefly seceders from the company of Mr. Carl Rosa, who, with a natural desire to continue their labours, and not finding an entrepreneur, have banded themselves together as a kind of artistic republic. Well and good. There is room for all, or, if not, the fittest will survive and the rest we can spare. It was bold on the part of the company to take Covent Garden Theatre, even with Mr. Gye as a friend. Much is expected on that stage—more, as it turned out, than the artistic resources at command could always furnish.

The repertory of the season has contained many old and favourite operas—"Il Trovatore," "Maritana," "The Lily of Killarney," "Satanella," and so on. These need not detain us here, since there is nothing to be said about them that has not been uttered a thousand times. Our concern is with the two operas that, showing commendable spirit, the company was the first to put before a metropolitan audience. We refer to Victor Nessler's "Piper of Hamelin" and Julian Edwards's "Victorian."

The season opened with the "Piper of Hamelin," which work came to us in the English dress provided by Mr. Henry Hersee, and with the stamp of German approval. Nessler, who now acts as chef d'orchestre at the Leipzig Theatre, has gained the ear of his countrymen with this "grand romantic opera," and from one point of view the fact may be regarded as a good sign. It shows, at any rate, that Teutonic taste has not yet been trained to reject lyric drama constructed on the old classic lines or vocal melody written in form. The "Piper of Hamelin" is by no means a drama to be declaimed with musical accompaniment, the best proof of which appears, perhaps, in the pages containing a Sestet in canon. It recognises music as an art, and when we find popular Germany applauding, a sense of satisfaction arises without regard to the actual merit of the work. In itself, the "Piper of Hamelin" is not a great thing, but the music is pleasing, and would have a far better chance of general acceptance were it allied to a libretto of greater interest. Nessler's librettist cannot plead, in defence of a poor book, that he was hampered by the legend, all of which we find in Browning's well-known poem. The Piper comes to Hamelin, offers to clear the town of rats for a certain sum; fulfils his contract; is refused payment; and in revenge draws, by the magic of his music, all the children of the town into the river. Beyond these grim and unpromising incidents, the librettist could work his own will, and surely he had room enough for accessory motives and incidents. In using this liberty he shows but a small amount of wisdom. For example, the mysterious Piper becomes anything but a hero. He betrays a village girl, Gertrude, who is attracted to him, as Senta to the Dutchman, makes a silly wager that he will compel the Mayor's daughter to give him a kiss, and is then condemned to death for practising unholy arts. Availing herself of a very peculiar and local law, Gertrude claims to suffer in his place, and, when her hero is at liberty, drowns herself in the Weser, after which the Piper carries out the doom of the children. This is all very poor. The Piper inspires contempt instead of awe; Gertrude is a bad copy of Wagner's heroine, and the rest of the characters represent so much padding, among them being the usual convivial monk, a comic town-clerk, and a jealous lover of Gertrude—a sort of Siebel in a blacksmith's dress. As still further proof of unskilful construction, the opera is in five acts, each act containing a change of scene, so that the curtain descended, on the first night of representation, no fewer than ten times.

Nessler's music has some good qualities. A vein of lightness and piquancy runs through it, as through Flotow's "Martha," and suggests French influence, which is not surprising, inasmuch as Nessler, an Alsatian, was born a French citizen, and trained under French auspices. To this may be attributed what we will call the superficial merit of his composition—that is to say, merit obvious and easily recognised. There is plenty of tune in the "Piper of Hamelin." True, it cannot always be called original or distinguished, but still it is tune, and that of a pleasant kind. The concerted pieces, while for the most part simple in construction, are well written, and show a sufficient knowledge of effect within the limits laid down. A Sestet in canon has already been mentioned, but deserves further notice as an admirable exemplification of Nessler's powers when at their best. It is a canon on the octave, rigidly scholastic, yet quite expressive, and so charming that the Covent Garden audience demanded a repetition. Nessler doubtless had the "Fidelio" Quartet in canon in his mind when writing this number, and the music shows him not unworthy to be emulous of Beethoven. Whether in solo or concerted piece, this composer does not forget that prominence belongs to the human voice. The orchestra is fully and at times richly used, but never reduces the voice to a secondary place. Hence the "Piper of Hamelin" demands vocalists rather than mere declaimers for its proper interpretation. Its main defect is a lack of commanding numbers, such as, in a great work of art, excite interest and admiration to the highest pitch, and help to tide over the weaker passages that must of necessity occur. Not the level plain but the mountainous land most charms the eye, and makes the way seem short. In Nessler's work there is an absence of sky-kissing summits. It presents a level of well-cultured country, pleasing enough, but not provocative of any enthusiasm.

The performance, conducted by Mr. Gilbert H. Betjemann, was fair, but by no means what it should have been. To the representatives of certain parts praise can honestly be awarded. Madame Rose Hersee's experience and skill, for example, gave a good account of the infatuated girl, Gertrude. Mr. Arthur Rousbey played the small part of the jealous lover in promising style, and Mr. C. Lyall as the Town Clerk once more showed what a very excellent comedian he is. Mr. Albert M'Guckin, as the Mayor, did good service, and Mr. James Sauvage, upon whom fell the heavy burden of the title-rôle, sang with considerable taste and acceptance. That he presented a nondescript character was not his fault, since the librettist has created a personage who is "neither fish, flesh, fowl, nor good red herring." Mr. Sauvage is an important recruit to the ranks of English opera, and may look forward to a career of some distinction. The orchestra and chorus were competent to the work they had to do, but lacked the precision and cohesion that come of adequate rehearsal.

"Victorian," by Mr. Julian Edwards, was first performed in London on the 19th ult., under the composer's direction. Mr. Edwards is a young man of whom the world had previously heard very little. An overture from his pen was produced at one of the orchestral concerts given by Mr. F. H. Cowen, nearly two years ago, and it must have been about that time that "Victorian" was written. No immediate chance of presenting the opera offered, but with the engagement of the composer as one of the conductors of the present company, the desired opportunity came, and a first performance took place in Sheffield during a recent tour. The librettist, Mr. J. F. R. Anderson, went to Longfellow's "Spanish Student" for a subject, and "freely adapted," for musical purposes, the story there told. We do not think that he made a wise choice. The general character of the plot and most of the incidents are stale, while no great personal interest is roused, and rarely do the situations prove exciting. We need not reproduce the "argument" here, because everybody has read Longfellow's play, and made acquaintance with the fortunes of Victorian the student, and Preciosa the gipsy, who of course is no gipsy but the offshot of a noble house. Mr. Anderson employs Longfellow's lyrics where he can, and they are a great help to the libretto, which, let us add, particularly needs it. Here is an example of Mr. Anderson's verse:—

My life is sad and lonely :
Since thou art lost to me,
And, bound by fate, Death only
Can set me free.
But when strange lovers move thee
To bliss, thou'lt see
That none could love thee ever
As I love thee.

Mr. Edwards brought some qualifications to the musical setting of this book. He has a gift of melody, and is capable of expressing strong feeling, while some of the concerted pieces are marked by character and a certain element of the picturesque. But the composer's art is not equal to his natural gifts. He fails to present a dramatic situation with sufficient power, unity, and distinctness, his successes, such as they are, being entirely lyrical, while his musical method is vague and his orchestration elementary. Mr. Edwards seems particularly fond of modulation into extraneous keys, and frequently resorts to enharmonic changes. This gives a sense of restlessness and striving to his music; and it need hardly be said that excessive use of the tremolando, of themes played by violins in octaves, and an arpeggio accompaniment, suggests poverty of device as well as induces monotony. We shall scarcely be expected to go into details. "Victorian" is no more than a ballon d'essai thrown up to see which way the wind of his powers blows. At the same time we would not discourage him. He has his career before him and must expect some initial failures—the sort of adversity that to a wise man answers Shakespeare's description, "Though like a toad, ugly and venomous, It yet doth wear a precious jewel in its head." The performance, in which Madame Julia Gaylord, Mr. Packard, Mr. Sauvage, Miss Lucy Franklin and other well-known members of the company took part, was distinctly not good. Having said this with emphasis, we may be excused entering into unprofitable details.

SAVOY THEATRE.—"PRINCESS IDA."

WHEN Sir Arthur, then Mr., Sullivan commenced that collaboration with Mr. W. S. Gilbert which has since yielded such an extraordinary meed of popular approval, musicians gave utterance to some feeling of regret that the ability and talent of one of our representative composers should be frittered away in the composition of burlesque music. Six years have elapsed, and Sir Arthur Sullivan has carefully felt the pulse of the public to whom he has appealed, giving a higher artistic impress to each successive work as he believed it was safe so to do. "Patience" and "Iolanthe" were on the whole a considerable advance upon "The Sorcerer" and "H.M.S. Pinafore," and by general consent the Music of "Princess Ida" shows yet further progress towards that intellectual standard which should be the goal of every earnest composer. This comparative excellence is the more apparent because Mr. Gilbert's share in the work is confessedly weaker than usual. There are some extremely whimsical ideas in his libretto, but it has the disadvantage of being a renovated version of an unsuccessful play, and it has its dull as well as its brilliant moments. On the other hand, the score is free from the slightest suspicion of vulgarity; and though much of the music is a réchauffé of earlier works, the composer has preserved a certain refinement of manner which conveys a sense of charm to cultured listeners. It would serve no useful purpose to analyse the opera in detail, but we may call attention to Sir Arthur Sullivan's felicitous reproductions of old world rhythms and cadences, and also to his masterly use of the orchestra. In this last respect the superiority of his work to those of foreign composers of light comic opera must be manifest to any attentive listener. There is not one among the performers who is entitled to special commendation, but the ensemble is little short of perfection, and the orchestra and chorus are of first-rate quality. If "Princess Ida" is as successful as it appears to be, Sir Arthur Sullivan may be encouraged to devote his gifts to higher purposes in the domain of the lyric drama.

MONDAY AND SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

THERE has been very little to call for critical comment in these performances since Christmas, the programmes having been formed of familiar works, while the artists have not included the name of any performer of importance whose individuality is not well known to the frequenters of St. James's Hall. It is evident that the public is well satisfied with this order of things, for the audiences have been unprecedentedly large and enthusiastic. At the same time it relieves us from the task of speaking at length on what has been done; and in most instances a mere formal record will suffice. The Concerts were resumed on the 7th ult., when Mozart's Quintet in C minor headed the programme. This work was originally composed as a serenade for eight wind instruments, and it has been heard in that form at the Popular Concerts. Madame Frickenhaus, who is always quietly artistic in whatever she attempts, played Beethoven's Sonata in D minor, Op. 31, No. 3; and Mr. E. Lloyd sang two of his most hackneyed airs, Gounod's "Lend me your aid" and Piatti's "Awake, awake." On the following Saturday M. de Pachmann reappeared, his solo being Beethoven's ("Moonlight") Sonata, Op. 27, No. 1. It is impossible to agree without reservation to his reading of this work, the sentiment of the first movement being exaggerated, while the treatment of the finale lacks breadth and dignity. Mendelssohn's Quintet in B flat, Op. 87, interesting to Mr. Chappell's patrons as being the first work ever performed at the Popular Concerts, and Beethoven's Pianoforte Trio in D, Op. 70, No. 1, were the principal items in the programme. The Concert of Monday, 14th, was more varied than usual, and in a certain sense more interesting. Some curiosity attached to the appearance of Miss Maggie Okey, a young pianist, formerly of the London Academy of Music, but now receiving the benefit of tuition from M. de Pachmann. She played the sixth study of Henselt, known as "Danklied nach Sturm," and Nos. 6, 8, and 10 of Chopin's Etudes, Op. 25. In all of these she displayed very neat mechanism and a sympathetic touch, but not much power. Her reception by the audience was flattering in the extreme. The study in thirds of Chopin (No. 6) had to be repeated, and at the end of her selection she was again encored, when she gave Schumann's "Vogel als Prophet." Later in the evening Miss Maggie Okey joined her preceptor in Chopin's Rondo in C, for two pianofortes, Op. 73, one of the posthumous publications, and an early composition, despite its high opus number. The works for strings were Schumann's Quartet in A minor, Op. 41, No. 1, a great favourite at St. James's Hall, and Mendelssohn's posthumous fragments of a quartet. The vocal music consisted of two duets by Herr Alexis Holländer, and two by Dvorák, all charming little compositions and tastefully rendered by Miss Louise Phillips, a young soprano of promise, and Madame Fassett.

A group of acknowledged masterpieces was performed at the next Concert, on Saturday, 19th. These were Mozart's Clarinet Quintet, with Mr. Lazarus in the principal part; Beethoven's Sonata in E flat, Op. 7, played by Mr. Charles Hallé; and Brahms's Sonata in G, for pianoforte and violin, Op. 78. Mr. Hallé and Signor Piatti rendered some numbers of Schumann's "Mährchenbilder" for pianoforte and violoncello, and Miss Santley was the vocalist. The reappearance of Miss Marie Krebs is always an event of some interest, as the Dresden pianist has been known to us from the days of her childhood. She had a cordial reception on the 21st, and justified it by giving an interpretation of Beethoven's "Waldstein" Sonata, which, in a technical sense, was masterly. Even after this lengthy work she was asked for an encore, with which she complied by playing Schumann's "Traumeswirren." The concerted works at this Concert were Mozart's Quintet in E flat, one of his latest compositions; and Spohr's melodious and graceful Trio in E minor, Op. 119. Mr. Maas was heard to great advantage in Handel's "Deeper and deeper still," and Blumenthal's "Message." Madame Néruda, who has occupied the position of leader throughout the month, displayed wonderful brilliancy of execution in Paganini's "Moto Perpetuo." Herr Joachim is announced to reappear on Monday, the 25th inst.

MR. WILLING'S CHOIR.

THE second Concert of this Choir for the present season took place in St. James's Hall, on the 15th ult., and was fairly well attended, thanks, perhaps, to a programme of varied interest. It is significant that both the societies which have sprung out of the ruins of the old "Sacred Harmonic" go beyond the region of oratorio to search for attractions. Both are giving miscellaneous programmes, and the long oratorio seems likely to accompany the long sermon and the long magazine article into disuse, and eventually into oblivion. Is this because the average man of the present day is less solid, more volatile, than his fathers? The Concert under notice opened with Mendelssohn's "First Walpurgis Night," the solos in which were taken by Madame Patey, Mr. Levetus, and Mr. Bridson. A good performance of this fine dramatic work resulted, the choruses and the orchestral part, on which so much depends, leaving very little to desire. At the same time, Mr. Willing's tempi were, in certain cases, open to question, albeit the conductor could, doubtless, give a good reason for the course he adopted. In the miscellaneous part were the overture to Gounod's "Mireille" and Beethoven's mighty "Leonora," two widely contrasting, but each in its way effective, works. The vocalists were Miss Beare, who sang "Bel raggio" in promising style; Madame Patey, whose "Che farò" charmed as ever; and Mr. Bridson, from whom the audience heard Quasimodo's air in "Esmeralda," "What would I do for my Queen." The chorus of faggot-binders in Gounod's "Mock Doctor" had a place in this very mixed selection.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

SINCE the Christmas performance of "The Messiah," by the members of the Festival Choral Society, musical events of interest here have been few and far between, but the next few weeks promise abundant entertainment for local music lovers, and the present dearth will shortly give place to an embarras de richesses. There is no good reason, save that of custom, for these alternations of feast and famine, and it is to be hoped that in future years some bold innovator will be found to break the spell of silence which is so arbitrarily imposed upon the musical world here during the first few weeks of the new year.

One Christmas entertainment yet remains to be noticed in the production, on the 27th December, of Gounod's "Redemption," by the members of the Local Philharmonic Union, under the direction of Dr. Swinerton Heap. The experiment was a bold one for this comparatively young organisation, but it was justified by the result, and the performance, though not immaculate, presented so many praiseworthy features, and appeared to give such genuine satisfaction to the large audience assembled, that it may be honestly chronicled a success. The vocal principals were Miss Delves Yates, Miss Grace Damian, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Brideon, and Mr. W. Evans. There was a small but excellent band, with Mr. Stimpson at the organ, and the Society's chorus was augmented for the occasion by a strong contingent from Wolverhampton. Of the soloists, it will suffice to say in general terms that they acquitted themselves with skill and judgment; Miss Delves Yates especially distinguishing herself by her brilliant rendering of the noble solo "From Thy love as a Father," and Mr. W. Evans impressing his audience very favourably by the suavity and tenderness with which he gave the utterances of the Redeemer. The honours of the performance, however, were borne off by the chorus, and especially by the soprano section, who were in excellent voice and form. The delicate singing of the semi-chorus, and of the small body forming the "celestial chorus" was especially deserving of praise, whilst for power and breadth nothing could well have exceeded the rendering of the massive chorus "Unfold, ye portals everlasting!" and the grand final chorus of the work. The accompaniments generally were well rendered, but larger executive resources were needed to do full justice to the composer's full and elaborate orchestration.

The only other musical event of sufficient interest to call for notice here was the Chamber Concert given by Mr. Stratton on the 22nd, which was remarkable chiefly for the large proportion of new music by English composers. One of the novelties, a String Quartet in F, by Mr. Thomas Anderton, a Birmingham musician, met with a very cordial reception, in virtue chiefly of its tunefulness, and of the musicianly skill with which the themes are worked out. If it errs at all, it is on the side of over elaboration, which occasionally mars the breadth of effect. The best passages are those in which the composer has surrendered himself to his lyrical impulses, and the finale in particular is a gem of its kind. The other novelties were a Sonata in D for pianoforte and violoncello, and an adagio for the same instrumental combination by Mr. Edward Sharp. These compositions, if not distinguished by any great originality of style or theme, revealed much refinement, and grace and true feeling for rhythm and melody, and they were warmly and deservedly applauded. Schubert's Octet furnished a substantial and worthy finale to a very interesting Concert.

Of Messrs. Harrison's third Subscription Concert, which took place on the 28th, with Miss Clara Samuelli, Madame Patey, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Frederic King, and Mr. Santley as vocal principals, details must be reserved for another issue.

MUSIC IN THE WEST.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

DURING the Christmas holidays, Colston Hall has been occupied by a panorama, thus preventing the usual concerts and recitals from taking place. The company, however, departed in time for the grand Concert given in aid of the Bristol Royal Hospital and Infirmary, in the presence of H.R.H. the Prince of Wales, on the 29th ult., too late in the month for a detailed notice to appear in this letter, as is also the case with Mr. Herbert Thorndike's Concert, given at Victoria Rooms, on the 26th ult., and Mrs. Viner Pomeroy's Classical Chamber Concert, which took place on the 30th ult.

On December 28th, a Concert was given at Clifton College, when Mr. Caldicott's Cantata, "A Legend of the Rhine," formed the second part of the programme. The choir was composed of Clifton ladies, Miss Louie Phillips and Miss Winthrop being the soloists. The first part of the programme was miscellaneous, Mrs. Caldicott, Miss Winthrop, Mr. Caldicott, and Mr. Herbert Thorndike contributing solos in a most artistic manner.

On the feast of the Epiphany Beethoven's grand Mass in C was performed at St. Mary's (R.C.) Church, with orchestral accompaniment.

On the 10th ult. a crowded audience assembled in the Victoria Rooms, on the occasion of the annual "Ladies'

Night" of the Bristol Madrigal Society. The first meeting of this Society was held on March 1, 1837, and it is interesting to compare the number of voices present at that first meeting with that of those who took part last month at the forty-eighth Concert. March 1, 1837: seven choristers, four altos, seven tenors, seven basses. January 10, 1884: thirty choristers, nineteen altos, twenty-nine tenors, thirty basses. The programme, a most attractive one, was as follows:—Part I. "God save the Queen," "All creatures now" (Benet), "When April deck'd (Marenzio), "Spring Song" (Mendelssohn), "Thirsia; sleepest thou" (Benet), "Great God of Love" (Pearsall), "When all alone" (Converso), "Summer Song" (W. Macfarren), "As Vesta was" (Weelkes), "Jack Frost" (Hatton). Part II. "Hence dull care" (Gastoldi), "Sir Patrick Spens" (Pearsall), "Autumn song" (Mendelssohn), "Sweet honey-sucking bees" (Wilbye), "I love, alas!" (Morley), "Winter song" (Dorn), "What ho! What, shepherd, ho!" (Beale), "The Curfew" (W. Macfarren), "Why with toil" (Pearsall), "The Waits" (Saville). As a whole, the programme was rendered in a most satisfactory manner, the singing of some of the items being really perfect. The chief fault was the conspicuous weakness of the trebles in the National Anthem, while in the next number they were distinctly guilty of singing flat. But they seemed to warm to their work, and Marenzio's beautiful composition, "When April deck'd," was very finely sung. There being apparently no rule against encores in force, many were demanded and given, and the idea of having the songs for the four seasons seemed attractive. The observance of light and shade was a marked feature of the choir throughout the evening, and this was especially observable in Mendelssohn's "Spring Song," which received the first encore. Pearsall's eight-part composition "Great God of Love" was much appreciated, and heartily encored, and W. Macfarren's charming "Summer Song," faultlessly rendered by the choir, fairly awoke the enthusiasm of the audience, the composer, after the second singing of it, having, in answer to repeated calls, to bow his acknowledgments from his seat amongst the audience. This was again the case after the singing of his interesting setting of Longfellow's "Curfew Bell." Weelkes' madrigal "As Vesta was," brought out the solid training of the choir to great advantage—and best of all perhaps was the rendering of "Sweet honey-sucking bees," this most trying composition being sung with the greatest ease, the members of the choir showing themselves to be completely masters of the situation. "Sir Patrick Spens" which was encored as a matter of course, was sung in the most satisfactory manner, the descriptive character of the composition being well sustained. The two novelties presented this year were Morley's "I love, alas!" and Dorn's winter song. Mr. Rootham ably filled the post of conductor, and he is to be heartily congratulated upon the result of his careful training of the choir during the past year.

Musical Bristol is now eagerly anticipating the first of the Monday Popular Concerts, which is announced to take place on the 4th inst. The number of the members of this Society is steadily increasing, and seats are rapidly being secured. We sincerely trust that, once resumed, these valuable Concerts will not be allowed again to drop. Their importance as a means of musical education is surely sufficiently evident to the public to ensure their continuance. The possession of a first-class local orchestra is the only thing now wanting to place Bristol in the front rank of English musical cities, and it is to these Concerts we have to look as the chief means of forming such an orchestra. Native talent is by no means lacking in Bristol; many excellent musicians are now resident amongst us, and with such a Conductor as Mr. Riseley, our orchestra might soon compare favourably with that of any other provincial town in England. It is intended also to form an amateur society in connection with the Popular Concerts, to which Mr. Riseley has most kindly offered his services as Honorary Conductor; and surely we may count ourselves most fortunate in having in our midst a musician who not only possesses first-rate ability, but who is actuated by the most disinterested love for his art.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THIS month's record of musical events in Yorkshire would not be complete without some reference to the numerous performances which were associated with the Christmas Festival in several Yorkshire towns. Prominent among the Sacred Concerts which were given in Leeds at that period was the Choral Society's performance of "The Messiah" in the Victoria Hall, on the evening of Boxing Day. There were many other holiday attractions, but the attendance was none the less satisfactory, for this particular Concert has acquired much popularity. The performance of the soprano music by Miss Fanny Bristowe was thoroughly artistic, and secured for that lady marks of great favour. Mrs. Creser, the wife of the accomplished Organist of the Parish Church, sang the contralto music with much taste and vocal purity, and confirmed the excellent impression which, as Miss Clarke, her previous efforts had left upon many Leeds audiences. The tenor and bass music was rendered by Mr. E. Dunkerton and Mr. J. Nutton respectively. The Conductor was Dr. Creser, who had a grateful task in leading such an admirable chorus through a congenial work. Mr. Alfred Benton was at the organ. The band was weak.

At Salem Chapel, Leeds, where many excellent sacred performances have taken place from time to time, Gaul's Cantata "The Holy City" was given during Christmas week, by a fairly large chorus, conducted by Mr. W. Toothill. The principals were Miss Ada Rhodes, Mrs. Kennedy, Miss Ada Sutcliffe; Mr. E. F. Doyle, and Mr. H. Rhodes. Mr. W. N. Hudson was at the organ.

Besides the Christmas Concert of "The Messiah" at St. George's Hall, Bradford, to which reference was briefly made in last month's issue, there were performances of the same Oratorio by the Huddersfield Choral Society, the Dewsbury Choral Society, and the Pontefract Musical Society. At Huddersfield the principals were Miss Clara Samuëll, Madame Mudie Bolingbroke, Mr. Henry Piercy, and Mr. Barrington Foote. Mr. Joshua Marshall was the Conductor, and Mr. H. L. Parratt presided at the organ.

At Halifax the Choral Society gave a performance of "Elijah," which was throughout well balanced and satisfactory. The singing of Miss Tomlinson and Miss Hilda Wilson was conspicuously fine. Mr. R. S. Burton was the Conductor. A curiosity in its way, the performance at Idle of Gounod's operetta "The Pet Dove," may be mentioned. The work seems to have secured some favour, not only here but at Gillington, near Bradford, where it was given a few weeks ago.

Another musical event worthy of note in connection with the Christmas Festival was the Leeds Parish Church Choristers' Concert, which took place early in January. The famous Choir, of which Dr. Creser has charge, produced on that occasion two of Dr. Stainer's works—"The morning stars" (anthem) and "The Daughter of Jairus." The performance was most acceptable. Dr. Creser interpreted the instrumental music with considerable effect.

Apart from events specially associated with Christmas, the month has been exceptionally quiet so far as Leeds is concerned. There have been several admirable concerts, some of which are worthy of notice in these columns. A Concert, given in aid of St. Matthew's Church, served to introduce, amongst other artists, Miss Eva Farbstein, a soprano of the Covent Garden Promenade Concerts, and a talented member of a well-known musical family in Leeds, Mr. Edgar Haddock, who played a couple of Paganini's studies. In the capacity of solo flautist Mr. Stainland Hall, too, created a favourable impression. Another Concert, the object of which was to aid the Jewish Free Schools in Leeds, was distinguished by the appearance of Miss Annie Albu, who has won much favour as a member of Carl Rosa's Opera Company. The second of the series of Popular Concerts, instituted for the benefit of the working population of Hunslet, took place on the 14th ult. The attendance was encouraging to the promoters of this new movement. The artists were Miss Hilda Coward, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Henry Guy, and Mr. Frank Elmore. Excellent assistance was afforded by a selected chorus, and Dr. Creser was the Conductor.

Romberg's "Lay of the Bell" was performed, on the 11th ult., by the Emmanuel Choral Society, which has made great musical progress within the comparatively short period of its existence.

On the 22nd ult. the second annual Subscription Concert of the Leeds Temperance Choral Society took place in the Victoria Hall. Gaul's Cantata "Ruth" constituted the first portion of the programme, the remainder being of a miscellaneous character. The Society has been in existence for three years, and has accomplished an enormous amount of work, chiefly in aid of the temperance cause.

The chief musical event of the month in Bradford was the fourth Subscription Concert, which took place on the 11th ult., when two more important works were added to the list of those which have been performed during the season. The announcement of Mr. Mackenzie's "Jason," coupled with Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night," was sufficient to secure a large audience. Few provincial towns could be better prepared than Bradford to appreciate the bold and independent spirit of Mr. Mackenzie's music. Here musical taste is essentially progressive, and does not stop at mere prettiness; and nothing could have tended better to foster the artistic instinct of the community than the course of instruction provided by the committee of these Concerts. The intellectual discernment and widened experience of the amateurs who filled the hall enabled them thoroughly to grasp the merits of construction and the strong individuality of the work. The performance was, in many respects, a masterly one. The Bradford Festival Choral Society did its work well in the choruses, and Mr. Hallé's band rendered the instrumental portion with admirable skill. There was, however, one drawback of an unavoidable character, in the fact that Mr. F. King, who was called upon to fill the part of Jason, was indisposed, and, consequently, was unable to deal satisfactorily with the highly-wrought baritone music. The performance of Miss Marriott in the part of Medea was dramatic and impressive, especially in the passionate duets for Jason and Medea. The music of Orpheus was sung by Mr. Lloyd, who was in excellent voice. Madame Armitage and Mr. Bridson were the remaining soloists. "Jason" was followed by an exceptionally fine rendering of the "Walpurgis Night," Madame Armitage, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Bridson being the soloists. Mr. Hallé conducted both performances with his accustomed good taste. The next Concert is fixed for the 8th inst. Miss Clara Samuëll, Miss Damian, Mr. Henry Guy, and Signor Foli; M. Pachmann and Mr. J. Hollman (violoncellist) are announced to appear.

Mr. Carrodus and a Concert Party appeared at the Bradford Mechanics' Institute, on the 17th ult. The eminent violinist is always sure of a hearty reception in his native county, and he was met by a crowded audience. His great command over the violin was displayed in Vieuxtemps's Reverie and Mendelssohn's Andante, which he played with great refinement; and again in Paganini's "Moto Perpetuo," his marvellous bowing and fingering elicited much applause. Mr. Herbert F. Sharpe, another Yorkshireman, also won much esteem by his artistic interpretation of several pianoforte pieces—an Impromptu (Op. 36) and a Scherzo (Op. 20) by Chopin, a Polonaise by Moszkowski, and a composition of his own. Apart from his excellent command over the keyboard, Mr. Sharpe gave proof of much intellectual power and grasp of subject. The vocalists were Miss Clara Leighton and Mr. Savage, and two clarinet solos were rendered by Mr. T. E. Turrell.

A scheme of considerable importance was launched on the 23rd ult., at Bradford, in the form of a series of chamber-concerts, for which the prices of admission are low and the artists local. The Bradford people have shown much appreciation for the chamber-music with which Mr. Hallé and his collaborateurs have occasionally supplied them, and, if only as an educational movement, the plan will doubtless be successful. The scheme has been conceived and carried into execution by Mr. J. Misdale, a talented local pianist, and the first concert, which took place on the day named, was full of encouragement. Mr. Misdale was assisted by Mr. W. Rees and Mr. A. Healy (violinists), Mr. T. Turner (viola soloist), Mr. W. B. Cross (violoncellist), and Miss Marshall (vocalist). The programme was of a superior character, including Prout's

Quintet for piano and strings; Rheinberger's Sonata for violin and pianoforte (Op. 77); Goltermann's Grand Duo for pianoforte and violoncello (Op. 15), and Pauer's Quartet for pianoforte and strings.

Several interesting events are announced for next month.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE Edinburgh Select Choir, under the conductorship of Mr. Henry Hartley, gave a Concert on the 29th December, in the Music Hall. The Choir sings with a considerable measure of refinement and taste, the greatest successes of the Concert being Hatton's "Stars of the summer night," Sir R. P. Stewart's version of Knyvett's old three-part glee, "The Bells of St. Michael's Tower," and Mr. F. Archer's skilful arrangement of "Corn Rigs," originally written for the Glasgow Select Choir by Mr. Archer, while he was conductor of it.

A Choral Union Orchestral Concert took place on the 9th ult.—Beethoven's "Coriolan" Overture, so seldom heard, was the opening number. The Symphony was to have been Schumann's No. 2 in C major, but from a change in the programme, to which I shall immediately refer, the Schubert MS. Symphony, No. 7, in E, completed by Mr. J. F. Barnett, was substituted for it, and was much appreciated. Another important selection was Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's ballad for orchestra "La Belle Dame sans Merci," which met with a hearty reception, the great merit of the work being warmly acknowledged. Signor Piatti, who regularly comes to Edinburgh for the annual Concert of the Philosophical Institution, made his first appearance at an orchestral concert on this occasion. Signor Piatti intended to play in a Concertino of his own, but substituted a Concerto by Rubinstein, a somewhat heavy work, which failed to command sustained attention and interest. This change in the programme suggested another, as above alluded to, namely, the Schubert for the Schumann Symphony, so that there might not be two rather weighty works on the same evening. Miss Hilda Coward was the vocalist on this occasion, and though her voice is not always at perfect command, a highly legitimate success was achieved, chiefly in Bishop's old-fashioned but tuneful song "Lo, here the gentle lark."

On the 14th ult., the sixth of the series of Choral Union Orchestral Concerts took place. The programme comprised Sir G. A. Macfarren's Overture to his "King David," Beethoven's Symphony, Op. 60, in B flat, two excerpts from "Tristan and Isolde," and instrumental selections from Félicien David's Symphonic Ode, "The Desert." Mr. Edward Lloyd was the vocalist of the evening, and he has seldom sung here with greater acceptance. Probably Mr. Lloyd's greatest success was with Sir Herbert Oakeley's air "Ad Amore," which he had to repeat.

A Chamber Concert was given by Mr. Waddell on Saturday afternoon, the 12th ult. Herr F. Blume and Mr. Colin Mackenzie joined respectively in a duet for piano and violin, Schumann's Fantasiestucke, Op. 73. Mr. Waddell gave Handel's Sonata in A, while Mozart's Quartet, No. 7, in D, was among the concerted selections, the whole tone of the Concert being one of refinement and grace, both as to selection and execution.

The next Choral Union Concert to be recorded, on the 16th ult., was entirely choral. Handel's "Ode for St. Cecilia's Day" and Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's "Jason" were the works performed, a great contrast in style, surely. Mr. Edward Lloyd and Mrs. Hutchinson took the solos in Handel's Ode in a way that left nothing to be wished for; and the orchestral performers played their comparatively simple music well, but the Union was not very successful with the choruses. Mr. Mackenzie's "Jason" was included in the scheme on its own merits doubtless, but also from a desire, one may be sure, to do honour to a musician whose fame is shedding lustre on his native city. Unfortunately the performance of the Cantata was not taken all round, at all equal to the praiseworthy intention of the Union. The choruses were for the most part indifferently executed, and the important part of Medea found a rather inadequate representative in the skilful, but vocally insufficiently powerful, artist, Mrs. Hutchinson, who essayed it. It is a pity that the Cantata, which may be said to have first revealed the strong dramatic instinct of the composer, should not have been better presented, but sufficient evidence was given of the remarkable power in the work, and it was well received. Mr. Collinson conducted throughout the evening with care and skill.

Dr. William Spark, of Leeds, has been lecturing in the city and neighbourhood. One of his lectures was entitled "The Vocal Music of the Victorian Era," and another "Music, Old and New—Sebastian Bach to Gounod." In the latter, the Leeds Organist somewhat oracularly gave his opinion of the great French composer's sacred Oratorio "The Redemption."

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE advent of the New Year, as English readers of THE MUSICAL TIMES doubtless know, is the leading holiday season in Scotland, in place of Christmas. In towns, however, the observance of Christmas is decidedly creeping in, exchange of illuminated cards, family gatherings and kindly greetings being nearly as common on the one occasion as the other. Services of sacred music in churches, or meetings for worship, are begun to be held, though as yet only in an indicative sense. Last Christmas the day was observed by service in the Cathedral as well as at one or two other leading, or as it might be put, more advanced Presbyterian Churches, while, of course, there was worship in all the Episcopalian congregations. In Queen's Park United Presbyterian (Dissenting) Church, a Concert of Sacred Music was given, on the evening of Christmas day, when Gade's Cantata "Christmas Eve," and Gounod's "Troisième Messe Solennelle (De Paques)," were performed, the latter, it is believed, for the first time in Scotland. The occasion might have been better selected in regard to Gounod's new mass, but there can be no question as to the favourable reception of the music, which indeed, proved of so attractive a character that it is sure to become a favourite with Societies. It, as also Gade's Cantata, was excellently interpreted by the Musical Association of the Church, under the bâton of Mr. W. T. Hoeck, Organist to the congregation. Dr. A. L. Peace ably officiated at the organ.

For a number of years past, and as one of its series of winter Concerts, the Glasgow Choral Union has been in the habit of giving a performance of Handel's Oratorio "The Messiah," on the forenoon of New Year's Day. On the 1st ult. the customary performance of Handel's masterpiece took place in presence of a very large audience. The principal vocalists were Miss Clara Samuëll, Madame Patey, Mr. Barton McGuckin, and Mr. Frederic King. The Chorus, as usual, at the holiday season, was somewhat under its ordinary strength, but sang, nevertheless, with power and impressiveness. The band accompaniments were satisfactory as usual; Dr. Peace presided at the organ, and Mr. Manns conducted. The arrangement of the platform, it may here be observed, is not all that could be desired for choral performances, the tenors, for instance, being in some measure separated from the basses by the organ, obtruding a good way forward into the orchestra. It is to be hoped that some improvement will ere long be effected in this matter. On the evening of New Year's Day a concert took place of popular orchestral selections.

The Ballet airs from Mr. Mackenzie's "Colomba" were among the most delightful numbers presented at the Saturday night Orchestral Concert of the 5th ult. The execution of the clever and tuneful music was all that could be wished for. Signor Gabriele played some pianoforte solos, and with fair success, albeit his style needs toning down.

At the Choral Union Subscription Orchestral Concert, on the 10th ult., were played the MS. Symphony by Schubert (completed by Mr. Barnett), and Mr. Mackenzie's Ballade for orchestra, "La Belle Dame sans Merci." The Schubert Symphony was naturally of extreme interest to the audience, the composer's works being held in enthusiastic admiration in Glasgow. The old beauties as well as the old faults of Schubert were noticeable. Mr. Mackenzie's music met with a very hearty reception, its grace of melody and masterly orchestral scoring being at once perceived by an audience eminently capable of the appreciation of what is really good in the art. Signor Piatti played at this Concert—this being his first appearance in Glasgow for many years. To most of the audience, therefore, the eminent violoncellist was a stranger. Needless to say that he delighted every one by his purity of style and grace and skill of interpretation. Signor Piatti was, however, somewhat unfortunate in his selection of the Rubinstein Concerto in place of his own Concertino as originally intended, the Russian composer's music proving diffuse and often dull, and failing to rouse much enthusiasm.

Berlioz's music is a great source of attraction to Glasgow people, who, if really keen and discriminating, are yet a little fond of the sensational. There was an unusually large audience at the Saturday Popular Orchestral Concert on the 12th ult., attracted doubtless chiefly by the performance of the "Symphonie Fantastique" of the great, if eccentric, French composer.

The seventh Concert of the Choral Union series took place on the 15th ult., and may be described as choro-orchestral. A very successful performance was given of Félicien David's picturesque Symphonic Ode "The Desert." The choruses were sung by the gentlemen of the Society, and Mr. Edward Lloyd took the tenor solos. Miss Amy Baynam read the text. The Ode is highly interesting and effective. It was performed on this occasion, without doubt, for the first time in Scotland in its entirety. Now that it is published with an English translation, "The Desert" should be highly popular in British concert-rooms.

A splendid performance of Gounod's great sacred work "The Redemption" followed on Thursday of the same week. Writing elsewhere of the Oratorio itself in 1882, before it had been heard at all, and from the score, I said: "If we may feel a little disappointed at the comparatively subordinate position of the voices, and may find but little of the traditional mode of treatment of great sacred compositions, we shall undoubtedly have compensation in increased richness and grace—possibly in greater naturalness, and on the whole, in what we believe to be purer and higher art." I believe Gounod's music to be, in fact, at the very least, an example of great importance of what sacred music should be, and, with thousands more in this country who have heard the Oratorio performed, I have since had no occasion to alter that opinion. This second performance in Glasgow of "The Redemption" arose from a very generally expressed desire last year to hear the work again, and we could not imagine a more perfect interpretation than on the present occasion. The choruses were rendered with exceeding nobility, refinement, and accuracy, the accompaniments were played with grace and verve, and the solo portions, in the competent hands of Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Santley, and Mrs. Hutchinson, were, as they could not fail to be, most successfully executed. The Oratorio again created a deep impression, and there was a very large audience.

The remaining arrangements for the month included the appearance of M. de Pachmann, the distinguished pianist, on the 22nd, and Herr Hugo Heermann, violinist, on the 29th; also, and very particularly, on the 31st Berlioz's "Messe des Morts," the latter important event too late to be noticed in this issue.

MUSIC IN ABERDEEN.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE musical public of the Granite City enjoyed a distinct and to them altogether novel treat in the Concert by the Glasgow Choral Union Orchestra, under the conductorship of Mr. Manns, in the Music Hall, on Wednesday, the 23rd ult. In respect of instrumental music, there is, it may be noted, an amateur Society in the town of considerable ability, studying and occasionally giving performances of the best works; but the present was the first occasion of the visit of a completely equipped professional orchestra of standing—at least, within the last twenty-five years—and therefore an event of no small importance. The Concert was opened with the Overture to "Oberon," brilliantly played; and subsequently were given the Overtures to "William Tell" and "Tannhäuser." The former of these was intensely enjoyed, probably because of its familiarity; the latter seemed not to be equally acceptable, no doubt because it was imperfectly understood. One of the journals of the city, in its critique of the Concert, makes the curious mistake of saying that the march in the opera (that at the Tournament of song, it is to be presumed) was a familiar feature in the Overture. The Symphony was Beethoven's No. 7 in A. To many of the audience so lengthy a work of abstract character could not but prove rather wearisome; but, on the other hand, to those present of the cognoscenti of the city, the splendid interpretation of Beethoven's Symphony would be an unusual treat. Among the lighter selections were the Love Duet from "The Olden Time" Suite by Cowen and the "Ballet of the Hours" from Ponchielli's "Gioconda." Miss Damian contributed vocal solos. The hall was completely full, and there can be no doubt that the Orchestra will now be annually called to the Good City in the North, which rejoices also in the pleasantly suggestive name of "Bon Accord."

MUSIC IN BRUSSELS.

January 20, 1884.

THE most important musical event of the month has been the performance, at La Monnaie Theatre, of "Sigurd," an opera in four acts, the poem by Messrs. Du Locle and Blau, and the music by M. Ernest Reyer, the well-known composer, and still better known critic, of the Journal des Débats. The success of the opera, which, though brought out for the first time on the 7th inst., was finished some eighteen years ago, proved fully equal to the great expectations it had aroused. Whether "Sigurd," or otherwise "Siegfried," is to be ranked amongst operas or musical dramas, remains open to discussion. Followers of Meyerbeer, as well as proselytes of Wagner, will doubtless recognise in "Sigurd" the influence of these composers, yet we are not far from the truth when we assert that the librettists fashioned the legend after the requirements of the Paris Grand Opera, while the composer, in writing the music, had in view the free ideal of the new school. The weak point of "Sigurd" is unquestionably the old fashioned and stagey form of the libretto. Messrs. Du Locle and Blau endeavoured to make prominent the fairy side of the legend rather than to throw light upon the deep meaning of it, and have ministered more to the satisfaction of opera-goers, thirsty after rich decorations and electric light, and horses and young danseuses, than to the severe taste of those who, while not admitting all the Wagnerian theories, have fully understood the great lesson taught by the deceased master. The "Niebelungen," after the tetralogy of Wagner, have been made so familiar to all who take an interest in musical matters, that it would be quite useless to relate here the deeds of Siegfried at the Court of Gunther, and the tragical death of the hero by the hand of Hagen. Some musical critics, especially of the Parisian press, have pointed out a certain relationship in Reyer's "Sigurd" to Weber's operas, and particularly to "Euryanthe." We think these critics are entirely on the wrong side of the question. M. Reyer is not a servile follower of Weber, any more than he is of Wagner or of Berlioz, who was his intimate friend, and who owes much of his renown to the affectionate devotion of Reyer. To find in "Sigurd" things that are to be met with in "Euryanthe," in "Lohengrin," in the "Prophet," or in the "Damnation of Faust," is not enough to tax a composer with plagiarisms. In truth, though not devoid of faults, the most noticeable of which is a certain tendency to lengthen out the situations, "Sigurd" has a fair claim to be ranked amongst the best operas of late years, and to be called, perhaps, the most powerful opera of the French stage. The Belgian papers have announced that Mr. Gye has expressed his intention of making the audience of Covent Garden acquainted with "Sigurd" during the coming season. If this be true, we have but to congratulate Mr. Gye upon his excellent choice. The performance of M. Reyer's difficult music went without a single hitch, owing to the clever conductorship of M. Dupont, and to the intelligence and goodwill of the interpreters, Mesdames Caron, Bosman,

Next to "Sigurd," the attention of music-lovers has been attracted by the first Popular Concert of Classical Music, given on Sunday, the 12th ult., at La Monnaie Theatre, under the direction of M. Dupont. Meyerbeer's interesting music to "Struensee," which had not been heard in Brussels these twenty years, formed the first part of the programme, the most important items of the second part being Max Bruch's Violin Concerto in G minor and M. Erasme Raway's new Symphonic poem "Les Adieux," Bruch's Concerto, as well as three less important numbers, were interpreted by M. Franz Ondricek, a violinist not wholly unknown to the London public—as he played two years ago at one of Mr. Ganz's Concerts; although not yet perfect, the young artist is possessed of some startling qualities which perhaps in a very few years will make him fully worthy of the high praise that German critics have already lavishly bestowed upon him. As regards M. Raway's Symphonic Poem, we must acknowledge the skill and the powerful conception of the Belgian composer, already well-known abroad by his "Scenes Hindones," but we must say that, let M. Raway call his work as he pleases, it belongs really to descriptive music, and the absence of a programme puts the hearer in the condition of being unable to catch the unity and the real meaning of his composition.

The "Union Instrumentale" has given two of its interesting and successful Monday Concerts, the first one being devoted to Mendelssohn, the second to Beethoven. At the third Concert Mozart's compositions will form the programme.

A new opera, by M. Godard, held by many as the leading composer of the rising artists in France, has been announced for production on the 21st inst., at Antwerp, and a new opera by the Belgian composer Franz Servais, son of the great violoncellist, and godson of Liszt, has been selected for performance at La Monnaie Theatre next winter. M. Reyer is giving the last touches to his "Salambo," and M. Gevaert, the principal of the Conservatoire of Brussels, and the learned author of "La musique dans l'antiquité," is said to be writing a grand opera in three acts and ten scenes, to words by Messrs. Blau and De Grammont. The title will be "Pertinax, Empereur d'Orient." These facts tend to show that operatic music has still a powerful charm to the musicians of the present day.

MUSIC IN AMERICA.

New York, January 8, 1884.

At the Metropolitan Opera House, since my last letter, there have been increasingly good performances of "Don Giovanni," with Mesdames Sembrich, Zerlina; Fursch-Madi, Donna Anna; and Nilsson, Donna Elvira; and representations of "Mefistofele" with the following cast: Faust, Signor Campanini; Mefistofele, Signor Mirabella; Marta and Pantalis, Madame Trebelli; Margherita and Helen of Troy, Madame Christine Nilsson. The experiment of lowering the orchestra at this house has, I believe, been permanently abandoned.

The chief event of Mr. Abbey's season has been the first production in this country of "La Gioconda," with the following cast: La Gioconda, Madame Nilsson; La Cieca, Madame Scalchi; Laura, Madame Fursch-Madi; Enzo, Signor Stagno; Alvise, Signor Novara; Barnaba, Signor del Puente. The work was cordially welcomed; and, partly from the general excellence of the cast and the very lavish and sumptuous manner of production in the way of mounting, &c., was received on the opening night with warm demonstrations of applause. The members of the company were anxious, and even nervous, over the first performance, a state of mind which will perhaps account for the necessity of remarking a want of dramatic force in Madame Nilsson. The critics are distinctly favourable to the work. Perhaps the most moderate being those who have least confidence in their own powers of judgment.

The season at the Metropolitan Opera House has now closed, but Mr. Abbey will give two extra performances, at which "Carmen" will be performed for the first time, with Madame Trebelli in the principal part.

Mr. Mapleson resumed his season on the last night of the year, producing during the week "Aida," with Madame Patti; "L'Elisir d'Amore"; "Crispino è la Comare," in which Madame Patti had one of her peculiar triumphs, and "Faust," which Madame Gerster alone made interesting. He has also essayed to repeat the attraction which "Semiramide" so fortunately added to his season last winter, but the effort was fruitless without Madame Scalchi. Mr. Abbey has in fact, as has been said, a "corner" in operatic contralti.

Mr. Mapleson has made a reduction of prices for seats. For the Patti nights the last four rows in the balcony will be sold for three dollars a seat instead of five dollars, and all the seats in the mezzanine circle at three dollars instead of four dollars. The prices for performances in which Madame Patti does not appear are as follows: Family circle (top gallery) admission fifty cents, reserved seats one dollar. General admission (to all parts of the house, without seat) one dollar fifty cents; mezzanine circle and last four rows in the balcony, two dollars; parquette and first four rows in the balcony, three dollars; mezzanine boxes, ten dollars; other boxes thirty dollars to forty dollars, according to location. Your readers can roughly translate this by calling twenty-five cents a shilling—four shillings to a dollar.

Mr. Abbey's Sunday Evening Concerts have twice presented, as a first part, Rossini's "Stabat Mater," somewhat cut, and rather carelessly sung by his artists.

On December 19 the New York Chorus Society, under Mr. Theodore Thomas, gave its first Concert, with imposing effect, before a large audience. The programme was the March and Chorus from "Tannhäuser," "Hail, bright abode"; Beethoven's Second Symphony; and Parts II. and III. of Schumann's Scenes from Goethe's "Faust."

Orchestral music is plentiful. I note a few important programmes. At the second Concert of the Symphony Society the following works were performed:—

- Tchaikowsky—Symphony in C (new, first time).
- Bach, J. S.—Prelude, Adagio and Gavotte, scored for string orchestra by S. Bachrich (first time).
- Mendelssohn.—Entire music to Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream" for orchestra, female voices, and solos.

At the Philharmonic Society's second Concert the programme was thus composed:—

- Symphony in F, Op. 9 .....Hermann Goetz
- Concerto, E flat, Op. 73 .....Beethoven
- Mr. Carl Baermann.
- Symphony No. 4, D minor, Op. 120 .....Schumann

Mr. Baermann confirmed the good impression produced by his performance of the same work in Brooklyn, of which I wrote at the time.

The second of the Brooklyn Orchestral Matinées (the annex to the Philharmonic course) had the following model of a "light" programme:—

- Overture—"Jubilee".....Weber
- Andante from "Surprise" Symphony .....Haydn
- Ballet Music—"Feramors" .....Rubinstein
- Symphonic Poem—"Danse Macabre" .....Saint-Saëns
- Overture—"Merry Wives of Windsor".....Nicolaï
- "Ave Maria" .....Bach-Gounod
- Waltz—"Village Swallows".....Jos. Strauss
- Introduction } "Lohengrin".....Wagner
- Nuptial Chorus } March Movement

Several ladies of New York have organised a series of Afternoon Concerts for children, at which music suited to their comprehension, but fit for refining and improving taste, will be given. Mr. Thomas has the direction.

The Buffalo (New York) Musical Festival Association has chosen Theodore Thomas as Director-in-chief of the festival to be held in that city next June. By the terms of his contract he is to furnish his orchestra, the artists, Materna, Winkelmann, and Scaria, Emily Wynant, Theodore Tødt, Franz Remmert, and a solo artist whose name is not made public. The only work yet selected for the performance is "Elijah," but it is intended to have programmes of musical importance, though popular in character. A guarantee fund of 22,000 dollars has already been secured. The engagement of the German singers mentioned, for an American tour under Mr. Thomas, has doubtless become known to you.

"The Messiah" has been given more frequently than in any former year. Beside the performance by the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, of which I have written, the work was given by the Oratorio Society of New York, in Christmas week, with Madame Trebelli, and in the Suburban City of Newark by the Harmonic Society. In Boston the Handel and Haydn Society, under Mr. Carl Zerrahn, gave it on Christmas night. In Philadelphia, it was performed, on December 20, by the St. Cecilia Society. In Cincinnati, the May Festival Choir sang it under Mr. Theodore Thomas, on December 27, and the following evening it was produced in St. Louis, by the St. Louis Choral Society, with the same Conductor.

The third Concert of the Symphony Society offered the following programme—the Volkmann work in memoriam :—

Cavatina from "Der Freischütz".....	Weber
	Mrs. Georg Henschel.
Overture, "Ossian".....	Gade
	Widor, Mendelssohn, Henschel
	Mrs. Henschel.
Symphony, D minor.....	Volkmann

Though Gade's work was given without the harp, the performance on the whole was very creditable. The Mozart Symphony was beautifully played, and Mrs. Henschel sang admirably.

Comic opera shows no sign of failure in New York, and is now drawing large audiences to four theatres. Mr. Grau's French company is at Mr. Haverly's Comedy Theatre; at the new Bijou a much diluted "Orpheus and Eurydice" succeeds chiefly by power of the spectacle; at the Casino the "Beggars' Opera" is still steadily running; while Suppé's "Afrikareise" has made an instant success at the Thalia, a large and handsome German Theatre in the lower part of the town.

Madame Helen Hopekirk, a Scottish pianoforte player, has made an excellent beginning in two Recitals given at Steinway Hall. The second Recital was attended by an audience four or five times larger than the first one. The best judges are those who speak best of Mdme. Hopekirk's performances.

Musical art in America has lost one of its greatest friends by the death at Davos of Mr. Julius Hallgarten. Mr. Hallgarten was for some time President of the Philharmonic Society, and was a most sincere, intelligent, though modest, supporter of all good art, musical or other. Being a man of large fortune, he employed it most generously at the dictates of his sound judgment and good taste. If possible, he cared more for art in America than for art merely, being in spite of his foreign birth a thorough American, and loving to contribute in every way to the art development of his own city of New York.

"THE REDEMPTION" IN AUSTRALIA.

"No work of modern times has caused so widespread an interest as this latest production of the great French composer Gounod," says the Age, of Melbourne; and truly its performance, for the first time in Australia, on the 27th November, 1883, by the Melbourne Philharmonic Society, at the Town Hall, appears to have been as great a triumph as any we have yet recorded. The room was crowded to its utmost limits, many of the audience having to be content with standing-room only during the entire evening; and numbers were unable to gain admission at all. Of the general effect of the Oratorio, the paper already quoted says:—

"Taken as a whole there is a glow of religious fervour throughout the work that makes itself felt, while the command of harmonic combinations and orchestral resources possessed by the composer allows him to express his thoughts freely, and gives him every opportunity of making new and startling effects."

The Daily Telegraph tells us that, in deference to the sacred character of the work, not a sound was heard during its performance, but at the termination "a spontaneous cheer burst forth from those present." The following, from the same paper, proves that the purely orchestral movements received due recognition, as well as those in combination with the voices:—

"The commencement of the prologue—the instrumental description of chaos—beginning very softly in the open key, followed by gently-swelling chromatic chords and then by an ascending chromatic lead of flutes and clarinets, taken up by the strings in reverse motion, is a most peculiar and effective piece of tone painting. So, also, is the orchestral representation of the darkness which covered the face of the earth from the sixth till the ninth hour on the Crucifixion Day, the music being weird-like, thrilling, and awe-inspiring. Again the representation of the earthquake which followed the death of Jesus, given by full orchestra and organ, forte-fortissimo, is terribly grand in its effect."

The Argus, in a glowing notice, says, alluding to Handel's "Messiah":—

"It was thought by many that the subject had been finally treated by Handel, but after hearing 'The Redemption' of Gounod it was acknowledged with gratitude and reverence that the resources of musical art are inexhaustible, and that the work of the living composer is an inspiration of the most exalted type, to be instantly recognised wherever heard, and treasured ever after."

And thus does justice to the numbers representing the "going up to Calvary":—

"Here is a whole musical play in itself. We cannot dwell upon minute description of the scenes enumerated, but we may speak of the general effect. Whatever of the pomp of cruelty could be expressed in music is here, in condensed and crystalline form. The music is hard and bright and glittering. It is actually so written that the players have to tear it out of their various instruments. It is majestic on account of the force which pervades it. It is pompous in rhythm, and most cruel in expression, when there is considered who was the central suffering figure in that memorable march. The wail of compassionate women, heard in startling contrast with the proud progress of the march, gives such an air of vitality to the scene that the imagination is greatly roused, and the history of a day two thousand years past seems to live in the mind of him who listens. Since the time when Mendelssohn wrote his 'Baal scenes' in the 'Elijah' nothing so dramatic in effect as this has been heard."

The Melbourne World says:—

"It would be interesting to compare 'The Redemption' with others of a similar nature, such as the Passion music of Bach, or with the other religious compositions of Gounod himself, although this could add nothing to the pleasure derivable from hearing the work itself. From the first note in the prologue to the last of the third part the attention is enchained and held captive under the impressions wrought by the music. It is conceived broadly, and laid out on a scale befitting the importance of the subject."

The success of the work seems to have been so decisive that there can be little doubt of its speedy repetition; and one paper expresses a hope that in a few years it may be performed "in the new Cathedral of the Church of England."

THE NEW ORGAN IN WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

AFTER an absence of a year, the Abbey organ is now being re-erected at the two extremities of the screen, having been completely rebuilt and enlarged by Messrs. W. Hill and Son, so that the instrument, when finished, may be regarded as being, in nearly all respects, a new one, retaining only the thirty-two feet pedal pipes and others made originally either by Messrs. Hill or Schreider. In completeness of mechanical contrivances of all kinds, the rebuilt organ will have few, if any, rivals in this country. The organist will be seated at a separate console in the centre of the screen, from which he can, with ease, obtain a view of his choir below, while the various organs are distributed in different places N. and S. of him, but so arranged that he can hear the full effect of each manual to great advantage. All connections between the console and the sound-boards, as regards draw-stops, manuals, and pedals, are by means of tubular pneumatic action.

There are eight reservoirs in immediate connection with the sound-boards, receiving wind at various pressures from the main bellows, situated in a vault in the cloisters, and driven by a gas engine. The air from these bellows is conveyed into the Abbey by three iron pipes, passing under ground, and extending to a distance of about sixty feet.

The topmost canopies of the cases, N. and S. will, when complete, reach to the triforium of the church, and so give a dignity to the instrument that was sadly lacking in the external appearance of the old organ; but for the present no cases will be provided, the Chapter having expended all available funds upon the mechanism and pipes, while several private individuals have also most generously contributed considerable sums with a like object. The Chapter have, therefore, appealed to the public for subscriptions for the cases, which, as designed by Mr. J. L. Pearson, R.A., will be appropriately fine, and will cost, at least, £1,500. It is greatly to be hoped that their appeal will not be in vain.

The following is the scheme of stops as now carried out. The organ will be, we are told, ready for use by Easter:—

There are but two other organs in England which contain a thirty-two feet pedal reed of metal, these being the instruments at Sheffield Town Hall, and at Regent's Park (lately the property of Mr. N. J. Holmes).

At the recent Examinations for Degrees in Music at the University of London—the examiners being Dr. John Stainer, M.A., and Dr. William Pole, F.R.S.—two candidates were passed for the degree of Bachelor of Music, namely, Mr. Augustus Hayter Walker and Mr. Ebenezer Goold, the latter gentleman having previously obtained the same degree at Dublin. For the Intermediate Examination in Music, the Examiners in Physics also assisted, and six candidates were passed—viz., First Class, Mr. Ernest George Binkes and Mr. Harry Colin Miller; Second Class, Mr. Francis Lyon Cohen, Miss Kate K. Moakes, Mr. Williamson John Reynolds, and Mr. Thomas Richard Ryder, B.A. Miss Moakes is the first lady who has aspired to a musical degree; and although she only obtained, on the whole range of subjects, a second class place, we understand that the strictly musical part of her examination was considered very satisfactory.

The Prince of Wales has again consented to act as President of the 21st Triennial Norfolk and Norwich Musical Festival. The music selected for performance is "Elijah," "The Redemption," "The Rose of Sharon," (an Oratorio composed expressly for the Festival by Mr. A. C. Mackenzie), "The Messiah," and a Cantata composed by Mr. Villiers Stanford for the occasion. A new composition by Mr. Randegger, the Conductor, is also expected.

THE prospectus of the Philharmonic Society for the present season announces six Concerts at St. James's Hall, commencing on Thursday, the 21st inst. Beethoven will be represented by his Symphonies Nos. 2 and 3 (the "Eroica"), and by his "Leonora" (No. 3) and "Egmont" Overtures; Mendelssohn by his "Italian" Symphony and "Melusina" Overture; Spohr by his fourth Symphony (popularly known as "The Power of Sound") and "Jesonda" Overture; Mozart by his "Zauberflöte" Overture; Schumann by his "Genoveva" Overture; Wagner by his Overtures to "Der fliegende Holländer" and "Die Meistersinger;" Sterndale Bennett by his Fantaisie Overture "Paradise and the Peri;" Goldmark by his "Sakuntala" Overture; and Liszt by his "Rhapsodie Hongroise in F." Amongst the interesting novelties will be the Symphony in D, and a new Overture ("Husitzka") by Herr Antonin Dvorák, a new Symphony by Mr. Frederic H. Cowen, and an "Idyll for Orchestra" by Dr. Ferdinand von Hiller, all of which will be conducted by the respective composers. It is also hoped that a new work by Signor Bottesini, a new Vocal Scena by Mr. A. Goring Thomas, and Brahms's first Symphony may be produced. The vocalists for the first three Concerts will be Madame Patey, Miss Griswold (of the Grand Opera, Paris), Mr. Winch (his first appearance), and Mr. Maas; and negotiations have been entered into with Madame Albani, Mr. Santley, and other eminent singers. Engagements have been made, or are pending, with Madame Sofie Menter, Madame Essipoff, Miss Clara Asher, Dr. Hans von Bülow, Signor Pirani, Señor Sarasate, Herr Wilhelmj, Mr. Carrodus, Signor Bottesini, and other celebrated instrumentalists. The following artists have consented to act as Honorary Conductors: MM. John Francis Barnett, Frederic H. Cowen, George Mount, and C. Villiers Stanford. So attractive a season's programme must assuredly most powerfully appeal not only to the well-wishers of the Society, but to all genuine lovers of high-class music.

RESPECTING the recent resignation of Dr. Spark, as organist of St. George's, Leeds, we read the following in the Yorkshire Post of the 14th ult.: "It may be stated that it is just 34 years ago when a very young man, Dr. Spark, came to Leeds to accept the proffered appointment of organist of St. George's Church. The choir of the church was then and for many subsequent years in the gallery, immediately in front of the organ, and it is no exaggeration to say that with the superior leading singers no better Church singing could be heard in the county. Dr. Spark was urged and encouraged to write new anthems, services, kyries, hymn tunes, and chants; and altogether, with the vicar, wardens, congregation, organist, and choir, there was an esprit de corps which made this church the envy of some and the pride of many. Subsequently the choir was removed downstairs, surpliced, and the singers were placed near the pulpit, and the organ was allowed to remain in its old place in the gallery—a fatal mistake, in the opinion of Dr. Spark, in a dead church with a flat roof and no resonance—the result being that the singing often has been out of time and unsatisfactory. A short time ago the organ was repaired and put in order, but the organist's pew was at the same time so reduced in size and comfort that Dr. Spark has for this and other reasons given in his resignation."

At the half-yearly examination held at the College of Organists, on the 8th, 9th, and 10th ult., the following gentlemen obtained Association: J. H. Anger, Frenchay, Bristol; C. M. Bill, Swansea; F. Broad, Notting Hill; J. C. Clarke, Walsall; A. E. Daniel, Aston; A. W. Dolby, Chester; B. Parsons, Stroud; H. D. Phillips, Kensington; W. E. Pitman, Lewisham; T. Russe, Tiverton; W. H. Speer, Great Malvern; C. Wilkes, Brixton; W. A. Wood, Sowerby Bridge; and the following gentlemen Fellowship: F. N. Baxter, Tetbury; G. A. Higgs, Streatham; W. A. Jefferson, Leeds; H. Riding, Loughton; E. Slater, Taunton; J. F. Slater, Oldham; J. E. West, Hackney. On the morning of the 11th the diplomas were presented to the successful candidates by Dr. Hopkins, of the Temple Church, at a largely attended meeting held at the College. The examiners were Dr. Bridge, Dr. C. J. Frost, Dr. Gladstone, Dr. Martin, Mr. James Higgs, Mus. Bac., and Mr. Thomas Wingham.

AN Evening Concert was given before a crowded audience on Friday, the 18th ult., at Marlborough Place Lecture Hall, St. John's Wood. The vocal portion of the programme, which included the trio from Bennett's "May Queen," was ably sustained by Mrs. F. G. Edwards, Miss Evelyn Gibson, Miss Hellis, Mr. Alfred J. Mayers, and Mr. T. S. Hamilton, all of whom gave great satisfaction in their respective songs. Miss Ida Audain (a pupil of Mr. John Thomas) played two harp solos with artistic finish and skill; and Miss Evelyn Gibson contributed to the success of the evening by her excellent performances on the violin. A special feature of the Concert was Handel's so-called "Largo," but which is really an air from his opera of "Serse," or "Xerxes," composed in 1737, arranged by Hellmesberger for solo violin, harp, organ (on this occasion replaced by harmonium and two violoncellos), and (four) ripieno violins, which proved a very effective combination, and which received a careful rendering. Haydn's popular Kinder-Symphonie, for strings and toy instruments, concluded an interesting and varied programme. Mr. F. G. Edwards, in addition to accompanying all the vocal music and taking the harmonium part in the "Largo," played two pianoforte sketches by Mr. J. F. Barnett.

A SERIES of twelve representations of German Opera is announced to be given at the Theatre Royal, Covent Garden, during the months of June and July, under the direction of Herr Hermann Franke, and the conductorship of Herr Hans Richter. The répertoire, from which a selection will be made during the season, includes Wagner's "Flying Dutchman," "Lohengrin," "Tannhäuser," "Meistersinger," and "Tristan und Isolde"; Stanford's "Savonarola"; Liszt's "Die heilige Elisabeth"; Weber's "Der Freischütz," and "Euryanthe"; and Beethoven's "Fidelio." Negotiations are pending with Madame Albani, Madame Pauline Lucca, and the most eminent artists of the principal German Opera Houses. The orchestra will be that of the Royal Italian Opera. The performances will take place on the Wednesdays and Fridays in each week, commencing on Wednesday, June 4, and ending on Friday, July 11.

A successful performance of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" was given by the South London Choral Association on Friday evening last, the 25th ult., at the Institute of Music, Camberwell. The choruses were sung throughout with great precision, but the Symphony and orchestral accompaniments, though upon the whole creditably performed, were not without faults. The principal soloists were Madame Worrell and Mr. Henry Parkin. The second portion of the programme included the "Allegro Molto e Vivace" from Beethoven's First Symphony, De Beriot's Concerto for violin and orchestra, No. 7 (the solo being cleverly played by Mr. T. E. Gatehouse), and the first performance of a well-written Ave Maria for tenor solo, chorus, and orchestra, by Mr. W. S. Lambert, who was recalled to the platform on the termination of his work, which he conducted. Mr. L. Venables conducted with his accustomed efficiency.

AT St. John's, Red Lion Square, the Christmas Services commenced with a Carol Service on the eve of the Festival, at 8 p.m., the selections being chiefly taken from Bramley and Stainer's book; Barnby's Carol, "'Twas in the winter," being sung to the arrangement for men's voices. In addition, Gounod's "Bethlehem," Farmer's "Through the Empyrean," and Sullivan's "It came upon the midnight clear," were well sung. On the day of the Festival the "Te Deum" was Smart in F and the Anthem Stainer's "O Zion that bringest," his music in A being used for the Communion. The Evensong Canticles were Langdon's setting in E flat. The Organist, Mr. C. J. Viner, was assisted by a string orchestra.

THE Leytonstone Choral Society gave its first Concert of the present season, at the Lecture Hall, on Tuesday evening, the 15th ult. The programme included Mendelssohn's hymn for contralto solo and chorus, "Lord, bow down Thine ear," Leslie's "Resurgam," Gounod's "Ave Verum," and several part-songs. The choir, under Mr. Ulyett, fully sustained its reputation. The soloists were Miss Bessie Diamond, Miss Marion Blair, Mr. C. Chilley, and Mr. Bantock Pierpoint. Miss Dakin presided at the pianoforte.

AT St. Anne's Church, Hoxton, on Christmas Day, there were two early celebrations of the Holy Communion, without music; and at 11 o'clock, after the "Pastoral Symphony" had been played by the organist, and a Processional Hymn sung, full choral Matins was held, with Festal Responses, and chants selected from the "Cathedral Psalter." This was followed at noon by a full choral celebration of the Holy Communion, the music being a Plain Song setting by Walton, of Bradford. Gounod's "Nazareth" was sung as an Introit, the precentor, Mr. E. Puttock, taking the solo. The sermon was preached by the Rev. W. M. Puttock, Vicar, and the musical arrangements were under the direction of Mr. George Dixon, the Organist and Choirmaster. On the following Sunday, after full choral Evensong, a selection of Carols, including "Nazareth," was sung before a crowded congregation.

THE Dedication Festival at St. Paul's Cathedral was held on the 25th ult. The selection from Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," first introduced at the Festival of 1873, was again performed with as good effect as heretofore; and the Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis were sung to Dr. Martin's setting in C, composed for St. Paul's Day, 1877. The important tenor and bass solos were taken by Messrs. Kenningham, Winn, and De Lacy; the chorus was enlarged to the number of nearly 300 voices, and, with the orchestra of about fifty performers, was conducted by Dr. Stainer, Dr. Martin presiding at the organ. At the full choral Service in the morning, also, in addition to Schubert's Mass in G, was sung the recently published Te Deum and Benedictus by Dr. Martin, the completion of his service in C, begun seven years ago in his first year of office as sub-organist.

MISS MARIE WURM has been elected to the Mendelssohn Scholarship, which is worth £80 per annum, and is renewable at the end of one, two, and three years, at the discretion of the electing committee. It is thus the most valuable prize in this country open to competition among students of music. Miss Wurm has already passed several years abroad, studying under the direction of Joachim Raff and Madame Schumann, and has played the pianoforte more than once at the Crystal Palace Concerts. There were twenty-five competitors for the Scholarship, and one of these, Mr. G. J. Bennett, impressed the examiners so strongly with his proficiency that they voted him a sum of money more than sufficient to cover his fees for a year at the Royal Academy of Music, as a mark of their approval of the progress already made by him at that institution.

THE Rehearsals for the Drury Lane season of English opera are being held at Liverpool, under Mr. Carl Rosa, Mr. Randegger, Mr. Villiers Stanford, and Mr. Augustus Harris. The season will open on Easter Monday, with Balfe's "Bohemian Girl," followed by revivals of Mackenzie's "Colomba," Thomas's "Esmeralda," Bizet's "Carmen," &c. The chief artists will be Mesdames Marie Roze and Burns; Misses Baldi, Burton, Perry, and Le Brun; Messrs. Maas, McGuckin, Davis, Laumane, Ludwig, Crotty, Snazelle, Pope, and Foote. The special novelty of the season will be Mr. Villiers Stanford's "The Canterbury Pilgrims." The season will be strictly limited to four weeks. Mr. Randegger will conduct, and Mr. Augustus Harris has again undertaken the stage arrangements.

AN organ has been erected in the Public Hall of Stirling (N.B.), the instrument—which is a very fine one, by Messrs. Willis, of London, and cost, with its accessories, about £2,300—having been "opened" by Dr. A. L. Peace, of Glasgow, on the 8th ult. The music selected on the occasion was well calculated to display the varied resources of the new organ, but doubtless the instrument will soon be heard in connection with a choral performance by the excellent musical society of the town, under Mr. Allum, to whose exertions, we believe, its acquisition is largely due.

THE first part of "The Messiah" was given, as a portion of the service, at St. Mary's, Boltons, S.W., on the 10th ult., before a large and attentive congregation. The choruses were well rendered by the usual choir of the church, assisted by that of St. Paul's, Bow Common, under the direction of Mr. Horace Buttery, who accompanied at the organ.

A VERY successful Concert was given on the 17th ult., in the Lecture Room of the Highgate Literary and Scientific Institution, in aid of the Library Fund. A miscellaneous programme was well rendered by the following artists:—Senorita Lucia Carreras, Miss F. H. Smith, Mr. G. H. Barton, Mr. Arthur Ray, Miss Kate Chaplin (violin), Miss Nellie Chaplin (piano), Mr. W. Reynolds ('cello), and Mr. F. M. Wood (clarinet). A string quintet (Messrs. Alfred J. Dye, R. S. Norman, Geo. D. Atkin, S. J. Smith and W. Reynolds) played three short pieces. Special praise is due to Senorita Carreras, Mr. G. H. Barton, and the Misses Chaplin. Mr. Alfred J. Dye acted as accompanist, and Mr. George D. Atkin conducted.

THE Denmark Place Choral Society gave a Concert in the Lecture Hall, Denmark Place Chapel, Camberwell, on Friday, the 18th ult., when Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion," and Spohr's "God Thou art great," were well rendered. The programme also included Hauptmann's "Salve Regina," Mendelssohn's Motett, "Grant us Thy peace," a new Anthem, "God who madest earth and heaven," written by the Conductor; vocal solos, and the First Movement of Prout's Duo Concertante, Op. 6, for pianoforte and harmonium. The solo vocalists were Mrs. Robt. George, Miss Emilie Sampson, Mr. H. Kearns, and Mr. Robt. George, A.R.A.M. Mr. W. Byrom presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. W. Miller at the harmonium. Mr. W. H. Sampson, B.A., conducted.

THE members of the St. Paul's Choral Society gave a Concert at the Athenæum, Camden Road, on Tuesday evening, the 15th ult. The first part of the programme consisted of Dr. Stainer's Cantata, "St. Mary Magdalen." The choruses were upon the whole well rendered, the training of the Choir having evidently received careful attention. The solos were ably sustained by Madame Clara Suter, Madame Florence Winn, Mr. A. Kenningham, and Mr. E. Wharton. Mr. J. R. Murray conducted, Miss Phoebe Stamp presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. J. Borland at the harmonium. The second portion of the Concert was miscellaneous.

THE annual Concert of the music students of St. James's College, Victoria Park, was held on the 17th ult., at Victoria Hall, Approach Road, before a large audience. The programme comprised an excellent selection of instrumental and vocal pieces, all of which were admirably performed and warmly received, several being encored. The Concert reflected the utmost credit upon the music mistress, Miss A. Holdom, under whose direction, assisted by Mr. P. McAuslane, Organist and Choirmaster of Victoria Park Congregational Church, Mr. George Merritt, Choirmaster of Wycliffe Congregational Church, and Mr. E. Simmons, Choirmaster of St. Lawrence Jewry, the whole of the arrangements were made.

THE third of a series of Concerts in aid of the Choir Fund of St. John's, Great Marlborough Street, was given on the 24th ult., in the Lecture Room, under the direction of the Organist, Mr. G. F. Bruce. The principal vocalists were Miss Elise Worth, Miss Annie Wilson, Mr. G. W. Turner, Mr. Syckle Moore, and Mr. S. W. Beckley, who were all well received. Herr Rudolf Koenig played two pianoforte pieces in an effective manner, and Herr Herman Koenig was loudly applauded for his excellent rendering of two violin solos. The room was crowded to excess, and the Concert was in every respect highly successful.

AT the Whitefield Tabernacle, on the 7th ult., an attractive Concert was given, Mr. S. S. Wiggins, R.A.M., contributing pianoforte solos, and Miss Alice Ivimy playing with much effect a Scotch Fantasia, called "Balmoral," on the violin. The vocalists, Miss Edith Stow, Miss Grace Godolphin, Miss Amy Sargent, Messrs. Arthur Thompson and Frank May, were thoroughly successful. Mr. Arthur Dorey presided at the organ.

THE Free Concerts at the City Temple, Holborn Viaduct, continue to attract very large audiences. On Thursday evening, the 17th ult., when Madame and Miss West, Messrs. Thomas and Budd were the vocalists, with Miss Twist as solo pianist, many persons were unable to gain admission, although the spacious building seats 3,000 people.

MR. JAMES BUDD gave his annual Benefit Concert on Wednesday evening, the 16th ult., at Brixton Hall, before a crowded audience. Mr. Budd was assisted by the following artists: Madame Worrell, Madame Adeline Paget, Miss Annie Matthews, Miss Frances Hipwell, Miss Emma Walter, Madame Raymond, Mr. Wakefield Reed, Mr. C. J. Murton, Mr. J. Dalgety Henderson, Mr. John King, Mrs. Rushton Odell (pianoforte), and Mr. F. Böttjer (violin). Mr. Turle Lee accompanied in his usual efficient manner. The concert was highly successful.

THE Auckland (New Zealand) Choral Society, under the conductorship of Herr Carl Schmitt, will perform, among others, the following works during the present year: "Israel in Egypt," "Messiah," "Hymn of Praise," Gounod's "Messe Solennelle," Spohr's "Last Judgment," and Gade's "Psyche." The Society numbers 200 vocalists, and 45 orchestral performers. The hall, the property of the Society, seats 1,200 people, and is always so overcrowded that the committee has been compelled to refuse the admission of any new honorary members.

THE 180th Monthly Concert of the St. George's Glee Union was held at the Pimlico Rooms, on the 4th ult. The programme was miscellaneous, and included solos by Miss Edith Phillips, Madame Osborne Williams, Mr. Richard Clarke, Mr. Herbert Schartau, and Mr. Chaplin Henry. Several part-songs, including "Daylight is fading" (H. Leslie), "For the new year" (Mendelssohn), and "My bonny lass she smileth" (Morley), were well rendered. The accompaniments were played by Mr. Edwin Shute, and Mr. Joseph Monday conducted.

ON Monday, the 14th ult., at the Town Hall, Bermondsey, an interesting Concert was given by the Popular Ballad Concert Committee, when Sir Sterndale Bennett's "May Queen" was performed by the Choral Society, assisted by Miss Margaret Hoare, Miss Frances Hipwell, Mr. George Cox, and Mr. Henry Prenton, all of whom were highly efficient. The choruses were so well rendered by the Choir as to reflect much credit upon the Conductor, Mr. W. Henry Thomas. A short miscellaneous selection preceded the Cantata. There was a large and appreciative audience.

AT St. John's, Bethnal Green, on Sunday, December 23, the choir of the church sang Purcell's "Rejoice in the Lord" (The Bell Anthem) with a small string band accompaniment, in addition to the organ, at which Mr. W. H. Ward, the Organist and Choirmaster, presided. The solos were taken by Messrs. W. J. Ames, F. and George Snell, members of the choir. The anthem was, we believe, given for the first time on this occasion; and lovers of Purcell's music will, we are sure, be pleased to hear of its performance.

UNDER the direction of Mr. W. H. Leslie, and in connection with the People's Entertainment Society, a Concert of a very successful character was given at the Town Hall, Bermondsey, on Saturday evening, the 19th ult. The programme was contributed to by Madame Adeline Paget, Miss Patten, Mrs. Gatty, Mr. James Budd, Mr. W. Wilding, Mr. Wilkins (cornet-à-pistons), and Mr. W. H. Leslie (violin). Mr. Raiemond recited, and Mr. Turle Lee acted in the capacity of accompanist. There was a large audience.

HAYDN'S "Creation" was performed before a crowded audience, at Stamford Hill Congregational Church, on Wednesday evening, the 12th ult. The solos were well sung by Miss Mary Davies, Mr. Alfred Kenningham, and Mr. W. G. Forington; and the whole of the choruses were effectively rendered by the members of the Stamford Hill Choral Association, numbering 160 voices. Mr. Fountain Meen presided at the organ, and Mr. O. Notcutt, Organist to the Church, conducted.

AN Organ Recital was given at St. Mark's, Lewisham, on Thursday, the 24th ult., by Mr. G. E. Blunden, who performed an excellent selection much to the satisfaction of the audience. Mr. Reginald Groome was the vocalist, and sang with good expression Sir Arthur Sullivan's "Refrain thy voice from weeping."

WE are glad to find that the services of Madame Albani have been secured for the approaching Worcester Festival, an outline programme of which appeared in our last number.

A CLASSICAL Concert, the programme consisting entirely of selections from the works of Mozart, was given at the Town Hall, Shoreditch, on the 21st ult., by the Popular Ballad Concert Committee. The artists were Madame Rose Hersee, Miss Rosa Leo, Mr. Tietkens, Mr. Henry Prenton, and the Band of the Grenadier Guards. The hall was crowded by a highly appreciative audience. The Conductors were Herr Francesco Berger, Mr. W. Henry Thomas, and Mr. Dan Godfrey.

MR. JOHN C. WARD, Organist of Henry Leslie's Choir, &c., on the occasion of his retirement from the organistship of Quebec Chapel has been presented with a testimonial, consisting of a handsome silver "Queen Anne" kettle and a purse of money. The kettle bears the following inscription: "Presented to John C. Ward, Esq., in grateful remembrance of fifteen years' faithful and kindly work in connection with Quebec Chapel and district, and the Hampden Gurney Schools. Christmas, 1883."

THE Academical Board of Trinity College, London, has awarded the annual prize of ten guineas and a gold medal to Miss Alma Sanders for her pianoforte quartet sent in for the Chamber-Music Prize Competition, the adjudicator being Sir Herbert Oakeley. The Bonavia Hunt Musical History Prize, for the best essay on "The Madrigal Writers of the Elizabethan period," adjudicated by Mr. W. H. Cummings, has been awarded to Miss Fanny F. White, of Falmouth.

A PERFORMANCE of "The Messiah" was given on Wednesday evening, the 9th ult., at St. Mary's Church, Hornsey Rise, under the conductorship of Mr. Squier. The band and chorus (numbering 100) rendered the work with great precision, and the solos were well sung by Miss Kate Drew, Miss Ada South, Mr. Reginald Groome, and Mr. Albert Hubbard. Mr. Groome deserves special mention for his excellent rendering of the Passion music.

THE performance of the new Cantata "The Sea of Galilee" by Dr. R. M. Winn, at the Sheldonian Theatre, Oxford, gave the utmost satisfaction to a large audience. The work was written as the test composition for the degree of Mus. Doc., and Dr. Winn is to be congratulated warmly upon his success. The principal parts in the Cantata were sung by Mr. W. Winn, of St. Paul's Cathedral, and his daughter, Miss Winn.

THE direction of the Harmony course at the Royal College of Music has been placed, by Sir George Grove, the Director, in the hands of Dr. Bridge, Professor of Counterpoint at the Institution, who will be responsible for both these important branches of study. We also hear that valuable additions have been made to the staff of the College in the appointment of Mr. James Higgs and Dr. Gladstone as Professors of Harmony.

THE 143rd Monthly Concert of the Grosvenor Choral Society was given on Friday, the 18th ult., at the Grosvenor Hall. The programme consisted of a miscellaneous selection; solo vocalists, Madame Christopher Ellis, Miss Jessie Dixon, Mr. Hirwen Jones, Mr. Henry Yates, and Mr. Frederick Williams; solo pianoforte, Mr. Algernon S. Rose; accompanist, Miss Florence Hartley; Conductor, Mr. David Woodhouse.

WARD'S Cantata, the "Nativity," was given at St. James's, Curtain Road, on December 30. The principal parts were sung by Masters John Statham and W. Browne, and Messrs. W. T. H. Elsley and H. Smith. The choruses were rendered with much spirit, and the organ was excellently played by Mr. Hereward Browne, the concluding Voluntary being Scotson Clark's Processional March in G.

THE Erith Choral Society gave a performance of "The Messiah" on the 17th ult., under the direction of Mr. Richard Lemaire. The principal vocalists were Miss Ambler, Miss Dones, Mr. Kenningham, and Mr. Bridson, all of whom sang admirably. The band comprised some of the best players in London, led by Mr. Halfpenny. The choruses were given with excellent precision and finish.

IN connection with the Guildhall School of Music, Mr. William Henry Bateman, C.C., has been recently unanimously elected Chairman of the Corporation Music Committee.

THE first Concert for the season of the Bach Choir will take place at St. James's Hall, on March 26, when Palestrina's Mass "Assumpta est Maria," for six-part chorus and soli, unaccompanied, will be given for the first time. Mr. C. Villiers Stanford's Hymn "Awake, my heart," S. Wesley's Motett "Exultate Deo," J. S. Bach's Sanctus, and other interesting works will complete the programme.

THE Princess Christian graciously assisted at the Entertainment given to the patients of Brompton Hospital, on the 15th ult., the other performers having been the Lady Agneta Montague, the Hon. Mrs. North Dalrymple, Mrs. Ronalds, Miss Mary Liddell, Miss Shinner, Mr. H. Graham, Mr. F. C. Ricardo, and Colonel Viscount Hinchingbrook, M.P., by whom the Concert was arranged.

THE death is announced, on the 4th ult., of Mr. Thomas Frost, who was formerly well known in London concert rooms as a bass vocalist. He leaves two sons who have adopted the musical profession—Mr. H. F. Frost, the musical critic and the present organist of the Chapel Royal, Savoy, and Mr. W. A. Frost, an alto singer in St. Paul's Cathedral.

GOUNOD'S "Redemption" will be given, for the first time in Cheltenham, on the 11th inst., by Mr. J. A. Matthews' Choral and Orchestral Society. The soloists are Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. W. H. Brereton. The band and chorus will be complete in every department, and the work will be conducted by Mr. J. A. Matthews.

WE are glad to find that the second edition of "Voice, Song, and Speech," by Messrs. Lennox Browne and Emil Behnke, is announced, the first edition having been sold within a month of publication.

WE regret to hear that Mr. W. de M. Sergison (who was taken ill on Christmas Eve) is not likely to resume his duties for some weeks, complete rest having been ordered by his medical attendant.

WE are informed that Dr. Horton Allison has just been appointed one of Her Majesty's Examiners in Music to the Intermediate Education Board for Ireland.

A REMINISCENCE of Mario, written by Frederick F. Buffen, is announced to appear in the next number of Tinsley's Magazine.

WE understand that Trinity College, London, is about to start a monthly paper of its own, entitled the Academic Gazette.

REVIEWS.

Sigurd. Opéra en 4 Actes et 9 Tableaux de MM. Camille du Locle and Alfred Blau. Musique de E. Reyer. [Paris: G. Hartmann.]

"EVERYTHING comes to him who can wait," says the French proverb; and the experience of M. Reyer, as regards his opera "Sigurd," is a case in point. M. Reyer, although a Member of the Academy, a Chevalier of the Legion, and the successor of Berlioz of the Journal des Débats, waited long for a chance of producing "Sigurd," and at last it came. Not, however, in Paris the great, but in the lesser Paris, where King Leopold holds court. "Sigurd" was played at the Théâtre de la Monnaie, Brussels, on the 7th ult.

It is claimed for M. Reyer that "Sigurd" was written before Wagner's "Götterdämmerung" saw the light. We do not contest the point, but the "Nibelungen" libretto was published some time previous to the first performance of that work; and M. Reyer, if he did not see a copy, must have known very well that Wagner had the traditional story in hand. All this, however, matters little. The "Nibelungen Lied" is common property, and MM. du Locle and Blau have taken care not to follow the lines of Wagner more closely than could be helped.

"Sigurd," unlike the vast majority of modern operas, begins with an overture which, if not in regular form, is of considerable dimensions, occupying twenty pages of the pianoforte score. It anticipates some of the melodies in the body of the work, and is full of bustle and energy. The curtain first rises upon a hall in the palace of Gunther,

King of the Burgundians. Women are embroidering battle flags and singing an appropriate chorus, of a simple as well as martial character. With them are Hilda, Gunther's sister, and Uta, her nurse. Hilda is troubled. She has dreamed a dream and tells it to Uta, who interprets it, bidding the Princess beware lest a rival one day destroy her spouse that is to be, as he lies in her arms. Hilda, who is sought in marriage by Attila, King of the Huns, then reveals the secret of her love for a hero, the noble Sigurd (Siegfried), who, in a great emergency of war, had saved her own and her brother's lives, afterwards, in cold and stately fashion, riding away. Presently the women retire, as Gunther and his companions return from hunting, but not before Uta had assured Hilda that by means of her magic art she will bring Sigurd to Court and give him a love potion. Gunther welcomes the envoys of Attila, and in the course of much festive and martial music a bard tells the story of Brunnhild on her fire-guarded rock. Gunther resolves to win the banished Walkyrie for his wife. Then follows a scene between Hilda and the envoys, who press their master's suit, backed by Gunther; but before the maid can reply a trumpet call is heard, and a Knight enters in shining armour, declaring his name Sigurd. There is great rejoicing at his presence, and Gunther and he swear eternal amity in a particularly vigorous duet. Hilda advances with Uta's magic cup; Sigurd drinks and at once falls in love with the Princess, whose hand, it is arranged, shall reward him for helping Gunther to win Brunnhild. Upon this compact the curtain descends.

The second act opens in Brunnhild's country, where we see the worship of Odin and Freja carried on. Hither come Sigurd, Gunther, and Hagen, intruding on the sacred rites, and proclaiming their errand. The priests and people warn and menace them without effect, and the high priest reveals that only the man can succeed in winning Brunnhild who has never known woman or love. Sigurd accepts the conditions, for he is that man, and soon we see him left alone in the forest with instructions to sound three times upon a horn given him by the Priest. After invoking Hilda, he does so, and a rock rolling away shows the three Norns washing at a fountain a shroud, which by signs they indicate is intended for himself. Nothing daunted, Sigurd prepares to sound again, but now all manner of supernatural beings assail him. He conquers, and next a voluptuous scene tempts him to ruin; this, also, without effect. Then the lake near at hand turns into a lake of fire with a palace of fire rising out of it. Into this the hero, calling Hilda's name, dauntlessly plunges. The scene changes to a hall of Brunnhild's palace, where the Walkyrie lies asleep. Sigurd enters, conducted by the Norns, and wakes the maid, who offers him her love, but he, faithful, bids her accompany him to Gunther's court, and places his drawn sword between them. Thus ends the second act.

The third act opens at night in Gunther's garden. Spirit voices invoke the King's presence, and draw also Uta and Hilda on to the scene. These are hidden witnesses of an interview between Gunther and Sigurd, who announces his success and his fidelity. During the night spirits have borne sleeping Brunnhild to the garden, and now she wakes to find Gunther near her protesting his love, which, not knowing him from Sigurd, she accepts. Seeing all this, Hilda knows that Sigurd loves her, and is overjoyed. Uta enjoins caution and secrecy as to what has been discovered. The scene changes to a terrace before the Palace, where Hagen proclaims to the people the approaching marriage of Gunther and Brunnhild. Nuptial ceremonies then begin with offerings, dances, and games, after which the King and his bride prepare to cross the Rhine into the sacred grove. At that moment Sigurd appears, claiming Hilda. Gunther consents, and bids Brunnhild join their hands. As she does so the Walkyrie and Sigurd cry out that their hands burn. The wedding procession, a double one now, then moves towards the sacred grove.

When the fourth act opens, Gunther's servants are telling the people that Brunnhild suffers from a mysterious malady. Presently she appears, and all respectfully move away. In a long scene, Brunnhild confesses her love for Sigurd and its anguish, and calls upon Odin to extinguish her being. To her comes Hilda with words of consolation, but anon Brunnhild observes that Hilda is wearing the ceinture which Sigurd took from her on the night of her deliverance. She at once divines the trick played upon her, and an exciting scene follows, each woman claiming the hero's love, the result being that Hilda is inflamed with jealousy against Sigurd. Of this Hagen takes advantage, and a plot is laid for his destruction. Meanwhile, Brunnhild, by a beautiful charm, removes the effect of Uta's potion, and Sigurd's eyes are opened to his real affection. After a duet, he goes to hunt with Gunther, who lets fall some words that reveal his intentions to the women. Hilda offers to save Sigurd if Brunnhild will renounce his love, but the Walkyrie hesitates till too late. The body of Sigurd is brought home; and the form of the hero, with that of Brunnhild, is seen in the sky above the blaze of the funeral pyre.

The reader can make his own comparison between the story as here told and that of Wagner's "Götterdämmerung," which, as part of a larger "argument," is necessarily more complicated. He can also estimate the strong dramatic interest and the fine situations which sustain attention. Of these matters whose runs may read. M. Reyer's music has been called Wagnerian, and so in some respects it is, but not more than that of other French operas wherein the leit motif is largely employed, and the orchestra made to act an important part. For the rest, M. Reyer writes like a Frenchman, with plenty of well-marked vocal melody and straightforward effect; plenty of sentiment also, and glitter. The opera will probably be heard in London ere long, and we shall wait to discuss it in detail till after the representation. With such a work this is only fair; but we will go so far as to say that the music as seen in a pianoforte score attracts us, and makes us anticipate its performance with an interest strong enough to be called eagerness.

Novello, Ewer and Co.'s Music Primers. Edited by Dr. Stainer. Two-part Exercises, for Choirs and Schools. By James Greenwood. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE author of this work has conferred an inestimable boon upon choirs by presenting them with a series of two-part Exercises in which, as he truly says, he has "combined time with tune and the scales with contrapuntal devices," so that, the class being divided into two sections, each division may sing alternately the scale and counterpoint until both parts become equally familiar. When we consider the difficulty of writing 396 specimens of varied counterpoint upon the ascending and descending scale, we may fairly award unlimited praise to Mr. Greenwood, not only for the thoughtful manner in which he has performed his task, but for the melodious character of the whole of his writing. The Exercises may be used with any system of Sol-fa, and are constructed upon nearly the whole of the major and minor scales.

Old Ireland. A Collection of Ancient Irish Melodies. The words written by the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman;" the symphonies and accompaniments by Berthold Tours. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS book has a two-fold interest. In the first place it makes public six native Irish melodies heretofore buried out of ordinary sight among the treasures of the Petrie Collection. This is something to be thankful for, quite apart from the value of the tunes per se. We cannot know too much of national song, especially when, as in the case of Ireland, the nation boasts an indigenous growth of the article. But the melodies here presented have worth in themselves. They are more regular in point of construction, and, therefore, less characteristic than many Celtic tunes; but there is character enough in them to mark their origin, and to give them a piquant flavour. Mr. Tours has written the symphonies and accompaniments with good judgment. His task was a delicate one, and we might, perhaps, say of any one undertaking a similar duty, "He does best who does least." Mr. Tours has not done too much, his accompaniments are quite unobtrusive, and his harmonies appropriately simple. In writing the words, Mrs. Craik had an object, which she sets forth in a short preface: "Being myself an Irishwoman, my work has been a work of love; hoping to sing—not sermonise—into the English heart a tenderer feeling towards Old Ireland. I prefer to dwell, not on the faults, but the virtues of my people—their domestic purity, their strong affections, their innate loyalty, courage, and fidelity; also, last, but not least, their indomitable gaieté de cœur, which implies neither hardness, shallowness, nor selfishness of heart, yet enables the Celtic nature to tide over trouble in a way which the more sombre Saxon can hardly understand." This is very amiable and praiseworthy, and, it may be, the Englishman appreciates it vastly more than Mrs. Craik's countrypeople, who are just now more inclined to strike than to shake the hand held out to them. The poems written to the six melodies are respectively entitled, "The Royal Irish at Tel-el-Kebir," "Old Friends," "Kathleen Asthore," "My Home Ruler," "O Mary! thy laugh was sweet," and "The High-born Orphan." As an example, we quote a verse of "My Home Ruler"—

O I've given my troth to my Irish lad
And I cannot take it away,
Though times are bad and the wicked glad,
And the righteous sad to-day:
His word's his bond, and his heart is fond
And true, though his laugh rings gay,
His head is cool, fit for Love's Home Rule
And his smile is my Peep-o'-Day.

We have nothing but commendation for this interesting little group of songs.

Voice, Song, and Speech: A Practical Guide for Singers and Speakers: from the combined view of Vocal Surgeon and Voice Trainer. By Lennox Browne, F.R.C.S., Ed., and Emil Behnke.

[Sampson Low, Marston, Searle, and Rivington.]

The title-page of this work sufficiently shows that it really supplies a want which all students of the vocal art have long felt. Alluding to the writings which both the authors have already contributed separately towards the store of literature on the human voice, the Preface says: "The one, after many years of experience, came to the conclusion that wrong production of voice, or abuse of its function, was the chief cause of most of the cases of vocal failure, and even of throat disease, occurring to professional voice-users, which came under his notice. The other had become equally convinced that the scarcity of fine voices in singers, as well as in speakers, generally acknowledged to exist, was due less to dearth of material than to faults in its cultivation and exercise." The results of two such earnest investigators of the subject here presented to the public, accompanied with numerous illustrations by wood-engraving and photography, cannot fail to produce a most salutary effect upon the art of voice-training, and we sincerely hope that the work may be extensively read. It would be impossible here to draw attention even to the salient points of this elaborate treatise; but we may say that the chapters upon the Anatomy and Physiology of the Vocal Organ, the Hygienic aspect of the vocal apparatus, the description of the Laryngoscope and its uses—in which every credit is given to the real inventor, Manuel Garcia—the remarks upon Voice Cultivation, and the hints upon the daily life of the voice-user, are of vital importance to all whose profession necessitates an undue strain upon the vocal organs. We are told in the Preface that it may not be difficult for readers to identify the separate authorship of certain chapters and passages; but every portion of the book is so obviously the outcome of mutual deliberation that few will be inclined to attempt such identification; and the volume will assuredly remain as the most perfect manual for singers and speakers ever published.

Reeves' Musical Directory for 1884. [William Reeves].

WHEN, on opening the present issue of this Directory, we find the name of Miss Ellen Orridge—whose sad death was not only chronicled, but commented upon at the time of its occurrence by every musical journal in England—it would be impossible for us to award praise for the care with which the work is supervised. We may also say that the custom of mixing up the advertisements with the general contents of the Directory, and of printing the names of those who advertise in the book larger than those who do not, is still adhered to. There are many useful features, however, in the publication, to which we have before drawn attention; and these should strongly recommend it to the notice of all who desire a ready reference to persons in any way connected with music.

Tablettes d'un Solitaire. Quatre Pièces pour Piano, par Stephen Heller. [Forsyth Brothers.]

THESE refined and eloquent musical trifles, edited and carefully fingered by Mr. Charles Hallé, are written not only for educated pianists but for educated listeners. Nos. 1 and 2—"Aveu" and "Résignation"—are well contrasted in character, the first, having a marked subject in the left hand, with an effective syncopated accompaniment, and the second being an arpeggio in triplets, with which an appropriately placid theme is woven. Nos. 3 and 4 are Caprices in F sharp minor, both excellent practice, even regarded as Exercises. The extensions in No. 3 can indeed only be successfully mastered by an accomplished player. In No. 4 the subject in the tonic major is most attractive, and on the whole, perhaps, this will be the favourite of the four pieces before us, all of which are, however, healthy additions to the music of the day.

Danse Bohémienne. Alpine Bells. For the Pianoforte. By Etienne Claudet. [Robert Cocks and Co.]

THERE is nothing sufficiently "individual" in these compositions to distinguish them from the light trifles with which we are now absolutely inundated. It must always be remembered that characteristic titles will often partially disguise feeble music; but perhaps when subjected to criticism, it is on this very account that their abstract merits should be more strictly judged. The second piece, in Mazurka form, is, we think, the better of the two; but why it is called "Alpine Bells" we cannot comprehend. The passages lie well under the hand; and "Drawing-room" players will doubtless take into favour the works of a composer who can make them produce such "brilliant" results with so little trouble.

The Musical Directory, Annual and Almanack, for 1884. [Rudall, Carte & Co.]

THIS old established Directory appeals more strongly than ever to public favour in the volume for the present year, for it opens with a carefully collated and well written record of the principal musical events from October 1, 1882, to September 30, 1883, by Mr. Joseph Bennett. The obituary notices are extracted from the various musical journals; and, apart from the usual lists of names, there is much valuable information concerning the chief musical institutions, both at home and abroad.

FOREIGN NOTES.

M. MASSENET's new opera, "Manon Lescaut," was produced at the Opéra Comique, in Paris, on the 20th ult. A large and enthusiastic audience was present, and the work achieved a success. M. Massenet has followed the example of Wagner in the use of the leit-motive, and he further proves himself to be an adherent of the modern school in music by the prominence he gives to the orchestra. The music is, however, thoroughly vocal, and always within the capabilities of the voice. A song of Manon, "A nous les amours et les roses," with a refrain sung by her female companions, proved the most popular piece in the work. Madame Heilbron, who re-appeared after an absence of some years, and M. Talazac were excellent in the principal characters, and the scenery and dresses showed that M. Carvalho had done everything possible to make the performance a success.

L'Union International des Compositeurs, the new musical society in Paris, which has been formed for the purpose of producing new works by French and foreign musicians, has arranged for six concerts, to take place at the Trocadéro, on April 3 and 17, May 1, 15, and 29, and June 12. The concerts will be conducted by Benjamin Godard, but some of the composers will conduct their own works. The following works, representing most of the European nations, have been chosen: France—Gounod, Benedictus, from the "Messe des Pâques;" Massenet, Marche Solennelle, for chorus and orchestra; Joncières, Fragments from an unpublished Opera; Augusta Holmès, "Hero and Leander," opera in one act; Lambert, Overture to "Macbeth;" Reyer, Fragments from "Sigurd;" Saint-Saëns, Hymn to Victor Hugo; Franck, March and Ballet, with chorus from "Hulda," opera in four acts Benjamin Godard, Fragments from "Pedro de Zalamea;" Paul Vidal, Invocation Chorus; Alfred Bruneau, "La belle au bois dormant," symphonic poem. Russia—Tschaikowski, Suite for Orchestra. Belgium—Peter Benoit, Rubens Cantata; Fernand le Borne, "Daphnis and Chloe," lyric poem. Bohemia—Smetana, Patrie, symphonic poem. Denmark—Gade, Spring Fantasia. Germany—Bruch, Frithjof. Italy—Sgambati, Symphony.

Our contemporary, Le Menestrel, gives a complete list of the new Operas performed for the first time in Italy during 1883. Subjoined is the list, with the towns at which the performances took place: "Despo," by Carrer, at Patrasso; "Margherita," by various authors, at Naples; "La Befana," by Canti, at Rome; "Il Saggio," by Soffredini, at Livorno; "Un Giorno onomastico," by Piacenza, at Novi-Ligure; "Il Profugo," by Gnarro, at Naples; "L'Assiedo di Firenze," by Terziani, at Rome; "Adello," by Logheder, at Pavia; "Dejanire," by Catalani, at Milan; "La Regina di Scozia," by Stuard-Stresa, at Turin; "Ettore Fieramosca," by Benacchio, at Padua; "Luisa Sanfelice," by Taccheo, at Chioggia; "L'Oratore de caffè," by Maggi, at Sondrio; "Donna Ines," by Luigi Ricci, at Plaisance; "Il Matrimonio segreto," by Graffigna, at Florence; "Tommaso il Gobbo," by Teza, at Longarone; "La Bujenta," by Tarditi, at Acqui; "Amazilia," by Palminteri, at Milan; "Una Congiura," by Biagi, at Florence; "L'Antiquario," by Dessy B., at Cagliari; and "Cristoforo Colombo," by Penco and Bignami, at Genoa.

The Dresden Court Theatre celebrated, on December 29, the hundredth anniversary of the death of Johann Adolf Hasse by performing one of his numerous operas—"Hercules am Scheidewege." Hasse, whose name and works have now been almost entirely forgotten, was considered during his life to be the first of opera composers, and was then as much thought of as his immortal contemporaries Bach and Handel. Hasse was the husband of the celebrated prima donna Faustina Bordoni, for whom all the principal parts in his operas were written, and to whose interpretation was, no doubt, due the immense and, as long as composer and interpreter lived, lasting acceptance of works which, as far as their real artistic value is concerned, were inferior to those of many an unsuccessful contemporary of Hasse.

The negotiations between Herr Director Neumann, of Bremen, and Mr. Gye, for the performance of German opera at Covent Garden during the coming season having been broken off, and Herr Director Hofmann, of Cologne, having also declined to bring a company to England this year, arrangements have been made with Herr Franke and Herr Hans Richter for twelve performances of German opera at this theatre during June and July. Particulars will be found in another column.

The concert tour which Herr Joachim is about to make through the United States will last six months, during which time one hundred concerts will be given. Herr Joachim receives for this tour 230,000 marks (about £11,500), and he will be accompanied by a pianist and a singer.

Fräulein Therese Malten, prima donna at the Royal Opera House at Dresden, and one of the leading singers of Wagner's music in Germany, has been invited to sing the difficult part of Kundry at the performances of "Parsifal," which have been announced to take place at the Albert Hall during the present year.

The seventh Silesian Musical Festival will take place at Breslau, on July 15, 16, 17, under the conductorship of Herren Ludwig Deppe and Julius Schäffer. Amongst the works to be performed we find Blumner's Oratorio "The Fall of Jerusalem"; the 100th Psalm, composed by Jadassohn; "Des Sängers Fluch," by Schumann; "Christophorus," a Cantata by Rheinberger; Wagner's "Faust" Overture, and a new Symphony by Count Hochberg, the founder and supporter of these Festivals.

Flotow's posthumous Opera, "Der Graf von St. Mégrin," was performed for the first time at Cologne, on the 10th ult., with marked success. The excellent tenor engaged at this theatre, Herr Heinrich Götz, sang the fatiguing and difficult title-rôle in magnificent style, and was much applauded, contributing, indeed, greatly to the enthusiasm with which the work was received.

Berlioz's Requiem is to be performed at Budapest, probably with the assistance of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde at Vienna.

A monument to the late Robert Volkmann is to be erected in Budapest, the city in which he lived and worked during the greater part of his life, and where also he died.

Marschner's long-forgotten opera "König Hiarne" was revived at Hamburg, on the 2nd ult., and achieved a marked success.

Amateurs will be interested in knowing that the full score of Wagner's "Parsifal" has just been published by Messrs. Schott, of Mayence.

De Swert's Opera, "Die Albigenser," was recently performed at Wiesbaden and Breslau, considerably altered, and in its new form was a decided success.

A new paper on musical and theatrical matters has appeared with the new year at Munich. It is called Münchener Signale für Theater und Musik.

Professor Carl Klindworth having resigned his place as one of the masters in Kullak's new Academy of Music, Berlin, is about to open a similar establishment of his own.

Brahms's new Symphony is reported to have created a very favourable impression at its first performance in Berlin, on the 4th ult. Herr Gutmann, the music publisher of Vienna, has purchased the copyright of the work for 36,000 marks—about £1,800.

A revival of Spohr's "Jessonda" is in preparation at Vienna. It is intended to give the opera on the 5th of April, the centenary of the composer's birth.

Ambroise Thomas's "Françoise de Rimini" has been enthusiastically received on its production at Antwerp.

It is reported that Rubinstein, tired of waiting for the production of his works at the Imperial Opera House of St. Petersburg, and annoyed at the preference given to the works of other composers, intends leaving the Russian capital and taking up his abode at Berlin.

The new Italian Opera at Paris has not, as yet, been remarkably successful. The principal cause for this non-success is no doubt to be found in the uninteresting répertoire, which consists entirely of operas by Bellini and the earlier works of Verdi. No novelties have yet been produced.

Three performances of Schumann's music to "Manfred" have lately been given in Paris, by M. Colonne. The work had not previously been heard complete in the French capital.

The programmes of three concerts, given in Paris, on the 5th ult., contain extracts from Wagner's works, a fact which seems to show that the prejudice entertained against the master's works in France is dying out.

The novelties at the Paris Opéra after the new version of Gounod's "Sapho," which is nearly ready for production, will be M. Salvayre's "Egmont," M. Massenet's "Le Cid," and a work on the subject of King Arthur, by M. Saint-Saëns.

Massenet is reported to be writing a new work for the Grand Opéra at Paris.

A new opera, "Neaga," by the Swedish composer, Ivar Hallström, has been accepted at the Stockholm Theatre Royal. The book is by Carmen Sylva (the pseudonym assumed by the Queen of Roumania).

A new opera, by Salvayre, entitled "Richard the Third," was produced at St. Petersburg, on December 9, and was very favourably received.

We deeply regret to announce the death of Louis Ehlert, one of the ablest critics and writers on music in Germany, which took place at Wiesbaden, on the 4th ult. Louis Ehlert was born at Königsberg in Prussia, on January 13, 1825. He studied music under Mendelssohn, at Leipzig, and published several compositions, of which the "Hafis Overture," the Overture to Shakespeare's "A Winter's Tale," and the Spring Symphony, are the most important. Not being very successful in his compositions, he began writing on musical matters, and soon drew the attention of the whole musical and literary world to his splendid essays, of which the "Römische Briefe" and "Die Briefe an eine Freundin" are the most important. Lately he had lived at Wiesbaden, where he was taken ill whilst at a concert given by Wilhelmj, at the Cursaal. Being removed from the concert-room, he expired in a few minutes. By his death Germany has lost one of her foremost and ablest musical critics.

Paul Taglioni, the celebrated Ballet Director at Berlin, died on the 6th ult., aged 76.

Franz Gehring, well known in Vienna as a critic and writer on musical matters, died in that city on December 31, at the early age of 48.

M. Stefano Pugno, well-known as the composer of some very popular French romances, died at Paris lately, aged 67.

CORRESPONDENCE.

CHEAP MUSIC BOOKS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—I have been much interested in a letter in the December number of your paper from P. C. Edwards on "Cheap Music Books," with your editorial comments thereon. There is no doubt, as you say, that musical scores and musical works are now published at wonderfully cheap rates, and no complaint can be made by the public on that head. When we come to what is known as musical literature or works on the art, such as biography, criticism, &c., the case is somewhat different. Although some of the works in this line are issued at moderate rates, too many are brought out at figures which place them beyond the reach of any but the comparatively well-to-do collector. I feel convinced that were the same published at popular prices, the demand would be greatly increased.

It may interest your readers to know that of late years a growing demand has been springing up in the United States for works on musical literature. Very little original work has been done in this branch, but the best foreign works are often reprinted and meet with a ready sale. Such works as "Music and Morals," by Haweis; "The Mendelssohn Family," by Hensel; "Life of Chopin," by Karasowski, &c., &c., have been issued, and have met with marked success.

English publications also circulate largely, and are imported in quantity by musical firms here. Within a few months there has been quite a revival of the subject, caused by the publication of a musical literature catalogue by one of our leading houses, which has seemed to meet a want felt for some time. The musical public in this country is very large, and is becoming more extended every year, and the bringing out of this Musical List is a sign that the people are waking up to the value of the works in this department.

The æsthetic and intellectual side of the art has been too much ignored in the past, while over-attention, perhaps, has been given to theory, technique, &c. It is time that the student and amateur was brought to feel more interest in the higher and, in some respects, more congenial phases of music. Nothing can subservise this end more effectually than the diffusion of works on music and its literature, the lives of its great composers, with their struggles and triumphs, analyses of musical works, heightening our perceptions of their beauty, and developing our critical faculties, &c., &c.

A wide and varied reading on musical themes gives much breadth and character to the mind and tastes of one musically inclined, and as years go on a familiar knowledge of its literature will be regarded as an important feature in musical education. Many here are waiting to impress this view on musical people, and already gratifying results have been obtained.

Should any of the English publishers start a movement to still further popularise and cheapen musical literature they will meet with a prompt support in this country. It is not likely that any works they may issue at the cheap rates will be reprinted here, as American firms would not find it a paying investment to compete with such low publication prices.

With best wishes for the success of your valuable suggestions, Yours sincerely,
FRANK MARLING.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Anticipating a warm discussion on this subject, I modestly refrained from stating my views in your last number; but the silence of my fellow readers on this theme induces me to step forth to briefly express my opinion.

I agree with Mr. Coulson Edwards, but consider he carries his suggestion too far when he would invite publishers to divide 4s. and 5s. volumes into so many 6d. parts. Books which are not within the reach of very ordinary folk—say 10s. 6d. volumes, and upwards—might, I should think, with advantage be issued in monthly parts, at a slight extra charge to the receiver in the long run, to be sure, but greatly to the benefit of the publishers themselves, the booksellers, and, what is the most important consideration, the advancement of English musical culture.

I should indeed rejoice to see Mr. Edwards' plan adopted with some such compositions as he has named; also works on music and costly musical biographies.

Yours respectfully,

VICTOR LOUIS WESTER.

BAPTIE'S "BIOGRAPHY OF MUSICIANS."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—I must again ask for a space in your paper to answer your correspondent of December 1 and January 1, relative to Sir Robert Stewart's position in St. Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin. The following are the names of the Organists of St. Patrick's since 1845: 1845-1852, Mr. W. H. White; 1852-1879, Mr. W. Murphy, Mus. Bac. Mr. Murphy resigned in 1879, when the present Organist, Mr. Marchant, was appointed. The foregoing facts have been taken from St. Patrick's registry, and I may here add that on Visitation days Sir Robert is called as Vicar-Choral, and Mr. Charles Marchant as Organist and Choirmaster (he is also Conductor of St. Patrick's Cathedral Oratorio Society). As I stated in my letter last month, Sir Robert is not, and never was, Organist; he is a half Vicar-Choral (tenor), to which post he was appointed, I think, about 1862. I understand that Mr. Murphy and Sir Robert then entered into an arrangement by which the former sang at the Sunday afternoon services, and the latter played; but Sir Robert was liable for his share of the vocal work, and I have on many occasions seen him at his post in the choir. I understand that he still continues to preside at the organ on Sunday afternoons whenever he feels inclined; but this is simply out of courtesy.

I am, Sir, yours, &c.,

R. Y.

[We cannot insert any more letters on this subject.—Ed. Musical Times.]

THE "GLORIA TIBI" AND "GRATIAS TIBI."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—May I ask two questions which some of your readers, learned in liturgical music, can perhaps answer.

1. How is it that among all the anthems, &c., written by Church of England musicians, there seems to be nothing, excepting one or two small and modern compositions for the Festivals of the Blessed Virgin?

2. What is the History of the "Gloria" and "Gratias Tibi," before and after the Gospel, as sung in so many churches? "Glory be to Thee, O Lord," as said by clerk and people before the reading of the Gospel, is in King Edward VI. Prayer Book (1549). This, and "Thanks be to Thee, O Lord," both occur in the Scotch Liturgy (1604).

Neither occurs in either the present version of the Prayer Book, the black-letter draft of it, nor the marginal suggestions for its final revision. But, curiously enough, although many of these marginal suggestions were by Bishop Cosins, he, himself, altered the rubric of the Durham Prayer Book so as to embrace both "Glory," &c., and "Thanks," &c.

The Gloria is perhaps a survival of the Roman Gradual. Is it? And where does the "Thanks," &c. come from?

January 25, 1884.

TESTIMONIAL TO SIR MICHAEL COSTA.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—As a rumour is in circulation that Sir Michael Costa has declined to accept the Testimonial now being promoted by his friends and admirers, will you kindly allow me to state through the medium of your columns that there is not the slightest foundation for the same.

Yours obediently,

W. H. HUSK,

Honorary Secretary to the Committee.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

* Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur. Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all Subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

H. A. WILLIAMS—"Handbook to St. Paul's Cathedral," published by Messrs. Griffith and Farran, St. Paul's Churchyard, will give you the information.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

ABERDEEN.—The members of the Choral Union gave their tenth annual Oratorio Concert on December 26, when Handel's Saul was performed to a large and appreciative audience. The solos were sung by Madame L. Williams, Miss Eleanor Rees, R.A.M., Messrs. Wm. Thomas Neath and James Sauvage, all of whom were well received. The Choruses were rendered with precision and effect, and the Cyfarthfa band, by kind permission of W. T. Crawshaw, Esq., played well. Mr. Harper, of Gloucester, presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. W. I. Evans at the harmonium. Mr. Rees Evans conducted.

BAMBURY.—On Wednesday, the 2nd ult., a musical entertainment took place to which the parents of the children attending the Wesleyan Sunday School, Marlborough Road, and other members of the congregation were invited. The programme consisted of a Sacred Cantata, The Lion of Judah, and a short miscellaneous selection. The solos in the Cantata were sung by Miss Owen, Miss Kay, Miss Brain, Masters Prince and Day, Mr. W. J. Cooke, Mr. D. Fowler, Mr. J. H. Kay, and Mr. C. F. Edmunds. The pianoforte accompaniments were excellently rendered by Mr. W. Clough, who also played a solo on the pianoforte with much success.

BASINGSTOKE.—The members of the Harmonic Society gave their first Concert this season, in the Town Hall, on Thursday, the 3rd ult., under the conductorship of Mr. W. H. Liddle, Organist of the Parish Church. Macfarren's Christmas formed the first part of the programme, and the second was miscellaneous. Miss Ada Patterson and Mr. B. Ramabottom were the solo vocalists. The choruses were well rendered. Mr. H. E. Powell accompanied, and Mr. C. S. Macpherson played additional accompaniments on the American organ. The Concert was a success in every respect.

BELFAST.—The performance of Christmas music by the Choral Association, under the able direction of Mr. Kempton, was in every respect a decided success. The principal vocalists were Miss Marianne Fenna, Mrs. Kempton, Mrs. Canning, Mr. Beaumont, and Mr. Hemmingway, who were highly efficient in the solos allotted to them, Miss Fenna in "Rejoice greatly" and Mr. Beaumont in "Comfort ye" and "Ev'ry Valley" creating a marked effect. The choruses were admirably rendered throughout. The second part of the programme was miscellaneous, and included an ancient Carol and Christmas Madrigal, both of which were well sung. Mr. W. H. Jude, Organist to the Association, accompanied all the choruses, and played a Fugue by Bach.

BIRKENHEAD.—On Friday, December 28, a performance of The Messiah was given at the Music Hall, in aid of the funds of St. Luke's Church. Madame Billinie Porter was highly successful in the soprano solos, and praise must be accorded to the other vocalists, though Mr. Ambler, the tenor, suffered from a cold so severe as to prevent his appearance in the second part. Mr. Hope-Jones conducted, and Mr. Lawson was leader of the orchestra.

BOLTON.—The Philharmonic Society gave a Concert on the 5th ult., under the leadership of Mr. Henry Taylor, when there was a crowded attendance. The Eagley Choir have also recently appeared, and with considerable success.—An audience, numbering over 2,000 persons assembled on Saturday evening, the 12th ult., in the Temperance Hall, on the occasion of one of a series of "Concerts for the People," given during the winter months. The programme, arranged by J. R. Bridson, Esq., President of the Bolton Philharmonic Society, was highly attractive. The artists included Miss Catherine Pickering and Mr. J. D. Smith, vocalists; Signor Rieagari and Mr. G. W. Nelson, violins; Herr Otto Kenhardt, viola; Mr. Bridson, flute; M. Vieuxtemps, violoncello; Mr. Brazillier, double-bass; and Mr. H. Smith, pianoforte. Solos, trios, quartets, and a sextet were admirably played, and the efforts of the vocalists were thoroughly appreciated.

BRIDGEWATER.—On the 8th ult. a very successful Soirée, in connection with the Church of Holy Trinity, was given at the Town Hall. The programme was well carried out by several lady and gentleman amateurs, and the Military Band of the B. A. Christs.—On Sunday, the 20th ult., the Dedication Festival Services were given at the Catholic Church, at Cannington. The Kyrie, Gloria, and Credo from Mercadante; the Sanctus, Benedictus, and Agnus Dei from Van Bree; Laudate pueri (Zingarelli); Ave Maria (O'Donovan), Novello's O Solitaria, and Gastinet's Tantum ergo, were sung by the Industrial School Choir-boys, supported by Mr. Montague Worlock and Messrs. Moloney, Bryce, and David. The vocal music was well accompanied by Mr. J. Neill O'Donovan, the Organist.

BRIGHTON.—The Annual Entertainment and Concert of the Warren Farm Schools was given on Thursday, the 17th ult., before a large audience. The band was under the direction of Mr. J. Steward Smith (late bandmaster of the 11th Hussars); violin, Mr. Pickett; pianoforte, Mr. Richard Miles. The vocalists were Mr. and Mrs. E. H. Payne, Mr. Nicholson, Miss Williams, Mr. G. Marten Barling, and Miss Sattin, all of whom were thoroughly appreciated.

CARLISLE.—On Friday evening, the 11th ult., Mr. G. W. F. Crowther who has greatly distinguished himself at the Royal Academy of Music, having obtained the Sterndale Bennett Scholarship and received the medal of the Academy, gave a Pianoforte Recital in the County Hall, assisted by Mr. Sinclair Dunn, also a medalist of the Royal Academy of Music. Mr. Crowther gave an excellent selection of pieces, mostly classical, by Beethoven, Bach, Mendelssohn, and others, with admirable skill and taste. Since his last appearance in Carlisle he has much gained, both in execution and expression, and his playing bears evidence, not only of decided musical talent, but of diligent study. Mr. Dunn contributed several songs new to the audience, which were all well received. The Recital was a decided success.

CHELMSFORD.—On the 15th ult. a Sacred Cantata, entitled Judah's Captivity and Restoration, was given in the London Road School-room, by the London Road Chapel Singing Class. The work is the composition of Mr. George Shinn, Mus. Bac., and was received with much favour by a large audience. The principal vocalists were Miss Wilton, Miss Kate Saltmarsh, Mrs. England, Miss Beadle, Mrs. Wigley, Mrs. Budda, Miss Palmer, Messrs. J. H. Bee, G. E. Wigley, Jeffreys, C. Killick, S. Auger, E. R. Tombs, and E. Dillway. The Choral as well as the solo parts were well rendered, the connective readings were given by Mr. G. E. Wigley, and Mr. E. Gosling conducted.

CLIFTON.—Mr. W. Haydn Cox, Organist of the Parish Church, gave an Organ Recital in the Victoria Rooms, on the 3rd ult., at a meeting held in connection with the Church. The programme included Mozart's Fantasia in F minor, Batiste's Offertoire in D major, Marche Religieuse, Guilmant, &c. In the course of the evening the Vicar, on behalf of the Churchwardens, the Choir, and himself, presented Mr. Cox with a handsome marble clock, an inkstand and writing materials, as a mark of their appreciation of his services.

COALVILLE.—An invitation Concert was given on New Year's Eve by the members of the Part-Song Choir. The first part of the programme was sacred, and consisted of excerpts from the works of the great masters, the second portion comprising secular compositions by various composers. The members of the choir acquitted themselves with much success, their singing being marked by truthful expression and precision of attack. The audience was very large and thoroughly appreciative. Mr. Nunley efficiently presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. Clarke at the harmonium; Mr. Hurst, the hon. Conductor, directing the concert with much ability.

COBHAM.—Mr. J. F. Karn, A.C.O., Organist of the Parish Church, gave his first Concert in the National Schoolroom, on Thursday, the 3rd ult., before a large audience. The solo vocalists were Madame Clara West, Miss Lottie West, Mr. James L. Gregory, F.C.O., and Mr. Frank May (Evill prizeholder and gold medalist of the R.A.M.), all of whom were highly appreciated. Mr. Karn's pianoforte solos, and Mr. Payne's violin solos, were features of the Concert.

CULLOMPTON.—Mr. Alfred J. Gosden, Organist of the Parish Church, gave his third Annual Concert in the Infants' School on the 2nd ult. There was a good attendance, and encores were numerous. The vocalists were Mrs. Harding, Miss Isabel Chatterton, Mr. John M. Hayden (principal tenor of Salisbury Cathedral), Mr. G. Harding, and Mr. W. H. Thomas, all of whom were very successful. The pianoforte playing of Miss Flora Wrighton was a special feature of the Concert. Mr. Gosden conducted, and also played Diabelli's Duet in D with Miss Wrighton.

DUBLIN.—A Concert was given in the Molesworth Hall on the 16th ult., when an excellent programme was well rendered, and thoroughly appreciated. The artists were Mrs. Culwick, Miss Pilkington, Mr. W. B. Martin, Mr. Reeves, Mr. J. C. Culwick, Herren Lauer and Elsner, and Mr. Griffith. An interesting item in the programme was a manuscript quartet in E flat for pianoforte, violin, viola, and violoncello, composed by Mr. Culwick for the Dublin Instrumental Music Club, which was well received.

DUNSTER.—On the 3rd ult. the Philharmonic Society gave a successful Concert in the Assembly Rooms, before a large audience. The first part of the programme consisted of Dr. Stainer's new Cantata St. Mary Magdalen, for the first time in the West of England. The work was well rendered both by the solo vocalists—Miss M. Good, Miss Isabel Chatterton, Mr. E. T. Morgan, and Mr. H. St. B. Goldsmith—and chorus. The second part consisted principally of songs, interspersed with madrigals by the choir. Paer's Overture to Sargino was played by the orchestra, which was led by Mr. O. Sadler. The accompanist was Mrs. West, and the Conductor, Mr. J. Warriner, L. Mus. T.C.L., Organist of the Parish Church.

EDINBURGH.—Sir Herbert Oakeley's Organ Recital, on the afternoon of the 10th ult., commenced with a selection from The Messiah, seasonable to the Epiphany. The programme also included some excerpts from the operas La Favorita and Les Huguenots, in homage to the memory of the late Signor Mario. Sir Herbert's MS. setting of Tennyson's "Flow down, cold rivulet," was sung by Mr. Sneddon, who had been heard with much pleasure in the earlier part of the Concert. On being encored he substituted another song by the same composer. The class-room was crowded, both by pupils and professors.

ENNISKILLEN.—A very successful Concert was given on the 4th ult., in the Protestant Hall, on behalf of the Enniskillen Benefit Society. The band of the 13th Somersetshire Light Infantry performed several pieces under the direction of Mr. Veivers. The vocal performers included Miss Tallon, Messrs. Hamilton and Oldum, of Dublin, the Misses Weaver, McKenque, Benson, and Messrs. Lemon and Mercer, of Enniskillen. Mr. Arnold presided at the pianoforte.—A Concert, with Readings, took place, on the 10th ult., in Florence Court School Room, in aid of the restoration of the Parish Church, when an excellent programme was well rendered by Lady Alice Cole, Mr. Hamilton, Mr. Arnold, Revs. D. O'Leary, Bailey, D.D., and Jamieson, M.A.

ETON.—A Concert of Sacred Music was given at the William Street Congregational Chapel on Wednesday evening, the 9th ult. The programme included two new works, a Cantata, The Prodigal Son, and a Te Deum, both the composition of Mr. R. P. Paine, which were well received. The principal vocalists were Miss Annie Briggs, the Misses M. E. and A. H. Briggs, Miss Barnett, Messrs. Smith, Mellor, Christian, and Webb. Mr. G. F. Huntley presided at the organ.

EXETER.—At the fifth of the series of "People's Concerts," on the 12th ult., the Royal Marine Band, under the direction of Mr. H. Froehner, played an excellent selection of pieces, which were warmly received. The vocalist was Madame de Vaney, and M. Ivan Range was the accompanist and solo pianist. The Hall was well filled.

GLOSSOP.—The performance of Handel's Messiah by the Glossop-Dale Philharmonic Society, at the Wesley Chapel, High Street, on the 9th ult., was in every respect a decisive success. The engagement of Mr. Joseph Maas for the tenor music of the Oratorio was a powerful attraction; and the singing of Miss F. Bristowe (who was, however, suffering from indisposition), Miss H. Dutton, and Mr. J. Barrow was highly effective in the whole of the solos allotted to them. The choruses were admirably rendered; and Mr. Charles Hall, to whom the Society is so largely indebted for its present state of efficiency, conducted with his accustomed ability. Mr. Fairclough rendered valuable assistance at the organ.

GRAHAMSTOWN.—Mr. Winny's Concert at the Town Hall, on November 14, 1883, was in every respect a decided success. The performance of Haydn's Imperial Mass, with Misses De Beer, Bayne, Grace Davies, and Tidmarsh, Messrs. Price and Kay as the solo vocalists, was highly satisfactory, and reflected much credit upon the efforts of the Conductor, Mr. Winny. The second part of the programme was devoted to a miscellaneous selection of vocal and instrumental pieces, in which mention must be made of the excellent rendering of a pianoforte solo by the daughter of the Concert-giver.

GREENWICH.—Handel's Messiah was given on the 9th ult., at St. Mary's Church, by the Maze Hill Choral Society, with a full band and chorus of 150 performers, under the conductorship of Mr. Joseph Tucker. The soloists were Miss Blackwell, Miss Gordon Scott, Mr. C. E. Ellison, and Mr. Alfred Bunker, with Mr. J. E. Batchelor at the organ, and Mr. W. Marriott as leader. All the solos were rendered in a most satisfactory manner, and were highly appreciated, the singing of the choruses being also worthy of warm commendation. The performance was free to the public, admittance to the galleries being by tickets.—Mr. E. A. Williams gave a Concert, on the 17th ult., which was highly successful. The vocalists were Miss M. L. Evans, R.A.M.; Miss Nellie Lea, Miss M. Gwynne, Mr. Rowland Guy, and Mr. Williams; Mr. Pritchard also contributing his "Musical Sketches," which were well received. Able assistance was given by the Kentish Choral Society in some effective part-songs.

HAVERFORDWEST.—A very successful Concert of Sacred Music was given by Miss Lillian Thomas, on the 10th ult., in aid of the Wesleyan Renovation Fund. An excellent programme was well sustained by Miss Annie Harding, Miss A. Williams, Miss Thomas, Miss Green, Messrs. Edwin and James Thomas, and others. The Anthems were conducted by Mr. F. Greenish, Mus. Bac., Oxon. There was a large and appreciative audience, and the net proceeds amounted to the sum of £76 10s.

HAWICK.—To take up, with a view to public performance, a work which must be so comparatively new to the vocalists as Gounod's Redemption would be considered a bold venture for any provincial choral society; and it evidences much enthusiasm and enterprise, as well as a rapid and decided advance in musical proficiency in Hawick, that such a resolution had been adopted by the St. John's Sacred Harmonic Society. And no one of the large assembly which crowded the Exchange Hall, on Tuesday evening, the 8th ult., will hesitate to say that the style in which the work was performed fully justified the estimate which had been formed of the capabilities of the Society, and the confidence which had been placed in the judgment and skill of its Conductor. The Society of course had to rely on a band of professional musicians for the orchestral and solo parts of the work, but from first to last there was evidence that the choral portion had been thoroughly well rehearsed; and the local artists, quite as much as the foreign talent employed, must be congratulated on the complete success of what may be justly regarded as the most important musical event that has yet occurred in this part of Scotland. The great themes treated by the composer in this sacred Trilogy are the Passion and Death of the Redeemer, His Resurrection and Ascension, and the spread of the Gospel by His disciples. In depicting the various scenes connected with the going forth to Calvary and the Crucifixion, he has rather attempted to give expression to the savage fury and fiendish cruelty of the priests and the mob, and to present musical pictures of the stupendous phenomena which gathered around the cross, and attended the death of Him who hung upon it; and without doubt he has produced some really wondrous and memorable effects. All the choral music was finely sung, but the chorus which concludes the second part, "Unfold, ye portals everlasting," created an extraordinary impression. It corresponds to Handel's "Lift up your heads," in The Messiah, but on quite a different plan of treatment; and Gounod has evidently intended to make it one of the strongest points of the work. All the resources of band, soloists, and chorus were employed in it, and it was delivered with such telling effect that the audience broke through the restraint which had been well observed hitherto, and applauded heartily. A Celestial Choir of forty boys, placed at the top of the orchestra, had a splendid effect when rendering the words, "But who is He, the King of Glory," the answer being given in full chorus, "He who death o'ercame, the Lord in battle mighty." The solo parts were excellently rendered by Madame Laura Smart, Miss Nelly Anderson, Mdlle. Hallwood, Miss Annie Cowan, Messrs. Josef Cantor, S. Thornborough, and Eaton Batty, R.A.M. Mr. W. Fiddes-Wilson, Conductor of the Society, directed the performance with an intelligence and precision which cannot be over-praised, and Mr. T. H. Collinson, Mus. Bac., Organist of St. Mary's Cathedral, Edinburgh, presided at the organ.

HUDDERSFIELD.—The Concert of the Fitzwilliam Street Philharmonic Society, given at the Town Hall on the 16th ult., was in every respect a decided success. Miss Marie Thompson's vocal solos elicited warm and well deserved applause; and a marked feature in the programme was the admirable rendering of Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Concerto in G minor, by Mr. John Shaw, who also joined the Rev. J. Thomas in the Adagio and Rondo from Beethoven's Sonata, No. 5, for pianoforte and violin. Several pieces were well played by the orchestra, and an effective zither solo was contributed by Herr Fritz Bleissner. The Concert was ably conducted by the Rev. J. Thomas, and Mr. B. Shaw acted as accompanist.—At the Imperial Hotel, on the 18th ult., Mr. J. Wood, whose services in the cause of music in Huddersfield are so well known and thoroughly appreciated, was presented with a framed and illuminated address, a gold watch and chain, a purse containing seventy-five guineas, and a book with a list of the subscribers to the testimonial printed in it. The presentation, which was made on the occasion of Mr. Wood's retiring from the profession, was acknowledged by the recipient in a suitable speech; and after the proceedings the "Orpheus" Quartet Party and a number of friends gave a selection of songs and glees.

HUNSLLET.—A Popular Concert was given in the Mechanics' Institute on the 14th ult., the object being to cultivate a taste for music among the working classes of the neighbourhood. The principal vocalists were Miss Hilda Coward, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Henry Guy, and Mr. F. Elmore. A well selected programme was excellently rendered. Dr. Creser conducted and accompanied the songs.

HURSTPIERPOINT.—The second of a series of Organ Recitals was given in the Parish Church, on the 19th ult., by the Organist, Mr. H. C. Young, B.A., Cantab. The programme included selections from the works of Handel, Mendelssohn, Smart, Ouseley, V. Novello, and Mee Pattison. At the Christmas Services, Dykes's Te Deum and Benedictus, Barnby's Offertory Sentences, and Mee Pattison's Anthem, "There were shepherds abiding," were sung.

ILFRACOMBE.—The performance of Mendelssohn's Elijah, on the 3rd ult., at the Oxford Hall, by the Choral Society, was a decisive success. The principal vocalists, Miss Julia Jones, Miss Annie Layton, Mr. Montague Shepherd, and Signor Montecco, were highly efficient, and the whole of the choral music was admirably sung. The band, under the leadership of Mr. M. Rice, was thoroughly satisfactory, and valuable aid was given in the accompaniments by Mr. Bridgman at the organ, and Mrs. Burges at the pianoforte.

KENDAL.—Mr. S. Claude Ridley, of Liverpool, gave his third Organ Recital, in the Unitarian Chapel, on Thursday, the 17th ult. The programme consisted of selections from the works of Bach, Mendelssohn, Chopin, Gade, &c., and was listened to by a large audience. Mr. T. C. Fargher sang with much effect three sacred solos, and was highly commended by the local press.

KIDDERMINSTER.—At the Choral Society's Concert, on the 15th ult., the programme included Mendelssohn's "As the hart pants," which was admirably rendered. The solo vocalists were Miss E. Parry and Mr. C. Blagrod, both of whom were favourably received. Miss M. Pearce contributed violin solos. Mr. J. Johnson presided at the organ, Mr. T. Everist at the pianoforte, and Mr. Fitzgerald conducted.

LEEDS.—On the 5th ult. another of the free Organ Recitals was given by Dr. Spark, the Borough Organist, at the Town Hall. The programme was, as usual, admirably selected, and displayed with excellent effect the exceptionally fine powers both of the performer and the instrument.

LEICESTER.—The Amateur Harmonic Society, on Monday evening, the 14th ult., gave a performance of Handel's Oratorio Saul, in the Temperance Hall. The principal vocalists were Miss A. Askew, Miss Adderley, Mr. H. Ford, and Mr. McRobie. Mr. D. T. Jackson conducted, Mr. W. J. Bunney rendered valuable assistance at the organ; and Mr. J. T. Kilby was principal violin. The audience was numerous, and, judging from the applause, seemed much gratified.

LEIGHTON BUZZARD.—A successful performance of The Messiah was given by the Choral Society, on December 26, under the conductorship of Mr. Eard. The band, strengthened by performers from London, was highly efficient; and the choruses were admirably sung. The vocalists engaged were Miss Fanny Perfit, Miss Coyte Turner, Mr. Reginald Groome, and Mr. Forington, all of whom acquitted themselves in a highly artistic manner. The hall was crowded in every part.

MANCHESTER.—Miss Amina Goodwin, who has been recently under the tuition of the Abbé Liszt, gave a Chamber Concert at the Lecture Hall, on the 7th ult., when she fully evidenced her artistic progress as a pianist of the highest class by her rendering of a classical programme, including solos by Liszt, Chopin, and Rubinstein, and concerted pieces by Schumann, Schubert, &c., in which she was ably assisted by Messrs. Bauerheller, Spielman, Vieuxtemps, and Neuwirth. Miss Goodwin was most enthusiastically received throughout the evening; and the vocalist, Madame Adeline Paget, also elicited warm and well-deserved applause.

NEWCASTLE.—The second of the present series of Orchestral Concerts, promoted by Messrs. Alderson and Brentnall, took place in the Town Hall, on the 14th ult., and was highly successful. An excellent programme was most efficiently rendered. Mr. Charles Hallé was the pianist, and Mdlle. Warnots the vocalist.

NEWNHAM-ON-SEVERN.—Miss M. Morgan gave an Evening Concert at the Town Hall, on the 10th ult., which was well attended. Miss Morgan was assisted by Miss Margaret Hoare, R.A.M., Miss A. Morgan, Mr. W. H. Brereton, Mr. Morgan, and Mr. Hunt. Miss A. T. Jones, R.A.M., was received with much favour—her skilful harp playing being an attractive feature of the Concert. Miss Morgan, Mr. Townsend, and Mr. W. H. Morgan acted as accompanists.

NORWICH.—On Saturday, the 12th ult., an excellent Concert, on behalf of the Church of Kirby Bedon, was given in St. Andrew's Hall.

The vocalists were Miss Beaumont, Miss Clara Wollaston, Master Islip, and the Rev. E. H. Kinder; organist, Dr. Gower; violinist, Mr. F. W. B. Noverre; Conductors, Drs. Bunnett and Gower. Miss Beaumont obtained an encore for "Good Night" and Miss Wollaston for an effective rendering of "Forget, forgive" (with violin obbligato). There was a very good attendance, and the Concert was a great success.

OLDHAM.—On the 23rd ult. a Concert was given in the Tit-Bits Coffee Tavern to a crowded audience. The vocalists were Miss Rothwell, Miss Cox, Messrs. Wood, Crompton, Vesagra, Kenny, Hagan and others; Masters D. M. Greaves and J. E. Hatfield (violin) and Mr. J. Greaves, accompanist.

ONGAR.—The annual Concert of the Ongar Cricket Club took place at the Drill Hall, on the 9th ult., when the following artists assisted: Mrs. Clive, Miss Elsa Odell, Miss Alma Young, Mr. G. Sargent, and Mr. Cooper, vocalists, and Miss Gwendoline Brown, violinist. Encores were awarded for the songs of Miss Elsa Odell and Mrs. Clive; and Miss Brown's violin solo was an attractive feature of the evening. The Hall was well filled with an appreciative audience; and the Concert was in every respect highly successful.

ORE, NEAR HASTINGS.—On the 6th ult., the new organ at Christ Church was used for the first time, when the following artists (Organist of St. Andrew and St. Philip's Church, Upper Westbourne Park, London) presiding at the instrument both in the morning and evening. The Te Deum and Jubilate were sung to Jackson's setting in F, and the anthem was Whitfield's "I will lift up mine eyes" at the morning service. At evening the choir from the Parish Church assisted, the Psalms being sung to Purcell's and Harvey's chants, and the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis to Dr. Bunnett's setting in F. The organ, which is an extremely fine instrument, was purchased by subscription, and was built by Messrs. Harper Bros., of Brighton.

PARGATE, SHEFFIELD.—The performance of Mendelssohn's Elijah at the United Methodist Free Church, on December 26, by the Ramnath and Pargate Sacred Harmonic Society, was an unqualified success. Miss Beattie Holt, R.A.M., Miss Margaret Hancock, Mr. Redfern Hollins, and Mr. Goodhead, the principal vocalists, were thoroughly efficient, Miss Holt's excellent rendering of "Hear ye Israel" securing a unanimous encore. The choruses were given with remarkable precision and effect, under the able conductorship of Mr. Brameld. The orchestra, of about thirty performers, was led by Mr. John Peck.

PETERSFIELD.—A Concert, with an orchestra and choir of seventy performers, was given in the Corn Exchange on Friday evening, the 4th ult. The principal item in the programme was Bennett's Cantata The May Queen, which was well rendered. The solo vocalists were Mrs. May Owen, Miss Tristram, Mr. A. Colbourne, and Mr. C. Wilson. Miss Cross presided at the Pianoforte, and Mr. A. Burnell at the American Organ. Mr. G. E. Lake conducted.

PETERMARITZBURG, NATAL.—Mendelssohn's Oratorio Elijah was performed for the first time by the local Philharmonic Society, on November 29, 1883, conducted by Mr. J. C. Dunster, late of East Twickenham and Carlton Choral Societies. The rendering of the work was highly creditable, and may be regarded as the greatest musical achievement of this colony. The choir and orchestra numbered over a hundred. Mr. Carmichael (late of Edinburgh) specially distinguished himself by his artistic singing of the part of Elijah, the other soloists being Mrs. Darch, Mrs. Eicke, and Mr. J. Holding.

ROCHFORD.—On Wednesday, the 9th ult., the Choral Society gave a Concert at the Corn Exchange, consisting of choruses from oratorios, part-songs, &c., interspersed with solos, duets, &c. The members of the Society were assisted by Miss Clara Wollaston (pupil of Mr. J. B. Welch), who elicited much applause, several of her songs being encored. Mr. F. Greyson conducted.

SEVENOAKS.—On Tuesday, the 8th ult., the St. John's Choral Society gave its third Concert at the Royal Crown Assembly Rooms, when a miscellaneous programme of part-songs and choruses, interspersed with solos, &c., was performed under the able direction of the Conductor to the Society, Mr. Geo. E. Blunden. The Choir is to be warmly congratulated on the great improvement effected since the last public performance: accuracy of intonation, precision of attack, and the gradations of light and shade having been particularly well attended to. The Society was assisted by Miss Clara Wollaston and Mr. Bridson, who were highly effective in all their songs. Of the amateur soloists we would specially mention the lady who sang Marziale's "Ask nothing more," and the gentleman who gave an excellent rendering of Clay's "The sands of Dec." Mr. Blunden played Dr. Arnold's Pianoforte Sonata in F minor, besides taking part in the accompaniments and a very effective piano and harmonium duet by Mr. E. Prout.

SOUTHBOROUGH, KENT.—The members of the choirs of St. Peter's and Christ Church, gave, at the Parochial Hall, on Friday, the 4th ult., an evening of Christmas Carols and Anthems, interspersed with appropriate readings. The solo vocalists were Masters C. Crow, H. Marchant, and A. Schermain, Miss Ford, Mr. Standing, and Mr. T. W. Marchant. The singing throughout appeared to give much satisfaction, and was very creditable to the members of the associated choirs, who were conducted by Mr. Codner, of St. Peter's, and Mr. Fletcher, of Christ Church. A pianoforte solo was performed by Miss Baynes at the commencement of the second part, and the evening closed with the singing of the hymn "Adeste Fideles."

STOCKTON-ON-TEES.—The new organ placed in St. John's Church by Messrs. Stringer and Co., Hanley, was opened on Sunday, the 20th ult., by Mr. James H. Rooks, of Bradford. The organ, which is a very fine instrument, was shown to the utmost advantage by Mr. Rooks, his masterly rendering of Bach's Fugue in A minor being specially noticeable.

STOURBRIDGE.—Mr. Hedley Satchell's Annual Concert was given at the Corn Exchange, on the 14th ult., before a crowded audience. The vocalists were Miss Jos. Sherrington, Miss Henden-Warde, Miss Ellen Marchant, and Mr. H. Moberley: solo violin, Mr. F. Ward; accompanist, Mr. Edwin Boardman.

TORQUAY.—A Concert in aid of the British Seaman's Home was given on the 4th ult., under the direction of Mr. P. Craddock, Mus. Bac., Organist of Upton Church, and under the patronage of the Duchess of Sutherland, and other ladies of wealth and position. The artists included Miss Mary Beare, R.A.M., Miss Blanche Campbell, and Mr. H. Sullivan (vocalists); Mr. Rice (violin); Miss Dinah Shapley, Mr. C. Fowler, Miss Baynes, and Miss Rowlandson (pianoforte). The choir of Upton Church gave several glees and part-songs, and Mr. Rice and Mr. Fowler contributed Svendsen's "Romanze" for violin and piano in a finished manner. Miss Dinah Shapley played a Scherzo by Chopin for the pianoforte with ease and grace, and Mr. Fowler's piano solo, Weber's "Rondo Giocoso" was a brilliant performance. The honours of the evening, however, fell to Miss Mary Beare, for her singing of Rossini's "Bel Raggio," and Sullivan's "Orpheus with his Lute." The first named was redemanded, and at the close of the second song the applause was so protracted that the singer was compelled to reappear and sing again.

TROWBRIDGE.—On Tuesday evening, the 1st ult., the second of a series of Organ Recitals was given in the Manvers Street Wesleyan Chapel, by the Organist, Mr. O. A. Mansfield, A.C.O., to a large and appreciative audience. Vocal selections from the Oratorios were contributed by Mdlle. Jutz and the Rev. S. L. Usher.

TUTBURY.—On Friday, the 18th ult., a very successful Concert was given in the Church Schoolroom in aid of the funds of the Choral Society. The principal vocalists were Madame Clara Gardiner and Mr. Bingley Shaw (Southwell Cathedral). Several members of the Society also gave songs and pianoforte solos. Mr. Herbert Drury conducted with his usual ability.

WARE.—The first Organ Recital of a second series was given in the Parish Church, on Tuesday, the 8th ult., by Mr. James L. Gregory, F.C.O., assisted by Mr. Alfred E. Gregory, a Mus. T.C.L., who contributed vocal solos. An excellent classical programme was well rendered.

WARMINSTER.—Dr. Alcock gave a Lecture entitled "An Evening with Beethoven," in the Athenæum, on the 8th ult., which was highly appreciated. The musical illustrations were well rendered, the solo vocalists being Mrs. Jeans and Mr. Hayden; solo pianoforte Miss Chute. The Misses Alcock accompanied on the pianoforte, and there was a small band conducted by Dr. Alcock.

WHITWORTH, NEAR ROCHDALE.—A Concert was given in the New Mission Room and Infant School, Lloyd Street, on Wednesday evening, the 9th ult., in aid of the building fund. The programme was miscellaneous. The principal vocalists were Mrs. Pidduck, Miss Bevan, and Mr. Green, all of whom were highly successful, several of their songs being encored. Miss Bevan also played with much effect two pianoforte pieces; and Mr. Rothwell's violin solos were a marked feature in the selection. Mr. Robert Wrigley was an able accompanist.

WIMBORNE.—The Wimborne Minster Orpheus Quartet had the honour of singing, on the 24th ult., before their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales during their visit to Lord and Lady Alington, at Crichele. The Prince and Princess were much pleased with the excellent rendering of the glees.

WINDSOR.—The Annual Carol Concert took place, at the Albert Institute, on Monday evening, the 7th ult., under the superintendence of Mr. Samuel Smith. The choir was taken by the Vicar, the Rev. Canon Gee. The solo vocalists were Miss M. E. Briggs, Miss A. Knowles, Masters Davies, Kearton, and Way, Messrs. B. Ramsbottom, Ogilvy, and O. Christian. Mr. H. R. Coudrey presided at the Pianoforte, and Mr. A. Smith at the harmonium.

WITHYHAM.—At the Parish Church on Sunday, December 30, an Organ Recital was given, after evening service, by Mr. Edwin Barnes, Organist of Holy Trinity Church, Paddington, when an excellent programme was admirably rendered. The collections, both at the morning and evening service, were in aid of the Choir Fund.

WOLVERHAMPTON.—On December 28, the Festival Choral Society gave its second Concert of the present season in the Agricultural Hall, when Handel's Messiah was excellently performed, under the conductorship of Dr. Swinnerton Heap. The principal vocalists were Miss Emily Farnol, Miss Emily Dones, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. J. Bridson, who gave the whole of the solos with marked success. All the choruses were rendered with the utmost precision and effect, the "Hallelujah" and "All we like sheep," being especially worthy of mention. The trumpet obbligato of Mr. Robinson to the air, "The trumpet shall sound," was a decided feature in the performance.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. E. Parker Hides to St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church, Sheffield.—Mr. J. Percy Baker, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Thomas's Church, Charlton.—Mr. James A. Crapper, Organist and Choirmaster to the Parish Church, Jedburgh, N.B.—Mr. Alfred Hickman to Park Lane Chapel, Netherend, near Brierley Hill.—Mr. Walter J. IMPORTANT to all TEACHERS of the PIANOFORTE.—The old method of teaching Music is now entirely superseded by a far more excellent method, which claims to be the only correct and reasonable method for teaching Pianoforte-playing. Mr. Felix Sommer, one of the most efficient music-masters in the neighbourhood of London, writes as follows concerning this NEW PIANOFORTE TUTOR. (For particulars see below.)

"Sutton Lane, Chiswick, October 30, 1883.

"Dear Herr Hoering,—I am very much obliged to you for your pamphlets and specimen copy of 'Tutor.' I have only had time to look rapidly through the latter, but I have seen sufficient to show me that it contains everything you claim for it; and I shall cordially recommend it as far as it may be in my power. It is conscientious, and thoroughly musicianlike, and I feel quite sure that it will be much appreciated by the majority of the musical profession."

Now ready.

BOOKS I. and II. of A. HOERING'S NEW METHOD FOR THE PIANOFORTE, on an entirely new principle:—
 OPINIONS FROM PROFESSIONALS.

"I like it immensely."

"An excellent method, and worthy of all teachers' notice."

"I find your method excellent."

"Infinitely superior to all I have tried before."

"I think your system wonderfully good, and just the thing that was wanted."

"Comparison only shows the merits of your system to greater advantage."

THE CHILDREN'S HOUR

NEW PART-SONG. PRICE 3D.

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"This Part-Song, written for, and dedicated to, the Kyrie Society, is laid out in Mr. Gaul's very best manner, and while recalling, for its beautiful effects, his elegant Part-Song 'The Silent Land,' the resemblance begins and ends there. Mr. Gaul knows to the very letter the capabilities of the voices he writes for, and one is perfectly safe, even after a single experience only, in predicting a widespread popularity to 'The Children's Hour.'"—Birmingham Daily Mail.

Miss Kilmansegg & her Golden Leg

GRAND OLD-FASHIONED CANTATA

CAROLINE HOLLAND

Words by THOMAS HOOD.

Price 3s.

"In the music Miss Holland has written to Hood's poem she shows herself to be possessed of real talent for dramatic writing, combined with a thoroughly English vein of melody. . . ."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"Miss Kilmansegg" is not only a very musical composition as far as the mere details of the labour and construction are concerned, but it is also full of those subtle touches of art which can 'raise or quell' the feelings of the listeners. . . . Is at times tender as well as comic, and never is wanting in the element of refinement."—Morning Post.

"Miss Holland's music is extremely tuneful and pleasing, and it overflows with fun. Her setting of the more comic passages of Hood's poem is an example of admirable fooling. . . . The work was extremely well rendered. . . . the whole chorus entered heartily into the spirit of the fun. The Cantata may be cordially recommended to small Choral Societies in search of light music."—Athenaeum.

"From among the numerous Concerts recently given, a couple may be selected at which work of an unusually interesting character was done. One of these took place on the 4th of May, when a large audience gathered to hear the performance, by Miss Holland's choir, of that lady's Cantata 'Miss Kilmansegg and her Golden Leg.' This has now been given four times this season. . . . The music is bright and pretty, and more than one number is likely to become popular. It was capably performed by the choir."—Musical Review.

PRICE ONE SHILLING AND SIXPENCE.

CONTENTS:—

On the hidden wood-path.	A lifetime wasted.
Sunset.	Lo! he has come.
Not a star.	Autumn sorrow.
Sunset.	Will she come to-day?
Breathlessly the Lake reposes.	Love in May.
In the forest, moonbeamed-brightened.	Yea, thou art blighted.
The Swiss Soldier's complaint.	The last tear.
Rest on me, thou eye of darkness.	Love song.
At night I see thee with dreaming eyes.	When my despair is deepest.
Dreams.	Sweetest maid with lips like roses.
The rose and the lily.	Thinking of thee.
On the sea.	The rose has made sad moan to me.
Gently through my bosom flow.	In Rhine's broad rolling waters.
Omnipresence.	Forgotten.
Thou art far.	Good Night.

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"The work is an honour to English Art, and has elevated its composer into a place of distinction amongst native musicians."—Queen.

"A good sound musical work is this 'Holy City.' I have no hesitation in saying that it creditably represents English art, and does honour not only to the skill but to the judgment and taste of Mr. Gaul."—Daily Telegraph.

"The reception was favourable in the extreme, and the Cantata must henceforth be classed among the successes which the Birmingham Musical Festivals have brought to light."—Standard.

"The Holy City" is evidently the work of a thoughtful as well as a clever composer, and should make its mark among thoroughly English productions of a sacred character."—Musical Times.

"We hope and believe that the reception given last night to Mr. Gaul and to his 'Holy City' Cantata will prove an earnest of its popularity and acceptance throughout the length and breadth of the land."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"A most interesting, tuneful, and scholarly work."—Manchester Courier.

"This fine work will considerably enhance Mr. Gaul's reputation as a musician."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

WINDSOR AND ETON GAZETTE.

"We are pleased to be able to compliment Mr. Paine upon his success. 'The Prodigal Son' has already started upon a second journey, the first edition having been run through in a short space of time. 'I will arise' was a very fine chorus; 'Let us eat and make merry,' a fine chorus, being sung with all the spirit that it demanded.
One of the finest solos in the Cantata was that sung by Mr. Mellor.
'Lo, these many years,' and rendered as it deserved. The final chorus, 'Blessed be His glorious Name,' and 'Amen,' which was certainly the finest rendered during the evening, brought the Cantata to a fitting termination. Prolonged applause, again and again repeated, greeted the conductor and composer, Mr. Paine; and, by particular request, the last chorus was repeated."

The same paper says, with respect to the "Te Deum laudamus," performed on the same evening:—"Its performance was a great success. The 'Te Deum' was brought to a close amid great applause, which was fully deserved by Mr. Paine, who himself conducted the performance of both his works throughout the evening."

OLD IRELAND

AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN"

BERTHOLD TOURS.

Price 2s. 6d.

PREFACE.

Some years ago I found, among the Petrie Collection, many rare and beautiful Irish airs, to which from time to time I wrote words.
The result is the present publication.

Mr. Berthold Tours has, in his symphonies and accompaniments, done exactly what should be done with national melodies—namely, as little as possible. For such music, simplicity is the truest art.

Being myself an Irishwoman, my work has been a work of love;
hoping to sing—not sermonise—into the English heart a tenderer feeling towards Old Ireland. I prefer to dwell, not on the faults, but the virtues of my people; their domestic purity, their strong affections, their innate loyalty, courage, and fidelity; also, last, not least, their indomitable gaieté de cœur, which implies neither hardness, shallowness, nor selfishness of heart, yet enables the Celtic nature to tide over trouble in a way which the more sombre Saxon can hardly understand. If I can do this, I shall go on singing. Thus taking up
Thomas Moore's harp, I may lay it down, as he did, with his own
farewell words—

"I was but as the wind passing heedlessly over,
And all the wild sweetness I waked was thine own."

THE AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."

June, 1883.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"The melodies—six in number—are all characteristic and unmistakably Celtic. The words are good throughout, and we agree with the author of 'John Halifax' that, by doing as little as possible in the way of accompaniment, Mr. Tours has best performed the task entrusted to him. Students of national music will not refuse to give
'Old Ireland' a place in their collection."

MORNING POST.

"The musical part of the work has been admirably done, the harmonies, chiefly tonal, eminently fit the nature of the melodies, of which there are only six in the collection. Their natural beauty excites a wish for more."

Patent Organ Pedal Attachment

TO THE

PIANOFORTE.

JOSH. SHAW

Wishes respectfully to draw the attention of Organists, and all who wish for this desirable boon, to his invention, which he has now duly patented on the

"ESCAPEMENT PRINCIPLE."

This Attachment is allowed by all who have seen it to be the most perfect and unique yet in existence, far excelling all direct actions, which are entirely at the mercy of the feet, its chief features being that a perfectly crisp and uniform note is imparted by the pedal to the key of the piano, no matter whether the pedalling is legato or otherwise, the pedal not acting directly on the key; and, moreover, there is a perfect immunity from any damage to the Piano.

Notice particularly that this is the only Attachment acting purely on the

without which any scheme, however cheap, is altogether unsatisfactory and dangerous to the Piano.

BANKERS.—Manchester and Salford Banking Co. (Chorley Branch). THE UNPARALLELED SUCCESS WHICH HAS ATTENDED AINSWORTH'S "THE ONLY PATENT PEDAL ACTION" IS DUE TO ITS SUPERIORITY AND THE FACT THAT IT FULLY SUPPLIES A LONG-FELT WANT—viz.,

A PLEASANT AUXILIARY FOR ORGANISTS AND ORGAN STUDENTS ABSOLUTELY FREE FROM ANNOYANCES.

THIS UNIQUE INVENTION almost invariably evokes the most flattering letters and agreeably surprises the most sanguine. The following are a few extracts from letters received:—

"Considering the first-class material and workmanship of your Patent Action and Organ Pedals, the price is a marvel of cheapness. Never in all my business transactions did I pay money more freely than for your Pedals and Action."

"The attachment I found easy, the directions being clearly defined and simple. The Pedals and Action are even superior than your Drawings, &c., led me to believe—the working of both is simply beautiful."

"As you are already aware I have had three sets of pedals which proved worse than useless, you will not be surprised to receive a good account of the set I received from you. I have given them a fair test, and can only say that those who (like myself previous to purchasing yours) think organ pedals attached to a Pianoforte of little use, will, by purchasing for themselves a set of your Pedals and Action, be pleased to find their views much changed."

"Having with great benefit and delight used for over one year the set of Pedals and Action I bought for myself, you will be glad to hear they are none the worse. My pupils are also much improved through the use of your valuable invention. The order enclosed is for a very promising pupil. I hope to send an order for three more sets shortly."

Pedals can be disconnected by simply drawing out Stop 17 (see drawing 4). They can also be drawn away and replaced instantly.

BERLIOZ'S "MESSE DES MORTS" AND ITS PERFORMANCE IN GLASGOW

By FR. NIECKS.

BERLIOZ begins to weigh upon the artistic conscience of our time like a horrible nightmare, and unless an heroic effort is made to rouse ourselves, to break the paralysing spell, the result will be fatal, no less than death to the feeling of ideal beauty—of the true, pure, serene, noble and genuinely sublime. The prestige of the French master, a prestige by no means wholly baseless, has made cowards of a multitude that now lies prostrate—worshipping in awe rather than in love and trusting, undoubting faith—before the idol it but lately ridiculed. Small is the number of those who dare to form an opinion on the "Messe des Morts," smaller still the number of those who dare to express their opinion if they have formed an adverse one. Under these circumstances a bold and even violent declaration may not be unwelcome, and certainly cannot be unseasonable or unjustifiable; for which reason I venture to state my humble opinion without preamble, apology, and circumlocution.

The "Messe des Morts," so far from being a thing of beauty that will remain a joy for ever, is but a remarkable monstrosity that will occupy the curiosity of the musical world for a little while and then become a dead item of history. It is a rudis indigestaque mola, a chaotic jumble of matter, forms, and styles. Ghastly simulacra of plain-chant, early a cappella style, later imitative counterpoint, and most modern romanticism, jostle each other in grotesque confusion. Thus, whilst readily admitting that the work is rich in beautiful details—in wonderful effects of instrumental colouring, harmonic combination, and architectural disposition—I cannot help regarding it as non bene junctarum discordia semina rerum. I am not an indiscriminate disparager of Berlioz. It is possible to admire "Harold" and "Faust" without applauding the "Requiem." I still think, as I did some years ago, that Berlioz is an artist not perfect, but of many perfections. He shows to advantage when he deals with romantic, picturesque subjects, or subjects admitting a romantic, picturesque treatment; in short, subjects in which his eccentricity, explosive passionateness, and love of the fantastic and colossal find ample scope. But in the "Messe des Morts" the composer undertook a task for which his character and genius wholly unfitted him. The all-absorbing tendency of his nature was externality and realism; the subject, on the other hand, demanded inwardness and ideality.

My friend, Mr. Barry, allowed himself to be so far carried away by his zeal to secure for Berlioz's work a good reception as to speak slightly of the composers in the a cappella style.* Palestrina's compositions "passionless and arid"? Well, passionless they may be, but that they are arid cannot be seriously maintained for a moment. I will not now enter on a discussion of the question whether passionless or emotional music is preferable for liturgical purposes. Indeed, in order not to complicate my argument I will grant that the emotional element is not only admissible, but in our time even indispensable. Now, however, I ask: Does Berlioz in the "Messe des Morts" evolve the emotions inherent in his subject? It seems to me that every unprejudiced judge must answer this question with an emphatic "No." Where, indeed, will he find in this work true devoutness, heartfelt repentance, clinging faith, spiritual exaltation? If Berlioz succeeds in impressing his hearers with anything it is terror. And how does he produce this effect? By noise, by the unloosening of the elemental forces of the tone-world. Still this frank brutality is more pleasing than the trickeries and the continual straining after the unusual and unexpected in the more subdued portions of the work. What of edification we derive from these latter is to a great extent owing to the relief they afford our tortured auditory organs. Should the music itself not be a sufficiently convincing proof of the fact that Berlioz's sympathies were mainly engaged by the Tuba mirum spargens sonum and other similar passages of the text, let him who doubts take up and read the master's letters and "Mémoires," where all his self-gratulating, self-glorifying talk centres in the "terrible musical cataclysms." In one word, the radical fault of Berlioz's work is its insincerity. To speak in one breath of the "Messe des Morts" and Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" is blasphemy. Beethoven's work is full of the warmest, intensest, and purest religiosity; that of Berlioz is in this respect absolutely inane—vox, et præterea nihil. Beethoven wrote above the Kyrie of his work, "From the heart it has come, to the heart it shall go." Berlioz could not have said this of any part of his work. For, without exception, every one of them is more or less the result of calculation—they are made, not born. And how could it be otherwise? Listen to what Ferdinand Hiller says concerning his friend's religious and artistic constitution: "Of his Catholic education every trace had disappeared; doubts of all sorts had possession of him, and the contempt of what he called prejudice bordered on the monstrous. . . . I had been brought up, as regards religious views, in pure deism, and also my artistic views were, so to speak, of a deistic nature. Berlioz believed neither in a God nor in Bach—neither in absolute beauty in art nor in virtue in life." ("Künstlerleben," p. 70.) Surely all the gifts that nature can bestow and science and practice develop will not enable such a man to become a creator of sacred music.

The character of Berlioz presents a strange conglomeration of qualities, some of them noble, others the very reverse of admirable. Mr. Barry, in placing unlimited confidence in the autobiographer's trustworthiness, committed a grave error. He thereby not only made his otherwise so carefully collected and pleasantly-marshalled data defective, but he also helped to disseminate unfounded accusations against two honourable and universally known men. Berlioz had either no moral sense, or—and this is the more likely supposition—his mental vision and memory were vitiated by a too active imagination. At any rate, his so-called "Mémoires" are a string of fables, not to use a stronger word. "It is necessary," writes Edmond Hippeau, an enthusiastic admirer and indefatigable proclaimer of the master's genius, in his "Berlioz Intime" (which first appeared in the pages of "La Renaissance Musicale," and lately in book-form), "that we should search for the motives of Berlioz's deceptions and incessant criminations against his contemporaries, collaborators, rivals, or enemies. As in the narration of the romance—that is to say, in the study of Berlioz in love—I have still to cite and criticise texts, for I continue to reconstruct the true Berlioz—a person very different from the legendary Berlioz painted by the 'Mémoires' and by the biographers who have been taken in by this confession which is a perpetual apology." The two calumniated musicians above alluded to are Cherubini and Habeneck, the former of whom Berlioz accuses of having intrigued against the performance of the "Messe des Morts," and the latter of having laid down the conducting-stick and taken a pinch of snuff at the most critical moment of the performance. To the first accusation, a letter written by Berlioz to Cherubini, on March 24, 1837, and published in the second edition of the "Correspondance Inédite," gives a downright denial. It runs: "I am deeply touched by your noble abnegation, which leads you to refuse your admirable 'Requiem' for the ceremony of the Invalides. Be convinced of my heartiest gratitude." Halévy's conduct in this affair is defended by Berlioz's devoted young friend, Ernest Reyer. "Berlioz attributes to Halévy a rather pitiable [risiste] rôle, which does not seem to us compatible with the honourable, elevated, and benevolent character of the author of 'La Juive.' Berlioz was of a very irritable and also somewhat suspicious nature. . . . Well, I will not believe with Berlioz that Halévy's calling on the director of the Journal des Débats had another object [than that of getting for Cherubini as a consolation the croix de commandeur de la légion d'honneur]." With regard to Habeneck, M. Hippeau remarks: "The letter to Ferrand [dated December 17, 1837; see 'Lettres intimes,' p. 178], which gives an account of the performance of the 'Requiem,' says not a word about the affair of the snuff-box. Only one line in it is about the conductor, and that line partakes of the general enthusiasm: 'Even Habeneck has altogether come round again' [est tout-à-fait revenu]. Afterwards, when the chapter of the 'Mémoires' appeared in the Monde Illustré, Berlioz wrote to his friend—namely, twenty years afterwards: 'You will read in the last number the narration (much weakened) of the crime attempted against me by Cavé and Habeneck at the first performance of my "Requiem." But is this not a story imagined after the event, seeing that we find no trace of it either in the letter of 1837 or in the accounts of the Débats and Gazette Musicale, where Berlioz would not have failed to mention so grave an incident?' Although the result of my own endeavours to ascertain the truth of Berlioz's statements is not conclusive, it corroborates the conclusions of M. Hippeau. No one remembered having heard at the time of such an occurrence, and even one who had been present at the performance as an executant knew nothing of it. All were of opinion that Berlioz must have drawn the story from his inner consciousness.* It would be easy to point out other discrepancies between the letters and the "Mémoires" in the composer's account of the circumstances, especially of the pecuniary transactions, in connection with the performance of the "Requiem," but we must tarry over these matters no longer.

This historical digression is not so foreign to a criticism of the work under discussion as may at first sight appear; it is indeed a comment on my remarks about the insincerity of Berlioz. In life and in art he is for ever attitudinising and striving after effect. He does not for a moment forget that he is in presence of an audience, though the audience may be his most intimate friend. His supreme endeavour is always to make himself interesting, and to set the world agape. To effect he sacrifices unheatingly truth, friendship, the sanctities of love, and all that is noble and beautiful. Could Berlioz have written the Offertory ("Domine Jesu Christe"), with its chorus throughout, except at the close, on two notes, if he had been in earnest, absorbed in his theme? To be sure, the composition is a wonderful tour de force, and not without charm; but the procedure savours rather of the artificial than of the artistic—at any rate, is out of keeping with the gravity of the occasion and the import of the words. Berlioz's insincerity is further exemplified by his imitations of styles which he regarded as embryonic or pedantic. How strange that one who looked down with contempt on Palestrina, and jeered and sneered at those who composed fugues, should write the "Quaerens me," the "Hosanna in excelsis," and other portions of the "Messe des Morts"! Such a sacrilegious hypocrisy did not escape the punishment it deserved—the attempted imitations resulted in miserable failures. Cherubini said truly of Berlioz, "If he does not love the fugue, it is because the fugue does not love him" ("S'il n'aime pas la fugue, c'est que la fugue ne l'aime pas"). In listening to the "Quaerens me," you think you hear a rehearsal by the singers, without the instrumentalists, of an accompanied choral work. How empty, desolate, un-beautiful this is! The voices wander hither and thither like disconsolate shades on the shores of Acheron. Perhaps some one will tell us that this is an intended effect. But then what becomes of art? Unless art can in some way idealise the real, transmute by a subtle alchemy ugliness into beauty, it has no business to meddle with the real and the ugly. However, the words in question neither demand nor naturally suggest such a treatment; they are a heart-felt prayer inspired by the consciousness of guilt and the trustfulness of firm faith, being characterised above all by warmth and sweetness. The melodic element in this and other parts of the "Messe des Morts" is often wanting in nobility, and not rarely exhibits awkwardness. Berlioz's talent is indeed rhythmic, harmonic, and chromatic, rather than melodic. To this deficiency of natural melodic flow—very conspicuous in his part-writing, most conspicuous in his counterpoint, than which nothing can be more hard, dry, and angular—may be to a great extent ascribed the ineffectiveness of the choruses.

* But even if Cherubini and his friends made efforts to get his "Requiem" performed, this was by no means so shocking a proceeding as Berlioz seems to have imagined. In this case the greatest musician of the time, whom Beethoven had honoured above all his contemporaries, who held the highest musical post in France, and whose compositions had hitherto graced the most solemn occasions, would have claimed the precedence due to his genius, reputation, and position. To speak of Cherubini as of an impotent botcher intriguing against a better man is simply ridiculous. Moreover, the romanticism of Berlioz must have been to the classic a thing of evil. That Cherubini owed Berlioz no debt of love the "Mémoires" prove only too well.

Berlioz is now universally acknowledged as an unsurpassed master in the handling of orchestral resources. Unfortunately his love of the unexpected and the grand, as he understands it, leads him frequently into doubtful paths. The combination of three flutes and eight tenor trombones in the "Hostias," and four flutes and eight tenor trombones in the "Agnus Dei"—the flutes soaring in the higher regions and the trombones descending to the lowermost depths (the composer makes here use of the unusual "pedal-notes")—reminds one of the dangerous proximity of the sublime and the ridiculous. Du sublime au ridicule il n'y a qu'un pas. The most striking feature of the work is, however, the unprecedented instrumental force. With regard to it I must confess (may the shade of Berlioz forgive me!) that I cannot help thinking the effect produced by the five bands with their imposing, nay, overwhelming array of drums is far from being commensurate with the means employed. Moreover, I feel inclined to pronounce the sixteen variously tuned kettle-drums that roll forth harmonious thunder in full chords a complete failure. As to the four brass bands, what are they compared to the one trumpet of the poem?

Tuba mirum spargens sonum
Per sepulchra regionum,
Coget omnes ante thronum.

No more than mere toy instruments. Here is another bark split on the rock of realism. The impression the hearer receives from the "Tuba mirum" and the other "terrible cataclysms" is unquestionably "foudroyant," but it is equally unquestionably purely physical. In short, we may accept wholly and literally the composer's own description, "C'est d'une horrible grandeur."

More satisfaction give the less noisy portions—the "Lachrymosa," "Offertorium," "Hostias," "Sanctus," and "Agnus Dei." There is, however, on the whole—if we except the "Lachrymosa," and a section or passage here and there—little design in them (design in contradistinction to masses of colour, and light and shade). Were I to discuss the work in detail, I would object to the cutting up of the prose Dies Iræ into small separate sections, a procedure of course not peculiar to Berlioz, but perhaps less felicitously accomplished by him than by many of his great predecessors. Some of these sections (notably the "Quid sum miser") have too much the appearance of pigmies among giants, of miniatures beside immense wall-paintings. Nor would I leave unnoticed the composer's capricious omissions and re-arrangements of the words of the text, of which I can neither approve nor see the necessity.

With a work of the nature of the "Messe des Morts" all depends upon the execution. Unless the number of performers amounts at least to the minimum prescribed, a perfect ensemble has been obtained by assiduous training, and the indications of time, expression, &c., are carefully attended to down to the smallest detail, the idea of the composer cannot be realised. To this should be added that the performance ought to be held in a dimly-lighted church, and the executants placed so as to be invisible to the audience. None of these conditions obtained at the performances of the work in this country. Let us keep this in mind. Massiveness, for instance, is one of the exigencies without which much that would be imposing turns out poor and even ridiculous. I see in the score many possibilities which the Glasgow performance on January 31, 1884 (the first in Scotland, the third in Britain), did not reveal to me.* Nevertheless, considering that the chorus had only twelve practisings and but one rehearsal with the bands, and that the rehearsals of the bands did not exceed the number of two, the performance was very creditable to all concerned—to Mr. Manns, the conductor, to Mr. Allan Macbeth, the chorus director, to Mr. Charles Chillely, the solo tenor, and to the chorus and the bands. With a less clever and experienced conductor disaster, however, would hardly have been avoidable. As it was, the performance passed off—barring some vacillations, one of them rather serious, and occasional imperfections of intonation on the part of the chorus—pretty smoothly. It seemed to me that Mr. Manns took the tempo of the "Lachrymosa" somewhat too quick. True, in the superscription the word andante is accompanied by the phrase non troppo lento; still the tempo is andante. To do justice to this composition is no easy matter. It demands from the several choral parts the morbidezza

and abbandono of a perfect Italian vocalist, and the utmost endeavour to reproduce the grand sweeps of the melodic outline. If the tempo is taken ever so little too quick the peculiar treatment of the chorus calls to one's mind no less profane a thing than opéra bouffe. The public was at a loss what to think of the "Messe des Morts"; but although not favourably impressed, it modestly abstained from expressing any opinion. Mr. Manns received at the end an enthusiastic ovation. The best thanks of the musicians and amateurs of this country are indeed due to this earnest and indefatigable worker for the bold and difficult undertaking of making us acquainted with the great French master's colossal work. Whether further repetitions of it, especially with inadequate resources, are desirable I will not decide, but incline to the belief that it would be more profitable and delectable to turn our attention to those of Berlioz's compositions the subjects of which are more suited to the character of his genius—namely, to his romantic works. If we wish to extend our acquaintance with him, let us eschew his sacred music and choose instead something secular—for instance, his opera "Benvenuto Cellini." The weaknesses, the incongruities of the "Messe des Morts" cannot be hidden by calling it a "drama of death," a phrase as meaningless as most party watchwords. Nor can Berlioz's pride in the work be regarded as a proof of its merit. What pleases him in it is what he calls its grandeur and sublimity. But Berlioz always confounds the grand and sublime with the colossal and monstrous, as he confounded also many other notions. What Heine said of Victor Hugo may be applied with equal force to Berlioz: "Ce n'est pas un grand homme, c'est un homme énorme." That any of Berlioz's productions can lay claim to the appellation "standard work" may be questioned; that he left us much that in spite, partly indeed on account, of its eccentricities deserves attention must be admitted. Berlioz is not one of those noble spirits whose works purify and elevate as well as entertain us, not one of the company which comprises Palestrina, Bach, Handel, Gluck, Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven; but for all that he is a tone-poet of rare genius, and capable of affording us much pleasure, harmless pleasure as long as it does not make us neglect those masters to whom our chief devotion is due. There is truth in the words—curiously like words written by the historian Ambros on the same point—with which F. Hiller concludes his account of the French master; truth, I say, but cannot add "nothing but the truth." For to most men it is becoming clearer every day that Berlioz's fantastic, picturesque, passionate creations contain pages of exquisite beauty, and volumes of stirring romance which are a living power now and will remain so for a long time to come. In short, Hiller's words leave much in the dark, but illustrate strikingly one most important point—the unique character of the composer's genius. "Hector Berlioz does not belong to our musical solar system—he does not belong to the planets, neither to the large nor to the small. He was a comet—shining far, somewhat eerie to look at, soon again disappearing; but his appearance will remain unforgotten. That a similar one will show itself in the musical firmament is neither to be hoped nor to be feared, and hardly to be expected."

MASSENET'S "HÉRODIADÉ" AND "MANON."

THE author of "Le Roi de Lahore" is the man of the day among composers of French opera. Two works from his pen have lately engaged and are still engaging the attention of Parisian quidnuncs, not as objects of derision, but of praise and honour. The fact is quite justification enough for interest on this side of the Channel, and we now propose to give our readers some idea of the operas which M. Massenet has put forth, premising that, with regard to "Hérodiade," we speak of the original version produced at the Monnaie Theatre, Brussels, in December, 1881, and not the enlarged four-act edition which has recently seen the light in Paris.

* The minimum of instrumentalists and singers indicated in the score is 178 and 210. Berlioz asked for the first projected Paris production of the work (that which did not take place) 500 performers, but had to be satisfied with 450. At Glasgow there were 120 instrumentalists against 400 singers. But though the number of instrumentalists was less and the number of singers more than Berlioz's minimum, it was especially the vocal element that fell short of the requirements of the occasion. The first tenors seemed to me very weak, but also the basses lacked solidity. Indeed, greater fullness would have been desirable everywhere. Was this shortcoming owing to the distribution of the parts (the composer wrote for a chorus of two soprano, two tenor, and two bass parts; in this case the first tenor part was sung by twenty tenors and the contraltos), to inferior voice-material, or to insufficient practice? The first and the last see no doubt the chief, if not the only, causes.

Apparently three authors were needed to make a drama out of the story of John the Baptist, and we do not wonder at it, since the object may have been to lessen the individual responsibility attendant upon playing such tricks with the Bible. MM. Milliet, Grémont, and Zanardini have certainly achieved amongst them a notable thing in the way of daring imagination. This will appear as we proceed. After an orchestral Introduction, chiefly founded upon a theme to which the praises of John are sung later, the curtain rises and we see life return with returning day to the courts of Herod's palace. Merchants and slaves bestir themselves, singing the praises of Jerusalem, to which their caravans have come, while between them and Herod's chiefs a lively business scene takes place, relieved by the mutual abuse of Pharisees and Samaritans. All this is mere exordium, but it awakens interest, and the music has attractive features. It is simple in structure, and well marked in character. As the two parties just named are soundly abusing each other, Phanael (bass) appears and the strife is hushed, a gentle, flowing strain proceeding from the orchestra. In grave phrases, to a sombre accompaniment, he speaks of the troubles of the country, counsels peace among themselves, and refers to an approaching revolt against the Roman yoke. His words produce little effect, but the caravan people depart and the chiefs retire into the palace, leaving Phanael alone. To him comes Salome (soprano), and now we begin to learn something of the fancy displayed by the authors. Salome does not live in the palace; she does not even know who her parents are, but seems to be roaming about on the chance of, at any rate, finding her mother. Phanael knows her origin, but keeps it to himself. After the dialogue conveying this, Salome sings an air in praise of John, whose aid she seeks: "Il est doux: il est bon," she declares, in strains which are also gentle and good. The first phrase of the melody—one peculiarly French in style and treatment—is used later to represent the Prophet's qualities. At its close, Phanael and Salome separate, while the chant of the caravan folk is heard in the distance. Before Phanael can quit the stage Herod appears, agitated and speaking to himself, a chromatic descending passage in the orchestra attending upon him. The Tetrarch gives us more strange information. Salome has lived in the palace, but, having run away from it, troubles Herod with the memory of her fascinating presence. Plainly, he is in love with her, and invokes her in a short but somewhat maudlin ariette: "Salome, Ah! reviens!" Then he sees Phanael, who calls him to really important business—the troubles of the country, and the expected Messiah. Herod thinks more of his heart's troubles, and gives us a short air, "Ah! guéris un amour qui consume mes sens." This is a good, well marked, and passionate piece of the ordinary type. Phanael again speaks of state affairs, and then follows a vigorous dialogue about Herod's impending revolt, the enthusiasm of the people for John, &c. M. Massenet is happy here. He persistently uses a capital and expressive "figure" of accompaniment, which gives unity as well as strength to the whole. Presently, a chorus is heard without, and Herod is just going to receive messengers from his allies when Hérodiade appears. Much "put out" she calls on the King for vengeance, while the orchestral basses roll in chromatic convulsions. Why is Hérodiade angry? Because, when out walking, she had met a half-naked man, who called her "Jezebel," and threatened the vengeance of Heaven. The presumptuous person in question is no other than John, whom Herod has reasons of his own for befriending. In vain Hérodiade plies him with a tender Andante "Ne me refuse pas," full of French sentiment, but none the less highly expressive. Herod remains firm, the woman becomes angry, and a short but violent scene ends with Hérodiade's threat to destroy John herself. At that moment the Prophet calmly enters, saying "Strike, then." We have now a trio of an extremely energetic description, and perhaps more dramatic than musically satisfactory. There is, however, little characterisation, while John's part is almost limited to calling Hérodiade Jezebel—an exercise which appears to give him considerable pleasure. But it irritates Herod at length, and he intervenes, only to extract from the wrathful Prophet a curse so powerful that it drives the royal and affrighted personages off the stage. Salome again enters, heralded by a harp passage faithfully attendant upon her. Now comes the most beautiful air in the work. Salome loves John, and pours her whole heart into the song "Ce que je veux—te dire que je t'aime." The theme of this number is a prolonged strain of beauty, set off by delicate accompaniment, and the composer loves it, for he employs it later again and again. John refuses the girl's affection, but she persists, till the Prophet, inspired, bids her open her heart to the light of faith and the love of eternal life. A short ensemble ends the scene, which cannot be charged with wanting impressiveness or relief from the tender beauty of the love motif.

A public place in Jerusalem is next shown, and we witness the further development of Herod's revolt. The people sing noisy choruses, and Herod, accompanied by the orchestral "figure" already mentioned, as well as by plenty of tremolo, incites them to take up arms. This they are ready enough to do with no enemy in sight, and more noisy ensembles follow, of a firm and solid if not elaborate structure. M. Massenet, it must be confessed, loves an uproar, which, however, is here quite in place. The courage of the mob is mere vapouring. Trumpets are heard in the distance, a cry of "Vitellius" (the Roman Consul) arises, and the people exclaim, "What shall we do?" Vitellius enters with his lictors, amid plenty of trumpeting and obeisances. Then ensues an ensemble for solo voices and chorus, somewhat elaborate as to character, and decidedly effective. The scene ends with the triumph of Rome a few gracious words serving to bring the people enthusiastically around the Consul. Upon all this breaks the music of an "Hosannah." Children and women enter, waving palm branches, and singing "Blessed is he that cometh," &c., in advance of John and Salome. The "Hosannah" theme is very distinctive and pretty, and has a harp accompaniment. While it goes on, Herod observes Salome, and Hérodiade watches him with jealous eyes, while Vitellius asks who John is, and the people cry "God's Prophet." The stage at this moment is full of varied interest, a little reflection serves to show, but the conclusion is rather impotent. John taunts Vitellius with impotence as against the Eternal King; Vitellius takes no notice; the people shout "Long live Cæsar," and the curtain falls.

The second act opens in the house of Phanael who, looking out on Jerusalem, laments over it, and sings an air "Astres étincelants," in which he must upon the character and mission of John. The solo is skilfully constructed, sometimes reminiscent of foregone themes, and not without a certain elevation and dignity befitting the circumstances. Hérodiade, with her agitated chromatics, breaks in upon Phanuel's reverie. She has come to enquire of the stars what fate awaits "that woman" (Salome) who has stolen Herod's heart. In a solo, having a curiously monotonous accompaniment, Phanuel tells her that he sees the star of Salome disappear, while Hérodiade's turns blood-red; more, that Hérodiade was a mother but is so no longer. On this the feeling changes. In an extended duet and dialogue, the music being often expressive, even to pathos, the Queen laments a daughter she has lost, but who, Phanuel declares, may yet be restored. This stirs the mother's heart, and a climax is reached when the astrologer, drawing Hérodiade to the window, points to Salome, who is just entering the Temple. "My child!" exclaims the Queen, "She! she is my rival! No, my child is dead!" and Phanuel answers: "Thou art a woman, but a mother!—never." M. Massenet is not wholly happy with this fine situation, which, we think, eludes his grasp. He meets it with simple declamation instead of music.

The next scene is laid in the Temple. Salome enters alone, while women's voices outside sing the praises of Herod. She comes grieving. John is in prison—perhaps already dead—and her sorrow is mocked by the pretty strains of the folk without, whose music constitutes one of M. Massenet's discoveries in characteristic effects. Moreover, he has obtained a good and telling contrast here. Salome presently laments the past in an air "Charme des jours passé," founded on the theme of her song in the first act, and therefore very welcome. The melody, however, is heard chiefly in the orchestra. Herod enters, brooding over his ambitious projects, and determining to save John in order to please the people. Seeing Salome, feeling of another sort animates him, under the influence of which he sings a languishing yet passionate air, "Vision fugitive," written in the approved French style, with plenty of pedal points, single and double, bearing up a superstructure of sensuous harmonies. Salome repulses her royal suitor, who only becomes the more urgent throughout the rest of the scene—till he learns that she loves another. Herod divines the man, and, swearing both man and maid shall suffer death, departs. The music is sufficiently energetic during this scene, but seems to us superficial, as though the composer, in presence of a great emergency, found his means inadequate. His methods and devices are those which have served a thousand times before, and we begin to suspect that he is happiest when dealing with ordinary rather than extraordinary situations. At this point the drama halts that we may look upon religious ceremonies. There is a long procession to the strains of an effective solemn march; priest and people join in prayer and response, using Hebrew words; the daughters of Mahanaim dance a sacred dance; a girl sings the song of the Sulamite in the Canticles, to a strain cleverly imitative of Eastern melody, and with another dance the religious observances end. Enter now the King and Queen, the Consul and Phanuel to take up the dropped thread of the story. In energetic unison the Princes and Priests demand of Vitellius the death of John, but the Consul shifts the responsibility to Herod, who, answering the continued clamour of the Priests, consents to interrogate and judge the prisoner. John is at once brought in, the orchestra playing the theme of the "Hosannah," and a short but resounding ensemble goes on as the dignitaries take their places. M. Massenet, who has often jogged memory before, is here not unsuggestive of "L'Africaine." The interrogation goes on in a sufficiently dignified manner, and when John declares himself an apostle of liberty, all, save Vitellius, echo the strain. Herod, to save the Prophet, declares him mad; but the Priests and people join Hérodiade in crying for his blood throughout another ensemble more noisy than musical. At that moment Salome rushes forward, demanding to share the fate of him she adores; while, as the people murmur astonishment, the theme of her love-song is heard in the orchestra. After another ensemble, Herod, furious at seeing a rival in John, condemns the pair to death; but Hérodiade feels a strange pity rise within her, and John proudly defies the King, threatening him also with the vengeance of Heaven. This busy act ends with a grand chorus of the most strenuous and exciting kind.

The third act is precluded by an orchestral Andante having as its theme that of Salome's love-song, and opens in the crypt where John is confined. The Prophet has a long soliloquy of a rhapsodical character, but distinguished by a good deal of musical beauty. He feels that love is shaking his faith, and cries pitifully to Heaven for help. Heaven sends him Salome, who, attended by her love theme, appears at his side. A tender and beautiful, sometimes passionate, duet follows, broken by the cries of the people without as they demand John's death. Salome refuses to quit her lover, and they both are found together when the High Priest, with Herod's Guards, enters to tell John that his hour has come, but that the King, pardoning Salome, requires her presence in the palace. The girl, resisting, is forced away: the Prophet resigns himself to the guards, and a repetition of the love melody ends the scene. We are next shown the great Hall of Herod's palace, where legionaries sing the glory of Rome in a chorus of simple construction but ample development. Vitellius, Herod, and Hérodiade presently enter amid more festive tumult, and the inevitable ballet begins. There are five dance movements, representative of various countries and, musically, not of special mark; M. Massenet being less fortunate than usual in this respect. Upon the gay and brilliant scene Salome is now brought by the guards. She pleads for John's life, or the privilege of dying with him; and specially appeals to Hérodiade's womanhood. As she does so, the Queen's remembrance of her maternity awakes feelings of pity. All are moved in some manner, and Salome is on the point of succeeding when the executioner appears with his blood-stained sword. A cry of horror greets him; Salome drawing a dagger rushes at Hérodiade who exclaims, "Hold, I am thy mother," and then the maddened girl turns the weapon on herself with the words, "Take back thy blood and my life." The curtain here descends amid a renewed shout of dismay, and the opera is concluded. That the story has little to do with the Bible, need not be said now, but it is a good story for stage purposes, and the principal characters are powerfully drawn. Salome enlists sympathy throughout; the Prophet is a grand figure, whom even love cannot turn from the path of duty, and the other personages all contribute their share of human interest. As for the music, we have indicated that M. Massenet seems to miss the great dramatic situations, but writes charmingly when lyrical expression is demanded. The love numbers, and those devoted to the gentler emotions, form the strong point of the work, while the ensembles are its weakness. Of course, to us in England, "Hérodiade" is forbidden. Though its incidents are imaginary, its personages are Scriptural, and that suffices to keep the work off our stage. It may be, however, that we do not lose very much.

"Manon," an opera in five acts, played for the first time at the Opéra Comique on January 17 last, is a work differing altogether from the quasi-Biblical tragedy just described. Its characters are very worldly characters indeed. There is neither a Prophet nor a King amongst them; and they are only a lot of ordinary folk in the dress of modern civilisation, playing their little part upon a stage of intrigue.

After a short prelude, we are shown the arrival of Guillot and De Bretigny, with Pousette, Favotte, and Rosette, at an hotel in Amiens. They cry out for attendants, and, irritated by neglect, join in a spirited quintet, "Voyons, monsieur l'hôtelier." But for a long time no one answers their call. At length the host appears and orders dinner to be served. Waiters pass towards the salle à manger bearing dishes, and a scene of mock solemnity takes place as the host names the various courses, chorused by the hungry arrivals. All this is admirable, and in the true spirit of comedy, with which M. Massenet seems quite at home. The guests follow the waiters, and the hotelkeeper is left alone. He soliloquises, using ordinary speech, not recitative, while the orchestral accompaniment continues. This is one of M. Massenet's innovations, and marks a new departure in Opéra Comique such as may end in abolishing spoken dialogue altogether. At any rate, it has the effect of a half measure at which nobody expects change to stop. Presently the townspeople gather to see the coach come in, singing a chorus as they do so. Lescaut also appears with two comrades of the body guards, whom he leaves at the hotel, and departs to a neighbouring auberge where good claret is sold. When the coach arrives we have a bustling scene, what with travellers, servants, and the bystanders, who, after the manner of their kind everywhere, freely criticise the new arrivals. All this while the music continues bright, clear, and good. We begin to discover where the composer's strength lies. Lescaut, looking on, suspects a pretty traveller to be his cousin, Manon, whom he awaits. He is right, and not he only but ourselves are soon interested in the girl, who sings in artless fashion such charming and piquant music as she excuses herself for feeling embarrassed on making a first journey. Another lively ensemble attends the departure of the coach, then the townsfolk disperse, repeating a snatch of their chorus; Lescaut goes to look after his cousin's luggage, and Manon is left alone. Guillot, coming out on the balcony, sees her, and offers money for love, at which the girl laughs, drawing forth Guillot's companions, by whom the merriment is taken up, only ceasing when Lescaut returns, and the revellers retire. Even now the girl has to linger on the scene, for Lescaut and the two guards go to settle some business, otherwise take a hand at cards and dice at the neighbouring auberge. Before doing so he sings a funny air of advice, marked by more of the mock dignity we have before recognised. Again left to herself, Manon moves on the gaiety and fine attire of the women with Guillot. She is tempted to envy them, but her better nature checks her, and in this mood she is discovered by Des Grieux (tenor), who, struck with her beauty, engages her in conversation, to be even more attracted by her simplicity. It is a case of love at first sight on both sides, and a love duet is reached with remarkable rapidity. Nay, so quickly do matters progress that the pair make off in company towards Paris. Lescaut, returning, misses his cousin, but encounters Guillot, whom he accuses of hiding her, and a scene ensues, only ended by the host's declaration that Manon has gone to Paris with a young man. Upon this situation the curtain falls. Throughout the first act M. Massenet will not be denied. His music runs on, bright, animated, sometimes humorous; always clear in construction and effect. We begin to regard him as a master in comic opera.

The second act opens in the Parisian apartments of Des Grieux and Manon. There is a pretty scene as Manon reads a letter concerning herself, written by Des Grieux to his father, and the music is really charming in style and character. The lover wishes to marry his mistress, and is about to carry the letter to post, when a servant announces two men, who clamour for admission. These are Lescaut and De Bretigny (one of the Amiens revellers). Lescaut reproaches Des Grieux with his usual burlesque solemnity, and an altercation follows in the form of a delightfully comic trio. Lescaut will be satisfied if Des Grieux marries Manon. Des Grieux gives him the letter to read, and both move up, leaving De Bretigny to "carry on" with poor simple Manon, who recognises him as an admirer of some standing. De Bretigny assures Manon that Des Grieux's father will fetch him away that very night, and presses his own suit in the course of a clever quartet full of varied interest. Manon hesitates, and the two men, seeing the game half won, retire. Des Grieux soon follows them to post his letter, happy and unsuspecting of mischief. Left alone, the weak girl dwells on her new lover's fine promises, is seduced by them, and bids a tender farewell to her household belongings. Des Grieux returns, more affectionate than ever. As they sit at table, a soft knock at the door disturbs them. Des Grieux rises to open; Manon seeks to prevent him; he persists, goes out, there is a noise of struggling, and, as the curtain falls, a carriage is heard to drive away. Throughout this act M. Massenet uses his art adroitly. He has now several representative themes to employ, and manages them well; the various parts are well characterised, and the music of Manon especially happily accords with her temperament and invincible simplicity.

The third act introduces a popular fête, with all its bustle and variety. We meet here the three ladies of the Amiens hotel, also with Lescaut, but the story halts at this point, and interest gathers around the spectacle and the music, which last keeps up to the level of the preceding acts, and is full of spontaneity and charm. We learn only that Manon is now living with De Bretigny, and that Guillot means, if possible, to take her from him. Presently, Manon and De Bretigny appear on the scene, to the admiration of all beholders. The girl is delighted with so much homage, and sings a curiously constructed air made up of unaccompanied vocal phrases with short orchestral interludes. Now it appears, from the father of Des Grieux, who opportunely arrives, that his son has become an Abbé. The Count is himself attracted by Manon, who roams about the fair like a child, and presently finds himself answering her questions about his son. All this goes on to the sound of dance music, and is full of interest. Further dialogue takes place, though none of great importance. The act ends, as it began, with revelry, and we are left with an impression that Manon still loves Des Grieux.

Organ music opens the fourth act, which is laid in the Seminary of Saint Sulpice. A crowd of worshippers discuss the preaching talents of Abbé des Grieux, who presently appears with his father. The Count rallies him, and bids him marry some good woman; but he remains firm, resolved to separate from the world. Left alone, he tries to chase the image of Manon from his thoughts, and sings some tender and touching strains, written in Massenet's peculiar vein of sentiment. When he has gone to his religious duties, Manon enters, seeking him, and waits while a distant choir sings a part of the office. Moved by the strains, she cries for pardon to Heaven.

Des Grioux returns, and an important duet follows: the woman pleading with her old lover, the man bidding her begone and tempt him no more. M. Massenet here writes with genuine passion, and sustains the feeling through a very long scene, which ends with the victory of love over renunciation.

The fourth act opens on a gambling scene, where we meet Lescaut and the Amiens convives once more. But the story again halts for some time in favour of a bright stage and pleasant light music. It marches, however, when Manon and Des Grioux appear. The girl wishes her lover to augment his fortune by play; but his soul rebels against the thought. He is persuaded in the end, nevertheless, and tries his luck against that of Guillot, while Manon sings a reckless song (with a constant inverted dominant pedal) in praise of gold. Des Grioux wins rapidly, and Guillot insults him; a fracas ensues, and the police enter. Des Grioux's father also appears—he must be own brother to the father in "La Traviata"—full of reproaches, and now a long ensemble begins. Finally, Des Grioux and Manon are placed in charge of the police, and the act closes.

The last act shows the Havre road, and Des Grioux waiting with Lescaut to rescue Manon from those who are escorting her to ignominious servitude. The archers appear with their prisoners, and when they halt we learn that one of the women is dying. Lescaut goes to them as a comrade, and asks permission to speak to her. The sergeant not only grants it, but detaches Manon from the chain and leaves her, enjoining Lescaut to deliver her up at the halting place. The lovers now meet once more, and their duet is the most touching piece in the opera. Real feeling pervades it, while the music is often beautiful in a high degree. It recalls somewhat the last scene of "La Traviata." There is the same access of energy in the dying woman, the same collapse. The lovers take a tender farewell, and then, by the road side, poor Manon dies. The opera is over.

We have little to add, without going into a close description of the music, the character of which, however, has been sufficiently indicated. The story is painful and its atmosphere unwholesome, but M. Massenet's share of the work has been so well done that, whatever else fails, Manon will hand down his name. It is an opera musically instinct with the qualities that constitute vitality.

THE GREAT COMPOSERS

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

No. XIV.—MEYERBEER (continued from page 74).

It was in 1815 that Meyerbeer, acting on the advice of Salieri, went to Italy for the purpose of learning how to write for the voice. But before entering upon this second phase of his career, it may be well to cite the opinion of Carl Maria von Weber with regard to some of the work done in his first. We have already stated that Weber, who handled the pen of a critic as well as of a composer, wrote in assertion of his old fellow-student's claims. He did this especially as regards "Alimelek," and an article on that opera bearing his signature may be found in the Musikalische Zeitung, of Leipzig, for November 3, 1815. The Musikalische Zeitung, at that time edited by Rochlitz, had not, in Weber's opinion, done justice to Meyerbeer, and against this fact the future composer of "Der Freischütz" lifted up his testimony. After some sharp invective against his countrymen, who, with all their pretended patriotism, neglected native talent, Weber said:—

"Mr. Meyerbeer has hitherto acquired fame only as a great pianoforte player, while but little justice has been done to him as a composer. The great works by which he has proved his genius—the operas 'Jephtha,' performed in Munich, and 'Alimelek,' produced at Stuttgart and often at Prague, and his grand oratorio 'God and Nature' have either been passed over in silence, or mentioned in terms of doubtful praise. . . . It is truly melancholy that a composer should be so often at the mercy of individuals whom either mere chance or the vanity of seeing themselves in print, or even hunger, has made the heralds and proclaimers of public opinion. How often is their judgment influenced by illiberal selfish motives. . . . The unity and keeping of the whole opera ('Alimelek') is an advantage that few compositions like this possess. In addition to which, how many proofs of a devoted study of the art—what a beautiful combination of original melodies, in various forms, each preserving a character peculiar to itself! No prolixity in the work, all dramatically true, all full of lively imagination, of lovely and frequently luxurious airs. The declamatory part always correct, with an abundance of rich and new harmonies. A judicious use of the orchestra, often so combined as to produce the most striking effects. Such is this opera, from which I could easily select specimens to prove all that I have said if experience had not taught me that such passages, when detached, cease to be what they are in union, and therefore incapable of producing conviction."

Meyerbeer may have felt that he deserved these high encomiums, but, as we have seen, he willingly lent an ear to those who counselled a step certain to revolutionise his method. Already the composer had no artistic principle. Dazzled by the splendour of Rossini's fame, he would become an Italian likewise, drink from the same fountain of tune, and set all the heads in Europe nodding to the measure of his rhythms. It was the end he regarded, not the means; and the adaptability of his race, so fiercely inveighed against by Wagner, made him not only willing to take any course, but able to take it with success. The situation becomes more accentuated when we recollect that, up to this time, Meyerbeer had been a strong opponent of Italian music, as represented by Nicolini, Pavesi, and others. Like most German musicians, he fretted against the preference shown to Italians at the multitudinous German courts, and had, therefore, a personal grievance wherewith to strengthen his artistic dislike. Yet, spite of all, he went to Italy resolved to start along the flowery path of Italian opera towards the goal of fame. He could not have done so at a more propitious moment. On reaching Venice, he found the public wild with delight over Rossini's "Il Tancredi," which had just appeared to assert the existence of a new and brilliant genius, whose music was living music, not dry and soulless strains. "Il Tancredi" at once converted Meyerbeer, if indeed there could be involved in the case any such thing as real conversion. He saw his course marked out, and, just as at Vienna, he shut himself up to work hard and rival Hummel at the pianoforte, so now, with German patience and Jewish pliability he laboured unceasingly to follow, and, if haply he may, catch up Rossini. Meyerbeer was in no hurry to make an Italian début. Calculating, rather than enthusiastic, he could resist the promptings of impulse and eagerness. All the chances of success and failure were deliberately counted and weighed with the closest reference to his own judgment of himself, and hence it came to pass that his first Italian opera, "Romilda e Costanza," was not played till 1818. The Paduans, in whose city this event took place, gave the work a cordial reception, "not only," remarks Fétis, "because of the music and the talent of the prima donna (Pisaroni), but because Meyerbeer was considered by them as belonging to their own school, in his quality as a pupil of Vogler, himself the pupil of Valotti. "Semiramide riconosciuta," produced at Turin in 1819, followed, and after it came (Venice, 1820) "Emma di Resburgo," which at once established the master's reputation.<sup>3</sup> This opera soon travelled to Germany, where it proclaimed the composer's apostasy, and excited a storm of angry criticism. No wonder! German opera, thanks to Weber, whose strong nationality kept him intensely German, was lifting its head, and stirring up expectation. Every young composer had upon him the eyes of the people, looking to see that he did his duty, and loud was the outcry when "Emma di Resburgo" showed on every page that Meyerbeer, whose German virtues Weber so loudly proclaimed, had gone over to the enemy. Weber himself shared this feeling to the fullest extent. He had failed to comprehend Rossini, just as, by the way, he failed to comprehend Beethoven, and waged against him and his school a bitter war which was, perhaps, as much national as artistic. One can easily imagine, therefore, his disgust at seeing a Rossinian in the German composer of whose talents he had warmly expressed a profound admiration. To such a heat did the feeling of resentment rise that it boiled over on to the pages of the Dresden Gazette, where we find an angry and protesting article. But the personal friendship of the two men remained unaffected, and evidence of this may be discovered in Weber's letters, from which we make a single extract: "On Friday last I had a great pleasure—Meyerbeer came and passed a whole day with me. . . It was really a day of happiness—a souvenir of the happy time we spent together at Mannheim. We did not separate till far into the night. Meyerbeer goes to Trieste to produce his 'Il Crociato,' and means to return to Berlin in a year to write a real German opera. Heaven grant that he keeps his word. As for me, I have talked to him conscientiously."

Weber did more than talk. As a practical protest against his friend's desertion to the enemy, he put Meyerbeer's opera, the "Two Caliphs," on the Dresden stage, under the name of "Wirth und Gast," intending thus to show that he had not praised his friend without cause, as well as to declare the road in which that friend should walk.

It would serve little purpose to dwell minutely upon Meyerbeer in Italy. This was not the true Meyerbeer, any more than the grub is the butterfly. Let us, therefore, simply record that "Emma di Resburgo" was followed by "Margarita d'Anjou," that by "L'Esule di Granata" (1822), and that by "Almansar." In 1823, Meyerbeer's health not being good, he went to Berlin for a change, and there wrote a German opera, "The Brandenburg Gate," intended, it is said, for the theatre at Koenigstadt, but never performed. It was this visit to his native city which brought about the pleasant intercourse with Weber, spoken of in the extract already given from the master's letters. At this time, also, he completed his "Il Crociato"—a work produced, not at Trieste, but at Venice (1824), where it was received with acclamation, the composer being presented with a laurel crown on the stage. So ended, with all honour, the master's Italian career, for he composed no more operas in the language of Rossini.

The works produced during this phase of Meyerbeer's career were not successes merely on the spot, though even such a limited result would have been creditable when Rossini was everywhere worshipped as a god. It says much that, against so powerful a rival, the young Berliner obtained a hearing at all. He did far more than obtain a hearing. For example, "Emma di Resburgo" was played at Venice, Milan, Genoa, Florence, and Padua, while, as "Emma von Leicester," it appeared in Vienna, Munich, and Dresden, and, as "Emma di Roxburg," at Berlin and Stuttgart. "Margarita d'Anjou" was performed in Italian at Milan, Venice, Bologna, Turin, Florence, and Trieste; in German, at Munich and Dresden; in French, at Paris and several provincial towns of France; and, in English and Italian, at London. Triumphs of this kind were surely enough for satisfaction, and Meyerbeer could not have been led by failure to abandon Italian opera. How then came he to abandon it? Probably through artistic dissatisfaction with results, which, if brilliant, were superficial; through the force of early training and dread of the opinion formed of him in Germany. Be this as it may, his last Italian work, "Il Crociato," shows a marked disposition to return to the German manner. On this subject Fétis observes: "If one examines the score of 'Il Crociato' with care, unequivocal signs appear of a reaction in the method of the composer and of an attempt to fuse his primitive tendencies with the Italian method of 'Emma di Resburgo' and 'Margarita d'Anjou.'" The fact was noticed immediately on the production of the opera. Thus a correspondent of the Harmonicon (Vol. I., p. 160) wrote, after referring to the success of the piece: "Yet envy and many a mortified maestro did their utmost to rob the German composer of his triumph. Such is the order of the day, but letters of impartial connoisseurs received from Venice and other quarters cannot sufficiently praise the music of this opera, which is of that profound and solid kind which at present seems confined almost exclusively to Germany." Another correspondent of the same journal (Vol. III., p. 2), writing from Florence after "Il Crociato" had been produced there, enters fully into the merits of the work, pronouncing it a "happy amalgamation of the music of the German and Italian schools, full of well-digested and profound harmonies, blended with a spirited and expressive melody." But more is gathered from this contemporary writer. We learn, for instance, that Meyerbeer's peculiar individuality so asserted itself as to obtain notice and excite comment. "It is true that in Meyerbeer's music we sometimes meet with uncommon phrases, which will not at once be either relished or understood, but when heard often they enchant by their novelty and beauty, and strongly rivet the attention. It must be acknowledged by all that the compositions of this master not only please the ear, but also express a language that speaks directly to the heart. His music may be compared to some of those grave-looking persons who alarm us on a first introduction, but upon closer acquaintance charm us by the suavity of their manners, and the elegance of their conversation. One fault we may be permitted to find with this composer, but it is a "happy one," as Quintillian calls it, and this is a redundancy of genius. If he possessed self-denial enough to retrench these exuberances, if he would bear constantly in mind that great law, ne quid nimis, his music might approach rapidly to perfection." These extracts amply suffice to show the significance of "Il Crociato," as the first work which gave a definite intimation of what its composer was destined to become.

"Il Crociato" not only foreshadowed Meyerbeer's ripened method, but had a remarkable influence upon his future career. The work was played in Paris in 1826, and the composer travelled to the French capital for the purpose of supervising the production. He little suspected, perhaps, the importance of that journey. It determined him as a writer for the French stage.

On reaching Paris Meyerbeer installed himself at the Hotel Bristol, and at once entered into the full enjoyment of Lutetian life. "One saw him everywhere," says M. Blaze de Bury, "at the theatre, in society, at the quartet evenings given in the Pillet-Will mansion, where Baillot had so much trouble then in gathering thirty people to hear the masterpieces of Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven. . . Meyerbeer was soon on terms with all that music, the fine arts, letters, and society had of notabilities. He was full of respectful deference for the famous veterans of the Conservatoire; simple and cordial towards the celebrated men of his own generation; affable and encouraging towards talent still obscure." With Rossini he soon established close relations. The composer of "Il Barbiere" recognised all the talent of the German master, and had no jealousy. To his honour he it said that Rossini kept free from that very professional meanness, as he did from ill-natured resentment. Who can forget his remark to Weber when the master approached him "delicately" (as Agag approached Samuel), with an uncomfortable recollection of how he had lampooned and burlesqued him. "Not a word more," exclaimed Rossini, replying to Weber's muttered excuses, "the polisson who wrote 'Tancredi' ought to think himself too happy that such a man as you made him the subject of your pen." There was Rossinian sarcasm here, undoubtedly, but so happily veiled that Weber, who saw no more in it than he wished to see, was put quite at his ease.

"Il Crociato" was set before the Parisians in due course, and in the best manner, with the aid of Pasta, Mombelli, Donzelli, and Levasseur, but it had no special success, and was no more than well received. Here, in parenthesis, let us show out of what conflicting elements the historian has to evolve truth. M. Fétis writes in his "Biographie Universelle": "Il Crociato" did not obtain in Paris the enthusiastic success it gained at Venice, Rome, Milan, Turin, and all over Italy, nor even such as it won later in Spain, at Lisbon, and at London, as well as in Germany. Circumstances were unfavourable. Paris does not divide its crowns, which fall upon a single head. In 1826 the frequenters of the Théâtre Italien did not believe that any other composer than Rossini was possible." On the other hand, M. Blaze de Bury, after a panegyric on Paris as the supreme arbiter of fame, says: "'Il Crociato' was produced under the most powerful auspices . . . its success bore the aspect of a triumph. At that time there was enthusiasm for all masterpieces, and laurels for all glory." We elect to believe Fétis, who wrote as a contemporary of the event, and whose testimony accords with the established fact that when "Il Crociato" was produced in Paris, Rossini had the ear of the public to an extraordinary degree—had, in fact, a virtual monopoly of that organ.

After his French début, Meyerbeer kept silence for four years. Endowed with ample fortune, no need existed to work for bread, and he now seems to have bethought him of social duties, and intimate family pleasures. In 1827, he took to himself a wife, and two children were quickly born to him—born only to die in babyhood. Meyerbeer keenly felt the loss of these infants, so brooding over the heavy affliction as to bring on a serious illness, from which he recovered with difficulty. Much of the artistic interregnum, we have good reason to suppose, was really spent in maturing the method and style that astonished the world in his next work. In the quietness of his home, when home was not the abode of overwhelming grief, the master worked out the manner and direction of a new departure, which, whatever its merits, gave him, for all time, a distinct and striking individuality among composers of opera.

The work just referred to was "Robert le Diable"—first of the great series which ended with "L'Africaine." Written by Scribe and Delavigne, the book of this opera has often been praised, on the strength, perhaps, of its authors' names; but more often abused, as monstrous in conception, vulgarly sensational in working out. As far as the detractors are right, Meyerbeer should bear his meed of blame, since it is known that he reigned supreme over his poets, never accepting in deference to them what his judgment disapproved. In this very opera, for example, Scribe wished to bring on a lot of sea-nymphs, bearing golden oars, as the seductors of Robert. Meyerbeer rejected the idea and proposed, with characteristic boldness, the famous scene of the nuns. How bitterly this was attacked no student of musical literature needs to be told, while readers of Mendelssohn's letters easily call to mind his amusing description of the entire plot. Mendelssohn was in Paris during the early run of "Robert," and refers to the work as "played every night with great success," adding, after a sketch of the story: "I cannot imagine how any music could be composed on such a cold, formal extravaganza as this, and so the opera does not satisfy me. It is throughout frigid and heartless, and where this is the case no effect is produced on me. The people extol the music, but where warmth and truth are wanting, I have no test to apply." No considerations of the sort affected the Parisians, who revelled in the spectacular effects without question as to their reasonableness or propriety, and accepted all that seemed doubtful for the sake of music which spoke a new dialect of the universal language.

It will be of interest to reproduce here that which Fétis has said regarding Meyerbeer's second transformation, as revealed in "Robert le Diable":—

"A new man is shown in this work. It is no longer the German Meyerbeer, the pupil of Vogler; it is no longer he of Italy, throwing violently off his scholastic habits in order to learn, by imitation of Rossini, the art of using the voice and instrumental colouring; it is not even the fusion of the two styles in order to attain varied effects; it is altogether a creation in which there remains to the artist, of his earlier periods, only the experience acquired by his labours. Six years of rest, or rather of study; six years of meditation, observation, and analysis, had at last co-ordinated and made into an original and powerful whole all the energetic feeling that nature had infused into his soul, all the novelty of idea born of audacity, all the elevation that the philosophy of the art lent to his style, and all the certainty that a practised mechanism gave to the effects which he desired to produce."

A French critic (Félix Clement) adds to the foregoing general and, in the main, correct remarks, some more definite observations of an instructive character. He says ("Dictionnaire Lyrique"):—

"Meyerbeer demonstrated in this work a powerful individuality and indicated a new horizon. He has dramatised the harmonic methods of the German school by a process which we can indicate but briefly. The expression of personal character and dramatic situation is in agreement. Its impression is more concise, more immediate than in the melodic phrase, which can only exert its influence after some bars. Enharmonic modulation is the master's most frequent resource in order to enter, without preparation, into the moral sense of his subject. From this manner of shaping the composition it follows that, wanting a text, a title, a canvas, a definite situation, the music of Meyerbeer does not interest, does not hold the attention so much as that of composers who strive less to paint with energy, precision, and all possible force the sentiments of humanity than to move the soul by constantly charming the ear and by the feeling of rhythm. For this reason the instrumental pieces of Meyerbeer are generally short. The æstheticism of his art did not invite him to precede his operas with developed overtures. His orchestration is admirable for science, resource, and dramatic intention, but it never unbends. Sonority, variety of timbres, all incessantly contribute to the effect. Let imitators of the master take care lest in pushing his system too far without the support of eminent qualities, they act upon their audience in a manner more acoustical than musical."

Whatever opinion may be expressed for and against the new method of Meyerbeer, assuredly it pleased the taste of a time when romanticism in art was asserting itself against bondage to classicism, and that in Meyerbeer's novel rhythms, bewildering variety of effects, and highly coloured orchestration, they recognised an assertion of liberty which few valued the less because here and there it bordered upon license.

"Robert le Diable" was ready for representation in 1830, but the confusion brought about by the Revolution of July affected even the Grand Opéra, which was no longer under royal direction. The manager, left to himself, had to take care of himself, and he stipulated for terms so hard upon the composer that Meyerbeer declined to entertain them. By November of the following year affairs had settled down, and an arrangement to produce the work took effect without further trouble. With it the most splendid period in the history of the Académie Royale de Musique distinctly began, much to the surprise of the manager, who had listened to the sneers of the critics admitted to rehearsal. Fétis, who was present, tells us: "A multitude of the professional critics, without sufficient knowledge of art, who abound in Paris more than anywhere else . . . cut up the musician's work in the gayest manner possible. It was who should say the most jocular word, or make the most grotesque and witty funeral oration over the score. They summed up by declaring that the piece would not run ten nights." The poor manager (Dr. Veron) hearing all this went to Fétis and confided to him his doubts and fears. "Don't trouble yourself," said his friend, "I have listened attentively and feel sure I am not deceived. There are here many more beauties than imperfections. The spectacle is taking, the impression will be lively and profound. The work will rise to the clouds and make the round of the world." The manager may have found some comfort in these words, but yet more consoling were the ten thousand francs which "Robert" brought to the treasury night after night. The first performance took place on November 21, 1831, with the following cast: Alice, Mlle. Dorus; Isabelle, Madame Cinti-Damoreau; Raimbaut, M. Lafont; Robert, M. Nourrit; Bertram, M. Levasseur. Success came, as we have seen, promptly and in abundance, and without a day's delay, Meyerbeer's first French opera began the march round the world predicted for it by Fétis.

The splendid result of the new operatic mixture invented by our master naturally led to an engagement for the production of another work. He accepted from Scribe and Emile Deschamps the book of "Les Huguenots" and bound himself under a penalty of 30,000 francs to present the score by a specified time.

Already his fondness for altering and re-altering, and for taking the minute precautions which long kept "L'Africaine" from the public, had become so far known that it was deemed wise to bind him down. In this case, however, nothing availed against delay; but the fault was not Meyerbeer's. The composer's wife, suffering from an affection of the lungs, was ordered to reside in Italy, and thither the master accompanied her in a state of great anxiety. He begged for six months' grace under the painful circumstances, but the favour was refused, upon which Meyerbeer paid the fine, and said to the manager, "Good-bye." This at once brought the operatic potentate to his knees. He approached Meyerbeer as a suppliant; begging him to take the money back and let him have the score as soon as possible. To this the composer agreed, nothing loth to re-pocket his 30,000 francs, and "Les Huguenots" was first performed at the Académie Royale on February 21, 1836.

HANDEL'S ORCHESTRATION

By EBENEZER PROUT.

I AM beginning to discover that if I proceed with the examination of the whole of Handel's operas in the same detail as those already noticed, this series of articles bids fair, like Banquo's descendants, to "stretch out to the crack of doom"—to say nothing of the probability of tiring even the most patient of my readers. The subject is so much fuller of interest than would be imagined by any one not familiar with it, that the chief difficulty experienced is in making the best selection from the mass of material lying under one's hands. Fortunately, not all of Handel's scores are so suggestive of remark as "Almira" or "Agrippina"; and I shall endeavour to condense what I have to say into as few words as possible.

"Silla" (1714) furnishes on p. 15 the earliest example in Handel of a trumpet obbligato to a song; and the air "Douce nème" (p. 22) has a beautiful accompaniment (afterwards used for the air "O come let us worship" in the Chandos Anthems) for two violins, doubled in the octave above by two flutes.

One number of "Amadigi" (1715) must be noticed. The song "Pena tiranna" (p. 60) has a very fine accompaniment for strings in five parts (three violin parts), a solo oboe and "bassons" in the plural. The bassoons in unison execute arpeggio quaver passages against staccato chords for the strings, while the solo oboe has mostly a duet with the voice. The effect is very full and rich. It is worth noting that the bass line is expressly marked "senza cembalo"—one more proof that the harpsichord was employed to accompany the songs in ordinary cases.

The overture to "Radamisto" (1720) has the part for the cembalo on a separate line in the score. It will be remembered that Handel's usual custom is simply to indicate "con cembalo" or "senza cembalo" on the bass line. There appears to be no special reason why in the present instance the plan should have been departed from, as the part is in unison with the bass throughout. It was in "Radamisto" that Handel first used the horns, which will be found in the accompaniment of the air "Alzo al volo" (p. 95). In the same opera (at p. 100) will be seen an early instance of the use of the oboes to fill up the harmony. Instead of doubling the violins, as usual, the oboes add other notes to the chords, making with the strings a six-part harmony.

The score of the third act of "Muzio Scavola," the opera which, it will be remembered, was written in 1721, in collaboration with Mattei (some say Ariosti) and Bononcini, presents nothing remarkable in the instrumentation; but "Floridante" (1721) has one number very richly scored, and with much variety in the effects. This is the duet "Fuor di periglio" (p. 65) which is accompanied by strings (the first and second oboes doubling the first and second violins throughout), two flutes, two bassoons, and harpsichord. The solo passages for the bassoons answering and imitating the strings are very effective; and the passage on p. 69, where two bassoons are doubled by the flutes two octaves higher, might have been written by Mozart.

The next two operas have little to detain us. In "Ottone" (1722) we find in the song "Bel labbro" (p. 20) a passage in the final symphony, where the bassoons double the violas in an important middle part. At the beginning of the second part of the song the bass line is marked "e bassoons," showing that these instruments played with the basses, even when not expressly indicated. The line is marked simply "Bassi" at the commencement of the number, and not "Bassi e Fagotti"; but the doubling of the basses by the bassoons is evidently implied here, as in many other places.

"Flavio" (1723) gives us, at p. 22, the rather unusual combination of a solo oboe and solo violoncello in thirds; but a more curious thing will be found in the song "Amor, nel mio penar" (p. 75). The key of the piece is B flat minor, but the oboe obbligato is written in A minor. The inference of course is that there was an oboe in D flat, a semitone higher than the ordinary pitch, like the flutes in a military band.

We now come to one of the most remarkable of all the opera scores, "Giulio Cesare" (1723), a work which, according to M. Schoelcher, was performed in 1787, and which was the last of Handel's operas ever given on the stage. The scoring of this work is noteworthy in more than one respect. There is a larger proportion of airs richly accompanied than in many of the other operas, though it need hardly be said that here, as elsewhere, we find many numbers in which only strings and harpsichord are employed. In this work alone, of all those as yet published in the German Handel Society's edition, independent parts for four horns may be seen, and these horns are used, according to the modern fashion, in different keys. Thus the opening chorus (p. 5), "Viva, viva il nostro Alcide," which is in the key of A, has parts for "Corni 1, 2, in A," and "Corni 3, 4, in D," full harmony for the four horns together being frequently found. A symphony in the key of G in the third act (p. 122) is even more curious. It has two horns in G, and two in D, and at one point a short adagio is introduced in which a phrase for the two horns in G, soli, is immediately repeated a fourth lower by the horns in D. Four horns are used again in the final chorus. Besides this, the air "Va tacito e nascosto" (p. 40) has a very important and effective horn obbligato. Passing over with a mere word of mention the beautiful bassoon parts to the air "Se in fiorito ameno prato" (p. 59), I must notice the remarkable scoring of the symphony (p. 54) at the point where Mount Parnassus opens, and Virtue is discovered on her throne surrounded by the nine muses. Here we see the employment of two orchestras. Besides the usual orchestra in front of the foot-lights, consisting of strings and oboes, there is a second band on the stage, composed of an oboe, first and second violins, violas, violoncellos, bassoons, a harp, a viola da gamba, and a teorba, all of which have separate parts. Cleopatra's song (p. 56), which follows, is similarly scored, the strings being muted, and charming effects are produced by the antiphony of the two orchestras.

The score of "Tamerlano" (1724) contains, on p. 31, a song with a remarkably fine obbligato for the bassoon; but it has two points also which are very curious. The song "Par che mi nasca" contains parts for "Cornetti 1, 2." It is almost unnecessary to say that the instrument intended is not the modern Cornet-à-piston, which was not known in Handel's time, but the old "Cornet," called in Germany "Zinken"—a wooden tube covered with leather. It was, in fact, the treble of the now nearly obsolete Serpent. We find it not infrequently in the scores of Bach's Church Cantatas; but I have not met with it in Handel excepting in this one song. Possibly he tried it here as an experiment, and, not being satisfied with the result, did not use it again. The other remarkable feature of this score will be seen in the duet "Vivo in te" (p. 102). Besides the strings, the score has two staves marked "Traversa e Flauto 1," "Traversa e Flauto 2." As "Traversa" is the name almost always used by Handel for the modern German flute—a name which was given from its being held crosswise, instead of being blown through the end—the inference is irresistible that the "Flauto" must here mean the old "Flute-à- bec," which Bach frequently writes for. It is quite plain that two different instruments are intended by the two names, and we have here a proof that the older form of flute had not, in 1724, disappeared entirely from the orchestra.

If further proof of what has just been advanced be needed, it is furnished by the next opera of the series, "Rodelinda" (1725). The song "Con rauco mormorio" (p. 58) has a charming accompaniment; in the first part of the song we have strings and harpsichord, with bassoons in unison mostly doubling the violas, which, probably for this reason, are written in the tenor instead of the alto clef. The second part of the song is full of contrasts of colour. The voice is accompanied throughout by the basses and harpsichord only; but the vocal phrases are interspersed with instrumental passages in three-part harmony, given sometimes to two violins and viola, at others to three bassoons—proving that there were at least three in the orchestra—and at others to two Flauti and one Traversa. Here the distinction between the two kinds of instruments is unmistakable. Had Handel intended three flutes of the same kind he would have written the three parts on the same staff, as he has done with the bassoons; but he has put the two upper parts on one line, marked "Flauti," and the third on a lower one, marked "Traversa."

In speaking of "Almira" I have mentioned Handel's anticipation of one of Meyerbeer's special effects. The score of "Rodelinda" gives another of the same composer's favourite combinations, on p. 76, in the florid passages for bassoons and violoncellos in unison. The air "Se il mio duol" (p. 91) has a very fine accompaniment in which the voice is supported by holding notes for flute and bassoons, the latter reinforced by the violas. The viola part is written in the tenor clef when the bassoons are in unison with them, and in the alto clef when they play alone.

It is not without regret that I pass over the next three operas—"Scipione," "Alessandro," and "Admeto," all written in 1726. I had noted points in each of them, but the length to which this article is growing warns me to be concise. I therefore next take up another very interesting score—"Riccardo" (1727). In the symphony which opens the first act a storm at sea is depicted. Here, for the first time in the works of Handel, the drums are used for a descriptive effect, as Beethoven has done in the Pastoral symphony. Hitherto the composer has always employed them with the trumpets to give brilliance to the *tutti*s. The symphony now under notice has no trumpet parts, and the drums are mostly used for rolls, the part being marked with the words "loud," "soft," "very soft," &c., in full instead of the usual p and f. It is seldom that Handel treats these instruments in this manner; other instances will be found in "Israel" ("But the waters") and "Semele" ("Avert these omens"). The song "Del' onor" (p. 59) in "Riccardo" must be mentioned because of its containing several passages in which the contralto voice is accompanied by the horns only. On p. 88 we meet with a short arietta, accompanied by strings and a "Traversa bassa"; the latter was evidently some variety of the flute a tone lower in pitch than the ordinary instrument, as its part is written in G minor while the key of the piece is F minor. The short battle piece on p. 106, afterwards used in "Joshua," has a brilliant accompaniment for three trumpets and drums, and the song immediately following, "Il volo così fido" (p. 110), has a beautiful piccolo obbligato, which is even more effective than the familiar accompaniment of "Hush, ye pretty warbling choir." Lastly, in the fine song "Quando non vedo," given in the appendix to the opera (p. 125), there are parts for two "Chalameaux"—a now obsolete reed instrument, believed to have been the predecessor of the clarinet, which is also to be found in the score of Gluck's Italian "Alceste."

In contrast to "Riccardo," the following opera, "Siroe" (1728), presents not one number excepting the overture in which there are any independent parts for the wind. "Tolomeo" (1728) also brings nothing in the instrumentation that is absolutely new; while in "Lotario" (1729) the only number requiring notice is the richly scored chorus "Viva e regni" (p. 36), which is accompanied by strings, two oboes, two bassoons, and two horns, and abounds in fine effects for the wind, and florid passages for the violins. Handel used this piece later in "Time and Truth," where it appears as "Happy if still they reign in pleasure."

There are three interesting points to be found in the score of "Partenope" (1730). The air "Dimmi, pietoso ciel" (p. 33), accompanied by strings, flutes, bassoons, and harpsichord, has several passages in which a melody given to the medium notes of two flutes in unison is doubled by the violas and bassoons an octave lower, while the violins play a moving accompaniment of semiquavers, sometimes above and sometimes below the flute. In the song "Io seguo sol fiero" (p. 46) will be found duet passages for voice and horn, and in one place, on p. 47, the thoroughly modern effect of a long holding note for the horn above the voice; and the air "Mà quai note" (p. 105), accompanied by strings con sordini, and two flutes, has this indication on the bass line—"Con la Teorba, e Bassi piccicati (sic), senza cembalo e Bassons," proving once more that harpsichord and bassoons played from the bass line when not otherwise directed.

In "Poro" (1731) the air "Se possono tanto" has clear directions for the use of the harpsichord in the "Con Cembalo" and "Senza Cembalo" on the bass stave, which at the beginning is simply marked "Bassi," as usual. In the air "Senza procelle" will be seen the rather unusual combination (with Handel), of two horns and two flutes, with charming effects of holding note for one horn in the middle of the harmony. Some songs given in the appendix to this opera have a curious part for "Cembalo II.," an examination of which shows that there were two harpsichords in the orchestra, and that the second played only in the symphonies and ritornelli of the songs.

The score of "Ezio" (1732) gives us some new combinations, such as that of two flutes with two violas (p. 20). The most striking numbers of this work, as regards orchestration, are the song, "Se la mia vita" (p. 89) and the final chorus. The score of the former is one of the most varied in its colouring to be found in the whole of Handel's works. It contains parts for two flutes, two bassoons, and two horns; and besides the usual strings and harpsichord, a solo violin, solo viola, and solo violoncello are employed, the part of the violoncello being especially prominent. Besides such ordinary effects as solo passages for the horns or flutes, we find the combinations of flutes and bassoons in octaves, and horns and bassoons in octaves, quite in the modern style. It may be noted that the bassoons are only written for a few bars, on the line of the basses, and where they have solo passages. The indication "Tutti Bassi" at the commencement shows that in the rest of the movement they played with the basses.

The final chorus of "Ezio" shows again how much attention Handel paid to contrasts of colouring. It is a simple tune in five strophes, each of the first four of which is sung by one of the principal characters of the opera, while the last is given to the full chorus. The first verse, for mezzo-soprano, has the melody doubled by the violins unis in the octave above; the second, for soprano, has all the oboes in unison with the voice; the third, for alto, has the flutes the octave above the voice; the fourth, for bass, is accompanied by strings and oboes; while the full chorus has strings, oboes, and horns. The means employed are very simple, but the contrasts leave nothing to desire.

I must pass briefly over the remaining operas, though there is not one on which something of interest might not be said. In "Orlando" (1732), in the well-known air "Sorge infausta" (p. 88), the opening symphony is remarkable for the dynamic marks inserted in quite a different way from that usually employed by Handel. At the third bar the semi-quaver passage for the violas is marked f, while the other string parts are p; and at the eleventh bar the violins are marked pp, and the violas and basses f only. I have found no parallel case to this in any other of Handel's scores. At p. 97 of the same opera we find the composer experimenting with a new instrument. The air "Già l'ebro mio ciglio" is accompanied by two "violette marine" and pizzicato basses. The "violette marine" are written in the alto clef and marked "per le Signori Castrucci." We learn from Chrysanther's "Life of Handel" (II., 256) that the Signori Castrucci were violin-players in Handel's band, and that the new instrument was a kind of viola invented by one of them, the effect of which Handel immediately tried. The parts he has written for them could be played on two ordinary violas; but nothing exact is known as to the specialties of the instrument.

In "Arianna" (1733), we see at p. 73 a song with a violoncello obbligato curiously resembling in its figures the well-known solo for the same instrument in "Batti, batti;" and in "Ariodante" (1734) attention should be drawn to the lovely effect of the bassoons pianissimo, combined with muted strings in the air "Scherza infida" (p. 70); while in the chorus "Ogn'uno acclami" (p. 130), we find a band of oboes and bassoons on the stage answering the strings and trumpets in the orchestra. "Alcina" (1735), has nothing calling for remark except the curious piccolo solo in the ballet air on p. 148, against a sustained G for violins and violas in unison, which furnishes a very rare example of the use by Handel of the "double string."

In "Atalanta" (1736) Handel uses a trumpet in the overture for the first time. The chorus which opens the second act (p. 30) has two horns in B flat, almost the only instance of their employment in this key which I have found in Handel; and at p. 91 of the same score is a Gavotte for three trumpets and drums alone. Mozart half a century later did something similar in his little minuets for five trumpets and four drums, to which, however, he added flutes.

In "Arminio" (1736) are a few points which must not be passed over. The air "Quella fiamma" (p. 52), besides an oboe solo has "Violino 1 e oboe 1, ripieno," and "Violino 2 e oboe 2 ripieno," giving conclusive proof, if such be required, that there were more than two oboes in the orchestra. The curious disposition of the accompaniments to the air "Mira il Ciel" (p. 70), should also be noted; but for this point I must refer my readers to the score. A most singular effect is produced in the duet "Quando più minaccia il Cielo" (p. 77). Here each voice part is doubled in the octave above by a flute and oboe in unison, while the violins accompany in florid semi-quaver passages.

I cannot pass over "Giustino" (1736) without calling attention to one or two curious points. I noticed in speaking of "Riccardo" the "Traversa bassa," on p. 16 of "Giustino" another kind of bass flute is used. The opening symphony of this song ("Può ben nascer") is scored for an oboe solo "e Flauti 1" in unison; "Flauti 2" is written against the second stave, while the lowest part is indicated "Viola e Basso de Flauti." Unless Handel was more than usually careless, the employment of the plural ("Flauti 1," "Flauti 2") would show that each flute part was played by at least two instruments, while the "Basso de Flauti" would appear from the part to have been a large flute going down to the low F. In the chorus "Per voi suave e bello," of the same opera, we find again, exceptionally, the horns in B flat.

"Berenice" (1737), the last opera as yet issued by the German Handel Society, is remarkable for the meagreness of its orchestration, and contains nothing requiring notice. I have now therefore completed, though very inadequately, the first part of my task. When I come to speak of the Oratorios, I shall have to point out effects of a different class. As a whole the songs in the operas are more varied in their scoring than those in the Oratorios, though the latter are by no means so colourless as is generally imagined. It is largely in the choruses of the Oratorios that special effects will be found. I believe that what I have already written will surprise most of my readers, and I think I have a few more surprises still in reserve for them in the articles which are to follow.

THE artistic history of La Scala is truly that of dramatic music and choregraphy in Italy during the last century, for it includes a marvellous list of operas by illustrious composers, of ballets and choreographers, celebrated singers, and favourite dancers, which extends uninterruptedly through a hundred years. These may be divided into three great periods, in the course of which Italian music has transformed itself, changing style, essence, and aim. The first period, from 1778 to 1812, comprises the composers of the last century up to the dazzling apparition of Rossini. The second period is Rossinian and leads us to 1839, the first appearance of Verdi.

The third may be called Verdian, and lasts to the present day.

La Scala, begun in 1776, was built so rapidly that two years later, on August 3, 1778, it was inaugurated with Salieri's "Semiramide Riconosciata," which was sung by Signore Balducci and Lebrun, Signori Rubinelli and Prati, and the celebrated male soprano Pacchiarolli. Salieri was a poor, vulgar composer, of whom nothing is remembered but the record of his attempts to rival and criticise Beethoven at Vienna. The number of composers who, from Salieri's day to ours, have written operas expressly for La Scala is very great; and during the first period, when composing an opera was not a very long affair, considering that the only qualities required were spontaneous melodies, rapidity of development, and easy harmonies, they succeeded each other incessantly. I shall name those composers only who won more than a passing and fictitious popularity, and who deserve to be recorded in the history of art.

Guglielmi only wrote for La Scala an opera bouffe, "I Fratelli Pappamosca."

Zingarelli, a prolific and tedious composer, wrote more for La Scala than any other maestro. He began in 1785 with "Alsinda," which was followed by "Telemaco," "Ifigenia," "La morte di Cesare," "Pirro re di Epiro," "Il mercato di Monfregoso," "La Secchia rapita," "Artaserse," "Giulietta e Romeo." In 1796 he gave "Meleagro," "Il ritratto," "Clitemnestra," and "Il bevitore fortunato." Of all these operas, what has remained? "Romeo e Giulietta" only, which would be forgotten like the rest if Bellini had not written, on the same subject, his "Capuletti e Montecchi."

Asioli, a Milanese composer and excellent writer of didactic works, composed but one opera for La Scala: it was called "Cinna."

Paer, the celebrated composer of "Agnese," gave three operas: "L'oro fa tutto," "Rossana," and "L'Eroismo in Amore." This last appeared in 1816, when Rossini's star had already risen.

Fioravanti, one of the most brilliant and imaginative writers of opera bouffe in the old Italian style, of which Cimarosa is the prototype. The public of La Scala warmly applauded four new works by him: "L'astuta in amore," "La capricciosa pentita," "L'orgoglio avvilito," and "La schiava di due padroni."

Mayr, of Bergamo, was remarkably gifted with dramatic power for his time, and wrote during the period of Napoleon's grandeur, dedicating to him a cantata. La Scala accepted the following works by this composer: "Lodowiska," "L'equivoco," "Le due giornate," "Imisteri Eleusini," "Le fiute rivali," "Alfonso e Cora," "Amor non ha ritegno," "Braldo ed Eunna," "Adelasio ed Aleramo," "Ne l'uno ne l'altro," "Raoul di Créqui," "Le due duchesse," "Elena," and "Fedra," this last in 1821, when Rossini was at the height of his glory; but Mayr's rather antiquated style makes me place him amongst the composers of the first period.

Generali is to be considered as Rossini's true precursor. Form and ideas are often identical in both masters, and the famous crescendo in the overtures is his invention. Generali began composing for La Scala in 1805. "Don Chisciotte," his first opera given there, was followed by "Chi non rësica non rosica," "La vedova delirante," and "Il romito della Provenza," this last in 1830.

Gnecco deserves mention for the great success he obtained with "Le prove d'un opera seria," which remained for years in the general répertoire and was played in every theatre in Italy.

Morlacchi, a melodious composer, gained celebrity for one opera only—"Tebaldo ed Isolina"—his

"Aventure di nuagioruata" and "Gianni di Parigi," given at La Scala, had no success.

During the second period, besides Rossini's, we find names which entirely eclipse those of contemporaneous writers. These names form a melodic pleiad which has impressed itself on the whole world, leaving ineffaceable traces, notwithstanding the real progress made later in the musical drama. And this is the reason why the Italians, whose nature seemed reflected in the easy, spontaneous, inspired melodies of Rossini, Bellini, and Donizetti, bore so ill the violent change of style which has arisen lately. On the production of every new work written in our day these melodies are evoked and mourned over, yet there is nothing left to do but to copy them or turn boldly towards the future. Let us see now what these famous composers wrote for La Scala, and begin with Rossini, who, at the early age of twenty, brought out an opera bouffe, "La Pietra del paragone." It was sung by Signora Marcolini, Filippo Galli, and Bonoldi, three celebrities of their time, and the composer received 600 lire from the impresario.

The success was immense. Rossini became at once famous, and the viceroy of Italy exempted him from military service, a most extraordinary favour in those Napoleonic days. Two years later he returned to Milan and gave "Aureliano in Palmira," in which the famous Velluti sang. It appears the opera had but a very quiet reception, but Velluti obtained an enthusiastic success for his fanciful vocalisations; indeed, these ornamentations were so much out of proportion with the original theme, and so completely perverted the melodious idea, that Rossini from that day determined to write himself all the ornaments he intended to be sung. Useless precaution! for singing masters, and singers too, have ever since added new variations to those already elaborated by Rossini. The overture alone of "Aureliano" has remained, placed by Rossini himself as the Prelude to his "Barbiere di Siviglia." In this same year (1814) Rossini gave, at La Scala, "Il Turco in Italia." It was coldly received, the general opinion being that the master had copied himself too freely. A great success, however, was obtained by its performers—David (tenor), Galli (basso), and the buffo Pacini, who was inimitable in the part of Geranio.

Three years passed over, and in 1817 Rossini, full of honours for his "Barbiere," "Otello," and "Cenerentola," obtained an immense success with "La Gazza Ladra." On leaving the theatre, after the furore of the first night, Rossini, who joked on every subject, said that he was more overpowered by the fatigue of the numerous bows he had to make to the audience than by the excitement of his great success. Two curious circumstances are attached to the first representation of "La Gazza Ladra." The fine duet of the prison was written in Ricordi's back shop, in the midst of a dozen copyists, who were making a furious noise; then a pupil of Rolla, the violinist, wanted to stab Rossini because he had had the impudence to put drums in the overture, and was pacified only when Rossini, with comic gravity, promised he never would repeat a similar profanation. The last opera Rossini wrote for La Scala was one of his weakest, "Bianca e Faliero," which was given in 1820. It failed completely, a marvellous quartet in it alone being received with enthusiasm.

Pacini, after being one of Rossini's first imitators, left the beaten path, and, adopting a style of his own, soon became a tolerably original inventor of themes and cabalette; but too affected, a bad harmonist, too violent in dramatic effects, and wanting in rhythm; his operas, although successful on their production, soon fell into disuse, and "Saffo" alone remains. Of this, however, there are doubts as to his being really the author; indeed, it has been attributed to his servant, who it is said gave him the best motives in it. No less than ten operas did he write for La Scala, beginning in 1819. Their names are: "Falegname di Livonia," "Wallace," "La Vestale," "Isabella ed Errico," "La gelosia corretta," "Gli Arabi nelle Gallie" (which was very successful), "I cavalieri di Valenza," "Il Talismano," "Giovanna d'Arco," and "L'Ebreo."

Another close imitator of Rossini was Meyerbeer, at the time he gave his two first operas at La Scala, "Margherita d'Anjou," in 1820, with fair success, and, in 1822, "L'esule di Granata," which pleased less. Shackled by too close an imitation of Rossini, whose form, style, and even embellishments he reproduced, he had not been able in these two works to give adequate signs of the truly original character of his genius, which only revealed itself in the "Crociano," and attained perfect maturity in "Robert le Diable." Mercadante, too, for a long time reflected only the formulas, ways, and means of the great Pesarese; but he always tended to the grand style and pompous expressions which came later. He, perhaps, was less imaginative and melodious than Pacini, but he surpassed him in learning, in clearness, and in a certain grandeur and regularity of construction, which unfortunately turned to heaviness and wearisome length. "Elisa and Claudio" was the first opera he gave at La Scala, in 1821. The triumph it obtained created the universal feeling that a new melodious genius had arisen, but instead of progressing his star receded for many years. Signore Tosi and Pisaroni, two celebrities of the time, must be mentioned as contributing greatly to his success. The following operas, "A dele ed Emerico," "Amleto Montanaro," "Il Conte d'Essex," "La gioventù di Enrico V.," all given with little or no success, are now forgotten. "Il Giuramento," given in 1837, and sung by Signore Schoberlechner and Brambilla, Pedrazzi and Cartagenova, renewed Mercadante's fame, and was followed in 1839 by the representation of "Il Bravo," perhaps a more clamorous triumph yet. These two operas mark the culminating point of Mercadante's inspiration, for in them spontaneous phrases, with novel outlines, are sustained by solid harmonies and most effective dramatic expression. "La Schiava Saracena," the last opera written by Mercadante for La Scala, was of an inferior stamp altogether, and was very coldly received.

Donizetti's name appeared for the first time on the bills of La Scala in 1822. This artistic genius, whose excessive facility for composing, and whose untimely end prevented him from reaching the highest realms of art, had to encounter difficulties and vanquish obstacles such as few artists have met with. His first attempt was a failure, "Chiara e Serafina," in 1822, which was produced immediately after Mercadante's "Adele ed Emerico," which had obtained a fair success. Nor was he more fortunate with "Ugo Conte di Parigi," given ten years later in the same season as "Norma"; too severe a test, although the good public of La Scala had shown itself difficult to please, even by Bellini's divine creation. A memorable date is that of December 26, 1834, when "Lucrezia Borgia" was first represented; many are still living who were present, and they all concur in saying that it was received with impatience, general discontent, and disapproval, to be pulled to pieces next day by the criticisms of the time.

Donizetti next gave "Gemma di Vergy," a very inferior work to "Lucrezia Borgia," but which pleased more. The last opera Donizetti wrote for La Scala was "Maria Padilla," which contains a beautiful duet for two sopranis. This opera had more success than its predecessors, although "Gemma" is a fine opera, full of fancy, and "Lucrezia" a real masterpiece.

No new composer created such a dazzling surprise as did Bellini with "Il Pirata," in 1827, supported by three vocalists, whose names have reached us as famous amongst all—Rubini, Tamburini, and Méric-Lalande. Added to the unexpected beauties of new and fresh melodies, the maestro himself exercised a bewitching influence by his sweet, affectionate manner, his youth, and beautiful expression. The music of "Il Pirata" has now got old, but one must go back to those days to be able to imagine the effect those warm melodies had on the public, when sung by a tenor such as Rubini. Two years later "La Straniera" also pleased immensely, but did not produce the enthusiasm created by "Il Pirata." Rubini was no longer there, and was replaced by Reina; to Tamburini and Méric-Lalande was added Madame Ungher, one of the future queens of song. The success of "La Straniera" grew with every representation, and no good Milanese could do without going each night to hear the famous "Meco tu vieni o misera." Another memorable date in the history of "La Scala" was that of the first representation of "Norma," December 31, 1831. How strange it is to learn that "Norma" was received coldly by a public who applauded all the pieces on the old-fashioned principle, and left unnoticed all the sublime, imperishable passages of this score, in which Bellini, by his melodic force, obtained a dramatic effect never before realised, even by Gluck's declamation, nor surpassed since by Wagner's metopea. Quite on a par with the public's reception was the judgment of the critics, who with stolid and impudent coolness pitied Bellini, and declared a want of vitality in his new work, the most living and most lasting score in existence.

Another composer worthy to be recalled, although not to be compared to the great masters of his time, is Ricci. His "Chiara di Roseberg" obtained great success in 1831, and a more noisy triumph still greeted the appearance of "L'avventura di Scaramuccia." On the contrary, "Chiara di Montalbano" failed miserably.

AMATEUR MUSIC AS IT SHOULD BE.

THE coming of age of the Herefordshire Philharmonic Society within the past year has been allowed to slip by without any recognition from the press, though much smaller and less noteworthy musical events are constantly chronicled, and though to its numerous members, and twice a year (when the concerts are given) to three or four surrounding counties, it has been a most important institution ever since its commencement twenty-one years ago. This silence may be consequent on one of the Society's rules—not to admit the press for the sake of public criticism; but it seems a mistake and an act of injustice in these days, when the efforts of amateurs are being constantly run down (chiefly because they are successful), that the music-loving public should not have the opportunity of knowing a little about so excellent an amateur Society from every point of view, whose twenty-one years' flourishing career fully entitles it to offer rules and principles as models on which other societies may build with almost insured hopes of success.

A knowledge of most of the similar musical associations now in existence all over the United Kingdom enables us to say that there is no other Society of the same character which can boast a like artistic position. To endeavour to show the reason for this, with a view to encourage and stimulate other similar bodies to the same degree of excellence, may be worth some little consideration. The Society possesses, in common with most others, a president, vice-president, committee, treasurer, subscription list, and ballots for its members, consisting of ladies and gentlemen, who come, some of them, sixty miles to attend the strictest rehearsals. This will tend to show that the Association possesses what others seem unable to obtain—namely, the hearty love and deep interest of all its members.

Anything but a crammed room at its concerts is unknown, and this not from tickets being forced upon unwilling buyers by aristocratic ladies, to whom the effort of getting rid of them is well nigh a desperate one; but from those taken up by the subscribers to whom they belong. Houses are filled and parties are made from the esprit de corps felt everywhere with regard to "our Society"; the same sort of interest, indeed, working for music which supports successfully the county balls and agricultural shows throughout England; not a complimentary simile for art, perhaps, but one which shows the sort of life absolutely necessary from a social point of view, and which ensures a satisfactory result indirectly from a musical standpoint also.

The cause of this is, of course, mainly individual effort; but surely in other counties there might be found equally competent and energetic managers, who would and could infuse that magnetic power into a body of people which we commonly call "go," and without which the best efforts are "stale, flat, and unprofitable." Amateur music has of late made great strides, and amateurs will have their own music and their own performances whether they are laughed at or no. They want to know, by performing it, the music they care for; to listen to it once or twice gives them little or no knowledge of it. Their rendering of it may not always give their listeners all the pleasure they wish, but it gives the executants pleasure, for they have learnt something, and at each performance feel the necessity of learning more, their powers of gauging the merits of a purely artistic performance being also materially increased.

The Society which is our subject possesses both an orchestra and a chorus. Perhaps the former may not be all which its members some day hope to see it; but many of them, we venture to say, would agree that they have learnt more of music at their rehearsals than from all they have heard elsewhere put together. We would only recommend them more frequent rehearsals to fit them to become in their department as good as the other half of their Society; for, of the choral singing, it would be impossible to speak too highly. Judged by a professional standard it is first rate, and there are many fine points in most of the works given by the members, especially those unaccompanied, which we do not think could be excelled by many well-known Metropolitan choirs.

After having mentioned this characteristic of the Society, readers will not be surprised to hear that the conductor in Herefordshire is Mr. Henry Leslie, to whom the advancement of music owes so much throughout England. He realised long before other people that if England is to rise from the ignominy of being the unmusical nation of Europe, the work of making her different, and of giving to her the cultivated, discriminating audiences we find abroad, belongs undoubtedly to the self-cultivation of amateurs of all classes throughout the country, either through choral and orchestral societies or through independent action. One of the first results of his working interest in this branch of musical education was the formation of the Herefordshire Philharmonic Society, and for twenty-one years he has given his untiring skill in making it what it now is, socially, financially, and, above all, artistically flourishing.

During that time something like two hundred and eighty works, great and small, have been given; and the result is a real feeling for, and a certain knowledge of, much good music among the Society's members, combined with the certainty of its being carried home and influencing largely for musical good their respective villages and surroundings, as indeed is proved to be the case.

Should this short account of successful results and their apparent reasons lead any similarly constituted Society to follow the rules and ambitions of this one, or encourage any musical amateur to go on with the great work of musical education in himself and those around him, its object will have been reached; for if music as a serious art is ever to be appreciated and understood here, as it is in Germany, the formation of an educated, enlightened public is the first requisite; and, in order to produce this valuable result, most surely will the root of the matter prove to be the cultivation and encouragement of the musical amateur.

SIR JULIUS BENEDICT.

THOSE who can remember the time when Benefit Concerts were amongst the important attractions of the London musical season must recall with pleasure the annual appeal of Mr., now Sir Julius, Benedict, who invariably assembled around him the best artists of the day, and provided a programme of the highest degree of interest. In June of the present year the fiftieth anniversary of these performances will be celebrated by two concerts at the Albert Hall, at the first of which the composer's Oratorio "St. Peter" will be given. Apart from the opportunity which will thus be afforded for showing the estimation in which the exceptional artistic gifts of Sir Julius are held by the general public, we are glad to say that a testimonial in acknowledgment of his many years' services to the art has been proposed; and, as might be expected, has received the most cordial support. The Lord Mayor has accepted the post of Honorary Treasurer, an office has been secured, and many subscriptions have already been promised. In reviewing the fifty years of Sir Julius Benedict's career in this country, during which music has grown from an aristocratic luxury to a popular necessity, it must be recollected that he has ever been one of the most active agents in its progress; for as executant, composer, teacher, lecturer, and writer, he has made a name which will be permanently enrolled in the annals of the art. But although in all these capacities he has fairly earned a deep debt of gratitude from audiences, pupils, and readers, it must not be forgotten that there are many who cannot be classed under any of these heads who have received, and benefited by, his information and counsel.

A preliminary meeting of the Committee was held in the saloon of Her Majesty's Theatre, on the 22nd ult., when, in the unavoidable absence of the Earl of Lathom, Lord Londesborough took the chair. A very large number of musical professors, amateurs, and others connected with the art were present, and letters were read accepting the office of patrons, on behalf of Her Majesty the Queen, the Prince and Princess of Wales, the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh, the Duke and Duchess of Albany, and Mr. Gladstone, who expressed much regret at his inability to attend the meeting. On the motion of Mr. Wilson Barrett, seconded by Mr. T. Chappell, it was resolved that the testimonial should take the form of a sum of money, to be raised by public subscription, and from the proceeds of the two Concerts to be held at the Albert Hall. Mr. Barrett added that if the members of the theatrical profession could by their aid increase the fund, they would be most willing to give their services in the cause. Resolutions were also passed empowering the General Committee to increase their number and to receive contributions, and also to appoint an executive Committee, including the Earl of Lathom and Lord Londesborough. The Lord Mayor was requested to continue to act as Hon. Treasurer, and Mr. C. W. Thompson as Hon. Secretary, Mr. George Reeves Smith being appointed Secretary to the Committee. It was also agreed that Messrs. Dimsdale, the trustees of the fund, should be authorised to receive subscriptions, as well as the members of the Committee. Apart from the large number of subscriptions collected at the Meeting, the interest felt in the proceedings by all present was unmistakably apparent; and that the proposed testimonial will thus be a genuine expression from the music-lovers of a country with which the recipient, although not a native, has so long identified himself, must, we are certain, materially enhance its value to one who has so legitimately won his fame as an artist, and his reputation as a man.

ALL who think with us that the selection of operatic works for performance in any country should not be bounded by geographical restrictions, cannot but feel gratified that the lessee of the Royal Italian Opera no longer confines himself to the creations of foreign composers; but, welcoming good music wherever it can be found, has chosen Mr. Mackenzie's highly successful opera "Colomba" as one of the chief attractions of the coming season. The prospectus announces that this work, translated into Italian, and the principal part sustained by Madame Pauline Lucca, will positively be produced, Mdlle. Gertrude Griswold (who will make her first appearance on the stage in England), being also included in the cast. This widening of the hitherto somewhat exclusive scheme of the Royal Italian Opera will, we feel assured, tend, not only to secure a continuance of support from the former subscribers to the establishment, but will enlist the sympathies of the many who had long urged the desirability of instituting some changes in its management, which should be more in consonance with the marked progress in the musical taste of the people. We are glad also to find that Reyer's Opera "Sigurd," lately received with so much favour in Brussels, will be given, with Madame Albani in the character of the heroine. Besides the artists already mentioned we are promised Madame Adelina Patti, Madame Sembrich, Madame Maria Durand, Mdlle. De Vere (her first appearance at the Royal Italian Opera), Madame Scalchi, Mdlle. Reggiani, and Mdlle. Tremelli; Signor Nicolini, Signor Marconi, M. Soulacroix, Signor Mierzwinski, Signor Cotogni, M. Devoyod, Signor De Reszké, Signor Monti, and Signor Novara. The conductors will be, as before, Signor Bevignani and M. Dupont. The season will commence on April 29. As announced in our last number, a series of twelve performances of German Opera, under the conductorship of Herr Richter, will also be given on the Wednesdays and Fridays in each week, commencing June 4, which will certainly be a welcome addition to the important musical events of the season.

THE Christmas of 1883 brought with it the usual—indeed we may say more than usual—performances of "The Messiah"; and, as might be expected, a number of unique criticisms upon the work have appeared in country newspapers, many of which have been forwarded to our office. One of these—after telling us that “The Messiah” is a great deal too much heard in the present day, and that its merits are over estimated, because “the majority of people are blinded by the sublimity of the subject, and rendered unfit to pronounce judgment from a purely musical standpoint”—proceeds to say that the rendering of the air “I know that my Redeemer liveth” was “exceptionally brilliant”; that the singing of “He was despised” was “equal to a commentary upon it,” and expresses regret that after the air “Why do the nations,” “the singer gets his own share of the applause and the orchestra’s to boot.” In another the critic says that he would have been better pleased had the air “The trumpet shall sound” been written for a soprano, and makes other suggestions for improvements in the Oratorio which are, unfortunately, now too late. But a long notice, headed “The Messiah,” and commencing “The above was the title of the piece performed on Monday night,” is perhaps the most remarkable of any of the “curiosities of criticism” we have yet quoted from. “Thus saith the Lord of Hosts,” we are told, was well sung; “the chorus ‘He shall purify,’ &c., follows, in which the alto ‘soars.’” Then, “the contralto sung the next piece most efficiently, and so far not the slightest itch took place.” During the singing of “He was despised,” it is said, “one of the musicians got slightly wrong.” When the Hallelujah chorus was given, “the whole audience rose to their feet. Whether,” remarks the critic, “it was through having become uneasy from having sat from half-past seven to ten o’clock, or from some higher motive, the change was a enjoyable one.” The rendering of the whole of the choruses was evidently quite to the mind of the writer, for he says that “with the exception of a very slight itch in bass,” the singing was all that could be desired. We may add, in conclusion, that the italics are ours.

OUR readers know that we have consistently endeavoured to enforce the fact, whenever occasion offered, that good music, whether thoroughly understood or not, is always more enjoyed by the lower classes than bad. In the course of our remarks upon this subject we have adduced innumerable instances of working men even asking for songs of a higher class than those given to them at cheap Concerts where the music was presumably adapted to the capacity of the audience; and the most successful items in the programmes of the many “People’s Entertainment” performances have invariably been the compositions of the great masters. We have now before us, however, a proof that matters are mending, and that all our caterers for poor men’s Concerts are beginning to awaken to the truth we have stated. It appears that a number of those useful individuals popularly known as “Sandwich men,” whose pitiable appearance in the streets of the metropolis has often excited commiseration from the passers by, were invited one evening during the past month to the headquarters of the Bloomsbury Chapel Mission; and that, after an excellent tea, recitations and music were provided for their amusement. Songs were given by several amateurs, and glees by a choir connected with the Mission Hall. The instrumental pieces included a March by Schubert, a Minuet by Mozart, and a Barcarole by the first-named composer; and we are told that “a more intelligent and appreciative audience could not have been desired.” We have often heard of composers who produce music of an inferior class on the supposition that anything better will not sell; and these compositions they appropriately term “pot-boilers.” Some years ago the taste of the day might have justified such a course of action; but when “Sandwich men” can listen with delight to the music of Schubert and Mozart, we may reasonably ask whether such a lesson should be disregarded. “Pot-boilers” must, no doubt, be composed; but the time may soon come when the pot shall really be boiled with the flames of the bad works, and the good ones may prove the means of putting something in the pot to boil.

SINCE the true method of producing the voice has engaged the attention of our most eminent medical authorities, the question has assumed a form which is likely to lead to the most beneficial results. The book on “Voice, Song, and Speech,” noticed in our last number, has demonstrated the necessity of studying the causes as well as the effects of bad voice production by those who profess to give instruction in the art; and although we do not expect that every teacher of singing shall also be a surgeon, it is good that he should avail himself of the latest researches on the matter. The opening chapter in the book already alluded to has the following passage, with which, we think, all must agree: “Some have ridiculed the idea that an acquaintance with this subject is of any more use to the vocalist than is the anatomy of the hand to the pianist. But the examples are not analogous, inasmuch as the pianist obtains his instrument ready made for him, and if he wear it out or injure it he can purchase another, while the vocalist has to form his voice, and if he wrongly use it, it may be gone for ever.” Those who acknowledge the truth of this, however, should remember that there is a danger to the inexperienced in attempting self-tuition by the aid of a treatise, however well it may be written. A professor once told us that he was waited on by a lady to “have her voice tried,” and commenced by singing the scale with a spasmodic gasp between each note. Upon being asked what she meant, she said she had read in some book that she would never sing unless she pursued this method, and that therefore she had taken a great deal of trouble to acquire it. Perhaps the work inculcating this principle had good in it, but the tyro had only extracted the bad. Professors may undoubtedly be guided by books, but students should be guided by professors.

LOVERS of Handel, a race which happily still exists, though in danger of being improved off the face of the earth, will hear with pleasure that the “Dettingen Te Deum” is to be performed at the next festival of the “Sons of the Clergy,” to be held in St. Paul’s Cathedral, on May 14. In former years it was performed alternately with the Te Deum by Purcell; but, for some reason or other, this programme was superseded about fifty years ago by a long selection of English anthems, accompanied only by the organ. The full band was revived, under the auspices of the present organist, and many beautiful works, not often to be heard in London, have been given in their integrity under the dome of the Cathedral; amongst them Spohr’s “How lovely are Thy dwellings” and “God, Thou art great”; Mendelssohn’s “As the hart pants,” “Come, let us sing,” and “When Israel out of Egypt came”; Hiller’s “Song of Victory,” and also his fine, but too seldom heard, “All they that trust in Thee, Lord.” What a pity Latin words may not be used! We might then hear Leo’s “Dixit Dominus” in C, possibly a Mass by Palestrina, or Bach’s glorious Mass in B minor.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.

THE only performance of this Society requiring record in our present issue is that of Berlioz's "Faust" on the 7th ult. This favourite work was repeated in place of one of the intended performances of Wagner's "Parsifal," the production of which has been of necessity postponed until next season. We have so recently drawn attention to the masterly way in which the "Faust" is interpreted by Mr. Barnby's well-trained forces that it is only necessary to note the special features of this performance. Regarding the efforts of Mrs. Whitney, an American soprano who sang the music of Marguerite, it will be well to speak with some degree of reserve. There was ample evidence to prove that the new comer is an experienced artist, and whatever imperfections of method were noticeable may be fairly attributed to nervousness and the sensation of strangeness which every vocalist must feel when singing for the first time in so large an area as the Albert Hall. Mr. F. King gave satisfaction in the music of Mephistopheles, and Mr. Lloyd as Faust and Mr. Pyatt as Brander repeated their now familiar successes.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

AT the Concert given by this Society on the 1st ult., Schubert's Mass in E flat—one of the features of last season—was repeated, and with it were performed Beethoven's Seventh Symphony and Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night." These things made up a good and attractive programme, but the arranged order of the evening was broken in upon by the sudden illness of Mr. C. Hallé, who found himself quite unable to be present. The emergency was undoubtedly grave, but when an archer has two strings to his bow the snapping of one is not fatal. Mr. Hallé prostrate, the assistant Conductor, Mr. W. H. Cummings, came to the front, and at short notice took upon himself to direct not only the choral works, but the Symphony also. As may be supposed, he was least successful with the orchestral piece, the necessary experience, though not the required musicianship, being wanting. Yet Mr. Cummings, even with this, did wonderfully well, the audience being so impressed with the fact as to call him to the platform amid loud applause. With the Mass and Cantata the Conductor was, of course, at home, and they were rendered in a manner which gave the utmost satisfaction. Upon the works themselves there is no need to dwell, but we may congratulate the Society upon the fortunate circumstances that enabled it so successfully to "pull through" a crisis. The band and chorus were excellent as usual, and thoroughly well seconded the intentions of Mr. Cummings.

At the Society's next Concert, given on the 22nd ult., Bach's Christmas Oratorio was performed, under the direction of Mr. W. H. Cummings. The talented assistant Conductor was not called upon in this case because of Mr. Hallé's illness, but in pursuance of an arrangement made when drawing up the plan of the season. It was naturally and properly felt that Mr. Cummings, as chorus master, should be entrusted with the performance of a great choral work, and choice fell upon the Christmas Oratorio. In the result nothing but good came. Mr. Cummings showed that he possessed all requisite knowledge and skill for the responsible task; he maintained a firm control over his forces, and, if we cannot in every instance approve his reading of the music, nothing is more certain than that he had a definite idea, and was able to secure its ample expression. It is scarcely necessary to say that all the Christmas Oratorio was not performed, or that Bach never intended it should be given at a single sitting.

We have here, in point of fact, six Cantatas intended for Church use during the Christmas season, and, though short individually, collectively so long as to compel omissions when performed under the circumstances of a Concert. Some of the larger choruses were left out by Mr. Cummings, for whose judgment, we may be sure, it is possible to give good reasons. Nevertheless, we passed those numbers over with regret, and for some of them would gladly have exchanged a few of the chorals, to all of which honour was done. It soon became apparent to the audience why the chorals had been retained. The object undoubtedly was to display the fine part-singing of the choir when unaccompanied, and to rival in finish the execution of similar pieces by the Albert Hall Choir. Undoubtedly, a great step was taken in this direction, the music being performed with a steadiness, truth of intonation, and power of expression that reflected high credit upon all concerned. Nor were these merits confined to the chorals; inasmuch as the choruses proper were given with striking power and effect. Miss Annie Marriott, Miss Mary Beare, Madame Patey, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. Bridson answered for the solos, and gave a good account of them, special applause following in several instances. We shall be understood as referring to the Echo song for the soprano, the Slumber song for the contralto, and the duet for soprano and bass. These were all capitally performed; the only drawback to the merit of the solos, indeed, being an occasional lack of declamatory point and power in the delivery of the recitatives. But at this no amateur wondered, the secret of good recitative singing being in these days limited to very few. The audience paid great attention to the work throughout, and its performance must be accounted a distinct success.

MR. WILLING'S CONCERT.

THE extra Concert given by Mr. Willing's Choir, on Tuesday, the 26th ult., with the object of raising funds for the restoration of a church near Coventry, was one of the most interesting of the present season. The programme included three items, of which one was an absolute novelty, and another a revival of a little known work; while the performance of the third had one specially attractive feature, to which further reference shall be made presently. Mr. E. H. Thorne, whose setting of the 57th Psalm, written expressly for the Society, came first in order, is a musician whose merits are not so widely known as they deserve. His compositions for the church have obtained general recognition, but the present work proves in a decisive manner that Mr. Thorne has emancipated himself from the trammels of the orthodox ecclesiastical style, and made himself acquainted with the scores of modern composers of sacred music. The Psalm is arranged for tenor solo and chorus, and in the general character of the music may be described as standing midway between Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer" and Liszt's setting of the 13th Psalm. It is neither so sumptuous in melody as the one nor so free and involved as the other, but it has a sufficiency of melodic charm, while in construction and phraseology it is thoroughly modern and independent. To come to details, the work commences with an expressive tenor solo in A minor, with which eventually brief phrases for chorus, with harp accompaniment, are mingled. At the words "Awake up my glory" the tempo changes to allegro vivace in the key of D, and after another brilliant solo the Psalm concludes with a vigorous fugal movement in A, in the development of which the principal voice has a share. The second item in the programme was a selection from Handel's early Italian Oratorio "La Resurrezione." In 1706, the young composer, just emancipated from the distasteful study of the law, commenced a tour in Italy—at that time a necessary part of a musician's education—and in 1708 "La Resurrezione" was completed, and performed in Rome. The long period during which the work has slumbered is not a matter of surprise, even making full allowance for the estimation in which Handel is held in this country, for such interest as it possesses, is, of course, mainly antiquarian. It is in his choral writing that Handel's genius is chiefly resplendent, and in "La Resurrezione" there are but two choruses, brief, simply constructed movements, placed at the end of each part of the work. The characters are an Angel, the Magdalen, and a Voice (soprano), Cleophas (contralto), St. John (tenor), and Lucifer (bass), and the libretto consists merely of a dialogue between these mortal and immortal personages. In some prefatorial matter supplied to the book of words by Mr. W. H. Husk, the writer says that "Handel's instrumentation will be adhered to and no additions whatever made." This was doubtless said in perfect good faith, Mr. Husk not being aware that Mr. Willing intended to use Sir Michael Costa's additional accompaniments to the fine bass air "O voi dell' Erebo," and that the cembalo part would be omitted throughout. The matter was only of importance as showing once more that it is a practical impossibility to perform one of Handel's scores precisely as he left it. The selection was, on the whole, tolerably well rendered, the soloists being Miss Jessie Griffin, Madame Enriquez, and Mr. Santley. The choir, however, was heard to far greater advantage in Mendelssohn's "Athalie," which formed the second part of the Concert, and we are inclined to consider their share in this work as the best achievement so far. The illustrative verses were declaimed by Mr. Santley earnestly, though without much variety of emphasis, and the solo parts were efficiently sustained by the Misses Robertson and Miss Griffin.

MONDAY AND SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

SOME of Mr. Arthur Chappell's programmes during the past month have presented features of more than usual interest. For the sake of chronological accuracy, however, we must commence with the Concerts of January 26 and 28, though these may be dismissed with only a formal record of what was done. Beethoven's Quartet in A (Op. 18, No. 5), his Sonata in A (Op. 2, No. 2), and Fibich's Quartet in E minor (Op. 11) were played on the former occasion; and four movements of Schubert's Ottet, Bach's Prelude and Fugue à la tarantella, and Beethoven's Trio in G (Op. 1, No. 2), on the latter, Mr. Charles Hallé being the pianist on the Saturday and Miss Marie Krebs on the Monday. The vocal music, contributed by Mr. Edward Lloyd and Miss Santley respectively, calls for no remark. The rentrée of Mdlle. Janotha, after a more than usually prolonged absence, constituted the chief attraction at the Concert of the 2nd ult. The Polish pianist received a warm welcome from a full audience, and speedily proved that she has lost none of those qualities which have given her a position in the front rank of executants. Mdlle. Janotha is in no sense a specialist; while it would scarcely be correct to say that she is perfect in everything she attempts, there are very few pianists who show so much excellence alike in the classical and romantic schools of composition. Her admirers would perhaps have preferred to hear her in some work of importance on this occasion; but let that pass. She gave a highly sympathetic rendering of Chopin's Impromptu ira F sharp, and though Herr N. Janotha's Gavotte and Herr Gelenski's Scherzo in E flat did not prove very interesting as music, they showed her command over the key-board, the latter piece especially. Of course she was encored, as was Madame Néruda in Paganini's Moto perpetuo. The concerted works were Spohr's melodious Quartet in E flat (Op. 58, No. 1) and Rubinstein's fine Sonata in D (Op. 18), for pianoforte and violoncello. In the analytical programme it was suggested that the Adagio in the quartet would make an excellent organ piece. The writer was perhaps not aware that the movement is to be found among Dr. Hopkins's organ arrangements published many years ago. Mr. Santley contributed three of his oft-repeated selections, namely, Signor Piatti's "O Swallow, Swallow," Schubert's "An die Leyer," and Schumann's "Widmung."

Amateurs should have mustered in strong force on Monday, the 4th ult., for the programme contained a new pianoforte Sonata by Mr. Villiers Stanford, but as a matter of fact they severely stayed away. This indifference on the part of the public to the claims of native art is not only irritating, but it is fast becoming ridiculous. We have three or four young composers whose collective ability is at least equal to that of the same number of leading German living musicians, whose utterances always awaken interest and expectation. Mr. Villiers Stanford is gaining honour abroad, but he is also not without it at home, for in his orchestral Serenade in G and his Elegiac Symphony—to name but two of his works—qualities have been recognised far more valuable than mere musicianship, even of the highest class. These qualities are also present in his new Sonata, which is in the unusual key of D flat. Some listeners have professed to perceive in the work a deliberate intention to violate the established laws of form, but we confess that to us no such design is apparent. In matters of detail, Mr. Stanford shows himself an independent thinker, but in all essentials his newest work is as classical in outline as could possibly be desired. The opening adagio is exceedingly impressive, and the succeeding allegro moderato is worked out with splendid mastery of the subject matter, the general effect being that of a lofty design carried into execution by a thoroughly experienced hand. The succeeding allegro grazioso, a modified kind of scherzo, is vigorous, and the final allegro comodo, with its excellent first subject, seems scarcely less important than the first movement, though for some mysterious reason no analysis was vouchsafed of this portion of the work. Here it may be remarked, parenthetically, that if biographical details are taken from Grove's "Dictionary" they should be brought up to date and mistakes corrected. Mr. Stanford's Serenade, produced at Birmingham, was not repeated at Bristol; nor is his opera "Savonarola" to be produced at Hamburg in the autumn, but at the end of the present month. To return to the Sonata, we have no hesitation in characterising it as one of the most important compositions for piano solo produced within the present generation. It was very finely played by Miss Zimmermann, and composer and executant were called to the platform and loudly cheered. An addition to the number of acceptable vocalists was made at this Concert in the person of Mr. Winch, a native of America, and the possessor of a tenor voice of very agreeable quality, and well under control. Mr. Winch proved himself to be an artist in his first air, Handel's "Si tamo, o cara," from "Muzio Scaevola," and he was even more successful in some charming lieder by Raff and Jensen. One of these was asked for a second time, and the audience was evidently well pleased with the new comer. Mendelssohn's Quartet in D (Op. 44, No. 1), Rheinberger's Pianoforte Quartet in E flat (Op. 38), and some pieces for violoncello by Signor Piatti completed the programme of this excellent Concert.

On the following Saturday Madame Néruda could not appear in consequence of indisposition, and her place was taken by that clever young English violinist, Miss Emily Shinner. It was an arduous undertaking for a young artist to appear at short notice as leader of the concerted music before such a highly critical audience, but Miss Shinner acquitted herself remarkably well, the works in which she took part being Mozart's Quartet in D minor and Haydn's Trio in C. Mdlle. Janotha played Beethoven's Sonata in D, Op. 28. On Monday, the 11th, there were two novelties, both of them by deceased composers. The first was a Quintet in D, for flute and strings, by Molique, Op. 35. This highly esteemed violinist, teacher, and composer left a large number of works in various styles, but his name does not often appear in concert programmes, the most prominent recent instance being the revival of his Oratorio "Abraham," at the Hereford Festival of 1882. Molique was a musician of the first rank, and whatever he wrote bore the impress of sound workmanship, as well as remarkable elegance of style. These qualities are to be found in full measure in the flute Quintet which it is stated was written at the request of Mr. Walter John Broadwood. It is in no sense a great work, but it is very pleasing, a flow of easy unaffected melody mingled with scholarly partwriting prevailing throughout. As a representative example of the art work of a period when Spohr and Mendelssohn were the masters from whom musicians gathered their inspiration, the Quintet was well worthy of revival. It was beautifully interpreted with Mr. Svendsen in the principal part. The other novelty was Beethoven's Serenade Trio for flute, violin, and viola, Op. 25, a work which, in the nature of things, is not likely to be often performed, bright and ingenious as it is. Mendelssohn's Fantasie Ecossaie, in F sharp minor, Op. 28, afforded Mdlle. Janotha an easy triumph. She made a commendable effort to resist an encore, but had to yield at last, when she gave the favourite "Lied ohne Worte" in C from the sixth book. The vocal element was supplied by Miss Louise Phillips and Madame Fassett, whose singing of duets by Herr Holländer and Schumann fully merited the applause it received.

Mr. Villiers Stanford's Sonata in D flat was repeated by Miss Zimmermann on the following Saturday, and again favourably received, its merits being more conspicuous on a second hearing. The programme likewise contained two early works of Beethoven, the Trio in C minor, Op. 1, No. 3, which Haydn advised him not to print, and so offended the young composer, who was conscious that it was the beat of the set; and the String Quintet in E flat, Op. 4, a work which has suffered by comparison with the far grander Quintet in C, Op. 29. On Monday, the 18th, there was a very large audience, induced by the double attraction of Beethoven's Rasoumowski Quartet in F, Op. 59, No. 1, and the fact of its being the last appearance this season of Madame Néruda at a Monday Concert. Mendelssohn's Trio in C minor, Op. 66, was the only other concerted work, and the greatest of female violinists played two of her favourite solos by Spohr and Paganini, receiving an encore as a matter of course. The same compliment was paid to Miss Marie Krebs after her rendering of Chopin's Ballade in A flat, though the piece did not exhibit her talent to advantage. Miss Carlotta Elliot, who has not been heard so frequently of late as could be desired, sang lieder by Schubert and Franz with her customary refinement and charm.

Four of the most popular works in the repertory of these Concerts were performed on the 23rd, namely, Mendelssohn's Quartet in E flat, Op. 12; Boccherini's Violoncello Sonata in A; Beethoven's Serenade Trio in D, Op. 8, and his "Moonlight Sonata," the last-named item being finely interpreted by Mdle. Janotha.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

THE two Concerts which come under our present notice included only one feature, and that not a very interesting one, in the shape of absolute novelty. This was the ballet-divertissement inserted in M. Saint-Saëns's opera "Henri VIII.," recently performed with great éclat, but with little chance of permanent success, in Paris. Whether the opera will ever be performed in the country where the scene is laid seems doubtful; in the meantime, the specimen produced at the Crystal Palace did not rouse any very ardent desire for such a consummation. M. Saint-Saëns's ballet-music is very like other ballet-music, with the difference, however, that several English and Scottish airs are introduced by way of giving couleur locale to the subject. The fact that England and Scotland were in those days not only strange, but frequently hostile nations, not likely to interchange their popular airs, is ignored by M. Saint-Saëns with the sublime nonchalance peculiar to his nation. Apart from this, it may be admitted that the airs are cleverly treated, and may well serve to accompany the gyrations of the dancers, some of whom, at the Grand-Opéra, were, by the way, attired in the most wonderful tartans ever beheld. The first movement of one of Romberg's Violoncello Concertos, indifferently played by M. de Munck, which also was new at the Crystal Palace, was unanimously voted a bore—a fact for which the composer is perhaps less responsible than the taste of his time. The thoroughgoing laudator temporis acti who looks upon Liszt and Rubinstein, and, while it was at all possible, did look upon Schumann, with horror, ought consistently to stand up for the glory of Romberg and other old-fashioned gentlemen of his calibre. The same ingenuous judge would naturally contemplate with puzzled eyes such a phenomenon as Mr. Mackenzie's orchestral ballad "La Belle Dame sans Merci," which is imbued with the spirit of modern music. For here the sacred rights of absolute form are made to yield to the demands of "poetic meaning," as embodied in the ballad of Keats, from which the work derives its name and its deeper significance. The connection between music and poetry is indeed much more intimate than the meagre and hurried so-called analysis in the programme-book would lead one to believe. At the same time, Mr. Mackenzie is not the man to sacrifice sonorous beauty to the desire of painting in detail. His themes are as melodious as they are passionate, and his scoring betrays the master of the orchestra in every bar. The work was listened to with that profound attention which is so much more complimentary to a serious and unfamiliar effort than boisterous applause. A fine performance of Beethoven's Symphony in F is all that need further be mentioned of the Concert of the 16th ult. That given a week later was entirely devoted to Handel's serenata "Acis and Galatea." It is a significant and not altogether creditable fact that the hall was but moderately filled, and that the connoisseurs' gallery was almost empty. Of the performance, it is possible to speak favourably. The chorus was, upon the whole, satisfactory, and the soli were in able hands. Miss Mary Davies sang "Hush, ye pretty warbling choir," and "As when the dove" with inimitable charm of voice; and Mr. Bridson was a sufficiently truculent Polyphemus, his "O ruddier than the cherry" being amongst the chief successes of the afternoon. Mr. Charles Chilly gave satisfaction in the minor part of Damon, and Mr. Winch, the American tenor who was announced to sing Acis, but was unfortunately unable to appear in consequence of illness, found in Mr. Piercy a ready and efficient substitute.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

THE First Concert of the Season was given at St. James's Hall, on the 21st ult., under the conductorship of Mr. George Mount, who, for some unexplained reason, is termed in the programme "Honorary Orchestral Director." In the principal orchestral pieces—Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont," and Spohr's Symphony "The Power of Sound"—no fault could be found with the steady beat adopted by Mr. Mount, or of the times in which he took the various movements of Spohr's suggestive work; but we listened in vain for any poetical "reading" which should lift the performance beyond the level of those ordinary renderings of standard compositions so long passively endured by the loyal subscribers to this time-honoured institution. Considering, however, that three other Conductors are to share in the control of the orchestra during the season, it may be perhaps advisable that no one should too much impress his individuality upon the instrumental body; and, whilst admiring Mr. Mount for his modesty, therefore, we cannot but enter our protest against a policy which must effectually prevent any permanent reform in the performance of those important orchestral works which it should be the boast of the Society to present in the best possible manner. Mr. Carrodus's fine rendering of Beethoven's Violin Concerto, with Molique's difficult "Cadenza," was one of the great features of the evening; and the warm and spontaneous burst of applause at the conclusion of the piece must have convinced him that our opinion was fully shared by the large and critical audience assembled. Whether Miss Clara Asher, who played Mendelssohn's Capriccio for pianoforte in B minor (which, by the way, we should prefer to term a "Rondo"), should have been selected to exhibit her unquestionably clever performance before a Philharmonic audience we are inclined to doubt; but as even Madame Schumann never elicited more decisive marks of approbation, critical observations, perhaps, are unnecessary. The vocalist was Madame Patey, who gave with her usual artistic finish the eloquent "Inflammatus" from Dvorák's "Stabat Mater" and Haydn's "Spirit Song." The Concert concluded with Gounod's "Saltarello" for orchestra, which was composed for, and performed by, the Society in 1871.

BOROUGH OF HACKNEY CHORAL ASSOCIATION.

THE good repute in which this Society has been held for several years was worthily sustained by its Concert of the 25th ult., at the Shoreditch Town Hall, when Mr. Mackenzie's Cantata "Jason" was performed for the first time in London. The production of this remarkably original and effective work at the Bristol Festival of 1882 dwells as an unpleasant recollection in the minds of those who were present. It is by no means creditable to the conductors of our leading choral societies in the metropolis that "Jason" should have been thus far ignored by them, and the greater praise is therefore due to the Hackney Association for setting an example which we have no hesitation in asserting will be generally followed as time progresses. For in Mr. Mackenzie's cantata we have no ordinary work, but a veritable creation in which power and beauty are duly intermingled. It would be absurd to say that it bears no impress of extraneous influence; phrases reminiscent of Weber, Schumann, Wagner, and even Meyerbeer are to be found, but this is of slight consequence by the side of so much that is new and effective. It is in dealing with large masses that the composer exhibits his greatest strength, and thereby proves his claim to rank as one of the foremost musicians of his time. The splendidly developed opening chorus, the scene of the departing Argonauts, the intermezzo "On the waters," and the final chorus are pieces in which the hand of a master is apparent. The best of the solos are the first air of "Orpheus" and the last air of "Jason"; but it may be admitted that Mr. Mackenzie has yet something to learn in writing for voices, and generally he may be recommended to avoid making his music so difficult that conductors may have some excuse for declining the task of preparing it. Considering the intricacies of the score the performance last Monday evening was surprisingly good, especially as there had been but one rehearsal with the orchestra. The choir sang with spirit, and Mr. Prout may be congratulated on achieving another and an important success. Miss Fusselle was obviously overweighted in the arduous music of Medea, though she deserves the praise due to earnest effort. Mr. J. W. Turner's telling voice and dramatic style were of service in the part of Orpheus, and, in the title-rôle, Mr. Musgrove Tufnail showed such excellent promise as to encourage the brightest hopes of his future. The second part of the Concert consisted of a selection from Schubert's "Rosamunde" music, and Auber's light and pretty Overture to "La Sirène."

ROYAL NORMAL COLLEGE FOR THE BLIND.

It would be difficult to over-estimate the value of the work carried on by the Normal College and Academy of Music for the Blind. Dr. Campbell and his able staff of professors and assistants are proving how pure philanthropy and utilitarianism may be harmoniously and beneficially combined, the success of their system justifying the words of the executive committee in their report for 1882, that "The Blind need only to receive the advantages of a thorough training, both mental and physical, to be able to compete in the world with their seeing brethren." Whenever it is deemed advisable to draw public attention to the institution by means of a Concert at St. James's Hall, care is taken to impart an element of genuine musical interest to the programme, and this was done in a special sense at the Concert of the 5th ult. The name of Herr Klindworth is a household word with musicians, but his personality is not familiar to the present generation in this country, as he left us more than twenty years ago, when the art was not generally regarded in the serious light that now attaches to it. Wagner's music being considered attractive to the frequenters of orchestral concerts, four items from the master's works headed the programme. The Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" and the introduction and close from "Tristan und Isolde" were earnestly and impressively rendered, though of course the exquisite finish and unity of expression which Herr Richter is able to secure by numerous rehearsals were wanting. In the third part, which consisted of Liszt's compositions, a fine performance of the beautiful symphonic poem "Les Préludes," failed to receive due appreciation, because it came too late in an over lengthy programme. Madame Albani, who kindly lent the attraction of her name to the Concert, sang Bellini's "Casta Diva"—a somewhat singular selection—and "From Thy love as a Father," from "The Redemption." We have no hesitation in saying that the performances of the pupils of the College reflected the highest credit on the professors, and testified to the ingenuity of the system of tuition. Perhaps the most astonishing proof of this was the masterly interpretation of Beethoven's Concerto in E flat by Mr. Alfred Hollins. The vocalisation of Miss Campbell in Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer," Mr. Moncur in "O, ma maîtresse," and Miss Reece in two of Liszt's "Kirchen-Chor-Gesänge," also calls for very favourable notice. Again, the rendering of the "Pilgrims' Chorus" from "Tannhäuser" (unaccompanied) and Liszt's "Chorus of Reapers" from "Prometheus" was little short of perfection, and the Concert generally was not only interesting, but enjoyable.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

The third of Messrs. Harrison's Subscription Concerts, which took place on January 28, though scarcely equal in musical interest to its two predecessors, showed no falling off in the measure of popular approval, the hall being crowded in every part with an enthusiastic audience. A somewhat serious disappointment was caused by the non-arrival of M. Lasserre, the violoncellist, who was expected from Scotland, but who failed either to appear or to send an apology, and his absence unfortunately necessitated a great many changes, which were not altogether improvements, in the programme. The vocalists were Miss Clara Samuell, Madame Patey, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Frederic King, and Mr. Santley, instrumental art being represented by Signor Tito Mattei (pianoforte) and Mr. Stimpson (organ), Mr. Sidney Naylor conducting.

The Concert given by the musical section of the Midland Institute, on the afternoon of the 2nd ult., derived its chief interest from the performances of the newly-formed Madrigal Choir, which is well balanced and contains a fair proportion of fresh tuneful voices, but has something to acquire yet in precision, delicacy, and discipline. The programme contained some genuine examples of the madrigal of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries by Festa, Marenzio, Wilbye, and Orlando Gibbons, judiciously relieved and diversified by modern imitations by Pearsall and part-songs by Henry Leslie and Walter Macfarren. The singing throughout was very effective. Miss Emily Walker's performance of Beethoven's Pianoforte Sonata in D minor, Op. 31, No. 2, Schumann's Noveltette, No. 8, and some short pieces by Rubinstein, Thalberg, and Heller, greatly pleased her audience.

The annual Concert of the Edgbaston Amateur Musical Union, on the 6th ult., showed steady progress in the Society's band. A Beethoven Symphony is rather a difficult work for an amateur band—for the players sometimes, for the hearers nearly always—but on this occasion the performance of the Fourth Symphony in B flat left little to be desired on the score of precision or intonation. The most successful efforts of the band, however, were in the overtures, more especially those to "La Gazza ladra" (Rossini) and "Cosi fan tutte" (Mozart). Miss Edith Young's playing of Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Concerto in G minor was an unexpected treat, the lady's performance being distinguished by ease, precision, and expressiveness. The other performers were Mrs. Sutton, a well-known local vocalist, and Mr. W. Liston, a promising young violinist.

Perhaps the most interesting of the current series of Mr. Stockley's Orchestral Concerts was the third, which took place on the 7th ult., when the attractions of the band, which now numbers eighty picked instrumentalists, were supplemented by the vocal performances of Miss Anna Williams and Mr. Franklin Clive. Mr. Carrodus, the prince of English violinists, gave a masterly rendering of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, which wanted only a little more passion and abandon in parts to be perfect, and he delighted every one by the finish and refinement of his playing of Vieuxtemps's graceful Rêverie, and the untiring spirit and faultless fluency which he displayed in Paganini's "Moto perpetuo." The novelty, and in some respects the most important work of the evening, was Schumann's First Symphony, in B flat, which, if somewhat less characteristic of the composer's usually stern and sombre genius than its successors, is not less original or pleasing. The band entered fully into the spirit of this truly vernal work. Weber's joyous Overture to "Euryanthe" exhibited the orchestra at its best; and the playing of a selection from Sir Arthur Sullivan's "Tempest" music, including the prelude to the third act, the overture to the fourth act, and the charming dance of nymphs and reapers, left little to be desired. Miss Anna Williams gave Meyerbeer's Scena, "Robert, toi que j'aime," the quaint and plaintive air "There's a bower of roses," with harp accompaniment, from Mr. Villiers Stanford's "Veiled Prophet," and Cowen's "Who knows?" Mr. Franklin Clive displayed a pleasing baritone voice in Gounod's air "She alone" (from "La Reine de Saba") and in Pinsuti's quasi-Spanish song "The Night Watch."

The performance of Gounod's "Redemption," on the 14th, by the members of the Festival Choral Society, derived its chief interest from the sweeping change in the artistic personnel, as compared with previous occasions on which the same work has been presented here by the same body, the parts heretofore assigned to Messrs. Lloyd, Foli, and Santley devolving this time upon Messrs. Maas, Ludwig, and King. Miss Mary Davies and Madame Patey, as principal soprano and contralto respectively, completed the list of principals, whilst the band and chorus, under Mr. Stockley's direction, numbered over 400 performers. As practice proverbially makes perfect, it is scarcely necessary to remark that the rendering of the choral and orchestral portions by so competent and well-trained a body left very few loopholes for criticism, whilst furnishing much matter for applause. In the two orchestral interludes, "The March to Calvary" and "The Apostles in Prayer," the band won golden opinions; whilst the choral numbers the only one with which the slightest fault could be found was the final one, the Allegretto of which, "They are blessed, the poor in spirit," was taken at somewhat too slow a speed for its due effect. Mr. Maas, who was in excellent voice, gave a very impressive and, to some extent, original reading of the principal tenor part. Mr. Ludwig fully satisfied the dramatic requirements of his very onerous music in the Crucifixion scene, and Mr. King's rendering of the part hitherto associated with Mr. Santley was marked by judgment and artistic feeling. Miss Davies sang her two arias in excellent style, and Madame Patey was, as usual, admirable alike in voice and sentiment. The hall was crowded in every part with a highly appreciative audience.

At Mr. Stratton's Chamber Concert, on the 19th, the leading novelty was Mr. Mackenzie's Quartet in E flat, for pianoforte and strings, which excited much interest, owing to the striking originality of many of its forms and idioms, the Canzona con variazioni, forming the third movement, being especially admired. A Trio in D minor, for pianoforte and strings, by Mendelssohn's gifted sister, Fanny Hensel, was also much applauded, in virtue of its freshness, tunefulness, and symmetry. Miss Agnes Miller acquitted herself very creditably in Clementi's Pianoforte Sonata in B minor, and contributed materially to the effect of the other two works mentioned.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

CHAMBER music continues to be cultivated in Leeds with much favour, and has recently formed part of more than one Concert where it is not usually looked for. In this connection may be mentioned the annual Concert of the Leeds Mechanics' Institute and Literary Society. Mr. J. P. Bowling (pianist), Mr. Carrodus, and M. van Biene appeared as the instrumentalists. The programme included, among other items, Mendelssohn's delightful example, the Trio in D minor, the beauties of which were brought out with great clearness; and Beethoven's attractive C minor Trio, Op. 1. Mr. Carrodus gave fresh proof of his skill, which is so much appreciated in Yorkshire, by the performance of a "Romance and Tarantella" by Tours, to which he added, in response to an encore, a selection from De Beriot. The solo of M. van Biene was an Andante and Rondo Militaire by Servais, well adapted for effective 'cello playing, but of small artistic value. The vocalists were Miss Annie Woods and Mr. H. Sugden.

The companion work to that mentioned in the preceding paragraph, Mendelssohn's Trio in C minor, Op. 66, was given at the second of the Leeds Chamber Concerts of the present season, which took place on the 12th ult. The same Concert included Beethoven's Trio in E flat, Op. 70. The artists on this occasion were Miss Marie Krebs, Herr Peiniger, and Mr. Charles Ould. Miss Krebs selected for her solos Beethoven's Sonata "L'Adieu, l'Absence, et le Retour"; a Gavotte by Bach, the Impromptu in E flat by Schubert, and one of Chopin's Ballades. Herr Peiniger gave as a violin solo the Recitative and Andante from Spohr's Sixth Concerto in G minor, and in response to an encore a Toccata by Bach. Mr. Charles Ould's selection was the Largo and Allegro from the first Sonata of Marcello. Miss Ambler, who has but just completed a course of study at the Royal Academy, won favourable opinions as a vocalist, more especially by her admirable rendering of Beethoven's song "Penitence." The extraordinary attendance was not the least remarkable feature of this Concert.

Although not proceeding in strict chronological order, I may at this point allude to the first Concert of the New Leeds Musical Society, which has quite recently sprung into existence in a suburb of the town. The members are amateurs possessed of considerable esprit as well as musical culture, and in Mr. Longley they have had a Conductor of first-rate ability and experience. The Society found suitable material for its first essay in public in "Miriam's Song," which they rendered most agreeably, in Mr. Macfarren's delicious part-song "You stole my love," to which ample justice was done, and other works.

On January 29, and on the 14th and 19th ult., Recitals were given on the Leeds Parish Church organ by Mr. Best, Dr. Naylor, and Mr. Walter Parratt respectively. It may be of interest to state that a few months ago this organ was entirely rebuilt and enlarged by Mr. Abbott, of Leeds, and it is now one of the largest and most complete of its kind in the kingdom. Quite a history attaches to the organ. The original builder was Snetzler, who also erected an organ at Halifax, that upon which Dr. R. Wainwright and Sir F. W. Herschel played. The Leeds organ was No. 31 of the thirty-five constructed by Snetzler, and since it left his hands it has engaged the attention of many builders, among whom was the late Mr. E. Schultze. The designs of Schultze have been closely followed by Mr. Abbott, the work having been supervised by Mr. Walker Joy, an enthusiastic and capable amateur, whose long acquaintance with the eminent organ builder enabled him the better to carry out points which were contemplated in Schultze's scheme of improvement. The alterations and improvements have been effected at a cost of £1,600, towards which Mr. Joy has contributed £600, the churchwardens having made a grant of the remainder. The instrument is now rich in stops, and its grand diapason quality is such as is rarely surpassed, even in Cathedrals.

The mention of Dr. Naylor's name recalls a movement of which he is the object. Most readers will be aware that he succeeded Dr. Monk as organist and choirmaster at York Minster. His old friends at Scarborough, duly appreciating their loss, initiated a scheme for the presentation of a handsome testimonial, and, in order that it may be as widely supported as possible, those who, as visitors to Scarborough and the church at which he was organist, may have been inspired with his worth are invited to subscribe towards the object in view.

The fifth Bradford Subscription Concert of the season, which took place on the 8th ult., was chiefly devoted to Chamber music. Its most absorbing feature was the first appearance in Yorkshire of M. de Pachmann, whose characteristic playing was received with much favour. His thorough intellectuality, and remarkable delicacy of execution and individuality of style, will certainly earn for him much popularity in Bradford. His selections were from Chopin, Liszt, and Henselt. M. Hollman also gained much favour by his 'cello solos. Miss Clara Samuël, Miss Damian, Mr. Henry Guy, and Signor Foli were the vocalists, and Signor Bisaccia the accompanist.

The week beginning with the 11th ult. was musically interesting in Bradford by reason of the visit of Carl Rosa's Opera Company. The list of operas included Mr. Mackenzie's latest and most famous work, "Colomba," and Bizet's "Carmen," with the representation of which latter is so happily associated the name of Madame Marie Roze. Regarding the first of these productions, its reception here, as well as at Leeds, where it was presented a few months ago under similar auspices, was of the most favourable kind, and much regret was felt that a second night could not be devoted to it.

On the 19th ult. the Manningham Vocal Union gave Hofmann's interesting Cantata "Fair Melusina," under the direction of Mr. J. H. Rooks. On the same evening the College Chapel Musical Society (Bradford) performed Gaul's Cantata "The Holy City."

On the 20th ult. the Second Concert of the Leeds Philharmonic Society took place in the Victoria Hall, and was attended by a very large audience. The Conductor on this occasion was Mr. Alfred Broughton, whose brother, Mr. James Broughton, is now, in obedience to medical advice, making a voyage to the Cape for the benefit of his health. Schumann's Cantata "Paradise and the Peri," which was one of the Festival works ten years ago, was given for the second time in Leeds. The most ardent admirer of Schumann could have found no fault with the performance. The solo parts were in the hands of Miss Anna Williams, Miss Annie Woods (second treble), Madame Fasset, Mr. Piercy, and Mr. D. Billington, all of whom did justice to the work allotted to the leading voices. The chorus was decidedly at its best in the delicate music of the second part. Sterndale Bennett's poetic composition, the Fantasia-Overture "Paradise and the Peri," was given by way of introduction to the work of Schumann.

An account of the receipts and payments in connection with the Leeds Musical Festival of October last has just been issued. Under the heading of receipts are given the various sums received for admissions to each concert. Of serial tickets there were sold 1,098, which, at five guineas each, makes up an item of £5,764 10s. The miscellaneous receipts make up the sum total realised from admissions to the performances of £9,666 os. 7d. To this is added, for music books and programmes, £581 19s. 10d., and £59 15s. 3d. for donations and banker's interest, making altogether £10,307 15s. 8d. On the expenditure side are the following items: conductor, principal singers, and organists, £1,628 17s. 3d.; band, librarian, railway fares, and rehearsal room, £2,052 18s. 3d.; chorus-master, accompanist, chorus railway fares, librarian, and rehearsal room, £1,497 17s. 9d.; new works, £146 12s. 6d.; Town Hall, gas, and cleaning, £15 7s. 1d.; furnishing, awning, alteration of orchestra, attendants' refreshments, &c., £606 os. 6d.; advertising, £508 17s. 11d.; general printing, postages, and stationery, £335 2s. 11d.; music for sale, word books, carriage, commission, &c., £444 14s.; clerks, &c., £134 14s. 10d.; rent of office, rates, furniture, &c., £86 19s. 2d.; sundry expenses, extra fees, bankers' commission, &c., £121 5s. 11d.; making a total of £7,629 8s. 1d. Out of the balance thus left in hand the committee have presented £1,050 to the Leeds General Infirmary, £525 to the Leeds Public Dispensary, and £375 to the Hospital for Women and Children. This leaves a sum of £728 7s. 7d. to be added to the fund of £344 8s. 1d. reserved from the previous festival. The Leeds Festival is thus represented at the bank by a sum of £1,072 15s. 8d.

MUSIC IN THE WEST.

THERE has been more than even the usual rush of concerts before Lent this year, but, owing to this crowding together of musical events, some of the attendances have been rather thin.

Mr. Herbert Thorndike's Concert, on January 26, which I could not particularly notice in my last letter, was in every way a success. The smaller of the Victoria Rooms was filled in every part with an enthusiastic audience, which thoroughly appreciated the splendid singing of Mr. Thorndike and Miss Damian. Miss Thorndike was the soprano, and acquitted herself creditably in the music which fell to her share. Mr. Bernard Lane (tenor) and Signor Rossi (pianist) were both absent through illness, and their places were ably filled by Mr. Frank Boyle and Mr. Bampfyld, the artistic playing of the latter being especially noticeable. Mr. Lloyd-Harries, a distinguished amateur violinist, contributed two solos, and Mr. Harvey rendered valuable service in several accompaniments.

On January 29 a grand Concert was given in Colston Hall, in aid of the funds of the Royal Infirmary and Hospital, in the presence of H.R.H. the Prince of Wales. The performers were Miss Mary Davies, Madame Patey, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Lawford Huxtable, and Mr. Montague Worlock, vocalists, a selected choir of 200 voices, under the direction of Mr. D. W. Rootham; violin, Mr. Lloyd-Harries; violoncello, Mr. A. Waite, and piano-forte, Mr. Frederic Huxtable.

Mrs. Viner Pomeroy's Third Concert was given on January 30, the performers being as before: Mr. H. Holmes, Mr. J. Pardew, Mr. W. H. Hill, Mr. J. Pomeroy, and Mrs. Pomeroy. The first item was Mozart's Quartet for strings in D minor, played with skill and taste. Then followed Mendelssohn's "Variations Concertante," in D major, for piano and cello, in which Mr. Pomeroy's artistic playing appeared to great advantage, and elicited hearty applause. But it was reserved for Mr. Holmes's violin solo (Adagio and Allegro Fuga, Tartini) to move the somewhat cold, as well as scanty, audience to demand an encore. Last, but by no means least, came Schumann's beautiful Quintet in E flat, for strings and piano, splendidly played throughout.

The fourth and last of these Concerts was given on the 20th ult., at Victoria Rooms, the executants being Mr. H. Holmes, Mr. Rice, Mr. Hill, and Mr. Pomeroy, with Mrs. Pomeroy at the piano as usual. The first item was Spohr's Quartet in C major, for strings, played in a way which left little to be desired. Then came Brahms's Duet in G, for piano and violin, rendered by Mr. Holmes and Mrs. Pomeroy. A piano solo, "Faschingsch wank aus Wien" (Schumann), was the next piece, and in this Mrs. Pomeroy showed her executive powers to be far above the average. One of Haydn's String Quartets brought the Concert to a close, and we sincerely hope these delightful evenings may be resumed next season, and that the citizens of Bristol will not allow the only Concerts of this high-class kind to decay and fall through for want of due support.

On the 4th ult. the first of the Monday Popular Concerts, under the new management, was given in Colston Hall, and the crowded audience seemed to promise well for the future success of these evenings. The band is mainly the same as before, with a few valuable additions, such as Mr. Ellis (trumpet), whose fine playing was very noticeable. After the National Anthem, the Overture to "Ruy Blas" was very effectively given, and next came the pièce de résistance, in the shape of Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony. This had evidently been well studied, and was given with great intelligence and point. The last movements were most satisfactory, the time being perfectly kept. The first part of the programme closed with the Overture to "Tannhäuser." Part II. opened with the Overture to "William Tell," which was the least well performed of all the pieces in the Concert. Being so well known a work, it was perhaps thought that much practice was unnecessary, but the result was not satisfactory. The other instrumental pieces were Ponchielli's "Dance of the Hours," from "Gioconda," a selection from "Faust" (Gounod), and Waldeufel's "Venetienne" Valse. The vocalist was Miss Ambler, who sang three songs in a very pleasing manner, and was well received. Mr. Riseley, who received a most enthusiastic welcome, conducted with his usual ability.

The fourth annual Concert of Mr. John Barrett's choir took place on the 7th ult., in the Lesser Colston Hall, the principal items being Gade's Cantata "The Erl-King's Daughter," admirably sung by the choir, and Van Bree's Cantata "St. Cecilia's Day," which has never before been given in Bristol, but which will doubtless become popular. The second part of the programme was miscellaneous.

On the 9th ult. the Saturday Musical Association gave a Concert at Colston Hall, when the principal work performed was the Cantata "Hamilton Tighe," and on the 11th ult. Mr. Augustus Simmons's annual Ballad Concert was given at the same place. The vocalists were Miss Shackell (soprano), in place of Miss Royd; Miss Winifred O'Donnellan (contralto), Mr. Hayden (tenor), and Mr. Montague Worlock (bass); the instrumentalists, Mrs. Pomeroy (piano) and Mr. Pomeroy (violoncello). The programme was miscellaneous and well selected, and the Concert generally was a great success.

The annual "Ladies' Night" of the Orpheus Glee Society was given on the 24th ult., when an immense audience assembled in Colston Hall. The programme was a very interesting one, and the several items were almost faultlessly rendered, the observance of light and shade and the clear enunciation of the words being especially remarkable. Mr. Riseley conducted, as usual, and is certainly to be congratulated upon the results of his careful training. Mr. Merrick, a bass of our Cathedral, won hearty applause for his solo in "Love and Wine," as did also Mr. Morgan in the "Image of the Rose." Mr. Thomas was also very successful in the solo in "Tears of anguish," both the last-mentioned gentlemen being in the Cathedral choir.

The Plymouth Vocal Association gave its second subscription Concert at the Guildhall, on the 20th ult., when the programme consisted of Rossini's "Stabat Mater," Felicien David's "Desert" (first time in Plymouth), and a miscellaneous selection. The performers were Miss Thudichum, Miss Eleanor Rees, Mr. Maas, Mr. Joseph Barker; Mr. Pardeu, Leader; Mr. Faull, Organist; Mr. W. H. K. Wright, Reader: Band and Chorus, 250 performers, Mr. F. Löhr, Conductor. The whole Concert was very satisfactory, and it is gratifying to note the steady advance of the Choir under Mr. Löhr's admirable training. The band, too, though not perfect, supported the singers admirably, and the solos, as a whole, were most artistically rendered.

Mr. Augustus Aylward gave his second Popular Orchestral Concert at the Assembly Rooms, Salisbury, on January 31. The band, as usual, consisted of all the principal professionals and amateurs of the neighbourhood, including several ladies. The vocalists were Miss Rosetta Stewart and Miss Lily Mullings, and the programme included Meyerbeer's "Coronation March," Balfé's Overture to "Le Puits d'Amour," Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, Watson's "Cynthia," Sivrai's "Handelian Danse," &c., &c. Mr. Augustus Aylward conducted.

On the 6th ult. a competition took place at the Royal Public Rooms, Exeter, between orchestras in connection with the Western Counties Musical Association, Herr J. A. Kappey, Bandmaster of the Royal Marines (Chatham Division) acting as umpire. Each band was required to play the overture to "Der Freischütz," and a piece of its own selection. The performances were on the whole fairly good, and were listened to with much interest by a large audience. The first prize (£10) was awarded to Torquay, and the second (£5) to Tiverton. Great praise is due to the Committee of the Western Counties Musical Association for instituting these competitions, and especially to Colonel Troyte (himself an enthusiastic amateur orchestral player), at whose instance they were undertaken, and who liberally contributed £50 towards the expenses of this and of the one held last year.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

SIR HERBERT OAKELEY has this year again continued his custom of giving two Concerts in addition to the original Concert for which provision is made in the will of the founder, General Reid. The first of these three Concerts took place on Saturday, 9th ult., the second on Tuesday, 12th, and the third, the commemoration Concert, on Wednesday, 13th, the anniversary of General Reid's birth, the year of which, towards the middle of last century, seems to be unknown. Since 1869 the services of Mr. Charles Hallé and his Manchester orchestra, in conjunction with Madame Norman Néruda, have been constantly retained for these Concerts. The vocalists this year were Miss Anna Williams (soprano) and Mr. Frederic King (baritone). At the first Concert Spohr's Symphony "The Consecration of Sound" was the pièce de résistance, played in commemoration of the composer's centenary. Mr. Hallé, having hardly recovered from his late illness, brought with him Mdlle. Krebs, in case he should not be able to play his pianoforte solos, and that lady took Mr. Hallé's place as solo pianist at this Concert with marked acceptance. Miss Anna Williams sang with her accustomed vigour "O qual furor," from Beethoven's Fidelio, and also Fatima's Song "There is a bower of roses," from Villiers Stanford's "Veiled Prophet." Mr. F. King was less successful in "Rage, thou angry storm" (Benedict), than in Gounod's "Maid of Athens," in which his excellent method and fine quality of voice were shown to advantage.

At the second Concert Mr. Hallé was "himself again," and both conducted and played with energy. There were two "novelties" on this occasion, namely, Berlioz's "Waverley" Overture and Max Bruch's "Scotch" Violin Concerto, both interesting works. Schumann's Symphony in B flat was also performed. Miss Williams, who seems to have a penchant for dramatic music, gave an effective interpretation of the grand scena from "Oberon," "Ocean, thou mighty monster." Mr. King sang with great taste two new songs by Sir Herbert Oakeley, "Il Ritorno del Montanar," "characteristic" music, and "A Farewell," quite a gem in its simple beauty.

The Reid Concert proper, however, was perhaps after all, as it ought to have been, indeed, the best of the three. It commenced, according to time-honoured custom, and agreeably to the will of General Reid, with a Minuet and March of his own composition, the latter of which is yet chorally popular to the patriotic lines "The Garb of Old Gaul." Weber's "Der Freischütz" Overture followed and was splendidly played. Next came Spohr's Violin Concerto, in A minor, in which Madame Néruda distinguished herself. Then followed Beethoven's Symphony, Op. 36, and part of his Concerto, Op. 73. Saint-Saëns's "Poème-Symphonique" and Wagner's "Kaiser Marsch" completed the orchestral numbers. Madame Néruda created quite a furor at this Concert with Viëuxtemps's "Air Varié," Op. 2. Sir Herbert Oakeley's Romance "La fiancée du Marin," with a charmingly instrumented accompaniment, was sung by Miss Williams, and enthusiastically encored. This Concert was the forty-fourth since the institution of the Chair, and the nineteenth since Professor Oakeley succeeded to it. The whole of Sir Herbert's University Musical Society, numbering some 200 members, received tickets for the "extra" or first two Concerts. To the "Reid" Concert, the professors, the fourth year students, the University Court, and local musicians were, as usual, admitted free.

Perhaps I may be allowed the opportunity of saying that one at least of these annual Concerts should be chiefly choral, the members of Professor Oakeley's classes taking part. This would probably be as much in the spirit of the will of the benevolent founder of the chair, the only one in Scotland as yet, as are the orchestral Concerts.

I have taken up so much space in writing about the Reid Musical Festival that I must be brief in regard to other musical events of the month. The ninth and last of the present series of Choral Union Concerts took place on the 4th ult. These Concerts have been extremely successful financially, and, if not perfectly satisfactory as regards the chorus, have been all that could be wished for in respect of the orchestra. The sixth and last of Mr. Waddell's Chamber Concerts was held on Saturday, 2nd ult. The series has been so successful that a larger and more public room will probably be taken for next season, and the prices reduced, which is gratifying as showing an advancing, if not a reviving, taste for this delightful form of musical entertainment. M. Vladimir de Pachmann's Piano Recital, on Saturday afternoon, the 16th ult., attracted an audience so large as to fill the Music Hall to overflowing, and the enthusiasm was something extraordinary.

The Parish Church Musical Association of Portobello, a town on the coast, some two miles from Edinburgh, gave a Recital of sacred music in the church, on the 8th ult. Hiller's Cantata "The Song of Victory" formed the first part of the programme. The choir was small, but well balanced, and the singing was very good. Mr. W. S. Brown conducted.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE great event of the Glasgow musical season, the Choral and Orchestral Series of Concerts, has come to an end for the present. The series just concluded has been without doubt the most successful, in every sense, since the institution of the Concerts on their present basis—ten years ago. Attempts had been previously made to establish orchestral concerts in Glasgow, but with comparatively small success. They are now, as we have before mentioned, on a secure and permanent footing, being managed by the Choral Union.

On January 22 the ninth Concert was given, with Schumann's No. 2 Symphony in C as the leading item in the programme. The other orchestral selections were of no great moment, excepting the Chopin Concerto, No. 2, in B minor, the solo pianoforte part in which was deliciously played by M. Vladimir de Pachmann, it being his first appearance here. Miss Grace Damian was the vocalist.

The so-called "popular" Concert which followed, on January 26, consisted chiefly of the overture to the "Merry Wives of Windsor" (Nicolai), the No. 3 Leonore Overture of Beethoven, and the No. 1 Hungarian Rhapsody of Liszt. There was also heard, for the first time, a short "Characteristic" piece, "Undine," by Mr. W. T. Hoeck, a young local musician of promise. A Concertante for piano, violin, and violoncello, with orchestra (Op. 56), by Beethoven, was somewhat of a failure as to execution, being, too, by no means a good example of the master. Miss Thudichum sang "Una voce" and two songs by Smart and Sullivan. At the next Subscription Concert, tenth of that set, the Symphony played was the "Jupiter" of Mozart. It was magnificently performed, but the leading feature of the evening was undoubtedly the violin playing of Herr Hugo Heerman, who created a most legitimate impression, his rendering of the solo part in the Beethoven Concerto for violin and orchestra being marked by dignity of style and Joachim-like breadth of tone. Then, on the 31st, took place the distinguishing Concert of the season, the "Messe des Morts" of Berlioz being performed for the first time in Glasgow and the third time in Great Britain. As this reproduction of the great Frenchman's very remarkable composition will be referred to elsewhere in the present month's MUSICAL TIMES, I do not here further speak of it except to say, in a word, that the performance, under Mr. Mann's direction, was quite a success, and that I understand a repetition next season is contemplated. On the 2nd ult. the last but one of the Saturday Concerts took place, Felicien David's Symphonic Ode "The Desert" being given again, and with a still better rendering than on the previous occasion of its performance. The last Concert of the Subscription Set occurred on the 5th ult. The Tragic Overture of Brahms and the Pastoral Symphony of Beethoven were the leading numbers in the programme, and in the Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra of Beethoven, No. 4, in G major, Mdme. Janotha took the solo, it being her first appearance at these Concerts.

When Dr. von Bülow was Conductor of these Orchestral Concerts, some five years ago, he introduced a Plebiscite programme, "Suffrage Universel," as he called it, and the idea has taken quite a hold of the public. Unfortunately, the privilege thus afforded of voting the music to be performed at the last concert has never on the whole been very judiciously exercised, and this bright idea of the erratic doctor but very partially reflects the best taste of the public. The overture to "Tannhäuser," and that to "William Tell," among the overtures have stood highest, or nearly so, in every plebiscite since, and they were duly voted for on the present occasion and performed. In addition, in due response to the will of the people, Berlioz's "Symphonie Fantastique" was all gone through! Per contra, however, the Ballet Airs from Mackenzie's "Colomba" received the greatest number of votes in this class of music, and formed a delightful relief in the somewhat sensational programme of this, the last, Concert of the series.

Chamber Concerts are not in much favour in Glasgow, probably from imperfect acquaintance with their peculiar charm. A Concert was given by four of the members of the orchestra of the Choral Union Concerts—Messrs. V. Buziau, Bourdarot, H. Buziau, and J. Lasserre, with Mr. J. A. Robertson at the pianoforte—in the suburb of Hillhead, on the 12th ult. It was but moderately successful, both as respects performance and support. To secure their establishment here, Chamber Concerts would require to be given at more frequent intervals, and with a party accustomed—as most of the parties we have had are not—to play together.

The Glasgow Sunday Society has established a series of Sunday Concerts, and the two already given (December 30, 1883, and the 18th ult.) have been attended by crowded audiences. The programmes have comprised sacred and classical music, and, notwithstanding the protests raised in certain quarters against the innovation, it is hoped that next session the Concerts may be resumed with renewed vigour. Madame Elly Warnots has been the vocalist, and Herr Franz Groenings the Conductor. The band has numbered between forty and fifty performers.

In Rutherglen, east from Glasgow, on the 6th ult., a very fair performance was given of Handel's Dettingen Te Deum by the Rutherglen Choral Society.

Connected with one of the numerous local volunteer regiments—the 1st Lanarkshire Rifles—is an excellent

Musical Society. It was originally a male-voice choir, but ladies and cadets have been added, and performances have been given of late years of Cantatas and similar music. On the 6th ult. Gade's "Erl-King's Daughter" was excellently performed, in St. Andrew's Hall, by the Association, with full orchestral accompaniment (by a contingent from the Choral Union Orchestra), under the direction of Captain H. McNabb.

M. Vladimir de Pachmann gave a Pianoforte Recital, on the 18th ult., in the Queen's Rooms. The attendance was considerable, but not nearly as large as might have been expected from the distinguished ability of the concert-giver.

MUSIC IN BRUSSELS.

Brussels, February 22, 1884.

M. BENJAMIN GODARD, one of the wandering tribe of French composers asking abroad the hospitality for their works that is so obstinately denied in their native country, had his new opera "Pedro de Zalamea" performed, for the first time, at Antwerp, on January 31. Even admitting the claims of M. Godard to be considered the leading maestro of the rising French school, we do not think that the musicians on whom devolve the management of the Antwerp theatre are to be congratulated upon their choice. There exists between Brussels and Antwerp a kind of rivalry, the ostentatiously Flemish-speaking town endeavouring not to be left behind by the French-speaking capital. The fact of Brussels opening the doors of La Monnaie to "Sigurd," having attracted the attention of musical Paris, will go far to explain why Antwerp gladly admitted to its theatre "Pedro de Zalamea." The plot, taken from a drama by Calderon, is as absurd and wanting in interest as the worst and most old-fashioned Italian librettos were. It is not worth while even to attempt to give an idea of the story, and we cannot but regret that a young artist should have wasted so much intelligence and musical inspiration over a poem that is quite unworthy of serious criticism. The performance, under the direction of the composer himself, failed to arouse any enthusiasm either in the Flemish or foreign portion of the audience, and "Pedro de Zalamea" will soon be forgotten and its name registered in a catalogue of French operas, there to remain.

Madame Albani, who is engaged to sing for a few nights at La Monnaie, achieved an immense success both as an actress and as a singer in "Mefistofele," "Traviata," "Rigoletto," and "Faust." It is to be regretted that the gifted prima-donna chose to sing her parts in Italian, the contrast between the peculiar cadences of the French and Italian language falling rather harshly on the ears of the audience.

At the second Concert Populaire of Classical Music, under the management and conductorship of M. Dupont, the great attraction was the appearance of the English pianist, Mr. D'Albert, who played Rubinstein's Concerto in D minor, a Valse and Nocturne by Chopin, and Liszt's Nocturne and Second Rhapsodie Hongroise. Mr. D'Albert may safely be included amongst the most eminent modern pianists, and though he has not yet perhaps attained to the fulness of his powers, few living artists can match or surpass him. Mr. D'Albert met with an enthusiastic reception.

There have been during the month several Concerts, which, though very good, have no interest for English readers. Therefore, I shall mention only the one given by Wilhelmj, who showed himself, as usual, a striking interpreter of modern violin music, and left his audience to desire a more classical programme. It is a pity that such an artist does not more often give selections of serious music, and especially of Bach's works, in which he doubtless excels.

MUSIC IN AMERICA.

New York, February 8.

DURING the supplemental seasons of both operas nothing has been presented worthy of report, save, perhaps, the production, at the Academy of Music, of the "Huguenots," with Mesdames Patti and Gerster. Madame Patti, with her liking for dramatic parts, chose Valentine, being heard therein to less advantage than if she had chosen Marguerite. The house was enormous, though the Metropolitan Opera House was filled on the same evening to hear "Gioconda." Mr. Mapleson performed the opera with the same cast on the occasion of his benefit, which yielded him a large sum.

At the third Concert of the New York Philharmonic series, on Saturday, January 19, the programme was as follows:—

I. Serenade in G (manuscript).....	C. Villiers Stanford
II. Overture, Leonore, No. 2.....	Beethoven
III. Concerto in G, string orchestra.....	Bach
IV. Symphony, No. 4, dramatic, Op. 95.....	Rubinstein

Of Mr. Stanford's "Serenade" one critic says: "There are few traces of the untried writer. The themes are broadly laid down and treated with deliberation and elegant elaboration. There is a noticeable absence of an overcrowded, incoherent score—where musical impulses choke and perplex the writer. A spirit of confidence and mastery penetrates the work through all its successive movements. There is no repetition, no disappointment. The Scherzo is full of rustling, airy, spiritual beauty, quite unconventional, and plainly neither ghost nor echo of any other. The Nocturne is quickened throughout with a deep, plaintive, wealth of finely conceived melodic figures, and, until its close, the interest grows to a full climacteric. The work may be characterised as exceptionally graceful, restful, poetic. It may possibly be classed some day with the Midsummer Night's Dream music, and its writer recognised as a disciple, but not an imitator, of Mendelssohn and Schumann. Rarely has a new score developed such promise and hopefulness in a new composer."

The enterprise of Mr. Thomas with Madame Materna and Herren Winkelmann and Scaria is taking definite shape. The first performances will be at the Metropolitan Opera House, on April 22, 24, and 26. Mr. Thomas's orchestra will number 150 players.

"The Redemption" (which was given "by general request") was very adequately performed at the rehearsal and Concert of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, on February 1 and 2. On February 6 the third Orchestral Matinée of the same Society was given, with an excellent programme. Perhaps I have not already written that these (four) "Orchestral Matinéas" are a sort of over-measure dealt out by the spirited Brooklyn directors to their subscribers—a kind of premium, or bonus, permitted by their overflowing treasury, for I believe the subscription remains as formerly.

The third of the Concerts for Young People, organised by some ladies and conducted by Mr. Thomas, was given in Steinway Hall, on February 2, with the undermentioned programme:—

Overture—"Jubilee".....	Weber
Andante—"Surprise Symphony".....	Haydn
Aria—"Batti, batti" (Don Giovanni).....	Mozart
Miss Emma Juch.
Symphonic Poem—"Rouet d'Omphale".....	Saint-Saëns
α. Humoreske.....	Edward Grieg
δ. Menuet.....	Moritz Moszkowsky
Miss Mary Garlich.
Cavatina—"Bel raggio" (Semiramide).....	Rossini
Miss Emma Juch.
Menuet.....	Boccherini
String Orchestra.
Overture—"Merry Wives of Windsor".....	Nicolai

This is the last of these charming and useful Concerts, which have been so successful that a series of six similar performances is already determined upon for next winter.

While dwelling upon casual courses of Concerts, I am reminded to say that at the Memorial Service for the late Mr. Julius Hallgarten, Professor Adler announced that Mr. Hallgarten had, before his death, provided for four free Concerts for working men, to be given by the Philharmonic Orchestra, under Mr. Thomas, on certain Sunday afternoons, when the best works are to be produced in the best manner. Such a gift, now become a legacy, illustrates the truth of some former remarks which I made to you concerning Mr. Hallgarten as a friend of art, and it is to be hoped may perhaps prove suggestive to other citizens of equal fortune and intelligence.

Mr. Rafael Joseffy, the pianist, who has been seriously disabled by illness, made his appearance in the first (deferred) of his own series of Concerts, in Steinway Hall, on February 5, assisted by Mr. Thomas and his orchestra.

The fourth Concert of the Symphony Society occurs to-morrow evening, with the following programme:—

Overture "Koenig Stephan".....	Beethoven
Andante de Concert for violoncello.....	Molique
Mr. Fritz Giese.
Symphony, "Leonore".....	Raff
Concerto in G minor for pianoforte.....	Mendelssohn
Miss Jessie Pinney.

Selections from "Die Meistersinger"..... Wagner

Miss Jessie Pinney is a young American artist of remarkable promise. A resident of New York (or rather of the suburbs), she returned last year from long and well-directed foreign study, and made a decided hit at her first public performance under Mr. Thomas.

The two opera companies are apparently doing better in the provinces than in town. The interior cities, containing from a quarter to three-quarters of a million of people, feel obliged, from local pride, and in contention with each other, to "sustain" their opera "season," of from two nights to two weeks, and perhaps find the high prices of from five to ten dollars for a place flattering to their taste and means of outlay rather than discouraging. In town we have only comic opera left. The "Beggar Student" has ceased its long run at the Casino, giving place to a revival of "The Merry War," very well cast, and admirably put on the stage. The death of Josephine Gallmeyer has removed from us a pet and great favourite of the town. A memorial meeting in her honour will be held in the Thalia Theatre on Sunday.

"THE REDEMPTION" AT LIVERPOOL.

UNDER the excellent conductorship of Mr. Randegger, a performance of Gounod's sacred masterpiece was given on January 30, by the Liverpool Philharmonic Choral Society, which—especially in the choral portion—appears to have been one of the best heard since the production of the work at Birmingham. A highly appreciative notice from the Liverpool Mercury commences thus:—

"There has during the past two years been remarkable activity in the composition of musical works designed upon the largest scale, but no production of these recent times stands forward more prominently than the noble trilogy which Gounod has given to the world in 'The Redemption.' Never has a fairer offering been laid at the shrine of the Christian religion. The simple words which Gounod inscribed on the title-page of his score, 'Opus vitæ meæ,' are significant of the devotion with which he applied himself to the fulfilment of a duty whose sacredness must have touched him at every step he took in the development of his plan of depicting, by means of the art which he holds in trust, the story of the Passion, Death, Resurrection, and Ascension of the Saviour. Not a note, not a chord, not a phrase exists without immediate relationship to the sequence of the splendid structure of which it is part. Exquisite pathos of melodic vocal diction, varied eloquence of descriptive and reflective orchestration, and constant changes of great masses of harmonic colour, bring us more nearly into the presence of the tremendous tragedy of the Crucifixion, with its preceding and succeeding incidents." And after quoting from a critique in the same paper upon the first performance of "The Redemption" in Liverpool twelve months ago, the writer says:—

"There need be no departure from the acceptance which these two sentences convey, for the fine exposition of 'The Redemption' at St. George's Hall last night, under the auspices of the Philharmonic Choral Society—an organisation which, happily, continues to pursue a vigorous career—clearly demonstrated the searching power of a work in which is crystallised the spirit of Christendom. Every vocal and instrumental resource is employed, but in the combination of these resources Gounod is faithful to the consecrated purpose which he steadily held before himself from the beginning. Symbolically expressive, the trilogy, the crown of a career of purity in music, is strong in its very simplicity. They who listen are filled with reverence and a deeper sense of the subjects of the oratorio, and thus the aim of the master is accomplished."

The following, from the Liverpool Porcupine, is a well-earned tribute to the care and attention bestowed upon the work by Mr. Randegger:—

"The Liverpool Philharmonic Choral Society have worked so hard to attain success that their worst enemies, if they are so unfortunate as to possess any, must confess that the triumph of Wednesday evening last was well earned. When Gounod's 'Redemption' was produced here last season under Max Bruch's direction its reception was by no means an enthusiastic one, a result which was not to be wondered at under the circumstances. With an enthusiastic believer in Gounod's genius such as Mr. Randegger confesses himself to be, however, a new light has been thrown upon the work, and strange as its form appears to those accustomed to the oratorios of Handel and Mendelssohn, it produced at times an overpowering effect."

The Liverpool Courier, referring to its former notice of the work, says:—

"The Philharmonic Choral Society have earned the thanks of the musical public of this district for the opportunity afforded them last night in St. George's Hall of renewing their acquaintance with Gounod's 'Redemption.' A further hearing of the trilogy brings to light several new features of beauty in construction and detail, besides many episodes which it was almost impossible to grasp on a first performance." And, in speaking of the new American tenor, we have the following remarks:—

"Mr. Winch, to whom the bulk of the solo work was allotted, acquitted himself with a general excellence and a minute attention to detail which at once stamps him as an earnest musician. He made a judicious use of the mezzo voice which was admirably suited to the music."

The other vocalists—Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Damian, and Mr. Herbert E. Thorndike—are also much praised; and it is said that "so far as the band was concerned, it was without doubt the finest display of orchestral skill we ever remember hearing in St. George's Hall." There was an overflowing audience, and the reception of the work was most enthusiastic, Mr. Randegger being called for and warmly greeted at the conclusion of each part.

OBITUARY.

JOHN PYKE HULLAH.—This well-known musician passed away from the scene of his varied and useful labours on Thursday, the 21st ult., to the regret of all who knew him. Mr. Hullah's death surprised nobody acquainted with the state of his health for a considerable time previous. It was looked for as likely to happen sooner rather than later, but, as always in the case of men who have filled prominent positions, the event came with a certain shock. We miss, from the stage whereon musicians play their part, a conspicuous and familiar figure.

Mr. Hullah had passed the "three score years and ten" of the Psalmist, having been born, at Worcester, in June, 1812, or, according to some authorities, 1813. He was brought to London while still an infant, and, in due course, sent to a school at Highgate. Of these early years very little seems to be known, perhaps because there is very little to tell. Young Hullah was an average specimen of the English schoolboy. We do not hear that he showed precocity of any kind; rather are we told that he took seriously to the study of music only after his voice broke. This was certainly late enough to rescue him from the doubtful honour attaching to wonder-children. As a young man, Hullah worked well. In his teens he became a pupil of William Horsley, and, in 1832, placed his name on the books of the Royal Academy of Music, where Crivelli gave him lessons in singing. The youth's first ambition was to figure as a composer of English opera. To this end he associated himself with another aspirant for fame—a young fellow known to very few at that time but afterwards world-famous as the author of "Pickwick." Dickens and Hullah between them created an Operetta called "The Village Coquettes," which was produced by Braham, at St. James's Theatre, in December, 1836. This was followed by two other works of the same class, in which, however, Charles Dickens had no part. They were "The Barber of Bassora" (1837) and "The Outpost" (1838). It is scarcely necessary to state that, while these pieces were successful in some degree, they speedily joined the majority of their kind in the limbo allotted to operatic failures. Hullah was clear-sighted enough to make out the fact that he could not depend upon composition for a living, and, by a happy instinct, he turned his attention to popular musical education—not the routine of professional lesson-giving to individuals, but the proclamation of a gospel of music to the million. In 1840 the times were ripe for such an enterprise, the popular mind was waking up under the stimulus of widening education and comparatively cheap literature. A stirring in the valley of dry bones showed that new life had entered into the people, and fortunate were they who, discerning the signs, set themselves to meet the wants that declared themselves. Hullah unquestionably saw his opportunity—the more clearly because, among our nearest Continental neighbours, a remarkable advance in musical culture had already begun. Hullah went to France, studied the methods adopted in that country—the method of Wilhem principally—and returned to England quite prepared to carry on a similar work in his own land. His first lesson was given to a class formed from the students of the Battersea Training College, in February, 1840, and thus began a movement that swept over the entire country, taking rank among the phenomena of the day. Hullah's system was by no means an easy one. Its plan of sol-fa-ing, by giving every line and space a fixed name, deprived the student of that association of names and key-relationship which enables tonic sol-faists to do without ordinary symbols altogether. Nevertheless, the public was fascinated by the idea of simultaneous instruction, and by the effect which a mass of voices can produce even in elementary exercises. Hence the Hullah classes, conjointly with those established on the cognate method of Dr. Mainzer, became the rage everywhere. In London the utmost activity was shown. Hullah established large classes in Exeter Hall, gave Concerts, and so enlisted general sympathy that no difficulty was experienced in building St. Martin's Hall as the headquarters of the new artistic crusade. The Hall was occupied by Mr. Hullah till 1860, when fire devoured it, and during those thirteen years he carried on most energetic operations. According to trustworthy authorities, more than 25,000 persons received musical instruction in St. Martin's Hall from Mr. Hullah and his assistants. There also series after series of Concerts were given, at which it was often possible to hear new works and new artists against whom all other doors of utterance were closed. Among the débutants at St. Martin's Hall were Miss Sherrington (Madame Lemmens) and Mr. Santley, and among the composers whose works were first made known to English amateurs in the same place was Charles Gounod. At this time Hullah acted as Professor of Vocal Music at King's College, a post he held for thirty years. He filled a like position in other educational establishments, but his distinctive work as a teacher ended when the disaster to his Hall closed the era of classes and concerts. It is impossible to estimate the value of Hullah's work as a public professor. We only know that it must have been great, for its influence spread over the whole land.

The deceased musician laboured in other ways than those above described. For several years he conducted the concerts of the Royal Academy of Music. He composed numerous songs, &c., some of which—the "Storm" to wit—will long survive him. He compiled a "Psalter," published several educational music books, contributed to the literature of his art a "History of Modern Music" and "The Transitional Period of Musical History"; edited several collections of national and other songs; wrote musical criticisms for the Academy and the Globe; acted as organist of the Charterhouse; delivered lectures at the Royal Institution, and from 1872 till 1882 discharged most important duties as Inspector of Music in Training Colleges under the Committee of Council on Education. Over all this wide field of work Mr. Hullah spread himself, doing most things well, and reaping no mean harvest of private esteem and public honour. English Universities took no notice of him, but that of Edinburgh made him LL.D. in 1876, and a year later the Academy of St. Cecilia, Rome, conferred upon him the distinction of honorary member. Onerous and unceasing labour naturally tried his physical resources severely as years went on, and in 1882 he laid aside altogether the weapons of a successful warfare. Unhappily there was not, for him, a long and restful evening. Stroke after stroke of paralysis hurried on the end, which soon came full in view of those who least desired to see it. Now that the busy life has closed, none will refuse the tribute due to a man who left the world richer than he found it.

The remains of Mr. Hullah were buried at Kensal Green Cemetery, on the 26th ult.

THERE was a very large attendance at the rooms of the Society for the Encouragement of the Fine Arts, in Conduit Street, on Thursday evening, the 14th ult., to hear a lecture by Mr. Lennox Browne, F.R.C.S., a member of the Council, on "Science and Singing," the chair being occupied by Mr. Gilbert, R.A.M., another member of the Council. After a powerful exposition on the advantage of science as a basis of intelligent cultivation of the art of singing, which he contended was as necessary as was grammar to one wishing to learn a language—or perspective to a student of painting, the lecturer proceeded to give some practical examples of his contention. The first related to the question of breathing, and involved not only full expansion of the chest, so as to acquire the largest possible amount of air without effort at each inspiration, but also complete control, so as to economise its exit. This involved consideration of the question of respiration from a mechanical point of view; but it was hardly less important that the air breathed should be pure. To prove this the lecturer gave a short account of the chemical constitution of the atmosphere and the changes it undergoes in respiration, and many illustrations were given of the injury that must accrue to both vocal and general health from voice exercise in impure atmospheres. Singers were particularly cautioned as to the dangers to voice of assisting at "smoking concerts." Recognising this fact of the necessity for pure air, it had recently been proposed that people should breathe an artificial air containing, as was believed by the gentleman suggesting the procedure, the special element that gave, or was believed to give, peculiar excellence of voice to Italian singers—in other words, to supply all persons with artificial Italian air. It was contended, however, there was no warrant for any of the assumptions on which the process was based. So far from Italian voices being in a majority, it was shown that, although there were many naturally gifted singers of Italian birth, and the language was that most favourable for vocal instruction, but a small minority of the singers of the present day in Italian opera were of that nationality. Analysed into its constituent properties, it was shown that hydrogen in a marked degree caused deterioration of voice, while oxygen undiluted must have the effect of unduly exciting the membrane of the air passages. Still further there was nothing to show that this peroxide of hydrogen existed in a greater proportion in the towns and cities in Italy than elsewhere, on the contrary, the air in the majority of Italian towns was most insanitary; in some, notably Naples, the climate was insalubrious in a marked degree. Continuing the analysis of this artificial air, it was shown that, supposing the peroxide to have any beneficial effect, it was combined with two ingredients, ammonia, a most poisonous gas, and peppermint, which must necessarily render the preparation more unstable than it naturally is, and the conclusion was come to from the different points of view of chemistry, physiology, and actual practice, that the scheme was unworthy the slightest consideration of scientific men. Other illustrations of the connection between science and singing were given, more especially in regard to the compass and registers of the voice, and among them the interesting question of the variation between the "upper thick" and "lower thick," which was demonstrated vocally to the audience. A report was made, in further proof of this, of a recent experiment by transmission of intense electric light through the larynx when the vocal chords, examined with the laryngoscope, were seen to be opaque in the "thick" and almost transparent in the "thin" register. A most interesting lecture, interspersed with chemical experiments and vocal illustrations, under the direction of Mr. Emil Behnke, concluded by one or two part-songs, and an eloquent peroration in the words of Herbert Spencer to the effect that "only when Genius is married to Science can the highest results in any art be produced."

THE first performance in London of Dr. F. E. Gladstone's Church Oratorio "Philippi" (originally produced in July last at Newcastle-upon-Tyne) took place at St. Margaret's Church, Westminster, on January 30. The narrative of the "Acts of St. Paul and St. Silas in Macedonia" is concisely put together, with an evident knowledge of the requirements of a musical libretto, by the Rev. J. Powell Metcalfe, and, opening with a brief choral prologue, deals with the call to Macedonia, the conversion of Lydia, the incident of the woman possessed with the spirit of divination, and the imprisonment and delivery of the Apostles. Dr. Gladstone's work may be noticed for the easy and graceful writing of the recitatives, a task by no means simple, and for the evident absence of any theatrical effects, showing that the composer bore in mind that his work was, above all, intended for use in the Church. This was especially noticeable in the choruses "Why do the heathen rage" and "In this was manifested," both of which will be found of value as separate anthems. The Apostolic Benediction, set as a bass solo (the chorus entering piano at the end), and its effective violoncello obbligato accompaniment, also calls for special commendation; and a very quaint effect is created by the utterance of the possessed damsel, which is unaccompanied, and is repeated three times. Dr. Gladstone's knowledge of contrapuntal writing is shown in the concluding fugal chorus. The choir numbered between fifty and sixty vocalists, including the choristers of the adjacent Abbey; the solos were very efficiently sung by Masters Hodsdon and Roper, Mr. Alfred Kenningham, Mr. Thornthwaite, and Mr. R. Hilton (whose delivery of the number referred to above deserves special mention). The accompaniments were played by a small orchestra, Dr. Gladstone being at the organ and Dr. Bridge conducting from the Lectern. At the conclusion of the oratorio, which only occupied one hour in performance, Handel's Fourth Concerto was played with admirable executive skill by Dr. Gladstone, who introduced a cadenza of his own. The concluding voluntary (Smart's Postlude in D) was played by Mr. H. D. Flowers. We understand that a repetition of the work is to be given, by desire of Canon Duckworth, at his church, St. Mark's, Hamilton Terrace, on the 25th inst.

THE fifth annual Dinner of the South London Musical Club was celebrated at the Holborn Restaurant, on Saturday, the 9th ult. Mr. Joseph Barnby occupied the chair, and about 150 members of the Club and their friends were present. In proposing the toast of "The Club," Mr. Barnby said that this was a Society of which he could not speak too highly, especially as it was entirely composed of amateurs. He had been advised at the outset of his career, by a distinguished musician, to have the assistance of professional singers in his chorus. "Depend upon it," he said, "that your amateurs, as soon as they get before an audience, will be tongue-tied." He had found them anything but that, and since then he had done everything with the assistance of amateurs. But this Society was not only a Society of amateurs, but was conducted by an amateur, which was a source of great satisfaction to him. In the reign of Queen Elizabeth, it was only a mark of ordinary breeding among the higher classes to take part in those difficult madrigals which have come down to us; but now, in the reign of Queen Victoria, even among the middle classes, it is considered to be a stigma upon any one who could not take his part manfully in such music. In the time of Queen Elizabeth, English composers stood almost at the head of the composers of Europe. Our great Church writers of that time had produced compositions equal in every respect to those of the finest Italian writers, whilst the madrigal composers—Benet, Wilbye, and others—produced work even finer than the best madrigals of the Italian school. In the present day we find that, whereas we used to be flooded with French, German, and Italian compositions, the Continent is now becoming very familiar with the compositions of Englishmen. This is a movement which ought to be most gratifying to all who were musical in this country. Mr. Barnby went on to say further, that at one time all glees and part-songs were exclusively sung by professional musicians. That was not the case now, and he congratulated those present on the existence of a Society whose object was to cultivate the most beautiful art under heaven. The speech was received with great applause, and, in reply, Mr. J. Brisley, the President, thanked Mr. Barnby for the kind remarks he had made about the Club, and gave some statistics as to its progress. It was founded in January, 1875, at Nunhead, and continued to grow so rapidly that, in October, 1877, they moved to the Angell Town Institution, Brixton, and a year or two afterwards were enabled to take the large hall of that Institution for their weekly practices. Last year, on account of the continued indisposition of the proprietor, several members of the Club joined together, bought the building now known as the Gresham Hall, and formed a limited liability company, most of the members of the Club being shareholders. They had now close upon 200 members, 80 being singing members. They had also a very large library of male-voice music. Three evening concerts, and nine, ten, or eleven smoking concerts were given every year, admittance being by invitation. These performances were all largely attended. Mr. Barnby, in proposing the health of the Musical Director, Mr. C. Stevens, paid a high compliment to his skill as a Conductor; and Mr. Stevens, in responding, said that he was very pleased to hear Mr. Barnby's remarks concerning amateurs. Mr. Stevens then proposed Mr. Barnby's health, and alluded in flattering terms to his great success as a Conductor of part-singing. The next toast was the Honorary Secretary, Mr. E. J. Richardson. Mr. Percy Davis proposed "The Visitors," which was briefly responded to by Dr. Frost and Mr. H. Gadsby. The toasts were interspersed with glees and part-songs, &c., by the members of the Club, including songs by Messrs. Pompe, Cranch, and Ponsford, the latter gaining a well-deserved encore for his charming rendering of Handel's "Where'er you walk" (Serlele.) In connection with the foregoing, it may be mentioned that the Gresham Hall, Brixton, the headquarters of the South London Musical Club, was unfortunately destroyed by fire on Tuesday morning, the 12th ult., as were also the organ and the library of music belonging to the Club, which included some valuable MSS. All other losses are, we believe, fully covered by insurance.

On Monday, the 4th ult., an Evening Concert, under the direction of Mr. A. W. Brookes, was given at St. Luke's Hall, South Hackney, in aid of the funds of the various charities in connection with St. Luke's Church. The programme consisted of an excellent selection of vocal and instrumental music, which was highly appreciated by the large audience assembled. The vocalists were Madame Clara West, Miss West, Miss Ellen Chapman, R.A.M., Miss Abbey, Miss Milner, Mr. C. J. Murton, Mr. Prickett, and Mr. J. D. Simmons. Madame West elicited much applause by her rendering of Braga's Serenata, which she had to repeat, the violoncello accompaniment being played in a masterly manner by Mr. C. H. Allen Gill. Mr. C. J. Murton was heard to advantage in "The Distant Shore" (deservedly encored) and in Pinsuti's "Sleep on, dear love." Special mention should also be made of the singing of Miss Milner and Miss Abbey, the latter of whom gave "The Three Singers," by Tours, with great taste. Of the instrumental portion of the programme, Raff's "Andante and Allegro Scherzoso," for pianoforte, was performed in a refined style by Miss Rosselli, who also took the pianoforte part in Reissiger's Trio in D minor, the violin and violoncello being played by Mr. Rosselli, Jun., and Mr. C. H. A. Gill. Mr. John E. West, F.C.O., and Mr. Brookes acted as accompanists.

An Organ Recital was given by Mr. W. Henry Thomas, on Wednesday evening, the 20th ult., at St. George's Church, Tufnell Park. The organ, formerly electric, has been rebuilt and enlarged by Messrs. Bryceson and converted into a mechanical one, with new blowing apparatus. There are now three manuals, with six stops on the swell, ten on the great, five on the choir, and three on the pedal organ, five couplers and seven combination pedals. Mr. Thomas played with great ability excerpts from Mendelssohn, Morandi, Guilmant, Salome, Feyer, and Smart. The programme also included two anthems, "And the Glory" (Messiah) and "Let thy hand be strengthened" (Coronation Anthem), which were well rendered by the church choir.

THE Lecture on Ancient and Modern Music, delivered by Mr. Brinley Richards at the Society for the Encouragement of the Fine Arts, Conduit Street, Regent Street, on January 31, was something more than an interesting concert, with critical remarks upon the compositions performed. Mr. Richards has ever been foremost in his desire to uphold the claims of true art; and in some respects his Lecture was an experiment, seeing that instead of courting public favour by blandly moving with the times, he took the liberty of boldly criticising much of the pianoforte playing of the day, which he truly termed "aggressive, the object being apparently the production of the greatest amount of sound, or, if you please, noise, the intellectual claims of art not being considered worthy of attention." Commencing his Lecture by remarking that music might be described as of two kinds—one of nationality, the other of art—he alluded to the difficulty of ascertaining the original forms of ancient songs, as they had not been preserved by tradition, and dated the real progress of music from the time when composers began to write their works. In speaking of the exaggerations of Welsh historians with regard to the antiquity of some of the national music, he said: "The late Archdeacon Williams, of Cardiff, in his enthusiasm declared that the Britons long before the establishment of Christianity possessed 'a refined science of music,' but it was difficult to understand how they could have had what was unknown to the world for more than a thousand years. No one who was acquainted with Wales in the present day could doubt for a moment that among the population there was an enthusiastic love for music, and especially for choral-singing; but it would be contrary to all evidence, to assert as some historians had done, that in the eleventh century the Welsh possessed any exceptional advantages in musical progress, and there were strong reasons for believing that the so-called musical manuscripts of that century were, like the bardic alphabet, inventions of a more recent period." The Lecture, which was listened to with deep and intelligent interest, was accompanied and illustrated by Mr. Richards's performance of pianoforte selections, including the works of Bach, Purcell, Scarlatti, Handel, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Chopin, Sir Sterndale Bennett, Raff, Eaton Fanning, Walter Macfarren, and the lecturer himself.

THE third annual Concert of the Choir of St. Augustine's, Highbury New Park, was held on the 21st ult., in the Room adjoining the Church. The programme consisted of Rossini's "Stabat Mater," the solos being taken by Madame Worrell, Miss Lena Law, Mr. Charles Chilley, and Mr. Frank Ward, who met with a very flattering reception. The choruses were rendered in a perfect manner, and reflected the greatest credit on the Conductor, Mr. Charles Strong. The accompaniments were played by Miss Fanny Boxell (pianoforte), and Mr. A. M. Colchester (harmonium). The second part was miscellaneous, including songs by Madame Worrell, Miss Lena Law, Miss Mary Chamberlain, Mr. C. Chilley and Mr. F. Ward, a duet by Mr. Chas. Strong and Mr. F. Ward, an organ solo by Mr. Colchester, and a trio for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, by Miss Fanny Boxell, Mr. Tidey and Mr. Gertin. Miss Lomas was an efficient accompanist in the second part.

MR. HENRY GADSBY'S Dramatic Cantata "The Lord of the Isles" was most successfully rendered by the All Saints' (Clapton) Musical Society, on Tuesday evening, the 19th ult. Several of the solos, and the chorus "Merrily bounds the bark" were redemanded. The principal parts were sung by Miss Annie Coxhead, Mrs. Crossley, Mr. J. R. Hodgson, Mr. W. J. Clare, Mr. Alex. H. S. Burnett, and Mr. G. Ablitt, all members of the Society. Mr. Gadsby presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. W. M. Wait (Organist and Choirmaster, All Saints') conducted. There was a large and appreciative audience.

AN Evening Concert was given at St. Pancras Vestry Hall, on Monday, the 4th ult., in aid of the Blind, a large audience being attracted by the excellent programme provided. The vocalists were Miss Mary Davies, Miss Elfrida Williams, Miss Mary Willis, Miss Mina Poole, Mr. Reginald Groomer, Mr. Franklin Clive, and Mr. Traherne; solo pianist, Miss Nannie Reynolds, and solo violin, Mr. Reynolds.

MESSRS. GRIFFITH AND FARRAN have in preparation a volume by Madame Viard Louis, the well known pianist, entitled "Music and the Piano," in which her aim has been to point out that the music for this instrument is the expression of an idea, and not merely an ingenious method of displaying force and skill. It is written in three parts. In the first Madame Viard Louis shows that music has from age to age followed the progress of the human mind. In the second, she takes the numerous composers for the piano, and indicates how the individual character of each is set forth in their respective works. The third part treats of style—that is to say, the method of conveying the ideas of the master by the execution of their compositions. The book, originally written, but not published, in French, has been translated into English by Mrs. Warrington Smythe, wife of Warrington Smythe, Esq., F.R.S., a lady of highly cultivated taste both in literature and music.

THE Burlington Hall Choral Society gave a successful Concert at Burlington Hall, Saville Row, Regent Street, on the 4th ult., under the direction of the Conductor, Mr. Hamilton Robinson, F.C.O. The principal vocalists were Miss Mary Mackway, R.A.M., Miss Annie Buckland, Mr. Walter Mackway, R.A.M., and Mr. Charles W. Copland, R.A.M., all of whom were highly successful in their solos, several being redemanded. The Society, which numbers about sixty voices, gave an excellent rendering of some part-songs, including Mendelssohn's "Hunting Song," and elicited a double encore for Oliver King's "Peacefully slumber." Mr. William C. Hann, R.A.M., performed three violoncello solos, which were highly appreciated, and Mr. Hamilton Robinson and Mr. J. R. Griffiths were recalled for their performance of three pianoforte duets. Mr. J. R. Griffiths accompanied. There was a full audience.

AT the Second Concert of the tenth season given by the Crouch End Choral Society, at Christ Church School-room, Crouch End, on Tuesday, the 12th ultimo, Mr. J. F. Barnett's "Ancient Mariner," was performed, the soloists being Mrs. Lansdill, Mrs. Barbour, Mr. George Micklewood, and Mr. Joseph Wilson. The performance was satisfactory. The second part was miscellaneous and comprised the popular part-song, "The Vikings," by Eaton Fanning; a trio for female voices, by J. G. Callcott, "Tell me where is fancy bred;" a madrigal, by Pearsall, &c., with solos by the above artists. Mr. Micklewood was very successful in a new song by the Conductor, entitled "Fickle Mollie," and Miss Cobely in "A Song and a Rose," by Cowen; Mr. Edmund Woolhouse contributed solos on the violoncello; Mr. Charles W. Lovejoy presided at the pianoforte; Miss C. Long at the harmonium; and Mr. Alfred J. Dye conducted.

To the energetic director of the London Popular Concerts, Mr. Arthur Chappell, South London again owes a debt of gratitude in respect of another series of those excellently conducted performances of classical chamber music, the Denmark Hill Concerts. The first of the four concerts forming the seventh season, took place at the Surrey Masonic Hall (South London Institute of Music), Camberwell, on Thursday evening, January 31, when the programme was headed by Mozart's String Quartet in B flat, No. 3, admirably executed by MM. Heermann, Ries, Zerbini, and Piatti. Herr Heermann was warmly received in each of his solos, and Mdlle. Janotha played with her well-known skill and artistic feeling. Songs by Eckert, Rubinstein, and Gounod were well sung by Miss Carlotta Elliott, a violoncello obbligato to Gounod's "Quand tu chantes bercée" being played by Signor Piatti. Mr. Zerbini accompanied.

THE Members of the North-east London Choral Society gave an excellent Concert at the Morley Hall, Hackney, on Tuesday, January 29, the programme consisting of Mendelssohn's 13th Psalm, Haydn's "Winter" ("The Seasons"), and a miscellaneous selection. The solo vocalists were Miss Ellen Chapman, R.A.M., Miss Clara Wollaston, Madame West, Miss Lottie West, Mr. Henry Parkin, and Mr. Bantock Pierpoint: organist, Mr. C. E. Smith; pianist, Mr. Louis B. Prout, R.A.M.; Mr. H. Baynton led the band, and Mr. John E. West, R.A.M., F.C.O., conducted. There was a good and appreciative audience.

AT the first examination for the degree of Bachelor in Music, at the University of Oxford, the following have satisfied the Examiners:—J. H. Anger, New College, and Frenchay, near Bristol; T. Hemmines, New College, and Stoke-on-Trent; H. T. Lewis, Christ Church, and Doncaster; W. G. Price, Queen's College, and Fore Hill, Ely; C. J. Revell, New College, and Carmarthen. Examiners: Sir F. A. Gore Ouseley, Bart., Mus. Doc., M.A., Christ Church, Professor; E. G. Monk, Mus. Doc., Exeter College; J. Varley Roberts, Mus. Doc., Magdalen College. The examination for the degree of Doctor in Music will be held in October next. At the second examination for the degree of Bachelor in Music, which will also take place in October, in addition to the usual subjects, there will be required a critical knowledge of the full scores of Handel's Oratorio "Judas Maccabæus" and Mendelssohn's "Otteto." All exercises are to be sent to the Professor of Music, Sir Frederick A. Gore Ouseley, St. Michael's, Tenbury, as early as possible. None can be received after the end of June.

ONE of the best Concerts yet given by the East Finchley Choral Society took place on the 19th ult., at the Lecture Hall. The first part consisted of Handel's "Acis and Galatea," under the conductorship of Mr. Herbert Jayes. The choruses were well sung by the Society. Madame Robert George gave an excellent rendering of the soprano music, and Mr. Orlando Harley made a great effect in the music allotted to Acis. The parts of Damon and Polphemus were carefully sung by Mr. Frank Salter and Mr. Percival Hart, members of the Society. The second part was miscellaneous, and, under the conductorship of Mr. Granslade, Handel's "Haste thee, nymph," and Purcell's "Come, if you dare," were efficiently rendered by Mr. G. H. Gifford and Mr. W. Jones respectively. Miss Jones, the honorary accompanist, performed her task with marked ability.

A CONCERT in aid of the People's Entertainment Society was given at Bermondsey Town Hall, on Tuesday evening, the 12th ult. The programme consisted of portions of Handel's "Messiah" and a miscellaneous selection, the latter including Mendelssohn's "Cornelius" March and Michaelis's descriptive Fantasia "The Smithy in the Wood." Both in the choral and orchestral departments an amount of proficiency was displayed calling for high praise, and entitling the Society's Conductor, Mr. W. H. Leslie, to much commendation upon the result of his labours. The vocalists were Madame Worrell, Mrs. Tuer, Mr. Charles Wade, and Mr. James Budd. Mr. Val Nicholson was leader of the orchestra, and Mr. R. J. Pitt and Mr. Edward Morton presided at the pianoforte. The Concert received well-deserved support.

A CONCERT in aid of the Netherlands Benevolent Fund for the relief of indigent Netherlands subjects residing in London will be given by Mr. Willem Coenen, at St. James's Hall, on Thursday evening, May 1. The Concert will be under the immediate patronage of their Majesties the King and Queen of the Netherlands, their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Albany, the Netherlands Minister, and the Countess de Bylandt. The following artists have already kindly promised their services: Madame Albani, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Herbert Reeves, Mr. Santley, Mr. Hollman, and Mr. W. Coenen. An influential committee is being formed, and a large addition to the Benevolent Fund is looked forward to with confidence.

THE Kyrle Choirs, under the direction of Mr. Malcolm Lawson, gave a performance of Rossini's "Stabat Mater" and Mendelssohn's "Athalie," on the 6th ult., in All Saints' Church, Haggerston. The soloists in the "Stabat Mater" were Miss Edith Phillips, Mrs. Oram, Mr. John Probert, Mr. Albert Orme; in "Athalie," Miss Everett Green, Miss Emily Lawson, and Mrs. Oram. The Choirs gave a second performance of the same works in Trinity Chapel, Poplar, on the 13th ult., the soloists in the "Stabat Mater" being Miss Alice Frupp, Mrs. L'Estrange, Mr. D'Arcy Ferris, and Mr. Albert Orme; in "Athalie," Miss Alice Frupp, Mrs. L'Estrange, and Miss Mary Howell. Mr. E. H. Turpin presided at the organ on both occasions.

WE have received the prospectus of a new Musical Society called the Pandora Amateur Orchestral Club, the object of which is to afford suitable accommodation for the study and practice of orchestral music. A professional musical Director conducts the practises; and a private room has been engaged at the Three Nuns Hotel, Aldgate, which is open every Tuesday evening, at 6 o'clock, for the use of performing members. A series of Smoking Concerts (instrumental and vocal) will be given in the large Hall adjoining the practice room, to which members will have the privilege of introducing a friend. As during the short time the Club has been formed there has been a rapid increase of members, the success of the undertaking seems placed beyond a doubt.

ON Tuesday evening, the 19th ult., an excellent performance of John Francis Barnett's Cantata "The Ancient Mariner," was given at the Cadby Hall, Hammersmith Road, by the Hammersmith Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. Theodore Drew. The solo vocalists were Miss Hilda Coward, Mrs. Lloyd-Edwards, Mr. Henry Hallam, and Mr. Arthur Oswald. The work was ably rendered, and proved in every way a success. The second part of the programme was miscellaneous, the above artists being assisted by Mr. H. Pyatt, who sang "The Village Blacksmith" most effectively, and Mr. W. L. Barrett, who played a brilliant solo on the flute. Mr. Theodore Drew presided at the pianoforte.

YE London Glee Men, under the direction of Mr. Richard Mackway, gave a very successful Smoking Concert, the second of the season, at the Guildhall Tavern, on Thursday the 14th ult. Among the part-music performed, the pièce de résistance was Wesley's glee "I wish to tune my quiv'ring Lyre," which was well rendered. The programme also included Sullivan's part-song "The long day closes," Hatton's "Oh my love is like the red, red rose," Horsley's "Nymphs of the Forest," Bishop's "Bold Robin Hood," and Gounod's "Soldiers' Chorus," from "Faust." Vocal solos were contributed by Mr. Richard Mackway and Mr. Frank Ward; and violin solos by Master Hubert Armfield.

WE regret to announce the death, at the early age of twenty-four, of Mr. Farquharson Walenn, Organist of St. Alban's, Holborn. Mr. Walenn, was originally a chorister of All Saints', Margaret Street, and on his leaving the choir school he studied for about three years under Mr. W. S. Hoyte. He then obtained the Novello Scholarship at the National Training School, and continued his studies there until its close. He was choirmaster at St. Mary's, Kensington, and conductor of the St. Alban's Choral Society, and was the author of several sacred and secular compositions.

THE 181st Monthly Concert of the St. George's Glee Union was held at the Pimlico Rooms, on the 1st ult. The programme was miscellaneous, and included songs by Madame Grace Godolphin, Mdlle. Emilia Vadini, Miss Coyte Turner, Mr. Arthur Thompson, and Mr. R. F. Roberts. Several part-songs were well rendered by the choir, among which were the "Hunting Song" (Mendelssohn), "Come live with me" (Bennett), "Good-night, beloved" (Pinsuti), "Sunshine thro' the clouds" (Lemmens), &c. Mr. Joseph Monday conducted.

THE first performance of the Quartet for Pianoforte, Violin, Viola, and Violoncello, to which the prize of ten guineas and a gold medal, annually offered by Trinity College, London, for a Chamber Music Competition has just been awarded, took place at the College, on Tuesday evening, the 19th ult. It was played by Miss Alma Sanders (the composer), Mr. Edmund E. Halfpenny, Mr. Ellis Roberts, and Mr. Edmund Woolhouse. The Adjudicator was Sir Herbert Oakeley, and the work has been dedicated, by gracious permission, to H.R.H. the Princess of Wales.

THE members of the Choir of the Association of Lay Helpers for the Diocese of London have presented their Conductor, Dr. George C. Martin, with an ivory bâton, mounted in silver, in testimony of their appreciation of his great ability and untiring efforts for the good of the Choir, and in congratulation of his having attained the dignity of Doctor of Music. The presentation was made by G. A. Spottiswoode, Esq., Chairman of the Committee of the Association.

THE arrangements for the production of Gounod's "Redemption," at the Trocadero, Paris, on the 3rd of April, are nearly completed. Madame Albani will go specially to Paris to sing the part created by her at Birmingham, while Mdlle. Rosina Bloch and Madame Ketten will sing the other solos for soprano and contralto. MM. Faure, Ketten, and Fournets, will divide the solos for tenor, baritone, and bass. All the French musical papers predict an enormous success for this first performance in Paris of Gounod's master-work.

ON the 4th ult. a Smoking Concert was given by the members of the Euston Glee Union, in a dining saloon adjoining the North-Western Railway terminus, the chair being occupied by John Partington, Esq. The greater portion of the programme was devoted to glee-singing, under the able conductorship of Mr. Kilby; and songs were contributed by Messrs. Harding, Norton, Wand, Keedle, and Collins. The Concert, which was well attended, reflected great credit on the executive, and formed a most successful début for the Euston Glee Union.

THE ninth of the winter series of free "Entertainments for the people" at Bethnal Green Road Congregational Church, was a Ballad Concert, of superior character, given under the direction of Mr. W. West, of the North-East London Academy of Music, on Wednesday evening, the 13th ult. The vocalists were Miss Alice Woodruffe, Miss Lottie West, Mr. H. D. Feild, and Mr. C. Prickett. Some good standard ballads, vocal duets, trios, quartets, &c., were admirably rendered, and several redemanded.

THE arrangements for the entertainments at the Royal Victoria Coffee Hall, Waterloo Road, during the past month have been excellently organised, and satisfactorily carried out. Instrumental and vocal music of sterling worth has been given at the Concerts, and most attractive dramatic Recitals have been included in the programme. We are glad to find that these evenings for the people have so thoroughly fulfilled the anticipation of the promoters of the movement.

IN our January number we gave the full programme of the approaching Worcester Musical Festival, and have now to add that the following artists have been engaged:—Madame Albani, Miss Anna Williams, Miss Santley, Madame Patey, Madame Enriquez, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. Boulcott Newth, Mr. Brereton, and Mr. Santley: leader of the orchestra, Mr. Carrodus. There will be opening and closing services, with full band and chorus, to which free admission will be given.

THE St. Mark's, North Audley Street, Choral Society gave the first Concert this season, on Tuesday evening, the 12th ult., in the Church Room. The first part consisted of Mendelssohn's 95th Psalm, and the second of Sir Sterndale Bennett's "May Queen." The soloists were Miss Fripp, Mrs. John Bryant, Messrs. Wells and Yorke. The 95th Psalm was particularly well rendered, and the singing throughout reflected the greatest credit on Mr. Thomas Mountain, the conductor. Mr. Bolton acted as accompanist.

ON Tuesday evening the 5th ult., Mr. Herbert Smith, gave his annual Evening Concert, at the New Cross Public Hall, the large room being crowded in every part. The artists were Miss Marie Ebbington, Miss Mary Bear, Miss Marian Mackenzie, Mr. Reginald Groome, and Mr. E. Miles; solo violin, Mr. Arthur Payne; solo pianoforte, Mr. Herbert Smith and Mr. Edwin Samson.

AN interesting Organ Recital was given at St. John the Evangelist's, Waterloo Road, on the 12th ult., by Mr. Henry J. B. Dart, several of the pieces being accompanied by solo trombone, played by Mr. Samuel Millar. The programme, which was exceedingly well rendered, included the first performance of a Sonata in D minor, by Mr. Dart, for organ and trombone solo.

THE third Subscription Oratorio Concert, in aid of the Organ Fund, was held on the 7th ult., in South Norwood, Congregational Church, when a performance of Haydn's "Creation" was given with full band, chorus, and organ. The soloists were Miss Evelyn Bawtree, Mr. Arthur Wilmot, and Mr. W. G. Forington; Mr. Josiah Bawtree conducted.

MISS MADELINE HARDY gave a most successful Concert at Brixton Hall, on Thursday, January 31. The bénéficiaire, who was highly successful in all her songs, was assisted by Mesdames Agnes Larkcom, Rosa Leo, Lizzie Evans, Grace Godolphin, and Messrs. Arthur Thompson, Orlando Herley, Wakefield Reed, Musgrove Tufnail, Chaplin Henry, and Master Frank Charlton; solo pianoforte, Mr. Albert H. Fox; violin, Mr. H. Newton. Conductor, Mr. Turle Lee.

HERR ANTON DVORÁK will visit London during the present month, and will conduct the performance of his "Stabat Mater," which is to take place at the Royal Albert Hall, on the 13th inst., as well as his Overture "Husitzka" and "Rhapsodie Sclavische," No. 2, at the Philharmonic Concert of the 20th. He will doubtless be invited to conduct some of his works at other important performances.

THE lectures upon "The Human Voice as a Musical Instrument," given by Herr Emil Behnke, both in the metropolis and throughout the country, have been in the highest degree successful. The press notices which have been forwarded to us are most enthusiastic in praise of the excellent matter contained in his discourses, as well as of the attractive manner in which they are delivered.

THE election to the post of Choragus in the University of Oxford, vacant by the death of Dr Corfe, took place recently. There were several candidates, the choice falling on Dr. Hubert Parry, who a short time since received an Honorary Degree of Doctor of Music at Cambridge, and has since his appointment received the same compliment from his own University.

THE Members of the Lavender Hill Choral Society gave their third Concert this season on the 19th ult., under the conductorship of Mr. F. G. Edwards. The soloists were Miss Jessie Ross, Mrs. Goddard, Mrs. Coe, Mr. Church, Mr. Goddard, and the Messrs. Ortnier. The part-songs by the choir were very well rendered. Miss Bird and Miss Denness were efficient accompanists.

AT the church of St. Margaret Pattens, Rood Lane, Fenchurch Street, among other compositions suitable for the season, will be sung, unaccompanied, the "Missa Æterna Christe" of Palestrina at the solemn Celebration every Sunday during Lent. The "Stabat Mater" of Rossini will be sung on Wednesday evening, the 26th inst., under the direction of Mr. Stedman.

AT the Lenten Services, at St. Anne's, Soho, Bach's Passion Music (St. Matthew) will be sung. There will be full orchestral accompaniment, and the principal tenor part will be undertaken by Mr. Charles Wade. The services will be held on each Friday evening during Lent, at 8 o'clock, and on Good Friday afternoon, at 4 o'clock.

ON the occasion of the recent marriage of Miss Alice Brooks, late of the Watford School of Music, the Council, professors, and students of the Institution presented her with a handsome diamond brooch, together with an address on vellum, expressing their appreciation of her untiring efforts on behalf of the School.

WE have heard the most flattering accounts, from reliable sources, of the organ Recitals now being given at St. James's, Curtain Road, after the even-song on Sundays, by Mr. Hereward Brown, who, although only eighteen years of age, displays an exceptional amount of power and artistic feeling.

AN Organ Recital was given on Saturday evening, the 2nd ult., at Stepney Meeting House, by Dr. C. J. Frost, upon the new organ recently erected there by P. Conacher and Co., of Huddersfield. The vocalist was Madame Ellen Horne.

MADAME FRICKENHAUS and Herr Josef Ludwig announce a series of four Chamber Concerts at the Prince's Hall, Piccadilly, on Thursday evenings, commencing May 15. The programmes will include works of the old masters, and modern compositions of special interest.

WE are informed that Mr. William M. Hutchison is at present occupied in composing a Comic Opera, in three acts, the Libretto by Mr. Henry B. Farnie; the Opera is expected to be completed in a month or two.

REVIEWS.

The Great Musicians. Edited by Francis Hueffer.
Mendelssohn. By W. S. Rockstro.
[Sampson Low, Marston, Searle, and Rivington.]

THE details of Mendelssohn's career have within the last few years been so constantly before the public, and these details have been so supplemented by the most charming personal recollections that many persons will imagine this latest contribution to the lives of the "Great Musicians" to be merely a reproduction of facts already generally known. This, let us hasten to assure our readers, it is not; for, apart from the relation of all the principal events in Mendelssohn's life, we have so much deeply interesting matter which only a musician who, like Mr. Rockstro, has received the benefit of the composer's instruction, could satisfactorily record, that the book can hardly fail to obtain the recognition it deserves. The following account of Mendelssohn's method of teaching counterpoint at the Leipzig Conservatoire, for example, should be read with attention both by students and professors. "For counterpoint he employed a large black-board, with eight red staves drawn across it. On one of these staves he would write a canto fermo, always using the soprano clef for the soprano part. Then, offering the chalk to one of his pupils, he would bid him write a counterpoint, above or below the given subject. This done, he would invite the whole class to criticise the tyro's work, discussing its merits with the closest possible attention to every detail. Having corrected this to his satisfaction, or at least made the best of it, he would pass on the chalk to some one else—generally to the student who had been most severe in his criticism—bidding him add a third part to the two already written. And this process he would carry on until the whole of the eight staves were filled. The difficulty of adding a sixth, seventh, or eighth part to an exercise already complete in three, four, or five, and not always written with the freedom of an experienced contrapuntist, will be best understood by those who have most frequently attempted the process. It was often quite impossible to supply an additional part, or even an additional note; but Mendelssohn would never sanction the employment of a rest as a means of escape from the gravest difficulty, until every available resource had been tried in vain. One day, when it fell to our own lot to write the eighth part, a certain bar presented so hopeless a dead-lock that we confessed ourselves utterly vanquished. 'Cannot you find a note?' asked Mendelssohn; 'Not one that could be made to fit in without breaking a rule,' said we. 'I am very glad,' said he, in English, and laughing heartily, 'for I could not find one myself.' It was, in fact, a case of inevitable check-mate." Want of space, only, prevents our giving further extracts from Mr. Rockstro's volume—especially his truthful observations upon "Mendelssohn's position in Art"—and we, therefore, conclude by warmly commending the book to the general reader, as well as to all those who love and cultivate music.

Novello, Ewer and Co.'s Albums for Violin and Pianoforte. No. 1. Four Marches, composed by F. Mendelssohn Bartholdy. Transcribed for Violin and Pianoforte by Berthold Tours. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE four pieces chosen for this volume are the "Wedding March" from the "Midsummer Night's Dream," the "Cornelius March," the "War March of the Priests" from "Athalie," and the "Funeral March" in A minor and major, composed for the funeral of Norbert Burgmüller. All these works sufficiently recommend themselves; but amateurs who are well acquainted with them will, we are certain, eagerly procure the transcriptions before us by an artist whose reputation guarantees their excellence. Both the pianoforte and violin parts are thoroughly within the reach of even moderate performers; and so effective are the arrangements that they must be warmly received in every musical drawing-room. We are glad to find that Messrs. Novello have resolved to issue Albums appealing to violinists as well as to pianists and vocalists.

Professional Musical Directory. Issued by the Society of Professional Musicians. 1884.

[Wigan: Thomas Wall, Observer Office.]

THE compilers of this Directory, in the Preface, return thanks to "all those who have kindly aided in purging the list of names from the enormous impositions which have heretofore abounded in all published works of the kind." We know not, of course, what means have been taken to exclude the names of those who are not bond fide members of the profession; but we certainly find that the names of some who are—and these of acknowledged high standing—have been omitted, and that the honour of knighthood awarded to Sir G. A. Macfarren and Sir A. Sullivan is not acknowledged in the book. Without delivering an opinion upon the policy of printing the names and addresses of professors with no indication of the branch of music they profess, we cannot pass over the fact that, in spite of the assertion that the names appear with the addition of any "University degree or Royal Academy Membership," out of upwards of eighty Members of the Royal Academy of Music, only three or four have this honourable distinction affixed. Considering that this could have been remedied either by communication with the professors themselves or by procuring the published list of Members in the Royal Academy prospectus, we can scarcely understand how the Society of Professional Musicians can claim credit for that excessive accuracy which alone can justify the issue of one more Directory, especially as those already established, if containing some names that should not be printed, at least include all those that should.

Le Livre des Sérénades. Morceaux Caractéristiques, pour Piano à 4 mains, par J. Burgmein. Poésies par Paul Solanges. Illustrations par A. Edel.

[Tito di Gio. Ricordi.]

WHEN we say that the illustrations of this beautiful volume almost eclipse its musical attractions, it by no means proves that the composer has not ably fulfilled his share in the work. Of the fifteen Serenades designed as musical types of the various nationalities, some are exceedingly good, and all are thoroughly musician-like sketches, although occasionally unduly eccentric; but the charming chromo-lithographs and drawings in Heliotype, profusely scattered throughout the book, make so powerful an appeal to the artistic eye that we question whether the work will not oftener occupy a place upon the drawing-room table than upon the desk of the pianoforte. Warm commendation must also be given to M. Solanges for the brief poems which precede the Serenades.

The Village Maid. Song.
When Stars are in the quiet Skies. Song.
The Child's First Grief. Song.
To Me, fair Friend. Song.
I think on Thee. Song.
A Cradle Song, for the Pianoforte.

By George John Bennett.

[Stanley Lucas, Weber, and Co.]

THOSE who, having discerned the talent of the composer of these pieces, are watching his career with interest, will turn to the works now before us in hope of gratifying expectation, and will not be disappointed. The Songs—we can speak of them as a whole, for they are constructed on identical principles—are far from commonplace, or rather, we should say, conventional, either in respect of melody or form. Mr. Bennett obviously rejects the English model, with its single vocal theme and chord accompaniment. This is not musical enough for him, and he adopts a modification of the German lied as we have it in the works of Schumann, Franz, and their compeers. The modification tends to simplicity, but we note the same exaltation of the pianoforte to more than the position of an accompanying instrument, and the same use of it for the working out of a musical idea in which the vocal theme is but a part—sometimes even a subordinated part. The artistic composer naturally finds this form of song-writing best worth effort, but we would counsel Mr. Bennett not to sacrifice spirit to method, and so elaborate his expression as to become "dry." Our advice is not unnecessary, because passages here and there have the effect of

"made" music rather than of the song that flows and burns with native fire. Nevertheless, the pieces before us are most interesting and musicianly. There is not one without beauty, or that fails to deserve attention and praise. The "Cradle Song" is a charming melody, with arpeggio accompaniment, easy to play, delightful to hear.

Celebrated Musicians of all Nations. Translated from the German, with an Appendix for England, by M. F. S. Hervey. [Sampson Low, Marston and Co.]

THIS excellent collection of portraits of the most eminent musicians will no doubt earn a welcome in this country, not only for their accuracy, but because they are accompanied by brief biographical notices, which will prove of much value for reference. The portraits are reproduced by the phototype process; and a great merit in the work is that they are grouped with reference to nationality and to the various epochs of musical art. We cordially commend the volume to the notice of all interested in music and musicians.

The Old and the Young Marie. Song. Words by F. E. Weatherly. Music by Frederic H. Cowen.

[Edwin Ashdown.]

MR. WEATHERLY'S simple little story has been coloured most sympathetically by Mr. Cowen, who has here proved that he knows how to reserve, as well as to display, his musical power. The changes of time and key are extremely happy throughout; and although the harmonies and accompaniments do little more than strengthen the voice part, they are unmistakably touched by the hand of an artist. The multiplication of such graceful and refined specimens of what may be termed "drawing-room music" is a healthful sign of the time.

FOREIGN NOTES.

THE first anniversary of the death of Richard Wagner, on the 13th ult., was celebrated in nearly all the musical circles of Germany. Theatres and Societies vied with each other in doing honour to the departed master. Among the most interesting celebrations was that at Bayreuth (where Wagner's family still live), a concert being given containing fragments from his last work, "Parsifal."

We are requested to call the attention of our readers to the foundation in Germany of a General Richard Wagner Society. The purpose of the Society is to help to maintain for all time the repetition of the "Bayreuther Bühnen Festspiele" at Wagner's own theatre. Anyone wishing to become a member can do so by paying a yearly subscription of four shillings. All particulars may be had of the English representative, B. S. Mosely, Esq., 55, Tavistock Square, London.

For the furtherance of Wagner's principles in musical art a rival paper to the Bayreuther Blätter, which he founded himself, has, on the anniversary of Wagner's death, been started in Vienna. The paper is called Parsifal, will appear fortnightly, and is edited by Herr Emerich Kastner.

Wagner's "Parsifal" will shortly be translated into French, M. Victor Wilder having been selected to perform this arduous task.

The "Parsifal" performances of this year, at Bayreuth, will take place on July 21, 23, 25, 27, 29, and 31, and on August 2, 4, 6, and 8.

Brahms's Third Symphony promises to become the most successful of the three similar works from this master's pen. Wherever it is performed, be it under the composer's own conductorship or not, it creates the greatest enthusiasm with the public, though the opinions of the critics seem to vary a good deal in describing the character of this new production of the master's genius—one calling it a Pastoral Symphony and another saying that it is decidedly of an heroic character—they seem, however, to be all unanimous that it is the most melodious and pleasing work yet given to the world by this, as a rule, sombre and deep musical writer. We hope soon to hear the work in London, and so be enabled to form our own opinion, and we trust that the composer may at last be induced to visit our shores, where we are sure a hearty reception awaits him from the many whom his works have so often delighted.

The 24th of January was the first anniversary of the foundation of the so called Raff Conservatoire at Frankfort-on-Main. This Conservatoire was founded by some teachers who were originally engaged at the Hoch'sche Conservatorium, of which the late Joachim Raff was during his life director. After his much lamented death the authorities of the last named Conservatorium felt themselves constrained to alter most of the rules which Raff had established, and to re-engage Herr Stockhausen, whom Raff had dismissed. In consequence of this some of the teachers left the institution and founded a rival Conservatoire, calling it in honour of the deceased master, the Raff Conservatoire. These gentlemen have particular reason to be proud of the first anniversary of this foundation, as Herr Hans von Bülow accepted on that day the post of honorary president, promising to come every year for several months to Frankfort for the purpose of giving finishing lessons to the most advanced pupils in pianoforte playing.

The energetic director of the St. Cecilia Choral Society at Berlin, Herr Alexis Holländer, invariably introduces interesting novelties to his audience, in contradistinction to other choral societies of the German capital, which seem to ignore almost entirely the existence of modern choral works. Herr Holländer gave last year Gounod's "Redemption" for the first time in Berlin, and this year brought forward Rubinstein's grandest choral work, or, as the composer calls it, sacred opera, "Paradise Lost." The performance was a perfect success, particularly as the choruses, which form by far the most important part of the work, were rendered with great precision and power.

Herr Franz Rummel, the celebrated pianist, has lately been playing in several important Continental cities, including Leipzig, Hamburg, Wiesbaden, and Antwerp, with the greatest success. We have before us cuttings from several papers, all containing the most laudatory critiques on Herr Rummel's excellent playing, and all of them particularly mentioning his wonderful technique and refined delicacy of touch. Herr Rummel's répertoire is immense and varied, and we may specially mention the following important works, his playing of which was everywhere received with the greatest enthusiasm: Schumann's A minor Concerto and Henselt's F sharp minor Concerto, Liszt's Fantasia on Hungarian Themes, the same composer's arrangement of Schubert's "Wanderer" Fantasia, Bach's Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue, and Variations by Tausig on a Theme of Schubert. We are glad to hear that Herr Rummel intends visiting his native place, London, during the coming season, for the purpose of giving some Pianoforte Recitals at St. James's Hall, and hope he will obtain at the hands of the public, as well as of the critics, the support and encouragement which he so richly deserves.

Johann Strauss, hitherto known only as a composer of dances and comic operas, is now engaged on a lyrical work of higher pretensions for the Imperial Opera House of Vienna. The libretto is written by the greatest living Hungarian poet, Maurus Jókai, and is taken from Hungarian history.

The Beethoven prize, offered by the Gesellschaft der Musik Freunde of Vienna, has been awarded for the year 1883 to Herr Victor Herzfeld, for his music to Grillparzer's "Der Traum ein Leben."

The répertoire of the Vienna Hof Opera Theatre for 1883, comprised the respectable number of seventy works.

Handel's two hundredth birthday will be celebrated at his birthplace, Halle, by a great musical festival, in which all the neighbouring towns have decided to take part, thus enabling the town, although small, to arrange a celebration worthy of the great master.

Herr Baron von Perfall, who has been for eighteen years Intendant General of the Royal Theatre at Munich, is about to resign his post. His successor will be Count Moy, master of the ceremonies at the same Court.

At a Concert given at Baden-Baden, on January 4, Herr Adolf Beyschlag, director of the Belfast Philharmonic Society, played Chopin's E minor Concerto, and several smaller pieces for pianoforte, with great success.

On the 1st ult. the Italian Opera at Paris brought out the long promised novelty of this season, "Hérodiade," by Massenet. This work, which was first performed at Brussels, on December 19, 1881, and has since been given with much success in Milan and Hamburg, was received in Paris, in its Italian form, with great favour. The instrumental and choral portions of the opera suffered from want of sufficient rehearsal, but the solo parts were sustained most efficiently by Mesdames Fidés Devries and Tremelli, and MM. Jean and Edouard de Reské, and Maurel.

Notwithstanding the unfavourable accounts given by most of the French papers, it is interesting to notice that the Italian opera in Paris is in a flourishing state, although, as our worthy Parisian contemporary, Le Ménestrel says, the performances have been only mediocre, and the répertoire almost entirely void of interest. We take from the same paper a list of the first thirty performances given, with the respective receipts: 1, "Simon Boccanegra," 20,778fr.; 2, ditto, 11,913fr.; 3, ditto, 12,908fr.; 4, ditto, 16,208fr.; 5, ditto, 10,027fr.; 6, "Marta," 13,093fr.; 7, ditto, 20,954fr.; 8, ditto, 14,834fr.; 9, ditto, 13,527fr.; 10, ditto, 18,225fr.; 11, "Simon Boccanegra," 12,515fr.; 12, ditto, 11,840fr.; 13, ditto and Ballet, 15,508fr.; 14, "Marta" and Ballet, 12,027fr.; 15, "Ernani," 16,811fr.; 16, ditto, 9,780fr.; 17, ditto, 11,927fr.; 18, ditto, 15,925fr.; 19, "I Puritani," 11,553fr.; 20, ditto, 12,079fr.; 21, ditto, 16,128fr.; 22, "Ernani," 9,623fr.; 23, ditto, 11,552fr.; 24, "I Puritani," 15,263fr.; 25, "Ernani," 11,624fr.; 26, "Hérodiade," 15,235fr.; 27, ditto, 18,270fr.; 28, ditto, 15,375fr.; 29, ditto, 18,152fr.; 30, "Ernani," 16,933fr. This shows a total of 431,000 frs. for thirty performances, an average of 14,866 frs. each, a sum which ought to secure the prosperity of the institution, considering that even at the Grand Opéra the receipts are not greater. The directors of the theatre intend to propose to their shareholders an alteration of the statutes which would allow them to perform new French Operas in the original language.

The municipal council of Paris offers two prizes—one of 10,000 francs, the other of 6,000 francs—for the best compositions for soli, chorus, and orchestra. All foreigners are strictly excluded from the competition.

We hear that Stephen Heller, who has lived in France for the last thirty-five years, has received the Legion of Honour. This distinction is well deserved and cannot but be gratifying to the many friends of the composer in England.

M. Gayarre, well known to the frequenters of Covent Garden, made his first appearance in Paris on the 18th ult. in "Lucrezia Borgia," and achieved a marked success.

The famous Belgian composer, M. Gevaert, of Brussels, is said to be writing a grand opera called "Pertinax Emperor of the Orient."

M. Benjamin Godard produced his new opera "Pedro de Zalamea" at Antwerp, on January 31. A detailed account of the performance will be found in another column.

Carl Goldmark, the composer of "La Reine de Saba," is engaged on a new opera called "Attila."

The Beethoven Male Choir, one of the greatest Choral Societies of New York, has acquired from the Central Park Commission of that city permission to erect a monument to Beethoven. The same park contains already monuments to Schiller, Goethe, and Humboldt.

A biography of Donizetti is about to be published at New York. It is written by a Mr. Sottas, and will be brought out simultaneously in three languages, English, French, and Italian.

Rubinstein's Opera "Nero" was produced, on the 10th ult., at the Marie Theatre, St. Petersburg, under the direction of the composer. The chief parts were sung by members of M. Vizenini's Italian company, Mesdames Durand, Repetto, and Stahl, and Signori Silva and Cotogni. The work was enthusiastically applauded.

A Correspondent in Turin writes to us as follows:—"In your January number I see you allude to the grand Concert-room erected in the Exhibition, and will be glad to hear that orchestral concerts on a large scale, 100 performers, alternately conducted by Faccio of Milan and Fasso of Turin, will be given every Thursday, to which the admission will be free. Other cities will in turn send their orchestras, Milan for the first fortnight in May, Naples in June, &c. At the Regio we have had the 'Figlio prodigo' by Ponchielli, but it did not; though possessing many beauties, succeed like his 'Gioconda.' It was followed by 'Aida,' the title part being interpreted by Signorina Singer, who had already sung it over 400 times. She has extraordinary low notes for a soprano, but is rather exaggerated in the use of them. Ponchielli's 'Gioconda' is being given in four towns, and Gomez's 'Salvator Rosa' in two. Out of a list of twenty-nine places the only opera of Wagner's being performed is 'Lohengrin' at Parma. There have been some fairly good orchestral Concerts and the Stefana Tempia Choral Society has given three. The last was on the 10th ult., and as it was the fiftieth Concert given since the foundation, Maestro Roberti thought well to repeat the programme of the first—Marcello's "18th Psalm," Danzi's "Salve Regina," Mozart's "Ave Verum," Palestrina's "Pleni sunt cœli," Cherubini's "Dormi, regal fanciul," and Gounod's "Presso il fume stranier." While other societies have gradually disappeared, this is in its ninth year and is still full of life. We are to have an extra opera season during the Exhibition, and Tamagno the tenor and Signorina Pantaleone, now delighting the Milanese in the 'Ugonotti,' are engaged. A monster open air Concert or contest is being arranged to be held in the handsome Piazza Vittorio Emmanuele."

We quote the following from La Palestra Musicale (Rome): "A short time since we had an opportunity of hearing and admiring a Trio by Mr. Cusins, Director of Music to H.M. the Queen of England. On Saturday we had the pleasure of hearing Mr. Cusins himself play the pianoforte part of his Concerto in A minor for pianoforte and orchestra, the merit of which seems to us beyond dispute. The first movement Allegro Appassionata is a true inspiration, and may be compared with the best compositions of the kind. Mr. Cusins is especially bold in the rhythm, which proves that he has studied Schumann with loving care. The subject is new and interesting, and the harmonisation shows the mastery of the orchestral Conductor, whose experienced hand knows how to use his materials in order to obtain the required sonority and effect. The second movement, Romanza, was also much appreciated, and made a most pleasing impression, above all, for its originality. The finale, Quasi Tarantella, is remarkable for its bold rhythm and novelty of character. It is a brilliant and fanciful piece, the subjects being clear, the harmonic combinations most effectively coloured, and the form elegant and correct." Speaking of the same Concert, La Liberta says: "Yesterday's matinée went off splendidly, both in respect of the number who attended it and for the merit of the performance. Messrs. Sgambati and Furino began with Mendelssohn's Sonata in D, which they rendered in their usual perfect style. Then followed Schumann's Quartet in A, by Messrs. Monachesi, Jacobani, and Furino, given with marvellous effect. Finally, Mr. Cusins performed the pianoforte part of his beautiful Trio, for which he was greatly applauded. We noticed this work when it was performed by the composer at the St. Cecilia Lyceum, but we must say that a second hearing further revealed the beauties of the composition, which may hold the place of honour in the best programmes of instrumental music. The elegant Scherzo, the melodic Andante, the imposing Finale excellently performed, ensured a splendid reception, and the sympathy of all present with the talented artist."

We have much pleasure in noting, while on the subject of English musicians abroad, that Mr. Alfred Gilbert has been elected an Honorary Member of the "Reale Accademia Sante Cecilia" of Rome. This honour has been conferred in consequence of the very favourable reception accorded to certain of Mr. Gilbert's instrumental compositions at a Concert given by him in Rome on January 24.

A new illustrated musical journal is about to be published at Barcelona called L'Enciclopedia Musical.

M. J. F. Colombier, the Nestor of Parisian music publishers, and for many years president of their corporation, died at Paris on January 19, at the age of seventy-four.

Auguste Franchomme, the celebrated violoncello virtuoso and composer, lately died at Paris, where he had been for a long time past Professor at the Conservatoire, at the age of seventy-six.

Josephine Gallmeyer, the most popular of the Viennese singers in operettas and comic operas, died on the 3rd ult., at Vienna.

"BAPTIE'S BIOGRAPHY OF MUSICIANS."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—As "R. Y." has not only impugned the accuracy of my statement in your January number, but has appealed to the St. Patrick's registry in support of his own, I think I may venture to ask you to suspend the clôture on this occasion in favour of the following extracts from the Chapter minutes, which have just been furnished to me by the courtesy of the Registrar of the Cathedral.

May 28, 1852. The Dean acquainted the Chapter that he had appointed Dr. Stewart, organist, to play at afternoon service, and that he had appointed Mr. William Murphy to play the organ at morning service, and have the instruction of the choir boys as music master.

June 12, 1861. The Dean also informed the Chapter that he had appointed Mr. George Gray, late half Vicar Choral, to the full Vicar Choralship, which had become vacant by the death of Mr. Robert Jager, and that he had nominated Dr. Robert Stewart, organist, to the half vicarage vacated by Mr. Gray, he relinquishing the salary heretofore paid him as organist.

This, I think, disposes of the question as regards the interval between 1852 and 1861. "R. Y.'s" remarks apply solely to the time that has elapsed since the latter date. The post of organist in the two Dublin Cathedrals has been frequently held by the same person, who took the duty at Christ Church in the morning and at St. Patrick's in the afternoon, those being the high services in the Cathedrals respectively. The other services were taken by some one else engaged to "play the organ," and in Thom's Directory, previous to 1862, Mr. Murphy is rightly described as "Assistant Organist and Master of the Boys."

I am afraid that the remark with which "R. Y." commenced his letter to you in January is not altogether inapplicable to himself; and I may perhaps now add that all I have stated on the subject, and a good deal more, is within my own personal knowledge.—Yours faithfully,
G. A. C.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—In answer to the questions as to the "Gloria Tibi" and "Gratias Tibi" before and after the Gospel, raised by your correspondent "J. F. A.," I have consulted the works of one or two authorities upon the matter with the following results:—

The Rev. Dr. Blunt, editor of the "Annotated Prayer Book," says that the "Gloria" has been handed down to us from the Ancient Church (Rupert of Deutz writes of it in the 12th century), and has been retained with a firmer hold than most ritual traditions by subsequent generations. Dr. Blunt says nothing about the "Thanks."

The Rev. A. Williams, in his work "The Liturgical Reason Why," says that the custom of saying "Thanks be to God for his Holy Gospel" is as old as the time of St. Chrysostom. This statement is borne out by the fact that its use is enjoined in the Gallican Liturgy, this Liturgy being derived from the Liturgy of St. John. Dr. Blunt informs us that the Liturgy of St. John was the original of that which was used in Spain, France, and England during the earlier ages of Christianity, being conveyed from Ephesus by missionaries at a period very near to that of the Apostles themselves. I think, therefore, we may apply the same reason for the retention of the "Thanks" as Dr. Blunt has applied to the "Gloria."

As regards the scarcity of Anthems for the Festivals of the Blessed Virgin, it is a subject which I have often thought upon, and have attributed it to the fact of the great lack of honour shown to our Blessed Lady in the Anglican Church. I trust, however, that with our increasing Church life this apathy will not be allowed to continue, but that fitting Anthems will be written and widely sung in honour of her whom all generations shall call Blessed.

JOHN E. STROULGER.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

* * Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur. Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all Subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

C. E. ROWLEY.—The system of noting time signatures suggested by our correspondent has been frequently proposed.

HINDA MOSELY.—The "Marschallaise" is introduced into Schumann's song "Zwei Grenadiere" by way of effect. The air was composed many years earlier.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

ASHFORD.—The members of the Amateur Orchestral Society, under the patronage of the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh, gave their second popular Concert in the Corn Exchange, on Wednesday, the 13th ult., Dr. Wilks conducting. The solos by Messrs. Scott (violin) and Thorne (clarinet) were admirably performed. The overtures by the band were given in good style. Dr. Wilks accompanied the solos with his usual ability, and also played in a trio and quintet. The glees were well rendered by the Church Choir Glee Party.

BALDERSBY.—The first Concert of the newly formed St. James's Musical Society was given at St. James's Schoolroom, on the 19th ult., under the able conductorship of Mr. C. A. Payne, with much success. The principal vocalists were Miss Payne, Miss Blanchard, Mrs. Blakeborough, Mrs. Pierson, the Misses E. and M. Ellis, Miss Bean, Messrs. Hurst, Ellis, and Ward, and the Rev. E. A. Tugman. A violin solo by Miss Lane was enthusiastically encored; and pianoforte pieces were well rendered by Miss Brownlow and the Misses Payne. The Society, under the patronage of the Viscountess Downe, and most influentially supported, is already exercising a highly beneficial influence, the choral music in the Concert under notice being entirely sung by vocalists from the neighbouring villages, who evidently throw their whole heart into the work.

BATTLE.—On Tuesday evening, the 5th ult., Miss Annie Tate, R.A.M., and Miss E. Avery gave a Ballad Concert at the Drill Hall, under distinguished patronage, assisted by Mr. Edward Harper; solo harp, Mr. Edwin Smith, and solo piano, Miss Ella Payne. The Concert was a great success.

BELFAST.—The members of the Philharmonic Society gave an excellent rendering of Gade's Cantata The Erl-King's Daughter, in the Ulster Hall, on the 15th ult. The solo vocalists were Mrs. L. Mantell, Miss Burne, and Mr. George Benson. The second part of the programme was miscellaneous, including violoncello solos by Herr Elaner, and organ solos by Mr. J. Shillington. The pianoforte accompaniments were played by Herr Werner, and Herr Beyschlag conducted.

BRENTWOOD.—The members of the Vocal and Instrumental Society gave a successful performance of Louis N. Parker's Idyll "Silvia," with full orchestral accompaniment, on Thursday, the 7th ult., under the conductorship of Mr. J. W. Carr. The soloists were Miss James, Miss Wainwright, Mr. White, and the Rev. F. Fanning. The house was crowded, and the applause frequent.

BURNHAM.—The members of the Choral Society gave two successful Concerts in the National Schools, on Saturday afternoon, the 2nd ult., and Monday evening, the 4th. A miscellaneous programme was well rendered, the singing of the Society being worthy of praise. The solo vocalists were Mrs. Banting, Miss Ivey, Mr. Balston, Dr. Wilmot, and Mr. A. Joll. Mrs. Wilmot presided at the pianoforte and Mr. A. Joll conducted.

BURY.—The Musical Society, which has been almost in abeyance for several years, through the want of a suitable Conductor, has at last revived, under the baton of Mr. J. C. Whitehead, F.C.O., late of Durham, now Organist and Choirmaster of the Bury Parish Church. The second Concert of the season was given in the Athenæum, on Wednesday, the 13th ult., when Haydn's Seasons was performed. The principal vocalists engaged were Miss Henrietta Tomlinson, Mr. D. Whitehead, and Mr. J. Nutton. Mr. J. C. Whitehead conducted, and Mr. J. R. Openshaw led the band, which numbered over fifty instruments.

CANTERBURY.—The members of the St. Lawrence Musical Society gave an Invitation Concert at the Oddfellows' Hall, on Wednesday evening, the 6th ult., when a miscellaneous programme was well rendered. The solo vocalists were Miss Ada South, R.A.M., Mr. J. Plant, and Mr. F. Powell. The instrumental selections were well played by the band, and Mr. Gann's violin solo was a feature of the evening. Mr. Teach White conducted.

CHELLENHAM.—Gounod's Redemption was given, for the first time here, on the 11th ult., by the Choral and Orchestral Society, under the direction of Mr. J. A. Matthews. The work produced a profound impression on the large audience, who showed their appreciation of the solemnity of the theme by abstaining entirely from applause. The soloists were Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. W. H. Brereton. The Choir numbered about 100 voices, and rendered the choruses very effectively. Mr. Mathews conducted, and the band was led by Mr. E. G. Woodward.—Herr August Lortzing's Class Concert, on the 12th ult., was very successful, an excellent performance of Mr. J. L. Roedel's Cantata Westward ho! being given, the composer presiding at the pianoforte, and Dr. A. E. Dyer at the harmonium. The solos were sung by Mr. F. Daubeny and Mrs. Winson. In the second part, the Minnesingers, also under Herr Lortzing's direction, sang several part-songs. The performance throughout reflected great credit on Herr Lortzing as a Conductor.

COVENTRY.—Special services were held at Vine Street Chapel, on Sunday, the 10th ult., on the occasion of the opening of an organ recently erected therein. The instrument, which was formerly in the Corn Exchange, has been entirely rebuilt and considerably enlarged by Mr. H. W. Hewitt, of Leicester. Mr. F. R. Betts, the Organist, fully displayed the power and excellent tone of the instrument.

CRAWLEY.—A successful Concert was given at the Assembly Rooms on Thursday, January 31. The solo vocalists were Miss Nancy Woodhatch, Miss Jeanie Ross, Mr. Edward Hall, and Mr. G. Marten Barling; solo violinist, Miss Alice Irving; accompanist, Mr. Arthur Dorey.

CROYDON.—A sacred Concert was given in Christ Church, Addiscombe, entitled "An evening with Mendelssohn," on Wednesday, the 13th ult. The programme consisted of Lauda Sion, The Ninety-fifth Psalm ("Come, let us sing"), and selections from the oratorios S. Paul and Elijah. The principal vocalists in the first-named work were Misses Frisch and D. Howard, Messrs. Edwin Leslie and H. M. Carter, who gave a most impressive rendering of the quartet "Ye who from His ways have turned." The soprano solos were sung with great refinement by Miss Frisch. Mr. C. D. Waite sang the tenor solos in the Psalm, the duet "In his hands," being well delivered by Miss Frisch and Miss Howard. The selections were "Jerusalem" (S. Paul) by Miss Frisch, "Woe unto them" (Elijah), finely sung by Miss Howard, and "It is enough" (Elijah), Mr. F. Wiltshire. The Church Choir, considerably augmented for the occasion, sang with spirit throughout. Mr. Sharland, of Bromley, and Mr. W. J. Smith presided respectively at the organ and pianoforte, and Mr. Edwin Leslie, the Choirmaster, conducted.—The first of a series of Classical Concerts, under the direction of Mr. L. De Clercq, was given in the Addiscombe Hall, on the 14th ult. The instrumental part of the programme contained Quintet for pianoforte and strings (Hummel); Trio, Op. 70, 2 (Beethoven), for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello; String Quartet, No. 2, in G minor (Spohr); and a Sextet for pianoforte, flute, and strings (De Beriot), all of which were well rendered by Miss Johnson, Miss Fagg, and Messrs. Lintott, Best, Wildman, Sydney-Leppard, Everist, and De Clercq. Miss Clara Field also contributed a pianoforte solo. The vocalists were Miss A. Woods, Mrs. Silverthorne, and Mr. Bicknell Young. Mr. Sydney-Leppard was a very able accompanist.

DERBY.—A Concert in aid of the Railway Servants' Orphanage was given, on the 19th ult., in the Drill Hall. The solo vocalists were Miss Beattie Holt, R.A.M., Miss A. Davies, Miss L. Brentnall, Mr. W. Mockridge, and Mr. Frank May, R.A.M., all of whom were well received. Some choral pieces were effectively rendered by the children of the Orphanage, and instrumental selections by the Midland Railway Reed Band, under the direction of Mr. G. Belfield, were features of the evening. Mr. W. G. Parkinson, Organist of St. Chad's, accompanied.

DUBLIN.—At the Second Concert, for the present season, of the University Choral Society, which took place on the 16th ult., Handel's Jephtha was performed. The principal solos were well sung by Miss Mullen, Mrs. Scott, and Mr. Bapty, the smaller parts being entrusted to amateurs who were very efficient. The choruses were excellently rendered. The Professor of Music conducted.—On the 18th ult., Miss Adelaide Mullen gave her Annual Concert in the Antient Concert Room, before a large audience. Miss Mullen was assisted by Mrs. Scott-Fennell, Mr. Henry Beaumont, Mr. Jones, Dr. King-Mullen, and Signor Esposito; Conductors, Signor Caracciolo and Mr. Patton. The Concert in every respect was most successful.

ECCLES, NEAR MANCHESTER.—On Monday evening, the 4th ult., the members of the District Vocal Union, under the Conductorship of Mr. R. Froude Coules, F.C.O., Organist to the Earl of Mulgrave, gave an open evening at the Town Hall. The programme was an attractive one, including Dr. Stainer's Cantata St. Mary Magdalen, and a miscellaneous selection of glees, part-songs, &c. The solos in the Cantata and songs in the second part, &c., were contributed by members of the Society, and rendered with good effect. The choruses were given with precision and due regard to light and shade, and the glee and part-songs were an attractive feature of the Concert. Mr. Coules played two pianoforte solos, and was much applauded. There was a large and appreciative audience. The District Vocal Union has only been established twelve months, and has now developed into one of the largest amateur musical Societies in the suburbs of Manchester. At the next open evening Mackenzie's Cantata The Bride, Jensen's Cantata The Feast of Aonis, and a part-song by the Director will be given.

FROME.—Mr. W. Haydn Cox (Organist of Clifton Parish Church, Bristol) gave a Concert, at the Mechanics' Hall, on Tuesday, January 29. The principal performers were Madame Grace Godolphin, Mr. Henry Morgan, and Mr. Sheaby, vocalists; instrumentalists, Miss Laura Cox (piano), Mr. W. Haydn Cox (piano, and harp Eolian concert organ), and Mr. W. E. Cox (violin). The Concert was much appreciated.

GLOUCESTER.—The Second Concert of the Choral Society for this season was given in the Shire Hall, on the 19th ult., before a large audience. The works performed were Rossini's Stabat Mater and Mendelssohn's Lobgesang, with full orchestral accompaniments. The principal singers were Miss Anna Williams, Miss Eleanor Rees, Miss Ellicott, Mr. W. J. Winch, and Mr. T. Brandon. Mr. Winch—who has recently come from America, and already made his mark as an exceptionally fine tenor in London—created a highly favourable impression, his excellent voice and cultivated style eliciting genuine applause, especially in the well-known passage "Watchman, will the night soon pass?" and Miss Rees must also be awarded warm praise for her rendering of the music allotted to her. The chorus singing was extremely good throughout; the band, led by Mr. E. G. Woodward, was thoroughly efficient; and Mr. C. L. Williams conducted with his accustomed skill and precision.

GUELPH, CANADA.—A very good example of what can be done in a small city when its musical forces are well organised was recently shown here. In October last some of the music-loving people thought they could emulate the Choral Societies of Toronto by securing the services of an efficient Conductor from that city. Mr. Edward Fisher, Conductor of the Toronto Choral Society, organised the Guelph Choral Union, and under his able leadership the Society made its first public appearance on Thursday evening, January 17, with a chorus of a hundred voices and a full orchestra. The first part of the programme consisted of Rossini's Stabat Mater, the solo parts being sung by Miss Strong, Boston; Mr. Jenkins, Buffalo; and Mr. Warrington, Toronto; with the following excellent local talent: Misses Coffee, Miller, Hastings, Nellie Foster, Fielding, Carrie and Clara Stevenson, and Mr. Higham. The second part of the programme was miscellaneous, consisting of solos by the above-mentioned artists, a well-rendered pianoforte selection by Miss Grant, a violin solo by Mr. Jacobsen, Toronto, the leader of the orchestra, and a chorus and trio, "The heavens are telling," from The Creation. Every number was most successfully given and received enthusiastic applause.

HAWWELL.—On the 18th ult. a most successful Concert was given in the Lecture Hall, before a large audience. The principal vocalists were Madame Alladice and Mr. Francois Choveaux, and the pianists the Misses Mudge and T. E. Choveaux.

HARTFURY.—A successful Concert was given in the schoolroom, on Tuesday, the 12th ult. The principal vocalists were Mrs. Alfred Morris, Miss Gordon Canning, Miss Harvey, Miss Swinden, Mr. F. Evans, and Mr. Abraham Thomas, all of whom were well received. The programme included selections from Sterndale Bennett's May Queen.

HASTINGS.—A performance of Mendelssohn's Elijah was given at Christ Church, on Thursday evening, the 7th ult., in aid of the Organ Fund. The choruses were excellently rendered by Mr. Gosa Custard's choir, the solos and quartets being taken by Miss Julia Jones, Miss Dones, Mr. Kenningham, and Mr. Kempton. Miss Dones was heard to great advantage in "O rest in the Lord," and the part of the Prophet was finely sung by Mr. Kempton. Mr. Custard presided at the organ, and Mr. Marcus conducted.

HULL.—A Concert, in aid of the Widows' and Orphans' Fund, in connection with the Hull District of the United Ancient Order of Druids, was given on the 4th ult. The vocalists were Miss Holt, Miss C. Pocock, Master S. Hewson, Mr. C. Blagbro, and Mr. Frank May. Mr. F. J. Harper conducted, and contributed pianoforte solos. The Concert in every respect was successful.

KILMARNOCK.—The new organ erected in Winton Place E.U. Church by Messrs. James Conacher and Sons, of Huddersfield, was opened, on the 15th ult., by Dr. A. L. Peace, of Glasgow, before a large audience. The instrument is in the Gothic style, in a handsome case of pitch pine, with two fronts of richly illuminated pipes facing south and east. It has three manuals and pedal, 32 stops, and three composition pedals to great and swell organ respectively. The full power of the organ is of rich, round tone, while the more delicate stops are voiced with a skill highly creditable to the builder.

KNARESBORO'.—Miss Fannie Sellers gave her annual Concert in the Town Hall, on Wednesday, the 6th ult. The Concert-giver was very successful in her selections, which included "Softly sighs." The other solo vocalists were Miss Emma Dixon, Mr. E. Dunkerton, and Mr. Hemingway, all of whom gave great satisfaction. Madame Alice Reis (solo violin) and Mr. A. W. Gilling (solo pianoforte), by their artistic playing, added much to the success of the Concert. There was a large audience.

LARGS.—The first Concert of the Choral Union was given on Tuesday, January 29, in the Artillery Hall, before a large audience. The programme consisted of selections from Handel, Stainer, Gounod, Stevens, Weber, Pearsall, &c., which were sung with precision and taste. The soloists were Miss J. Wilson, Mr. Robert Beck, and Mr. A. Adams. Miss J. W. Paterson rendered efficient aid as accompanist, and Mr. John McCallum conducted.

LAUNCESTON.—On Wednesday, January 30, Mr. Dalby gave a Concert of Vocal and Instrumental music. The artists engaged were Miss Frispi, Miss Ameris, Mr. Traherne, and Mr. Cecil, vocalists; Miss Hickling, violinist; Madame Viard-Louis, solo pianist; and Madame Gould, accompanist. The programme was of a high character, including selections from the works of Mendelssohn, Beethoven, Liszt, Tartini, Papi, Verdi, Sullivan, Pissuti, and Bishop, all of which were admirably rendered. The audience was large and appreciative, and several pieces were encored. The Concert was in every respect a marked success.

LICHFIELD.—The work of reconstruction of the Cathedral organ is progressing under the skilled care of Messrs. Hill and Son, of London. Workmen are making arrangements immediately outside the organ chamber for the reception of the gas engine which is to be the future motive power. Messrs. Hill will use the pipes of the old organ, but they will furnish the instrument with an entirely new construction upon the best principles. The blowing apparatus will consist of feeders, acted upon by the engine known as Otto's gas engine, an engine which is in use in St. Paul's Cathedral, Westminster Abbey, and other large buildings, and is found to work admirably. The organist will sit at a detached console at the back of the choir stalls, and with the north choir aisle between him and the organ, the entire communication between the player and the organ being effected by means of tubular pneumatic action. The organ, which it is hoped will be ready for use before Easter, will be furnished with a great addition of stops, and promises to be one of the most complete instruments in the kingdom.

LLANELLY.—Mr. Arthur W. Swindell gave an Organ Recital at All Saints' Church, on the 5th ult., before a large audience. The programme was well selected, and the playing of Mr. Swindell was highly appreciated, especially in Bach's Prelude and Fugue in B flat, and in an interesting improvisation towards the end of the Recital. Vocal solos were rendered with much effect by Mrs. Hugh Waddle, Miss Kate Williams, and Mr. Pritchard. Mendelssohn's Chorus "He watching over Israel" was carefully sung by the choir of the church.

MAIDENHEAD.—The second Concert of the season was given by the Philharmonic Society, at the Town Hall, on Tuesday evening, the 19th ult. The first part consisted of Mendelssohn's Lauda Sion, and the second of a miscellaneous selection. The principal vocalists were Madame Clara West, Miss Lottie West, Mr. Siggers, and Mr. D. Sutton Shenley: solo violoncello, Mr. W. C. Hann; solo pianoforte, Mr. J. G. Wrigley; Conductor, Mr. J. G. Wrigley, Mus. Bac., &c.

MONTROSE.—On Tuesday, the 5th ult., the Harmonic Union gave a Concert to the honorary members and friends in the Guildhall, which was crowded. The programme was well selected and, under the leadership of Mr. C. B. Taylor, was rendered with precision and taste. Miss Taylor presided at the pianoforte.

NEWHAM-ON-SEVERN.—A Concert was given on Thursday evening, the 14th ult., the artists being the Misses Mabel and Lottie Woods, Simmonds, King, Annie Morgan, Messrs. C. Smale, E. White, H. Morse, C. King, F. Simmonds, W. Morgan, and J. Morgan. The items most favourably received were two violin solos, well played by Miss Mabel Woods, and songs by Miss A. Morgan and Mr. W. Morgan. Miss Hulin and Miss W. H. Morgan assisted as accompanists.

OXFORD.—On Monday, the 18th ult., the Oxford University College Servants' Society held their annual Concert in the Town Hall, which was crowded. A number of ladies and gentlemen kindly gave their services. The Concert, which was under the direction of Dr. Roberts (Magdalen), who also presided at the pianoforte, was very successful, more than £40 being handed over to the Society.

PENICUIK.—On Saturday, the 9th ult., Mr. Mangelsdorff gave another of his popular Concerts in the Town Hall. The performances of a string band (the Masters Mangelsdorff) were amongst the principal attractions of the evening. The vocalists were Miss L. Weir and Miss E. Affeck, both of whom were well received.

POLRUAN, CORNWALL.—An organ was opened at the United Methodist Free Church on January 25, when Mr. Howlett, A. Mus., T.C.L., gave a Recital from the works of Beethoven, Wely, Rossini, Thomas, Mendelssohn, and Bach. Messrs. Kinsman, Smith, and Daley sang effectively Bennett's Quartet "God is a Spirit" and Novello's Anthem "Call to remembrance," Mr. Smith taking the solo.

RIPLEY.—On Tuesday evening, the 12th ult., a performance of Sansou was given in the Public Hall. The vocalists were Mrs. A. J. Sutton, Miss Talbot, and Mr. Dunkerton. The local orchestra was strengthened by several performers from Nottingham, including Mr. Hodgkinson, leader of the band, and Mr. A. Redgate, solo trumpeter. Mr. W. G. Taylor, Musical Director of the Union, conducted. Mrs. Sutton sang in an artistic manner, her rendering of "Let the bright Seraphim" being much applauded. Mr. Dunkerton, who made his first appearance in Ripley, was also well received. The choruses were sung with steadiness and precision.

RICHMOND, YORKSHIRE.—The members of the Choral Society gave their second Concert of the season at the Assembly Rooms, on the 5th ult. The solo vocalists were Miss E. Norton, Madame Evans-Warwick, Mr. Macdonald, and Mr. McCall. The band, under the leadership of Mr. Dawson, of Leeds, consisted of local amateurs. Mr. Woodthorpe Browne presided at the harmonium, and Mr. Jas. Callow, who merits great praise for the thorough manner in which the members had been trained, conducted. The choruses were rendered in excellent style. The Concert was a thorough success.

RUSHDEN.—On Wednesday, the 13th ult., Mr. J. E. Smith gave his ninth annual Concert in the New Hall, before a large and appreciative audience. The programme was well selected and admirably rendered. The vocalists were Miss Frances Hipwell (who was highly successful in all her songs), Mrs. Kingston, Mr. H. King, and Mr. Kingston. Madame Hélène de Lisle played well, and was encored in each of her violin solos. The pianoforte playing of Master A. Clarke evinced a proficiency seldom met with in one so young. Miss Woodward also contributed pianoforte solos with effect.

ST. ANDREWS, N.B.—A Soirée was given on Tuesday evening, January 29, in the Town Hall, by the Musical Association, in connection with the Martyrs' Free Church Bible Class, when the Cantata Nativity was performed, and a few secular pieces, under the conductorship of Mr. Sutherland, the Precentor. Considering the very short time the Cantata had been rehearsed, it was very fairly rendered.

ST. ASAPH.—A very successful performance of Dr. Stainer's Daughter of Jairus took place at a special service held in the Cathedral, on January 29, by the Choral Societies of St. Asaph, Abergele, Denbigh, and Ruthin, assisted by the Cathedral Choir numbering over 100 voices. The solo parts were most effectively rendered by Miss Minnie Jones, and Messrs. Partington and Powell, lay clerks. There was a crowded congregation. The work was ably rendered under the direction of Mr. F. C. Watkins, Conductor of the above Societies; and Mr. Mayrick Roberts presided at the organ with marked ability.

SHREWSBURY.—On Thursday, January 31, a special performance of The Messiah was given in the Music Hall by the members of the Harmonic Society. The solo vocalists were Miss Clara Samuelli, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. W. H. Brereton, all of whom were highly appreciated. The choruses were sung with great clearness and precision, and well merited the high encomiums which were freely given. The band was composed of picked members of the Birmingham Festival Society and other orchestras. The trumpet obbligato was played by Mr. Robinson. Mr. H. Byolin presided at the organ, and the performance was under the direction of Mr. Lea, the Honorary Conductor of the Society.

SUNBURY-ON-THAMES.—The members of the Choral Society gave their first Concert at the St. Saviour's Institute, on January 31, to a large and appreciative audience. The solo vocalists were Miss Florence Marshall, Miss Candler, Mr. E. G. Bishop, Mr. G. Pollexfen, and Mr. H. Buggs, all of whom were very efficient. Miss Princeps contributed two pianoforte solos, and Mr. D. Knott conducted with care and ability.

SWINDON.—An excellent Concert was given on Wednesday evening, the 6th ult., in the Corn Exchange, by the Members of the Harmonic Society. The principal artists were Miss A. Townsend, Mrs. Harrison Smith, Mr. Tudor Jones, and Mr. W. M. Ellenor. The choruses and glees were well sustained throughout. The accompanists were Mr. G. Whitehead and Miss Nelly Sykes. Mr. G. Whitehead conducted.

TIPTON.—On the 11th ult. a very successful performance of Haydn's Creation was given by the members of the Burnt Tree Choral Society, under the conductorship of Mr. Alexander Smith. The band and chorus numbered one hundred and twenty. The solo parts were well sung by Mr. and Mrs. Ford and Mr. W. H. Smith.

WATFORD.—An Organ Recital was given in St. Andrew's Church, on Monday evening, the 11th ult., by Dr. C. J. Frost, Organist of Christ Church, Newgate Street, E.C. The programme was well selected.

WELSHPOOL.—Mr. Harry Baines gave his annual Ballad Concert in the Assembly Room, on Thursday, January 26, under distinguished patronage. The artists were Miss Bessie Holt, R.A.M., Miss Howard Dutton, Mr. E. Kemp, and Mr. Fred Gordon (vocalists), and Miss Maud Pearce (violin), all of whom were highly appreciated. Mr. G. H. Bell played two pianoforte solos, and also acted as accompanist.

WEST HARTLEPOOL.—On Tuesday, the 5th ult., the choir of the Parish Church presented Mr. James Henry Lewis, their Organist, with a handsome marble timepiece, bearing the following inscription: "In kindly recognition of his talents, and as a token of love and respect on his leaving the town." The congregation of the church gave a pair of bronze equestrian statuettes, bearing the following inscription: "In recognition of his long and efficient services and untiring zeal in the furtherance of the art of music."

WITHAM.—The first Concert of the Literary Institution Choral Class was given at the Public Hall, on the 5th ult., under the conductorship of Mr. N. Howlett. The room was crowded by a large and appreciative audience. The vocalists were Miss M. J. Williams, R.A.M., Miss Garrett, Mr. F. Brown, and Mr. R. Barwell. The choir consisted of upwards of fifty voices. Miss Williams's songs were highly appreciated, several being redemanded. The band and chorus showed that great pains had been taken with them by Mr. Howlett, who is to be congratulated upon the success of the Concert.

WOLVERHAMPTON.—The third Concert for the present season of the Festival Choral Society, was given in the Agricultural Hall, on the 15th ult., before a large and appreciative audience. The artists were Miss Clements and Madame Patey, vocalists; Madame Norman Nêurda, solo violin; Mr. Charles Hallé, solo pianoforte; and M. Vieuxtemps, solo violoncello; accompanist, Mr. T. Roper, F.C.O.; Conductor, Dr. Swinnerton Heap. The part-songs were admirably given by the Choir, consisting of 250 voices.

WORCESTER.—Mr. Spark gave his third and last Concert of the season at the Public Hall on the 4th ult. The programme included instrumental and vocal music of the highest order, which was excellently rendered. The vocalists were Miss Clara Samuel, Miss Damian, Mr. Henry Guy, and Signor Foli. The instrumentalists, Mons. Hollman (violin-cello) and Signor Bisaccia (pianoforte), were received with the greatest favour.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. Horace Last, Organist and Choirmaster to All Saints' Church, Branksome Park, Bournemouth.—Mr. James Henry Lewis, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Stephen's, Tunbridge Wells.—Mr. B. Warren, Organist and Choirmaster to the Parish Church, Stoke-next-Guildford.—Mr. Warren Tear, to St. Mark's, Notting Hill.—Mr. S. Filmer Rook, Organist and Choirmaster to Trinity Presbyterian Church, Streatham Hill.

The third book contains compositions of greater difficulty, it is therefore more fully fingered and marked for the pedals. It is believed Organ Students will derive the greatest possible assistance by having their attention directed from the outset to a convenient method of dealing with each difficulty as it arises. The present book includes the Fugue in B major, on a subject from Corelli, a beautiful Prelude and Fugue in A major (most useful for obtaining command of the higher part of the Pedal-board), a Prelude and Fugue in C major, a Fantasia and Fugue in C minor, and the well-known short G minor Fugue. There is, as usual, in this Edition a Preface containing interesting particulars of the several works.

Miss Kilmansegg & her Golden Leg

GRAND OLD-FASHIONED CANTATA

BY CAROLINE HOLLAND

Words by THOMAS HOOD.
Price 3s.

"In the music Miss Holland has written to Hood's poem she shows herself to be possessed of real talent for dramatic writing, combined with a thoroughly English vein of melody. . . ."Full Mail Gazette.
"Miss Kilmansegg" is not only a very musical composition, but it is also full of those subtle touches of art which can 'raise or quell' the feelings of the listeners. . . . Is at times tender as well as comic, and never is wanting in the element of refinement."Morning Post.
"Miss Holland's music is extremely tuneful and pleasing, and it overflows with fun. Her setting of the more comic passages of Hood's poem is an example of admirable feeling. . . . The Cantata may be cordially recommended to small Choral Societies in search of light music."Athenaeum.
"Performed at Oswestry, October 30, by Mr. H. Leslie's Choir, with great success. Mr. Leslie said, at the close of the Concert, that he had had so many and such strong expressions of a desire for the repetition of 'Miss Kilmansegg' that he felt he must comply, and announced a repetition accordingly."Oswestry Advertiser.

Belfast.—Mr. H. COHEN, 7, Upper Crescent.

Agents are required in every Town. Apply to the Inventor and Patentee as below.

The Pedals and Patent Action supplied by the above well-known Inventor are giving a great impetus to the present generation of Organists and Students in the art of Pedalling, and, as it is well known that most, if not all, of our great Organ Players had the advantage of a Pianoforte with Pedals attached by the old and cumbersome roller-board system, it should be known that by this new invention the Pedals can be purchased and attached at a small cost with a Mahogany Action which is perfectly noiseless, and without any springs or intricate parts to get out of repair. Organ music can thus be enjoyed and practised without the usual trouble and expense of an Organ blower. This invention is quite different to any other Patent Action, and, being the most recent, it is as great an improvement over others as the Steam Engine is over the old Stage Coach.

Send to the Inventor, as below, for the Drawings and Prices to the Profession and Trade.

DR. F. E. GLADSTONE says:—

"I have much pleasure in stating my opinion that Mr. WM. CHINNOCK DYER's Patent Action for attaching Organ Pedals to a Pianoforte is likely to prove very valuable to Organists and Students of the Organ.

"It possesses several advantages over other actions which have come under my observation, and I shall have no hesitation in recommending the invention to my friends and pupils."

All is sent complete, with full printed "Directions for Attaching," and the Action, being placed under the keyboard of the instrument, is easily attached to any Pianoforte.

ADDRESS—WM. CHINNOCK DYER,

WESTON-SUPER-MARE.

To show the popularity gained by this invention, and the way it is making in the houses of organists and students, the last Patent Action sent out previous to March 1 was numbered 2,024; thus it will be seen that the turn-out for six months as above will give a total of over 4,000 per annum.

CAUTION.—This being the latest Patent Pedal Action, intending purchasers should note that it is the most perfect and reliable, as it contains every improvement; and being manufactured solely of well-seasoned mahogany, carefully bushed with red cloth, will continue to give the very best Pedal practice to Organists and Students.

Kindly read the testimonial above.

Before purchasing send to the Inventor for the drawings and prices of this the most recent Patent Pedal Action.

STORY OF MOZART'S REQUIEM.

Carefully compiled from the best and most authentic sources,

By WM. POLE, F.R.S., Mus. Doc.

This immortal work, independently of its value as a musical composition, has great interest on account of its very remarkable history. The mysterious commission given for it, the supernatural impression made by this on Mozart, his composition of the work under such pathetic circumstances, partly on his deathbed, the difficulties as to its publication, the fierce controversy as to its authorship, which for fourteen years engaged the attention of some of the most learned men and profound musicians of Europe, the extraordinary disappearance and long concealment of the manuscripts, their ultimate discovery, the difficult and perplexing questions as to their genuineness, the strange revelations gradually made as to the secret history of the various transactions, and the doubts which, after all possible information has been obtained, still hang over the authorship of some parts of the work; all these things, spread over seventy or eighty years, form a story of unparalleled interest in the annals of music.

The object of the present essay is to tell this story, which is hitherto but little known in England; and it will form, it is hoped, an appropriate companion to the various editions of the "Requiem" published by Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co.

Dr. Pole's little book is the result of much careful and painstaking investigation, the conclusions from which are given in the most logical and clear manner, and embody perhaps the most extraordinary story ever heard of in connection with a musical composition, and one which really has all the interest of a romance."—Edinburgh Review.

EXTRACT FROM THE PROSPECTUS OF THE SERIES:—

"The intention of 'Novello's Primers of Musical Biography' is to convey, as clearly as the limits of an elementary work will allow, a just idea of each composer's personality, and to record the principal events of his life. Knowledge of what a man is helps the understanding of what he does. These little books may serve, therefore, as a first step towards acquaintance with the genius and compositions of the masters to whom they are devoted."

PASSION SERVICE

FOR THE SEASON OF

LENT AND GOOD FRIDAY,

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL,

COMPOSER OF THE "HOLY CITY," &c.

MUSICAL STANDARD.

"On the evening of Good Friday, the congregation of St. Augustine's Church were invited to attend the first performance of their organist's new sacred work—a musical illustration of subjects connected with the 'Passion' of the Saviour. In this fresh musical product Mr. Gaul has the advantage of an open field, till very recently closed almost entirely to the Anglican Church composer; so that at the outset his work claims the merit of distinctiveness. The text of Mr. Gaul's work, varied and elaborate in structure, is the compilation of the Rev. J. C. Blissard, author at the same time of the original lyrical portions of the work. The course of sacred events connected with the Passion is laid out by the writer so as to form a series of six distinct 'scenes,' the literary construction of these being similar in plan throughout, but each preserving its own separate unity and point of narrative or dramatic interest. The subjects of these divisions, each occupied with a particular stage of the Mystery, are respectively: 'The Traitor at the table,' 'The Denial,' 'The Condemnation before Pilate,' 'The Mockery on Calvary,' 'The Shadow of Death,' and 'The Holy Sepulchre.' Each comprises a prophetic portion (the words selected from those passages of Holy Writ 'foreshadowing' the event), and preceded by a short choral, which is retained unaltered throughout the work; a narrative portion dealing with the especial event, and what may be termed the lyrical epode, a hymn embodying the subjective reflection on the preceding passage, and in which the whole congregation is supposed to take part. The author has executed the compilation and versification with commendable judgment and skill. As regards the composer's share in the work, it must be noted, in the first place, that whilst endeavouring to illustrate in the best manner possible the outward course of the events, the dramatic element, properly so called, has been carefully kept out of the work. Individual characterisation has been avoided by allotting the different solo musical passages without regard to any representative character. This arrangement has no doubt been prompted by judicious reasons, and there is much to be urged in its favour. Mr. Gaul has adopted the arioso style of musical setting for the solo portions of his work. In certain parts, as in the melodious solo 'Blessed are the departed,' the writing approaches the ordinary aria form, but in general the more declamatory style is preserved. There is no imitation of archaic forms in either melodies or harmony, and in the descriptive episodes the composer has not been tempted into theatrical exaggeration in order to secure dramatic effect. The style of the composition, in short, resembles generally that of Mr. Gaul's previous writings—the same effective, grateful part-writing, and the same expressive and melodious treatment of the solo voice. In those sections, notably that of the Unjust Condemnation, where the realistic element is predominant, the composer has manifested his ability to write with dramatic force and intensity as well as with lyric charm. In this respect the choral writing distinguished itself in comparison with that in the 'Holy City' and other of the composer's works. Among the items which impressed us most favourably was the chorus 'The fining-pot is for silver,' the beautiful choral passage 'Watch and pray,' the whole of the choral passages of the condemnation scene (the original treatment of this scene evades any comparison with the part of the Passion music of other writers); the contralto air 'Oh, hear ye this, all ye people'; the fine chorus 'Consider this,' the culminating point of the scene on Calvary; the trio for soprano, tenor, and bass 'Thou hidest Thy face, O Lord'; the quartet 'Hath God forgotten to be gracious'; the strikingly effective chorus 'God is not a man that He should lie'; the solo before mentioned, 'Blessed are the departed,' with its choral appendage (solo quartet); and last, but not least in merit, the fine setting of Adelaide Procter's lines, 'Why shouldst thou fear the beautiful angel Death,' full like the poem of a sweet, subdued, delicious calm. Mr. Gaul has not written new hymn tunes for Mr. Blissard's lyrics; the tunes selected for this occasion were from among those in ordinary congregational use. Altogether considered, Mr. Gaul's new work will undoubtedly greatly enhance his already high reputation in the line of sacred composition. An overflowing congregation testified to the great interest taken in the service. On Saturday evening the work was repeated, the attendance being almost equally large with that of the previous evening."

BIRMINGHAM DAILY MAIL.

"A second experience simply confirms the remark hazarded on the first presentation, viz., that the work is not only the most important Mr. Gaul has yet given to the world of art, but is one that, when familiar, must arrest attention."

Price, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; paper boards, 3s.; Scarlet cloth, 4s.

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"The work is an honour to English Art, and has elevated its composer into a place of distinction amongst native musicians."—Queen.

"A good sound musical work is this 'Holy City.' I have no hesitation in saying that it creditably represents English art, and does honour not only to the skill but to the judgment and taste of Mr. Gaul."—Daily Telegraph.

"The reception was favourable in the extreme, and the Cantata must henceforth be classed among the successes which the Birmingham Musical Festivals have brought to light."—Standard.

"The 'Holy City' is evidently the work of a thoughtful as well as a clever composer, and should make its mark among thoroughly English productions of a sacred character."—Musical Times.

"We hope and believe that the reception given last night to Mr. Gaul and to his 'Holy City' Cantata will prove an earnest of its popularity and acceptance throughout the length and breadth of the land."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"A most interesting, tuneful, and scholarly work."—Manchester Courier.

A Pretty Present for a Musical Friend.

MUSIC IN SONG, from CHAUCER to TENNYSON, being a Selection of Extracts descriptive of the power, influence, and effect of Music. Compiled by L. L. CARMELA KOELLE, with an introduction by Dr. JOHN STAINER. Beautifully printed in red and black upon Dutch hand-made paper, and bound in parchment. Price 3s. 6d.

"In its dainty got-up parchment cover and Dutch hand-made paper, it will form an acceptable little gift-book: while a short Introduction, modestly signed with the initials J. S. (Dr. John Stainer), will considerably enhance its intrinsic literary value. We must not, however, omit to notice the index (a most important and often neglected feature of any work) on which a laudable amount of care has evidently been expended, divided as it is into three parts, namely, a chronological as well as an alphabetical list of authors with a table of first lines."—Musical Times.

IMPORTANT to all TEACHERS of the PIANOFORTE.—The old method of teaching Music is now entirely superseded by a far more excellent method, which claims to be the only correct and reasonable method for teaching Pianoforte-playing. Mr. Felix Sommer, one of the most efficient music-masters in the neighbourhood of London, writes as follows concerning this NEW PIANOFORTE TUTOR. (For particulars see below.)

"Sutton Lane, Chiswick, October 30, 1883.

"Dear Herr Hoering,—I am very much obliged to you for your pamphlets and specimen copy of 'Tutor.' I have only had time to look rapidly through the latter, but I have seen sufficient to show me that it contains everything you claim for it; and I shall cordially recommend it as far as it may be in my power. It is conscientious, and thoroughly musicianlike, and I feel quite sure that it will be much appreciated by the majority of the musical profession."

Now ready.

BOOKS I. and II. of A. HOERING'S NEW METHOD FOR THE PIANOFORTE, on an entirely new principle:—

OPINIONS FROM PROFESSIONALS.

"I like it immensely."
 "An excellent method, and worthy of all teachers' notice."
 "I find your method excellent."
 "Infinitely superior to all I have tried before."
 "I think your system wonderfully good, and just the thing that was wanted."
 "Comparison only shows the merits of your system to greater advantage."

THE MUSICAL TIMES

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.

APRIL 1, 1884.

ANTON DVOŘÁK.

BY JOSEPH BENNETT.

THREE years ago I wrote two articles in this journal upon "The Music of Anton Dvorák" pointing out the originality of its spirit, the character of its themes and its structural features. The second of the notices finished thus: "In conclusion, has it not appeared from the rapid and superficial examination now ended that Dvorák is a well-ordered composer, though imaginative and bold. He is not one of those who ride Pegasus without a bridle, and allow the winged horse to fly whither he will in the realms of space. On the contrary, Dvorák, while not the slave of rule and method, submits to the laws of his art which have come down to him sanctified by the allegiance of all the great sons of music. To such men—progressive yet conservative—we must look, and for their long continuance and increasing we should hope and pray." These words, written in the semi-obscurity of 1881, may stand in the fuller light of 1884. Three years have added much to public knowledge of the Bohemian composer, but they have confirmed rather than changed the first impressions created by his music. Apart from the national characteristics more or less distinctive of all he does, amateurs see in him, with the clearness of conviction, the spirit of the time present, guided by the wisdom of the past, and they recognise in his works an exercise of the freedom which, though limited by traditions, gives ample room for individual development. Now that Wagner is dead, no more interesting figure than Dvorák remains for the contemplation of music-lovers, while the Bohemian's claims to attention rest upon a basis so different from those of the German as to stand quite apart. Some words about the man and his pretensions will not, at the moment, be thought inopportune.

Dvorák has passed through the best training which the professor of such an art as music can possibly have. A composer, if he be a composer indeed, speaks from his experience of life, and the more intense and varied that experience the more he has to tell us of a sort worth heeding. Fitting it is, no doubt, that there should be Mendelssohns in the ranks of our art—those on whose path the sun has never ceased to shine, and who reflect their own brightness and cheerfulness upon the page across which their pen travels. Yet even these favoured ones touch us most profoundly when, by some rare chance, they cry out of the depths. Witness the Quartet in E minor of him who was truly named Felix. Plunged in grief for the loss of his favourite sister, and with some presentiment, it may be, of his own approaching dissolution, Mendelssohn wrote a work which will ever endure as a recognised expression of poignant sorrow. But it is best for music when some divinely gifted singer, like Beethoven, or Schubert, or Schumann, lives a life of heavy burdens, sore discouragements, and weary trials. This is the true school for one who has to speak from heart to heart, and, from the fulness of his own experience, to touch the chords of feeling in others. And this is the adversity which, "like the toad, ugly and venomous, wears yet a precious jewel in its head." Through such a school Dvorák has passed, so long looking into the face of adversity that few know its lineaments better than he.

What reasonable prospect of musical eminence had this son of a struggling Bohemian innkeeper? There seemed to be nothing before him but the life of a rustic fiddler, who plays for the amusement of dancing peasants. He discharged this lowly function as a necessary part of business, for the Bohemians of the humbler orders is given to energetic terpsichorean exercises. Every Sunday afternoon, "in the season of the year," as the old poaching song has it, the Czechish youths and maidens resort to the dance; mostly favouring the national forms of that art, though the progress of what we call culture is, in Bohemia as elsewhere, reducing manners and customs of every kind to the dead level of a European uniformity. Young Dvorák helped his father to supply music for the frequenters of the village inn, and thus spent impressionable years in close association with much that was distinctive of his people. The influence of these early surroundings may be traced on the pages of nearly every work he has written. When he approached serious artistic labour he did so steeped to the lips in folk-music. He had lived his life upon the wild yet strangely fascinating dance forms represented, in a glorified way, by the "Furiant" of his symphony, and upon characteristic popular melodies, such as those that charm in his Moravian and Gipsy songs. A Bohemian musician he was, and a Bohemian musician he remains, chiefly as the result of strong devotion to his country, and love for whatever is an element in her distinctive life. Composers are rarely men of this stamp. They early learn the advantages of cosmopolitanism, and hasten to speak the conventional language of civilisation, thus losing touch of the people to which they belong, and deriving no benefit from the vitality and power of popular art. Circumstances prevented Dvorák from making such a mistake; to the aid of circumstances came patriotic feeling, and now we recognise him as speaking with the freshness and force of those who draw their inspiration directly from nature. In this there is true cause for congratulation. All art needs to obtain strength by contact with the source whence its vigorous, original elements come, and, perhaps, the art of music most of all, because it is most easily weakened and conventionalised in the process of culture. Not only so, but its origin is essentially popular; while, owing to intimate connection with human feeling as acted upon by the diverse conditions of life, its manifestations are wonderfully varied. When, therefore, a composer emerges from the mass of a people endowed largely with an individual musical expression, intelligent men recognise a "God-send," bringing not only force and fancy, but new resources and fresh forms of utterance. It would be a serious thing for music were such recruits not forthcoming from time to time. The art, like some florists' flowers, would suffer from an excess of culture, and, losing its natural charm, descend to the level of a curiosity. Do we not see this very process going on in Germany at the present day? May we not recognise its outcome in the exaggerated and sensational developments which are taking the place of classic beauty and grace? It was only in the decadence of Greek art that sculptors began to tint their statues and degrade the ideal into a semblance of realism. Having all these things before me, I cannot but rejoice over the appearance in the musical arena of new and, comparatively speaking, virgin nationalities. There is hope in them. They are like the untouched soil of the prairies; sometimes a little rough and rank, but needing only to be "tickled with a hoe" in order to "laugh with a harvest." Especially does hope attend the advent of the great Sclavonic race—one which nobody can accuse of being played out either in politics, literature, or art. A people of deep sentiment and keen feeling, with an individual way of looking at life, and inheriting musical traditions of a definite and distinctive character, they seem to be the possessors of the future.

When Dvorák, emerging from his lowly village life, went to Prague to pick up what he could of musical education, circumstances were still kindly adverse. In other words, he had, for the most part, to educate himself, and this he did by studying the scores of the great German masters in order to wrest from them the secret of their technical excellence and perfection of form. His works show with what assiduity this labour was carried on; also, how successfully he managed to keep alive his own spirit while pondering the "letter" of others. If Dvorák occasionally suggests to us Beethoven, it is only by some resemblance of structure or detail of form. The inner life of his music remains quite distinct, not to be confounded with anything else. We owe this, perhaps, to an isolation which left him to follow his natural bent undisturbed. Poor and unfriended, he dwelt alone, poring over his scores in the intervals of musical drudgery so scantily remunerated that it is a marvel how he kept body and soul together. This was hard training, but, we repeat, it was healthy. "Every man," says an ingenious writer, "has two educations—that which is given to him and that which he gives himself. Of the two kinds the latter is by far the most valuable. Indeed, all that is most worthy in a man he must work out and conquer for himself. It is this that constitutes our real and best nourishment. What we are merely taught, seldom nourishes the mind like that which we teach ourselves." All experience and observation of life go to prove this, and we need not, therefore, pity the years of Dvorák's poverty and hardships. They disciplined him; they drove him back upon himself with a lesson of self-reliance, and a mission to find in his own resources the materials with which to build up a distinguished life. Many men would have despaired, given up the struggle, and never redeemed their names from obscurity. But such men are they in whom the unquenchable spirit of genius does not dwell. Like Schubert under similar conditions, Dvorák was bound to live out his musical life. An essential and absolute dependence upon circumstances could never shape itself into an idea in the mind of either of these composers. Their way was dark, and their career, to all seeming, without prospect, but they had no thought of sitting down and waiting for light. They worked on, guided by the sure instinct that sees farther than the eye of sense, and better than the vision of imagination.

During this disciplinary period of Dvorák's career he composed music incessantly. There was not the smallest hope of hearing his works performed. At first so great was his poverty that he could not even furnish his lodging with a pianoforte; so complete his isolation that nothing but the humblest musical tasks afforded him the means of earning a scanty living. Thus the composer existed, with no more than slow change for the better till 1878, when, driven to seek a grant from funds devoted to the help of poor artists, his music came as a revelation to Ambros, Herbeck, and Brahms, and, through them, to an astonished public. It may be that Dvorák is himself partly responsible for the hard fate which pursued him till he had reached middle life. Had he been merely a musician, with no thought or feeling outside his art, he would probably have drifted away into some German town and been absorbed into the huge mass of Teutonic musicianship. But, sprung from the Bohemian people, brought up amongst them, and remaining of them heart and soul, he acted the part of a good Czech, stayed at home and joined in the struggle of Slav against German always raging in Prague, and destined, sooner or later, to wrap Eastern Europe in flames. "The march of empire is for ever westward." So it assuredly has been from the beginning of history, and there are no evidences of cessation. At all points along the line where Slav and Teuton meet there is friction, but who can wonder if the Bohemians, in the very capital of their country, chafe under the supremacy of the rival race. Even Austrian Germans, with the politeness to which their northern confrères are strangers, cannot conciliate the offended Czechs. To be a good Czech is to be a good hater of the Germans. Dvorák is a good Czech. This fact explains much that would otherwise be obscure. In presence of it we cease to wonder that the master was first known through the medium of national music—through Sclavonian rhapsodies, dances, songs, and operettas written in the native tongue for a Bohemian theatre. The musical public are, of course, concerned with this only so far as it confirmed the national tendencies of Dvorák's art, and kept him from falling into the stream of German music-making. It is certain, however, that he had a narrow escape. At one time even our ardent Czech caught the infection arising from the most aggressive and characteristic development of Teutonic art. That is to say, he was almost persuaded to adopt the faith and practice of Wagnerism. There can be no question about this curious fact. I have it out of his own mouth. Happily Dvorák paused in time, as was to be expected from the rude and vigorous nature of his training. Apropos, let me quote here some remarkably pregnant observations of Goethe, upon which I casually lighted the other day: "It is our ambiguous, dissipating education," says the Sage of Weimar, "that makes men uncertain; it awakens wishes when it should be animating tendencies; instead of forwarding our real capacities, it turns our efforts towards objects which are frequently discordant with the mind that aims at them. I augur better of a child, a youth who is wandering astray in a path of his own, than of many who are walking aright upon paths which are not theirs. If the former, either by themselves or by the guidance of others, ever find the right path which suits their nature, they will never leave it; while the latter are in danger every moment of shaking off a foreign yoke and abandoning themselves to unrestricted license." The application of these keenly discriminative words to the case of Dvorák is not difficult. He certainly had no "ambiguous, dissipating education," but one which, guided by natural promptings, animated his tendencies and forwarded his real capacities. Hence, though he felt the temptation of Wagnerism, he passed the ordeal unharmed. Had he been trained according to "the schools," the chances are that he would have succumbed and perished, as all those perished whom Klingsor's "garden of girls" seduced.

Looking at the characteristics of Dvorák's music, one is struck by the prevalence of those which are more or less of a national cast. This remark holds good even when we take from the field of view all compositions avowedly national. In point of fact, works quite free from the Slav tinge are a very small minority in Dvorák's list. A little further on I shall have occasion to show this more fully; meanwhile, let me state with explicitness what I conceive to be the leading features of the Bohemian musician's method and style. These are, first, an abundant flow of fresh and characteristic tune; second, remarkable facility in varying and developing motives; third, an almost excessive freedom in the employment of modulations and transitions without reference to key relationship; fourth, a luxuriant fancy, for the manifestation of which novel and striking rhythmic devices are largely employed; fifth, picturesque use of orchestral colour; sixth, strong contrast of moods. These, I think, cover well-nigh all the ground over which the student of Dvorák needs to extend his investigations. Let me remark upon each, more by way of suggesting matter for thought, than for the purpose of exhaustive handling.

I. The "abundant flow of fresh and characteristic tune" I take to be a fact which no one will question. In what consists its freshness and characterisation? Precisely in the national tinge to which reference has before been made. The spirit of the composer is thoroughly possessed by the genius of his people's art. He thinks its thoughts, and employs its accents; not always avowedly, of course, but ever so as to betray the origin of his thematic ideas, or, at any rate, the special nature of the channel through which they run. It is this which gives to Dvorák's melodies their peculiar piquancy and freshness of flavour. We recognise a departure from the conventional utterance of musical society, and, at a time when the world is fast becoming monotonous, the sensation is not only novel but agreeable. Here I touch the broad question of Slavonic melody, but have no time to enter upon it. The reader, if he be tempted to follow up the matter, can easily do this for himself by studying Wenzig's "Slawische Volkslieder, übersetzt" (Halle, 1830) — a little work full of information on this most interesting theme.

II. "Remarkable facility in varying and developing motives." This feature is remarkable in very truth, and for examples of it the reader may turn to the "Stabat Mater," nearly every movement of which is constructed out of a few bars of tune. Or he may refer to the illustrations given in my two articles on "The Music of Anton Dvorák"—vide THE MUSICAL TIMES for 1881, pages 165, 236. It there appears how the composer—thematically the most economical of musicians—takes his melodies to pieces and uses up every fragment, making each the germ of fresh details. Here, again, the early training of Dvorák has stood him in good stead. "What!" it may be asked, "does national music include the careful development of themes?" Most certainly it does, and I fortify myself by the evidence of the late Carl Engel, who says (vide "Introduction to the Study of National Music," page 105), "My object is to draw attention to the noticeable fact that the prevalence and development of a certain motive is just what we continually meet with in national music. Only its treatment here, as might be expected, is far less complicated than in the elaborate compositions of our great masters. In dance tunes an entire period is sometimes constructed from one or two motives only. Evidences in proof of the above observation will offer themselves continually to the student in analysing national tunes. It would, therefore, appear that the usual device of developing the motives derived from the theme in an elaborate composition is by no means so arbitrary and artificial a contrivance as some of our present composers maintain it to be, if we may judge from the disregard shown to it in their productions; but that it emanates from a natural and healthy taste for what is beautiful in art." I may add to the foregoing that the national music of the peoples of Eastern Europe is just that in which a fondness for varied treatment of motives most shows itself.

III. "Almost excessive freedom in modulation and transition, without reference to key relationship." "Down with the tyranny of the tone-families!" exclaimed Wagner, the revolutionist. Dvorák never echoed the cry, because he never experienced the provocation. He was, to this extent, cradled in the lap of liberty, and his fashion of roaming at will among the tonalities simply means the exercise of a privilege to which he was born. It must be granted that he avails himself of his privilege to the full, and the official analysts of his music never weary in showing us how he goes from key to key on a course apparently as erratic as that of a butterfly among flowers. The pages of his scores look like a study in "accidentals." Of this, however, the performers are much more conscious than the hearers. I do not deny that Dvorák might restrain his tendency to abrupt key changes with advantage to the classicality of his works. Yet, somehow, this feature appears to harmonise with the general character of the music, and does not become offensive even where most pronounced.

IV. "Vigorous fancy, for the expression of which large use is made of rhythmical changes." Here we have a very striking feature in the Bohemian master's music. The strongest impression made, perhaps, is that of an almost exuberant imagination carrying the composer along in a manner the most spontaneous. Listening to Dvorák, we never feel that he has been casting about for ideas, or hesitating what to say next. The notion is, rather, that he suffers from an embarrassment of riches. This may explain the rapidity with which he works. I have his own authority for stating that the "Stabat Mater," written ten years ago, was begun and finished, even to scoring, within six weeks—a feat, in its way, quite as remarkable as Handel's composition of the "Messiah"—while the Symphony in D was completed in three weeks. These facts confirm what the character of Dvorák's music indicates—a free flow of ideas under the stimulus of an ardent and lively imagination. In the matter of technical expression, the master is largely helped by a prominent characteristic of national music in Eastern Europe—varied and mixed rhythms. He plays with these as though he loved them, and he can do with them what he likes. Let the reader take up any movement from his pen and observe what an extraordinary resource he has in rhythmic variations, and how he handles them as "to the manner born"—which, indeed, he was.

V. "Picturesque Orchestration." The orchestra is never monotonous with Dvorák, who seems to have a natural facility for making it glow with bright and changeful colour. This could only have come from careful and intelligent study of the best models. Berlioz himself might envy the Bohemian the delightful touches—a soft clash of the cymbals, a faint note from the triangle, a single pizzicato chord from the strings—with which he conveys to his audience a sense of beauty and a consciousness of charm.

VI. "Variety of Mood." No national "property" affords a better index to the nature of a people than their music; and if Slavonic music indicate one thing more than another, it is the sensitiveness from which spring changes of mood. Dvorák's compositions show an almost childlike play of feeling, as though the master's nature answered, like an Æolian harp, to every breath passing over its chords. Herein lies the humanness of it, as distinct from the artificiality of a mere music-maker.

I have now indicated what seem to me the features most worthy of the studious reader's attention, and there only remains to emphasise the fact that Dvorák, albeit delighting in the unrestrained liberty of a rhapsody, finds observance of classic form quite compatible with the expression of all that in him is individual and characteristic. The thing is significant and I need not point its moral.

Dvorák's success in England affords matter for much congratulation. We have from him that which is new and not mischievous, that which is a legitimate development from, and variation upon, true art models, and that which is founded, not upon an elaborately devised theory, but upon the natural expression of a people's musical nature. The more of Dvorák the better, therefore, and the indications are that a good deal of him awaits us. He has undertaken to produce a Patriotic Hymn at the Worcester Festival, next September; an important secular Cantata at the Birmingham Festival of next year; and an Oratorio at the Leeds Festival of 1886.

LUDWIG SPOHR.

BORN, APRIL 5, 1784.

BEFORE the present month expires the musical world will celebrate the centenary of Spohr's birth, and the fact invites a few words in justice to a composer who, living, filled a large space in music, and, "being dead, yet speaketh." Those who remember Spohr as in the flesh no longer ago than 1859, and who saw him conducting the New Philharmonic Concerts in 1853, may be surprised to hear talk of a centenary. But figures, especially when they convey facts, are stubborn things, and, on the 5th inst., a hundred years will have passed since the musician of "The Last Judgment" came to life in his grandfather's house at Brunswick. This is no place for a biography of the master, especially as little time has elapsed since a series of articles upon his career appeared in our columns. We may, however, fittingly dwell for a while on Spohr's artistic position, past and present.

The generation now living has, it is to be feared, no more than a hazy idea about the position occupied by Spohr's music in this country during many years of his life. Even Mr. Haweis, who writes books on music, talks in his latest work ("My Musical Life") of the "tardy recognition" of Spohr helping to lower Mendelssohn in public esteem. Nothing could be more inexact, for the truth is precisely the reverse. It was the recognition of Mendelssohn which aided in dethroning Spohr. We say dethroning advisedly, since the Cassel master reigned for years as a musical king, especially in the region of Oratorio. Mr. Haweis speaks of a "Mendelssohn mania." There was a Spohr mania before it; beginning with the master's first visit to this country in 1820, and continuing till the dazzling splendour of the younger composer's genius made all other luminaries dark by comparison. The works produced here by Spohr, in 1820, were admirably representative of his peculiar genius, as all must admit who know the Dramatic Concerto (played by himself), the Symphony in D minor, which he composed in this country, and the Nonetto for strings. His second visit, in 1839, gave us the Oratorio "Calvary"; on a third occasion (1842), he conducted a performance of the "Fall of Babylon," and saw almost an entire Philharmonic programme occupied by his orchestral music. In 1847 he came to England for the fourth time, and conducted his "Last Judgment," "Lord's Prayer," and Milton's Eighty-fourth Psalm, in Exeter Hall. In 1852 he brought out his "Faust" at Covent Garden Theatre, and a year later introduced, at a New Philharmonic Concert, his Symphony for two orchestras. These facts indicate the great favour with which Spohr's music was received in our country. The composer is less esteemed now, but no one will be at a loss to comprehend the reasons of his supremacy forty years ago. He came to us speaking a new and attractive dialect. Men were fascinated by the tender and delicate beauty of his melodies, and by the richness of his harmony, both qualities being connected with a careful observance of accepted forms. They saw the old musical models in a new and charming dress, and they had not then been allowed time to discover that Spohr's talent, however fascinating, was limited in scope, and that his methods were so uniform as to be mannerisms. These things were discovered later.

When even a fair reaction begins in musical matters it is apt to become unjust, and for many years Spohr remained as unduly abased as, perhaps, he was, in the first instance, unduly exalted. The great catalogue of his works, numbering more than 150 compositions, was put on the shelf when Mendelssohn came. Of his symphonies we heard only "The Power of Sound," of his oratorios only "The Last Judgment;" of his concertos, the Adagio (No. 9), and the "Dramatic," introduced as the battle-horse of aspiring violinists; of his cantatas, only "God, Thou art great"; of his songs, only "Rose, softly blooming." Granted that these were each representative, the representation was clearly not enough for justice to a prolific and highly gifted master. There are some present signs that the force of reaction has spent itself, and that the pendulum is swinging forward again—a fact it is pleasant to record in view of the approaching anniversary. True, we may never hope to see this master on his old and exalted pedestal, but the patient, inexorable justice of events will give him a rightful place, and that is undeniably one higher and more conspicuous than any he has filled of late years. His luscious music—which, indeed, suffers because of beauty in measure so abundant as to be cloying—may please more and more as a relief from the excitement, noise, and cacophony that distinguish the school of "sturm und drang." In any case it can do nothing but good, "exhibited" in the moderate quantities which prudence suggests, having regard to its decided mannerisms.

When these words are read, one of Spohr's most important compositions will have been performed for the first time in England. We refer, of course, to the Mass in C, for five solo voices and double chorus, introduced by Henry Leslie's Choir on the 27th ult., and now published by Messrs. Novello and Co. The character of this work will be discussed in its proper place, but we may here express a hope that its beauty and masterfulness will direct attention to other religious compositions from the same pen. Spohr wrote only one Mass, but in his catalogue we find a setting of the Psalm 128, one of Milton's Psalm 84 (performed in Exeter Hall thirty years ago, as already stated), and one of Psalm 24. Surely also the "Calvary" is worth attention; especially as objections once successfully raised against its performance would not now have much weight. The Germans, we hear, are preparing to celebrate the Spohr centenary in a fitting spirit and manner. With us there will be no festivities, save, indeed, at the German Athenæum, where a musical entertainment will be given, having as its chief feature one of Spohr's double quartets, the first violin in which will be played by Herr Joachim. As regards purely English recognition of the master, the performance of his Mass and the results likely to flow therefrom cannot fail to be practically valuable. Nor should it be forgotten that an English firm (Messrs. Novello and Co.) was the first to publish the full scores of "Calvary" and the "Last Judgment" in any country.

By EBENEZER PROUT.

IN my previous papers I have dealt exclusively with Handel's compositions for the stage; and my readers will have noticed the great difference which exists as to the orchestration between some of the operas and others. Similar differences will be found in the oratorios and other choral works now to be spoken of; and it is as impossible to give reasons for the variety in the one case as in the other. There must surely have been some special cause why, for example, "Saul" and "Israel in Egypt" abound in effects of instrumental colouring, while the oratorio which comes next in order, the "Messiah," is in this respect among the least interesting of the series. It is impossible at this distance of time to tell why this should be, but the fact remains, and it is curious enough to be worth noting.

In order not to go twice over the same ground, and to trace as far as possible the gradual development, if it may be so considered, of Handel's orchestration, I propose to take the whole of the remaining vocal works, sacred and secular, as far as possible in chronological order, concluding my articles with a few remarks on Handel's instrumental compositions. I have just spoken of the "gradual development, if it may be so considered, of Handel's orchestra." I inserted the qualifying clause because, though Handel in his later works often writes for a larger orchestra than he employs in his earlier years, yet, as regards colour and contrast of tone, some of his first compositions are fully as remarkable as any which he wrote in the period of his maturity.

The first choral work of Handel was the small "Passion according to St. John" (1704), the instrumentation of which contains nothing requiring notice, excepting the earliest employment by the composer of one of his favourite effects (p. 16 of the score)—two flutes in octaves with the violins, the latter instruments being here doubled by the oboes in unison. In the collection of Latin Church Music (Part 38 of the German Handel Society's Edition), most of which was written at Rome about 1707, we find in the "Salve Regina" one of the few examples in the composer's works of a song with a florid organ obbligato. The organ part is mostly in semiquaver passages, sometimes alternating with and sometimes accompanying the strings. The concluding movement of the same work shows the organ used in chords.

Handel's only two Italian oratorios, "La Resurrezione" and "Il Trionfo del Tempo ed el Disinganno," both composed at Rome in 1708, are remarkable, especially the former, for the variety of their orchestral effects. In "La Resurrezione" we find at p. 6 a song, "Disserratevi, oh porte d'averno," with a rich accompaniment for strings, two oboes, and two trumpets; while the very next number has six-part harmony for strings, the violins being divided into four. Both these pieces were introduced, with some modifications, nearly forty years later, into "Alexander Balus." On p. 17 we meet with a recitative, accompanied only by two flutes and a viola da gamba; the lowest line is marked "senza continuo"; but the bass is figured throughout, proving that the viola da gamba had to play the harmony, as the violoncello frequently does now-a-days, in the accompaniment of recitatives. The song which follows is scored for two flutes, "violini sordi"—an expression also found as "sordi" in "Agrippina," which is evidently equivalent to "con sordini"—a viola da gamba, and basses, mostly without harpsichord. In the first half of the song, the viola da gamba part is written out on two staves, with frequent "double-stopping," the second half is accompanied, like the recitative, with the flutes and a figured gamba part only. The song "Naufragando vâ per l'onde" (p. 33) adds one more to the numerous proofs already adduced of the large number of oboes used in the orchestra. The opening symphony commences with two oboes in thirds, marked "solo"; and at the third bar we have the indication "tutti oboi," the "soli" and "tutti" in the oboe parts alternating throughout the number. There must evidently have been at least two oboes to each part. In the second part of the same song we find the voice accompanied by "archiliuto solo." Only an unfigured bass is marked; but it is probable that the harmony was played on the instrument. At p. 36 is a song curiously accompanied by a trio consisting of flute, viola da gamba, and teorba, while the whole of the violins and basses in octaves have from time to time passages of descending scales. It is impossible for the imagination to realise fully the effect of these combinations of instruments, some of which are now obsolete; but we can see from this score how early in his career Handel occupied himself with the invention of striking orchestral contrasts. One more curiosity of orchestration remains to be noticed in this work. The song "Per me già di morire" (p. 53) has in the accompaniment, besides the strings and harpsichord, a solo violin, a solo viola da gamba, and a part for "tutti flauti e un oboe sordo"—all the flutes and one muted oboe in unison—a curious combination of tone, which I have not found in any other of Handel's scores. "Il Trionfo del Tempo" contains less on which it is necessary to dwell. In this score we frequently find solo passages for the violin, and much prominence is also given to the oboe. The most remarkable numbers, as regards instrumentation, are the Sonata (p. 33) and the following song (p. 39), both with organ obbligato. In the former we find some curious passages of semiquavers for solo violin and organ, and solo violoncello and organ, in thirds. The organ part is mostly written out in full; but in the second part of the song there is a passage where only the bass of the organ part is given, while the right hand part has the indication "arpeggiando per tutti"—the exact form of arpeggio being left to the player.

The works which come next under notice—the Te Deum and Jubilate written for the Peace of Utrecht in 1713—have but few points requiring mention. The double chorus "Day by day" furnishes an early example of the antiphonal effects in which Handel delighted; the first choir being accompanied by the whole mass of oboes and bassoons, and the second by the strings and trumpets. The opening symphony of this chorus is one of those florid duets for two trumpets to which the composer was partial, and of which that to be found in the well known "To thee, Cherubin," in the Dettingen Te Deum, is perhaps the most familiar example. The commencement of the "Jubilate" also contains several florid passages for the trumpet.

I pass over the "Passion of Christ" (1717), because most of it was used later (in "Esther" and "Deborah"), and the points I had noted will be dealt with in speaking of those works; and next come to the series of anthems written for the Duke of Chandos, between 1718 and 1720, and generally known as the "Chandos Anthems." Here we see Handel at work on a new field. All these compositions are for a small orchestra—generally two violins, no violas, violoncello, contrabasso, one oboe, one bassoon, and organ; two of them contain parts for two flutes; and in the Te Deum written for the Duke of Chandos we find in one movement a trumpet. But for the most part Handel in these works relies rather on choral than on orchestral effects. As these anthems were intended for church use, the organ was employed in the solos, instead of the harpsichord, which, as will be seen later, Handel mostly used in his oratorios to fill up the harmony. In the opening chorus of the anthem "As pants the hart" we find a somewhat rare example of the violoncellos and double-basses having separate parts. Handel's orchestra, as I have said, had no violas; he wants four-part harmony from the strings; he therefore gives the third part to the violoncellos, and reinforces the double-bass, which has the lowest part, by the bassoon in the eight-foot octave—an anticipation of a common effect in modern scores. The opening of the song "Tears are my daily food," in the same anthem, gives us an expressive duet for oboe and bassoon, accompanied by the organ only. In the duet "The heavens are thine," from the anthem "My song shall be always," a new combination will be found. Here there is a three-part harmony; the upper part is for all the violins in unison, the middle for violoncello and bassoon in unison, and the lowest for the double-bass and the organ, the latter, of course, giving the eight-foot octave. A somewhat similar effect is found in the anthem "Let God arise." The song "Like as the smoke" has the same accompaniment just described, with the addition of an oboe solo as a fourth part to the harmony. Excepting for a few bars the violoncello and bassoon are independent of the double-bass and organ throughout the whole piece.

Like the Chandos Anthems, "Acis and Galatea" is written for a small orchestra, there being no violas, and oboes and flutes being the only wind instruments employed. It is probable that a bassoon doubled the bass part, though (as in many other of Handel's scores) this is not expressly indicated. The well-known overture is interesting from the fact that in the greater part of it we have entirely independent parts for two oboes, which with the violins and basses make four-part harmony, the violins and oboes crossing one another continually. In the opening symphony of "O the pleasures of the plains" we see an anticipation of one of Mozart's favourite effects—the doubling of the violins by the oboes in the octave above. In the score of "Hush, ye pretty warbling choir," we find the piccolo, which we have already met with in "Rinaldo," "Ricardo," and "Alcina." The present is the proper place to enter a protest against the senseless custom of using the piccolo in "O, ruddier than the cherry." The flute is expressly marked in the score; and Handel would hardly have been so foolish, after Polyphemus has sung—

Bring me a hundred reeds of decent growth,
To make a pipe for my capacious mouth, as to represent the "pipe for my capacious mouth" by the tiniest instrument in the orchestra. It is simply nonsense; it ruins the effect Handel intended, and is, I suppose, one of the many blessings for which we have to thank unconscientious conductors.

"Esther," Handel's first English oratorio, is also the most important of the works written for the Duke of Chandos. It was remodelled twelve years later for public performance, and both versions of the score are published in the German Handel Society's edition. Of the first performance of the work, hardly anything is known. It is evident, however, from the score that special musical resources were brought to Cannons for the occasion, as we find in the air "Jehovah, crowned with glory," and in the chorus "He comes to end our woes," parts for horns, which instruments are used nowhere else in the music written for the Duke of Chandos. We further find in the soprano air "Praise the Lord with cheerful noise" a harp—one of the few examples in the oratorios of the employment of this instrument. A symphony for the harp is found in Arnold's edition of the score of "Saul"; but this was added by the publishers, and, according to Dr. Chrysander, was not written by Handel at all. The song now under notice is very curiously accompanied. Besides the harp there are violins (mostly in unison) con sordini, and violas and violoncellos in unison without double-basses. The cembalo was doubtless also used; because where this is not the case Handel indicates its non-employment. Of this we have an example in the same oratorio. The song "Tune your harps" is accompanied by an oboe solo, first and second violins and basses, all of which are pizzicato throughout; while the bass line is expressly marked "senza cembalo." One more point must be noted in this volume—the delicious and quite modern use in the song "O beauteous queen" of two bassoons in thirds doubling the violins in the lower octave.

Though somewhat out of its regular order, it will be more convenient to take the later version of "Esther"—that of 1732—next. Here we not only find several numbers of the first version, but a large proportion of absolutely new matter. Handel had gained twelve years' experience; he had also written the Coronation Anthems, in which he had to combine a large orchestra with the choral masses. We find consequently the scoring of this second version of "Esther" much fuller than that of the first. The difference is particularly noticeable in the final chorus, "The Lord our enemy hath slain." In the first setting the only wind instruments used were one oboe and one trumpet; but the second version contains two oboes and bassoons, three trumpets and drums. But the most remarkable piece of scoring in the oratorio, and one of the most striking in all Handel's works, is to be found in the first solo, "Breathe soft, ye winds." In the opening symphony of the song the orchestra is treated antiphonally; a group of wind instruments, consisting of two flutes, two oboes, and two bassoons, and supported by the violoncellos, double-basses, and organ, is answered by the violins divided into five parts, the violas, the cembalo, teorba, and harp. Such a passage as this proves that Handel's frequently thin orchestration was the result of system. Modern composers often lavish their resources, and use every instrument in nearly all the numbers of their scores. Handel worked on a different plan, and reserved his masses of tone for special effects.

Of Handel's use and non-use of the organ in the accompaniment of his solos, I shall have to speak in some detail when I come to examine the score of "Saul"; but there are two numbers in the second version of "Esther" which bear so strongly on this that they should be referred to here. Haman's song, "How art thou fallen," is marked on the bass line "Organo, tasto solo"—i.e., the bass of the organ without chords strengthens the violoncellos and double-basses. The following piece—the duet "I'll proclaim the wondrous story"—is expressly marked "senza organo"; but on the entry of the first voice we find "Cembalo I. con li Bassi"; when the second voice enters we see "Cembalo II. con li Bassi"; and in the ensemble "Cembalo I. II. con li Bassi." Obviously, the two harpsichords were used to fill up the harmonies, as the voices are accompanied by the instruments in unison throughout. Another proof of the method adopted by Handel is found on the very next page of the score, at the commencement of the final chorus. After the first phrase, tutti, a florid soprano solo commences, accompanied only by a figured bass. Here Handel has written "Cemb. col Basso"—not "Organo col Basso"; and the figures prove that the harpsichord had to fill up the chords. Only those who are either incompetent to form a judgment on the subject or determined to abide by their own preconceived notions can maintain, in the face of the evidence furnished by the new edition of Handel, that the composer habitually used the organ, and not the harpsichord, to fill up the harmony of the songs in his oratorios.

The short Te Deum in A, which Arnold states to have been composed for the Duke of Chandos, but which, according to Dr. Chrysander was really written for the Chapel Royal, is interesting from the prevalence of passages of duet for oboe and bassoon; but it contains one number requiring special notice. This is the song for alto, "When Thou tookest upon Thee," accompanied by strings, one flute, and one bassoon. The curious point is that Handel uses the two wind instruments to accompany the voice in precisely the same manner in which Mozart employed them when sixty years later he wrote the additional accompaniments to the "Messiah." In "How beautiful are the feet," Mozart's flute and bassoon parts are quite similar in character to those which Handel has written here.

The Coronation Anthems (1727) need not detain us. It is only necessary to remark that in these works Handel had for the first time the opportunity of employing a large orchestra in combination with his chorus. In "Zadok the priest," for example, the score contains parts for two oboes, two bassoons, three trumpets, drums, three violins, viola, violoncello, double-bass, and organ. The other anthems, excepting "Let thine hand be strengthened," which has no brass or drums, are similarly scored.

"Deborah" (1733) is one of the most interesting and suggestive of all Handel's scores; it would, indeed, be easy to write an entire article on this volume alone. It was the first oratorio written with a view to public performance, though (as already mentioned) Handel had remodelled "Esther" with the same object. In "Deborah" we find a fuller orchestra than we have yet met with. In the second movement of the overture we see harmony in eight real parts—for two violins, two violas, basses, two oboes, and bassoons, the wind instruments not, as is so often the case, doubling the strings, but having independent parts filling up the harmony. The work, moreover, furnishes more than one positive proof as to the large number of oboes and bassoons used in Handel's orchestra. On p. 3 we find the two oboe parts marked first soli and then tutti. In the song "Choirs of angels" we see at p. 74 a passage indicated "Hautb. primi," in the plural, showing that there must have been at least two first oboes, therefore not fewer than four in all. The last movement of the overture furnishes strong presumptive evidence in the same direction. It is written upon a ground bass; the whole of the strings play in unison and octaves throughout, while the counterpoint is given to two oboe parts. I have heard the oratorio more than once at the Sacred Harmonic Society's concerts; and the effect of this movement was simply nil. The oboes were scarcely audible against the mass of strings; but imagine the parts played by several of the old oboes with their broad nasal tone, so different from the thread of sound produced by the modern instrument, and it will be seen at once that a very different effect will be produced. Proof of the employment of several bassoons is seen in the indication "bassons ripieni" to be found in some of the choruses (pp. 8, 93, 127, 130). It is perhaps superfluous to remind my readers that the "ripieni" instruments were those used for filling up, as the name implies—i.e., not the principals. From the use of the plural there must have been at least two of these bassoons, and, therefore, at least two principal ones, four in all. That Handel had a large band of strings is evident from the division of the violoncellos, in several parts of this work. The score of the opening chorus, "Immortal Lord," shows us the full extent of Handel's resources. We have here parts for three trumpets, three horns, which play with the trumpets, or, to speak more accurately, in the octave below, drums, two oboes, bassoon, first and second violins, viola, eight voice parts, and at the bottom of the score three bass lines, the first marked "violoncelli ripieni," the second "contrabassi e bassons ripieni," and the third "organi (in the plural), violoncelli, contrabassi e cembali." We find here not only that there were two harpsichords, which we have already noticed in the score of "Poro" and of the later "Esther," but two organs. That the plural form is not a mere slip of the pen on the composer's part appears from p. 29, of the same chorus, where we meet with "organi soli." The use of several oboes may also be clearly inferred from the passage for those instruments in thirds in the same chorus at the words "Whose conduct may our cause maintain." If played only by one instrument to each part it is absolutely inaudible against the full orchestra; but it would come out clearly enough as the composer intended it. The organ is occasionally used in the songs in "Deborah." We find it in combination with the oboes in "Choirs of angels" and with the flutes in "Tears such as tender fathers shed," while the song "In the battle fame pursuing" has an important organ obbligato, in which the florid figure for the right hand is doubled by the flute in unison. In most cases, however, as in other oratorios, the songs are accompanied by the harpsichord, senza organo being in a few cases expressly marked. A few more numbers in "Deborah" remain to be noticed. The beautiful air "In Jehovah's awful sight" (p. 112), borrowed from the "Passion of Christ," has a rich accompaniment of six-part harmony for strings and two bassoons with a very expressive oboe obbligato; while in the chorus "Now the proud insulting foe" we see a modern effect in the contrast of strings and wind, the former being answered by a quartet of two oboes and two horns. At the close of the chorus "Doleful tidings" we find an organ solo, marked again "organi soli (in the plural) e piano." In a somewhat similar situation in "Saul" Handel used the same effect again, at the end of the chorus "Mourn, Israel, mourn."

Though less rich in material for comment than "Deborah," the next work to be noticed, "Athalia" (1733), presents more than one point for remark. In the overture, which Handel calls "Sinfonia," probably because it is not in the usual fugued form, we find four violin parts instead of two. The opening song, "Blooming virgins," is accompanied by "violoncello e cembalo solo"—the composer's simplest form of scoring. The bass song "When storms the proud" is one of Handel's richly orchestrated numbers, great effect being obtained by the contrast of the oboes and bassoons with the strings. The air "Softest sounds no more can ease me" has a very fine flute obbligato, and is further noteworthy from the employment (rather rare with Handel) of the basses pizzicati throughout the song till the concluding symphony. The beautiful air "Gentle airs, melodious strains," one of Handel's most lovely melodies, has a violoncello obbligato, and the bass line is marked "contrabasso, cembalo, e archiliuto." How will those who clamour for Handel's works as he wrote them propose to perform this song? In the opening symphony of the chorus "The clouded scene begins to clear" we find the indication in the organ part "left hand loud, right hand soft," proving that the instrument used at the performances had either two manuals or stops drawing in halves. Lastly, in the song "Jerusalem, thou shalt no more," will be seen an interesting employment of the bassoons to add an independent middle part to the harmony of the strings.

Handel's next choral work, "Parnasso in Festa" (1734), was largely, though not entirely, taken from "Athalia." There is but little to say about the score. On p. 56 the song "Nel spiegar" ("Through the land," in "Athalia") bears the indication "Flauto ou Trav. 1, 2," showing that the old "Flûte-à-bec" was not yet entirely disused. We have already seen other proofs of this in the scores of "Tamerlano" and "Rodelinda." But the most curious thing in the orchestration of the "Parnasso in Festa" is the opening chorus of the second part. This is the first chorus of "Athalia," "The rising world," with fresh words and the addition of a part for the drums. The key of the piece is G minor. No trumpets are used, and the drums appear quite superfluous. This is the only instance I have found in all Handel's works of a drum part written in G and D.

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

IN view of the splendid triumph which "Les Huguenots" secured for the composer of "Robert le Diable," attention may fitly be drawn to some passages in a letter written by Meyerbeer as far back as 1823. At that time the master was following up his Italian successes, and, after his shrewd manner, looking out for artists best able to further the end he had in view. Thus he crossed the path of Levasseur, who was himself "preluding" in Italy. Meyerbeer at once discerned the French singer's capacity, and the letter now in question is chiefly taken up with remarks concerning a prospective engagement. This disposed of, Meyerbeer goes on to say:—

"I am much flattered by that passage of your letter in which you speak of the favourable opinion the Director of the French Opéra is good enough to entertain regarding my feeble talents. You ask if writing for the French stage would have, for me, no attractions. I assure you that I should more glory in the power and honour of composing for the French Opéra than for all the Italian theatres—to the chief of which I have already given works. Where, save in Paris, shall one find the immense resources which the French Opéra offers to an artist who desires to write really dramatic music? Here, one absolutely lacks operatic poems, and the public care for only one kind of music. At Paris, there are excellent poems, and I know that your public receive all kinds of music without distinction, so long as genius presents them. Hence, a field for the composer much vaster than in Italy. Perhaps you ask why, if I think thus, I have not sought to write for Paris. The fact is that I am told French opera is a difficult field; that one has usually to wait many years before a hearing comes, and hence I am afraid. I must say, also, that I have been drawn away from this point in Italy, where I am at present much sought after; although, I confess, this is more owing to the excessive indulgence of the public than to my small talent."

These remarks are of interest, not only because they show at what an early period Meyerbeer had in view the scene of his greatest triumphs, but because they were addressed to one of the artists who became closely identified with his successes, and were written under circumstances pointing to the careful way in which the master took precautions against failure.

His dread of fiasco was almost a monomania, and we shall see by and by how many years he kept "L'Africaine" in his desk because no artist satisfied the conditions of executive efficiency imposed by great, if not exaggerated, prudence. Meyerbeer was certainly most fortunate at the Grand Opéra in the matter of his interpreters. He could not have been better suited had he bribed Nature and Art to do their very best on his behalf. Habeneck presided in the orchestra—Habeneck, the fortunate chief who produced "Le Comte Ory" and "Guillaume Tell" for Rossini, "Masaniello" for Auber, "Robert" and "Les Huguenots" for Meyerbeer, and "La Juive" for Halevy. Upon the stage were Mdle. Falcon, Nourrit, and Levasseur; the trio of whom Meyerbeer was wont to say, "we shall never see the like again"; while in the Director the master found one who appreciated his vast designs and spared neither cost nor trouble to work them out. Never did an opera appear under better auspices than "Les Huguenots." It was "born in the purple," and fate and circumstances stood around its cradle wreathed in smiles. We need not refute the idea that happy conditions alone explain its success. "Les Huguenots" lives now, fifty years, or nearly, after its production, but we who, with English eyes, witness it as given on an Italian stage can form no notion of the charm it had for Frenchmen in 1836. It satisfied their conception of what an opera should be. Thoroughly eclectic, it combined the variety of forms and effects which a German pur sang would never seek, with the largeness of style and close attention to detail such as an Italian would never give. Then its grandiose character, its originality, pomp, and passion, all shown with, so to speak, the limelight on them, charmed a people whose genius for the theatre finds expression in all they do.

Naturally, the severer school of musicians objected to Meyerbeer's gorgeous, or, as they preferred to call them, meretricious, creations, and some of its members carried resentment to absurd lengths. We already know what Mendelssohn thought of his fellow Hebrew, but here comes in an amusing anecdote narrated by Ferdinand Hiller—also a Jew:—

"Mendelssohn was often told that he was very like the composer of 'Robert,' and at first sight his figure and general appearance did perhaps give some ground for the idea, especially as they wore their hair in the same style. I sometimes teased Mendelssohn about it, to his great annoyance, and at last one morning he appeared with his hair absolutely cropt. The affair excited much amusement in our set, especially when Meyerbeer heard of it, but he took it with his usual invincible good nature and in the nicest way."

Looking at Meyerbeer's French development from a point of view diametrically opposed to that taken up by the classicists, Wagner professed to feel even a greater repulsion. He attacked Meyerbeer, as everybody knows, with exceeding bitterness—intensified, no doubt, by the fact of having received favours at his hands—and it may be fitting to give the substance of Wagner's argument at this point. In "Opern und Drama," the Bayreuth master declares the secret of Meyerbeer's music to be "effect"—using the English word, not the German "Wirkung," because he takes "effect" to mean "result without motive." He distinctly asserts that "Meyerbeer's music does, in fact, produce on those who are able to enjoy it a result without a motive." The writer then continues, in language so involved that even an accomplished German scholar like Mr. J. V. Bridgeman can hardly make it intelligible: "This miracle was only possible for the most external kind of music, that is to say, for a power of expression which (in opera) has, from the earliest period, being endeavouring to render itself more and more unworthy of expression, and proved that it had fully attained this independence by debasing the subject of the expression—which subject alone imparted to the latter being, proportion, and justification—to such a depth of moral as well as artistic nothingness that the subject itself could only obtain being, proportion, and justification from an act of musical caprice, which act had thus itself become denuded of all real expression." The reader will hardly expect us to try and reduce to comprehensible terms this peculiarly Teutonic language. We leave it, therefore, as a nut for him to crack at leisure, and pass on to something more definite. In argument Wagner is always wordy and obscure, but in invective and vituperation he can be clear enough. Thus, there is no mistaking what he means below:—

"Had I especially to characterise Meyerbeer's capability and vocation for dramatic composition, I should, out of regard for truth, which I exert myself completely to discover, bring forward most prominently a remarkable circumstance in his works. There is such frightful hollowness, shallowness, and nullity displayed in Meyerbeer's music that we feel inclined to set down his specifically musical competency at zero—especially in comparison with that of the greater majority of contemporary composers. The fact that, in spite of this, he has achieved such great success with the operatic public of Europe must not fill us with astonishment, for this marvel is very easily explained by a glance at the said public, but purely artistic observation shall enchain and teach us."

Wagner goes on to admit that in some places Meyerbeer rises to "the pinnacle of the most undeniable and greatest artistic power." Those moments depend upon the poet and they come whenever "the poet forgets his constrained consideration for the musician; wherever, in his course of dramatic compilation, he involuntarily comes upon a moment when he can breathe in and again send forth the free refreshing human air of life, he suddenly wafts it as a source of inspiration to the musician as well, and the latter, who, after exhausting all the musical riches of his predecessors, cannot give a single gasp more of real invention, is now enabled, all at once, to discover the richest, most noble, and most soul-moving musical expression." Here Wagner attacks Meyerbeer's "poetical private secretary," Scribe, rather than Meyerbeer himself, because, it seems, Meyerbeer was capable of great things when the poet gave him a chance. Wagner goes on to cite an example which has, no doubt, already occurred to the reader's mind: "I would especially call attention to several detached passages in the well-known and painful love scene in the fourth act of the 'Huguenots,' and, above all, to the invention of the wonderful and moving melody in G flat major, with which, springing as it does like a fragrant blossom from a situation that seizes on every fibre of the human heart with delicious pain, only very few, and only the most perfect portions of, musical works can be compared." These words seem a handsome tribute to a brilliant and moving masterpiece, and Wagner professes to offer it with "most sincere joy and real enthusiasm." But he soon dissipates all the grace of his expressions by pointing out that Meyerbeer's success in the "Huguenots" duet simply proves that the "most corrupt maker of music" can, under the circumstances detailed above, be capable of real artistic creation. The author of "Opern und Drama" then goes on to say that, through an unnatural anxiety to represent his capability in the light of boundless power, Meyerbeer "reduced the said power, which is in truth most rich, to the most beggarly poverty, in which Meyerbeer's operatic music now appears to us." It would be interesting, but beyond our province now, to enquire how far these remarks recoil upon Wagner himself, as we have him in his latest manifestations. In some respects they are unjust to Meyerbeer, whose restless striving after effect sprang from no artistic vanity. Meyerbeer, we again point out, had the suppleness of his race. His artistic conscience was not "seared as with a hot iron," because there was not enough of it to lay an iron upon, and thus, unhampered by principles like those that made his fellow-Hebrew, Mendelssohn, so fastidious, he simply shaped the exercise of his genius to circumstances. French opera demanded sensational effects of the most gorgeous and variegated character, both musical and scenic, and that demand Scribe and Meyerbeer supplied in a measure only possible to the highest talents. Had the taste of Paris declared itself for archaism on the lyric stage Meyerbeer would just as readily have gratified it, and, no doubt, with equal success.

Between the production of "Les Huguenots" (February 21, 1836) and that of "Le Prophète" (April 16, 1849), Meyerbeer composed nothing for the French stage. Several causes brought about this result. Fétis declares one to have been the progressive decline of singing power at the Grand Opéra, but others are obviously more important. Thus, the King of Prussia—he who was afterwards known by the irreverent as "Clicquot"—invited Meyerbeer to become his Chapelmaster. It is scarcely necessary to add that the offer found ready acceptance, and it must be admitted that Meyerbeer of "Les Huguenots" was a fit successor to Spontini of "La Vestale." Frederic William IV., though an indifferent king, had the tastes of an admirable dilettante. He was a literary and musical gourmandiser, and never so happy as when sitting down to a table well-loaded with artistic dainties. Almost as a matter of course, therefore, the King, struck by the Parisian success of his Hebrew subject, sought to attach him to his Court. He found Meyerbeer much more tractable than Mendelssohn, who had not the suppleness requisite for a courtier. Meyerbeer loved to be noticed by anybody—he would take pains to conciliate the smallest and most insignificant journalist—but especially did he value the smiles of the great. There was in his character something of the Orientalism that distinguished another famous Hebrew—Disraeli. He could "boo" as well as Pertinax McSycophant himself, and he regarded a bit of riband in his button-hole more than a jewel of price. So Meyerbeer flourished at the Berlin Court, becoming a prominent figure at the King's artistic and intimate reunions. "The King," says M. Blaze de Bury, "sitting at a table, amused himself by sketching architectural designs with a crayon, Tieck or Humboldt read, the ladies embroidered or picked out threads, and if the Countess Rossi (formerly Mdle. Sontag), then wife of the Sardinian Minister at Berlin, was in the humour to sing, Meyerbeer accompanied on the pianoforte." The master's life, however, was not all "cakes and ale" of this kind. A good deal of hard work entered into it, and to the period now in review especially belong a number of compositions for church use. Among them are the 91st Psalm (published with English words by Messrs. Novello and Co.), twelve Psalms for double choir, a "Stabat Mater," Miserere, and Te Deum, all of which are marked by Fétis as not printed. But Meyerbeer was in his true vocation when writing an opera for the opening of the new Royal Theatre (December 7, 1844).

A former edifice on the site of this structure had been built by Frederic the Great, and Rauch's equestrian statue of that monarch stood near it. Associations with the redoubtable warrior were therefore strong, and may have determined the subject of the book provided for Meyerbeer by Rellstab. In any case, the great Frederic was the hero of the new opera, "Ein Feldlager in Schlesien" ("A Camp in Silesia"). The composer had great hopes of success with his work. The theme appealed to national hero-worship, and Jenny Lind, then fresh from her native North, took the part of the heroine, Vielka. But the result did not bear out expectation. "Ein Feldlager" was, in fact, nothing but an opéra de circonstance, intended mainly to bring Frederic on the scene, and to display a military spectacle. The plot, therefore, was as simple as possible, and may be sketched in a few lines:—

The King, at war with Austria for the possession of Silesia, is pursued by the enemy, and takes refuge in the house of an old captain named Saldorf. Searched for on all sides, Frederic is saved by Saldorf, who makes his son exchange clothes with the royal fugitive. Once beyond reach of danger, the King makes liberal recompense to the devoted family.

Such is the story in outline, and we cannot be surprised that an opera of limited interest and purpose served its immediate object and no more. Meyerbeer, however, by no means allowed his music to run to waste. Much of it he afterwards introduced into "L'Etoile du Nord," notably the great military ensemble and the trio for voice and two flutes. By the way, Frederic, whom all the world knows to have been a flute-player in real life, had to perform a solo (behind the scenes) in the Berlin opera, and it was perhaps out of compliment to the instrument of his choice that Meyerbeer wrote the trio just named, oblivious of Cherubini's reply to the question, "What is worse than one flute?" It should be mentioned here that "Ein Feldlager in Schlesien" was produced, with alterations and additions, at Vienna, in 1847, Jenny Lind again acting the part of Vielka. This version took its name from the heroine, and, strange to say, obtained more success among the whilom enemies of Frederic than the original form of the opera enjoyed amongst his friends.

Meyerbeer's next important work of a dramatic character was the overture and incidental music to his brother Michel's five-act play, "Struensee." Michel had written this piece as far back as 1826, but it had never been performed, for reasons to be found in the nature of the subject. Struensee, as historical students know, was an ambitious and unfortunate minister of the King of Denmark, who suffered death in 1772 for his share in a palace conspiracy, the circumstances of which the royal family of Denmark did not wish to have brought under public notice. Frederick VI., the reigning monarch at Copenhagen in 1826, used all his influence, therefore, to keep the play unacted, and succeeded so well that Michel Beer died in 1831 without witnessing it on the stage. In 1846 the same powerful objection did not arise, and "Struensee" was performed in the Royal Theatre of Berlin, by command of the King of Prussia, with the addition of the music specially written for it by the author's brother. This music consisted of an overture—which every amateur knows as a grand example of the master—nine pieces to accompany the drama, and four entr'actes. The last are never heard in public, for reasons assuredly not found in themselves, since they are of high interest and fully developed.

To the year 1846 belongs also a "Fackeltanz" (Torch Dance), written for the marriage of the King of Bavaria with Princess Wilhelmine of Prussia. We hardly need say that this piece is really a Marche aux flambeaux rather than a dance; or that Meyerbeer subsequently composed two other works of the same character—the second for the marriage of Princess Charlotte of Prussia in 1853; the third for that of Princess Anne.

In 1847, after directing the performance of his revised "Feldlager in Schlesien" at Vienna, with Jenny Lind as the heroine, Meyerbeer visited this country. So, at any rate, we are told by the writer of the article "Meyerbeer" in Grove's "Dictionary of Music." No confirmation of the statement can be found in the journals of the time. Had Meyerbeer come to England at all, he would have done so, no doubt, for the production of "Robert le Diable," and the début of Jenny Lind, at Her Majesty's Theatre (May 4), but he certainly was not present on that occasion, preferring to remain in Berlin. It is true, however, that his coming was announced—in Mr. Lumley's prospectus of the season, which proved to be no more trustworthy than other documents of the same character. Mr. Chorley says:—

"It was announced that M. Meyerbeer was to bring his 'Camp de Silesie' to London—that opera which he has never allowed to travel beyond the barriers of Berlin—aware, it may be fancied, of its weakness. It was undertaken that Mendelssohn should, in the same season, produce his opera of 'The Tempest.' There was, thirdly, to be a new opera by Signor Verdi. Of these three promises the last alone was performed. It may be doubted whether anything beyond the merest preliminary negotiations had been entered into with the two great German masters."

Meyerbeer continued to discharge his duties in Berlin during the rest of the year 1847.

The master, who had done Wagner some service in Paris, was of use to him in Berlin also; for there he produced "Rienzi" (1847), "after long and careful preparation," and used all his influence in favour of "Der Fliegende Holländer." We have seen how he was requited by a man who, with all his great qualities, had some which were very small indeed. A natural curiosity here prompts the question, "How did Meyerbeer feel towards Wagner in face of such ingratitude?" The materials for framing an answer are scanty. Meyerbeer was an extremely cautious man where he discerned a possibility of making enemies, and though he might feel deeply he took good care to hide his sentiments behind a smile. M. Blaze de Bury, who enjoyed the master's intimacy, declares that he could never hear the name of Wagner without a disagreeable sensation, "which he took no pains to conceal." Elsewhere we are told, on the same authority, that Wagner's name "had the effect of a dissonance," and that Meyerbeer cherished too much respect for the authority of the masters "not to detest those blustering theories invented to serve instead of learning; those absurdities deliberately put forward to attract the notice of the public, like the helmet on the head of a vendor of pencils." M. de Bury adds the terms of a conversation with Meyerbeer on this subject, but, unfortunately, he himself did nearly all the talking, Meyerbeer saying as little as possible and making that little indefinite. On the whole, there is no reason to believe that he personally resented Wagner's outrageous onslaught upon his artistic character. He possessed an invincible good nature, and hated quarrelling for its own sake as well as because it signifies bad policy; while, himself satiated with public applause, he could afford to let personal attacks pass him by like the idle wind.

We now approach the time when Meyerbeer, with "L'Africaine" partially completed, suspended labour on that work and brought out "Le Prophète."

Although "L'Africaine" was not produced till after the master's death, its composition began as far back as 1845—that is to say, it followed hard upon the production of "Les Huguenots." The idea was to write a great part for Madame Rosine Stoltz, then in the prime of her powers. Meyerbeer, as we have seen, always had a sharp eye for the advantages which come to a composer through eminent interpreters, and he greatly desired to utilise, for that end, the personal and artistic qualities of Stoltz. M. Blaze de Bury says :

"An incorrect, unequal, but essentially gifted singer, with a voice of gold and a nature of fire, Rosine Stoltz could hardly fail, by her merits and even her defects, to attract the curiosity of the master, if only for a time. One can imagine her the ideal of such a heroine (as the Africaine), and, while calculating the profit to his music from such a fine dramatic organisation, Meyerbeer, who never lost sight of the picturesque, naturally regarded the physical attraction of the woman, and the very special effect which a slender and beautiful person, her skin tinted to copper-colour, could not fail to produce upon the operatic public." The master, it is said, had actually finished his score, and was about to put it in hand for representation, when he determined upon altering certain parts of the libretto. This caused delay, and finally shelved the work for many a long year. Scribe refused to make the changes required; Meyerbeer insisted; Scribe waxed obstinate, and, though he at length became more tractable, the composer then found that his music had grown old-fashioned. Forthwith "L'Africaine" entered upon the era of patching and mending, which endured till shortly before Meyerbeer's death, and resulted in the rejection of sufficient music to make another opera. The master was naturally glad to put this troublous "L'Africaine" aside when Scribe sent him the book of "Le Prophète."

LA SCALA AT MILAN

THE Verdian period can be divided into two parts—before and after 1860—and the reasons for this division are obvious. Giuseppe Verdi arrived in Milan from Busseto to perfect himself in the study and practice of music, in which he had already acquired a certain proficiency. He was so far advanced in the science as to render it unnecessary to apply for an admission to the Conservatorio, nor did the Institution ever repulse him for "musical inaptitude," as it has been untruly rumoured. In 1839, when he obtained the favour of writing for La Scala his first opera, "Oberto Conte di S. Bonifacio," Verdi was very young and very poor, but gifted with much firmness of character. "Oberto," which contains the germs of genius, pleased, and the proof of this is its reproduction a year later, partly, perhaps, as a consolation for the grief felt by Verdi at the failure of his second opera, "Un ora di regno," written whilst he was suffering anguish and cruel anxieties for the health of an adored wife who died at the time.

Verdi is one of the few artists whom grief and failure reanimate. He sought diversion from his sorrows in the composition of a new opera on a grand subject, which a clever poet, Solera, had well adapted to the stage, and written in vigorous, elegant verse. The writing of an opera is easy enough; the difficulty lies in writing it well and getting it represented. Verdi mastered the first difficulty by his genius, and to accomplish his ends he found a protector, who helped him materially, and an intelligent manager, who believed in him and benefited greatly by so doing. The first representation of "Nabucodonosor" took place on March 9, 1842. The success was fabulous, and it might be called a revelation of the same kind as "Il Pirata" at the same theatre, "Don Giovanni" at Prague, "Freischütz" at Berlin, "Robert" at Paris, "Lohengrin" at Weimar, when those operas first appeared. The names of the performers in "Nabuco" are famous in art—Signora Strepponi, who became the affectionate wife and inseparable companion of the maestro; Miraglia, tenor; Giorgio Ronconi, and Derivis. The public enthusiasm and wonder were stimulated by an abundance and novelty of ideas united to intense dramatic force and life. Pedantic critics now began to cry out that Verdi's music was too violent, that the singers would lose their voices; but all this hue and cry, which has now lasted forty and more years, has not hindered Verdi's triumphant career. This first success assured, Verdi next wrote for La Scala, "I Lombardi," which met with the same boundless enthusiasm; its interpreters, Frezzolini and Quasco, adding new lustre to the performance. "Giovanna d'Arco," given in 1845, was not quite so well received. Perhaps the subject may have had some influence on Verdi's inspiration, which, in this work seems uncertain, weakened, and incapable of exciting strong emotions. However, although Verdi must have felt the want of vitality in his opera, the coldness of the public towards him, and the indecent conduct of the press, so annoyed him that he did not dissimulate his rancour towards Milan, which caused his long absence from that city and his refusal to write anything more for La Scala; a resolution he has kept ever since. He, however, made a triumphant return to La Scala, when he came to superintend and direct "Aida" in 1872. He probably had this reproduction in view when he accepted the Khedive's offer, to write an original Egyptian opera for the Royal Theatre at Cairo. This was one of the most decisive successes ever obtained at La Scala, a success maintained during every successive reproduction, and extended to all the theatres in the world. "Aida," which I take to be the most complete affirmation and manifestation of Verdi's genius, is at the same time a proof of the fatal direction of modern art, followed by the talented maestro, who has known so well how to keep the just medium between harmony and melody, that medium craved for by Wagner in his letter to Boito.

Between "Giovanna d'Arco," by Verdi, and Petrella's first appearance at La Scala a long time passed without any new operas worthy of note. Petrella began by "L'Assedio di Leida," and immediately revealed his qualities of easy fancy and his immense defects as a musician, defects he was never able to correct. A popular, noisy chorus of soldiers made the shallow fortune of the opera, and the shallower fame of its composer, who next appeared with "Ione," in 1850. This opera shows more study, is animated by a truer dramatic spirit, is less vulgar; and, interpreted by that powerful tenor, Negrini, achieved a not unmerited success. In the third opera, "Il Duca di Scilla," Petrella returned to his natural tendencies, spoilt yet more by negligent writing. And yet there was a time when Petrella was placed by many on a par with Verdi, but it soon appeared that facility of invention alone leads to nothing if it be not united to deep study and art science.

Hitherto I have spoken only of the celebrated, or at least noted, masters, who began writing for La Scala before 1860; now, in this second part of the Verdian period, I can add my own personal remembrances. I shall therefore also consider those composers who, although fallen irremediably, have given proofs of natural talent and musical culture. This last period of twenty years has been absorbed by the young, courageous, audacious, believing apostles or imitators of Gounod and Wagner. Even in 1858, had appeared at La Scala an "Uscoco" by Petrocini, in which were gleams of the future; this young maestro gave great promise, but a brain derangement first and then premature death destroyed all hopes.

The first new opera given in 1860 was "Corrado," by Giorza, proving the inaptitude possessed by composers of dance music for writing melodrama. Immediately after followed Peri with his "Giuditta," which was well received and performed in many theatres under the auspices of the baritone Aldighieri, a magnificent Holopherne. But Peri did not renew the success of this first opera, for his next two and last he gave, "L'Espiazione" and "Rienzi," failed completely. Another failure in that time of dearth was Braga's "Mormile," soon to be coupled with the same composer's "Caligula." Franco Faccio seemed destined to become celebrated as a composer rather than as a leader of operas. Few musicians have shown such happy dispositions for the theatre, so much invention, such good style, fine sentiment, and, added to all, so vast a musical science. All these qualities shone luminously in the "Profughi Fiamminghi," given at La Scala in the autumn of 1863, although not to the taste of the public; but then arose the want of faith, the envy and the cabals which ended by concentrating themselves on Boito as leader of the young school. The next on the list of failures is the memorable one of Chelard's "Aquila Romane"; then, again, a timid, quiet, careful writer, who died early, Villanis, gave, in 1865, a "Bianca degli Albizzi," which also failed; nor is the list closed, for in immediate succession come a "Rebecca" by Pisani, a learned but unfortunate composer, and "Turanda," by Bazzini, in which musicians recognised the serious study and conscience of a true artist, but to which the public denied its approbation.

And now comes the glorious fiasco of "Mefistofele," by Boito. This great composer, to whom is opened such a wide future, had in common with all original individualities, the fate of becoming noticed as soon as he appeared in the world of letters and art, soon creating round him a mixed atmosphere of fanatical sympathies or ferocious antipathies. His strange ethereal figure, careless ways, natural modesty, united nevertheless with a knowledge of his own merits, his ideality and opposition to vulgarity of any kind, his love for novelty and originality, are all elements of a complex type which attracts all, even the many who cannot bear him. Boito's intimate admirers, who knew his "Mefistofele" note by note before he gave it at La Scala, and proclaimed it a unique, unheard-of marvel, were mostly the cause of the storm that burst so furiously on the 5th of March, 1868.

The spectators of the first representation of "Mefistofele" will certainly never forget the scene. Boito directed the orchestra, calm and smiling as though he had been smoking cigars at the café. The effect of the prologue was immense, the novelty, the ever increasing effect of the predominating phrase, the sound of the children's voices, quite bewildered the public, who broke out in a spasm of indescribable enthusiasm. Between the acts the spectators in the lobby, in the passages, admired this new music, proclaiming the advent of the long expected and long wished-for modern genius of song. Unfortunately, as each successive act was played enthusiasm cooled down until it totally disappeared. Too lengthy scenes, too obscure and bold ideas, made the public become impatiently nervous, cruel, implacable, and soon were heard groans, whistling, indeed shouts of anger and derision, especially at the intermezzo sinfonico of the battle, and at the scene of the Emperor. The execution of the work by the artists became weak, unconnected, unnerved, and the part of Faust, sung by a baritone, gave a grey, opaque, monotonous colour to the opera. Boito remained impassable at his post, ever serene, in the midst of people whose paroxysm of anger approached insult, and at that post he remained for three long nights, enduring continual vociferation against his beloved work. The public seemed to be angry with itself for having believed even for a short time in the poetical and musical abilities of the new maestro. The next day he was regarded as a man who had committed a bad action, and many of his acquaintances cut him dead.

Boito, whose nature is quite different to Faccio's, did not lose courage, did not give up hope, and believed in the vitality of his work; he saw the leading error of having written Faust's part for a baritone, altered it to a tenor's compass, and shortened some of the boldest passages, thus reducing the opera to the just dimensions which have now raised the admiration of both hemispheres. The unjust failure of "Mefistofele" was followed, in 1869, by the genuine one of "Fieschi," by Montuoro, and immediately after by the great and merited success of "Ruy Blas," by Marchetti, a fine opera in which the sweetest inspiration, elegance of phrases and of form, are wedded to a powerful and true sense of the drama, especially in the last act. Fate was not so propitious to "Gustav Wasa," which Marchetti produced in 1875, for in it were wanting inspiration and effect, although no fault could be found with its composition.

Great hopes were raised in 1870 by Gomez when he gave his "Guarany." It is an unequal work, full of imitations of other composers, but it is of a new and true colour, in harmony with the uncivilised character of the subject. The young Brazilian maestro encountered such favour that he shortly afterwards gave "Fosca," which seemed to verify the hopes created by the author's first work, for it was more even, the instrumentation better managed, and the drama well followed out. The public of La Scala, however, did not receive Gomez's opera with much favour. And here I may make a parenthesis, and beg to relate a personal fact which might prove how little musical criticism influences or educates the public: I was present at the last rehearsal of "Fosca," which made such a good impression on me that I was imprudent enough to praise it in the Perseveranza, the morning paper in which I have had the honour of writing on music for twenty-six years, and I prophesied a great success. Would that I had never written such words! All the readers of my article went to the theatre in the hope, and perhaps with the firm intention, of contradicting me, for, be it remembered, the Milanese will not be dictated to in matters of art, nor will they admit of puffing in any shape or circumstance, and the opera, in spite of its many beauties, was most coldly received. Ever since I have sworn to give no more predictions of success, and I have kept my word. The last opera written by Gomez for La Scala, "Maria Tudor," failed miserably; it was wanting in nerve, inspiration, and novelty, and too elaborate and heavy to please.

I pass over the failures of "Elisabetha d'Ungharia," by Beer, a nephew of Meyerbeer, and of "Viola," by Perelli, a learned musician, gifted composer, full of merit, but who lacks the most necessary faculty of writing for the stage.

Very fair performances of "I Pezzenti," by Canepa, in 1874, of "La Lega," by Josse, in 1876, of "Mattia Corvino," by Pinsuti, 1877, lead us to Ponchielli, of whom I will speak last.

Ponchielli and Boito are the two living composers who give the greatest hopes that Verdi is not to be the last genial and glorious representative of our music. Ponchielli has a strong individual musical and dramatic temperament; he has not so much fancy or ideality, nor is he so sympathetic as Boito, but he is a great musician, and purely a writer of operas. "I Lituani," performed at La Scala in 1874, immediately showed Ponchielli's worth. In this work his inspiration expands by force of study and reflection, and is to my mind that in which he has best drawn the drama and most truly depicted the passions which agitate it; nor do I understand why it has made no way. "Gioconda," on the contrary, is not so evenly written, but contains a fourth act which ranks with the finest pages of modern dramatic music. "Il Figliuolo prodigo," which was represented with very little success in 1881, is, musically, Ponchielli's best opera; but, dramatically, it is long, heavy, burdened with useless numbers; and derives much of its weight from the unsuitable nature of the Biblical subject which Ponchielli unfortunately chose to set to music.

MADAME SCHUMANN.

FRANZ LISZT has often been spoken of as the "King of pianists," and surely with equal if not greater justice the title of "Queen of pianists" might be given to the gifted lady, who by her performances during the past month, has excited such extraordinary enthusiasm. It is now over sixty years since Liszt first played in public, and more than half a century since Madame Schumann commenced her public career; but the former has long ceased to delight and astonish the musical world, while the latter is still a powerful attraction, and able to occupy a high, if not the foremost, place among the distinguished players of our day. We think we are correct in saying that no pianist ever before retained so powerful a hold upon the public mind for so long a period. When Clara Wieck first began to make a name, it was with the Concertos of Mozart and Hummel, and the bravura music of Kalkbrenner, Herz, and Pixis; Mendelssohn had not written his two pianoforte Concertos, Robert Schumann had just commenced publishing his early pianoforte works, and Chopin had only attracted notice by his celebrated "La ci darem" variations (Op. 2)—which, by the way, were first played by Clara Wieck at Leipzig, in 1832—while Raff, Brahms, Bennett, Rubinstein, and other men now famous were still children.

As the wife of the illustrious composer, Robert Schumann, Madame Schumann had, as an artist, a difficult rôle to sustain, and as his widow a still more difficult one. As the wife of one of the greatest composers since Beethoven, she might easily have been tempted to espouse with too much ardour her husband's cause; and as his widow she might have felt that the principal aim of her life was to persuade an indifferent world of the beauty, poetry, and originality of Schumann's music. Had she acted thus her conduct would have been natural and excusable, but she would not at the present moment stand so high in the world's esteem; and even then she might not have succeeded, as she certainly has done, in making Robert Schumann's music so generally loved and admired. Madame Schumann's character, intellect, and training saved her from becoming a mere partisan: though for years she has been acknowledged unequal as an exponent of Schumann's music, yet one always hears of her wonderful interpretations of Bach, Mozart, and Beethoven. By her modesty, prudence, and talents she has gradually achieved a veritable triumph.

We are not writing an account of the rise and progress of Schumann's pianoforte music, or we should certainly feel it our duty to mention Moscheles, Liszt, Bülow, Rubinstein, and many other illustrious names, who have helped to make this music so attractive, and even popular. We are only speaking of what Madame Schumann has been able to accomplish in a quiet unostentatious way. Though not her husband's sole disciple, or the sole propagandist of his music, she is, however, one of the most remarkable; and when she speaks to us she arouses special sympathy, and commands attention as one having special influence and authority.

Years ago, in England, she performed Beethoven's Concertos and Sonatas and was universally admired. She seldom played her husband's music: few understood it; some, who ought to have known better, spoke of it as "dull, dry, and laboured"; and the public cared but little about it. However, in the course of nearly thirty years (Madame Schumann paid her first visit to England in 1856, when she played at the Philharmonic and Musical Union) she has let us hear, from time to time, various of his works; indeed, in looking back, we find that nearly all Schumann's greatest pianoforte compositions have been interpreted by her: the Davidsbündler and Carneval, the Etudes Symphoniques, the two Sonatas in F sharp and G minor, the Kreisleriana, many of the Novellen, the Nachtstücke and Waldscenen, the Pianoforte Quartet and Quintet, and last, but not least, the Concerto in A minor. There is, we believe, among musicians but one opinion now—viz., that of Schumann's music as it is rendered by the gifted pianist, the more we hear the better; for surely the time cannot be very far distant when she will retire from public life, and enjoy (let us hope for many years) the rest which she has so nobly earned; and when that time does come the public will lose the most faithful, the most earnest, and the most intelligent interpreter of Robert Schumann's pianoforte works.

Another secret of Madame Schumann's wonderful success is the great interest which she has always taken in the development and progress of music. We spoke of her in connection with Chopin; it would take us long to tell how much she has done for Mendelssohn and others; and we now find her in London playing one of Brahms's recent works. She has, therefore, been faithful to the old masters, true to her husband's art-work, and generous to the productions of men of various styles and degrees of excellence.

If we think of Emanuel Bach and Mozart, of Hummel, Mendelssohn, and a few others, we are reminded of a pure and noble style of pianoforte playing, of which perhaps Dr. F. Hiller and Madame Schumann may be considered the last representatives. We still have the privilege of hearing the latter, and the crowded hall every time she has appeared this season shows how thoroughly it has been valued. Madame Schumann needs no praise, but the ringing cheers and rapturous applause at St. James's Hall must have pleased her, even though she is able to recall the triumphs and ovations of a long past; what, however, must have specially touched her heart was the indirect homage thus paid to the memory of one who had lived and laboured in comparative obscurity, and who passed away without receiving the honours and rewards which the musical public now seems so anxious to bestow on composers who show, it may be, only sparks from the flame of genius.

ALTHOUGH both the study and practice of music have made very rapid advance in this country, it is only within the last few years that a knowledge of the art has been of advantage to persons seeking for situations, either at private houses or public establishments, in capacities where it might reasonably be supposed that instrumental or vocal acquirements would be deemed rather an objection. We have already drawn attention to several cases in proof of our assertion; and, on perusing the daily papers, it becomes very evident that these cases are on the increase. Only a short time ago we quoted an advertisement for a waiter who must also be a good accompanist; and another for a gardener who should be able to take part in a choral practice. We have now before us an announcement that a male attendant is required at an asylum, where good wages are offered, with board, lodging, washing, and uniform; but the line at the conclusion, "Musician preferred," unquestionably shuts out the many who might be thoroughly eligible for the situation had their musical education not been neglected. The following advertisement, however, would, we think, puzzle even those who have sufficiently prepared themselves to move with the times: "Young Lady, as Pianist and Vocalist, wanted at once, to live in and assist in hotel bar." Now, without stopping to inquire what accommodation would be provided for a resident in an "hotel bar," we may reasonably suppose that if the young lady is to "assist" there as pianist and vocalist, she must form one of a group of minstrels who are perpetually discoursing sweet sounds to the loungers at the refreshment table; for there is no indication in the advertisement that her services are also required in serving the customers. So tempting an opportunity should not be lost. There are plenty of ladies in want of a situation who can sing well enough to please a not over critical audience; and the necessary instrumental instruction is now thoroughly within their reach, for we have just read an advertisement where a "pupil of Benedict" undertakes to teach the pianoforte at the pupils' own residences for sixpence a lesson.

OUR readers know that we have little faith in the various contrivances for teaching beginners the elements of music; but as we never have underrated the absolute necessity of thoroughly mastering these elements before proceeding to their practical application in performance, it may of course be concluded that we firmly believe in the advisability of conveying the requisite information in clear and concise language without the aid of any "inventions," either in cardboard, wood, or ivory, by which the simple rules are presented to the eye instead of being fixed in the mind by oral instruction. The first instalment of a work by Mr. James Mitchell, which has recently been forwarded to us, seems forcibly to illustrate the truth of our theory. The writer says that the work is especially designed to smooth the difficulties which generally perplex young students, and to "point out a plain, practical, and pleasant way of dealing with a few of these hindrances." Now, after reading Mr. Mitchell's explanations, we are inclined to say that he has an excellent method of imparting his knowledge, and that if he would only be content to let his juvenile readers, under the guidance of a master, learn from his book, they would make highly satisfactory progress. Why, then, should he direct their attention to some complicated diagrams published in a detached form, and say (after showing the major scales) "fold down this flap" in order to find the relative minor; for the measurement of an interval "put a dagger under the letter or note (in a diagram) you wish to measure from, find the letter or note you wish to measure to, and then follow a dotted line till you get the name of the interval," the inversion of the interval being shown by pursuing another line? Surely a student can comprehend that a minor third below any major key-note is found that of the relative minor; that an interval is the distance from one note to another, its nature being discovered by counting the semitones which lie between, and that the inversion will make up the number nine, all major, minor, and augmented intervals becoming reversed, and perfect remaining perfect. The diagrams in the work before us are exceedingly ingenious; but experience proves that they are utterly unnecessary; and it will be seen, therefore, that our remarks are directed against the principle Mr. Mitchell advocates, and not against the manner in which he has carried it out.

OUR observations upon the Free Concerts at Birmingham, organised by the mayor, Mr. Alderman White, have elicited some letters showing how many well-wishers of the art agree with us as to the desirability of establishing a series of popular musical entertainments in the metropolis at the expense of the municipality. We can hardly perhaps expect that the contemplated reforms in our city affairs will at all touch this matter; for a desire to promote a love of music, however it may stimulate private individuals to acts of benevolence, appears to form no part of any of the schemes of our legislators. Whilst living in hope, therefore, of some action in the matter on the part of the city dignitaries themselves, we are glad to direct attention to the following proposition, forwarded to us by Mr. Welchman, organist of the Catholic Church, Clapham: "Can you not," he says, "do something, by ventilating the subject in your journal, towards securing for the people of London an organ and an organist for the Town Hall—i.e., the Guild Hall? There is, I think I may say, no town of any size in this country without its public hall, and in most there are organs suitable, as to size at least, to the building. Here in London our principal public hall is organless. Cannot the Musical Committee of the Corporation, with their energetic chairman, Mr. Bateman, lead the way?" Certainly this is a suggestion worthy of serious consideration. That a hall in the centre of the metropolis, which our correspondent rightly terms the Town Hall of the great metropolis, should have no organ must appear strange indeed to the musical residents in Birmingham, Leeds, Liverpool, and other populous towns where recitals upon this instrument in the principal building by the appointed organist are of frequent occurrence. We need scarcely wonder that, whilst the beauties of the standard compositions for the pianoforte are becoming gradually revealed to the frequenters of London concerts, the great works for the organ are almost unknown; and seeing that the city has now established a School of Music, it seems impossible that the Corporation should much longer live under the reproach pointed out by our correspondent. Presuming that the organ is still considered the "king of instruments," assuredly the power of the democracy has, up to the present time, sadly marred the glory of the monarch's reign.

SINCE the days when the "Battle of Prague" was a show-piece for young ladies, the music of society has undergone various changes. Assuredly it passed through stormy times, although the showers and cascades represented upon the key-board of the pianoforte were generally presumed to be composed of pearls or roses; and, save therefore from their intolerable monotony, could inflict no harm upon those who were unfortunately caught in them. Happily, however, we have now arrived at a more accurate knowledge of the true mission of the art; and not only do we listen to pianoforte compositions of a higher class in our drawing-rooms, but, in consequence of the very general study of other instruments, concerted music is constantly performed, even by the members of one family, so that in our home-circle a very varied and enjoyable concert can be given without any undue amount of preparation. But a communication from a correspondent, recently received, proves to us that even such domestic performances as these are assuming larger proportions; and we willingly give publicity to a scheme which certainly deserves to be better known. The letter, headed "A Suggestion," tells us that a number of families have agreed to meet at each other's houses, all the musical members contributing to a private concert, the programme of which is to be drawn up, written out, and a copy sent to each family before the evening. There being a mixture of amateur and professional talent in the Society, the young members of a family will be stimulated to the study and practice of good music, and the concerts already given—the excellent character of which is shown by a specimen programme enclosed to us—must assuredly prove most beneficial to the listeners as well as to the performers. We sincerely echo our correspondent's hope that the example set by himself and his friends may be extensively followed.

In the January number of THE MUSICAL TIMES we stated that the "Lily of Killarney," being the property of Messrs. Chappell, their consent only would be required to legalise the performance of any part of the opera; but at a recent trial at Clerkenwell County Court, before Judge Eddis, the contrary was proved. It appears that the defendant, Mr. Walter North, publicly performed on a pianoforte the accompaniment to the song "Eily Mavourneen" without the consent, in writing, of the plaintiff, Mr. Harry Wall, who is the registered proprietor of the sole liberty of the performance of the music and words of the said opera, or any portion thereof. With the view of rebutting plaintiff's title, Edward Chappell, of the firm of Chappell and Co., as witness for the defendant, produced a deed, dated 1862, purporting to be an assignment by Sir Julius Benedict to the said firm of the copyright of the opera. His Honour ruled that such deed was inoperative, as it was not signed by Sir Julius Benedict. The plaintiff also produced a deed, dated 1862, whereby Louisa Pyne and William Harrison were assigned the sole liberty of performance of the whole or any part of the said opera. Defendant next put in a document wherein it was expressed that in consideration of £10, paid by Messrs. Chappell to William Harrison and Louisa Pyne, they would not interfere with the performance of portions of the opera at any concerts. This document, however, did not hold good, as it was only signed by W. Harrison, and judgment was therefore given for the plaintiff. We, of course, cannot find fault with this decision, seeing that it is strictly legal; but it is evident that vocal compositions published before the passing of the new Act should now be labelled "dangerous"; and their proprietors must not be astonished, therefore, if they are avoided both by concert-givers and vocalists.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.

THIS Society gave a noteworthy Concert on the 13th ult., and attracted an audience remarkable for numbers, if not for the musical enthusiasm that endures even a long programme to the end. The works presented were full of interest. One—Mr. Barnby's Leeds Psalm, "The Lord is King"—had not been heard in London previously; the other—Dvorák's "Stabat Mater"—had only been given once, and then by the London Musical Society, which can hardly be called a public body. Novelty, therefore, was the order of the evening, and metropolitan connoisseurs set their faces towards the Albert Hall as one man. They were well repaid. The Psalm was so fully noticed in THE MUSICAL TIMES of November last that there is no present need to discuss its manifest and manifold merits. Our business is with the performance, into which the chorus and orchestra naturally threw themselves with ardour and a resolve to do the best possible for their Conductor's reputation. It was no fault of theirs if the effect proved less striking than at Leeds, the conditions of the building being the real cause. As, however, only a few present could recall the impressive Yorkshire ensemble, the audience had reason for satisfaction with a rendering which, in many respects, offered a good deal for genuine admiration. The work obtained a warm reception, and several numbers were encored. Musicians were again most powerfully struck by the breadth and nobility of the opening chorus—one of the best things Mr. Barnby has written, and the most productive of hopeful anticipation with regard to the Oratorio which we understand is likely to be produced at one of our great Festivals next year. The Composer-conductor was loudly applauded at the close of the performance, as, in the course of it, were the solo vocalists, Miss Williams, Madame Patey, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. King.

The execution of Dvorák's "Stabat Mater" was made specially interesting by the distinguished composer's presence in the Conductor's place. Herr Dvorák, who must have contrasted past experience of neglect and obscurity with the welcome accorded him by the thousands of his audience, was received with the warmest demonstrations. The excellence of his work was taken for granted, but scarcely could the most sanguine of those not before acquainted with it have anticipated the impressive effect actually made by a rendering which was, at all points, admirable. We have noticed the "Stabat Mater" already, and have insisted upon its remarkable merits—merits that become more obvious as acquaintance grows more intimate. It is a great work—in some respects standing alone, in all respects indicative of the high genius which is so rare and precious a quality. It will secure a permanent place in the repertory of sacred music in England, and be handed down with other masterpieces as worthy of their companionship. Herr Dvorák conducted with energy and success, though his tempo rubato seemed at times to take the chorus and orchestra unprepared. The solos were admirably sung by the artists already named, and to everybody engaged in interpreting the beautiful music the thanks of the audience were fairly due, and frankly given. The performance ended at a late hour, but by those who remained to the close Herr Dvorák was enthusiastically applauded. He had won his way to English favour and started upon a career the full glory of which we shall not venture to measure.

MR. WILLING'S CHOIR.

It has been the misfortune of Mr. Willing that the programmes of his Concerts during the present season have clashed with those of the Sacred Harmonic Society to an extent that could not fail to be damaging to a young Association not possessing the advantage of a familiar and justly venerated title. We are now concerned with the performance of "Elijah," under Mr. Willing's direction, on Tuesday, the 25th ult., at St. James's Hall, which on the whole reflected great credit on the Conductor and his forces. The improvement previously noticeable in the chorus was continued, especially in such matters as the observance of light and shade; and Mr. Willing wielded the bâton with care and discretion, the only fault being the slow tempo adopted in some of the movements, more especially the choruses "For He the Lord our God," the first Baal chorus, and "The fire descends from Heaven." Mr. Ludwig sang exceedingly well as Elijah, and although his reading of the music differed from that of Mr. Santley in some respects, it had distinctive merits of its own. Miss Annie Marriott also deserves high commendation for her earnest and artistic rendering of the soprano music, and Madame Patey and Mr. Maas acquitted themselves in their customary acceptable manner.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

IN the presence of perfection the voice of criticism must needs be silent, and in this Society's performance of "Elijah," on the 14th ult., perfection was as nearly realised as possible. Mr. Charles Hallé resumed his position in the Conductor's seat, and was warmly greeted by the orchestra and chorus. Mr. Santley was in excellent voice and has rarely sung the music of the title-rôle with greater force and impressiveness. Ample justice was also rendered by Miss Anna Williams, Madame Patey, and Mr. Maas to the soprano, contralto, and tenor numbers, and the choruses were interpreted with vigour and faultless precision. Especial mention deserves to be made of the excellent enunciation of the words, for which probably we have to thank Mr. W. H. Cummings, the admirable chorus-master of the Society. On Friday next, the 4th inst., "The Redemption" is to be performed, with Miss Carlotta Elliot, Miss M. Handcock, Mrs. Suter, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Burgon, and Mr. Santley as the principal vocalists.

THE BACH CHOIR.

THE first of the two Concerts to be given during the present season by this highly-esteemed organisation took place on Wednesday last, the 26th ult., the programme consisting chiefly, so far as the Choir was concerned, of unaccompanied music. The interest attaching to the revival of Palestrina's celebrated "Missa Papæ Marcelli" induced the Society to revive another work by the father of ecclesiastical music, namely, the Mass "Assumpta est Maria," for soli and six-part chorus. For this effort the composer received a special compliment from Pope Sixtus V. It was written twenty years later than the "Marcelli" Mass, and is undoubtedly freer, more mature, and more varied in style, though, of course, still in the strict contrapuntal method of the 16th century. Mr. W. S. Rockstro, who appears to be familiar with the practices observed in the Sistine Chapel in Rome, has edited the work for the Bach Choir, and has given himself the utmost latitude in the way of introducing marks of expression and variations of tempi. How far such embellishments are justifiable must be left for musicians to determine; but, at any rate, the audience should have been informed in the book of words of the editor's additions to the original score, which are frankly acknowledged in the printed copies. Beside the Mass, there were many items in the programme to which attention should be drawn. Taking them in the order of performance, the first was a fine and vigorous motet, "Exultate Deo," for five-part chorus and organ, by the elder Wesley, originally performed at the Birmingham and Worcester Festivals. A motet in six parts, by Johannes Eccard, "The Presentation of Christ in the Temple," proved interesting not only as an example of 16th century German music, but on account of its quaint expressiveness. Mr. Villiers Stanford's hymn "Awake, my heart," for baritone solo, chorus, and organ, first performed at Cambridge in December, 1882, shows how modern feeling may be united to the traditional style of English Church composition. Mr. Rockstro may be complimented on his clever reproduction of the strict contrapuntal style in his madrigal "O, too cruel fair." Late in the second part came performances of German, Swedish, and Norwegian Volkslieder, which appeared to be thoroughly enjoyed, judging by the applause they received. The choir was in splendid order throughout, and its singing reflected the utmost credit on the Conductor, Mr. Otto Goldschmidt. Of the principal vocalists, Miss M. Davies and Miss Ella Lemmens are entitled to worthy mention, and the violin duets by Bach and Spohr, executed by Miss Emily Shinner and Mr. Carrodus, must not pass without a word of recognition.

MR. HENRY LESLIE'S CHOIR.

FAR more than average interest attached to the first Concert this season of this old established Choir, which took place on Thursday last, the 27th ult. Louis Spohr does not now receive the blind adulation which followed him during a certain portion of his lifetime, but he still occupies a distinguished place in the ranks of composers, and the production of his Vocal Mass must be regarded as an event of importance. It is probably a matter of coincidence, rather than of design, that the performance was fixed to take place within a few days of the centenary of the birth of Spohr, which will occur on April 5, 1884. The Mass dates from the composer's best period, and was written for his own choir at Cassel, where it was given on St. Cecilia's Day, 1827, and then laid aside for more than half a century. The reason for this neglect was the alleged difficulty of the work, which Spohr himself admitted, and there was danger of its being lost to the world for ever. However, a complete set of parts was found, and now that Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co. have republished it in their octavo series, it is within the reach of all choral societies. The plan of the work is certainly unique, but so far from its being exceptionally difficult it appears almost simple by the side of many modern works, not to mention the great Masses of Bach and Beethoven. There are five solo parts and a large and a small chorus, each consisting also of five parts. By this arrangement much variety of effect is gained, and the monotony, which otherwise might arise from the absence of accompaniments, dexterously avoided. It should be stated that a pianoforte part is given in the score, but for purposes of rehearsal only. With respect to the merit of the music, it must be remembered that Spohr was undoubtedly a mannerist, and he uses certain melodic phrases and harmonic progressions with a frequency that may in time become cloying, although few can resist the charm of his style. If no new phase of his genius is observable in the Vocal Mass all the best qualities of his music are to be found in abundance. He was a fluent, if not a great, contrapuntist, and some clear and effective examples of fugal writing are contained in the "Kyrie," "Gloria," "Credo," and "Sanctus." The fugue, "In gloria Dei Patris," is especially vigorous and telling. In a melodic sense, the opening of the "Sanctus" and the whole of the "Benedictus" are full of beauty, the latter being a veritable gem.

It should be noted that the composer's treatment of the two choirs does not include counterpoint in more than five parts. Sometimes the two choirs sing in unison, but more frequently antiphonally. Occasionally, a phrase sung by the large choir is repeated by the smaller body, and again by the solo voices to give a diminuendo effect; or the process is reversed with a contrary result. Musicians cannot fail to be delighted with the beauty of the music as well as with the skill displayed in its construction. For the performance on the 27th a number of students of the Royal Academy of Music were engaged to form the smaller choir, and Miss Winifred Payne, Mrs. Irene, Miss Janet Russell, Mr. Henry Guy, and Mr. Lucas Williams were the principal vocalists. Unless appearances were deceptive the Leslie Choir has somewhat diminished in numbers since last season, but its excellence has not sensibly deteriorated. Mr. Randegger had evidently bestowed much pains on the preparation of the Mass, and it went with commendable smoothness, the attack being good, the nuances carefully observed, and the pitch on the whole well sustained, a drop of a semitone only occurring in two numbers. The pianoforte was used at times to sustain the bass, but we think this was unnecessary, and the effect was certainly not good. The work was received with loud applause, an encore being demanded for the capital Fugue "In Gloria Dei Patris"—though happily not complied with; while at the close the Conductor was recalled with enthusiasm. The miscellaneous programme included a new part-song, "Poor or Rich," by Mr. Francesco Berger; Leo's Kyrie (in F), and Madrigals by Waelrent and Marenzio. The pianoforte solos of Miss Maggie Okey were deservedly received with much favour, but opinions seemed to be divided as to the merits of the rendering of the scena from "Fidelio" by Madame Waldmann Leideritz.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

Of the four Concerts with which we are concerned in the present notice, the last one, given on the 22nd ult., was by far the most important. The star of Herr Dvorák, which had been in the ascendant during the greater part of the month, ruled the hour, and that gifted composer added one more to his previous triumphs at the Albert Hall and the Philharmonic Concerts. The two orchestral works he conducted, although short, were thoroughly representative of his style. This may especially be said of the Scherzo Capriccioso, one of the most healthy and mirthful compositions of which our pessimistic age can boast. The pale cast of modern thought has evidently not affected the straightforward themes and striking rhythms of the Scherzo, admirably relieved by the soft melodiousness of the Trio. The instrumentation throughout is full of the most delicate effects, and in his most buoyant mood Herr Dvorák never forgets his counterpoint. The sense of form is, indeed, quite as remarkable in his work as the "national element," of which so much has been heard. The Notturmo for strings (Op. 40), performed at the same Concert, is in complete contrast with the robust merriment of the capricious Scherzo. Here everything is subdued and tender. A single melody pervades the whole design, and is treated with contrapuntal mastery, the poetic interest being by no means neglected over the requirements of scholarly device. Herr Dvorák, after having conducted his orchestral work, once more appeared on the platform, to accompany Mr. Winch, the excellent American tenor, in two of the "Gipsy Songs" published as Opus 55. Both are full of character, and show, in a modified form, the peculiarities of Slavonic music, familiarised by Rubinstein. At the same time, it may be doubted whether any composer besides Dvorák could have invested the lines beginning "Als die alte Mutter" with the tender charm which so captivated the public that a repetition of the song became inevitable. It is but just to add that Mr. Winch's rendering of the songs had the advantage of beauty of voice, combined with an intelligence of reading too seldom found amongst modern vocalists. The same artist showed good taste in the selection of his first piece, the Barcarole from Gounod's "Polyeucte." In the opera it is sung by an irrelevant young Roman of the name of Sextus, and has no perceptible reference to the action. By severing it from its dramatic surroundings Mr. Winch placed the charming ditty in its proper sphere. At the same Concert, it is necessary to mention the admirable performance by Mdlle. Janotha of Schumann's Pianoforte Concerto, and the equally creditable rendering by the orchestra of Mozart's Symphony in D, which, like most of the pieces in the programme, was composed at Prague.

At the first Concert of the month (1st ult.) Hermann Goetz's beautiful Symphony in F was played, and Mdlle. Marie Krebs contributed Mendelssohn's pianoforte Concerto in G minor. A week afterwards Miss Emily Shinner, a young English violinist, successively a pupil of the Royal Academy and of Herr Joachim, at the Berlin Hochschule, made a successful début in Spohr's E minor Concerto, which she played in exemplary style. More individual expression was shown in two of Brahms's Hungarian Dances. The Concert opened with Sir George Macfarren's Overture "King David" and concluded with three out of a set of four "Scènes poétiques" for orchestra, by Benjamin Godard, the rising French composer. As regards invention, the pieces are not very remarkable, but the scoring is extremely clever, and in the last scene, entitled "Our village," a dance of peasants is graphically rendered. Mr. Lloyd was the vocalist of the Concert. The Concerto in A major, by Mozart, revived by Herr Joachim at the third Concert of the month, has a history attached to it. It is the fifth of Mozart's works of that class and was, like its four predecessors, written at Salzburg for immediate use. At Salzburg also the manuscript was discovered by the great violinist, who introduced the work at the Crystal Palace with signal success. Compared with the modern Concerto, as developed by Beethoven, Mendelssohn, and Schumann, Mozart's juvenile effort appears primitive indeed. But in the beautiful long-drawn melody of the Adagio the genius of the young master is distinctly apparent. The Symphony was Schumann's in C, of which an admirable performance was given. Herr Joachim played for a second piece his own Variations for Violin and Orchestra, and Mendelssohn's "Midsummer night's dream" Overture and two movements from Raff's "Italian Suite" completed a programme which, if not very striking, was by no means without interest.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

By a fortunate circumstance the "sudden indisposition" of Signor Pirani—who had been for some days advertised to perform Schumann's Concerto in A minor at the second Concert, on the 6th ult.—was not too sudden to prevent the Directors from supplying his place; and Mdlle. Krebs, by her excellent rendering of Beethoven's Concerto in G, amply consoled the audience for the non-appearance of the Italian artist, who, in spite of the eminent pianists now in England, had been selected to appear on the occasion. Mr. W. H. Cummings, in his apologetical speech, however, had not only to inform the public of this change, but to account for the insertion in the analytical programme of Beethoven's Concerto in C minor, instead of that really played, and also to announce that, in consequence of a severe cold, Mr. Winch, the American tenor, would be unable to sing. In spite of these difficulties, the Concert was in every respect a good one, for it commenced with Sterndale Bennett's fanciful Overture "Paradise and the Peri," and the first part concluded with Brahms's Symphony in D, which, under the sympathetic bâton of Mr. Villiers Stanford, produced a marked effect upon the audience. The performance of Spohr's "Dramatic Concerto," by Madame Norman-Néruda, was one of the most finished interpretations of a great work we can call to mind, and the double recall of the player was a proof how thoroughly this feeling was shared by the rest of the listeners. The singing, by Miss Griswold, of an air from Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet" and a lied, by Schubert, was a good example of French vocalisation, and she was warmly and deservedly applauded. The Concert—which was most ably conducted by Mr. Villiers Stanford—concluded with Mozart's Overture to "Zauberflöte." A special interest was given to the third Concert, on the 20th ult., by the appearance of the Bohemian composer, Herr Anton Dvorák, who had been invited by the Society not only to produce and direct a new work, but to conduct some which had already been heard in this country. It is now somewhat late to enlarge upon the salient characteristics of an artist whose genius was at once so universally recognised in England that his compositions, following in rapid succession, only made us long for the catalogue to be extended. To call him an imitator of any composer, either of the past or present, is simply absurd; for in everything that he touches there is an individuality that must make itself felt even by the most impassive listener. His melodies are not only in themselves beautiful, but thoroughly sympathetic with the subject to which they are united; the framework of his compositions, without any slavish adherence to established forms, amply satisfies even those purist martyrs who, according to the adherents of the "advanced school," have no right to occupy a position on the judgment seat; and his instrumentation is so rich and varied in colour, that the attention never for a moment flags. This may indeed appear praise beyond what can be written of many "coming men"; but latent doubts upon the truth of any of our assertions must at once have been set at rest by his new Overture "Husitáká," the one actual novelty brought forward at this Concert. Being in the highest sense a descriptive piece, it appeared strange that it should have been termed an "Overture," not only because the word ought to signify something suggestive of what is to follow, but because to a certain extent it might cramp the composer in his desire to boldly work out a definite plan. No symptom of such feeling was however apparent either in the construction or treatment of Herr Dvorák's work; for, having selected one of the great epochs in the history of his country—the wars of the Hussites—for his theme, he has presented us with a glowing picture, which assuredly must not only take the highest rank amongst his own creations, but occupy a proud position in the repertory of standard orchestral pieces. One of the Hussite hymns, the subject of which is taken in the opening Lento, is worked in a masterly manner throughout, and, indeed, assumes the importance of a Leitmotiv, the vigorous theme which commences the Allegro con brio being woven in with extraordinary skill and power; and the climax, in the bright key of C major, bringing to a conclusion a work which has materially raised the already popular composer in the estimation of all competent judges. Of his Symphony in D, and second Slavonic Rhapsody, which were also given, we need only say that increased acquaintance revealed to us new beauties—the Scherzo in the Symphony, indeed, exciting the audience to positive enthusiasm—and no praise can be too great for the manner in which the whole of these works were rendered. It was certainly a proud evening for a composer who has so nobly battled with the difficulties which beset him in early life; and the ovation he received on the occasion will we trust be not only gratifying to the recipient, but tend to show the Philharmonic Directors that they are now pursuing the course which will assuredly accord with the wishes of all true friends of the Society. Mdlle. Janotha's fine performance of Mendelssohn's Concerto in G minor, and Beethoven's "Leonora" Overture, under the conductorship of Mr. Mount, were welcome features in the programme of the evening; and Mr. Winch—who, in consequence of Mr. Maas's indisposition, supplied his place at literally an hour's notice—sang "Through the forest" from "Der Freischütz" (in which his voice was almost overpowered by the band), and two exquisite gipsy songs by Herr Dvorák, delicately accompanied on the pianoforte by Mr. Oscar Beringer, the second of which was so charmingly rendered as to elicit an enthusiastic encore which, even at so late a period of the evening, could not be resisted.

MONDAY AND SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

ALTHOUGH these entertainments have been unprecedentedly attractive to the public during the past month we can confine our record within brief limits, as scarcely any novelties have been presented, the interest having centred in the performers rather than in the works performed. Herr Joachim made his re-appearance on Monday, February 25, and was received as usual with prolonged applause by a large concourse of amateurs. The programme was headed by Brahms's Septet in B flat, which he has helped to render popular, and the Scherzo of which was encored on this occasion. For his solo he played Bach's Prelude and Fugue in G minor. The pianist was Miss Zimmermann, who rendered three of Schumann's minor pieces, and the vocalist was Miss Santley.

On Saturday, the 1st ult., Mozart's Quartet in C, No. 6 of the set dedicated to Haydn, and his Trio in E, No. 6, were the concerted works in the programme. Herr Joachim brought forward Tartini's hackneyed "Il Trillo del Diavolo," which might be accorded a period of repose; and Mdlle. Janotha gave a characteristic though not altogether satisfactory rendering of Beethoven's Sonata Pathétique. The songs of Schubert and Blumenthal, sung by Mr. Edward Lloyd, were much applauded.

A still larger gathering and a greater display of enthusiasm characterised the Concert of the 3rd ult., when Madame Schumann re-appeared after an absence of two years. The English public is proverbially loyal to artists of eminence even when their gifts are on the wane, and there is the more reason why Madame Schumann should meet with such favour as she is now receiving as her wonderful gifts show no sign of decay. The exquisite beauty of her touch, the purity and delicacy of her phrasing, and the intellectual warmth of her style were never more distinctly illustrated than in Beethoven's Sonata in E flat, "Les Adieux," on this occasion. The audience became positively excited, and the scene was more suggestive of the opera house on a benefit night than a classical concert, floral tributes being rained on the great artist when she returned to the platform. Herr Dvorák's Quartet in E flat, Op. 51, which headed the programme, is an over-lengthy though, on the whole, very fine work. The "Dumka" or Elegy and the Romance are virtually two slow movements, though the course of the former is interrupted by a theme in waltz time, and the absence of a Scherzo induces a slight feeling of monotony, notwithstanding the unquestionable individuality of the music. Mdlle. Badia, the vocalist of the evening, was more at home in some songs by Gounod than in Mozart's "Dove solo." A great treat was afforded to those who were fortunate enough to obtain admission on the following Saturday, the performance of Beethoven's Sonata in A, Op. 101, by Madame Schumann, being one of the finest within our recollection. The fire and energy infused into the finale, united as they were to undeviating accuracy of execution, had an almost electrical effect. Mendelssohn's Quintet in A, Op. 18; Beethoven's Trio in G, Op. 9, No. 1; and Spohr's Barcarole and Scherzo for violin completed the instrumental programme. Mr. Abercrombie was successful in Handel's "Total Eclipse." On Monday, the 10th, Madame Schumann took part for the first time this season in a concerted work, namely, Beethoven's Trio in E flat, Op. 70, No. 2, which, with the co-operation of Herr Joachim and Signor Piatti, received an ideal interpretation. The great pianist selected as her solos Schumann's Novellette in E, No. 7; the Nachtstück in F, No. 4; and the Canon in B minor, originally written for pedal piano. Being encored in the last-named piece she very properly repeated it, though the audience probably desired something else. The other works were Beethoven's Rasumovsky Quartet in E minor, No. 2; and Haydn's Quartet in G, Op. 76, No. 1. Miss De Fonblanque sang with much charm of style two of Mr. Cowen's songs and Taubert's "In a distant land."

The programme of Saturday, the 15th, was more than ordinarily varied, the only work of length being Beethoven's Quartet in E flat, Op. 74. Schumann's curious but interesting Fantasietücke for piano, violin, and violoncello, and Mendelssohn's fragments of a Quartet were the other concerted items. Madame Norman-Néruda resumed the position of leader at this Concert, and played as a solo Handel's familiar Sonata in A. Madame Schumann gave three of Scarlatti's single movement Sonatas, and a fourth by way of encore. Two of Mr. Cowen's new songs, charming and musically trifles, were sung by Miss Carlotta Elliot. On the following Monday Madame Schumann brought forward, for the first time at these Concerts, her late husband's first Sonata in F sharp minor, Op. 11. It illustrates the singular prejudice which so long existed against this great master that two of his three pianoforte compositions in classical form should have been ignored for a quarter of a century. The Sonata in G minor has been heard once or twice, but that in F minor, Op. 14, perhaps the finest of the three, has yet to wait for a hearing. Madame Schumann may naturally have a predilection for the work in F sharp minor, as it was dedicated to her when a mere girl. Dating from 1835, when Schumann was a young enthusiast burning with zeal for true art and intense hatred of Philistinism, it reflects his exuberant fancy, and the sticklers for formal correctness may naturally object to the free play which the composer has given to his imagination. Allowing that the first movement and the finale are somewhat diffuse, they are full of beautiful thoughts, and the second and third movements are satisfactory in structure as well as thoroughly charming. Madame Schumann acquitted herself of what was doubtless a labour of love in a manner altogether beyond criticism. Notwithstanding the difficulties of the work there was scarcely a technical flaw from first to last, and the breadth and intellectuality of her playing served to remind the listener that it was indeed a great artist who was at the keyboard. Herr Joachim played the Romance from his Hungarian Concerto, and one of Paganini's Caprices in his own incomparable style, and the programme likewise contained Beethoven's ever-welcome Quartet in C, Op. 59, No. 3, and Haydn's Trio in G. In the last-named work the pianoforte part was taken by Mdlle. Marie Wurm. Mr. Santley was the vocalist.

The Concert of Saturday, the 22nd ult., commenced with Beethoven's splendid Quintet in C (Op. 29) and concluded with Haydn's vivacious Quartet in the same key (Op. 33, No. 3). Madame Schumann gave a superb rendering of Beethoven's Sonata in E flat (Op. 27, No. 2) and wisely declined an encore. She afterwards played with Herr Joachim, Brahms's Sonata for piano and violin (Op. 78). A great disappointment awaited the audience on the following Monday evening. Madame Schumann had been announced to perform Beethoven's Waldstein Sonata in C, but illness prevented her from appearing, and her place was taken by Miss Zimmermann, who selected Sterndale Bennett's familiar musical sketches, "The Lake, Millstream, and Fountain." The other works in the programme were well chosen for variety and contrast. Schubert's Quintet in C (Op. 163) is a veritable masterpiece, dating from his ripest period, and marked throughout by his distinctive genius. The Spanisches Liederspiel, of Schumann (Op. 74), is interesting as showing how little his subjective nature could lend itself to the illustration of any given theme. The ten numbers are all more or less charming, but the Spanish character is only faintly suggested, while the genuine Schumann idiosyncrasy is always present. The performance was rather unequal. Mdlle. Friedländer, in the soprano part, was excellent, and Madame Fassett and Mr. Pyatt, as the contralto and bass, were satisfactory; but Herr von Zur-Mühlen, in the tenor part, left much to desire. The Concert ended with Nos. 15, 17, 18, and 20 of Brahms's Hungarian Dances for violin and pianoforte, interpreted by Miss Zimmermann and Herr Joachim.

GUILDHALL SCHOOL OF MUSIC.

On Wednesday, the 12th ult., a Students' Concert was given at the City of London School, Victoria Embankment, before a large audience. The Concert commenced with an organ solo, "Prelude in E flat to St. Ann's fugue" (Bach), by Mr. H. B. Holman, followed by a pianoforte duet, "Allegro Brillante," Op. 92 (Mendelssohn), ably performed by Misses Cheffins and Gregory. The solo vocalists were Miss Wollaston, Miss Nellie Oxenham, Miss Alice Clark, and Mr. Sackville Evans. The Ladies' Choir gave a good rendering of the Cantata "Westward Ho!" the solos being taken by Misses Clara Field, Eleanor Clark, Edith Umpelby, and Sheldon. Miss Adela Duckham, a pupil of Messrs. George Palmer and Lindsay Sloper, played a violin solo and a pianoforte solo in a remarkably clever manner considering that she is only nine years of age. Miss Edith Algar, a pupil of Mr. Lindsay Sloper, showed the excellent training she had received by the manner in which she performed Beethoven's Sonata for pianoforte in F minor. A very successful Concert was brought to a close by a trio for piano, violin, and violoncello by Miss Paget and Messrs. Rowarth and Victor. Mr. Weist Hill (the Principal) conducted, and Mr. J. H. Leibold was the accompanist.

HIGHBURY PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

This spirited Society, which is doing so much to improve the taste and enlarge the knowledge of its patrons, gave a performance of Schumann's "Pilgrimage of the Rose," in the Athenæum Hall, on the 17th ult., Dr. Bridge conducting. The work, as our readers know, contains a good deal of beautiful—that is to say, Schumannesque—music, being especially excellent in its lyrical sections. It presents, however, no inconsiderable difficulties to an orchestra largely composed of amateurs, and to find the instrumental performance somewhat weak was far from surprising. For this, however, the choir made amends by singing with great spirit, correctness, and expression. We refer particularly to the ladies, by whom the pretty concerted music for female voices only was rendered with much charm of effect. All things considered, the experiment of essaying a work so difficult as "The Pilgrimage of the Rose" must be pronounced a success. At the next Concert Weber's "Euryanthe" will be produced, and we congratulate the Conductor and Committee upon the enterprise and judgment their choice displays. A miscellaneous selection followed Schumann's Cantata; the orchestra playing the "Fidelio" Overture and two movements from Haydn's "Military" Symphony, achieving, with the last-named, a distinct success. To this part of the Concert the choir contributed a tasteful part-song by Dr. Gladstone. The principal soloists, and the most popular, were Miss Clara Samuëll and Mr. Bridson.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE last of the current series of Saturday afternoon Concerts was given by the musical section of the Midland Institute, on the 1st ult. On this occasion Dr. Stanford's Elegiac Symphony, which was heard last year at the Gloucester Festival, was the pièce de résistance, but although the work greatly impressed the hearers by its originality and boldness, its performance was by no means unapproachable. Gade's Overture "Im Hochland" went, on the whole, more satisfactorily, but another rehearsal would not have been superfluous. Svendsen's "Romeo and Juliet" Fantasia failed to make any deep impression upon the audience, but the bright waltz-like Sclavonian dances, by Dvorák, were much admired. Mr. A. J. Priestley exhibited praiseworthy skill in the Andante and Allegro from Goltermann's Violoncello Concerto in B minor, Op. 51.

On the previous evening, at the fourth annual Concert of the Birmingham Press Club, the instrumental music comprised two movements from a Violin Suite, by Franz Ries; Weber's Polonaise in E, and other pianoforte pieces, by Mr. R. Rickard; the Andante, with variations and finale from the Kreutzer Sonata, played by the same artists; two violoncello solos of Dunkler, by Mr. A. J. Priestley; and the Andante and Finale from Mendelssohn's D minor Trio, capably played by Mr. Trickett, Mr. F. Ward, and Mr. A. J. Priestley.

The last of Messrs. Harrison's Subscription Concerts, which took place on the 3rd ult., made ample amends to music lovers for some of the undeniable shortcomings of its predecessors. The orchestral music was furnished by Mr. Charles Hallé's band, and the soloists comprised Mr. Hallé himself and Madame Norman-Néruda in the instrumental department, and Miss Hilda Wilson and Signor Foli vocalists. Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, which was played without repeats, has seldom, if ever, been heard here to more advantage than on this occasion, every movement being executed with faultless precision and appropriate feeling. In Mendelssohn's "Athalie" Overture and Wagner's "Kaisermarsch," also, the playing of the band was all that might have been expected from so experienced and ably directed a body of instrumentalists. The Rhapsodie Sclav of Anton Dvorák was practically the first of the Bohemian composer's orchestral works which have been introduced here at a public Concert, and its performance was listened to with much interest by the large audience present, but a more important and more typical work of the composer has since been heard here in the shape of his famous "Stabat Mater," which was performed by the Festival Choral Society, on the 27th. The Poème Symphonique of M. Saint-Saëns, illustrating the conquest of Hercules by the Lydian Queen Omphale, awoke great enthusiasm owing to the fanciful grace of the themes and the delicacy of the orchestration to which Mr. Hallé's band did full justice. Madame Néruda's playing of Spohr's Dramatic Concerto in A minor was a magnificent display of virtuosity, which well merited the furore it created. In Beethoven's charming Romance in G, and Paganini's Movement Perpétuel in C, Madame Néruda was no less effective, the break-neck pace at which the final piece was taken causing general excitement among the audience. Mr. Hallé's playing of Chopin's Nocturne in G minor (Op. 37), and Geminiani's Gavotte in C, adapted from a violin Sonata, was distinguished by the ease, finish, and mastery of an accomplished musician. Miss Hilda Wilson produced a very favourable impression in Rossini's "Di tanti palpiti"; and Signor Foli, who was in capital voice, gave the fine air from Verdi's "Nabuco," "D'Égitto le sue lidi," and Handel's "Oh, ruddier than the cherry."

The Royal English Opera Company commenced a very successful fortnight's season at the new Grand Theatre on the 3rd ult., the house being crowded on most nights to overflowing and the receipts considerably exceeding those netted by the Company at the Covent Garden and Standard Theatres, London, for an equal number of performances. The only absolute novelties attempted were Herr Nessler's "Piper of Hamelin" and M. Paladilhe's "Suzanne," but there were several quasinovelties, such as Auber's "Fra Diavolo" and Mozart's "Nozze di Figaro," which have not been heard in Birmingham for many years, and which excited interest accordingly. Madame Julia Gaylor, Madame Blanche Cole, Miss Philippine Siedle, and Messrs. J. W. Turner, Packard, George Fox, and James Sauvage were the exponents of the principal characters. The band, under the direction of Mr. Julian Edwards, was a large and fairly effective one, and the chorus, though lacking in the strength and precision which Mr. Carl Rosa's chorus, for instance, is wont to exhibit, was above the average of English operatic ventures.

Mr. Stratton's final Chamber Concert, on the 18th ult., was specially noteworthy for its introduction of a new and important work of more than average merit by a local composer, Dr. Swinnerton Heap. The work in question, a Sonata in D minor for piano and violin, consists of the usual four movements, and follows pretty closely the lines of classic models, but it exhibits at the same time considerable originality of style and treatment, in combination with ideas of marked elegance and even dignity. The second movement, Andante espressivo in C major, whilst eminently melodious and rhythmical, is entirely free from commonplace, and the second subject in particular is remarkable for its charm and freshness. The Scherzo, which alternates between the major and minor modes of A, is a sportive moto continuo for the violin, with ingenious accompaniment for the pianoforte, and the final Allegro maestoso, whilst abounding in contrasts of style and feeling, is well knit and artistically worked out. The composition was capitally played, and enthusiastically applauded by the critical company present. Mozart's string Quintet in G minor, and that of Schumann for piano and strings, Op. 44, were spiritedly rendered, and Dr. Heap acquitted himself with his wonted skill and effect in Schumann's fanciful sequence of "Carnival scenes." Mr. Stratton has published an interesting catalogue of the works performed at his concerts during the five seasons of their duration. The list embraces no less than seventy composers, classic and modern. Beethoven has been laid under contribution seventeen times, and after him the chief contributors have been Schumann, Mendelssohn, and Schubert. Seven works by modern composers were written for or first performed at these concerts.

Miss Agnes Miller's second annual Concert took place on the 20th ult., when she was assisted by Miss Emily Shinner (violin) and Miss Edith Santley (vocalist). The interest of the Concert centred in Miss Miller's playing of Beethoven's pianoforte Sonata in F minor (Op. 57), better known as the "Appassionata," in which Miss Miller displayed remarkable power and breadth of style, especially delighting her hearers by her impassioned playing of the opening Allegro and by the tenderness and refinement with which she gave the beautiful Andante. Subsequently Miss Miller exhibited much delicacy and fantastic grace in a couple of Fantasiestücke by Rudorff, and three Bagatelles by Bargiel. Schumann's Sonata in D minor (Op. 121), for pianoforte and violin, furnished scope for some effective playing by the two lady instrumentalists, and Miss Shinner won great applause by her really admirable performance of Bach's Prelude and Gavotte in E minor, and Miss Edith Santley's singing of an Irish Lullaby, by Villiers Stanford, Gounod's song, "Ce qu'est le lierre sans l'ormeau," and a fine old song "Vinto e l'amor," from Handel's "Ottone," was distinguished by refinement and expressiveness.

On the 25th, Mr. Sims Reeves's re-appearance, after an absence of nearly two years, filled the Town Hall to overflowing with an enthusiastic audience. The popular English tenor was accompanied by the Misses Robertson (who took their farewell of Birmingham on this occasion), Mr. Santley, Mr. Barrington Foote, Mdle. Marie Krebs, and other artists. Mr. Reeves sang Beethoven's "Ade-laide," Dibdin's "Tom Bowling," and, with Mr. Santley, in Brahms's duet "All's well," in his best style, and was enthusiastically recalled after each effort. The Misses Robertson produced a great impression by their singing of the Venetian boat song of Blumenthal, and Mr. Santley especially delighted the audience by his singing of "Revenge, Timotheus cries," and "Le nom de Marie" (Gounod).

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

At a Recital given in the Leeds Philosophical Hall, on February 27, and at a second performance in the Church Institute, Bradford, on the 14th ult., Mr. Alfred Christensen, a young Danish pianist, introduced himself to Yorkshire musicians. Mr. Christensen is a native of Copenhagen, and a member of the Royal Academy of Music, Berlin, and his performances on these two occasions secured him a hearty welcome. Modest in demeanour and possessed of commendable taste, he is apparently endowed with superior intelligence, and commands remarkable dexterity. His interpretation of several exacting solos lacked nothing in the way of artistic qualities. As an exhibition pure and simple of the capabilities of the pianist, each Recital was highly successful. With Mr. Christensen was associated a talented Leeds violinist, Mr. Edgar Haddock, whose solos were interesting, and were rendered with intelligence and skill. It may be added that the pianist comes to this country with excellent testimonials.

The final Chamber Concert of the season took place in the Albert Hall, Leeds, on the 11th ult. This was the crowning point of a most successful though limited season—limited, that is to say, in respect of the number of concerts, for there have only been three such gatherings during the winter. The promoter never had, however, such cause as at the present moment to congratulate himself on the success of the undertaking. The Albert Hall was much too small for the requirements of the second Concert, which took place in February, and had it been twice as big, the demand for seats on this occasion would probably have been within measurable distance of the supply. One cause for the large gathering—undoubtedly the prime one—was the appearance of Herr Joachim, who so seldom makes Leeds a stopping place that no other explanation is needed for this extraordinary display of eagerness for chamber music. More than thirty years have gone by since Herr Joachim's last visit to Leeds, and yet his name has the power which none other among violin virtuosos can command. The Chaconne in D minor of J. S. Bach, followed by a Bourrée from the works of the same master, constituted his solos on this occasion, and afforded amateurs ample opportunity of judging the violinist equally in the capacity of musician as of soloist. The Concert was also unusually interesting on account of the appearance of Mr. Walter Bache, who was heard, we believe, for the first time in Leeds. His performances, at first regarded with curiosity, drew forth admiration of the most genuine order. Along with Mr. Bache, Liszt too, as a composer, may fairly be said to have been on his trial in Leeds, and the result may be summed up in the record of but faint sympathy with the master, and undivided satisfaction with the disciple. Liszt's unexampled genius for compilation, if such his music may be called, and his power of producing rich and beautiful effects, were recognised by everybody; but it was not until the pianist had concluded an exquisite performance of one of Chopin's Polonaises that the storm of applause which had been gathering finally broke. The programme included Beethoven's Quartet in C major (Op. 59) and Schubert's Quintet in A major, in the rendering of which were associated Herr Joachim, Herr Speelman, Mr. Gibson, and Mr. Charles Ould. There was also an admirable performance, on the part of Mr. Walter Bache and Mr. Charles Ould, of the second of Mendelssohn's Sonatas for pianoforte and cello (Op. 58). Miss Damian was the vocalist, and she proved fully equal to the occasion. The Concert was the thirteenth which has been given in Leeds under the management of Mr. J. R. Ford (who has been fortunate in having the assistance of Mr. Townsend). Apparently more than satisfied with the success of the undertaking, the promoter announces a series of six concerts for next season.

Mr. Midgley's second Chamber Concert took place in the Bradford Church Institute on February 29, when an admirable programme was submitted. The artists were Signor Risegari (first violin), Herr Hunnemann (second violin), Herr Otto Bernhardt (viola), Mr. H. Smith (violin-cello), Mr. Dearlove (contrabass), and Mr. Midgley (pianoforte). One of the selections was Sterndale Bennett's

Sestet for pianoforte and strings (Op. 8), a work of great dignity and refinement, to which excellent justice was done. Beethoven's Quartet, Op. 18, No. 3, in D, and Schumann's Quintet for piano and strings, were also given, the latter being especially well received. For solos Mr. Midgley gave Weber's Sonata in D, Signor Risegari a movement from Spohr's Ninth Violin Concerto, and, in response to an encore, a Cavatina by Raff, and Herr Bernhardt Vieuxtemps's "Elegie."

On the 5th ult. Mr. E. Misdale gave the second of his Chamber and Vocal Concerts, in the Bradford Church Institute. There was novelty in the selections, the clarinet being brought into prominent use. Mozart's clarinet Quintet, the same composer's Trio for piano, clarinet, and viola, in E flat, Op. 14, and Weber's Duo in E flat, Op. 47, served admirably to show the excellent purpose to which the clarinet can be put in conjunction with other instruments. Haydn's String Quartet, No. 78, was also performed. Mr. C. Fawcett took the clarinet parts of the three first-named compositions, and the other instrumentalists were Mr. Rees (first violin), Mr. A. Healey (second violin), Mr. J. Drake (viola), Mr. Cross (violin-cello), and Mr. Misdale (pianoforte). Mr. Drake gave as a viola solo a Romance by Reinecke. Miss Williford was the vocalist.

The nineteenth season of the Bradford Subscription Concerts was brought to a close on the 7th ult., when to the resources of Mr. Hallé's band were added the services of Herr Joachim and Madame Patey. The violinist on this occasion played Spohr's Concerto in D minor, the Romance from his own Hungarian Concerto, and the third and fourth books of the Hungarian Dances. In response to an encore Herr Joachim added another of the Dances. Madame Patey sang Beethoven's "In questa tomba," Giordani's "Caro mio ben," and the Spirit Song (Haydn). The orchestral selections were of an important class, and included Dvorák's Rhapsodie Slav. Saint-Saëns's "Poème Symphonique" was most effective; indeed, in the hands of the members of this orchestra it could not have been otherwise. Gade's Symphony in C minor (Op. 5), was the opening piece, and the Coronation March from "Le Prophète" concluded an admirable performance.

The Bradford Festival Choral Society gave its first Concert of the year on the 21st ult. in St. George's Hall. Two familiar works were chosen for performance, namely, Mendelssohn's "Athalie" and Handel's "Acis and Galatea," the former of which was given only last year. The soloists for Handel's work were Miss Tomlinson, Messrs. Blagbro', Mellor, and Thornton Wood; and the principals in the performance of "Athalie" were Miss Norton, Miss Cockroft, and Mrs. Clark. Mr. Herbert Thompson, barister, recited the interpolatory readings. The choruses were rendered most satisfactorily, but the band was somewhat weak and scarcely so well balanced as one could have desired. Mr. Burton was the Conductor.

On the 18th ult. a Concert was given by Mdlle. de Nolhac, in the Mechanics' Institute, Wakefield; the pianist having the assistance of Miss Marian McKenzie and Mr. Herbert Thorndike, vocalists. An excellent programme was gone through. Among Mdlle. de Nolhac's solos was the well known "Waldstein" Sonata in C, of Beethoven.

During Lent Bach's Passion Music (St. Matthew) is being sung in weekly portions in York Minster by the ordinary choir and with organ accompaniment, under the direction of Dr. Naylor, the organist. We believe this is the first occasion on which the Passion has been performed in York Minster. The services are much appreciated and largely attended.

MUSIC IN THE WEST.

ALTHOUGH the season of Lent is not generally a favourable one for Concerts, a very fair number took place in Bristol last month. They were, however, chiefly of the sober type, when "the rule of evening dress" is not observed. The musical interest of the place has centred a good deal on the Monday Popular Concerts, three of which were given during the past month, on the 3rd, the 17th, and the 31st, the latter being at too late a date for a detailed notice to appear in this letter. The programme on the 3rd was as follows: Overture "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," Mendelssohn; Symphony in C minor, No. 5, Beethoven; Overture "Oberon," Weber; Introduction to the first and third acts "Lohengrin," Wagner; Ballet Music "Coppelia," L. Delibes; Selection "Il Trovatore," Verdi; Songs "Honour and Arms," Handel; "One more," Lord Henry Somerset; "The two Grenadiers," Schumann; "Hybrias, the Cretan," Elliott. The Symphony was the great treat of the evening, and was played with especial vigour and intelligence, leaving little to be desired, the only observable fault being an occasional weakness in the horns, besides the usual want of even balance between wind and strings, which, however, is merely a question of money, and no doubt if the Concerts are well supported, as they richly deserve to be, the number of strings will be increased. The expression in the Andante was most satisfactory, and the last movement was given with an immense amount of "go." The music from "Lohengrin" was given with marvellous effect, manifestly producing a profound impression on the audience, the absolute stillness of the packed hall being very remarkable. Mr. W. Brereton, of London, was the vocalist, and gained warm admiration by his thoroughly musicianly singing, his fine bass voice having evidently been most carefully trained, and his enunciation being particularly clear and good. Mr. George Riseley conducted with his usual ability.

The Concert on the 17th ult. was not quite so well attended as the former one, notwithstanding the great attraction of Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, which was most admirably given by the band, and listened to with rapt attention by the audience. The least want of perfect tune was now and then perceptible among the strings, and a slight want of compactness was observable in the first movement; but the effect, as a whole, was quite delightful. The first item in the Concert was the Overture to "Euryanthe" (Weber), in which the wind sadly overweighed the strings, much of the work of the latter being almost lost. The second part of the programme opened with Mr. W. Macfarren's Concertstück for piano and orchestra, the composer himself being the pianist. Mr. Macfarren is such an established favourite in Bristol that it is needless to say that a most hearty reception was given to himself and his composition. The last piece of the evening was a selection from Flotow's opera "Martha," several of the well-known airs being arranged as solos for the various instruments. On this occasion Mr. Hirwen Jones was the vocalist.

On the 13th and 15th ult. the celebrated harpist, Mr. John Thomas, gave Recitals at Victoria Rooms, when Mr. Cedric Bucknall, Mus. Bac., Oxon., presided at the organ, and also one on the 14th ult. at Colston Hall, with Mr. Riseley at the organ. Mr. Riseley gave Organ Recitals on the 1st, 6th, 15th, and 22nd ult.

On the 25th ult. Miss Agnes Zimmermann gave a Pianoforte Recital at Victoria Rooms. Miss Zimmermann is always so popular here that we were surprised to see the room only half full, but if not a very large audience it was a very appreciative one, and Miss Zimmermann received the most hearty applause after each effort. The programme was remarkably well chosen. Miss Zimmermann's beautiful touch and musicianly style is too well known to need comment. Miss de Fonblanque was to have been the vocalist, but, owing to indisposition, was unable to appear. Her place was supplied by Mr. Edward Birch, of London.

The principal Concerts at Exeter lately have been—February 26, the Exeter Branch of the Western Counties Musical Association gave a Concert, when Cowen's "Rose Maiden" was performed, with a miscellaneous selection. The vocal music was highly effective. The orchestral Society gave Beethoven's Overture, "Men of Prometheus," very fairly indeed, considering the recent formation of the Society. On the 8th ult. there was a Concert by the Exeter People's Concert Society, and on the 1st and 22nd ult. Organ Recitals were given at Victoria Hall by Mr. D. J. Wood.

Miss Aylward's first Chamber Concert of the season was given at Salisbury, on the 13th ult., when there was a large audience. The executants were Miss Aylward, Messrs. Burnett, W. H. Hill, E. H. Moberly, and Whitehouse; and the programme included Beethoven's string Trio in C minor, No. 3; Schumann's Quintet in E flat, for piano and strings; Mendelssohn's Sonata in B flat, for piano and cello; and Beethoven's Romance in F, for violin solo. Miss Alexandra Ehrenberg was the vocalist, and was very successful in all her songs. Mr. Augustus Aylward was the accompanist, and the Concert seemed to give great satisfaction, the applause, especially to Miss Aylward, being very hearty.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

ON the 3rd ult. a Concert was given by Madame and Miss C. Armstrong, two vocalists of some local distinction. Mr. Santley was the chief attraction, his selections including Hatton's "To Anthea," and "Old Simon, the Cellarer," as well as the more classic "Revenge, Timotheus cries," from "Alexander's Feast." The Concert was not, however, merely of a ballad character, several instrumentalists of local celebrity also taking part in it, namely, Mr. Francis Orosz (piano), Miss Agnes D. Hamilton (violin), and Mr. C. D. Hamilton (violoncello). Miss Hamilton contributed a Mazurka by Wieniawski, and Sarabande by Leclair; and Mr. Hamilton played a Fantaisie by Servais, "Souvenir de Spa"; both artists acquitting themselves with skill and grace. A pianoforte Transcription, by Liszt, of the Overture to "Tannhäuser" was the contribution of Mr. Orosz. Mr. Bridgman acted as piano accompanist.

The Portobello Choral Society gave a Concert in the Town Hall of that town, on the 7th ult. Gounod's "Messe Solennelle" formed the principal part of the programme. Under the conductorship of Mr. T. Craig, this beautiful composition of the distinguished Frenchman was very creditably rendered on the part both of the chorus and the soloists, Messrs. Smart, Craig, and Clark, and Miss Simpson. There was also an orchestra, under the skilful leadership of Mr. Waddell, who with three other members of the band, added much to the pleasure of the evening by playing, in excellent style, one of Haydn's Quartets. Sullivan's Cantata "On Shore and Sea," was also performed, the solo parts being taken by Mr. Borthwick and Miss Gibson.

The seventeenth annual Concert of the University Musical Society, on the 14th ult., was, as usual, one of the most deservedly popular and successful of the season. Those who remember the early years of the Students' Association—the first of its kind in Scotland, but the good example of which has been followed by our other three universities—can realise the efforts which have been made, and can appreciate the steady progress which, despite almost every drawback, has been achieved since Sir Herbert Oakeley, President and Conductor, determined to make Scottish students sing in parts, thus introducing a novel element in their College life, and one which may in after years prove a source of lasting solace and delight, as well as being of invaluable and peculiar service to such of them as may become connected with the Church. I believe it is a fact that at the commencement of the winter session, in November, only a small nucleus of the previous year's members exists, and that the majority each year consists of raw recruits, who do not know, and have never sung a note—at least of choral harmony. What the labour and perseverance must be in moulding such material into shape, only those, I should think, who have to do with training tyros can realise. The result, as evidenced at the last Concert, was alike a matter of surprise and of congratulation, and I give both efforts and results all the more prominence on account of the curiously ungenerous attitude of some of the local press in withholding in this case "credit where credit is due," an attitude which is becoming so marked as to be generally commented on.

I understand that the chorus of students, some 200 strong, of the "University Musical Society," although instructed by the professor of music, do not form, as in the case of other students professionally taught, part of his regular "class," so that his work for them is entirely unremunerated. They may join the Society on payment to its treasurer of trifling fees, which annually accumulate as a reserve fund, the annual Concert generally paying its own expenses. The first notes of the Conductor's spirited "Alma Mater," which is also sung this session at Aberdeen and at St. Andrew's Universities, evidenced a fine body of tone, and highly satisfactory progress. In this piece, in Mendelssohn's Fest Gesang, No. 2, and, as an entire contrast, in Verdi's fine chorus "Va pensiero," the broad unison effects showed off the male chorus to the best advantage, but in the more delicate part-songs, such as "The Knight's Farewell," "Loreley," "Carinthian Courtship," and a charming "Old Dutch Song" (encored), there was an attention to light and shade which, in the circumstances mentioned, is remarkable. A violinist, a tenor, and two baritone vocalists varied the selection by performing four solos, including Oakeley's songs "Happy hours" and "Flow down, cold rivulet," the latter as an encore, and Sterndale Bennett's "Maiden mine." A feature of the Concert was the orchestral accompaniments, of which eight were written by the Conductor, and the four overtures—"Prometheus," "Nozze di Figaro," "Ruy Blas," and "Guillaume Tell"—were so effectively given by the band of professionals and amateurs as to elicit general and hearty applause, which in the case of Mendelssohn's fiery Prelude amounted to an encore. It may be mentioned, by the way, that the Concert of St. Andrew's University Musical Society, of which the Edinburgh professor is also president and Conductor, is announced for the 1st inst.

I must be brief with the remaining musical events of the month. A Concert of chamber-music was given in Queen Street Hall on the afternoon of the 15th ult., the instrumental performers being Messrs. Risegari and Spielman, violins: Herr Bernhardt, viola; and M. Vieuxtemps, violoncello; Madame De Greiner, vocalist; and Mr. F. Gibson, accompanist. The concerted music was admirably interpreted.

The members of the Edinburgh Philosophical Institution every year lighten and vary their presumably severer studies with a Concert. This has always been of the same character, and nearly always the same artists have appeared from year to year, namely, Herr Joachim and Signor Piatti, with Mdle. Marie Krebs as solo pianist. The music hall was, on the present occasion, the 19th ult., densely crowded as hitherto, and though on the whole a somewhat light programme was submitted, the whole entertainment seemed to afford much pleasure to the audience. Mendelssohn's Trio in D minor was splendidly given by the above-named artists, and Miss Ambler made a good impression, especially in Cowen's song "The old love and the new."

The second Recital by the Senior and Junior Musical Associations of Brighton Street "Evangelical Union" Church took place in the Church, on the 14th ult., Mr. A. Greenslade conducting.

Recitals of Organ Music were given by Sir Herbert Oakeley, in the Class-room, on the 7th and 20th ult. At the former Concert a Funeral March by the Reid professor, in memory of Dr. John Hullah, was played by one of the students. There was a large attendance of students and others on both occasions.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

WHILE the Choral Union Concerts are "running" any other musical entertainment has scarcely a chance of securing the attention of our citizens, and consequently the field is left nearly entirely free to them; but the instant these Concerts cease all the lesser caterers, public or semi-private, begin to occupy the vacant ground, and with more or less success, the appetite, however, generally being cloyed rather than whetted with the great feast that has just been concluded.

A quarter of a century ago the Glasgow Abstiners' Union started a winter series of Saturday Evening Concerts in the City Hall, at prices of admission ranging, as a rule, from threepence to eightpence. The season runs from the end of September to the end of April, and the Concerts have been given every year since, without a break. They have been chiefly of the ballad kind, but the artists are often of the best class, Mr. Sims Reeves, the late Mdille. Titiens, Madame Trebelli, Signor Foli, and many other distinguished vocalists, as well as eminent instrumentalists, having appeared to crowded audiences of the humbler portion of the community, to whom, as should be explained, the Concerts chiefly appeal. The taste has not risen with these audiences quite as high as might have been expected, but yet the refining and educative influence of the Concerts has been very marked; "Comic nights," for instance, once the events of the season, have now almost entirely disappeared. Among the most valued occasions during the season are those on which the Glasgow Select Choir appear, their refined part-singing—not alone of Scotch music—attracting always a very large audience. An attempt on the part of the Abstainers' Union to duplicate the Concerts in St. Andrew's Hall before and after the Choral Union season has not met, as yet, with much success, but their firm establishment is only, I believe, a matter of time.

Since my last letter, several musical associations connected with churches have been giving their annual Concerts. On February 26, a Concert took place by the choir of Greenhead United Presbyterian Church, at which Farmer's Mass in B flat, a favourite work with church societies here, was fairly well rendered chorally. The solos were competently interpreted by Misses Pollock and Ferguson and Messrs. Howell and Riddell. Mr. A. D. Inglis conducted, and Messrs. Halstead and Black accompanied on the piano and Liszt organ respectively.

The St. Columba Musical Association, connected with St. Columba Parish Church, Anglo-Celtic, of which the father of the late Rev. Dr. Norman Macleod, the well known editor of "Good Words," was for many years minister, submitted a rather remarkable, and from a local point of view an interesting enough, programme on February 27, in the Christian Institute. The choral pieces sung were entirely the compositions or arrangements of resident musicians. Mr. William Carter, junr., who has charge of the English service in the church, was the conductor, and the Concert passed off with considerable success. The choir of Laurieston Parish Church sang a miscellaneous selection of music, on the 28th of the same month; Mr. William Davidson, organist of the church, conducting, and Mr. J. Pattinson, Mus. Bac., accompanying. On the same evening the Musical Association of John Street United Presbyterian Church, under Mr. George Taggart, rendered Mendelssohn's "Come, let us sing" and Romberg's "Harmony of the Spheres," with excellent effect in both instances. Messrs. L. and G. Hall accompanied.

At Kilmalcolm, some miles west from Glasgow, but resided in largely by city people, a Concert was given by the Parish Kirk Association, the selections being exclusively sacred and of a not too ambitious class, though including such choice anthems as Gounod's "Send out thy light," Goss's "O taste and see," and Stainer's "What are these?" The Concert was under the direction of Mr. A. Oatley.

An Organ having been recently put into Berkeley Street United Presbyterian Church—the organ is firmly taking hold in Scotland, in town and country alike—Mr. Thomas Berry, Organist of Trinity Congregational Church, gave a Recital of music, on the 3rd ult., calculated to display the powers of the instrument; and the choir sang some anthems.

In Woodside Parish Church, divine worship in which is conducted somewhat after the manner of cathedral service, the choir consisting exclusively of boys and men, a Service of sacred music was given on the 4th ult. The novel composition of the choir—novel to us in Presbyterian Scotland—attracted a considerable assemblage, and the singing generally was fairly good. The selection of music was not, however, entirely of the choicest.

A generally acceptable performance of "The Messiah" took place in St. Andrew's Hall, on the 7th ult., the choristers being the Glasgow Tonic-Solfa Choral Society, nearly 400 strong, and under the energetic guidance of Mr. W. M. Miller. Miss Clara Samuel, Madame Isabel Fassett, Mr. Hirwen Jones, and Signor Foli were the soloists. Dr. A. L. Peace was at the organ, and there was a small orchestra, led by Mr. T. Smyth. There was a very numerous audience.

The "Members of the Ladies' Choir, in connection with the Sunday afternoon Children's Services," in Hillhead Parish Church, gave a Concert, on the 17th ult., the selections being chiefly for ladies' voices. The singing was marked by refinement and taste.

A "Service of Sacred Music," was given by the Choir of St. John's Wesleyan Church, on the 19th ult., in aid of the Organ Fund. A Te Deum, by Dykes; anthems by Stainer, Barnby, Macfarren, and Elvey, were sung. Mr. Jonathan Howell conducted, and Mr. George Hopper, Organist of the Church, presided at the organ.

The annual Concert by the Choir of Trinity Congregational Church, took place on the 28th ult. Gaul's Cantata "The Holy City" occupied the principal part of the programme. The choir has for twenty-five years been trained and conducted by Mr. James W. Greig in an honorary capacity, with the aid, in former years, of Dr. A. L. Peace, and now of Mr. Thomas Berry, at the organ. The singing of the choir has as a rule been refined, and the selections high-class, setting an early example in these respects to other churches in Glasgow.

MUSIC IN AMERICA.

NEW YORK, March 8.

THE criticisms on "Princess Ida," by the American press are somewhat unfavourable, and are certainly rather remarkable for uniformity. Meantime the work is going on at the Fifth Avenue Theatre to at least fair, and I believe improving business, and the indications are such as to warrant that astute manager, Mr. John Stetson, in preparing for taking it "on the road" by two or three companies at once.

I have already informed you of Miss Helen Hopekirk's success with the critics and the public. Of the final recital a rigorous and exacting judge wrote a highly laudatory notice, which must give much pleasure to the home friends of this admirable Scottish artist.

The second of this season's private Concerts of our foremost male singing society, the German Liederkrantz, offered the following programme:—1, Overture, Scherzo u. Finale (Op. 52), Schumann; 2, "Nenie," Op. 10 (new), Goetz; 3, Concerto Romantique for Violin (M. Musin), Benj. Godard; 4, (a) "So Weit," Engelsberg, (b) "Weisst du Noch," chorus with bass solo (male chorus), Debois; 5, "Die Loreley," (Miss Emma Juch) Liszt; 6, Aufforderung Zum Tanz, Weber-Berlioz; 7, Final chorus from third act, "Die Meistersinger, R. Wagner. The Liederkrantz has both male chorus and mixed chorus, of admirable quality. The Concerts, which occur regularly each winter, are given in the excellent music-hall of the new club-house in Fifty-eighth Street. The orchestra is that of Mr. Theodore Thomas, who is the Liederkrantz conductor.

The following was the programme of the fourth Concert of the Philharmonic Society on February 16:—Symphony, C minor (Scandinavian), F. H. Cowen; Variations (Theme, Haydn—Chorale St. Antoni), Brahms; Scherzo, "Queen Mab" (Romeo and Juliet), Berlioz; Symphony, C minor, No. 5, Op. 67 (Beethoven).

The second Concert of the New York Chorus Society, on February 20, included the "Deutsches Requiem," of Brahms, and Mendelssohn's "A Midsummer Night's Dream" music. These Concerts have been taken out of the category of strictly public performances, being open only to the subscribers for the season. The subscriptions providing, once for all, an ample fund, no concession to supposed "popular" taste is necessary in construction of the programmes, and the Concerts are attended by great audiences.

A "People's Concert Society" has been formed which will continue the gracious work of giving these free performances of great and good music to working-men and their families, in hours at which only they are free to attend them. The tickets, up to the seating capacity of the hall, are distributed by the Directors and friends of the enterprise to those persons whom they know to be in need of them, and in the work of the distribution, as I have reason to know, some really touching instances of surprised wonder and gratitude in prospect of pleasure unwonted, or even un hoped-for, have been encountered. When it was suggested to Mr. Thomas that a trivial programme might be expected or preferred, he only said that he should show these people the same respect that he would show an audience of the highest fashion, and that to appear wanting in respect for them was not the way to win them. The first of the Concerts took place on Sunday afternoon, February 24. The spacious hall was filled to the farthest corner, and with precisely the wished-for audience. Certainly no such audience was ever assembled in America to listen to such music. The familiar faces were all absent; in their places a throng of plain, honest people, evidently all such as were reached after by the plan of the enterprise—plain, simple, wage-earning folk, not disguised by the Sunday clothes which they had put on to honour the time and place—many of the elders, but most of young and middle-aged, nearly one-half women, and a few children; and for intelligence of look and sobriety, or even propriety and essential dignity of demeanour, I should like to match them against any audience of the land. The attention to the music was most profound, and I am sure it will be with real pleasure that you learn that the Fifth Symphony, out of all the programme, awakened the loudest and longest applause.

The sale of tickets for the coming Wagner performances is so large that it seems probable the audiences will be limited only by the size of the great theatre which is to contain them. The programmes for the early Concerts are just published. They will be given at the Metropolitan Opera House. The subscriptions are already for half the house, though until now nothing has been known concerning the programmes. The first concerts will be three in number; the orchestra will comprise 150 instruments, the New York Chorus Society will sing the choral portions, and Miss Emma Juch, Miss Emily Winant, Mr. Theodore Toedt, and Mr. Franz Remmert have been engaged to assist the three eminent Wagner interpreters from the Imperial Opera at Vienna, Frau Materna and Herren Winkelmann and Scaria. On Tuesday evening, April 22, the programme will consist of extracts from "Tannhäuser," "Die Walküre," and "Siegfried." From the first opera the overture and first scene, the first three scenes of Act II. and the march and chorus will be given. The "Walküre" selections are the Ride of the Valkyries and Wotan's farewell to Brinhilde, to be sung by Herr Scaria. The last number will be the finale of Act III. of "Siegfried," with Materna as Brinhilde and Herr Winkelmann as Siegfried.

On April 24, the concert will open with the Centennial March, to be followed by the love duo and finale of Act II. from "Tristan und Isolde." Several numbers will be given from "Die Meistersinger," namely, Hans Sachs's monologue, the quintet, the choruses of tailors, cobblers, bakers, the dances of apprentices, procession of the mastersingers, and choral, Walter's prize song and finale.

At the matinée on April 26, the programme will be as follows:—I. "The Flying Dutchman": (a) Overture; (b) Introduction, ballad and spinning chorus, Act II. II. "Die Meistersinger": (a) Vorspiel, Act I.; (b) Pogner's address. III. "Die Gotterdammerung": All of Act III.

The first appearance, however, of the Vienna artists will be in Boston, where six performances will be given in the great hall of the Massachusetts Mechanics' Charitable Association, which will be remodelled for the occasion by a forward extension of the spacious stage and the construction on the main floor of an amphitheatre of three tiers of boxes. The orchestra, under Mr. Thomas, will comprise 150 players. A chorus of 600 picked voices is now rehearsing under Mr. J. B. Sharland. The solo artists besides the Viennese are to be the same as in New York. The characteristic choruses in the third act of "Die Meistersinger" will be sung by the New York Liederkranz, which will visit Boston for the purpose. The following is the complete scheme:—

Monday evening, April 14: "Tannhäuser"—Overture, Bacchanale. Chorus of Sirens; Scenes 1, 2, 3, Act II.; March and Chorus "Walküre," Act III.—Ride of the Valkyries; Wotan's Farewell. "Siegfried"—Finale, Act III.

Tuesday evening, April 15: Eroica Symphony, Beethoven. "Die Meistersinger," Act III.—Prelude; Sachs's Monologue; Quintet; Finale. Choruses by the New York Liederkranz.

Wednesday afternoon, April 16: Centennial March. "Rheingold"—(a) The Theft of the Gold; (b) Wotan's Apostrophe to Walhalla; (c) Loge's Tidings; (d) Closing Scene. "Walküre," Act III.—Ride of the Valkyries; Wotan's Farewell; Magic-fire Scene.

Wednesday evening, April 16: Huldigungs March. "Tristan und Isolde"—Love Duo and Finale, Act II. "Parafal"—Prelude, Act I.; Flower Girl, Scene and Finale, Act II.; Finale, Act III. (with Chorus).

Thursday afternoon, April 17: "Flying Dutchman"—Overture; Introduction, Ballad, and Chorus of Act II. "Meistersinger"—Vorspiel, Act I.; Pogner's Address. "Parafal"—Flower Scene, Act II.; "Walküre"—Introduction, Siegmund's Love Song, and Finale of Act I.

Thursday evening, April 17: Symphony No. 5, Beethoven. "Gotterdammerung"—Third Act complete.

The fourth Brooklyn Philharmonic Concert, on March 1, was closely like the New York Concert just preceding it. Mr. Cowen's "Scandinavian" Symphony, Brahms's Variations on Haydn's "Chorale St. Antoni," the Liszt symphonic poem "Tasso," and Moszkowski's Violin Concerto, Op. 30, played by the young pupil of Herr Schradieck, Mr. John F. Rhodes, of whose unusual talent I had the pleasure of writing a year ago in the brilliant and too brief Musical Review.

The fifth Concert of the Symphony Society occurs this evening, with the following programme: the "Freischütz" Overture, selections from Berlioz's "L'Enfance du Christ," and Liszt's "Faust" Symphony. The Berlioz music is announced as for the "first time," but the entire work was given under the same direction (Dr. Damrosch's) last winter.

Mr. Rafael Joseffy's health appears confirmed, and his second Concert was given on February 28. The programme included Beethoven's Concerto No. 4, in G (Op. 58); a "Scherzo Fantastique" of Mr. Joseffy, for pianoforte and orchestra, a Bach Bourrée, a Chopin Nocturne, a Schumann Toccata, and the Schubert-Liszt Morgenstaendchen, "Hark, hark, the lark"! The orchestral numbers were the Haydn G major Symphony (B. and H., No. 13), the "Lohengrin" Vorspiel, and Saint-Saëns's Symphonic Poem, "Phaëton."

OBITUARY.

MADAME ANNA BISHOP.—This once famous singer died in New York, on the 20th ult. She was the daughter of a Mr. Riviere, who is vaguely described as "an artist," and was born in London in 1815, or, according to some authorities, a year previous. She became a pupil of the Royal Academy of Music at an early age, and, at one comparatively earlier, entered the marriage state with Mr. (afterwards Sir) Henry Rowley Bishop, the composer. As a very young wife of fifteen or sixteen, Mrs. Bishop began a distinguished career in association with the musical enterprises of her husband at Vauxhall and elsewhere. First limiting her efforts to concert music, she filled a prominent place at oratorio and festival performances, afterwards going on the lyric stage and winning there her most conspicuous laurels. Her triumphs abroad were remarkable. She travelled over the Continent from St. Petersburg to Rome, and everywhere conquered the good opinion of the public. From Europe Madame Bishop (then Lady Bishop) went to the United States, Australia, and South America. Indeed, it is hard to say what place, within the limits of civilisation, this indefatigable artist did not visit. Her last appearance in England was made in 1859, and soon after she took up her residence in America, where, on the death of Sir Henry Bishop, in 1855, she married a Mr. Schulz.

THE Meadowcroft Memorial Prize, offered biennially for a four-part anthem under the auspices of the College of Organists, as well as a prize given by the College itself for an organ postlude, are again offered for competition during the present year, the MSS. to be sent in before the 1st of September, to the Secretary of the College of Organists. We sincerely trust that the well meant efforts of the College and of the Meadowcroft Committee may be attended with greater success on the present than on previous occasions; but to render this possible we venture to point out that mere absolute grammatical correctness is not the only, nor the highest, test to apply to works sent in for competition, as many highly respectable, yet withal still-born, prize compositions amply testify.

LONDON AND NEW YORK: NOVELLO, EWER & CO.

A CROWDED audience assembled at the Theatre of the Museum and Library, Bristol, on the 18th ult., to hear a lecture by Mr. Walter Macfarren on "The Literature of the Pianoforte." Premising that his discourse would more particularly have reference to what had been written "for the instrument" rather than "on the instrument," he said his argument was that the invention and subsequent perfection of the pianoforte had, by eliciting literature of unequalled extent and beauty, done more than anything else to create and foster that love for music which now happily permeated the civilised world. Mentioning that before the pianoforte was introduced the harpsichord family prevailed generally, he briefly described the salient characteristics of the old instrument, and, speaking of the restrictions it imposed, he said the current music of the period to which he was referring was for the greater part bold and conventional. It was true that John Sebastian Bach wrote for the clavichord, as it was called in his own country, but the genius of that great man converted into gold everything he touched, and his foresight was so great as to induce him to set down combinations impossible of realisation at the time they were written, and which had only been realised since the invention of the pianoforte. The pianoforte dated, they might say, from the dawn of the 18th century, for in 1709 an Italian designed and manufactured four specimens of the instrument, and he was afraid they must have been very rough specimens. The instrument did not take root till the latter half of the 18th century, and it was recorded that in the year 1767 "a new instrument, called the pianoforte, was played upon at the Theatre Royal, Covent Garden." The following year John Christian Bach, "the English Bach," one of the sons of the immortal John Sebastian Bach, performed a solo on the pianoforte in London. In the year 1770 a German harpsichord maker, assisted by John Broadwood and his apprentice, constructed the first grand pianoforte. A period of a little over a century had therefore elapsed since the pianoforte became a fact. In the course of that period, limited in the history of art, the pianoforte had acquired for itself a literature of such extent as to be out of all comparison with any instrument, excepting perhaps the "human voice," over which it had the advantage of not being so liable "to take cold." The violin was exquisitely beautiful in combination, but was comparatively rarely heard by itself. Even the grandest of instruments, the organ, with its vast resources, had, by comparison with the pianoforte, a limited répertoire of original music. Having recited, with admirable inflection of voice and exquisite feeling, Leigh Hunt's beautiful poem "The lover of music to his pianoforte," the lecturer proceeded to the leading feature of his evening's exposition, illustrations of some of the contributors to the wealth of pianoforte literature of which he had been speaking. Commencing with Haydn, he referred to his twenty beautiful sonatas, besides the great quantity of detached pieces which he had contributed to the pianoforte repertory. He then delighted the audience by playing, with masterly skill, Haydn's Variations in F minor, and then, coming to Mozart, he selected for illustration the Rondo in A minor, which Mendelssohn spoke of as "one of the greatest Rondos ever produced." As an example of his genius nothing could be happier, and it contained a wealth of melody, variety of expression, elegant phraseology, and, at the same time, masterly design and treatment. Mr. Macfarren illustrated each of these points by the telling manner in which he brought them out in his interpretation. Hastening on to Beethoven, he said that this composer, perhaps more than any other, had contributed to the wealth of the literature of the pianoforte, and even if he had done nothing else than write for us the thirty-two immortal sonatas, his name must have stood high over the heads of other composers. Having for a moment amused his audience with the preposterous stories told about the title of the Moonlight sonata, for which there was no foundation, he thought the title could only have arisen from its wonderfully soft and beautiful opening, and he then played it with such delicacy and tender, loving care for the beautiful theme that his auditors listened with rapt attention and delight, and at the close greeted him with a spontaneous outburst of applause. From Beethoven to Cramer seemed, he said, a great leap, but John Baptist Cramer rendered great service to the pianoforte by those wonderfully concise and epigrammatic studies, which seemed to comprise in a nutshell beautiful thought and the most apt illustration of some particular form of difficulty. He gave as an illustration the Studies in C, E minor, D, and G, and followed these with Weber's "L'Invitation pour la Valse," Mendelssohn's Fantasia in F sharp minor, Frederick Chopin's Nocturne in F sharp, Op. 15, and Valse in D flat, Op. 64; Schumann's "Arabesque," Op. 18; Sterndale Bennett's "Genevieve" and "Rondo Piacevole," Op. 25, and some choice examples of the lecturer's own compositions, "Second Scherzo," "Rondeau à la Berceuse," and "Impromptu Gavotte."

AFTER a somewhat prolonged interval since the first performance, the second of the current series of Denmark Hill Concerts was given at the Surrey Masonic Hall, Camberwell, on Friday evening, the 14th ult., the occasion being one of especial interest by the annual re-appearance of Herr Joachim. The famous Hungarian artist, who met with his accustomed ovation, played Beethoven's Romance in F and, as an encore, one of the familiar Hungarian dances. On the termination of the latter piece, Herr Joachim was again summoned to the platform. The violoncello was in the hands of Herr Hausmann, who played with eminent success Molique's Andante in D major, and Popper's "Elfentanz." Mdlle. Marie Krebs contributed, with her well-known artistic skill, a Ballo and Bourrée by Gluck, and Mendelssohn's Moto Perpetuo. The concerted works were Cherubini's Quartet in E flat (MM. Joachim, Ries, Zerbini, and Hausmann), and Schumann's Quartet in E flat, Op. 47 (Mdlle. Marie Krebs, MM. Joachim, Zerbini, and Hausmann), both, it need scarcely be said, being finely executed. Songs by Handel and Cowen were sung by Miss Edith Phillips, and Mr. Zerbini discharged, as usual, the duties of accompanist. A highly finished rendering of Brahms's fine Sextet in B flat headed the programme of the third Concert, given on Tuesday evening, the 25th ult., the executants being MM. Joachim, Ries, Hollander, Zerbini, Pezze, and Piatti. Miss Marie Wurm occupied the post of pianist, and elicited well deserved marks of approval by her very efficient interpretation of Chopin's Fantasia in F minor. The leading violinist, who played no solo, was heard in successful association with Miss Wurm in Beethoven's Sonata in G major, Op. 96, and the Concert was brought to a conclusion with Mozart's charming Quintet in E flat, played by MM. Joachim, Ries, Hollander, Zerbini, and Piatti. Miss Little contributed lieder by Schumann, Brahms, Schubert, and Hiller.

THE Upton Choral Society gave its fourth Evening Concert at the Stratford Town Hall, on Thursday, February 28, before a large audience. The programme was an attractive one, and the performance reflected much credit upon the members and their Conductor, Mr. J. Proudman. The first part of the programme consisted of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," which was excellently rendered. The solo vocalists were Miss Ambler, Miss Jones, and Mr. Harper Kearton. The second part of the programme consisted of songs, part-songs, and a clarinet solo by Mr. H. Lazarus. Miss Ambler gave effectively "A bird sat on an alder bough," the charm of which song was much enhanced by the playing of Mr. Lazarus in the clarinet obligato. Mr. Kearton met with much applause for his rendering of "Good night, beloved," and an encore was demanded. The accompanists at the piano and harmonium respectively were Messrs. Kitson and Gilbert.

THE thirty-fourth Annual Report of the Choir Benevolent Fund records the continued prosperity of this excellent Institution, which is not only fully equal to meet the claims that can be made upon it, but has also a large surplus, from the interest of which the Committee hope to continue the annual grants to the widows, which have now been made for the tenth consecutive time. The number of members is steadily increasing, and there can be little doubt that within the last few years the Society has become more generally known and appreciated; yet in order to extend still more its sphere of usefulness the Committee express an earnest hope that no means may be spared to ensure a larger amount of support, a wish which, it need scarcely be said, we cordially echo.

THE People's Concert Society is just concluding its sixth and most successful season of Popular Concerts. Founded in 1878 with the object of bringing good music within easy reach of the poorer classes by means of cheap Concerts, it has been steadily increasing its useful work, and from giving twenty-five Concerts during the first six months of its existence has reached the amount of fifty-seven Concerts given during the present season. The prices charged for admittance (when any) are so very small that the Concerts do not nearly pay their working expenses, and therefore the Society has to depend largely upon the contributions of friends, subscribers, and the kind help given by professional and amateur artists. Saturday and Sunday, being the days of greatest leisure for the working classes, are chosen by the Society as the best on which to give their Concerts, and it is felt that the combined advantages of cultivating a taste for good music and of keeping the people from the public-houses on the "day of rest" far outweigh any scruples as to giving musical performances on Sunday. The Society intends to resume its Concerts next autumn, and appeals for increased support in order to extend its work.

THE monthly Meeting of the Society of Professional Musicians was held on Saturday, the 1st ult., at Derby, in the Town Hall. Mr. Hilton, of Manchester, presided, and there was a large attendance of musicians. Dr. Hiles submitted the proposed rules for the extension of the operations of the Society throughout England, dividing the country into seven districts, in each of which a Sectional Council is to be elected for the management of local arrangements, but subject to a General Council (consisting of two delegates from each section) in all national movements, examinations, &c. Some forty-eight rules have been printed, which are to be fully considered before final adoption, and copies of which may be procured by any professor of music from the Secretary, Mr. Dawber, of Wigan. On the third Saturday in June a large and comprehensive examination in harmony, &c., will be held, under the presidency of Mr. H. Goldschmidt, in the Mayor's Parlour, at the Manchester Town Hall; and examinations in practical music will, at various dates, be held throughout the country.

THE second performance in London of Dr. F. E. Gladstone's Oratorio "Philippi" took place at St. Mark's Church, Hamilton Terrace, on the 25th ult. The ordinary string orchestra was strengthened by three trombones and by drums, and the addition of these instruments so enhanced the general effect that it could only be regretted that the parts written for the other wind instruments were only filled in on the organ, even when so admirably done by the composer himself. The choir, though numerically inferior to that at St. Margaret's, when the work was last done, appeared to be better acquainted with the music, the beautiful Chorus, "In this was manifested," going especially well, and the fugal leads throughout being promptly taken up. The solo parts were sung by Master Roper, Mr. Kenningham, and Mr. Hilton; the violoncello obbligato was played by Mr. Matthew. Subordinate help was given by Masters Hodson and Baker, and Messrs. Noble and Thornthwaite. Dr. Bridge conducted, except during the performance of his Festival setting of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, which he accompanied on the organ, while Dr. Gladstone conducted the orchestra.

THE members of the Evening Choir of Christ Church, Newgate Street, being desirous of showing their high appreciation of their Organist and Choirmaster, Dr. C. J. Frost (who has resigned the appointment and is leaving for St. Peter's, Brockley, where he is to succeed Mr. H. Gadsby), held a meeting in the Parish Vestry-room, on Saturday, the 8th ult., and presented him with a handsome testimonial, consisting of a morocco case containing a set of four silver salts and spoons. Upon the case was a silver plate engraved with the following inscription: "Presented to Charles Joseph Frost, Mus. Doc., Cantab., by the voluntary choir of Christ Church, Newgate Street, as a mark of their respect and esteem.—March, 1884." The presentation was made in a few suitable words by Mr. J. T. Salmon, on behalf of the choir, and was duly acknowledged by the recipient.

ON Wednesday, the 19th ult., a brass tablet was placed in the Cathedral, Christ Church, Oxford, to the memory of Dr. Corfe, Organist from 1846 to 1882, who died in 1883, aged sixty-nine. In 1875 the East Window of the North Choir Aisle was, by his liberality, filled with stained glass representing various incidents in the life of St. Cecilia, and under this window is fixed a record in brass as follows:—

hanc fenestram picturâ exornandam curavit
Car. Gul. Corfe hujus Ecclesiæ Organista
A. D. MDCCCLXXXV.
cujus rei ne pereat memoria hanc tabellam affixit H. G. L. Decanus.

Immediately below, and enclosed within the same border of Caen stone, is the tablet just put up by Dr. Corfe's friends, with the following inscription:—

Obiit vir desideratissimus die Dec. xvj A. D. MDCCCLXXXIII.
Organista ipse organistarum filius et nepos
Qui quum munus suum in hac Æde per annos xxxvj assidue præstitisset et robore non voluntate deficiente abdicasset intra biennium placide in Christo obdormivit annum ægens septuagesimum
hanc tabellam P. C. amici moerentes.

THE Popular Ballad Concert Committee has given some very excellent entertainments at the East End during the past month. On the 3rd, at the Foresters' Hall, an ordinary ballad programme was provided, but on the 10th, at Bermondsey Town Hall, a performance was given of "H.M.S. Pinafore," in a Cantata form, which attracted a very large audience. Permission was kindly granted by Sir Arthur Sullivan and Mr. Gilbert. On the 17th, St. Patrick's Day, an Irish Ballad Concert was given, at which the band of the Coldstream Guards, led by Mr. C. Thomas, rendered very welcome aid; and on the 24th a Concert of a similar character was provided, when the fine band of the Horse Guards, under the direction of Mr. Charles Godfrey, entertained the public with an admirable selection. The Conductor on each occasion was Mr. W. Henry Thomas, who is now busily engaged in training the choirs connected with the Society in the choruses of Handel's "Messiah." The motto of the Committee, "Instruction with Entertainment," is faithfully carried out.

A SPECIAL Choral Service was held in St. Thomas's Church, Portman Square, on Wednesday evening, the 12th ult., the attraction being the performance of a new Sacred Cantata, founded on the "Pilgrim's Progress," composed by Mr. E. Rogers (Organist of St. Thomas's). The composition contains the elements of great popularity, owing partly to the well-selected words and its alliance with so familiar a subject. The themes are melodious, their development interesting, and the form and treatment clear and precise, showing the work of a skilful, as well as a facile, hand. The performance throughout was singularly good. The solo vocalists were Miss Adela Vernon, Mrs. G. L. Edwards, Mr. Alfred Kenningham, and Mr. Henry Baker. Mr. Walter E. Stark presided at the organ, and Mr. Rogers conducted.

ON Thursday evening, February 28, Miss Crisp, Organist of the West Kensington Park Wesleyan Church, read a paper on "Mendelssohn" in the Schoolroom. The choir sang the chorus "How lovely are the messengers" and the part-song "Farewell to the Forest." Miss Crisp's pianoforte solos were "Christmas Song, No. 1," "A Musical Sketch in G minor," and selections from the "Lieder ohne Worte," and Miss Annie Crisp played the Andante and Allegro in A, "Rosen und Nelken in Menge." The solo vocalists were Mrs. Armriding, Mrs. West, and Mr. J. B. West. Violin solos were given by Mr. T. H. Bartschaw, B.A. The paper was a most interesting one, and both it and the illustrations were listened to with great attention.

AN interesting Musical Demonstration, in connection with the Early Closing Association, will take place at St. James's Hall, on the 5th instant, when a vocal and instrumental Concert will be given by the employés in various wholesale and retail houses of business, under the conductorship of Mr. J. Barnby. The arrangements for the Demonstration will be made by a representative Committee, chosen from numerous houses; and the rehearsals which have already taken place are said to reveal an amount of ability highly creditable to amateur talent.

Mr. and Mrs. Richardson-Gardner, with the hope of awakening more interest in the higher education of the blind, have generously provided the means to enable a party of the pupils of the Royal Normal College and Academy of Music for the Blind to visit the Continent, under the conductorship of the Principal, Dr. Campbell. By command of his Majesty the King of the Belgians, the first Concert will be given at the Palace at Brussels, on the afternoon of Friday, the 28th inst. On the 31st a grand Concert will be given at the Singakademie, Berlin, assisted by the Philharmonic Orchestra, under the special patronage of her Imperial Highness the Crown Princess. The programme will include the following works: 1. Selection, "Elijah" (Mendelssohn); 2. Air, "Rejoice greatly" (Handel), Miss Campbell; 3. (a) Anthems, "Lord, for Thy tender mercies' sake" (Farrant); (b) "All creatures now are merry" (Benet); 4. Concerto in E flat for pianoforte and orchestra" Mr. Alfred Hollins; 5. (a) Madrigal, "Flora gave me fairest flowers" (Wilbye); (b) Part-song "Break, break, break" (Sir G. Macfarren); 6. "Ah, rendini" (Rossi), Miss Reece; 7. Variations for two pianos on a theme by Beethoven (Saint-Saëns), Mr. Fred Turner and Mr. Wm. Perks; 8. Song, "I'll sing thee songs of Araby" (Cowen), Mr. Moncrieff; 9. Part-songs—(a) "Lokende Toner" (Kjerulf); (b) "O hush thee my babe" (Sullivan); 10. Fantasia on Hungarian National Melodies for pianoforte and orchestra (Liszt), Miss Jeannie Gilbert; 11. Selections from "Hymn of Praise," Mendelssohn. Concerts will also be given at the Philharmonic in Berlin, at Dresden, and at the Opera House, Leipzig.

THE invitation sent to neighbours and friends by the Bromley (Kent) Orchestral Society to a performance of music, given at the Parish Room on Saturday evening, the 9th ult., met with a hearty response, the room being crowded with a large and sympathetic audience. An excellent programme was provided, and the performance thereof showed that the Society had merit that was likely to prove serviceable at future musical undertakings in the district. In one particular number, Haydn's Symphony in C major, the performers gave indications that their present capabilities had been fairly gauged and successfully applied to a class of music combining entertainment and instruction. Mr. Lionel Clarke, accompanied by Miss Clarke, played a violin solo by B. Tours, and Messrs. De Zoeta, Willis, and Frank Lewis Thomas, gave an excellent rendering of Mendelssohn's Trio for violin, violoncello, and pianoforte. Some very agreeable singing, mostly by members of the orchestra, imparted variety to the entertainment. The conductor, Mr. Frank Lewis Thomas, must be congratulated upon the success of the first concert of the Society.

THE full prospectus of the German Opera season at Covent Garden has been issued. The series will consist of twelve representations, on Wednesdays and Fridays of each week, commencing on June 4 and ending on July 11, and on a Saturday afternoon in July Liszt's Oratorio "Die Heilige Elisabeth" will be performed. The principal artists announced are Madame Albani, Frl. Malten (Dresden), Frl. Schaernack (Weimar), Frl. Boers (Hanover), Frl. Kalmann (Cologne), Herren Gudehus (Dresden), Stritt (Frankfort), Schroedter (Prague), Riechmann (Vienna), Scheidemantel (Weimar), Wiegand (Vienna), and Noeldedchen (Brunswick). Negotiations are also pending with Frau Sucher. The repertory will be confined to Wagner's "Der Fliegende Holländer," "Lohengrin," "Tannhäuser," "Meistersinger," and "Tristan," Stanford's "Savonarola," Weber's "Der Freischütz," and Beethoven's "Fidelio." The chorus, from Germany, will number nearly one hundred voices, and the orchestra will be that of the Royal Italian Opera. Herr Hans Richter will be the conductor.

On Monday, the 10th ult., Mr. Herbert Stanley gave an Evening Concert at the Clapham Assembly Rooms, when an excellent programme was provided. The vocalists were Miss E. L. Hudson, Madame L. Kess-Baylis, Madame E. Nelson, Madame C. Harrill, Mr. Thomas L. Moncrieff, Mr. Newton Baylis, and Mr. Herbert Stanley; solo flute, Mr. W. B. Boddington; solo piano, Mr. Hubert Delma. Accompanists, Messrs. H. Delma and Herbert Stanley.

THE tenth Annual Concert, by the Violin Classes, at the Birkbeck Institution, under the direction of Mr. W. Fitzhenry, on the 1st ult., proved as successful as its predecessors. The classes showed the quality of the instruction they receive by a good rendering of a Gavotte and March, by Scotson Clark and Berthold Tours respectively, an Operatic Selection, and Mendelssohn's "Cornelius" March. The vocal portion of the Concert was sustained by Miss Mary Beare, Mr. P. Hawkins, Mr. A. Thompson, Mr. Prestridge Tabb, and Mr. Stanley Smith. Mr. T. E. Gatehouse received enthusiastic applause for his violin solos, as did also Mrs. Fitzhenry for her piano solo. Two recitations, excellently delivered by Mr. Charles Fry, were not the least noteworthy feature in the programme.

THE 182nd monthly Concert of the St. George's Glee Union was held at the Pimlico Rooms, on the 7th ult. The chief feature of the programme was Mendelssohn's "Athalie," which formed the second part. The soloists were Madame Worrell, Miss Louise Augarde, and Miss Marie Belval; the instrumental accompaniments being contributed by Mr. F. R. Kinke (pianoforte) and Mr. W. Byrom (harmonium). The lyrics were ably read by the Rev. J. Rice, M.A., and Mr. Joseph Monday conducted. The choruses were well rendered by the choir, which, in the first part of the programme, also contributed "Here by Babylon's wave" (Gounod) and "To Thee, great Lord" (Rossini). The Concert was a decided success.

AN excellent performance of the Cantata "Harold Glynde," written by Edward Foskett, and to which Dr. Stainer, Mr. Jekyll, Mr. James A. Birch, and others have composed the music, was given at the Surrey Masonic Hall, on Monday evening, the 10th ult., before a large audience. The solo vocalists were Madame Worrell, Madame Lansdell-Sims, Mr. F. Bevan, and Mr. A. Weston, all of whom were very efficient. Mr. Foskett, the author of the poem, recited the connective readings of the Cantata. The choruses were rendered with commendable precision and received with much appreciation by the audience. Mr. A. Bond conducted, Miss Peters was an able pianist, and Mr. E. F. Rook rendered good service at the harmonium.

ON February 26 the Richmond Choral Society gave an excellent performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah" in the Pavilion, at the Star and Garter Hotel. Miss Annie Marriott, Madame Osborne Williams, Mr. Maas, and Mr. Walter Clifford were the soloists. The Society numbers over eighty voices, and the manner in which the choruses were sung reflects the highest credit upon their Conductor, Mr. J. Maude Cramènt, Mus. Bac., Oxon. Mr. E. H. Turpin made himself responsible for the wind parts, which he brought out most skilfully on the Mustel organ, and the strings were represented by a double quintet of professional players, led by Mr. Val. Nicholson.

AT Derby, on the 25th ult., Samuel Townsend, a coach-painter, was fined £10 and costs, for selling in England two copies of a book printed in America, and containing a number of songs, the copyright of which is the property of Messrs. Boosey and Co., London. The book, which is called the "Song Folio," contains 116 songs, 110 of which are English copyrights, 39 of these belonging to Messrs. Boosey. The defendant was alleged to have brought a number of the books from the United States, and sold them in England at 4s. 6d. each. The sale having been proved in two cases, the fine of £5 was inflicted for each offence, or in default two months' imprisonment.

A CONCERT, by the London Sunday School Choir, was given in the Royal Albert Hall, on the 15th ult. The choir sang a varied selection, comprising Anthems, Choruses, Hymns, and Part-Songs, in a very creditable manner, and elicited much applause. Madame A. Sterling and Miss Marie Schumann (violin) gave great satisfaction to the audience in their respective pieces. Mr. Luther Hinton conducted, and Mr. D. Davies accompanied on the organ.

A VERY successful Concert was given at the Lyric Hall, Ealing, on Saturday, the 8th ult., under the auspices of the Ealing branch of the Popular Entertainments Committee. The following artists were very warmly received: Miss Agnes Thorndike, Mrs. Dean, Mr. J. Hart, Mr. Charles Copland, and Mr. Victor Gollmick.

HERR KOCH gave a successful Concert at the Bow and Bromley Institute, on the 20th ult. The instrumental portion of the programme included two trios for flute, violoncello, and pianoforte, by Kuhlau and Reissiger, rendered by Mdlle. Anita Paggi, Monsieur Albert and Herr Koch, the latter gentleman also contributing two original pianoforte solos. The vocalists were Miss Maud Kelly, Miss Jeanie Rosse, whose rendering of "Never to know" (Marzials) deservedly secured an encore, and Mr. Gostic. Mdlle. Linda Paggi, a very young elocutionist, recited a humorous piece, and a selection from "King John," with excellent effect.

MADAME STELLA DAMERICH (pianist and cantatrice to the Queen of Spain) gave her first Soirée musicale on Thursday, the 6th ult., at her residence, 13, Argyll Street, assisted by Mdlle. A. del Santo and Miss G. Herbert Taylor (pupils), Miss F. M. Strutt-Cavell, Signor Monari-Rocca, Herr Kohler, and Chevalier Robbio (violin). Madame Damerich's pianoforte playing exhibited great powers of execution and expression, and her singing was most artistic. Two melodious songs of her own, and a brilliant and cleverly written "Elège et Tarantelle," for violin and piano, were well received. Chevalier Robbio, a violinist of the Italian school, contributed several solos.

ON Wednesday evening, the 19th ult., an excellent performance of Edmund Rogers's Cantata, "The Pilgrim's Progress," was given at Robert Street Chapel, Grosvenor Square, by the members of the St. George's (Grosvenor Square) Choral Society, under the able direction of Mr. Stephen Killbey. The soloists were Miss N. Hudson, Miss H. Brookes, Mr. R. Bennetts, and Mr. Weldon Hydon. The work was ably rendered, and proved a great success, the tenor air, "Abide with me," being especially well received by the large and appreciative audience. The accompaniments were played by a small but efficient orchestra, led by Mr. Tomlin.

THE prospectus of the Bedford Musical Society shows that those who have for many years carried on the work of this Institution gratuitously, spare no effort to spread a love for the art throughout the district. Founded in 1867, under the able conductorship of Mr. P. H. Diemer, R.A.M., an excellent selection of high-class works has been presented, four Concerts being given every year. At the present time there are about 200 performers, the President is Mr. Frederick Howard, and amongst the Patrons are many highly influential persons, including the Mayor of Bedford.

MR. CHARLES DOWDESWELL gave two Lectures upon "Richard Wagner and his art," with vocal and instrumental illustrations, at the Wandsworth Road Commercial School-room, in connection with the St. Paul's Branch of the Church of England Young Men's Society, on the 10th and 24th ult. The works analysed were "Der Fliegende Holländer," "Tannhäuser," "Lohengrin," and "Tristan und Isolde." The illustrations were rendered admirably by Misses Plummer and Thorpe, and Messrs. W. C. Ward, W. B. Smith, and W. Dowdeswell. The audience on each occasion was large, and appeared to be much interested.

A FINE Art Loan Exhibition of an ambitious character was opened at Cardiff during the month of February by the Mayor, amid considerable ceremony. The object is to assist the funds of the Royal Cambrian Arts Academy, which is to be established in Cardiff. An organ of excellent quality has been erected in the orchestra of the Public Hall, where the Exhibition is being held, and Concerts are given daily. Among the contributors of artistic and historic treasures are the Duke and Duchess of Beaufort, Marquis of Bute, Earl Cawdor, &c. The intrinsic value of the loans is roughly computed at £70,000.

MR. FRANK BRADLEY, Professor at Trinity College, London, and Organist of St. Andrew's, West Kensington, announces four Pianoforte Recitals, two on the 16th inst., in Chiswick Vestry Hall, and two on the following day in Cadby Hall, West Kensington; vocalists, Madame Emma Beasley and Miss Jeanie Rosse. The admission to the afternoon Recitals will be by presentation of card only. We sincerely congratulate Mr. Bradley on his re-appearance after a long and dangerous illness.

MR. F. H. HORSCROFT gave a Concert of much excellence at Brixton Hall, on Wednesday evening, the 19th ult. Besides taking part in concerted music, Mr. Horscroft sang with decided success Gounod's "Maid of Athens," Loder's "The Diver," and M. Watson's "Anchored." Misses Helen D'Alton, M. Hoare and Marie Schumann (violin); Messrs. Arthur Thompson, F. Bevan, J. Brown, H. Taylor, E. Plater, Master F. Charlton, and Mr. Howard Reynolds (cornet-à-pistons), were all thoroughly efficient. Messrs. Turle Lee and Michael Watson divided the duties of accompanist.

WE have much pleasure in directing attention to the exceptional merits of two engravings recently published by L. H. Lefèvre, of King Street, St. James's Square, the subjects of which, "A Singing Class" and "A Dancing Class," will recommend them to our musical readers. They are etched by Mr. E. Salmon from the pictures by A. Ludovici, jun., exhibited at the Society of British Artists, Suffolk Street. The dresses, grouping, and attitudes of the pupils and the masters in both pictures are wonderfully life-like; and thoroughly recall the stately and artificial style of teaching in days gone by.

THE Kyrie Choir, under the direction of Mr. Malcolm Lawson, gave performances of "St. Paul," on the 12th and 19th ult., in St. Mary's Church, Hoxton, and in the Latimer Chapel, Bow. The soloists at the first performance were Miss Fusselle, Miss Arben, Mr. Reginald Groomer, and Mr. Pelham Roof; Mr. E. H. Turpin accompanying on the organ. At the second performance the solos were taken by Miss Eva Verner, Miss Arben, Mr. Hubert Fulkerson, and Mr. Arthur Sargeant; the accompanist being Mr. F. Sewell Southgate.

A SACRED Concert was given at the Union Church, Putney, on the 6th ult., when a good miscellaneous programme was arranged. The solo vocalists were Mr. Poole, Miss A. Rich, Mrs. R. Hart, Mr. A. J. Mayers, and Mr. E. Layton; Organist, Mr. C. King Hall; Conductors, Messrs. R. and R. P. Hart. There was a choir of thirty voices, the power of which was well displayed in choruses of Handel, Mendelssohn, &c. The quartet "Yea, though I walk," from Sullivan's "Light of the World," received a unanimous encore.

MR. JOHN THOMAS FRYE, who was appointed Organist of St. Mary, Saffron Walden, when eight years of age, has just completed his sixty-fourth year of service; and, having retired from the office, the churchwardens, and other friends and admirers, have determined to present him with a testimonial in recognition of his exceptional worth and ability. Mr. Frye is widely known, and not less esteemed for his social worth than for his musical skill as a performer on the pianoforte, organ, and viola.

THE fine organ which Messrs. Walker and Sons are building for Christ Church, Lancaster Gate, is expected to be ready for use on Sunday, the 27th inst. The instrument has been designed by Dr. F. E. Gladstone, the Organist of the Church. Special services will be held on the evenings of the 28th, 29th, and 30th inst., and May 1st. After each service a selection of music will be played by the following distinguished organists respectively: Mr. Walter Parratt, Mr. E. H. Turpin, Dr. Bridge, and Mr. W. S. Hoyte.

MISS ALICE WOODRUFFE gave her second annual Evening Concert, at the large Iron Hall, Bruce Grove, on Friday, the 21st ult. The vocalists were Madame Worrell, R.A.M., Madame Clara West, Miss Alice Woodruffe, Madame Florence Winn, Miss Lottie West, Mr. Arthur Weston, Mr. C. J. Murton, Mr. Frederick Bevan, and Mr. W. H. Webb; solo violinist, Mr. Arthur Payne, R.A.M.; accompanists, Mr. Stuart Lane and Mr. W. West. The Concert was most successful.

MR. J. MAUDE CRAMENT, Mus. Bac., Oxon., has resigned his appointment as Organist and Choirmaster at Holy Trinity Church, Brompton, after holding it for two years. During that time considerable improvement has been made in the choir singing, and, under his direction, several excellent performances, with orchestral accompaniments, of "The Messiah," "St. Paul," and Graun's "Passion Music" have been given in the church.

WE learn from the Paris Figaro that Gounod's re-written Opera "Sapho," the production of which has been so long deferred, was to be given, on the 31st ult., at the Grand Opera. The same week will see the first performance in Paris of "The Redemption," which will take place at the Trocadéro, on the 3rd inst. About the same time also the opera "Mireille" will probably be produced at the Opéra Comique.

ON Tuesday, February 26, Mrs. Beesley's pupils gave their annual Pianoforte Recital at St. Barnabas Schools, Clapham, before a large audience, when a classical programme was rendered with much skill and effect. Mr. Spinney, of Salisbury, also gave a brief musical lecture, accompanied by practical illustrations. At the conclusion Mrs. Beesley gave an excellent rendering of Chopin's "Andante Spianato" and "Grand Polonaise."

A VERY successful Organ Recital was given at St. John's, Waterloo Road, on the 11th ult., by the Organist of the Church, Mr. Henry J. B. Dart. The programme was composed entirely of French organ music, chronologically arranged from Lefebure-Wély to Saint-Saëns, and including compositions by Batiste, Chauvet, Guilman, Salome, and Widor. Two vocal solos were also effectively rendered by Mr. Charles James.

MADAME EDITH DANIEL gave her annual benefit Concert on Thursday evening, the 6th ult. The beneficiaire, who obtained a warm reception, contributed songs by Cowen, Bevan, and M. Watson. Madame Daniel was assisted by Miss Annie Matthews, Madame F. Brooke, Madame Raymond; Messrs. Coates, C. J. Murton, Rush-ton Odell, and F. H. Horscroft. Mr. Turle Lee accompanied with his accustomed ability.

ST. MICHAEL'S CHURCH, Folkestone, especially known for its musical services, has been enlarged at a cost of about £7,000, and is to be opened on May 1, together with a new organ, built by Messrs. Jones and Sons, of Fulham Road. The Rev. E. Husband, the Incumbent and Organist, has written a new Evening Service in E, for the occasion, which has just been published by Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co., and is dedicated to Dr. Stainer.

THE Concert of the London Musical Society, which took place on the 29th ult., too late for notice in our present number, introduced the following interesting works for the first time to London amateurs: Cantata, "O weep for those," F. Hiller; "Vier Gesänge für Frauenchor, Harfe u. zwei Hörner," J. Brahms; Cantata, "Feast of Adonis," Jensen; and Cantata, "The King's Son," Schumann.

ON the 11th ult. the All Saints' Choral Society, Battersea, gave its second Concert this season, the programme containing several part-songs. The solo vocalists were Madame Allardice (pupil of Mr. F. E. Choveaux), Mrs. Barrett, Mrs. Godfrey, Miss Burch, Mr. Francois E. Choveaux, and Mr. Richardson, all of whom gave great satisfaction. Mrs. Barrett was accompanist.

ON the 3rd ult. the members of the Battersea Musical Association gave their first Concert this season before a large audience. The soloists were Miss Anna Whitmer, Madame Allardice, Mr. Edwin Rayner, and Mr. F. E. Choveaux. The violinist was Mr. A. Newton, and solo pianist Mr. F. E. Choveaux. The choral singing was highly satisfactory.

AT a recent visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to the Royal College of Music, their Royal Highnesses were so much struck with the playing of Miss Marshall that they remained until the lesson was finished, and afterwards invited her to play at Marlborough House. Miss Marshall is the daughter of Mr. Joshua Marshall, of Huddersfield.

ON the 11th ult. an evening Concert was given at the East and West India Dock Company's Institute, under the direction of Mr. G. J. Rayner, assisted by Misses Josephine Pulham, R.A.M., and Florence Wydford, Messrs. Richard Evans, and Henry Behling. The concert was very successful.

DR. BRIDGE'S Motett, "Hymn to the Creator" (The song of St. Francis of Assisi), has been selected to form part of the opening service at the forthcoming Worcester Festival.

THE Standard says: "Arrangements are being made for holding an International Musical Festival at Canterbury in the last week in May. Two French Musical Societies will join with the local Musical Societies in a series of Concerts, which will be given for some charitable object. The city will be decorated, and there will be a public banquet."

AT the Organ Recital, at the Bow and Bromley Institute, on the 15th ult., Dr. Spark was the Organist. His selection, which included compositions by Gounod, Morandi, Sterndale Bennett, Batiste, Diemel, and himself, was received with much applause. Miss Fanny Bristowe was the vocalist.

AN Organ Recital was given on Sunday evening, the 2nd ult., at Holy Trinity Church, Gray's Inn Road, by Mr. Stretton Swann, assisted by the members of the Orpheus Amateur Orchestral Society. The programme included selections from Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," Handel's "Samson," Costa's "Eli," &c.

AT the Students' Concert at Trinity College, London, on the 18th ult., the programme included Beethoven's Trio, No. 1, as well as instrumental and vocal solos by pupils of the following professors:—Mr. Bradbury Turner, Mr. E. Woolhouse, Mr. Alberto Visetti, Mr. G. E. Bambridge, Mr. J. H. Nappi, and Sir Julius Benedict.

THE Kyrle Choir gave a performance of "St. Paul" in the Congregational Church, North Bow, on the 6th ult. The solos were taken by Miss Mina Sheppard, Miss Arber, Mr. John Probert, Mr. James Blackney, and Mr. McCarty. Mr. Albert Orme conducted, and the accompanist was Mr. William Tate.

THE annual performance of Bach's "Passion Music" (St. Matthew) with orchestra, at St. Paul's Cathedral, will take place on Tuesday, the 8th inst., commencing at seven p.m. The Cathedral is now not closed at all after the afternoon service, and no tickets are required for the seats under the dome.

THE Middlesbrough Musical Union, under Mr. Kilburn, will perform Gade's cantata "The Crusaders," on the 23rd inst. The programme will also include Sterndale Bennett's Symphony in G minor, and a new Cantata, "The Norman Baron," by Mr. Thomas Anderton.

MR. LENNOX BROWNE'S Lecture on "Science and Singing," delivered before the Society for the Encouragement of the Fine Arts, is to be published immediately in an amplified form by Messrs. Chappell.

THE members of the Bloomsbury Church Choir Union are rehearsing for, and purpose holding, a Festival during Easter-tide, in one of the churches within their district.

A NEW two-manual organ by Messrs. Henry Willis & Son has just been placed in the church of St. Peter-le-Poer, Old Broad Street, City.

THE Gregorian Festival will take place in St. Paul's Cathedral in May. We hope to announce full particulars in our next issue.

A PERFORMANCE of "St. Paul" will be given by the Erith Choral Society, under the conductorship of Mr. Richard Lemaire, on Wednesday, the 23rd inst.

MR. ALBERT LOWE, L.Mus., has just been honoured with the diploma of Fellow of the Royal Society of Italy (Rome) through their Majesties the King and Queen.

A NEW Society, entitled "The Cecilian Choral Society," has just been established in Clapham. The work in rehearsal is Van Bree's "St. Cecilia's Day."

REVIEWS.

Johann Sebastian Bach. By Philipp Spitta. Translated by Clara Bell and J. A. Fuller-Maitland. Vol II. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

As the value of one section of a biographical work must needs be comparatively small, the publishers have been well advised in issuing the second volume of Herr Spitta's monograph so quickly after the first, and we trust that the third will appear after a similarly brief interval. In our notice of the first volume we spoke at length of the special characteristics of the work—its complete exhaustiveness of the theme, and the pains taken by the author to render it not only invaluable as a life of Bach, but as a history of music in Germany before and during the period of the great master's career. It will therefore be unnecessary to further generalise on these matters, and a brief synopsis of the contents of the present volume will suffice. The portion of Bach's life which it comprises includes the Cöthen period, 1717-23, and the first eleven years of his experiences at Leipzig, 1723-34. We are accustomed to associate Bach with the Thomasschule in the last-named town, but it must be remembered that it was to his duties in two other places that the world owes a large proportion of his compositions. The organ works were chiefly written during the Weimar period, and those for clavier, violin, &c., at Cöthen, where he occupied the position of Capellmeister to Prince Leopold. Spitta insists that instrumental music (that is, music for its own sake) was the aim and essence of his being, and that the years spent in the tiny principality of Cöthen were the happiest of his life. Certainly he had an excellent patron in Prince Leopold, who was an enthusiastic and well cultured amateur; and until his marriage his relations with this gifted court musician appear to have been of the most cordial nature. Still Bach was not so absorbed in his duties as to entirely neglect the outer world. He made sundry art journeys, and in 1720 applied for the post of organist at St. James's, Hamburg, a proof that he felt that Cöthen did not afford free exercise for his manysided genius. There were seven other candidates, and the committee selected a certain Johann Heitmann, of whom Spitta says, ironically, that "what he had ever done in his art is less well known than the fact that on January 6, 1721, he paid over to the treasury of St. James's 'the promised sum of 4,000 marks current' in acknowledgment of having been elected." This kind of bribery seems to have been an ordinary custom, if we may judge by the record of the committee with respect to the matter, which is worth quoting: "That, no doubt many reasons might be found why the sale of the organist's appointment should not be made a custom, because it appertained to the service of God; therefore, the choice should be free, and the capability of the candidate be considered rather than the money. But if, after the election, the elected person, of his free will, desired to show his gratitude, this should be favourably looked upon by the Church." This pretty piece of sophistry did not save the committee from the just rebuke of the preacher Neumeister, who wished to have Bach, for at Christmas he declared that if one of the angels of Bethlehem desired to be organist to St. James's Church, and had no money, he would have to fly away again.

In accordance with the practice of the Bach family, the death of his first wife was followed quickly by his second marriage, and this part of his domestic history is dealt with in feeling terms and with as many interesting details as the author could gather and authenticate. Immediately afterwards Prince Leopold married, and from that moment his interest in music began to wane, his wife having no love for the art. Thus it was that Bach was led to seek a wider sphere for the exercise of his talents, and the post of Cantor at the Leipzig Thomasschule being vacant he presented himself as a candidate, and after much deliberation was accepted. With this appointment his personal history may be said to end. The remaining twenty-seven years of his life were passed in the quiet discharge of his very miscellaneous duties, though some time elapsed before pleasant relations were established between himself and his employers. The school had fallen into decay owing to gross mismanagement, and Bach seems at first to have trifled somewhat with that portion of his work which was distasteful to him. He was accused of doing nothing for his pay, and a proposal was made to sequester his income. True, he was always producing motetts, and had already given his sublime "Passion," according to St. Matthew, to the world. But these things did not count; the Cantor had to give a certain number of singing lessons, and not only did he neglect this duty, but treated the reproofs and admonitions of the Council in the same cavalier manner he had displayed at Arnstadt many years previously. Spitta does not seek to screen his hero from blame in this matter, though he puts forward certain extenuating circumstances. However, a new Rector was appointed in 1730, and, as he recognised the genius of his subordinate, matters became smoother, and Bach ceased the efforts he had been making to obtain another appointment.

This volume is as rich as the first in the analysis of the compositions, and in lengthy disquisitions on various developments of musical art. Herr Spitta waxes eloquent on the subject of the forty-eight preludes and fugues, and one passage here merits quotation: "There is a legend which tells us of a city of marvels that lies sunk beneath the sea. The sound of bells comes up from the depths, and when the surface is calm, houses and streets are visible through the clear water, with all the stir and turmoil of busy, eager human life—but it is infinitely far down, and every attempt to clutch the vision only trouble the waters, and distorts the picture. We feel the same thing as we listen to this music. All that stirred the soul of the composer, love and hatred, joy and sorrow, with their fortuitous and transient impulses, lie deep below the surface; faintly, remotely, we hear their echoes, and, as we gaze through the crystal flood of sound, we see the living soul within, and perceive that it suffered or was gay like ourselves, only what it was that stirred it we may not see. But each of us can recognise with kindred feelings the experience of his own life; every one of all the human hearts, which, for the last century and a half, has duly studied and absorbed this work; and this it is which has made it, to our own day, a perennial source of joy, and of spiritual refreshment and strength."

The chapters on the cantatas written between 1723 and 1734 will be read with much interest by musicians; but perhaps the most valuable portion of the volume is that which relates to the works on the Passion. It need scarcely be said that the settings according to St. John and St. Matthew are minutely and elaborately discussed, but the author also gives ample information concerning settings of the Passion previous to Bach, and here we realise the enormous superiority of his genius over that of all his predecessors and contemporaries. It is painful to read that of five works of this kind two, if not three, are lost for ever in consequence of the indifference and misconduct of one of his children. His manuscripts were divided between his sons, Emmanuel and Friedemann, and the former fortunately had the Passions according to St. John and St. Matthew; Friedemann, who supplied the exception that proves the rule with regard to the virtuous and conscientious life of the Bach family, sold the other three for a mere trifle, and two have entirely disappeared. But Herr Spitta inclines to the belief that the manuscript of a St. Luke Passion, in the possession of Herr Joseph Hauser, of Carlsruhe, is a genuine work but belonging to an earlier period than the date on the score. "The music itself is strange and puzzling; its very simple forms reveal a tender and soft expressiveness, but it is far away from the power, fervency, and grandeur of the "St. John" and the "St. Matthew" Passions. But although the score which exists was undoubtedly written at Leipzig, nothing compels us to assume that it was composed there. In Weimar, where he displayed no small industry as a composer of cantatas, he also occupied himself greatly with the whole class of Passion music."

The temptation to enlarge on the many matters of surpassing interest contained in the present volume is great, but it must be resisted, and we shall conclude by again complimenting the translators on the admirable way in which they have fulfilled their arduous task, the spirit as well as the letter of the original being preserved with scrupulous fidelity. The appearance of the third volume, with a copious index to the whole work, will be awaited with the utmost eagerness by musicians.

The Musical Year, 1883. A Record of Noteworthy Musical Events in the United Kingdom, with a Reprint of Criticisms on many of them. By Joseph Bennett.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

We quite agree with the author of this volume that it becomes a question whether "the conditions of newspaper criticism are compatible with the production of that which is really worth preserving"; but it must be remembered that the artistic departments of many of our daily journals have within the last few years fallen into the hands of those who, instead of furnishing us with bald records of what is passing before us, are desirous of estimating the value of these events by their probable effect, for good or evil, upon the future. Amongst the foremost of these pioneers in the good cause public opinion has already placed Mr. Joseph Bennett, the musical critic of the Daily Telegraph, who for fourteen years has, with an honesty of purpose which cannot be over-praised, eloquently expounded the doctrine of pure art according to his own convictions, and manfully battled with those innovations which he feared might tempt us by their novelty to the worship of a false faith. In reprinting his criticisms upon the past musical year, therefore, he has enabled us to read at our leisure many remarks upon the art which we would not willingly let die; and in addition to this, the book will be welcomed on the drawing-room table as—to use the author's words—"a modest chronicle of the year's doings." As a proof of the high tone of modern newspaper criticism, and in earnest of the laudable desire to sign his own opinions with his own name, Mr. Joseph Bennett has earned the cordial thanks of all who wish to elevate the musical taste of the people.

Part-Writing, or Modern Counterpoint. By Henry Hiles, Mus. D., Oxon. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

DR. HILES'S work on Part-Writing is well-timed, although we cannot see why, having adopted so many of what he terms the "irritating restrictions" laid down by the old contrapuntists, he should so violently oppose their maxims in his Preface. Unquestionably "Counterpoint" is merely the art of part-writing; and when our author tells us that he has treated his subject "without reference to any exploded views," he merely means that he has advocated the observance of those rules which he thinks good and rejected those which he thinks bad. Thus much every teacher has a right to do; but it must be borne in mind that when once we throw aside the dogmas of those authorities upon counterpoint whose laws have been held in reverence by the greatest composers of the world, the doctrines taught by each professor can merely be regarded as individual opinions; and thus the part-writing of a student, instead of being based upon recognised rules, must necessarily be a reflection of the convictions of the master under whom he happens to study. Viewed in this light, we are inclined to look most favourably upon this latest contribution to the subject, and congratulate Dr. Hiles upon the care and thought he has bestowed upon his task. His specimens of what we must still term "Counterpoint" are extremely good, although conservative musicians would call many of them somewhat "free"; and we are especially pleased with his examples of Double Counterpoint and Canon. Let us say, however, in conclusion, that too much stress cannot be laid upon the necessity of studying these artificial contrivances; for what Dr. Hiles terms the "artistic covering which gracefully hides the strictly scientific structure" of modern music, is too often used rather to cover the defects of unskilful workmanship.

Novello, Ewer and Co's. Albums for Violin and Piano-forte. No. 2. Thirty Melodies. Composed by Berthold Tours. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE second number of this work appeals especially to violin students who, having escaped from the Instruction Book, are desirous of performing something higher than arrangements of operatic airs before attempting the more important compositions of the standard writers for the instrument. A practical violinist like Mr. Berthold Tours is the only person who should be entrusted with the difficult task of leading a pupil by the right path to perfection; and apart from the tuneful character of the melodies before us, therefore—which we are told in the title-page are expressly written to be used in connection with the author's Violin Primer—it will be found that they shadow forth much of the feeling of the subjects used in the classical works of our great composers. It may be added that the pianoforte part is, as a rule, quite as essential as that for the violin; and, although not by any means difficult, will demand care and minute attention to variety of touch.

Harold. A Cantata. Written by Edward Oxenford. Composed by Arthur E. Dyer. [Wood and Co.]

THE multitude of Cantatas published in the present day is a hopeful sign of the fact that the musical public is beginning to prefer works, even of slender material, to a selection of detached vocal pieces. Yet we cannot but think that in choosing a libretto for such compositions purely dramatic subjects should be avoided unless the Cantata is intended for a concert-room, and consequently written with accompaniments for a full orchestra. The "argument" of "Harold" is thus described: "Harold, having defeated the King of Norway in Northumbria, returns to York, and is there feasting with his victorious troops when tidings arrive of the landing of the Normans in Sussex. On receiving this news Harold hastens to London, and thence, with his army, to Hastings, where he prepares to give battle to the invader." A theme like this is scarcely suitable for a drawing-room, with the accompaniment of a pianoforte, and still less for a concert-room with only such limited aid. Mr. Dyer has, however, done his best under the circumstances, giving but small prominence to his warlike choral pieces and bringing forward his more quiet numbers for the principal characters. From the choruses we may select for commendation "Fill, ye goblets" (which, however, savours somewhat too much of the conventional melodramatic drinking chorus) and the chorus of Priests. The tenor song "Be glad while ye may"—a feature in which is a marked figure in the accompaniment—and a duet for soprano and tenor, "On holly's glowing pages," are amongst the most melodious specimens of the music for solo voices.

The Organist's Quarterly Journal. Parts LX. and LXI. Edited by W. Spark, Mus. Doc. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS Journal is now in the sixteenth year of its existence, and its continued prosperity proves that Dr. Spark discerned a want and supplied it in a satisfactory manner. It may be asked, How many masterpieces have been given to the world through the medium of The Organist's Quarterly Journal? It is of greater importance, however, to know that, in spite of the number and popularity of arrangements, organists are willing to accept original compositions whenever they can obtain them. The sixtieth part of this publication commences with the first instalment of a Fantasia, in three movements, by the editor. It is a straightforward, solidly written piece in 3-4 time. An Impromptu in A, by W. H. Maxfield, is slightly crude; and we do not care for a patchy and vague Fantasia by J. Katterfeldt. The best piece in the part is an effective and musicianly Postlude in C, by F. J. Read. Part LXI. opens with the second movement of Dr. Spark's Fantasia, an Andante espressivo in A flat, very modern in style, and suitable for Recitals. An Introductory Voluntary on the Russian Hymn, by J. T. Pye, and an Andante in D, by J. H. Wallis, are not remarkable. Dr. J. C. Tiley's Fugue on the first section of St. David's tune contains some clever writing, though it is free rather than severe in construction. The last piece is a very showy and florid Concert Aria in A, written in the style of drawing-room pianoforte music.

Sisera. A Cantata for Treble Voices. Written by Marmaduke Browne. Music by Isidore de Solla. [Weekes and Co.]

THE subject of this Cantata is stated in few words: "The scene is laid in the women's apartments of the palace at Harosheth. The mother of Sisera, surrounded by her wise women and maidens, has watched the hosts of Jabin, King of Hazor, start on their expedition against the Israelite tribes." We must congratulate the author of the libretto founded upon such slight materials, many of the pieces indeed showing true poetical feeling. The composer, if somewhat too restless in his tonalities, and evidencing a tendency to be ultra-dramatic, has nevertheless given us some very good and effective vocal writing, the soli and chorus "Visions of joy" being by far the best portion of the work. The pianoforte part seems almost like an arrangement from a full score; but we see no intimation of the Cantata having been instrumented for an orchestra.

The Lady of Shalott. A Cantata for Female Voices. The poem by Lord Tennyson, poet laureate. Composed by Wilfred Bendall. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS graceful setting of Tennyson's well-known poem is a worthy addition to the rapidly increasing store of Cantatas for Female Voices, the publication of which has done so much to create an interest in part-singing with drawing-room amateurs, and to substitute for the sickly sentimental ballads of the day some pieces with varied dramatic colouring which shall sufficiently sustain the attention of an audience. The voice parts in Mr. Bendall's work are written with much purity, and although tolerably easy to learn, will require to be most carefully sung and well rehearsed together in order to produce the effect intended by the composer. Preceded by a brief introduction, the Cantata opens with a melodious chorus in A major. This is followed by a soprano solo, with chorus in A minor, one of the best numbers in the work, although perhaps one of the least pretentious. No. 3 contains some effective changes of key, and follows most sympathetically the words throughout. The flowing arpeggios which introduce the fourth number lead with much effect to the choral phrase in D minor, and the manner in which this finale is treated—especially in the Allegro Agitato, "Who is this? and what is here?"—shows that the composer has decided dramatic power, and encourages us to hope that we may again welcome him in a work of greater importance.

Popular Self-Instructor for the Pianoforte. Containing the Rudiments of Music, Scales, &c. [F. Pitman.]

WE are always glad to give a good word to cheap works for self-instruction in music, provided the principles laid down are so founded in truth that the student who wishes in after years to extend his knowledge shall at least have nothing to unlearn. In the little book before us all the explanations of the value of notes, rests, time, and the construction of the major scale are exceedingly clear, and the airs which are given are sufficiently popular in character to please a beginner. But unfortunately an attempt is made to teach the minor mode, and this is the manner in which the subject is summarily disposed of: "If we play the scale of C upwards, but make its third note (E) flat instead of natural, it will at once be seen what is meant by a minor scale; for by flattening the E its distance from C is made less than in the ordinary scale of C. The word 'minor' means less; so that a minor scale is simply one that has a lesser or minor third." Now this is positively false teaching, for by totally ignoring the minor sixth of the scale, one of its beautiful characteristics is never understood by the young pupil. It is lucky that even a simple melody is not given in the minor key, or most assuredly this eloquently expressive interval would have a place.

It was a Lover. Part-Song for S.A.T.B. Words by Shakespeare. Music by Joseph C. Bridge, M.A., B. Mus. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE composer of this Part-Song has thoroughly caught the true spirit of Shakespeare's words and given a most effective musical colouring to poetry which, from its excessive quaintness, demands something more than smooth four-part writing. We are particularly pleased with the manner in which the oft-recurring "hey nonny no" is treated, and take exception only to the three consecutive chords of the 6-4 in the two bars at the conclusion of the composition.

Rondeau à la Berceuse. Pour Piano. Composé et Dédicé à Mrs. Edward P. Pope, par Walter Macfarren. [Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.]

AMONGST the very many graceful trifles for the pianoforte contributed by this composer the Rondeau before us must assuredly take a prominent position. The melodious principal theme, with the effective syncopated accompaniment, is excellently contrasted with the animated second subject—introduced by an enharmonic change—the return to the original melody leading us, without any undue display of profundity, to the conclusion of a piece which both for its inherent attraction and as a study for touch, we heartily recommend to pianoforte students.

Ride a Cock-horse. Nursery Rhyme. Part-Song for Mixed Voices. By C. A. Macirone. [Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.]

AMONGST the many musical settings of Nursery Rhymes by modern writers Miss Macirone's "Ride a Cock-Horse" must take high rank. The holiday moments of so accomplished a composer are seldom trifled away without some pleasurable record of the time; and we can scarcely doubt that this little Part-Song, although merely a souvenir of some such bright periods of repose from sterner work, will live long in the memory of all who hear it. It is charmingly written, easy to sing, and instinct with a humour which never degenerates into burlesque. We sincerely hope that it may find a place in the programme of one of the concerts of Mr. Henry Leslie's Choir during the present season.

Romanzetta. For Pianoforte, Violin, and Violoncello. Composed by Henry Smart. Posthumous work. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS lovely, tranquil Andante is indeed a welcome souvenir of a composer who, with a well-earned fame for the production of important works, never failed, by his artistic feeling and refinement, to invest the merest trifles with the utmost interest. The piece is extremely simple, but the melodiousness of the theme—assigned in turn to the pianoforte and violin, with a delicate accompaniment for the violoncello—will charm all hearers; and, although it need scarcely be said that it appeals more to the mind than the fingers of the players, there can be little doubt that this Romanzetta will become extremely popular as a high-class drawing-room composition.

The Hymns of Martin Luther, set to their original Melodies. With an English version. Edited by Leonard Woolsey Bacon, assisted by Nathan H. Allen. [Hodder and Stoughton.]

"I AM not of opinion," says the great Protestant Reformer, Luther, "that all sciences should be beaten down and made to cease by the Gospel, as some fanatics pretend; but I would fain see all the arts, and music in particular, used in the service of Him who hath given and created them." How earnestly the writer of these eloquent words worked to ensure the realisation of his wish is known to all; but the rich mine of wealth he bequeathed to us, valuable alike in words and music, can only be fully appreciated when placed in a volume like the one before us, which may indeed be regarded as one of the most important contributions to the recent Luther Festival. In the Introduction the Editor tells us "that many of the tunes that appeared simultaneously and in connection with Luther's Hymns were original with Luther himself, there seems no good reason to doubt;" and although in this we perfectly agree, it is a matter of extreme difficulty to know, with the exception of one or two, which were really composed by him. The tunes, however, are in every case most sympathetically wedded to the words, and the collection here presented reflects the utmost credit upon all concerned in its publication. The volume is really beautifully got up, the commencement of the well-known "Ein feste Burg," in golden notes upon the cover, presenting a most tempting appearance to all lovers of Lutheran music.

A Day-dream. Melody for Clarinet, with an accompaniment for the Pianoforte. Composed by C. A. Ranken. [Duncan Davison and Co.]

WE have had the pleasure of noticing most favourably several songs by the composer of this piece, and are glad to be able to award equal praise to a composition written for an instrument which we should much like to see more cultivated by amateurs. The "Day-dream" is a charming little sketch, both the melody and accompaniments being highly attractive throughout. The principal instrumental part is written in G for a B flat clarinet; but merely as a guide to the pianist, we think it would have been better to let it appear in the pianoforte copy as it is played; for performers not accustomed to transposing instruments will doubtless be puzzled when they see it in one key and hear it in another. The title-page informs us that a violoncello part, in lieu of that for the clarinet, is also published.

Te Deum, in simple form. By James J. Monk.

[F. Pitman.]

O be joyful in God, a Festival Anthem. By James J. Monk. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

A COMPOSER must be accounted eccentric who chooses the key of F sharp major for a Te Deum "in simple form for parochial use." The unusual key and one or two doubtful chords are, however, the only points inconsistent with Mr. Monk's description of his work. The music flows on quietly in plain four-part harmony, and contains no features worthy of special praise or condemnation. The anthem is written in a style which can scarcely commend itself to musicians. In the course of ten pages there are seven distinct movements, the general effect being that of a series of patches, while all development of the subject matter is of course out of the question. There are indications, moreover, that the composer is not thoroughly grounded in the theory of his art. Passing over the consecutive fifth at bar 12, page 1, we come to a solo embellished with a series of unmeaning arpeggios and chromatic scales for the right hand. Mr. Monk's method of writing the chromatic scale is extremely simple—sharps ascending and flats descending. The Anthem concludes with one of the oddest examples of fugal writing we ever remember to have seen.

Twenty-five Studies for the Pianoforte. By Georges Pfeiffer. [Edwin Ashdown.]

THE author of this work tells us that his Exercises are intended as an introduction to the celebrated Studies of J. B. Cramer; and certainly we can imagine no better preparation for a student who is desirous of building up a good, solid style of execution. The design is well planned and most successfully carried out, each study being written with a specific object, those for Extensions, Repeated Notes, Octaves, Legato playing, and Arpeggios being especially good. We sincerely hope that the whole, and not a portion, of these Studies will be extensively used; although the composer, by publishing them in three separate books as well as in the complete form, tempts pupils to disregard this advice.

FOREIGN NOTES.

A LETTER of the late Richard Wagner, probably his last, dated February 11, 1883, and addressed to Angelo Neumann, has been published by German papers on the anniversary of his death. This last epistle from the great poet-composer's pen is universally interesting, as giving his opinion of the manner in which his works would probably be received by the various European capitals. We reproduce an extract from the letter, omitting everything that does not bear on this point. He says: "I see in the papers that you are going to Prague and Pesh in March. What then? Did you really intend coming to Venice? I should consider that a most unfortunate idea. Germans and Slavs—that will do; but not Latins and Romans. Belgium is a well mixed nation, but in Paris you might have a nice experience. Russia, Stockholm, Copenhagen, and probably also Hungary, are all good."

The latest musical events in Paris show that the Latins and Romans are not so bad as Wagner thought them. Two highly important Wagner novelties were performed on one day (the 2nd ult.) in the French capital, and obtained a success which the most sanguine of Wagner's friends and followers would not have dreamt of a short time ago. M. Colonne produced at his Châtelet Concert the final scene of the first act of "Parsifal"; and M. Lamoureux played, at the Château d'Eau, the prelude and the whole of the first act of "Tristan und Isolde." All the Parisian papers, even the most anti-Wagnerian, acknowledge that these performances were an immense success, an undeniable fact which is also proved by the repetition of the whole Lamoureux programme a week after.

Hans von Bülow, the "irrepressible," has got himself into another scrape. At an Orchestral Concert conducted by him at Berlin, one of his own compositions was demanded by an enthusiastic audience, when, to the astonishment of everybody, the Coronation March from Meyerbeer's "Prophète" was played instead of a repetition of Bülow's own work. After the conclusion of the March, Bülow turned round to his audience and treated it to a little speech in which he vigorously denounced the manner in which the "Prophète," and in fact everything else, was produced at the Imperial Opera House in Berlin. In the course of his speech he gave this time-honoured Institution the witty and sarcastic epithet of "Circus Hülsen." For the information of our readers we add that Herr von Hülsen is and has been for many years the much maligned director of the Royal Prussian Theatres. This gentleman has reciprocated by placarding in his theatres an appeal to the artists engaged to treat Herr von Bülow with contempt by not noticing in any way his impudent remarks, promising at the same time that he would ask at a certain place whether any person using publicly such language was fit to hold the position of an officer of the Ducal Court of Saxe-Meiningen. We hear that Bülow intends tendering his resignation.

Herr Joachim has postponed his American tour until next year, on account of the difficult circumstances in which the Philharmonic orchestra of Berlin, whose conductor he is, is placed. An appeal has been lately issued by the leading musicians of that city, to ensure by yearly subscriptions the existence of this orchestra, and to make it a permanent institution which would always be at the service of intending concert-givers.

An enterprising publisher, Herr Hugo Pohle, of Hamburg, announces a real tenth Symphony by Beethoven. On looking closer into the announcement we find this to be Beethoven's String Quartet, Op. 131, arranged for full orchestra by Müller-Berghaus. It is to be regretted that in the great composer's own fatherland there should be an earnest musician to be found who would consent to so misrepresent and mutilate one of the most beautiful works of the master, and a publisher to lend his aid in publishing such an arrogant arrangement. We hope that Herr Pohle's latest speculation will prove a decided failure, as otherwise he may treat us to half-a-dozen more of his real Symphonies by poor Beethoven.

The sixty-first Lower Rhenish Musical Festival is to be held this year at Düsseldorf, from June 1 to 3, under the conductorship of Herren Johannes Brahms and Julius Tausch. The chief works to be performed are Handel's "Messiah," Bach's Magnificat, Schumann's Overture, Scherzo, and Finale, Rheinberger's "Christoforus," Brahms's Third Symphony and his "Gesang der Parzen," the Prelude to "Parsifal," and Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony.

Nessler, the composer of the opera "The Piper of Hamelin," recently heard in London, has written a new opera, "The Trumpeter of Sakkingen," which will shortly be performed at Leipzig.

Herr Georg Ritter, an excellent tenor, has just finished a most successful tour through Holland and Germany, which culminated in a Concert given at Hamburg. In consequence of his success on this occasion he has been engaged to sing at one of the Concerts of the Philharmonic Society in that city during the coming autumn.

The latest novelty at the Hamburg Stadt Theater has been the opera "Spanish Students," the words by William Faber, the music by the Danish composer, P. E. Lange-Müller. The work failed to create any great impression.

The long-expected first performance of the opera "Helianthus," by Adalbert von Goldschmidt, took place at Leipzig, on the 26th ult., too late to allow of our chronicling its reception.

Madame Pauline Lucca has suddenly left the Imperial Opera House of Vienna without giving a reason for her departure.

The general German Musical Association will hold its Annual Festival at Weimar, from the 5th to the 8th of June, when it will enter its 25th year of existence.

"Mazeppa," a new opera by Tchaikowsky, was produced, for the first time, on February 15, at the Imperial Opera House at Moscow. The work met with a most enthusiastic reception, and the composer was several times called before the curtain. The pieces which produced the most effect are said to have been the overture, a chorus for female voices in the second act, and the duet between Marie and Andreas. The opera was carefully put on [the stage under the composer's own direction. A performance later on at St. Petersburg met with the same hearty reception.

The Society for the Promotion of Musical Art proposes to establish a Conservatory of Music at Amsterdam, under the artistic directorship of Franz Coenen, a brother of the well-known pianist and composer, Willem Coenen. The following gentlemen will be engaged as Professors: Julius Röntgen (piano), Cramer and Simner (violin), Henry Bossmans (cello), Daniel de Lange (counterpoint and composition).

On the 12th ult. a Concert was given at the Salle Flaxland, Paris, by the Misses Speer. The French papers speak highly of the performances of these young ladies, as vocalist and pianist respectively, and express the hope that they may soon be heard again. We understand that the Misses Speer will shortly appear in London.

Saint-Saëns's Oratorio "Le Déluge" was performed, on the 16th ult., at one of the Popular Concerts at Brussels, and obtained a decided success. The same composer is reported to be writing an important Symphony which he intends to call "Hymn to Victor Hugo." It will be performed during the coming summer at the Trocadéro, Paris.

At the Brussels Conservatoire performances have lately been given of three of the chief operas of Gluck, "Iphigénie en Tauride," "Armide," and "Iphigénie en Aulide," under the direction of M. Gevaert.

The pupils of the College St. Servais, at Liège (Belgium), recently gave a performance of Gounod's "Redemption." Notwithstanding its having to labour under the great disadvantage of a Pianoforte accompaniment only, it created so deep an impression that a general desire has been expressed that the performance may be repeated publicly, with an accompaniment of full orchestra.

Our Correspondent at Turin writes: "The International Musical Competition for Choral Societies, Brass, and String Bands, is to take place in the first week of August. There will be six contests: (a) for the Italian choral societies and bands; (b) for the foreign societies and bands; (c) for the foreign societies reading at first sight; (d) a competition between the foreign societies marked as excellent and superior and the first division of Italian societies, all having competed in the contest (a); (e) a special contest (if allowed by the Minister of War) between military bands; (f) a contest between those bands who have won the first places in the contest (e). A musical festival will be given, at which all the societies will perform. A commemoration medal will be given to all the societies and bands competing. There will also be a first prize of £80 for the choral societies, one of the same sum for the stringed bands, and a prize of £40 for the brass bands. To the conductors of societies winning one or more prizes, a baton will be presented. Ten pieces were sung, on the 2nd ult., by the Stefano Tempia Choral Society, including a madrigal of S. Tempia; Chorus of Hermits in "Faust," and "Gipsy Life" (Schumann); Gounod's Chorus and Solo "Pentecost" ("Redemption"); Mendelssohn's "Addio," for male voices, &c. Signor Roberti and his Society are busy studying a fine selection for the evening of Holy Thursday, when a crowded audience will probably attend."

Italian papers report a great success obtained by a new opera, "Stella," composed by Signor Auteri-Manzocchi, at the Argentina Theatre, in Rome, where it was performed on the 16th ult. Solo singers, as well as chorus and orchestra, shared in the enthusiastic applause, the latter having to repeat the Prelude to the third Act.

A new Opera, "Laureano," by a Portuguese composer, Senhor Machado, is shortly to be produced at the San Carlo Theatre, Milan.

The programmes of the Sociedade de Musica de Camara at Oporto show that this Society conducts its operations with considerable enterprise. Last month, in addition to two quartets by Beethoven, quintets by Saint-Saëns and Schumann, and smaller pieces by Mendelssohn, Brahms, Tchaikowsky, and Liszt were given.

Ernest Doré, an excellent musician, brother of the great painter, Gustave Doré, died lately at Paris.

CHEAP ANALYTICAL PROGRAMMES.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—As a constant concert-goer, may I ask you to use your influence towards procuring a desirable reform—a reduction in the prices of analytical programmes?

It is not necessary for me to say anything in favour of the utility of analytical programmes, the mere fact that they exist at all being sufficient evidence of their possessing an educational value. This being so, does it not seem very desirable that the price of the programmes should be such as would not merely enable but induce each member of the audience to purchase one? The prices at present charged, however, effectually prevent this. For example, the frequenter of the Popular Concerts is asked to pay sixpence for a book containing stereotyped remarks which have done duty over and over again; and the Directors of the Richter Concerts are more audacious still in demanding a shilling for what are mere reprints of familiar analyses by "G." and "C. A. B." That these prices can be very largely modified is proved by the fact that in Edinburgh the Choral Union programmes, which are identical in design and matter with those of the Crystal Palace, are sold for threepence. If this can be done where a smaller musical public exists, surely it might in London, where larger audiences would be a guarantee of commercial success. You, Sir, have so constantly advocated the cause of cheap music, &c., that I look with some considerable confidence for your support on the present occasion.

I am, Sir, your obedient Servant,

THE WESTMINSTER ABBEY ORGAN.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Your correspondent who furnishes your last number with particulars and scheme of the above organ says there are only two other organs in England with a thirty-two feet pedal reed of metal. I beg to correct that statement with the following facts, supplied from memory, and without any reference to the specifications of our large organs. There are thirty-two feet pedal reeds of metal in the church organs of Doncaster and Westminster, and the Concert Hall organs at Sheffield, Leeds, Liverpool, Royal Albert Hall, Alexandra Palace, and Regent's Park.

Yours truly,

ARTHUR W. SPEED.

Sheffield, February 26, 1884.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

* * Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all Subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

COLD WALTHAM.—We think both ways are wrong; the pace at which the tune should be sung must be regulated by the metronome marks.

J. W. ODELL.—The Archbishop of Canterbury has the power to confer the degree of Mus. D. on a musician. No examination is required, but the recipient has to produce certificates of musical efficiency from two musicians.

W. S. L.—We do not know of any biographies of Bellini and Donizetti, except those that may be found in musical dictionaries.

W. H. S.—(1) We think the use of the Digitorium may be beneficial as a means of strengthening the fingers, but care must be taken that it does not induce a heavy touch. (2) You should consult a medical man.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

ASHEFELDY, N.B.—The annual Concert of the Choral Union was given on Thursday, the 6th ult., in the Breadalbane Academy. The first part of the programme consisted of Bennett's May Queen, which was excellently rendered. The solos were well sung by Mrs. Ferguson, Mr. Archibald, and Mr. Glencorse. The second part was miscellaneous. The accompaniments throughout were played in an able manner by Mr. Jesse Timson, and Mr. G. H. Norrington conducted with his usual ability.

ADDISCOMBE.—The second Classical Concert, under the management of Mr. L. de Clercq, was given in the Addiscombe Hall, on the 13th ult. The programme included Beethoven's Quartet, Op. 16, for pianoforte, violin, viola, and violoncello, played by Miss Johnson, Messrs. Best, De Clercq, and Wildman; and one for strings only, Op. 48 (Haydn). Both were excellently rendered. Mr. Sydney Leppard gave an excellent performance of Beethoven's "Moonlight" Sonata, and Mr. Louis D'Evigle contributed some violin solos, two of which were his own composition. The vocalists were Miss Mary Hallam and Mr. de Clercq.

APPLEBY, WESTMORLAND.—The fourth Concert of the Musical Society was given, under the conductorship of Mr. D. Samuel, on Tuesday evening, February 26, at the Assembly Room of the Tufton Arms Hotel. The first part of the programme consisted of Lahee's The Building of the Ship. The choruses were excellently rendered by the Society, and the solos and recitatives were ably sustained by Miss H. Cooper, Mr. Macdonald, and Mr. McCall. The second part consisted of songs by the above-named artists, glees and part-songs by the Society, and selections of instrumental music by the string band.

BANGOR.—The first of the Subscription Concerts was given in Penrhyn Hall on the 11th ult. The artists engaged were Herr Steudner-Welsing (pianoforte), Mr. Lawson (violin), Herr Havemann (violoncello), Mr. Hughes (vocalist), and Miss Nixon (accompanist). High praise must be awarded to Herr Welsing for his artistic rendering of Beethoven's "Moonlight" Sonata and a group of pieces by Chopin; to Mr. Lawson for his excellent performance of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto and "Gipsy Reminiscences" (Sarasate); and to Mr. Hughes (a promising pupil of Dr. Rogers) for his refined singing of two songs, one of which especially, Blumenthal's "Message," elicited well deserved applause. Herr Havemann's solo was also well received; but the composition, by Grützmacher, was scarcely worthy of the care bestowed upon it. The admirable pianoforte accompaniments by Miss Nixon must be mentioned as a most attractive feature of the evening.

BEAMSTER.—A very successful Concert was given by the members of the Choral Society on Tuesday evening, February 26, in the National Schoolroom. The first part of the programme consisted of Mr. L. N. Parker's Cantata Silvia, the solos in which were well sustained by Miss M. Gill, Miss Studley, Mr. W. Clench, and Mr. James Hopkins, R.A.M. The choruses were excellently sung by the members of the Society. Miss Tilleley presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. Fred Stone at the harmonium. Mr. Hopkins conducted. The second part of the Concert was miscellaneous.

BEPFORD.—The first Concert of the Musical Society (eighteenth season) was held in the Corn Exchange, on Tuesday, February 26. The chief attraction centred in the Sacred Cantata Bethany, the composition of Mr. F. H. Diemer, the founder and conductor of the Society, who was greeted at the conclusion with well-deserved applause. The principal vocalists were Miss Larkcom, Miss Jeanie Rosse, Mr. Kensington, Mr. Cecil Higgins, and Mr. Kingston. The trumpet obligato to the Resurrection air was finely played by Mr. Herbert Sartoris, and the unaccompanied Trio was beautifully sung by three ladies of the choir, and rapturously encored. The chorus singing, for which this Society is famed, was quite up to its usual standard, and the band highly effective. Rossini's Stabat Mater brought a most delightful Concert to an end.

BELPER.—On Thursday, February 28, the Concert of the Harmonic Society was given in the Public Hall, in the presence of a highly appreciative audience. The first part was devoted entirely to selections from Handel's Messiah, the principal vocalists being Miss Vinnie Beaumont, Miss Hey, and Mr. Kenningham. Dr. Spark, of Leeds, presided at the organ, and his pupil, Mr. W. Windle, Organist of Belper, conducted. The choruses were sung with much precision and effect. Miss Beaumont sang "Rejoice greatly" in a manner that left nothing to be desired, the difficulties of the most florid passages being surmounted with ease; and Miss Hey was highly successful in "O Thou that tellest" and "He was despised." The second part was miscellaneous. The Concert was a great success.

BOLTON.—The eighth of a series of Concerts for the People was given in the Temperance Hall, on Saturday, the 15th ult., before about 1,500 persons. The instrumentalists were Herr Bauerkeller (violin) and Messrs. G. W. Nelson (viola), Joseph Morris (clarinet), Henry Smith (violoncello), and Robert Johnson (piano). The vocal selections were rendered by a chorus of gentlemen amateurs.—Mendelssohn's Oratorio Elijah was given in the Town Hall, on Wednesday evening, the 19th ult. The principal vocalists were Miss Annie Marriott, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Sidney Tower, and Mr. Herbert Greg. The band and chorus of the Bolton Philharmonic Society, under the conductorship of Mr. H. Taylor, and with Mr. W. Mullineux, F.C.O., at the organ, were highly satisfactory.

BRIDOR OF ALLAN.—The opening Concert of the revived Choral Society was given, on the 21st ult., in the Free Church. The first part was devoted to Mendelssohn's J. auda Sion, the accompaniments to which were furnished by Miss Irving at the pianoforte and Mr. J. L. Graham at the harmonium. The choruses were extremely well rendered, and ample justice was done to the soprano solo by Miss Bruce. The second part was miscellaneous. Under the excellent Conductorship of Mr. John Erskine, the Society has now every chance of a brilliant future.

BROMLEY, KENT.—Mr. Ernest A. Williams gave a Promenade Concert on Monday, February 25, assisted by Misses M. Gwynne, Elise Worth, and Alice Kean; Messrs. F. Williams, Ernest Williams, and Herren H. and R. Koenig. The Concert was artistically a great success, the feature of the evening being Herr R. Koenig's masterly performance on the violin.

CARDIFF.—On St. Patrick's Day a special evening of Irish music was given at the Fine Art Exhibition before a large audience. The arrangements were entirely entrusted to Madame Clara West's Concert party, from London, including Madame and Miss Lottie West, Messrs. Joseph Tapley, Henry Prenton, and W. West, all of whom were highly successful.

CHELMSFORD.—On the 1st ult., the last but one of the Saturday Evenings for the People took place at the Corn Exchange. The musical arrangements were under the direction of Mr. F. R. Frye, F.C.O., Organist of the Parish Church. The programme included a pianoforte duet by Mr. Frye and Miss F. Dickson, songs by Miss Alice Kean, a piano and American organ duet by Miss R. M. Copland and Mr. Frye, Mendelssohn's "I would that my love," Webbe's "Glorious Apollo," &c. These entertainments have been carried on through the winter season for the purpose of supplying an enjoyable evening to the working classes at a cheap rate.

CLAUGHTON.—The Wirral Amateur Choral Society gave an excellent performance of Sir G. Macfarren's Oratorio King David, at the Music Hall, on the 18th ult. Madame Billinie Porter created a marked effect in the soprano part; and Miss Dalin and Messrs. Alsop and Chisholme were also highly successful. The choruses were efficiently rendered; and, in the absence of a band, the accompaniments were assigned to a pianoforte and organ, presided at by Mr. W. T. Driffeld and Mr. Charles Collins respectively. The work was ably conducted by Mr. Karl Meyder.

CUPAR, FIFE.—The members of the Amateur Musical Association gave their annual Concert in the Corn Exchange, on Tuesday evening, the 4th ult. The first part consisted of Prout's Alfred, in the rendering of which the Society was supported by a small orchestra, pianoforte, and harmonium. The band was led by Miss D. Hamilton. The solo parts were well rendered by Miss Watson, Mr. Bromley, and Mr. Angus. The Choir, numbering over fifty voices, sang the choruses in excellent style. The second part was miscellaneous, consisting of part-songs by the Choir, solos by Miss Yoole and Messrs. Watson, Cooper, and Angus, and a violin solo by Miss Hamilton. Mr. G. H. Crookes conducted.

DENTON.—Mr. A. D. Keate gave a Concert on Monday, February 25, assisted by a number of his pupils, and Miss Bessie Holt, R.A.M., Miss H. Howard, and Mr. C. H. Warren. A miscellaneous programme was well rendered.

DETROIT, U.S.—The Schumann Society, organised only four months ago, gave its first Concert at Detroit Opera House, on January 28, before an audience of nearly two thousand people. Judging from the inaugural performance of this Society, it has every chance of a brilliant future. The orchestra was excellent, the vocalists, Miss Hope Glenn, Miss Alice Waltz, Mrs. A. R. Linn, Messrs. Louis P. de Sale, and George E. Thompson; the instrumental soloists, Messrs. Franz Apel (Pianoforte) and W. Luderer (violin); and the Choir were thoroughly efficient, and the programme was in the highest degree interesting. Mr. de Zielinski proved an able Conductor.

DUNDEE.—The Chapelshade Musical Association gave its first Concert for the season, in the Kinnaird Hall, on Thursday, February 28. The pieces which received the greatest amount of approbation were "God and King," from Costa's Eli; "Bingley," a hymn tune, by the Rev. F. W. Davis, of Blairgowrie, N.B.; "Stars of the summer night," by Hatton; and "Fall on us, O night," by W. J. Westbrook. Mr. John Sims was an efficient Conductor, and the solo vocalists were Miss Macpherson and Mr. J. Stewart; pianist, Mr. D. F. Justice. The proceeds of the Concert were in aid of the fund for the relief of the sufferers by the boat disaster in the River Tay, a short time before.

EDINBURGH.—A very successful Concert was given on Friday evening, the 14th ult., in Brighton Street Chapel. The principal vocalists were Miss M. Hay, Miss J. Hogg, Mr. T. Bartleman, and Mr. H. Scott, who were all well received. Mr. Greenslade, Conductor and Organist, gave the overture to "Semiramide" on the organ with good effect.

FOLKESTONE.—A Sacred Concert was given at the Wesleyan Chapel by Mr. Roberts, the Organist, on Monday, February 25. A small string orchestra was ably led by Mr. J. R. C. Roberts. The vocalists were Miss Edith Phillips, who was highly successful in all her songs, and Mr. H. Clements.

FRODSHAM.—An excellent rendering of Elijah was given on the 19th ult., by the members of the Choral Society, under the conductorship of Mr. Argent. The principal vocalists were Madame Billinie Porter, Miss Armstrong, Mr. Ambler, and Mr. Black. The work was performed with full orchestral accompaniments.

GOVAN.—On the 20th ult., the choir of Dean Park Parish Church, aided by friends, gave their eighth annual Service of sacred music to a crowded audience, Rev. J. T. Graham presiding. The programme consisted strictly of classical music for the most part. "I praise, Thee, O Lord" from St. Paul, "Worthy is the Lamb" (Messiah), "Sing, O Heavens," Sullivan, and "Hallelujah Chorus" (Messiah), being especially worthy of mention.

GRIMSBY.—A very successful Concert was given in the Temperance Hall, on Thursday evening, the 6th ult., in aid of the Grimsby Hospital. The vocalists were Miss Vinnie Beaumont, Mr. Thornton Sanderson, and Mr. A. J. Helman. A string orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. J. Keightley, played three Overtures, Mendelssohn's Cornelius March, and Boccherini's celebrated Minuet. Miss Freeston was accompanist, and Mr. C. H. Smith Conductor.

HORNSEY.—The members of the St. Mary's Choral Society gave a performance of Sterndale Bennett's May Queen in the National Schools on Tuesday evening, February 26. The solos were well rendered by Miss L. Walker, Mrs. W. J. Thompson, Mr. H. L. Fryer, and Mr. F. May. Mr. Dorey presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. G. W. Spencer conducted. The whole of the choruses were admirably sung. The second part of the Concert was miscellaneous.

KENMORE, N.B.—The Annual Concert of the Choral Union took place at the Mains of Kenmore, on Thursday evening, February 28, before a large and appreciative audience. A well selected programme was excellently rendered. Lady Breadalbane, who takes great interest in the Society, was highly successful in all her songs. Miss Dunn acted as accompanist, and Mr. G. H. Normington conducted.

KIRKINTILLOCH.—The members of the Tonic Sol-fa Association gave their annual Concert, on Tuesday, the 18th ult., in the Temperance Hall, before a large audience. A selection from The Messiah formed the first part of the programme, the solos and choruses being exceedingly well rendered. The second part consisted chiefly of a number of part-songs. The proceedings concluded with a vote of thanks to Mr. H. Alexander, Conductor, and Mr. T. S. Gleadhill, Accompanist, and Organist of Lenzie Church.

LIMERICK.—At St. Michael's Parish (Catholic) Church, on each Wednesday evening during Lent, a performance of a selection from Rossini's Stabat Mater is being given by band and chorus of fifty performers, with organ and soloists, under the conductorship of Mr. Stanislaus Elliot, the Organist and Choirmaster of the Church. The soloists are Mrs. Cusack, Miss Beck, Mrs. O'Malley, Miss Kelly, Mr. Cusack, and Mr. O'Mara, while Miss Ryan presides at the organ—a fine new three-manual instrument by Messrs. Telford and Telford, of Dublin. The choir of the church supplies the chorus, and the band is composed of amateurs of the city and neighbourhood. The church is crowded to excess on each evening.

LITTLE WALSINGHAM, NORFOLK.—On Monday, February 25, the Rev. G. H. Palmer, late Organist, &c., at St. Barnabas', Pimlico, gave an Organ Recital in the Parish Church of St. Mary and All Saints. Solos, with organ accompaniments, were given by the Vicar, Rev. G. Woodward (euphonium); H. Lee Warner, Esq. (violinello); and Mr. Marsh, Organist of the Parish Church (violin), all of which were greatly appreciated.

LIVERPOOL.—The eleventh Concert of the Philharmonic Society took place on the 11th ult., when an excellent rendering of Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise and Gounod's Messe Solennelle was given. The solo parts were allotted to Miss Annie Marriott, Madame Billinie Porter, Mr. Joseph Maas, and Mr. Bridson, all of whom were highly appreciated. The choral numbers were eminently satisfactory. The orchestra played finely, and Mr. Best lent invaluable aid with the organ, and contributed materially to the success of the Concert. Mr. Hallé directed with his usual skill and energy.

LOUTH.—A very successful performance of Mendelssohn's St. Paul was given in the Town Hall, on February 29, to a large and appreciative audience, by the members of the Choral Society. The principal vocalists were Miss Ellen Lamb, Miss Jessie Marshall Ward, Mr. George Banks, and Mr. A. M'Call; leader of the orchestra, Mr. Alf. R. Watson; pianoforte, Mrs. G. H. Porter; harmonium, Mr. G. H. Gregory, Mus. Bac., Oxon. The Concert was under the direction of Mr. G. H. Porter, Organist of the Parish Church, the Society's Conductor.

MANCHESTER.—Mr. Cross gave an Orchestral Concert—the last of the present series—in the Association Hall, on the 8th ult. The vocalists were Miss Bessie Holt (who was most favourably received), Miss Cowburn, and Messrs. Ridsdale, Bowley, and J. G. Hewson.

MELBOURNE, DERBYSHIRE.—The members of the Glee and Madrigal Society gave a Concert in the National Schoolroom, on Tuesday, February 26. The programme was miscellaneous, and included the Chorus from King David "Remember not"; and part-songs by Macfarren, Auber, and Smart. The band gave an excellent rendering of Handel's Overtures to Athaliah and Esther, and accompanied Mr. C. E. Abney in "Nazareth" and "Honour and arms." Miss A. M. Haimes sang a song by Dürner, "Thine is my heart," extremely well, and Miss Wadhouse, in songs of G. J. Bennett and Taubert, as usual distinguished herself. Mr. Wilson conducted.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.—Mr. J. Westwood Toss gave a successful Concert on the 21st ult., in the Central Hall. The soloists, who acquitted themselves with much credit, were Misses Wilson and Stevenson, Messrs. Mace and Cameron. "The Land of the Leal," harmonised by the Conductor, formed part of the programme, and received a most cordial encore.

NEW SWINDON.—Romberg's Lay of the Bell formed the first part of an excellent Concert given by the Choral Society in the Mechanics' Hall, on Wednesday, the 19th ult. The principal vocalists, Miss Julia Jones, Mr. Alfred Kenningham, and Mr. Thomas Kempton, were highly effective in their respective solos. Among the items of the miscellaneous portion, a composition by Mr. J. Carter, was performed for the first time, and was well received. The accompanists were Mr. G. Whitehead and Miss Nelly Sykes. Mr. Albert Sykes conducted.

NORTHALLERTON.—The newly formed Choral Society gave its first Concert, which was a marked success, on February 26. A selection from The Messiah constituted the first part, the choruses in which were given in a manner reflecting the highest credit on the members and their Conductor, Mr. Clement A. Harris. The solos were well rendered by Miss Pollock, Mr. C. A. Harris, and Mr. Jenkinson. The second part was miscellaneous. The choruses were admirably accompanied on the harmonium by Mrs. J. and Miss A. Guthrie.

PEBBLES.—The first Annual Concert of the Choral Union was given in the Chambers Institution, on Monday evening, February 25. The first part consisted of anthems, sacred solos, &c.; and the second part of glees, part-songs, &c. The soloists were Miss H. Simpson and Mr. T. E. Gleadhill. Messrs. R. M. Garth and C. E. Windridge officiated as accompanists, and the Rev. J. Llewelyn Evans, M.A., conducted.

READING.—The Philharmonic Society gave a performance of The Messiah on Monday, the 17th ult., in the New Town Hall, under the direction of Mr. W. H. Strickland, who officiated as Conductor. The solos were rendered by local amateurs. Mr. F. Read, Mus. Bac., Oxon., presided at the organ, and was fairly successful in keeping the choir together. The large audience, by frequent applause, testified their willingness to encourage the efforts of the Society in giving cheap concerts.

ROCHDALE.—A series of Organ Recitals has been given in All Saints' Church, Hamer, on Sunday evenings during February, by Mr. J. E. Dale, the newly appointed Organist and Choirmaster. The pieces, which were well selected, included selections from Handel, Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, &c., and some arrangements by Mr. Dale. The Recitals took place after the usual evening service, and were well attended and much appreciated.

SALISBURY.—An excellent Lecture was delivered on Tuesday, the 4th ult., by the Rev. H. O. Mackey, of Southampton, the subject being "Mendelssohn: the Man and his Music." The illustrations were excellently rendered by Mrs. Mackey, Mrs. Sly, Miss Lotie West, Mr. Mountford, and the Rev. H. O. Mackey; Miss West's pure and unaffected singing being an especial feature of the evening. The choruses were ably sung by a choir conducted by Mr. W. R. Atkins, Organist, Mr. Walter Woodrow.

SOUTHAMPTON.—A highly successful Concert was given at the Hartley Hall, on Wednesday, February 27, in connection with the Polytechnic Institution, by Miss Kate Evans, assisted by Miss Patsie Michie, L.A.M., Miss E. Welsh, Mr. J. Austin Herbert, Mr. Jno. A. Billett, and Mr. A. J. T. Gulliford. A miscellaneous programme was exceedingly well rendered, and great credit is due to Miss Evans.

SUNDERLAND.—On the 10th ult. a Concert was given in the Victoria Hall, in aid of the building fund of the Sunderland and North Durham Eye Infirmary. The entertainment, which was under the patronage of the Mayor and Mayoress (Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Wayman), was very attractive. The soloists were Madame Clarke, Mr. J. P. Bevan, Mr. D. S. Macdonald, Mr. J. B. Williams, and Master Bevan (violinist). Mr. T. Hutchinson, Mus. Bac., officiated as accompanist, and Mr. Thos. Henderson led an efficient orchestra. We regret to add that the attendance was not so large as desired, and we are afraid that the Institution will not have been greatly benefited.

SWANSEA.—Dr. Parry's Oratorio Emmanuel was produced, with much success, on February 29. The principal vocalists—Miss Kate Hardy, Miss Polly Jenkins, Mr. Sauvage, and Mr. Dyved Lewis—were thoroughly efficient, and the choruses were admirably sung throughout. The work was received with the warmest marks of approbation, and the composer (who conducted) was enthusiastically applauded at the conclusion of the performance. The organ was skilfully presided at by Mr. Haydn Parry, the composer's son.

TORONTO, CANADA.—The Philharmonic Society, which performed Gounod's Redemption (twice) and Cowen's Rose Maiden last season, gave the first Concert of the present season before a crowded audience on January 15, when Mendelssohn's Elijah was the work selected. Mr. A. E. Stoddard (of New York) took the part of Elijah, and was in every respect most satisfactory. The other leading parts were sung by local vocalists, members of the Society, all of whom were thoroughly efficient. The Chorus consisted of about 300 voices, and the orchestra of fifty performers. The rendering of the work was, on the whole, highly successful, the "Baal" choruses, "Thanks be to God," "Be not afraid," "Behold, the Lord passed by," "Then did Elijah the Prophet," and the finale being sung with much precision and effect. Mr. F. H. Torrington trained the chorus and orchestra, and conducted the performance.

TROWBRIDGE.—The third of a series of Organ Recitals was given on Thursday evening, the 13th ult., in the Manvers Street Chapel, by the Organist, Mr. O. A. Mansfield, A.C.O. The organ pieces were interspersed by a selection of Sacred choral music, admirably rendered by the Choir.

WALSHAM-LE-WILLOWS.—On Monday evening, the 10th ult. a Concert of Sacred music was given by the Choral Society, assisted by a few friends, under the direction of Mr. Fred. R. Lyne, Organist of the Parish Church and Conductor of the Society. The programme was well selected and ably rendered.

WARE.—A Ballad Concert was given, on February 26, at the Town Hall, under the direction of Mr. J. L. Gregory, F.C.O., in aid of the Ware Institute. The artists were Madame Clara West, Miss Lotie West, and Mr. Trelawney Cobham (vocalists); Mr. Arthur Payne, R.A.M. (violinist), and a Glee Party. Mr. Payne's violin solos were highly appreciated, and Miss Lotie West was much applauded for her effective rendering of Mr. Gregory's new ballad "The Dream of Home."

WINDSOR.—On Wednesday, the 19th ult., Mendelssohn's Oratorio St. Paul was given in the Albert Institute by the members of the Windsor and Eton Choral Society, the principal soloists being Miss Madeline Hardy, Miss Annie Knowles, Mr. W. H. Cummings, and Mr. Frank May. The choruses were well rendered throughout, evidencing the great care which had been bestowed upon the preparation of the work by Mr. Samuel Smith, who, since the retirement of Sir George Elvey, has conducted the Concerts of the Society. The soprano recitatives and airs were well sung by Miss Hardy, who was especially successful in the air "Jerusalem." Miss Knowles, a local artist, gave an exquisite rendering of "But the Lord is mindful." Mr. Cummings sang throughout with his wonted finish and taste, the death scene of Stephen being given with marvellous pathos, and but for the rule of "no encores" being strictly adhered to, he would have been compelled to repeat the air "Be thou faithful unto death," in which he was excellently accompanied by Mr. Gough with the violinello obbligato. Mr. Frank May sang the bass throughout with great taste and expression, and was highly successful. Herr Gustav Morsch was the leader of the orchestra, and Mr. H. R. Coulidge presided at the harmonium. The band and chorus numbered 100.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. Frank Bradley, Organist and Choir Director to the Parish Church, St. Andrew's, West Kensington.—Mr. H. C. Hardwick, to St. Philip's Church, Leeds.—Mr. H. W. Weston, to St. Mary's Parish Church, Balham, S.W.—Mr. J. Edward W.

EXTRACT FROM THE PROSPECTUS OF THE SERIES:—

"The intention of 'Novello's Primers of Musical Biography' is to convey, as clearly as the limits of an elementary work will allow, a just idea of each composer's personality, and to record the principal events of his life. Knowledge of what a man is helps the understanding of what he does. These little books may serve, therefore, as a first step towards acquaintance with the genius and compositions of the masters to whom they are devoted."

THE

STORY OF MOZART'S REQUIEM.

By WM. POLE, F.R.S., Mus. Doc.

This immortal work, independently of its value as a musical composition, has great interest on account of its very remarkable history. The mysterious commission given for it, the supernatural impression made by this on Mozart, his composition of the work under such pathetic circumstances, partly on his deathbed, the difficulties as to its publication, the fierce controversy as to its authorship, which for fourteen years engaged the attention of some of the most learned men and profound musicians of Europe, the extraordinary disappearance and long concealment of the manuscripts, their ultimate discovery, the difficult and perplexing questions as to their genuineness, the strange revelations gradually made as to the secret history of the various transactions, and the doubts which, after all possible information has been obtained, still hang over the authorship of some parts of the work; all these things, spread over seventy or eighty years, form a story of unparalleled interest in the annals of music.

The object of the present essay is to tell this story, which is hitherto but little known in England; and it will form, it is hoped, an appropriate companion to the various editions of the "Requiem" published by Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co.

"Dr. Pole's little book is the result of much careful and painstaking investigation, the conclusions from which are given in the most logical and clear manner, and embody perhaps the most extraordinary story ever heard of in connection with a musical composition, and one which really has all the interest of a romance."—Edinburgh Review.

PSALM LVII.

SET TO MUSIC FOR

TENOR SOLO, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

BY

E. H. THORNE.

Octavo, One Shilling.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"It is varied, highly coloured, and picturesque; the materials of modern art are freely employed without exaggeration, and if the ideas are not uniformly striking by reason of novelty or impressiveness, they are certainly presented in an attractive form."

STANDARD.

"Mr. E. H. Thorne's setting of the Psalm is a musicianlike effort in the Mendelssohnian school, and it should—on account of its full fund of melody—occupy a place in the repertory of choral societies."

DAILY CHRONICLE.

"This piece, whilst showing the musicianly acquirements of its composer, and characterised by proper elevation of style and devotional feeling, is by no means beyond the reach of average church choirs. It is eminently pleasing—indeed attractive, throughout."

Agents are required in every Town. Apply to the Inventor and Patentee as below.

The Pedals and Patent Action supplied by the above well-known Inventor are giving a great impetus to the present generation of Organists and Students in the art of Pedalling, and, as it is well known that most, if not all, of our great Organ Players had the advantage of a Pianoforte with Pedals attached by the old and cumbersome roller-board system, it should be known that by this new invention the Pedals can be purchased and attached at a small cost with a Mahogany Action which is perfectly noiseless, and without any springs or intricate parts to get out of repair. Organ music can thus be enjoyed and practised without the usual trouble and expense of an Organ blower. This Invention is quite different to any other Patent Action, and, being the most recent, it is as great an improvement over others as the Steam Engine is over the old Stage Coach.

Send to the Inventor, as below, for the Drawings and Prices to the Protection and Trade.

DR. F. E. GLADSTONE says:—

"I have much pleasure in stating my opinion that Mr. WM. CHINNOCK DYER'S Patent Action for attaching Organ Pedals to a Pianoforte is likely to prove very valuable to Organists and Students of the Organ. It possesses several advantages over other actions which have come under my observation, and I shall have no hesitation in recommending the invention to my friends and pupils."

All is sent complete, with full printed "Directions for Attaching," and the Action, being placed under the keyboard of the instrument, is easily attached to any Pianoforte.

ADDRESS—WM. CHINNOCK DYER,

WESTON-SUPER-MARE.

CAUTION.—This being the latest Patent Pedal Action, intending purchasers should note that it is the most perfect and reliable, as it contains every improvement; and being manufactured solely of well-seasoned mahogany, carefully bushed with red cloth, will continue to give the very best Pedal practice to Organists and Students.

Kindly read the testimonial above. Before purchasing send to the Inventor for the drawings and prices of this the most recent Patent Pedal Action.

Organists should recommend these Pedals and Patent Action to their Pupils.

Patent "Escapement" Organ
Pedal Attachment

TO THE

PIANOFORTE.

JOSH. SHAW

Wishes respectfully to draw the attention of Organists, and all who wish for this desirable boon, to his invention and patent on the

"ESCAPEMENT PRINCIPLE."

This Attachment is allowed by all who have seen it to be the most perfect and unique yet in existence, far excelling all direct actions, which are entirely at the mercy of the feet, its chief features being that a perfectly crisp and uniform note is imparted by the pedal to the key of the piano, no matter whether the pedalling is legato or otherwise, the pedal not acting directly on the key; and, moreover, there is a perfect immunity from any damage to the Piano.

Notice particularly that this is the only Attachment acting purely on the

without which any scheme, however cheap, is altogether unsatisfactory and dangerous to the Piano.

For further particulars, Litho Drawings, and price, post-free, apply to 21 Etudes spéciales pour préparer à l'exécution

des ouvrages de FR. CHOPIN. Op. 154 ... 10 6

The same work in Three Books ... each 5 0

PREFACE.—Chopin is a writer of such masterly originality, not only in his creations, but also in his manner of composing for the Pianoforte, in the structure of his accompaniments, in his treatment of scales, arpeggi, and combinations of all kinds, that a preliminary labour—with a view of acquiring a special technical power—is indispensable to the student of his works. With this view I have chosen a certain number of passages from the works of Chopin, remarkable either in their construction or in the difficulties to be surmounted in their execution; and I have written a study on each, developing the theme and its technical peculiarities.

It must of course be understood that these studies apply only to mechanical difficulties. The secret of Chopin's style and expression can be discovered only by an earnest study of his works.—STEPHEN HELLER, 1884.

OVERTURE in C major, by C. A. GAMBINI ... ..	" 2 6
BELL-RONDO (Rondò de' Campanelli), by G. MORANDI ... ..	" 1 6

Organists will be pleased to find in Signor Gambini's Ten Pieces music of a highly appropriate cast for use during Church service, once melodious and sedate in style, chiefly for the softer combination of organ-tone. The Overture affords more legitimate opportunity for solo display, and will no doubt be welcomed by advanced players as a valuable addition to their repertoire of concert pieces. Morandi's Bell-Rondo, a characteristic and tuneful movement, has already achieved considerable popularity, which the present special arrangement for our English instruments will tend to increase.

ARTISTIC VOICE IN SONG & SPEECH (reprinted from the Medical Press and Circular). By CHARLES LOWN. Dedicated by special permission to—
 Mr. SIMS REEVES,
 Mr. SANTLEY, and
 Mr. MAAS.

"Mr. Lunn is one of the most earnest and conscientious thinkers of the day."—Musical Times.
 London: BAILLIÈRE, TINDALL and COX, and all Book and Musicsellers.

VIOLINISTS should write for a Catalogue of "EDITION CHANOT," which contains a good Selection of new Violin Music, sent post-free by the publisher, F. W. Chanot, 179 and 185, Wardour Street, London, W.

UNDOUBTEDLY in the front rank of Musical papers stands MUSICAL OPINION AND MUSIC TRADE REVIEW, now in its seventh year of publication, and containing 156 columns of bright and interesting musical matter and advertisements. Published (2d.) on first of month. Secure a copy of the April issue by ordering it of your book or musicseller; sending 3d. to 1, Sherborne Lane; or ordering of the railway stall in your town.

HOW TO LEARN TO PLAY THE PIANO WELL. By ONE WHO HAS TAUGHT HIMSELF.
 "Here, in the compass of fourteen pages, is matter calculated to produce better results than half-a-dozen years' teaching."
 "Shows clearly the way to success in pianoforte playing."

Third Edition. Price 1s.

THE ART OF PLAYING AT SIGHT. By ONE WHO HAS TAUGHT HIMSELF.
 "The author believes his system to be infallible; after a fair trial, we must say, we believe so too."
 "We have almost practised our finger-ends off, but could never read half-a-dozen bars correctly. The few hints in this little manual have shown us the way to accomplish it."

LITTLE DIFFICULTIES WHICH OCCUR IN PIANOFORTE PLAYING, ILLUSTRATED AND EXPLAINED. By ONE WHO HAS TAUGHT HIMSELF. Price 1s.
 "The little difficulties which occur to the average player, and which make playing so irksome, are here fully illustrated and explained. It is astonishing what an amount of information is conveyed in a small compass."

HOW TO FORM AND TRAIN A VILLAGE CHOIR. By AN ORGANISING CHOIRMASTER. Price 1s.
 "By far the greater number of those who have the management of village choirs are amateurs. They will find their task considerably lightened after a perusal of this book."

"Sutton Lane, Chiswick, October 30, 1883.

"Dear Herr Hoering,—I am very much obliged to you for your pamphlets and specimen copy of 'Tutor.' I have only had time to look rapidly through the latter, but I have seen sufficient to show me that it contains everything you claim for it; and I shall cordially recommend it as far as it may be in my power. It is conscientious, and thoroughly musicianlike, and I feel quite sure that it will be much appreciated by the majority of the musical profession."

Now ready.

BOOKS I. and II. of A. HOERING'S NEW METHOD FOR THE PIANOFORTE, on an entirely new principle:—

OPINIONS FROM PROFESSIONALS.

"I like it immensely."
 "An excellent method, and worthy of all teachers' notice."
 "I find your method excellent."
 "Infinitely superior to all I have tried before."
 "I think your system wonderfully good, and just the thing that was wanted."
 "Comparison only shows the merits of your system to greater advantage."

LEOPOLD, DUKE OF ALBANY.

BORN, APRIL 7, 1853. DIED, MARCH 28, 1884.

BEYOND echoing the universal sentiment of regret for the loss which the Royal Family, the State, and society have suffered through the death of her Majesty's youngest son, we have not here specially to do with the sad event in those aspects. Nothing we could say would intensify public feeling, or give expression to it in terms more eloquent than those which have been employed by our contemporaries over and over again. Yet there still remains provocation to terms of sympathy and regret, though it may be that pity is misplaced. The workings of Providence are often a puzzle to human minds, who see only the steps and cannot discern the goal. We are told on high authority that "none of us liveth unto himself," and there is reason, after all, for believing that each of us discharges the work he has to do for others, even though, as in Prince Leopold's case, the sun go down while it is yet noon. With regard to the deceased Royal Duke, it is quite certain that he lived long enough to set a high example, and to leave behind him the fragrance of a worthy name. He was perfectly instructed as a prince, and the death of one who, in his high place, has gone through such a training may well be called a national loss.

It becomes us here particularly to dwell upon a special consideration. Prince Leopold inherited more than an average share of that love for music which is a family appanage. Resembling his father in many things—in tastes, habits of thought, and even mode of expression—he derived a love of music from both parents, and cultivated it with no ordinary zeal and success. There was good reason, indeed, for believing that, with increasing strength of body, he would take, in connection with our art, the conspicuous and most useful place once occupied by the Prince Consort, therein doing even more important work. Her Majesty's late husband exercised, beyond question, a beneficial influence upon music. Devoted to its personal cultivation, largely proficient in its practice, and sound of taste, the impress of his mind was widely felt in the right direction. We do not forget the cordial admiration he entertained for Mendelssohn, or the keen interest he took in making the works of Sebastian Bach known to English amateurs. But the Prince Consort had little leisure for the promotion of any one art. We now see, through the Queen's books and Sir Theodore Martin's "Life," what a busy man he was, and how, eager to lighten the burden of State for her Majesty, he took no inconsiderable load upon his own shoulders. With regard to three of his sons, circumstances of a like kind, if not in the same measure, have prevailed since their entry into manhood. Socially and ceremonially, the Prince of Wales discharges the manifold duties of the Crown; the Duke of Edinburgh is a sailor, in almost constant employment, which often requires his presence in distant parts of the globe; while the Duke of Connaught is a born soldier, proud of and devoted to his profession. There remained but the Duke of Albany, and him, as it seemed, circumstances helped predilection to mould into the form of a supporter of art. Debarred from what is known as an active career, and endowed with refined and gentle tastes, it was felt that in this Prince we had on the side of music a powerful influence and a brilliant example. Even with such poor health as was given him, he did something to encourage hope that under happier conditions he would do more. Amateurs do not forget his presence on a Manchester platform for the purpose of furthering the cause of the Royal College of Music; nor are they likely, when taking a retrospect of his career, to overlook the interesting and instructive speech he made on that occasion—a speech meant to prove that neither the records of the past nor observation of the present throw discouragement upon the idea of placing England among the foremost musical nations. The Manchester utterance of Prince Leopold may have revealed to students of musical history and watchers of musical doings nothing that they did not know before, but it is the privilege of Princes, even when they are most trite, to command attention and respect for their words. Prince Leopold's speech was a manifesto in favour of music, issued from a place of influence and authority, and there is every reason to believe that it made its mark quite apart from the particular purpose the royal orator endeavoured to serve. It is sad to think that the fair promise then given of good and knightly service to art has been so quickly blasted for ever.

Death, thou art he that will not flatter princes,
That stoops not to authority.

The fiat went forth, and with it an end to hope.

All this becomes the more sad when we recall the fact that Prince Leopold's last public appearance in England was made on the platform of a village Concert-room. With the tact and amiability distinctive of his family, the Prince took upon himself the duties of a neighbour, and, when an amateur entertainment was projected in aid of some local cause, he stood ready to bear his part among the rest, emulous of his brother, the Duke of Edinburgh, on a larger stage. He sang a song to the village audience, and took his encore, with the perfect simplicity and unaffectedness that stamps the English gentleman, at the same time setting an example likely to influence smaller people as, perhaps, nothing else could. Under no more appropriate circumstances could the Prince have taken a final farewell of English life. Socially and artistically they made up a complete, suggestive, and beautiful picture, which will be a pleasant memory in years to come. Now, there only remains to hope that among the rising generation of the Royal House may be one or more in whom the spirit of the Prince Consort and the Duke of Albany survives. We cannot recall the dead, but we can indulge roseate anticipations of the living, who have their life and all its possibilities before them.

SOME RECENT MUSIC IN PARIS.

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

THE French capital does not now hold the position of supremacy which it once so proudly filled. Yet there are times when a flash of the old vigour and enterprise attracts regard. Of one such period, brief but pregnant, I desire to speak.

On the 2nd ult. the revised version of Gounod's "Sapho" was produced at the Grand Opéra, under the composer's personal direction, and in presence of a crowded and brilliant house. The work must have been wholly new—in its stage form, at any rate—to a vast majority of those present, years having elapsed since it was last represented. With "Sapho," indeed, M. Gounod made his first essay on the lyric stage (April 16, 1851). A French critic gives a lively and characteristic account of the circumstances which led to this début: "Attached, as chapel-master, to the little Church of Foreign Missions, M. Gounod there composed a good deal of religious music, which attracted notice by elegant workmanship and fine feeling. M. Gounod thus lived, in peace, in the heart of the sanctuary, composing pious hymns to the glory of Heaven, when the genius of modern society, making a very gracious grimace, said to him: 'What art thou doing there, poor misguided soul? Thou seekest life, and takest the road to death. Come with me; come and sing the glorious passions of the human heart. That will be better worth thy while than striking thy breast for sins thou hast not committed.' M. Gounod, who did not wait for the invitation to be repeated, threw aside his soutane, and, following the steps of his good genius, was led straight to the Opéra." The composer of "The Redemption" would, no doubt, smile at this as the creation of a lively fancy, but it is, at any rate, founded on fact. Some say that the good genius was no other than Madame Viardot-Garcia (the Sapho of 1851), whose influence brought Emile Augier and Gounod into the bonds of collaboration, but I will not pursue this enquiry. Enough for the present purpose that "Sapho" was actually M. Gounod's premier effort at composition for the lyric stage. The opera attracted a good deal of attention in France, and much was written concerning it by critics and others anxiously on the look out for signs of greatness among the younger generation of composers. These received it with qualified favour, some of them praising the author generally as "a distinguished musician who has both style and elevated tendencies," and then finding fault in detail. As for the public, they are said to have received "Sapho" coldly, and it is on record that not more than nine representations were given. Strange to tell, the work obtained notice in England, very nearly stirring up a wordy war. The late Mr. Chorley—to his credit, be it said—was the first English critic to discern the talent of Gounod, and he never wearied of lauding it in the pages of the Athenæum. At that time some boldness was required to praise anybody who had come after Mendelssohn. Fascinated by the charm, personal and artistic, of that master, many writers of influence in the musical world would hear of nothing likely to damage his position as the idol of the hour. Consequently, when Chorley launched out in praise of Gounod, there were answers of exceeding fierceness. "We have really no patience," said one critic, "with the half-patronage, half-cold shouldering now applied to the works of a mighty genius, the extinction of whose life was the darkness of music, a darkness which twenty thousand of M. Gounod's rushlights would fail to re-illumine." It is hardly necessary to observe that this feeling was aroused, not on the question of the French composer's absolute claims, but through fear lest their advocacy by an influential man should do harm to a master with whom sympathy was then at fever-heat. The controversy soon died down, but sprang up again when "Sapho" was produced at the Royal Italian Opera, on August 9, 1851. Then the work underwent the process of being, so to speak, flayed alive. One critic, however, curtly dismissed it as "full of pretension and empty of merit." For seven years little was heard of Gounod's first opera, but in July, 1858—the master having, meantime, gained renown—it was revived at the Grand Opéra, reduced to two acts. Now, twenty-six years later, changeful "Sapho" is before the world in four acts. Time will show whether this is to be its ultimate form.

I am not concerned to defend M. Emile Augier's libretto, though I would stand up any day on behalf of some among the poet's verses. It must be admitted that he treated the theme in rather a commonplace manner, especially when making Phaon, that representative of the ancient Greek élegant, an ordinary conspirator against the tyrant Pittacus, and a blundering conspirator to boot. No doubt, the libretto, in its new form, is an improvement, the story being worked out more minutely and with greater variety of interest. It is still needful, however, to shut one's eyes to the charming possibilities of the subject in order to be content with this particular treatment of it. I shall not be expected to compare the libretto of 1851 with that of 1884, and show where the one differs from the other. Enough that in the second and third acts there is a good deal of entirely new matter, both music and words, the additions being so cleverly worked into poem and score that no charge of wanting homogeneity will lie. It is understood that M. Gounod increased his full score by 600 pages, a fact indicative, at any rate, of earnest purpose, but I should not like to be called upon to decide, without fuller acquaintance, whether the new music is better than the old. Certain it is that the brilliant Parisian audience bestowed hearty applause upon many numbers belonging to the edition of '51—upon, for example, the beautiful choral effects in the first act, the charming duet for Glycère and Pythéas (encored), and the impressive scene with which the heroine takes leave of life. It would, perhaps, be risky to give an opinion as to the chances of the revised work in this country. Mr. Gye was present at the performance, and formed his own idea on this matter, an idea which may or may not coincide with my own belief that he has produced operas far less worthy and much more likely to fail.

In performance, "Sapho" enjoyed all the advantages that the elaborate resources of the Grand Opéra could bestow. All the stage effects were splendid, particularly those of the first and last acts. In the first act, the temple of Jupiter stood up solid and imposing amid appropriate surroundings, and the life and movement of the crowd during the procession with which the drama opens could not have been improved upon. All conspired to present a magnificent classic picture, with which the "set" of the last act was a splendid contrast, the wild rocks whence Sapho throws herself into the sea standing out grimly against an angry sky, across which the setting sun threw a crimson glare. A good deal of Wagnerian breadth and grandeur distinguished this final act. The figure of the white-robed poetess, relieved against the sombre background, might have passed for that of a doomed Walkyrie deprived of her armour. Need it be said that the execution of the music, under M. Gounod's direction, was almost perfect? Whatever the shortcomings of our neighbours—and they have some in respect of other musical doings—they are entitled to boast when a lyric drama is produced at the Grand Opéra, neither money nor toil being spared to reach ideal excellence. Madame Krauss gave a grand and touching representation of the title character, and Mdlle. Richard was an acceptable Glycère, while M. Dereims (Phaon), M. Melchisedec (Alcée), and M. Gailhard (Pythéas) answered well for their respective parts. Mention should specially be made of the young artist (M. Phançon) who played Pittacus. He is, I believe, a recent addition to the strength of the company, and has, I am sure, a fine career before him if he chooses to make the best use of natural means and excellent training. The superb orchestra appeared to special advantage under M. Gounod's sympathetic direction; and a word should be added in praise of a splendid ballet, wherein the dancing of Mdlle. Subra, as Terpsichore, evoked round after round of applause. At the close of the performance M. Gounod was cheered and cheered again by his admiring friends and countrymen, who would, perhaps, have given "one cheer more" had they known that before entering the orchestra he had conducted a long rehearsal of his "Redemption" at the Trocadéro. Concerning the performance of that Sacred Trilogy on the morrow I have next to speak.

There has lately been set on foot in Paris an association called the "Union Internationale des Compositeurs." This is a grand name, but I am not precisely sure of the exact meaning intended by those who have chosen it. Literally interpreted, it would signify that the composers of all nations, or some of them, have banded themselves together for purposes connected with their craft, but, as far as appears to an outsider like myself, the "Union" is simply a concert-giving Society founded on more or less eclectic principles. Here, however, is enough for satisfaction. It must excite pleasure in every cosmopolitan breast to see Parisian musical circles becoming catholic after so many years of the sectarianism that cannot travel beyond itself. Our excellent neighbours have an abundance of good qualities, but, in matters of art, they are apt to look down on the rest of the world. They are the Chinese of the West, occupying a Middle Kingdom surrounded by "barbarians"—a very pleasant delusion, although healthy to get away from. I regret not being able to give the reader further insight into the constitution of a Society with which, as an international one, we all have concern, but I am able to state, for English gratification generally, that the managers have decided to present, at one of the series of five concerts now in progress, an example of English music—no other than the brief introduction to Mr. Mackenzie's "Colomba." Let us all be glad thereof, and rejoice to see that our native art, represented by a leaf from a score of our most rising composer, is acknowledged in Paris. We shall do now. We are barbarians no longer. "When France is uneasy, the world takes alarm"—when France approves, all nature smiles. The first Concert of the Union Internationale was properly devoted to French art, choice falling upon Gounod's "Redemption," which, though produced eighteen months before, had never reached a public hearing in the city where its composer resides. This may seem strange, but is not. Our friends across the Channel are not given to sacred concerts, and the oratorio has never become naturalised among them as with us. It remains a foreign article, the taste for which, as proverbially for olives, has to be acquired. There could be no stronger evidence of this than was presented on the occasion of the performance, when it appeared that the "assistants" were all somewhat undecided what to do. During one of the artistic tours made in Germany by Berlioz, he attended a performance of Bach's "Passion," and was deeply impressed by the reverent behaviour of the audience, who followed the executants book in hand, as though at a sacred function. We in England exhibit on a like occasion much of the same grave decorum, and I have been told that M. Gounod wished the "Redemption" to be given as far as possible under English conditions. Hence it was that the executants appeared in morning dress—the hour was two o'clock—instead of the regulation gala attire. By the way, there was an exception to the observance of this unwonted rule, the second bass soloist confronting the audience in all the glory of a "claw-hammer" coat and white tie, and looking particularly uncomfortable. But though the "assistants" wore morning dress in English fashion, the audience and the procedure generally remained distinctly French. Characteristic movement and chatter prevailed over the Hall. During the performance applause broke in whenever a singer achieved a "hit," and at the close of any special effort the amount of hand-shaking and mutual admiration on the orchestra had a very curious effect upon my insular eyes. In point of fact, it was hard to disabuse my mind of an impression that I was at a free and easy rehearsal. One incident wore a comic air. At the close of the first part of the oratorio the audience seemed uncertain what to do; thereupon, a servant of the establishment brought in a large board inscribed "Entr'acte," and held it up for public inspection till the message it conveyed had been mastered, M. Gounod, meanwhile, making a short speech in his customary genial and graceful style. Let me not be understood as censuring all this. Far from it. Every country has its little ways, and they are the legitimate outcome of its taste and temperament, however odd in the eyes of strangers. But should any Frenchman feel aggrieved by my remarks he can have his revenge. Let him borrow the pen of M. Max O'Rell, attend one of our oratorio performances, and make what fun he pleases of that extremely respectable, not to say solemn, function.

The arrangements for the performance of "The Redemption" went to show how novel was the occasion. There are no amateur choristers organised for such work in Paris, and the ladies and gentlemen of the chorus had, for the most part, the unmistakable air of professionals. The orchestra was, of course, easily procurable; but, of the six soloists, Madame Albani was brought from England and M. and Madame Kettner from Geneva, leaving only Madame Rosine Bloch, M. Faure, and an excellent young bass, M. Fournet, to represent Paris. It is presumable that the Union Internationale des Compositeurs will, by-and-by, possess its own special resources, and seek to develop all the means necessary for the proper rendering of great sacred works. This, at any rate, is the way to encourage composition. Here let me quote the words of M. Gaston Serpette, writing about this very performance: "The French composers who in our time have essayed Oratorio are rare. They have wanted the means of execution, and, let us add, it appeared doubtful whether this kind of music could ever naturalise itself in France. For this reason, no doubt, M. Gounod produced his work in England." I sincerely hope that the labours of the new Society will tend to remove from French music what is, however looked at, a serious reproach.

The performance had many good points, but would bear no sort of comparison with an average Festival display in England, while the poverty of effect, as compared with that produced in Birmingham, must have impressed M. Gounod by no means to the advantage of Paris. The male chorus contained good voices, and, generally speaking, did its work well, but the sopranos were weak and of poor quality, the contraltos, as usual in France, coming last of all. With regard to the orchestra, the only critical remark invited touches the thinness and weakness of the violins. Those instruments were in number sufficient, but they lacked sonority, and their delivery of M. Gounod's extended melodies in the higher parts of the scale wanted the brilliant timbre to which we are accustomed in England. As for the soloists, I need say nothing about Madame Albani, whose singing in "For His love as a Father" electrified the audience. Madame Rosine Bloch did well, and with experience, would become an oratorio artist of the right kind. Her delivery of "While my watch I am keeping" was chaste in style and full of expression. M. Ketten, as the tenor reciter, appeared too self-conscious, and more bent upon effect than became the task he undertook. Nevertheless, his declamation was often good, as was that of M. Fournet, about whom, I suspect, the world will soon hear more. There remains to speak of M. Faure, and to do so in terms of highest praise. Grave, dignified, and employing a style perfect in its propriety, M. Faure was not only an ideal reciter, but an ideal interpreter of the Divine words, which he delivered with a simplicity and tenderness never excelled. This was the most conspicuous feature in the entire performance, and the one by which the début of "The Redemption" in Paris will most readily be remembered. And now what was the result upon the audience? I am bound to say, in reply, that M. Gounod's music held them fast. Three hours were consumed in getting through the work, but at the end of that long strain the hall contained almost as many people as at the beginning. Applause was frequent—much too frequent for noise that breaks in upon music—and it conveyed, no doubt, a high compliment, but the best tribute rendered to the composer took the form of sustained interest and even rapt attention. It is true that the critics, who listened professionally, went away and—many of them—wrote in doubtful language about their novel experience. The public took a different line. Under no obligation to find in "The Redemption" material for epigrams, they heard frankly and frankly approved. M. Gounod's "Trilogy" should now go the round of France to represent a distinctive achievement by one of her most gifted sons.

On the evening of the day which witnessed the production of "The Redemption," M. Massenet's "Manon" was played at the historic theatre in the Rue Favart. The character of this very successful opera is not unknown to my readers, since, a little while ago, I had the honour to lay before them a sketch of the story and some remarks concerning the music. After witnessing a representation of "Manon," I think higher of the work than ever. It is musicianly and something more—that is to say, dramatic, while preserving the forms and sustaining the ascendancy of the composer's art. Certain features in the libretto may, perhaps, invest the production of "Manon" in our country with risk. It would shock many minds, for example, to show them an ecclesiastic sharing a passionate love-duet in the vestibule of his church, while organ strains prelude an act of worship. But much of this could be softened down without injury to the opera as a whole, and the game would certainly pay for the candle. "Manon" is too good not to be worth taking some trouble with. The performance went on with admirable smoothness, the orchestra, in particular, giving M. Massenet's music in splendid style. Of the artists on the stage two deserve special mention—our old London acquaintance, Mdlle.

Heilbron (Manon) and M. Talazac (Des Grieux). These, as representing the lovers, were well matched and satisfied the most exigent requirements. M. Talazac should be heard in London as soon as possible. He can sing and he can act—a rather rare combination among stage tenors at the present time. M. Taskin, as Lescaut, played with the rough force befitting that garde du corps, and M. Cobalet, as the "heavy father" of the drama, left really nothing to desire. All these details are, however, of secondary interest with English readers, the question for them being whether "Manon," suitably modified, will be given in this country. What does Mr. Gye say? He was present.

By EBENEZER PROUT.

THE score of "Alexander's Feast" (1736), the new work which in chronological order comes under our notice, though by no means deficient in variety of colour, contains but few effects which have not already been met with in previous works. The long opening symphony to "Bacchus' blessings are treasure," for wind instruments only, is in effect almost unique in Handel's works. But that which chiefly distinguishes "Alexander's Feast" from most other compositions of the old master is the importance of the bassoon parts. In few other of Handel's scores do we find so large a proportion of movements which have independent parts for two bassoons. We have seen ripieno bassoon parts in "Deborah," but in that work the principal bassoons in such cases played unison with the basses. Handel's general practice even where the bassoons have separate parts, is to let them all play in unison; but in this comparatively short score we find at least four movements with obbligato parts for two bassoons. In the chorus "Behold Darius, great and good," a charming effect is produced by these instruments doubling the first and second violins in the octave; while at the commencement of "The many rend the skies" two bassoons fill up the harmony of the strings with independent parts. The most striking use of these instruments in the work is in the accompaniment to the second part of the song "Revenge, Timotheus cries." For the passage "Behold a ghastly band," Handel, with musical insight, gets a sepulchral tone from the orchestra by the combination of two bassoons unison with divided violas, a third bassoon playing in unison with the violoncelli ripienti, while the violoncellos and double-basses, reinforced by organ, tasto solo, sustain the bass of the harmony. The combination here is so perfect that Mr. Gye, when he wrote his additional accompaniment to "Alexander's Feast," added nothing to it. We see shortly that two years later, in "Saul," Handel used the bassoons in a somewhat similar way for special dramatic effect. We must not pass without mention the unusual combination of flutes and viola in the recitative "Thus long ago," which Handel had already tried the same experiment in "Scipione," though there for a few bars only.

As the Funeral Anthem, written in 1737, for the death of Queen Caroline, contains nothing on which it is needful to dwell, we next come to one of the most interesting of all the Handelian scores, that of "Israel in Egypt," composed in 1738. Here for the first time we find parts for three trombones. It is a singular thing with the exception of "Saul," "Israel in Egypt" being the only movement in "Samson," Handel never to have made use of the trombones at all. What shows so thoroughly a knowledge of their employment as is to be found in these scores, should have discarded the instruments throughout the rest of his life is a question which it is probably impossible to answer. But a suggestion has occurred to me, which I throw out merely as a hint. In "Samson" we find trombones in unison with the violins in the Dead March, but they are to be seen nowhere else in the score of the oratorio. We know that Bach, writing at the same period, frequently uses trombones to play in unison with the alto, tenor, and bass voices in his choruses. We find the same thing half a century later in some of Mozart's masses. It is just possible, though I do not assert it in the absence of evidence on the subject, that Handel used the trombones in the same manner, and that he only wrote out the parts in full when they were obligato, or different from the voice parts. Such a hypothesis is at least not inconsistent with the composer's practice, as we have seen from his treatment of the bassoons; and, as we know that trombones were employed in "Samson," it appears scarcely probable that the instruments should have nothing to do all through the oratorio except to play a few bars in the Dead March. Is it likely that, after discovering such fine effects for the instruments as are to be found in the scores I have named, Handel, who throughout his whole career aimed at richness and fullness in his orchestra, would have abandoned their use? On the other hand, as he generally conducted the performances of his oratorios himself, nothing would have been easier than for him to furnish each of the trombone players with a copy of a chorus part, alto, tenor, or bass, and to tell them in which movements to play and in which to be silent. There is yet another hypothesis. Both in "Saul" and "Israel in Egypt" the trombones are not written in the score with the other instruments, but noted on separate sheets at the end of the volume. It is quite possible that other oratorios had trombone parts noted in the same way; and that, being on loose sheets, only those of "Saul" and "Israel" happen to have been preserved. This, of course, is mere conjecture; but I confess that to myself it seems at least as probable as that Handel should have used trombones nowhere except in the works I have named.

To come back to the score of "Saul," it is worth noticing that here, and also in "Israel," the low C is frequently written in the bass trombone part. There must therefore in Handel's time have been a bass trombone in F, as the note in question is not to be obtained from the ordinary trombone in G. The trombone in F is now very seldom used, though I believe that one of our best orchestral players, Mr. Samuel Millar, has one. Gluck in his "Alceste" and Weber in the overture to "Der Freischütz" have used the low C; and in general when the latter work is performed the note is transposed an octave higher.

In the overture, or rather Sinfonia, to "Saul," which is in four movements, we find much richness of orchestral effect. The first movement abounds in contrasts of wind (oboes and bassoons) and strings; in the following larghetto we have not only similar contrasts, but duet passages for solo violin and solo oboe, accompanied by the organ, cembalo, and teorba. The third movement is a regular organ concerto, with the organ part written out on two staves. The opening chorus, "How excellent Thy name," is brilliantly scored for the full orchestra. Here, besides the usual contrasts of strings and reeds, we find full harmony for the brass alone (p. 23, &c.), the combination of oboes and trombones (p. 26), the chorus accompanied by all the wood, three trombones, and organ (p. 29), and other effects too numerous to mention. Of the treatment of the organ I shall speak presently. The chorus "Welcome, welcome, mighty King," and the symphony which precedes it, are remarkable for the employment of the "Carillons," the instrument now known as the "Glockenspiel," which Mozart has employed in "Die Zauberflöte." Excepting in a late version of the chorus "Happy we" of "Acis and Galatea," which is printed in the appendix to the German Handel Society's edition of that work, I have not found this instrument in any other of Handel's scores. I have been unable to find in any work to which I have referred details as to the compass, &c., of the carillons. I must therefore content myself with noting the curious fact that both here and in "Acis" Handel has written the part a fourth higher than the notes intended to be sounded, the carillons being in F while the key of the piece is C. The air "Sin not, O King," must be noticed for the beauty of its bassoon parts; the instruments here (as in "O beautiful Queen" from "Esther," noticed in my last article) doubling the violins with charming effect. A novel combination will be seen in the solo "As great Jehovah lives." Here, while the violins have independent moving parts, the melody for the bass voice is doubled in the unison by the bassoons, and in the octave above by the violas—so far as my memory serves me, quite a new effect. The Sinfonia on p. 151 must be mentioned for the fullness of the harmony in the opening, which is scored for three violins (the first and second being doubled by the oboes), violas, two bassoons (the first obligato and the second doubling the basses), three trombones, violoncellos and basses, and organ; the harmony is mostly in eight real parts. The second movement of the same symphony is another organ concerto, and is remarkable for the indication at the commencement "senza organo ii.," which proves that here, as in other cases already seen, two organs were used. We find "organi" in the plural again in the Dead March.

In the scene between Saul and the Witch of Endor, which opens the third part of the oratorio, some very dramatic effects of instrumentation are to be found. The Witch's air, "Infernal spirits," is quite modern in its orchestration. Here will be seen sustained harmony in three parts for oboes and bassoons against staccato passages, mostly in unison, for the strings. At the close of the air, to the words "Let the prophet Samuel rise," a striking effect is obtained by the doubling of the voice part in unison and octaves by all the oboes and bassoons, while the harmony is given to the strings. I mentioned, in speaking of "Alexander's Feast," the use of the bassoons in "Behold a ghastly band." The same instruments are employed in this scene (here without the violas) to depict the rising of the ghost of Samuel, just as Meyerbeer, nearly a century later, used them in the scene of the resurrection of the nuns in "Robert le Diable." The short symphony (p. 200 of the score) representing the battle on Mount Gilboa, not only gives us the alternation of the three orchestral masses, strings, reeds, and brass, but it furnishes the only example I have found in Handel of complete phrases of full harmony for trumpets and trombones alone.

There is still another respect in which the score of "Saul" is of especial importance in its relation to our subject; it is the only one from which we can obtain definite information as to Handel's manner of treating the organ in his oratorios. It was not his custom to indicate in his manuscripts the employment of the instrument excepting in important passages or solos. He generally himself presided at the organ at the performances of his works, and it was therefore unnecessary for him to write directions for his own guidance. But, fortunately for us, the copy of "Saul" from which he conducted contains in pencil full indications as to the organ part throughout the whole. Dr. Chrysander, who in the first volume of his "Jahrbücher für Musikalische Wissenschaft" has devoted a long article to an analysis of this organ part, considers that the pencil notes were hurriedly written by the composer for use at a performance when he was unexpectedly absent. If this be so, and it appears highly probable, it may be further inferred that Handel's method of treating the organ differed from that usually adopted; because the filling up of the harmonies on the organ or harpsichord from a score or a figured bass was so generally practised that otherwise any competent musician would have required no special directions. Be this as it may, we have in this work minute instructions as to the way in which Handel intended the organ to be used. It would occupy far too much space to enter into details; for these I must refer my readers to Dr. Chrysander's very interesting article; all I can do here is to summarise the results.

We find that Handel in his choruses used the organ in full harmony with the voices, excepting in fugal passages, where he directs that the voice parts are to be played as they stand in the score. The obvious inference is that in other places, where "organo pieno" is marked, full chords were to be taken; for, if bare four-part harmony was employed throughout, there would have been no occasion to specify it in the fugued movements. But even in the choruses Handel does not always use the organ in harmony continuously. In "Along the monster atheist stode" and "The youth inspired," the organ simply doubles the bass part in the unison and octave, "tasto solo." In "Envy, eldest-born of hell," the organ plays the ground-bass in octaves throughout the first part, the effect of full chords on the instrument being held in reserve till the great burst at "Hide thee in the blackest night." From the resumption of the ground-bass to the end of the number we see again "tasto solo e l'ottava, forte." In the symphonies of the choruses, again (e.g., in "How excellent Thy name" and "Gird on thy sword"), the organ simply doubles the bass part, full chords not being used till the voices enter.

With regard to the accompaniment of the solos, we learn from this score a most important fact. In not one single song throughout the whole oratorio is the organ used to fill up the harmony. In some cases the bass ("tasto solo") reinforces the violoncellos and double-basses; but the large majority of the airs are expressly marked by the composer "senza organo." Nay, further, in the chorus "O fatal day," the use of the organ is directed; but though the instrument is already in use, as soon as the incidental solos which occur in the number commence we find on each occasion "senza organo." That Handel exceptionally used the organ in his songs we have already seen; but this score makes it abundantly evident that the harmonies (which nobody supposes were left empty) were to be filled up on the harpsichord, and not on the organ. Those who maintain, as some persist in doing, that Handel generally accompanied his songs on the organ must prove, to establish their point, that "Saul" was in this respect differently treated from all the other of the composer's oratorios; and of this there is not a particle of evidence.

"Israel in Egypt," the oratorio which immediately followed "Saul" in the date of its composition, also presents many features of interest in its scoring. Some of these are similar in character to those already noticed in speaking of other works; I shall therefore content myself with noting a few of the most striking. One of these is the highly dramatic employment of the roll of the drums in "But the waters overwhelmed their enemies," to which I incidentally referred in speaking of the storm music in "Riccardo." Another unusual point in the scoring is the giving the two upper parts of the accompaniment to two oboes throughout the song "Thou didst blow with thy wind." Did Handel intend a kind of musical pun here, in thus illustrating the words? The lower part in this number is given to violas, violoncellos, and bassoons in unison, reinforced by the organ—evidently "tasto solo" as we find it in the score of "Saul"—while the double-basses in the opening symphony have a simplification of the semiquaver figure of the violoncellos. It must also be noted that in "He spake the word" two organs are indicated, one to accompany each choir in the double chorus. But the most important point in the orchestration of this oratorio is the use of the trombones. It is very singular that the trombone parts were published for the first time in the German Handel Society's edition in 1863. In this work they are used even more freely than in "Saul." We find them not only in the choruses accompanied by the full orchestra—such as "He gave them hailstones," "Moses and the children of Israel," "I will sing unto the Lord," and "Thy right hand, O Lord"—but in "He spake the word," "He smote all the first-born," and in several of the fugues—"Egypt was glad," "And I will exalt him," "Thou sentest forth thy wrath," and "The earth swallowed them." In "I will sing unto the Lord" the canto fermo with which the chorus commences is accompanied by the trombones in unison, the same instruments reinforcing the theme on each subsequent re-appearance. In "He spake the word," which, it will be remembered, is in the key of B flat, the trombone parts, curiously enough, are written without any key-signature, and the flats noted as accidentals throughout. A fine effect is obtained in "He smote all the first-born" by staccato chords for the trombones, both at the commencement with the strings and at the well-known passage, near the close, of detached chords for the chorus "He smote the chief of all their strength." In the fugues the first and second trombones usually play in unison with the alto and tenor voices, the third trombone either with the bass voice or (not infrequently) in the octave below. It is worth noting that in no case are the trombones used in the first exposition of a fugue; they are always held in reserve for the later developments.

Though one of Handel's shortest works, the "Ode for St. Cecilia's Day" (1739) contains more than one point in the orchestration deserving mention. In the recitative following the overture we find not only five string parts—the violoncellos and double-basses being distinct—but independent iterated chords for oboes and bassoons, against moving semiquavers for the strings—quite an anticipation of the modern style of scoring. The once famous song "What passion cannot music raise and quell" contains one of Handel's most beautiful and expressive obbligati for the violoncello. In the air and chorus "The trumpet's loud clangour" we find the drums used as solo instruments—a rare thing with Handel. In the air "The soft complaining flute" will be seen the combination of one flute with all the violins in unison con sordini, also duet passages for the flute and lute, and the accompaniment of the voice by the flute, lute, and organ. It is worth noting that when in his oratorios Handel uses the flute, he frequently substitutes the organ for the harpsichord as the accompanying instrument—as, for instance, in "Tears such as tender fathers shed" in "Deborah." No doubt he felt the affinity between the flute tone and that of the flute stops of the organ. In the "Ode for St. Cecilia's Day" we also find a beautiful organ obbligato to the song "But oh! what art can teach." It is very seldom Handel gives any directions for registering; in the present case he has specially marked "Organ Diapasons."

In the opening recitatives of "L'Allegro" (1740) will be seen a striking instance of Handel's judicious use of orchestral contrasts. The work commences with the setting of the first lines of Milton's "L'Allegro," "Hence, loathed melancholy," &c., which is accompanied throughout by violoncellos in two parts and double-basses, the violoncello parts being doubled by the first and second bassoons. The following recitative, "Hence, vain deluding joys!" (the opening of "Il Penseroso") has also a three-part accompaniment, but Handel uses now the two violins and violas, without any basses or wind instruments. The contrast of tone is as strong as the means employed to produce it are simple. The well-known air "Sweet Bird," which, though by no means one of Handel's best songs, is, from its showy character, still occasionally heard in our concert rooms, has a flute obbligato of an unusually florid character; while the hunting song for bass, "Mirth, admit me of thy crew," has an appropriate horn obbligato, the only other one I have found in Handel's works besides that of "Va tacito e nascosto" in "Giulio Cesare," mentioned in my third article. In the air "Oft on a plat" the violoncellos and double-basses are used pizzicato, to imitate the curfew. A very beautiful effect is obtained in the lovely song "Hide me from day's garish eye" by accompanying the voice throughout the greater part of the number only by violins and violas; excepting in a symphony of four bars all the bass instruments are silent till the passage "Then as I wake sweet music breathe." One more point must be noticed in this score. At the beginning of the chorus "There let the pealing organ blow" the bass line is marked "Bassi, Contrafagotto e Organo." This is, I believe, the only instance of the employment of the contrafagotto by Handel. It is known that the instrument at that date was very imperfect; and it appears a probable conjecture that Handel experimented with it here, and, not being satisfied with the result, did not use it again.

It is a very curious thing that Handel's most celebrated work, the "Messiah" (1741), should be one of the least interesting of all his scores from the point of view of the instrumentation. The work is not yet published in the German edition, and I am therefore unable to say whether the conducting score will show any important additions in the orchestra; but I have carefully examined the lithographed fac-simile of the composer's autograph, and find that, with the exception of the trumpet obbligato in "The trumpet shall sound," not a single air in the work contains any indication of parts for wind instruments. Even the oboes, so frequently used in other works, are only to be found in the chorus "Their sound is gone out," which was a later addition. Is it possible that the composer, who, it is known, felt very deeply the solemn character of the words he was setting, purposely abstained from anything like brilliance in his orchestra, in order not to distract his hearers from the sacredness of the subject? Perhaps he may have felt that the utmost simplicity of treatment was here the most appropriate. The only point to notice in the orchestration of the "Messiah" is the treatment of the trumpets. In "Glory to God" they are marked "Da lontano, e un poco piano"—i.e., from a distance, and rather soft—a direction, it may be observed, which is never attended to in performance; while in both the "Hallelujah" and "Worthy is the Lamb" the upper D is written for the first trumpet, a note frequently to be found in Bach's scores, but rare with Handel.

A novel feature in "Samson," the work which immediately followed the "Messiah," is that the score contains almost throughout the indications "con ripieni" and "senza ripieni" in the string parts. These are probably given on the authority of the conducting score; and we see from an examination of them that the whole mass of the strings was never used in the accompaniment of the solo voice, and only exceptionally even in the symphonies of the songs, as for example in the interludes of "Honour and arms," where Handel, for dramatic purposes, requires unusual force. The larger number of the airs bear the direction "senza ripieni per tutto"—i.e., without the ripieni throughout. The alternations of the whole and partial strength of the strings in the well known overture are worth noticing. It will be remembered that the introduction consists of two parts, each of which is repeated. Curiously enough, Handel does not begin with his whole force; the first part of the introduction is marked to be played the first time without and the second time with the ripieni; on the other hand, the second part, beginning with the dominant, is to be played with the ripieni both times. The short Adagio which follows is "senza ripieni," as also the commencement of the fugue; the ripieni entering when the basses have the subject, and the rest of the fugue being for the whole force. In the Minuet all the piano passages are without and all the forte with the ripieni. This single example will show how much variety Handel obtained in his treatment even of the stringed orchestra. Similar indications as to the use of the ripieni are to be found in the scores of "Hercules," "Solomon," and "Susanna," and it appears probable that other works were treated in the same way, though the directions may not have been always written down in the scores.

The overture to "Samson" is further interesting from the independence of the wind parts (oboes and horns) in some passages of the fugue. Just before the close, after the two bars piano, the subject is given out for the last time by all the strings in unison and octaves, with full harmony above for the wind; while in the final close (Adagio) the first and second oboes double the violins in the lower octave. The horn parts of the minuet, especially in the middle section, also deserve mention.

Like "The Messiah," "Samson" has no indication of oboes being used in any one of the airs, though they are employed in all the choruses without exception. On the other hand, we find important parts for two bassoons in "Glorious hero"; and in "Thus when the sun" the bassoons and violoncellos double the violas in some passages, the bass of the harmony being assigned to the double-basses, strengthened doubtless by the harpsichord. In the air "Ye sons of Israel now lament" a beautiful effect is obtained by the alternation of the strings with the organ solo in the accompaniment.

One of the most valuable features of the German Handel Society's edition of "Samson" is the re-scored version which it contains of the Dead March in "Saul." Handel originally wrote for the oratorio the Dead March in D, which is still usually performed when the work is given, and which, as I have already mentioned, contains parts for trombones; but he subsequently replaced it by the more favourite march from "Saul," which he transposed into D, and re-scored, substituting horns in D for the trombones. Dr. Chrysander in the new edition has marked the parts "Corno I." (e Tromba I.) "Corno II." (e Tromba II.). The brackets show that the words are an addition of the editor's; but with the highest respect for his unequalled knowledge of Handel, I cannot but think that he is here in error. The march is intended to be soft throughout, this we know from "Saul"; and Dr. Chrysander, in his article already referred to, in speaking of that oratorio, has specially mentioned this point, and protested against the caricature of the march by the introduction of a fortissimo. But if in the present instance the trumpets double the horns in the octave above, the parts lying throughout in the upper register of the instruments, and twice reaching the high D, the quiet and solemn character of the music is absolutely destroyed. With all deference, therefore, to Dr. Chrysander, I am compelled to differ from him altogether as to the use of the trumpets in this piece.

The contrasts of colour in this later version of the Dead March are worth noting. The first eight bars are given to strings, horns, and drums, without the organ; the next eight to two flutes and organ only, with a single note for the drum on the fourth beat of each bar. The organ part is here written out in full on two staves, instead of there being, as in "Saul," merely a general indication of its employment; moreover, the chords are taken in a different position. At the seventeenth bar we have again strings, horns, and drums: at the twenty-first a tutti, the organ and flutes doubling the violins in the upper octave. The flutes and organ are used for four bars at bar twenty-five; and the last four bars are again tutti. It would be difficult within the space of thirty-two bars to obtain more contrast with so few instruments.

BY JOSEPH BENNETT.

No. XIV.—MEYERBEER (continued from page 199).

THE production of "Le Prophète" took place, as usual with Meyerbeer's works, only after many delays. Fétis tells us that the opera was several times announced under different names, and the fact is characteristic of Meyerbeer's fastidiousness—a quality which, as it seems to us, sprang from excessive timidity. The master had a perfect horror of adverse criticism, and trembled before the most insignificant scribbler in a public print. Hence the extreme precautions under which his works were brought out. The whole situation had to be surveyed with "anxious polyscopy" lest an open joint somewhere should let in the arrow of censure. It is only right to add that the final cause of delay as regards "Le Prophète" was independent of Meyerbeer, and had more to do with the Paris mob, who, in February, 1848, transformed King Louis Philippe into plain Mr. John Smith and sent him post haste to England. This amounted to an artistic as well as political upset. It disorganised the Opéra especially, and only after a year had passed did the director and composer think it wise or find it convenient to produce the new work at the Théâtre de la Nation, as the erstwhile Académie Royale was then called.

It is interesting, at this distance of time, to read the criticisms which the French and other journals poured forth anent "Le Prophète," and to gather from them, not so much definite impressions concerning the work, as an idea of the light in which Meyerbeer was generally regarded. We are able to see, through a perfect blaze of eulogy, that the composer's method was accepted with a certain amount of reservation, sometimes of openly qualifying remark. The impression made by Meyerbeer's elaborate musical structures and grandiose effects seems to have been much like that of the charge of the Light Brigade upon the French general who exclaimed, looking at the wild ride, "C'est magnifique, mais c'est pas la guerre." Thus, a writer in a journal devoted to Meyerbeer, said: "Greatly as the productions of this composer must be admired, his followers not possessing his genius will, it is to be feared, rather injure than forward the advancement of pure musical taste. The peculiarities of his style, indeed, are such as will readily be resorted to for reasons far different from those by which he was actuated; for, in finding the possibility of substituting noise for melody, and startling contrast and effect for merely scientific combinations, many a composer who would otherwise have lived unerring may be induced to offer his meagre and trashy productions to the world." The veiled indictment to be detected in the foregoing words may be seen also in the recondite observations of Fétis, who describes "Le Prophète" as the fruit of an alliance between imagination and reason, not imagination and sensibility, from which union sprang the great duet in "Les Huguenots." M. Scudo witnesses to a similar purport in a passage which the reader will thank us for translating:—

"Of a penetrating spirit, full of sagacity and depth, M. Meyerbeer shares neither the advantages nor the infirmities of those spontaneous natures which shine like the light, lavishing, without restriction or thought of the morrow, the perfume of their youth and inheritance. A philosopher and thinker, he elaborates ideas slowly and under the eye of reason, and when he opens to himself the doors of life he is almost sure of making glorious progress. M. Meyerbeer leaves nothing to chance; he foresees all that it is possible to foresee; he learnedly combines all his effects, determining the faintest shades. His scores are full of explanatory remarks and ingenious observations, which show the pre-occupation of his spirit and his profound knowledge of dramatic strategy.

... One might, doubtless, desire a little more variety and spontaneity in the music of 'Le Prophète'; the changelessly sombre character of the subject sometimes wearying the attention. We find there piquant and ingenious combinations, and mixtures of tone-colours the effect of which appears to us more curious than dramatic. It is a dangerous slope which leads to research for strange harmonies and multiplied modulations; and, when one does not possess the science and profundity of M. Meyerbeer, the method of instrumentation which his example authorises produces the music of M. Verdi, and worse still."

The evidence we have quoted above is that of Meyerbeer's enthusiastic friends. They could neither help seeing, nor refrain from stating, that the master was a kind of musical strategist and tactician, who, like Carnot or Von Moltke, "organised victory" with infinite care and forethought, and by means of the most daring and dazzling combinations. "Le Prophète," more, perhaps, than "Robert" or "Les Huguenots," illustrated this view of Meyerbeer's musical character. Hence the expression of a feeling in critical circles that admiration was not untempered by reservation of entire approval.

M. Scudo tells us that the first performance of "Le Prophète" left a good deal to desire, although Viardot, Castellan, Roger, Levasseur, and Gueymard took part in it. Madame Viardot, however, seems to have satisfied the composer by her Fides, which drew from Meyerbeer the subjoined eloquent letter:

"My dear Pauline,—Forgive me if I do not come to-day to express my admiration and gratitude. But I am indisposed, and feel the want of a few hours' rest; besides, what could I say in comparison to that which the tears and the enthusiasm of two thousand persons yesterday proclaimed of your admirable creation. I ceased for an instant to remember that I was the author of the work; you had transformed me into a breathless and excited auditor of your impassioned and truthful accents. Adieu.—MEYERBEER."

With the public the success of "Le Prophète" was complete. According to the Débats, the average nightly receipts for the first twenty-five performances were 10,000 francs. Yet even so great good fortune could not keep the Opéra open, although its subsidy, under a decree of the National Assembly, was 170,000 francs. The establishment lay under a load of debt, which crushed the life out of it, and on the 15th of July, three months after the production of Meyerbeer's work, its doors were closed. The house opened again in the autumn, but may be said only to have lingered on till June, 1853, when the Emperor Napoleon decreed: "From July 1 next, the Opéra will be under the Imperial Civil List, and placed to that end within the functions of the Minister of our House." Then the great establishment had peace.

Before passing altogether from "Le Prophète," let us quote an anecdote told of Meyerbeer in M. Charles de Boigne's "Petits Mémoires de l'Opéra." The composer being slow to write the ballet music, one of the two directors then reigning hit upon a shrewd method of spurring him on:—

D. Master, have you written the music for the divertissement?

M. Not yet.

D. So much the better.

M. Why so much the better?

D. Because I want you to let me get it from a certain composer.

M. Sir! Sir!!

D. Don't be angry, master. You know I have faith in your genius. At the Opéra I know only "Robert" and "Les Huguenots"; success is yours alone; "La Juive" is an accident, but—but—

M. I can't write ballet music! be frank.

D. You have never taken the trouble.

M. And the act of the Nuns?

D. Admirable; but the dance airs in "Les Huguenots"?

M. I don't like them any more than you do; as for the divertissement of "Le Prophète," I will try to satisfy you; let me see what I can do; if I succeed, you shall ask me for the music of your first ballet.

The composer straightway went home to work, and the director's end was gained.

Meyerbeer returned to his post in Berlin after the production of this third French opera, and resumed what may be called his official labours. Amongst other things he wrote the "Bayerischer Schüfgen Marsch," a cantata for four male voices and chorus, accompanied by brass instruments, words by King Louis of Bavaria. An ode to the sculptor, Rauch, suggested by the unveiling of Frederick the Great's monument, also belongs to this period. It is a work of considerable dimensions, for solo, chorus, and orchestra, and was first performed at the Royal Academy of Fine Arts, June 4, 1851. In this year, moreover, Meyerbeer produced a Festival Hymn, alla capella, for four voices and chorus, in celebration of the King of Prussia's silver wedding. Meanwhile, he was pestered by attacks of a peculiarly irritating nature. An organ of "sweetness and light," combined with Christian zeal, the Pruessische Zeitung, issued a series of articles in which the master was accused of bringing Christianity into contempt by acts of malice aforethought. A correspondent of the Musical World, writing from Berlin at the time, described the nature of this onslaught as follows:—

"The basis of the argument is that Meyerbeer is a Jew, and, in his operas, has frequently employed church music as a means of effect, such as the organ passage in 'Robert' and the Lutheran hymn of Marcel in the 'Huguenots.' But all his previous offences sink into insignificance compared with the still more extensive employment of similar means in 'Le Prophète.' There a solemn rite of the church, a coronation, is desecrated by the consecration of an impostor with all the pomp of priestly processions, incense, and anthems. In this spirit the whole of the composer's last opera is criticised; no merit as a work of art redeems it; it is an insidious design against the Christian faith for the purpose, it must be inferred, of propagating Judaism. The public must, therefore, beware how they listen to music; the most inspiring and glorious strains of harmony are snares for the soul if the composer is a Jew. This is a new principle in criticism and deserves to be noticed, because finding readers and approvers among a people who represent themselves as the sole possessors of the gift of clear and philosophical appreciation of art in all its manifestations and a universality of knowledge that makes prejudice in them impossible."

It does not appear that Meyerbeer took any public notice of these scandalous attacks; but one is tempted to ask now whether Richard Wagner, who borrowed so much, read these articles and then conceived the idea which came forth in the savage form of "Judaism in Music."

In 1851 Meyerbeer's health began to give way under the strain which his extremely anxious, not to say "worrying," nature imposed upon it. A constitution of iron was required to carry him safely through the crisis of producing a grand opera. The mere labour of composition, according to his method of writing and re-writing, then rejecting and writing again, must have been sufficiently severe; but this was ease compared to the agony which set in with rehearsal. "The rehearsals, which he superintended with a care unknown to other composers," says Fétis, "and the new pieces which he wrote rapidly while the work was under study, caused him great fatigue. To see his exquisite politeness towards the artists on the stage and in the orchestra, one could not imagine the pain and impatience in his soul when faults of execution missed the effect he intended and had resolved at any price to obtain. This acted in a painful manner upon his nervous system." Not less hard to bear were the assaults of criticism, to which, as we have before pointed out, the master was peculiarly susceptible. Meyerbeer never had sufficient confidence in himself to disregard the opinions of others, and he suffered torments in questioning whether he might not have done better and avoided the censure that gave him pain. Experiences of this kind eventually tell upon a sensitive organisation, and at the date above-named the master ceased work and went to Spa, which became afterwards his favourite resort. There he would avoid all company, taking long and solitary walks, or riding on an ass, or shutting himself up in his apartments, and following implicitly the advice of his physicians. Spa has been described as a "pretty miniature of a watering-place, embosomed among gentle heights whose tops are capped with the sun as a shining head-dress, whose sides are robed with wealthy trees, and at whose feet are tiny rivulets sparkling and singing as they flow, and bearing tribute from the treasury of springs and fountains in the hills that are their birth-place to feed the larger streams in which they live, but to be lost." In 1851 the demon of gambling disfigured this Eden, but Meyerbeer, though in Spa, was not of it, from a society point of view. He went there to gain health, and found, we may well believe, many a happy inspiration during his lonely rambles about the pretty hills and valleys. It is needless to say that the eyes of the world followed him whithersoever he went, eagerly watching for some sign of the production of "L'Africaine," an opera long since completed. But no sign was forthcoming. The master had set his heart upon Sophie Cruvelli as Selika, and the director of the Opéra, it is said, would then have nothing to do with that somewhat erratic artist. Other obstacles stood in the way, and so the desk containing "L'Africaine" was steadfastly kept locked. All this time the world did not dream that the Meyerbeer of the grand stage and mighty ensembles was preparing to invade the smaller domain of Auber and Adolphe Adam. This, however, turned out to be the case, and in due time "L'Etoile du Nord" was announced at the Opéra Comique.

Meyerbeer, in this case, "fluttered the Volsicians" to some tune, and there was dire commotion among French musicians, who naturally looked upon the Opéra Comique as their own peculiar inheritance. They had grown accustomed to the cosmopolitanism of the Grand Opéra, where the genius that is above geography, physical or political, was always welcome. But the Opéra Comique—the home of Grétry and Méhul, of Boieldieu and Hérold—what did the Berlin Capellmeister in such a place! Extraordinary heart-burnings followed, and it was suddenly discovered that Meyerbeer stood in the way of native talent. He was accused of intrigue all round. If an opera was rejected, Meyerbeer influenced the director; if it was delayed, Meyerbeer had a hand in it; if it failed, Meyerbeer had conspired to bring about the result. But the poor Frenchmen had one source of consolation. They knew perfectly well that Meyerbeer would fail on the limited stage in the Rue Favart. They said, "To obtain success there it is necessary to have qualities more refined, elegant, and spirituelle than passionate—qualities which do not appear to belong to Meyerbeer's talent, the proper domain of which is dramatic expression." With such words as these the French composers comforted one another, and awaited the realisation of their hopes. But they waited in vain. "L'Etoile du Nord"—into which was incorporated some half-dozen numbers from the Berlin opera "Ein Feldlager"—saw the light on February 16, 1854, and found instant acceptance at the hands of a public who really did not much care about the traditions so prized by critics and connoisseurs. In this case the public broke right away from the guidance of the press. "'L'Etoile du Nord' is not an opera at all," said some critics; while others apostrophised the composer thus: "Yes, dear and glorious master, one must admire you, but ought not to imitate you. You are a great dramatic composer, a powerful individuality, but the way to which you have committed yourself is not a road that leads to Paradise. Do you know who will be your artistic children, if you leave any? The Richard Wagners and their emulators. . . . Let us re-assure ourselves about the future. Monsigny, Grétry, Dalayrac, Méhul, Boieldieu, Hérold, Auber—O you charming masters, facile and moving musicians, who have made France illustrious, do not fear the great magician who has just suddenly invaded your modest domain. He will not make us forget you. This powerful constructor of ensembles, who piles Pelion upon Ossa in order to scale heaven, resembles you more than you believe in that of his work which will live. . . . As for 'L'Etoile du Nord,' posterity will not place it in the same rank with your beautiful masterpieces, because, in the hierarchy of the creations of the human spirit, the Last Judgment is below the Transfiguration." Jules Janin, not being a musical critic, took a different view of Meyerbeer's comic opera. Having witnessed the first performance, he rushed home and wrote: "We have come from the Opéra Comique, where M. Meyerbeer has just brought out his new chef d'œuvre 'L'Etoile du Nord' (drama by M. Scribe), and without fear of being contradicted by the learned and competent critic who will render an account of it in these columns, we venture to assert that the illustrious master has deserved and obtained universal praise. In the new style of music which M. Meyerbeer has created by his genius and subdued by his talent, 'L'Etoile du Nord' is a puissant work, superior and charming in every respect. Never, perhaps, in so short a space (a comic opera in three acts) has M. Meyerbeer scattered airs, duets, and morceaux d'ensemble with so prodigal a hand." M. Janin wrote this with impunity, and might have written a great deal more in the same strain without abating the soreness of his musical compatriots, who would not allow that any good could come to the Salle Favart from the universal Nazareth outside France.

"L'Etoile du Nord" soon travelled to Germany, being produced in Dresden in 1855, where it had an immense success, and brought to the composer the ribbon of the Royal Albert Order. It was also played at Liège about the same time. In 1855, also, "L'Etoile du Nord" appeared in an Italian dress at Covent Garden Theatre, the prospectus of the season having stated that "M. Meyerbeer has composed, expressly for the Royal Italian Opera, on poetry written expressly by M. Scribe, entirely new recitatives, and has added three pieces to the original score." Meyerbeer undertook to supervise the London performance of his work, and reached town on purpose at the end of June, after an absence of twenty-three years. He came to be "lionised" in true English fashion, as to which let us quote from a contemporary journal (Musical World, July 7):—

"Judging from the manner in which he is flêted and received in all quarters, the composer of 'The Huguenots' will not find cause to regret his visit to the metropolis of Great Britain. In all places, high and low, where music is loved, Meyerbeer is honoured. From the palaces of princes, ministers, and ambassadors to the concert-rooms of Exeter and St. Martin's Halls, there is a general demand for his society. He must eat every one's dinner and attend every one's concert; so that, what with his daily occupations at the theatre during rehearsals and his numerous engagements, morning and evening, Meyerbeer must have his hands full and very few minutes to spare. Nevertheless, at 7 a.m., day after day, those who get up soon enough, and have the wish, may see the celebrated musician taking his 'constitutional' walk in Hyde Park some hours before breakfast. It is at this early period of the day that he composes, like Auber on horseback in the Champs Elysées and Spohr in his garden at Hesse-Cassel."

Among the dinners Meyerbeer had to eat was a Royal one at Buckingham Palace, and among the concerts he had to attend was one given under the auspices of the Musical Union, at which what Mr. Ella rather infelicitously described as his "imposing presence" unsettled the performers. But no honours turned the master from his work, and in due course the Italian "Stella del Nord" was produced, with Bosio, Rudersdorff, Gardoni, Lablache, Tagliafico, and Formes in the cast. It achieved an immense success, and then Meyerbeer, perfectly content, rushed away to Spa for the purpose of recruiting his exhausted energies.

Delighted with his success in comic opera, Meyerbeer resolved to follow it up. Hence the production, in 1859, of "Le Pardon de Ploermel," known in England as "Dinorah." Meanwhile, however, other subjects had a share in his thoughts, particularly one about which such biographies of the master as are available to English readers say but little.

It has often been remarked that Meyerbeer had no very exalted notions of an operatic subject; preferring bustling, blatant, and sometimes vulgar historic scenes, more or less travestied by Scribe, to those of a refined and classic nature. In this respect some injustice has been done to the composer. As a matter of fact, he was always prospecting for a truly noble subject. "Hero and Leander" at one time attracted him; so did the "Orestes" of Æschylus; while of "Faust" he thought seriously, having been designated by Goethe as the musician of that great drama. But all this coquetting came to nothing. The case was somewhat different with another work, the history of which has been told by M. Blaze de Bury at great length. M. de Bury had written a drama for the Odéon, entitled "La Jeunesse de Goethe"—a fantastic affair, apparently, in which the poet was represented as "vivant ses œuvres," however that may be. While engaged in distributing the parts and so forth, the manager, Rounat, called M. de Bury's attention to a night scene in the third act, where he thought a melodrame, or orchestral symphony, would be effective. The following conversation ensued:—

R. We must have music, that is understood; but who will write it. We cannot think for a moment in such a situation of employing an ordinary chef d'orchestre.

De B. We have Meyerbeer.

R. What, Meyerbeer! You think that Meyerbeer would consent to write for us.

De B. I know it. He has already composed music to Mignon's song in the second act.

R. (delighted). You are in the way of obtaining from Meyerbeer these two pieces?

De B. I answer for it.

R. Well, then, I cannot imagine why, being sure of that, you do not ask more.

De B. Do you mean that I ought to make an opera of my piece and sing cavatinas to Goethe.

R. There is no question of cavatinas; the piece suits me; and I believe in its success, the best proof of which is that I play it. Only, in your place, instead of demanding from Meyerbeer a mark of complaisance, I would try to interest him musically in the work, and by some means give his genius a large part therein.

This conversation impressed the dramatist, who went home and spent the night in writing the text of an intermezzo to be performed between the fourth and fifth acts. The next morning he called on Meyerbeer, who, after some conversation regarding the words of an Ode to Schiller (performed at the centenary festival of that poet) remarked:—

M. You know that Mignon's song is composed, and now I am at your service for some bars of melodrame.

De B. Something better is possible than Mignon's song and your bars.

M. What! will not M. de la Rounat have my music?

De B. It isn't that. He takes it, but—

M. To correct it, perhaps?

De B. Not at all. He does you the honour to accept your music, only he claims more.

M. I understand. He wants too much.

De B. You are right.

M. Come, explain yourself seriously. What is required of me?

De B. (taking out manuscript). This, dear master, since you desire to know.

M. (having read the manuscript). But this means a score, my dear friend.

De B. I know it. Do you object to make the effort?

M. Not the least; but I must think it over, look up my Goethe, and then read your piece again. We will speak about the matter in a few days.

Eventually Meyerbeer undertook the work, but on his own plan and conditions, expressed in remarkable words: "I have thought much about your piece," said the master, "about the part that music ought to take in it, and the manner in which, to succeed, it should intervene. Perhaps we are on the track of a discovery. The old forms are used up; operas in five acts are no longer possible. Let us seek in the conditions of modern art the alliance of music and drama which the ancients appear to have established. That tempts me, I avow; I even say that I have long dreamed of it, and reckon to prove it, if we have a success, by making further proposals to you. Meanwhile, I shall intervene in your work without mixing myself up with it." Meyerbeer went on to explain that not even a violin should be heard till the time for the intermezzo arrived. Then he would "let loose all his forces," beginning with a grand overture. De Bury was charmed with Meyerbeer's idea, but nothing came of it till four years later (September, 1861), when the dramatist and composer met at Ems. "One morning, as we were breakfasting in his room," writes M. de Bury, "he cried, 'Ah! that "Jeunesse de Goethe," now is the time to speak of it. Would you like to see the score?' He opened his desk and took out a voluminous packet, which he put upon the piano. I turned over the leaves hungrily. It was complete! the Erl-king, the Hymn of the Fates in 'Iphigenia,' the scene of Margaret in the church, the immense seraphic Hosanna of the second Faust. I saw it; I touched it. Meyerbeer, all the while, looked at me, happy in my joy, and satisfied with himself. 'Another time,' he said, 'you shall hear it, for to-day it is enough that you have seen. You can now say to our good friends that Meyerbeer keeps his word.' Then, taking the volume, seven times sealed, he placed it in the desk and locked it up."

BY FILIPPO FILIPPI.

LA SCALA has, no doubt, patronised the best Italian composers, laid the foundation of their celebrity, and been one of the most powerful promoters of Italian art. It remains to be proved, however, whether our greatest theatre has always supported its position by representing, as is the case in other important theatres, all the masterpieces, either Italian or foreign, which did not see the light on its stage. A whole century's experience gives but an unsatisfactory result in this case; our public has always been loth to accept works not in consonance with its taste, and shown itself apathetic towards novelty in general and innovators in particular; very seldom has it given way to bursts of enthusiasm, and much oftener has pessimism and routine prevailed, a state of things favourable to the ignorance and avarice of managers, and to the epicurean habit in the public which could not be roused from its dormant enjoyment by the more active stimulant of novelty. All these things combined explain why amongst the operas represented at La Scala, since 1778, the most celebrated by the greatest composers are still missing.

During the first period were given some of the operas of the most fashionable composers of the last century, whilst yet in their prime. For instance, in 1787, Paesello's "Barbiere di Siviglia"; in 1793, Cimarosa's "Matrimonio Segreto," and his "Orazii e Curiazi" in 1798. Mozart had also a period of engouement, as the French call it. In May, 1814, "Cosi fan tutte" was represented, and with so much success that "Don Giovanni" followed in October of the same year; and the Milanese so thoroughly appreciated this delicious music, executed by David, Galli, and Picini, that in 1815 was given "Le Nozze di Figaro," in 1816 "Il Flauto Magico," and in 1819 "La Clemenza di Tito."

"Agnese," by Paer, appeared in 1816, "Il Barbiere" and "Mosè," by Rossini, in 1819 and 1825. "Guglielmo Tell," however, masterpiece of masterpieces, given at Paris in 1820, only appeared in Milan in 1846; was not understood by the public, and had but a short life. "Il Crociato" was sung in 1831, a short time after its first production at Venice, but it took years before any of Meyerbeer's other operas were given here; and, when such an event occurred, they were pronounced tiresome, long, incomprehensible (just like Wagner's and Boito's now-a-days), and generally met with but poor success. "Roberto," in 1846, did not please. "Il Profeta," in 1856, gave satisfaction; not so "Les Huguenots," in 1857. "L'Africana," in 1866, achieved a great success; but "Dinorah," in 1870, was only a moderate one. "La Stella del Nord" was only given in 1882, and did not succeed.

But how many composers and operas were left out at La Scala, either through unpardonable forgetfulness, or from sheer ill will? Cherubini, an illustrious Italian, is only known at La Scala by a juvenile work, "Ifigenia," represented in 1788. Spontini, another great Italian master, one of the fathers of modern dramatic music, produced only "La Vestale," in 1825, and that was a failure. Auber is represented by "La muta di Portici," in 1839, alone, which also failed. "Il Freyshutz" is the only opera by Weber given at La Scala, and always against the wishes of the public. Halévy's "Ebreu," in 1865, created an immense sensation, nor do I remember many manifestations of enthusiasm similar to that given by the public of La Scala, after the first finale in the opera, the spectators all rising to their feet in the excitement of their admiration. "Carlo VI.," by the same composer, was not so fortunate. Another opera which aroused the public from its torpor, broke its habits, and showed that a new art might exist, was Gounod's "Faust," which created one of those successes I call revelations. This work has effected a perfect revolution in the tastes of the people, and especially in the direction of young composers, who found great novelty in certain delicate touches, peculiar harmonic singularities which Gounod merely adapted from the classical school and from Bach more especially. Amongst the crowd of the new admirers of "Faust," however, were many conceited critics. I recollect at the time to have heard a few so-called musicians, some more or less celebrated professors of singing, assert quite seriously that Gounod did not know how to write for the orchestra, and that "Faust" was no music at all. After "Faust" Gounod had great success at La Scala with "Romeo e Giulietta," but a failure with "Cinq Mars." Another French composer of the "young school," Massenet, obtained a great and legitimate success with the "Re di Lahore," a work full of invention and originality. His "Erodiade," given lately, was not so successful. Wagner at La Scala shared the same fate as Boito. The fall of "Lohengrin" will become legendary, as well as that of "Mefistofele." In both cases the prejudiced reception given to these operas was fully atoned for in the full and continued success experienced in other Italian towns, even at Naples, the supposed stronghold of musical reaction.

I must end this not edifying chapter by mentioning the shameful omissions of two geniuses, whose immortal names have never figured at La Scala—Beethoven and Gluck. Neither "Fidelio," nor "Orfeo," nor "Alceste," nor "Ifigenia" ever have been represented at La Scala.

Whosoever understands and loves music may meditate thereon!

Many believe that La Scala owes its greatest fame, fortune, and life, to its grand ballets; they certainly have pleased and attracted the crowd, but take a secondary and inferior rank in its artistic patrimony. The first ballet given at La Scala was composed by the choreographers Verzizzi and Legrandi, and called "Pafo and Mina; or, I Prizionieri di Cipro," music by Salieri. Ever since the ballet has taken a high place in all the representations of La Scala. Some choreographers gifted with true artistic genius have known how to make use of the vast stage, of the corps de ballet unique in the world, and of the important material in scenes, decorations, and machines it contains. One of them, Vigario, appeared first at La Scala in 1812 with his ballet "I Streltzi," after which he gave "Il noce, Vestale," "La Otello," and his famous "Prometeo." At the same time Sanquirico painted scenes which unfortunately have but rarely been successfully imitated. Other choreographers worthy of record are: the first Taglioni, Vestris, Monticini, Galzarani, Cortesi, and Casati. One of the first who abandoned the classic style of mythological choregraphy in which the mimic art took too great a share was Perrot, who gave an "Esmeralda" the romantic style of which was much enhanced by Pugin's fine music and Fanny Elssler's marvellous dancing. Rota also was an innovator, an inventive artist, revealing himself at once by "Il Fallo" in 1853, and then by a series of successes, "Il Giuocatore," "Rodolfo," and "Cleopatra," with excellent music by Giorza. Borri and Monplaisir were two good choreographers, and Taglioni, junior, obtained fabulous success, with new effects, in "Ellinor" and "Flik e Flok."

We now have Manzotti, who seems by fancy and sense of art to be superior to all his predecessors. "Rolla," "Pietro Mica," "Sieba," had shown his value, but in "Excelsior" he has risen to a much greater height, having found means to eschew completely the ordinary nonsense of choregraphic inventions, and to interest and amuse the public by the reasonable development of a great idea—that of the battle between progress and regress. Manzotti is now preparing a new ballet entitled "Amore," which is to surpass "Excelsior" in grandeur, luxury, and bold machinations. It is promised for the next season at La Scala, and Giorza is to write the music for it.

In writing these few pages, I have frequently alluded to the bearing and temperament of the public of La Scala, and it certainly is interesting to study its complete physiology, to describe its character, its changeable tastes, its good and bad dispositions, and its peculiar intelligence, together with its obstinacy in denying true merit, in demolishing world-wide reputations, preferring, in fact, routine to progress, and darkness to light.

On the whole, it seems to me that the public of La Scala has always remained the same it ever was. One need but consult the literature of the period to see that there is not much difference between our ways and those of a hundred years ago. In Italy the theatre has always been a means of diversion and amusement in which art enters but little. The lightness and want of attention with which music is listened to at the theatre have always caused false and hasty judgments. The difference lies in this—that formerly the operas were written in a way better adapted to the indifference of the listeners. Before 1800 things had come to such a pitch that all the strangers who came to Italy were scandalised. Grètry, after residing here some time, wrote in 1789: "What is wanting in Italy to make a good opera seria succeed? In the ten years I lived in Rome I never knew of one. People only go to the theatre to hear the singers, and when the favourite is not on the stage they all retire to their boxes to gamble, or to drink ices, and meanwhile all the pit yawns to a man." The French President Desbrosses says about the same thing: "Once, finding myself almost alone in a box at the Valle, I played a game of chess with Rochemont whilst they were acting a graceful comedy, 'La libertà pericolosa,' which did not amuse the public, although it pleased me much more than their long, tiresome tragedies. Chess seems invented purposely to fill up the time of the endless recitative, and in its turn music removes the heaviness of the chess board."

Passing from the times of chess and iced drinks to ours, theatrical habits have improved a little; the public gets more interested in the music, gives it more attention, and sometimes is carried away by it; a just sense is being formed, but art still remains subject to prejudice, to habit, to party spirit, and to the inert resistance of its adepts. An opposition to all novelty, inattention, impatience to all difficulties, judging without fully understanding, and therefore precipitated, preconceived, and prejudiced judgments are still characteristic of the public of La Scala, but in a much less degree than formerly. There is now a large part of the audience that listens attentively, judges prudently, and goes to the theatre determined to assist at an artistic performance, to listen to it fully and to enjoy it. Novelty does not alarm any more, indeed it attracts. The section of the public which is most to be dreaded is that of the subscribers who frequent La Scala nightly. Many of these carry with them a ready made opinion, together with a sprig of laurel or a whistle in their coat pocket.

The middle seats of the pit and stalls are usually occupied by the most fashionable and youngest members of society. Correctly attired, in dress coats and white cravats, and faultlessly gloved, they lead, or pretend to lead, the taste of the entire house. The ballet generally gains their preference, and it required all Ricordi's powerful will to obtain the long-wished-for reform, of performing the opera before the ballet instead of its being grafted between the acts of the melodrama, as used to be done up to a few years back. The subscribers, more or less influential, are wont to give way to feelings of sympathy, or the contrary, towards the artists. If a singer, particularly a lady, enters into the good graces of these elegant gentlemen, they do not spare their applause nor their gifts; but let the artist, who for some cause or other has not been able to secure their goodwill, beware; for every note or movement of the unfortunate victim becomes an occasion of hisses, hooting, derisive laughter, and insulting coughs. Another important section of the public is that forming the back of the pit, tired out by long standing, and consequently wandering about uneasily, and often in the worst of tempers. It is composed mostly of artists without employment, newspaper writers, theatrical agents, music teachers, professors and pupils of the Conservatoire, whose business seems invariably to be to speak ill of everything and everybody. On important nights there is, besides, a large number of favour tickets deputed to applaud and sustain the performance at all costs.

A curious scene is presented on the first night of a new opera in the lobby between the acts, when all give their opinion; praise and blame, enthusiasm and maledictions, are poured forth at one and the same time. Some find everything good, through kindness of heart and a natural tendency to optimism; others, on the contrary, nervous or bilious, find everything infamous. There you hear the old frequenter of La Scala, who has seen all the theatres in the world, knows all the operas ever written, and has heard all the singers in and out of date; he has always a paragon of his own, with which he crushes the maestro, annihilates the poet, and fulminates the artist. So much for the old subscriber; the young one, to give himself importance, pretends to be difficult to please; the composers are prompted by envy and jealousy; the publishers and their adepts find none good but their own salable editions; the critics take notes, promising an article for the morrow, big with incense or thunder. This mixture of judgments and individual criticism, however, is lost on the mass of the public, and truth and justice prevail at last.

This short history of La Scala might end here, but a few more observations on its present circumstances may be useful to English readers. It is opened every year from Christmas to the Holy Week for sixty performances at least, the subscription being 200 lire for the entrance fee only. There being no répertoire, only four or five operas can be represented each season, at an enormous cost, as for every work, old or new, the scenes and costumes have to be entirely renewed. The same occurs for the two or three costly ballets which are brought out yearly. The entrance fee for standing room only is five lire; the seats vary in price according to the importance of the performance. The nominal price of the stalls is fifteen lire, but they rise to forty-five lire, which makes La Scala the dearest theatre in Europe, and yet the management could not subsist with these receipts alone, as it has no right to the boxes; the town, therefore, allows 200,000 lire to make up the probable deficit, paying besides the salary of the director of the orchestra, composed of ninety musicians.

"Gioconda," "Don Carlo" (remodelled), "Aïda," "Les Huguenots," and "Il Profeta" were performed this year. "Gioconda" was performed over thirty times, owing to the immense success obtained by Signora Pantaleoni in the title-rôle. The tenor, Tamagno, in "Don Carlo," and as Raoul in "Les Huguenots," shared the favour of his talented partner. The other artists engaged were Cardinali Durot, Puerari, tenors; Bruschi Chiatti, Pasqua Toresella, soprani; Lhérie, Delfino, Silvestri Navarini, bassi. "Il Profeta" was given but three times, although performed remarkably well. The ballets were "Flik e Flok," a failure, being found superannuated and old fashioned, and "Brahma," barely supported by an inferior dancer.

The orchestra of La Scala, besides serving the theatre, has constituted itself into an independent society of 130 performers. Its concerts take place in the daytime at La Scala, during spring. This year's programme promises four concerts at Milan and two at Turin, for the opening of the exhibition there. The subscription is ten lire, or three lire entrance fee. The principal pieces to be performed are Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, the Scherzo in the Ninth Symphony, and the Settimino; Goldmark's "Hochzeitmusik"; "España," by Chabrier; an Italian Symphony by Tschalkowsky, Paganini's "Moto perpetuo" for all the violins, and Faccio's Overture, entitled "Marie Antoinette."

MR. FREDERICK ATKINS, Mus. Bac., Oxon., has stirred up a controversy in Wales, which, as it has excited the national feeling of Welshmen, is scarcely likely to subside, even by the calm verdict of those most competent to adjudicate upon the merits of the case. In a letter to the South Wales Daily News Mr. Atkins asserted that the melody "Land of my Fathers," one of the most popular of all the airs presumed to be of Welsh origin, is taken almost note for note from the old English song known as "Tiptin o' Rosin the Beau." To this letter came a reply from Mr. James James, of Mountain Ash, who tells us that the melody was composed by him in 1856 to some Welsh words written by his father, under the title "Hen Wlad fy Nhadau," and that he knew nothing whatever of the air named by Mr. Atkins. Now it might be imagined that the only thing remaining to be done was to compare the two melodies, which would at least decide the artistic question of their similarity, although it might not decide the personal question whether (if the two were proved alike) Mr. James had consciously or unconsciously reproduced "Rosin the Beau" under another name. In the meantime, however, letters appeared from other correspondents, and in other papers, in which, as is usual in such cases, the real matter at issue seems entirely lost sight of, one writer, who signs himself "Morien," saying that to throw a doubt upon the originality of this melody "seems like an effort to prove that, to enable the bards and minstrels of this old land of song to give expression to the heartfelt patriotism of the Welsh nation, a Cymro found it necessary to rob an Englishman of a melody, and to lift the patriotic sentiments of the people of Wales on the wings of this foreign Pegasus"; and others, raking up some former actions of Mr. Atkins with the desire of showing the animus of a "Saxon" towards the natives of the Principality. Mr. Jenkin Howell, however, in the columns of the Western Mail, informs us that the melody from which Mr. James's tune is said to have been pilfered is not an old English, but an old Welsh air, called "Typin o' Rosin y Bow," and that he heard it played and whistled by harpers, fiddlers, and others in the Gwylmabsantau, at Penderyn, forty years ago; so that this will, we trust, soften the enormity of the alleged theft, even to the most patriotic of the Welsh correspondents in this dispute. Our task in the matter is simple. The two airs are printed side by side in the Western Mail, and we unhesitatingly declare that, save at the commencement, there is a very marked resemblance between them, and that the final phrases are almost the same. In justice to Mr. Atkins, this should be said; and to us it appears all that should ever have been said.

THE result of a recent trial at Derby will, we trust, have a salutary effect upon those persons who, knowingly or unknowingly, infringe the law of musical copyright. Samuel Townsend, described as a coach painter, was summoned by Messrs. Boosey and Co. for selling in England copies of a book called "The Song Folio"—printed and published at Detroit, Michigan, in the United States of America—which contained 116 songs, with music, 110 being English copyrights, and 39 belonging to Messrs. Boosey and Co. To save time, however, the case was confined to one song, Cowen's "It was a dream," the words and music of which were proved to be published in "The Song Folio" exactly as in the original, with the exception of the transposition of the music to an easier key. Miss Griffiths, who resides in Derby, stated that she sent her niece for a copy of the book, which she purchased from the defendant and paid for. For the defence, Mr. Stone endeavoured to show that Mr. Townsend brought some copies of the book from America to give to his friends in Derby; and that if he had sold any, it could not have been "for profit." The Bench, having considered the case, however, evidently thought that—even passing over the extraordinary circumstance of a coach painter bringing from America a number of volumes of music to present to his friends—the fact of selling them could scarcely be included amongst these acts of generosity, and he was accordingly ordered to pay £5 each upon two copies of the book, with double the value of the above-mentioned song in each copy, and the costs, or be imprisoned for two months. We sincerely congratulate Messrs. Boosey upon thus securing an individual right, as well as in calling public attention to a point of the law which seems but imperfectly understood.

THE Third Annual Report of the Park Band Society strengthens our belief in the attraction of open-air music for the masses; for if, as it is stated, a quarter of a million of persons contributed to the expenses of the enterprise by taking a penny seat in the enclosure, or by the purchase of a penny programme during the past season, there must be a widely-spread desire to encourage the movement, although, no doubt, the Fisheries Exhibition somewhat diminished the receipts; and this year we fear that the International Health Exhibition may have a similar effect. We counsel the Society, however, to persevere in the good work, and feel convinced that its appeal for subscriptions—to which we need scarcely say we earnestly add our voice—will be liberally responded to. It may be mentioned that season tickets can be obtained from Messrs. Chappell and Co., and also from Henry Ancketill, Esq., Secretary, 14, Albert Mansions, Victoria Street; and it is to be hoped that the sale of these, with the increased subscriptions which may reasonably be expected from the music-loving public, will induce the Committee to reconsider its announced decision of confining the performances of the band during the coming season exclusively to Sunday afternoons.

It is bootless to inquire whence canards come. They are always in the air, but their origin, like their use in the scheme of creation, remains a mystery. We are, nevertheless, tempted to ask, with the curious interest of a scientific investigator, who or what could have started the fable of Madame Piccolomini's poverty? Poverty is not usually a recondite thing, about the existence of which it is possible to make mistakes. If a man be poor, he shows it; and if he be rich, there are, as a rule, plenty of indications in proof of the fact. Madame Piccolomini is not in distress. She dwells at Nice in a position that becomes her rank and her deserts, and yet from some obscure source came, a little while ago, a sad story of want and misery. On the face of this rumour there was nothing that could be rejected as impossible. Artists en retraite have had their reverses, and may have them again. None the less, however, did the false report give pain to the lady of whom it spoke, and to whom sympathy is now due. There is no punishing anybody in the matter, but the experience may, perhaps, serve to suggest caution in dealing with current gossip when it is of a nature to annoy and vex.

DRURY LANE THEATRE.

THE Carl Rosa Opera Company commenced a season of four weeks at this establishment on the 14th ult., Balfe's "Bohemian Girl" being the opera chosen for the opening night, a proof that the management has no desire to present the works of Young England without affording the public a fair opportunity of listening to those which not only satisfied, but delighted, their predecessors. Madame Georgina Burns as Arline, Mr. Maas as Thaddeus, and Messrs. Ludwig and Snazelle as Count Arnheim and Devilshoof respectively, were, as usual, thoroughly efficient; Arline's air "I dreamt that I dwelt in marble halls" and Thaddeus's two songs "When other lips" and "When the fair land of Poland" being enthusiastically encored. "Carmen," on the following evening, brought forward Madame Marie Roze in one of her best parts, both her singing and acting as the heartless coquettish gipsy thoroughly realising the intention of the composer. Mr. Barton McGuckin, too, as Fosé, was everything that could be desired, his steady improvement as an actor, as well as a singer, being strikingly manifested throughout his performance of this most arduous character. Mr. L. Crotty must also be warmly praised for his excellent rendering of the Toreador's song, which received a unanimous encore. The conductorship of both the operas under notice was entrusted to Mr. Randegger, who, by his care and thorough acquaintance with the score, ensured as perfect a performance of these works as we have ever listened to. Wallace's "Maritana," on Wednesday evening, was most effectively cast, Madame Georgina Burns playing and singing the part of the heroine with charming grace and refinement, and Mr. Maas, as Don César, eliciting warm and well-deserved applause. The Lazarillo of Miss Marian Burton too must be highly commended, her artistic rendering of the air "Alas! those chimes," winning one of the very many encores of the evening. The opera was steadily conducted by Mr. Goossens. The performance of Mr. Mackenzie's Opera "Colomba," on Thursday evening, derived additional interest from the presence of the composer, who had come over from Italy especially to conduct his work. Our own opinions upon the merits of "Colomba" were so fully expressed upon its production by the Carl Rosa Company last season, and have been since so thoroughly endorsed, not only throughout this country, but abroad, that we have little to add save that a rehearing of the music amply confirmed, and even strengthened, our former impressions. Mr. Mackenzie is evidently too earnest an artist to allow even such a success as he has achieved to do more than nerve him to increased exertion in the future; and with the utmost confidence, therefore, we look forward to that evidence of art progress in his second opera which can only be gained by hard-earned experience. An important feature in the presentation of the work on this occasion was the performance of the part of the heroine by Madame Marie Roze, who seems to have made so intelligent a study of the character, both musically and dramatically, as to enable her fully to realise the savage fury of the avenger, tempered with those womanly qualities which cannot but enlist the sympathies of an audience. Nothing could be finer than her acting and singing in the finale to the first act, in her scene with the brigand Savelli, and in many portions of the last act; her voice seeming to gain both in power and expression as the opera advanced. It is needless to say that she was overwhelmed with applause; but we are glad to record that the interest of the work was in no place arrested by those absurd manifestations of approval which have done so much to degrade opera almost to the level of burlesque. Mr. Barrington Foote made his first appearance with this Company in the part of Brando Savelli, and displayed an excellent voice, which, although at times somewhat hard, he uses with much judgment. Unqualified praise must be awarded to Mr. Barton McGuckin, as Orso, to Mlle. Baldi, as Lydia, to Miss Clara Perry, as Chilina (her lovely old Corsican Ballad being encored), to Mr. Ludwig, as Giuseppe Barracini, and to Mr. Henry Pope as Count de Nevers, all of whom were the original representatives of these parts last season. The opera was received with the utmost favour, and the composer called on the stage, to share with the vocalists, after each act, the congratulations of the audience. Ambrose Thomas's Opera, "Mignon," on the following evening, gave that clever young vocalist, Miss Clara Perry, an opportunity of appearing in a leading part before a London audience; and we are glad to record that her performance of the heroine in this melodious opera fully justified the management in their choice. Her sprightly acting and charming vocalisation throughout the evening fairly won the good opinion of the audience; and there can be little doubt of her becoming one of the most valuable members of the Company. Miss Marian Burton, too, was excellent as Frederick, Mr. Barton McGuckin was better than ever as Wilhelm, Madame Burns was a thoroughly satisfactory Filina, and Messrs. Crotty and Leumane, as Lothario and Laertes respectively, completed a highly efficient cast. On Saturday evening Donizetti's "Lucia di Lammermoor" was given, Mr. Maas, in the principal tenor part, eliciting the utmost enthusiasm by his singing of the solos which have so long been the delight of Italian Opera frequenters, especially "Fra poco," which was tumultuously applauded. Madame Georgina Burns, as Lucia, was also highly successful, the "mad scene" being one of her greatest triumphs. The opera was conducted by Mr. Randegger. Mr. Goring Thomas's Opera "Esmeralda," another of the successes of last season, was performed on Tuesday, the 22nd ult., and received with marked favour, the applause indeed too often interrupting the action of the work, instead of, as in the case of "Colomba," being reserved almost exclusively for the termination of each act. Partially, of course, this may be accounted for by the construction of the work, which, clever as it undoubtedly is, frequently reflects the conventional style of our former English opera by the introduction of pieces sufficiently detached from the business of the scene to allow of, and even to court, these enthusiastic demonstrations of delight. Much of the music gained upon us on a second hearing; but we still retain the opinion that the solo portions of the work show the composer at his best, the concerted pieces, although indicating decided dramatic power, being occasionally somewhat laboured. From this charge we must, however, except the finale to the first act, and also that at the conclusion of the opera, to which the composer has added materially since the production of the opera last season. The tenor song, "O vision entrancing" received a very decided encore; but very much better music was passed over with but comparatively slight applause. It must be mentioned that an effective duet, in the second act, between the Marquis de Chevreuse and Fleur de Lys, and additional music for the ballet in the same act, have been supplied by the composer, and certainly, we think, to the gain of the opera. As on the production of the work last season, Madame Georgina Burns was Esmeralda, Mr. Barton McGuckin Phæbus, Mr. Ludwig Claude Frollo, Mr. L. Crotty Quasimodo, Mr. B. Davies Gringoire, and Mr. G. H. Snazelle Clopin; but Miss Bensberg replaced Miss Clara Perry as Fleur de Lys, and the Marquis de Chevreuse was played by Mr. Campbell, additional importance having been given to this character by the introduction of the duet already mentioned. The opera was carefully conducted by Mr. Randegger. We cannot conclude our notice without bearing testimony to the excellent manner in which many of the operas above-mentioned have been placed on the stage. Not only has the chorus singing been uniformly good, but the groupings of the choristers has evidenced an amount of care and intelligence at rehearsals which cannot be too highly praised. At the time of our going to press, Mr. Villiers Stanford's new Opera "The Canterbury Pilgrims," which was to have been produced on the 24th ult., is advertised for the following Monday.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.

WELL filled by an audience in evening dress, the Albert Hall presents a spectacle difficult to surpass in brilliancy and impressiveness. On the 2nd ult. the vast building proved itself equally well adapted to the outward display of a nation's grief. Nothing could be more suggestive of profound mourning than the scene when the audience rose to listen to the Dead March from "Saul." Beside this grandest of all dirges, Sir Arthur Sullivan's fine "In Memoriam" overture was played, as a piece specially appropriate to the occasion. Happily, the work chosen for performance at this Concert was quite in consonance with the spirit animating all present. Beethoven's Mass in D was the utterance of a master mind yearning for light and lifting itself in profound absorption to the Divine essence. "From the heart it has come, and to the heart it shall go," said Beethoven, and intelligent listeners have since gladly acknowledged the truth of his words. Unhappily he did not take into sufficient account the limits imposed by nature on the capacity of the human voice. It is impossible that the Mass should ever take its place by the side of the most popular choral works, simply because frequent performances would seriously injure the voices of soprano and tenor executants. The mere technical difficulties of the music are as nothing compared to the physical strain borne by the singers. Still, of late years, the Mass in D has been heard at frequent intervals. We have had some fine performances under Herr Richter, and it is paying Mr. Barnby a very high compliment to say that the rendering under his bâton was worthy to compare in every respect with these. It will be remembered that it was promised last season, but, finding it impossible to devote the necessary time to its preparation, Mr. Barnby wisely withdrew it until a worthy interpretation could be confidently anticipated. The result was a gain to the reputation of the Albert Hall Society, which now, more than ever, can claim to be considered the first of metropolitan choral associations. The singing throughout the evening was remarkable for excellent attack, perfect phrasing, and sustained power, even in those passages where the highest notes of the register are employed for many bars at a time. Indeed, the performance was so admirable that the obtrusive use made of the organ—presumably as a support to the voices—was unnecessary and irritating. The solo parts could scarcely have been more adequately rendered than they were by Miss Anna Williams, Madame Patey, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. F. King, and a word of praise is due to Mr. Pollitzer for his artistic delivery of the beautiful violin solo in the Benedictus.

"The Messiah" was performed, in a somewhat abbreviated form, on Good Friday evening, the 11th ult., the principal vocalists being Madame Albani, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Maas, and Mr. F. King. This concluded the work of the season, which will rank among the most successful in the history of the Society.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

THE popularity of "The Redemption" was once more proved on Friday, the 4th ult., when a crowded audience assembled in St. James's Hall, notwithstanding unauthorised rumours that the Concert would be postponed. We agree with a distinguished critic who said, in the course of his remarks on this performance, that the time for criticism of M. Gounod's sacred work has gone by. The public has accepted it with a unanimity which renders argument for or against equally needless and unprofitable. On the whole, there was little of which to complain in the Sacred Harmonic Society's performance, though we have heard the music more effectively rendered. Occasionally a slight roughness was noticeable alike in the orchestra and chorus, and there were also inequalities in the efforts of the soloists. Miss Carlotta Elliott seemed out of her element in the soprano music, and Mr. Santley was evidently suffering from hoarseness, though his delivery of the Redeemer's words was as remarkable as ever for pathos and dignity. Miss Hancock, Mrs. Suter, and Mr. Burgon were fairly satisfactory, and Mr. Lloyd was, as usual, irreproachable. The "Dead March" was given at the commencement of the Concert, which was conducted by Mr. Charles Hallé. The artistic results of the Society's second season have been, in the main, highly satisfactory, and we trust that the support of the public has been sufficiently liberal to prevent a monetary loss.

MR. WILLING'S CHOIR.

WANT of enterprise cannot be laid to the charge of this Association, for with the enthusiasm of youth it busies itself with work which older and graver societies would not care to undertake. At the last Concert this season, which took place in St. James's Hall, on Tuesday, the 22nd ult., two Cantatas were performed, one being an absolute novelty, while the other had not previously been heard in London. Mr. Alfred Cellier's setting of Gray's "Elegy" was, it will be remembered, produced at the Leeds Festival in October last, and naturally received much attention from being associated with so distinguished a gathering. This, however, was not to its advantage, for it was manifestly dwarfed by its surroundings, and to employ festival resources for a work so modest in aim may be compared to the placing of a cabinet picture in a massive gold frame. We have nothing to add concerning the merits of the Cantata to the remarks made upon it in our issue of November last, a second hearing only seeming to confirm the impression that, while much of the music is pleasing and melodious, it is utterly inadequate as an illustration of a poem, which by its reflective and didactic nature is not readily adapted for musical treatment. Mr. Cellier seems to have felt the difficulty of his self-imposed task, and to have therefore contented himself by writing music refined and agreeable in itself, though inappropriate to the solemnity of his theme. The other work performed at this Concert was a Cantata, with the curious title of "Parizadeh," by Mr. Wilfred Bendall, a composer who has won some success by his pretty and piquant trifles for the stage. The librettist, whose name is not given in the score, has taken his material from a Persian story, one of many Oriental legends suitable as bases for musical works, either for the theatre or the concert-room. Such a poet as Thomas Moore would have told this story in glowing and sumptuous verse, but the writer of "Parizadeh" has been content to express himself in lines which are frequently awkward and always commonplace. He may be of the opinion once generally held in England that any verse is good enough for music, and, if so, we shall feel disposed to agree with him as regards music of the quality which Mr. Bendall has supplied. We do not refer to the by no means infrequent violations of grammatical rules which are to be found in the score, but to the poverty of idea and the lack of constructive skill. If Mr. Bendall desired to produce a work capable of performance by elementary singing classes, he has succeeded, the solos being very simple ditties, while the choruses never rise above the level of part-songs. The music is by no means displeasing—on the contrary, it is flowing and tuneful, but absolutely commonplace, while, save in a dance of Bayaderes, no attempt is made to introduce what is known as local colouring. A very friendly audience received the new Cantata with much favour, and both works were excellently rendered. This, however, is not saying very much, as neither of them could have given the choir any trouble. The soloists of the evening, all of whom were highly satisfactory, were Miss Mary Davies, Miss Mary Beare, Miss Marian Mackenzie, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. King. We are glad to note that the Society is to be continued, four Concerts being announced for next season.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

VERY few words will suffice to bring the record of a not very eventful season of Saturday Concerts to a close. An exceptionally fine performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony was given on March 29. The Crystal Palace Choir has not hitherto been the best feature of Mr. Mann's executive resources, but on this occasion marked improvement was shown, and the ease with which the enormous difficulties of Beethoven's music were overcome was an earnest of further progress. Miss Annie Marriott, Miss Marian Mackenzie, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. Frederic King were the soloists. For the rendering of the instrumental movements no words of praise could be too high. The first Concert of last month (5th ult.) coincided with the centenary of Spohr's birthday, and the event was celebrated by a Spohr programme, including the overtures to "Faust" and "Jessonda," and the Symphony generally, though erroneously, called "The Power of Sound." Miss Clara Samuëll and Mr. Edward Lloyd gave vocal selections by the same master, and Herr Gompertz contributed a highly competent rendering of the famous Scena Cantante, the eighth, and perhaps the finest, of Spohr's Concertos for his favourite instrument. The second Concert of the month introduced a new pianist, of considerable talent and still greater promise, in the person of Miss Amina Goodwin, a young English artist who was trained at the Paris Conservatoire, and subsequently had the benefit of Liszt's instruction. "Favourite pupils of Liszt" are by no means rare amongst the rising generation, but Miss Goodwin's claims to that title is more legitimate than is generally the case, as might be proved from intrinsic reasons if external evidence were wanting, for the young lady's intelligent phrasing and her unflinching technique, as well as many a genuine touch of inspiration, betray the influence of the greatest of all masters of the pianoforte. Miss Goodwin of course has still much to learn, and something to unlearn, but her achievements must be called remarkable in one so young. She played Mendelssohn's Concerto in D and (with poetic feeling) Liszt's beautiful "Consolation," as well as Rubinstein's bravura piece "Danse des Cosaques." Mr. Winch gave general satisfaction in the Prayer from "Rienzi" and two songs by Raff and Jensen. Miss Hilda Coward, the second vocalist of the Concert, had not been able to think of anything more interesting than Rossini's well-worn "Bel raggio." Sir Arthur Sullivan's incidental music to "The Merry Wives of Windsor," in which Miss Coward sang the interpolated song "Love laid his weary head," concluded the Concert. The final programme consisted of Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, Liszt's "Les Préludes," and the Overtures to "Manfred" and "Die Meistersinger"; Miss Elly Warnots and Herr Max Friedländer were the vocalists. Mr. Manns's benefit Concert has not yet been announced, the delay being probably caused by the opening of the International Exhibition at the Crystal Palace. That event, which took place on the 23rd ult., was not allowed to pass by without musical honours. Of a very miscellaneous Concert, in which Madame Albani, Madame Patey, Mr. Santley, and a chorus and orchestra of 2,500 performers took part, it will be sufficient to mention a new "Te Deum," written by Sir George Macfarren for the occasion. In the prelude to his work the composer has introduced various national hymns, as a delicate compliment, no doubt, to the contributors to the International Show. The tunes are strung together somewhat in pot-pourri fashion, but the composer resumes his scholarly garb as soon as the vocal portion of the work begins. Leaving more detailed criticism to another occasion, we may briefly state that the eight numbers of the score comprise songs for baritone, contralto, and soprano, and a trio for the three solo voices, represented on this occasion by Mr. Santley, Madame Patey, and Madame Albani. At the conclusion of the work the composer had to acknowledge the prolonged applause of the audience.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

As a tribute to the memory of the late Duke of Albany, the fourth Concert, on the 23rd ult., commenced with Sir Arthur Sullivan's Overture "In Memoriam," which was conducted by the composer, and warmly received not only on account of its applicability to the occasion, but from its own intrinsic merits. A feature in the programme was the exceptionally fine performance, by Madame Essipoff, of Beethoven's Concerto in E flat, a work no less welcome on account of its familiarity. After the rendering of each movement Madame Essipoff was much applauded, and unanimously recalled at the conclusion. In the second part she played Schubert's Impromptu in B flat, Mendelssohn's Andante and Scherzo in E minor, and Raff's Gavotte in A minor, in which her artistic feeling and facile execution were displayed to the utmost advantage. The vocalist was Madame Marie Roze, who gave Gounod's Recit. e Stances "O ma lyre immortelle" (from "Sapho") and Berlioz's "L'Absence" (from "Les Nuits d'Été") with admirable effect, both pieces eliciting the most enthusiastic applause. Beethoven's Symphony in D (No. 2) and the Overture "Der Fliegende Holländer" (Wagner) were steadily performed, under the direction of Mr. John Francis Barnett, the Conductor of the evening; and the Concert, although containing no semblance of novelty, seemed thoroughly enjoyed by the audience.

MONDAY AND SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

It is understood that the twenty-sixth season of these admirable entertainments has attracted a larger number of people than any previous series, and the fact is exceedingly gratifying as it affords proof of the steady advance in public taste. In this notice we have to deal with the four last Concerts, the attendance at which was enormous, notwithstanding the lamented death of the Duke of Albany, which occasioned the postponement of many other entertainments. The Concert of Saturday, March 29, may be dismissed with a few lines. It was of course a pure coincidence that the programme commenced with Schubert's Quartet in D minor, which contains the exquisite variations on the air "Der Tod und das Mädchen," though the appropriateness of the work was felt by all present. Madame Schumann made a rather curious selection for her first solo—Bach's short organ prelude and fugue in E minor—and those acquainted with the work were further surprised at her rendering of the agremens in the Fugue, the auxiliary note being given in all cases upward instead of downward. She afterwards played Brahms's fine Rhapsodie in G minor (Op. 79), and joined with Signor Piatti in Mendelssohn's Sonata in D, for pianoforte and violoncello (Op. 58), which has never been heard to greater advantage. The programme included some vocal duets by Dvorák and Hollaender, pleasingly sung by Miss L. Phillips and Madame Fassett, and ended with Beethoven's Sonata in G, for piano and violin (Op. 30, No. 3), in which Miss Agnes Miller sustained the pianoforte part.

The Concert of the following Monday evening was one of the most interesting and attractive of the season. The production of Dvorák's second Pianoforte Trio in F minor (Op. 65), occurring so soon after the visit of the distinguished Bohemian composer, of course attracted much attention. It is one of the latest of his works, and is very far in advance of the earlier Trio in G minor (Op. 26). The first movement, of which alone an analysis was afforded, is very lengthy and complex, but a careful examination proves that the deviation from the established laws of form is only in matters of detail. The thematic material is thoroughly characteristic and the treatment masterly, though it may be admitted that the course of the music is not to be easily followed at a first hearing. The succeeding allegretto grazioso, which stands in place of a scherzo, is piquant and strongly national in colouring, but the gem of the work is the slow movement, poco adagio, a stream of beautiful and original melody. The finale seemed rather eccentric and patchy, but we prefer to reserve a definite judgment until another occasion. On the whole, Dvorák's Trio in F minor has undoubtedly a right to be placed among his most remarkable creations, and, notwithstanding its position at the end of the programme, it made a strong impression. The pianist was Mr. Oscar Beringer, who must be highly complimented on his discharge of a very difficult task. It would be affectation to deny, however, that the item at this Concert which gave the greatest enjoyment to the greatest number was Beethoven's Waldstein Sonata, with Madame Schumann at the keyboard. Her rendering of this favourite masterpiece was little less than phenomenal in its way, though totally devoid of the sensational element. Cultured amateurs could not fail to derive the keenest enjoyment from the pure, rich tone, the polished phrasing, and the combined warmth and intellectuality of the interpretation. Madame Schumann was recalled again and again to the platform, and was only permitted to retire after playing her late husband's "Traumeswirren." Beethoven's Quartet in C sharp minor (Op. 132), one of the most abstruse examples of his third manner, and songs by Cowen and Gounod, sung with perfect expression by Miss Santley, completed a noteworthy Concert. It was expected that the Concert of Saturday, the 5th ult., would have been postponed in consequence of the funeral of the Duke of Albany, but the speedy departure of the artists and the impossibility of communicating with the subscribers, rendered it necessary that the performance should be given as announced. A slight attempt was made to celebrate the centenary of the birth of Spohr by forming the first part of the Concert of his compositions, but advantage was not taken of the occasion to produce any novelty. The Quartet in E minor (Op. 45, No. 2) and the tempo di menuetto from the Violin Duo Concertante in G (Op. 67) had both been heard on several previous occasions. Perhaps the one pianoforte Sonata of Spohr is not in Madame Schumann's répertoire; at any rate, she selected instead trifles by other composers. A magnificent performance of Beethoven's Trio in B flat (Op. 97) concluded the Concert. Miss Carlotta Elliott was the vocalist. The final Concert, on the 7th ult., had, as usual, a very diversified programme, so as to enable several favourite artists to take their farewell for the season. Haydn's Quartet in G (Op. 17, No. 5) opened the proceedings, after which Miss Zimmermann and Signor Piatti played Rubinstein's three pieces for pianoforte and violoncello (Op. 11). Madame Schumann had a greeting more demonstrative than ever, and the audience tried hard to obtain more from her than the three numbers of Mendelssohn's "Lieder ohne Worte" set down in the programme, though happily in vain. Bach's Concerto in D minor, for two violins, as played by Madame Néruda and Herr Joachim, afforded an opportunity for contrasting the styles of the two great violinists. After Mr. Santley had sung "The Erl-King" and Gounod's "Ho messo nuove corde," the Concert was brought to a worthy termination by an exceptionally fine rendering of Schumann's Quintet in E flat (Op. 44), in which Madame Schumann sustained the pianoforte part. It only remains to be mentioned that the twenty-seventh season will commence on October 27 next, and to congratulate the management and the public alike on the remarkable vitality exhibited in an enterprise conducted on the purest art principles.

RICHTER CONCERTS.

THE scheme of these Concerts for the present season is, as our readers well know, of a more eclectic character than usual, embracing many masters and many varied works. Opinions differ about the policy thus exemplified. Some hold that the Richter Concerts, like their Conductor, are chiefly associated with Wagner and Beethoven, and should devote themselves to making the works of those masters understood with, perhaps, an occasional excursion towards Liszt. Others contend that as the works of Wagner which are possible in a Concert-room can be counted on ten fingers, and as Beethoven belongs to classic art, the special field of labour is not large enough for the avoidance of monotony. With this we are disposed to agree, the more readily because we cannot approve of an avowed propaganda in favour of a particular school, tending, as it does, to perpetuate strife and discord where there should be peace and harmony. The programme of the opening Concert, given in St. James's Hall, on the 21st ult., was, apart from the inevitable Beethoven Symphony, a sop thrown to "advanced" taste, the only composers represented being Wagner and Liszt. Yet even this did not draw a full house, though perhaps the empty places were due more to a high tariff than indifference about the fare provided. The orchestra was much as usual and again "led" by Herr Schiever, while of Herr Richter it suffices to say that he appeared to be himself in the completest sense. On coming forward to conduct as usual, without book, he was loudly cheered from all parts of the Hall. The Concert opened with Wagner's "Huldigungs-Marsch," dedicated to the King of Bavaria, a work often played before under Richter's direction, and therefore not calling for special observation now. About its merits as a piece of orchestration no dispute can arise. It scales the heights and sounds the depths of instrumental capacity. Regarded in any other light it at once excites controversy, over the provocation to which we had better pass in order to praise an extremely judicious and well-balanced performance—as complete an exposition of the given work as critical taste could desire. Wagner's "Faust" overture followed and pleased all parties, the orthodox by its classic form and, to some extent, classic treatment, the "advanced" by its distinctively Wagnerian expression. Next came the Prelude to "Parsifal," with which the selections from Wagner fitted ended. This once more took the audience into debatable ground, but none could have refused acknowledgment of the interest which the work commanded, of the consummate skill displayed by the composer in dealing with his plan, or of the beauty that made some passages shine in an almost unearthly light. Classicists may fight Wagner on the ground of principle, and we decline to say that they are not often right, but all must bow before the evidence of his genius, while, perhaps, regretting its application. Liszt's first Hungarian Rhapsody came after the "Parsifal" music with a thorough shock of change, but its wild rhythms and impetuous flow delighted the audience, who were clearly disposed to hear it again. Then followed Beethoven's

"Eroica," to lift men's minds into a higher sphere and show what music is in its purest and most exalted manifestation. The performance of all the foregoing works left little to desire, and opened the Richter season in splendid fashion.

ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL.

THAT there would be no falling off this year in the interest which attaches to the special service held in St. Paul's Cathedral on the Tuesday in Holy Week, at which Bach's St. Matthew Passion forms so important a feature, was clearly evidenced fully two hours before the time fixed for the commencement of the service. And it speaks well for the oft-abused taste of the British public that hundreds upon hundreds should be content to go year by year and wait patiently, and, in the great majority of cases, wait devoutly too, for the reward, at length, of music diametrically opposed in style to what is usually held to be "popular," lofty and sublime alike in conception and execution, and pre-eminently religious and sacred.

Of the actual performance of the music on the present occasion we have little to say, from the critic's point of view, beyond recording the fact that the high standard of past years was fully maintained, if not surpassed. The innovation, started some two or three years since in consideration of the size of the building, of assigning some of the treble solos to all the trebles of the cathedral choir, seems to be gaining favour with the authorities, as this year only one solo—the recitative "Thou blessed Saviour, Thou"—was actually sung by one voice (the solo "Have mercy upon me, O Lord" was sung by two boys, but this eyes alone would have been able to discover) and with this exception the soprano solos were taken by the whole of the cathedral boys. Whatever objection may be felt against such a proceeding from the Purist point of view, we are bound to say that the result, in the present case, was an example of ensemble singing rarely to be enjoyed.

As in past years the tenor and bass parts were sung by Mr. Kenningham and Mr. Winn. Dr. G. C. Martin presided at the organ, and Dr. Stainer conducted.

EARLY CLOSING ASSOCIATION.

THIS at first sight appears a singular heading for a notice of a musical performance; but without being unduly sanguine, we may attach considerable significance to a movement which produces such an initial result as that witnessed in St. James's Hall on Friday, the 18th ult. The Early Closing Association, being desirous of affording public testimony to the beneficial use made of the leisure hours secured to shop employes by its efforts, organised a "grand musical demonstration," consisting of vocal and instrumental pieces, given under the direction of Mr. Joseph Barnby. The Society may be congratulated on having obtained the services of so excellent a musician as Conductor. In a purely artistic sense the greatest merit was exhibited by the Choir, the performances of various part-songs being really very creditable. If the members remain together and rehearse with regularity, the body may eventually take an honourable position among metropolitan choral societies. The instrumental part of the programme consisted of selections performed by the wind bands, organised by the employes of Messrs. Marshall & Snelgrove and Messrs. Shoolbred & Co. Criticism of the various solo efforts, vocal and instrumental, would be out of place, and it will be sufficient to say that several of the performers fully earned the applause they received. The undertaking deserves encouragement, and its progress will be watched with interest.

MR. STANFORD'S "SAVONAROLA."

THE question of how best to turn history to account of the operatic stage is one that has vexed the souls of many a librettist and composer before now, and it does not seem probable that any ultimate solution will easily be arrived at. If on the one hand, historical accuracy be strictly adhered to, and nothing allowed into the text but what is established by the most unimpeachable documentary evidence, the result is apt to be terribly dull an ineffective, for the lives even of the greatest men do not obligingly arrange themselves into a convenient number of acts for stage purposes. On the other hand, if the facts of history be modified to suit the exigencies of the drama, the public and the critics will often complain that their firmest historical convictions have been grossly outraged, and will therefore have nothing to say to the production. Some composers, as for instance Wagner in "Rienzi," and Berlioz in "Benvenuto Cellini," have eluded the difficulty by screening themselves behind an historical novel, in which the modifications necessary for effect have been already successfully made.

In Mr. Stanford's new opera the librettist, Mr. Gilbert-à-Beckett, has had recourse to no such subterfuge as this, but has faced the difficulty for himself, and solved it in the best possible way, by surrounding the central figure with characters of his own invention, one of which at least is developed from a hint in Villari's life of the great Dominican.

Clarice, the daughter of a rich merchant of Ferrara, is beloved by Savonarola, a young student; she has been betrothed, against her will, to a Florentine nobleman named Rucello. She has appointed a last meeting with her lover on the evening of her betrothal, and at the opening of the Prologue he waits outside the gate of her house. He knows that his love is returned, but not that Clarice has been affianced to another. She comes, but only to bid him farewell. They are interrupted by Rucello, who taunts Savonarola with his lowly origin, and roughly orders Clarice to return to the house. Savonarola denounces him, and they are about to fight when a company of Dominican monks cross the stage singing as they go. The combatants put up their swords, and after the procession has passed, Clarice is drawn within the gates, but not before she has sworn to Savonarola that she will never marry Rucello. The student, left alone outside the gates, struggles once more against his fate, and tries to force an entrance, but as he does so the distant chant of the Dominicans breaks upon his ear, and he determines to join them and embrace a religious life.

So far the Prologue, after which twenty-three years are supposed to elapse. In the meantime, Clarice has been married to a certain Strozzi, and has died leaving a daughter, closely resembling herself, named Francesca. Of this daughter Rucello has obtained the guardianship, for Strozzi is also dead. She has been brought up in Florence, learning from her guardian to hate the very name of Savonarola, who by this time has, by his unbounded influence and strength of character, risen to a position of supremacy in the city. Rucello is at the head of a set of partisans of the Medici, who desire to overthrow the power of the priest and to bring in their own princes as rulers.

At the beginning of Act I. they meet opposite Rucello's house in the Piazza della Signoria, he having promised to produce an emissary who shall be instrumental in delivering up Florence to the Medici. This messenger is Francesca, who now enters and declares her hatred of Savonarola, and her longing to see Florence delivered from his sway. While waiting for her message, she is met by Sebastiano, a member of the secular order of the Piagnoni, founded by Savonarola; he loves her, but in vain, for her heart is given to the cause wherein lies, as she has been taught, the only hope for Florence. He tries to dissuade her from her error, and to show her the treachery which it involves; but she is not to be turned from her purpose. When she is gone, the ceremony of the "Burning of Vanities," so graphically described in "Romola," takes place, the Piagnoni boys collecting from the rich Florentines jewels and other spoils "for the holy fire." The partisans of the Medici deride the donors, and a tumult arises, which is immediately quelled at the appearance of Savonarola, the people falling at his feet as he advances, clad in the white robe and black hood of the order, and bearing in his hand a skull. Peace is restored, but is soon broken again by the discovery of Francesca's treachery. She is brought in, and confesses with pride that she is of the Medicean faction. Savonarola orders her to prison, but Rucello steps in and tells him whose daughter she is, showing him a miniature of Clarice. Savonarola wavers, and orders her to be freed.

Upon this Rucello reviles him to the crowd, calling him

One who sells
The honour of the state to feed and fan
The puling passion of a love-sick boy.

Savonarola regains his self-possession, and gives Rucello the lie, by confirming his first order of condemnation, and as Francesca is led off, the curtain falls.

Act II. passes in the monastery of San Marco. The Medicean faction has gained strength, and is endangering the ecclesiastical power in the city. The monks are praying to their founder, St. Dominic, for aid. Sebastiano and the chiefs of the Piagnoni come to defend the convent, and all go into the chapel, except Sebastiano, who stands as sentinel outside. To his surprise, Francesca demands admission. She has been set free by Rucello, and in her imprisonment her feelings towards Savonarola have completely changed, and she is now come to warn him and his monks of the approach of the Medici. Shortly afterwards they come and sack the convent, defeating its defenders and killing Sebastiano. Savonarola is imprisoned.

The third act is occupied with the final scenes of his life. In the prison Francesca comes to crave his forgiveness. He blesses her, and as he does so the memory of years gone by returns, and in Clarice's child his old sorrow is expiated. The guards enter to take him to execution, and curtains close in the scene while a funeral march is played. The second scene is in the Piazza, where Rucello is exulting in the accomplishment of his revenge. As Savonarola comes, followed by the crowd who kneel for his blessing, Rucello confronts him in triumph, and scoffs at him. He remains perfectly calm, but Francesca and the crowd pour curses upon Rucello's head. The procession moves on, leaving Francesca alone on the stage, watching the preparations for the execution. As the ruddy glow of the distant fire lights up the stage, she utters strains of rapturous exaltation as though seeing an angelic vision, and at last sinks lifeless to the ground.

The music inspired by this fine libretto is in all respects worthy of it. It is throughout lofty in emotion, conceived on the highest lines, intellectually as well as musically, and admirably sustained in every portion. It is not too much to say that in breadth of conception and richness of imagination, as well as in intrinsic musical beauty, it far excels all Mr. Stanford's former works. His method of operatic treatment is as original as the music itself. He uses "leading motives" freely, but by no means too lavishly. Some of the recurring phrases savour rather of musical allusion than of the "Leitmotiv" proper. Thus the orchestral opening of the Prologue is used again almost note for note to introduce Acts II. and III., which treat, like the Prologue, of Savonarola's sufferings. A phrase of great breadth and beauty which first occurs in G major as an accompaniment to the expression of the young student's hopes of victory in love, is used again in a slightly modified form where supremacy of his influence is to be expressed, and again when he is taken prisoner, exulting in view of the martyr's triumphant death. The other musical motives may be left to explain themselves. The use of the Dominican Chant, the melody of which is taken from a collection of church music dating from about 1300, is very fine indeed, representing as it does the religious element in the drama. Of set pieces there are few or none in the opera, but nothing is farther from the composer's style than the "endless recitative" affected by some young musicians in fancied imitation of Wagner. Though there are no separable numbers, unless we count the prayer of the Dominicans and the funeral march as such, yet the music is divided into movements which are scarcely less clear in form than those of a sonata.

Among the most beautiful and striking portions of the score we may mention the duet and final tenor solo in the Prologue, Francesca's song and the scene of the Burning of Vanities in Act I., the Dominican Hymn and the duet between Francesca and Sebastiano in Act II., and in Act III. the duet in the prison, the funeral march and final soprano solo, in which the music first heard at the close of the Prologue recurs with the best possible effect, and by which the whole work is brought to a solemn and most affecting conclusion.

The performance at the Stadt Theater, Hamburg, on the 18th ult., when the work was produced for the first time, was on the whole exceedingly good, and bore traces of the most careful study in all parts. The titic-rôle was undertaken by Herr Ernst, a young tenor whose admirable acting made up for what his voice yet lacks in sustaining power. Frau Rosa Sucher, in the parts of Clarice and Francesca, was extremely fine, as will easily be imagined by those who saw her wonderful impersonations in the last season of German opera in London in 1882. Dr. Kraus sang and acted the part of Rucello with great vigour and artistic intelligence, and Herr Landau was the Sebastian. The choruses were fairly well sung, but the acting of the singers was not all that could be wished. The orchestra was weak in the string parts, but was otherwise good. Herr Sucher conducted with the greatest care and skill, and the mounting of the work left nothing to be desired. The reception of the opera was most enthusiastic, the composer being called before the curtain many times at the conclusion of each act. "Savonarola" is to be produced in London during the approaching season of German performances at Covent Garden, under Herr Richter's direction.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

SPECIAL interest attached to the fourth and last Concert of the Festival Choral Society on March 27, because it was the occasion of introducing to the Birmingham public the sacred masterpiece of a foreign composer of note, who is probably destined to play an important part in the musical history of the town. Anton Dvorák, whose "Stabat Mater" furnished the principal item of the Concert, was entrusted some time ago with a commission for the Birmingham Festival of 1885, and he has now intimated to the committee that he has found a congenial subject in the life of the reformer, John Huss. But little of his music had been heard in Birmingham prior to the performance of his "Stabat Mater," which came, therefore, almost as a revelation upon the musical public of the Midland metropolis, and though the mournful character of the theme, and the somewhat severe spirit in which the composer has addressed himself to its exposition, render it improbable that the work will ever command the suffrages of the million, there was no mistaking the deep impression its noble strains produced upon the many earnest and educated music lovers present on this occasion. It was remarked that the themes employed in his "Stabat" are few and simple, but expressive, with little or none of the changeful flow of luscious, cloying melody which we get in Rossini's setting of the hymn, but more reserve and severity, if not more purity of style, than in the work of the Italian composer. The performance, though by no means an ideal one was, considering the difficulty of the music, a very creditable effort, more especially on the part of the chorus and band. A good deal of the solo music, however, severely taxed the resources of the principal artists, Miss Anna Williams, Madame Mudie Bolingbroke, Mr. Redfern Hollins, and Signor Foli. Schubert's "Song of Miriam," which was also performed here for the first time on this occasion, scarcely fulfilled the expectations of the many Schubert lovers present, who comforted themselves, however, with the reflection that if the composer himself had written the orchestral parts, which were supplied by Lachner, the result might, perhaps, have been different. The performance of the work by Miss Anna Williams and the chorus was, under every aspect, very satisfactory. An excellent rendering of Mendelssohn's setting of the Forty-second Psalm, "As the hart pants," concluded the Concert.

At the second Concert of the Amateur Harmonic Association, on the 2nd ult., the principal item was Schubert's tuneful First Mass in F, which exhibited the choir in a very favourable light where their efforts were not obscured by the loudness of the band. With the exception of an occasional want of balance between the vocal and instrumental sections, and a tendency to drag the time in places, the performance left little to be desired. In Beethoven's Choral Fantasia Miss Agnes Miller was the pianist, and acquitted herself in this and in a series of four harpsichord studies by Scarlatti with her accustomed skill and judgment. A couple of part-songs, including Beethoven's "Calm sea and prosperous voyage," Handel's Fourth Organ Concerto, capittally played by Mr. Stimpson, and songs by Rossi, Braga, Sullivan, and Ambroise Thomas, made up the programme.

Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri," first produced before a Birmingham audience by the local Philharmonic Union, in September, 1878, was repeated by the same Society on the 3rd ult., when the important part of the Peri devolved on Miss Anna Williams. The work possesses a special interest for Birmingham, owing to the many points of contrast and analogy it presents with Mr. Barnett's setting of the same poem, produced at the Birmingham Musical Festival of 1870—more than a quarter of a century after that of Schumann. Of the sterling qualities of the latter work it would now be superfluous to speak, and its performance on this occasion does not call for much comment. The choir, though somewhat weak in the tenor section, had evidently rehearsed the work carefully, and notwithstanding that the band was not large enough to fulfil all the requirements of the score, it was of excellent quality. Miss Williams was in fine voice, for which the music of the Peri afforded large and effective scope, and her efforts were well seconded by those of Miss Johnson, Miss Yates, Mr. Abercrombie, Mr. Alexander Smith, and Mr. D. Harrison. Of the choruses, the more delicate ones fared best, the brief Angels' chorus and the chorus of Houris being exquisitely sung. For some of the other choral numbers more weight and volume of tone and occasionally more fire were wanting. In Hiller's Pianoforte Concerto in F sharp minor, Mr. G. J. Halford displayed a neat articulate touch combined with good phrasing and power. The "banquet scene," from Max Bruch's "Odysseus," a clever but somewhat heavy work, first heard in Birmingham in May of last year, was the next item of this interesting Concert, which terminated with a spirited performance of Gounod's "Mireille" Overture. Dr. Swinerton Heap conducted throughout with his accustomed judgment.

On Good Friday the Philharmonic Union gave its usual performance of "The Messiah" in the Town Hall, with organ accompaniment only, under the direction of Dr. Heap. The choral singing generally was satisfactory, and Mr. Stimpson's playing left nothing to be desired, though the instrument was somewhat out of condition. At Aston Lower Grounds, on the same day, there was a crowded hall to hear a performance of "Elijah," under the direction of Mr. C. J. Stevens. There was a full band and chorus of 400 voices, with Miss Anna Williams, Miss Emilie Lloyd, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Mr. Bridson, among the vocal principals. Miss Williams was in excellent voice, and impressed the audience more particularly by her singing of "Hear, ye Israel." Miss Emilie Lloyd was effective in the dramatic scene between Yezabel and the Prophet. Mr. Vernon Rigby won great applause by his singing of "If with all your hearts," and Mr. Bridson, in the music of "Elijah," sang with judgment and skill. The choruses generally were well rendered, and the playing of the instrumental accompaniments left little to be desired.
