tones that he is behind his time, and that before again committing himself to paper he had better devote his energies to the study of the newest developments, of the existence of which he appears to be lamentably ignorant. As it is the object of the present sketch merely to set forth the serious hindrances which lie in the path of the aspirant to fame in operatic composition, we shall not attempt to prescribe the proper course to be followed in the present crisis. But, not to pursue the Mephistophelian philosophy of negation too far, let us pass for a moment to the consideration of a question about which there appears to be much misunderstanding. The influence of the Wagnerian music-drama is so generally potent that it is surprising no composer has as yet utilised the system of Leitmotiv as invented by the genius of Bayreuth. No doubt this assertion will strike many with amazement. Nothing is more common than to read concerning a new work that "the composer has adopted the Wagnerian device of leading themes." As a matter of fact, as every musician knows, Wagner no more invented the idea of associating certain musical phrases with the personages or the incidents of a drama than Bach can be said to have invented fugue, or Handel oratorio. The essence of his system is the amazing number of transmutations and modifications to which he subjects his motives, and his novel use of the time-honoured science of counterpoint in the construction of his scores. By submitting it to the processes of augmentation, diminution, or inversion, the meaning and sentiment of a motive may be modified or completely reversed; as also by changing it from duple to triple measure, or from the major to the minor key, and vice versa. The scores of "The Nibelung's Ring," "Tristan und Isolde," "Die Meistersinger," and, to a less extent, of "Parsifal," abound in examples of this description, and also of the masterly employment of two, three, and even four themes simultaneously, allotted to instruments of such diverse tone-colour as to enable the attentive listener to detect them all without difficulty. Here, surely, is a wide field for the legitimate successors of those old-world composers who amused themselves by evolving all manner of contrapuntal problems, in which musical expression had absolutely no place. If it should be said that similar negative results would accrue now, the answer would be that Wagner was the greatest master of expression who has ever appeared, his musical contrivances being merely a means to an end. It is not intended here to advocate this new application of musical science to operatic composition; the desire is merely to explode a popular fallacy with regard to Leitmotiv, and to indicate one track which no living composer has as yet explored. This, it will be perceived, is a purely musical point. Into the very important questions of appropriate subjects for lyric dramas, the proper relations between poetry and music, the use and abuse of form, &c., it is impossible to enter within the compass of a single article. The controversy is all-important to musical England at the present time, and as each of its several points is worthy of distinct consideration, the present remarks may afford some material for reflection.

WHOEVER is in the habit of perusing the American musical journals must agree with us that, as a rule, they are remarkable for plain speaking. For example, in our own papers devoted to the art we have latterly seen an earnest desire to separate the good teachers from the bad, and to warn persons who employ musical professors against the pretensions of those who are utterly incompetent for the position to which they aspire; but the following description of such teachers, from an American periodical, strikes us as being somewhat highly coloured:—"Charlatans in their profession, and next door to swindlers in their business relations, they never pay if they can sneak out, and all the scholars they can get are only misguided dupes of impudent ignorance and sheer quackery." The custom of calling a spade a spade, too, is perhaps an honest and commendable one; but when opinions are so freely expressed on all sides, the difficulty, we should imagine, would be to find out which is really the "spade." For example, the editor of a paper, speaking of some false news published in a contemporary, boldly avers that "it would have been very strange if they had told the truth"; and this is what the proprietor of one journal says of the proprietor of another: "The thing that astonishes me is that anybody who knows—knows his utter incompetency both as a writer and as an editor, knows his ingrained laziness and brazen effrontery—could for one moment think that such a poor, miserable journalistic nincompoop could ever make a paper that would appeal to a large circle of readers. If there are such, let them get a copy of the wretched rag he issues once a fortnight, and they will find that the sheet itself carries with it its own damnation more thoroughly than any I can publish of it." As the writers of these paragraphs boast of the immense circulation of the papers in which they appear, we may presume that their readers rather like these little personalities.

THE English translation of "John Bull et Son Ile" will no doubt be extensively read by the inhabitants of the island so cleverly satirised; and certainly since M. Taine's work on English life and manners we have not been shown up so effectually, and, we may even say, with so much truth. Considering, however, that, as a rule, whenever the literary men of our own country speak of music in England they exhibit a lamentable, and in the present day it may be said inexcusable, ignorance of the subject, it can scarcely be expected that a Frenchman should display a greater knowledge either of the state of the art here or of the composers whose works have become our household treasures. "In London," we are informed in the above-mentioned book, "there is not even a cobbler but has a piano in his back parlour"; yet, although every woman performs on this instrument, the author affirms that he has never heard in a private room "a lady or a young girl play well enough to afford pleasure to a serious amateur." Now we cannot say whether the writer of these assertions has sufficiently looked into the houses of cobblers in England to convince himself that they have all "a piano in the back parlour"; and of course his sweeping criticism upon amateur pianists is a matter of opinion. But now let us come to his statement of facts. After telling us that John Bull shows a predilection for the Oratorio, and that he sits in his stall with his eyes closed that he may hear the better, we have the following sentence: "It is true that some of these Oratorios contain splendid passages, and that a great number of them were written by such men as Haydn, Handel, Bach, and Mendelssohn. But it is a rather curious fact that most of them were composed in England by these great masters, perhaps under the influence of the spleen; it is Thames fog set to music." We will not underrate the knowledge of any of our readers by pointing out the absurdity of this statement; but what would be thought of the qualifications of an author to instruct the public who could write such utter nonsense upon any other art than music?

WHATEVER may be said of the effect of Moody and Sankey's hymns upon the people, it must at least be admitted that nobody is compelled to listen to them. Those who voluntarily enter a building devoted to a special form of religious service cannot reasonably complain of the method of worship adopted, and have a right, therefore, to be tolerant, even if they cannot feel devout. But the privileged disturbers of the public peace known as the "Salvation Army" have now become so aggressive that it is time to enter a protest against their proceedings. As long as they keep their choruses and shoutings to themselves, nobody would wish to interfere with them; but, as a correspondent in one of our provincial contemporaries says, why should a respectable citizen, going quietly with his family to church on Sunday morning, have his ears assailed by a band of these fanatics howling to the coarse accompaniment of a coarse band some sacred text to the tune "Dem Golden Slippers"? If, as is almost universally agreed, the words first heard sung to a certain air are afterwards indissolubly associated with it, what religious feeling can possibly be called up by a music-hall ditty such as the one we have mentioned, the doggerl verses to which were originally designed to raise a laugh in an atmosphere by no means congenial with devotional thoughts? The members of the "Salvation Army" may be perfectly sincere; but even if they make converts of a few persons inside their temples of worship, it is surely bad policy to make enemies of a larger number outside. On this subject we have before spoken somewhat strongly, and are glad to find that others are now following our example. In the interest of pure music, as well as of pure religion, the press should unite to repress demonstrations which have long been a public nuisance, and have now become a public scandal.

IN "Notes on the Cultivation of Choral Music and the Oratorio Society of New York," by H. E. Krehbiel, a volume recently published in the States, the author says that "one hundred and fourteen years ago there was not in all musical Europe a single amateur Choral Society, and only ninety-six years ago was the first public singing society (composed of amateurs) established. What the cultivation of Handel's music in England has done for that country is not to be measured; and the fact that in the manufacturing towns of Great Britain thousands of men and women might be assembled on a day's notice to sing 'The Messiah' without the notes, tells more of the gentleness and refinement of the working-classes in that country than hundreds of learned essays on social science." This warm tribute to the state of musical progress in England is supplemented by the observations of the critic of the work in an American paper, who says, "Here is something which the writer of this review can vouch for, as he has been present at many such meetings, and knows by actual sight that this is so. Miners and workmen of all sorts, who can neither read nor write, are able to take the bass or tenor (and sometimes the alto) part in 'The Messiah,' 'Elijah,' 'Samson,' 'The Creation,' and this with an accuracy of intonation and time (aside from vigour and fervency) that is truly astonishing, considering their general ignorance on other matters. This is a phenomenon, of course, but it has tended to make England especially famous for its choral singing." As both the author and reviewer of this book fully agree in the rapid spread of choral music, we have much pleasure in recording the fact, especially as in this, the 500th number of our journal, we may be pardoned for looking back through a number of years with a feeling of pride at the part we have ever taken in popular musical progress. Our leading article expresses all that we would say both upon our efforts in the past, and our intentions in the future; but we may mention that, gratifying as must be the opinion

we have quoted of an unprejudiced American critic upon the diffusion of the art amongst the masses in England, it is doubly so to the conductors of a journal which, it must be recollected, has for its title not only THE MUSICAL TIMES, but also the SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.

THE WORCESTER MUSICAL FESTIVAL

(FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

WE have on several occasions directed attention to the principal characteristics of the Three Choir Festivals, the features of which, as distinct from all other important musical gatherings, must ever secure for them a large amount of general, as well as of local interest. The benevolence of the object for which they are given, the sublime effect of the performance of great religious works in a Cathedral, and the opportunities which they afford for drawing together the influential residents of the surrounding neighbourhoods at periodical intervals, are points which cannot be too much insisted upon by all who, like ourselves, uphold these meetings rather for the good they do to art and charity than for any abstract veneration for their age. But however these reasons may lead us to accord our most strenuous support to the Festivals, it must also be impressed upon those who decide on the compositions to be performed, that they must move with the times; and in the present day we demand not only that modern works shall be included in the programmes, but that many which have fallen into comparative neglect shall be restored to that high position from which they have been so long excluded. It is because all these conditions were most satisfactorily fulfilled that we are disposed to regard the Worcester Festival of this year as a model of what these meetings ought to be; for whilst fully recognising the claims of the standard works which have for so many years formed the great attraction at these Festivals, the first morning was devoted to Gounod's now universally acknowledged masterpiece, "The Redemption," Antonin Dvorák's recent success, the "Stabat Mater," was contained in the programme, and a Cantata, "Hero and Leander," written for the occasion by Mr. C. H. Lloyd, and a new Hymn by Dr. Bridge afforded sufficient evidence of the desire to secure novelty.

The Festival commenced, according to the usual custom at Worcester, with a Special Service in the nave of the Cathedral, which was attended by the Mayor and members of the Corporation, who walked from the Guildhall, and joined the procession of clergy inside the building. Prominence was of course given to music, the full Festival band and united choirs lending their aid on the occasion. A setting of the "Hymn to the Creator," by Dr. Bridge, opened the Service, the work being conducted by the composer. The words of the Hymn (which is thrown into the form of a Motett) are a translation, by Mrs. Oliphant, of the "Song of St. Francis," the renowned Apostle of the Middle Ages, and founder of the Franciscan Order. The Motett is written for solo soprano, chorus, and orchestra, and evidences throughout not only the musical skill which might be confidently expected from an artist of Dr. Bridge's acquirements, but a true sympathy with the feeling of the verses, the beauty of which would be destroyed by any undue display of profundity. Opening with a brief instrumental Introduction, in A major, the chorus enters with much boldness on the words "Highest, Omnipotent," to a triplet accompaniment, a theme being carried on in the orchestra, which is afterwards given to the voices in imitative passages. After some good choral writing, a modulation into C introduces a melodious soprano solo—well sung by Mrs. Glover-Eaton—a portion of which is afterwards repeated in chorus. Eloquent phrases are then given to the various departments of the choir, the soprano solo being alternated with the choral parts, in the final movement, "allegro maestoso," soaring above the chorus with brilliant effect, on the words "By Thee the Highest to be crown'd in Heaven," and bringing to a termination a composition, if not striking in original thought, at least remarkable throughout for an artistic simplicity which would have gladdened the heart of the devout and pure-minded author of the verses. Sir Frederick Ouseley's Te Deum and Benedictus, in F, proved that genuine church composers are still in our midst; for although not based exclusively upon the models of the past, the construction of the movements and the harmonic progressions are thoroughly in sympathy with the feeling of the text throughout. Of the two we prefer the Te Deum, passages in which often arrest the attention, not only for their melodious beauty, but for their artistic treatment. The Anthem after the Collects was Mendelssohn's "When Israel out of Egypt came," the clearness of which was somewhat marred by the hurried pace at which the first and last movements were taken, and before the sermon Dr. Croft's "Cry aloud and shout" was given, the hymn "Holy, Holy, Holy," being sung before the Blessing. Tallis's music to the Responses was used, the Venite was given to Pelham Humphreys's Chant, and Lawes's Chant, in the same key, C, was chosen for the Psalms of the day. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Canon Knox-Little, from the text Zachariah, chap. ix., v. 17, "For how great is His goodness, how great is His beauty." Unlike most Festival sermons, which are merely impressive addresses upon the power of sacred music on a vast congregation, the preacher delivered to an unusually attentive body of listeners a discourse so evidently the result of mature reflection upon the subject, and so suggestive of a desire to evoke earnest thought in others that we cannot conscientiously dismiss the matter with a few conventional lines of commendation upon his efforts. Considering what was the real "message" of the music to be given during the week, Canon Knox-Little impressed upon his congregation the necessity of answering three questions—"What is its Pathos? What is its Danger? and What is its Power?" We can scarcely disagree with the Preacher when with reference to the first question he tells us that "music thrills the sensuous nature, but, if we will, through sensation, it thrills the soul." Those very words, "if we will," answer the objection advanced in discussing the second question, What is its Danger? "Music may be," he says, "a science of mere sensation. There are your modern apostles of culture, and what do they teach? They teach that man is in an ascending scale, and that he has advanced from point to point, not by that which we Christians call the grace of God, but by art, by culture." A bad man, then, is bad, not in consequence of, but in spite of, the influence of music; and surely art and culture must lead men, by "the grace of God," to receive that inestimable benefit from the study and practice of musical works which is denied to those who, from necessity or choice, remain at the bottom of the "ascending scale." Canon Knox-Little, indeed, is himself a notable example of the effect of culture; but that he is a deeply religious man, and one profoundly impressed with the true "message" of music is beyond question. Passing on to the question What is its Power? he counsels us to ask ourselves why the great musicians have suffered so acutely, though they left us such a heritage of joy. "Suffering and sorrow," he says, "are the ways to life. Suffering and trouble are the sad heritage of genius"; but genius, with an earnest purpose, passes through this ordeal to the fulfilment of its mission. "Dear brothers and sisters," says the Preacher, "don't let us make this Cathedral this week a mere concert-room"; but might he not have added that if they did so they would be acting in direct opposition to the intention of those who composed the undying strains to which they were listening? Musicians are, as a rule, religious men; and, entrusted with a power more eloquent than words, use it with a due sense of its importance in glorifying their faith. If music, in its secular use, can be made to awaken impure or meretricious feelings, it must be by alliance with words which would effect the same object without the aid of music; and although Canon Knox-Little in his sermon fully succeeded in drawing attention to the abuse of the art, we are certain that musicians will sincerely thank him for so eloquently expounding the true use of it.

Monday was devoted to rehearsals, and on Tuesday morning the Mayor gave a breakfast, at which a large number of notabilities were invited—unfortunately, however, not including the distinguished artistic guest, Dvorák—and the first performance took place at 11.30 in the Cathedral, "The Redemption" occupying the position in the programmes so long assigned to Mendelssohn's "Elijah." The readers of our journal will require in this place no critical analysis of a work so well known as "The Redemption." The opinions expressed by us on its production at Birmingham have been fully justified by its constantly increasing success; and the fact of the sale of tickets for the morning of its performance being greater than that of any other day during the week is a sufficient proof of the confidence felt in its attractive qualities by those who framed the programmes. But although, as we have said, criticism on the merits and characteristics of Gounod's great Sacred Trilogy is now uncalled for, we cannot be silent on the sublime effect of the work upon a congregation assembled in a building consecrated to the teachings which it is the object of the music to intensify. In the first place, it must be said that the same four vocalists who sang the solo parts at Birmingham—Madame Albani, Madame Patey, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley—appeared on the occasion, and that the purely devotional music assigned to these artists made the deepest impression upon the listeners, many of whom no doubt heard it for the first time. The exquisite singing of Madame Albani, who has made the important soprano solos in the work almost her own, produced a flutter of excitement which seemed with difficulty restrained within reverential limits; the rendering of the pathetic solos allotted to Madame Patey, of those for the Saviour to Mr. Santley, and of those for the Tenor Narrator to Mr. E. Lloyd, being equally impressive. A good word must also be given to Mrs. Hutchinson for her refined interpretation of the soprano music which fell to her share; but Mr. Breton was slightly over-weighted in the bass narrative recitatives, and the singing of Messrs. Millward and B. Newth, as the two thieves, was hardly in harmony with the tone-picture so truthfully and vividly conceived by the composer. The choruses produced an overpowering sensation, especially the grand choral and orchestral piece "Unfold, ye portals everlasting," the impressive Calvary music, and the Hymn of the Apostles; but we cannot speak with unqualified praise of the chorus singing, which occasionally was wanting in decision. Throughout the Oratorio the orchestra was everything that could be desired, the gorgeous instrumental effects, as well as the more delicate tints of colour, being realised with a fidelity which would have delighted the composer himself; and great credit is due to Mr. Done, whose conducting evidenced an earnest desire to show his admiration of the work.

The secular Concert in the evening was given for the first time at the Public Hall, where a fine organ, by Nicholson, having been recently erected, it was hoped by many that some innovation upon the conventional programmes at these Festivals would be attempted by the introduction of at least one of the organ works of the great writers for that instrument. No such reform, however, was carried out, and the Concert on Tuesday evening commenced with Weber's Overture to "Der Freischütz," which, although excellently played, was evidently regarded by the numerous late-comers as a mere orchestral voluntary during the process of seating the audience. Some attractive vocal pieces—amongst which may be mentioned Berlioz's "Absence," from "Les Nuits d'Été," charmingly sung by Mrs. Hutchinson, and Mr. E. Lloyd's magnificent rendering of a Recitative and Aria from Halévy's "La Juive"—were followed by Mr. C. H. Lloyd's Cantata, "Hero and Leander," written expressly for the Festival. The story selected by Mr. Lloyd for musical treatment is, of course, sufficiently well known; but Mr. F. E. Weatherly's libretto compresses it so skilfully that the "Argument" should be quoted as it appears in the book: "To keep the Feast of Adonis the people from Abydos cross the Hellespont to Sestos, where dwells Hero, priestess of Venus, in a lonely tower. With them sails Leander, who, seeing Hero as she presides over the Festival, loves her. After the Festival, he tells his love, and Hero's heart is won; but not without fear, for she has broken her religious vows. Then they part, she to her tower, he to Abydos. But a torch will shine each night, and he will swim the strait to come to her. One night, in winter, he is drowned, and Hero, in her misery, throws herself from her tower, and dies by the drowned body of her lover." Mr. Lloyd may congratulate himself upon having secured the co-operation of one who, in the performance of his task, has not contented himself with writing "singable" verse, but aimed at suggesting, by poetical thought, a sympathetic poetical setting of the text; and though in some parts we might certainly desire that the theme should be more fully developed, the salient points are brought out with sufficient clearness to preserve the necessary continuity of the narrative. The Cantata is divided into two parts, with an Epilogue. The first part, "The Feast of Adonis," commences with an orchestral Introduction and Chorus of People from Abydos. The purely instrumental portion of this movement, in E major, is charmingly fresh and melodious, the flowing 9-8 rhythm being admirably adapted for the themes, accompanied with semi-quavers, in arpeggio, which precede the entry of the chorus, a melody being skilfully carried on with the cellos and bassoons as an independent part. At the change into G major, a pedal upon the key-note, and afterwards upon the dominant, leads to a modulation into C, on the words "Hear us, O Venus, ocean-born," this appealing phrase, accompanied with triplets, being extremely expressive. The return to the original key brings the chorus to a conclusion with much effect. The Processional March, which accompanies the worshippers to the Temple, has a well-marked subject in F sharp minor, a distinctively appropriate character being given to it by the adherence to the minor seventh of the scale. This March is carried on during Leander's solo, in which he avows his love for Hero, and forms, indeed, a most attractive movement, the use of the chord, technically called the German sixth, here, and afterwards when the death of Leander is alluded to, being a point of much interest. No. 3—the words of which are said to be an abbreviated paraphrase of Bion's version of the Hymn actually sung at the Feast of Adonis—begins with a striking instrumental figure in A minor, with, as in the previous number, the unraised seventh of the scale, the solo of Hero, interspersed with choral passages, being exceedingly dramatic. After an effective change into the tonic major, the worshippers fall on their knees and sing an unaccompanied hymn, the theme of which has previously appeared as an inner part in the Processional March. The whole of this movement evidences not only much true and sympathetic musical feeling, but shows that the composer has so well thought out his subject as to work throughout with an earnest and defined purpose. The love duet which follows, between Hero and Leander, if scarcely as spontaneous as the choral portions of the Cantata, contains some charming vocal passages, and is so gracefully and delicately accompanied as materially to aid the efforts of the singers. "The Return to Abydos," concluding the first part, is a choral piece with a solo for Leander, the many reminiscences which occur, both of the orchestral introduction and the opening chorus, tending to establish a link between the several movements which effectually sustains the musical interest. The second part opens with an impassioned solo for Leander, commencing in B minor, the agitated instrumental Introduction and accompaniment to which has many excellent points. Orchestral storms are dangerous subjects for young composers to handle; but, on the whole, Mr. Lloyd has been fairly successful, and by legitimate means, his score never being defaced by those violent, spasmodic efforts which belong rather to noise than to music. Hero's scena, "Oh love, why tarriest thou?" which follows, although, like other movements, somewhat too brief, well expresses the varied emotions of the situation, her address to the relentless sea, and final resignation to death being worthy of warm commendation. The Epilogue, commencing with an appropriately pathetic phrase, in E minor, "Weep for the lovers," and changing to the tonic major on the words "Weep no more," forms a fitting choral commentary upon the tragical end of the narrative, the few bars of symphony effectively dying off with the opening theme of the orchestral Introduction to the Cantata. Although our impression of Mr. Lloyd's work has been recorded in detail we must now supplement our remarks by the expression of a highly favourable opinion upon its merits as a whole; indeed we may conscientiously say that the promise of a brilliant future for the composer is so decidedly shown in this, his first important essay, that there can be little doubt of his success in a composition of greater pretension, especially as we feel certain that he will accept the success he has achieved at its true value, and work as hard in the future as he has convinced us that he has done in the past. It need scarcely be said that the singing of Miss A. Williams and Mr. Santley in the principal parts was of the highest order—indeed, Mr. Lloyd was singularly fortunate in having enlisted such exceptional talent in his cause—and, as a rule, the choral portions were well rendered. More rehearsal, however, was absolutely necessary to secure that dramatic colouring which can hardly be obtained whilst the music is unfamiliar to the choristers; but such result can scarcely be expected at Festival time, and we must look forward to another hearing of the work before it can be truthfully said that we have fully realised its beauties. Mr. Lloyd, who conducted the Cantata, was most cordially received, and retired from the orchestra amidst the warmest demonstrations of applause. The principal items of interest in the second part of the Concert were the superb playing of Mr. Carrodo, in the first movement of Beethoven's Violin Concerto, with Molique's difficult cadence; the excellent singing of the popular quartet "Un di, se ben rammentomi," from "Rigoletto," by Mrs. Hutchinson, Madame Enriquez, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley; and the refined rendering by the band of the "Danse des Sylphes," from Berlioz's "Faust," which was enthusiastically redemanded.

The performance on Wednesday morning commenced with Cherubini's Mass in D minor, respecting which there is little to say, save that, like "The Redemption," the effect of the work is materially enhanced by its presentation in a Cathedral. Mr. Done has a right to feel proud of the triumphant success of the composition at the last Worcester Festival, and we feel quite certain that its repetition was cordially welcomed by all who heard it on the former occasion, and that those who listened to it for the first time would carry away with them a lasting impression of its wondrous power. We can scarcely affirm that the fugal movements of the Mass were sung with that perfection which characterised the former performance throughout; but many of the choruses were well rendered, and an especial word of praise must be given for the due observance of those gradations of tone without which such contrapuntal music sounds somewhat hard and unsympathetic with the text. The principal parts were assigned to Madame Albani, Mrs. Hutchinson, Madame Enriquez, Messrs. B. Newth, Dyson, and Brereton, all of whom sang with an evident appreciation of the devotional character of the music with which they were entrusted, the "Benedictus," especially, being excellently rendered. Handel's Overture to "Esther" opened the second part of the programme, after which Bach's Cantata for Whitsuntide, "God so loved the world," was given. Of course, a great attraction in this work is the song for soprano, "My heart ever trusting," finely sung by Madame Albani (who, however, somewhat offended Bach worshippers by her alteration of the final cadence), but the two choral movements are excellent specimens of the highest form of fugal writing, especially the latter, "On Him believing," which was most satisfactorily given. The bass solo, "On my behalf," was well sung by Mr. Brereton, but the air is somewhat dry, and the song gives but little opportunity for the vocalist to enlist the sympathies of his auditors. No work offering more decided contrast of style could have been selected to follow Bach's Cantata than Spohr's "Christian's Prayer," which was throughout faultlessly sung. The beauty of the melodies, and the rich harmony with which they are clothed, although perhaps scarcely in tone with the religious nature of the subject, cannot fail to produce a powerful effect upon the hearers, and the composition was listened to with the most earnest attention. The principal soprano part was sung by Mrs. Hutchinson, whose artistic and sympathetic voice and style were so fully evidenced in the whole of the music allotted to her during the Festival as to win the good opinion of all competent judges. Praise, too, must be given to the other solo vocalists—Madame Enriquez, Mr. B. Newth, and Mr. Brereton—all of whom gave the music with commendable care and intelligence. Schubert's "Song of Miriam," which concluded the morning's performance, gave Miss A. Williams an opportunity of displaying her well-trained voice and method in the important solo portions, the Choir singing with uniform steadiness and precision throughout.

The performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah" in the evening attracted a large congregation to the Cathedral. The principal soprano parts in this work were divided between Miss A. Williams and Madame Albani—the former giving the whole of the music for the Widow, and the latter the air "Hear ye, Israel," which, if somewhat demonstrative, was brilliantly rendered—those for contralto between Madame Patey and Madame Enriquez, Mr. E. Lloyd was the tenor, and Mr. Santley sustained the part of the Prophet; the excellent singing of Mrs. Hutchinson in the trio "Lift thine eyes"—in association with Madame Albani and Madame Patey—being the only point needing mention where every other artist has been so long identified with the music. All the choruses were well sung, "Thanks be to God" and "He watching over Israel" being especially effective.

Thursday was one of the most important mornings of the Festival, for the Cathedral performance commenced with Dvorák's "Stabat Mater"—one of the greatest compositions of modern times—and also introduced the celebrated Bohemian composer himself as Conductor of the work. Such a masterpiece of construction, of melodious beauty and artistic treatment, must, wherever heard, thoroughly win its way to a perfect recognition of its abstract musical claims; but its devotional eloquence, its power of intensifying the feeling suggested by the text, can only be appreciated amidst those surroundings in harmony with its sacred character; and again, therefore—at the risk of undue reiteration—do we say that the Three Choir Festivals offer to composers the only opportunity of placing their grand tone-pictures in a fitting temple for worship as well as praise. We have so many faded imitations of the style of great musicians, past and present, constantly presented to us for judgment, that it is quite refreshing to listen to a work so thoroughly individual in conception as this "Stabat Mater." We do not say that Dvorák shows a want of reverence for all the creations of genius which have brought music to its present high position—on the contrary, he evidences an intimate acquaintance with all that is good in the compositions of his predecessors—but he slavishly follows no model, and dares to think for himself with a boldness which would be dangerous in one less gifted. A striking point in this work is the manner in which he develops a subject, and this never to weariness, but with a skill which creates the utmost interest in an attentive listener; and although these themes are, as a rule, remarkable for simplicity, they have always a sufficiently attractive character to ensure their welcome on repetition. It need scarcely be said that, under the direction of the composer, the work was exceptionally well rendered, the most delicate shades of expression, both in the choral and instrumental parts, being accurately observed. We find it difficult to select any choruses for commendation where all were given with such precision, but the opening "Stabat Mater Dolorosa," alternated with solo quartet, the impressive "Eia Mater," and the lovely pastoral movement "Tui Nati," might be cited as models of devotional choral singing, the obviously suppressed emotion of the listeners bearing the highest testimony both to the power of the music and the excellence of its interpretation. The principal vocalists—Madame Albani, Madame Patey, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley—exerted themselves to the utmost to do full justice to the composer's intentions, and the result, with such artists, may be readily imagined, Madame Patey, in the fine solo, "Inflamatus," and Mr. Lloyd, in the flowing and melodious "Fac me vere," with chorus, throwing an indescribable charm around these movements by their refined vocalisation, the quartet "Quis est Homo," being also worthy of the warmest praise. The composer must indeed have felt a pardonable pride at the high appreciation of his work; for although any audible demonstrations were forbidden by the sanctity of the building, it was easy to perceive how eloquently his music had spoken to the hearts of the vast congregation assembled, and how generally it was tacitly acknowledged that a really great composer had arisen in our midst. It remains only to record that the morning's performance concluded with the first part of Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," that the principal vocalists were Miss A. Williams, Madame Patey, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley, assisted in the subordinate passages by Messrs. Millward and Brereton, and that the choruses were sung with as much freshness as if the Festival had but just commenced.

At the secular Concert in the evening, an opportunity was afforded of personally testifying the opinion of the Worcester public upon the decisive success of Dvorák, his Symphony in D, under his own conductorship, forming one of the principal items in the programme. On his entry into the orchestra, the applause was so overwhelming that it was many minutes before he was allowed to give the signal for commencing; a similar demonstration followed the end of each movement, and at the conclusion of the work he received such an ovation as we trust will convince him that English people are ever ready to recognise, and give a welcome to, the highest representative men in art, whatever may be the country of their birth. Of the Symphony, which has already been heard at the Crystal Palace and at a Philharmonic Society's Concert, we need not speak; but something must be said of the excellent manner in which it was rendered by a band, shorn of some of its strength by the exigencies of space. No doubt the presence of the composer acted like magic upon the performers, for certainly the delicious slow movement, the Scherzo—the Slavonic character of which has the advantage of being spontaneous and real—and the final "Allegro con brio" received an interpretation which produced an electrical effect upon the audience, and must have afforded the highest gratification to the composer. The evening's programme commenced with Mozart's Overture to "Die Zauberflöte," and the selection included a highly interesting feature—extracts from the second act of Gluck's "Orfeo"—the solos in which were finely sung by Madame Patey and Mrs. Hutchinson; a melodious part-song, "If slumber," by Dr. L. Colborne, effectively rendered by the Worcester Philharmonic Society; and vocal music by Miss A. Williams, Mrs. Hutchinson, Mr. B. Newth, Mr. Santley and Mr. Brereton. As at the secular Concert on Tuesday evening, the first part was conducted by Mr. Done and the second by Mr. C. L. Williams.

The Festival was brought to a termination on Friday by a performance of the "Messiah" in the morning at the Cathedral, the principal vocalists being Madame Albani, Miss A. Williams, Madame Patey, Madame Enriquez, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. Santley, and Mr. Brereton—and a full Choral Service in the evening, the music in which included the Overture to the second part of Spohr's "Last Judgment," Attwood's Cantata Domino and Deus Misereatur, Purcell's anthem, "O sing unto the Lord," and the "Hallelujah" Chorus from Beethoven's "Mount of Olives."

Apart from the satisfactory artistic and pecuniary results of this Festival, we cannot close our notice without alluding to the reforms which have gradually been carried out, and the effect of which has removed every possible objection to these important meetings. We remember the time when a large number of the visitors to the Cathedral, feeling that they had come to a Concert, and consequently disregarding the nature of the building in which it took place, would complacently lunch during the interval, and sometimes during the performance, even occasionally hanging their hats upon the recumbent figures on the tombs within their reach, and adopting a manner which seemed to show that they had come out for a holiday and were resolved to enjoy themselves. The solemn adjuration of Canon Knox-Little to his congregation on Sunday seems, however, now almost unnecessary, for a due sense of that decorum of behaviour in consonance with the occasion, and a higher appreciation we hope and believe of the real purpose of sacred music, has transformed the audience into a congregation, and we unhesitatingly affirm that, crowded as was the Cathedral during the Festival week, no more attentive or devout body of listeners at each performance ever assembled within the walls of a religious edifice. Much has also been said upon the character of the music usually given at the secular Concerts, the programmes, indeed, offering so violent a contrast to the grand compositions presented in the Cathedral as utterly to destroy the artistic tone of the Festival. This has now been altered, for on the present occasion all the works have been of a high class, and not only have "Royalty" songs been excluded from the selections, but not one vocal piece has been sung with a pianoforte accompaniment, although Mr. C. L. Williams was announced to preside at the instrument. The Festival, then, has not only achieved success, but has fully deserved it; and we sincerely congratulate all who contributed to this result—Mr. Done by his careful, though undemonstrative, conducting; Dr. Colborne, Messrs. C. L. Williams and Hugh Blair by their judicious aid at the organ; the Stewards who officiated at the Cathedral by their attention to the placing of the auditors; and the Rev. Canon Cately by his uniform and unremitting courtesy in all the business arrangements, for which we here take the opportunity of returning our warmest thanks.

The total amount received at the doors on behalf of the Charity for which the Festival is given was £1,066 rs. 4*d.*, being £40 over that of the Worcester Festival of 1881. Some additional donations, however, are often dropping in, so that the fund may still be benefited beyond the sum already received. The accounts of receipts and expenses—that is, sale of tickets and payments to artists, &c.—have not yet been made up.

MUSIC IN THE WEST.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE musical outlook for the coming season in Bristol is somewhat richer in interest than usual, and includes the intended performance of many works new to the city. We are especially looking forward to the enjoyment of nine Monday Popular Concerts, instead of the six of last season; and also to the fact that for the first five, which are to be given before Christmas, the band will be considerably augmented. There is some notion of a performance of Beethoven's Choral Symphony towards the close of the season, an idea which we sincerely hope may be carried out. Surely we may reasonably expect that this year the firm establishment of these excellent Concerts will be assured. More subscribers are yet needed to secure the expenses being cleared, and though the accounts of last season, as shown by the Society's report lately issued, are not unsatisfactory, yet it should be remembered that were Mr. Riseley's services as conductor otherwise than voluntary a deficit would have been exhibited. The first Concert is announced for the 6th inst.

There is, however, one feature in the prospect before us next season which is very depressing—that is, the non-continuance of the Classical Chamber Concerts which have for several years past been such a treat to the lovers of music of that description. It could not, of course, be expected that Mr. and Mrs. Pomeroy could carry on the Concerts with the meagre support which Bristol and Clifton accorded to them, and therefore they are now, we fear, finally dropped.

The chief works now under rehearsal by the Festival Choir are Dvorák's "Stabat Mater," Brahms's "Triumphlied" and Haydn's "Creation," which are to be performed at two Concerts to be given at the end of the month, or in the beginning of November, when efficient soloists and Mr. Charles Hallé's band will be engaged.

A grand Concert is announced to be given at Colston Hall, on the 24th inst., by Mr. George Buckland, who has engaged the following celebrated artists:—Madame Valleria, Miss Ella Lemmens, Madame Enriquez, Mr. Joseph Maas, Mr. Barrington Foote, Mr. Harvey Löhr, Mdlle. Anna Lang, and Signor Bottesini.

A very fair performance of Rossini's "Stabat Mater" was given at Colston Hall, on Saturday, the 20th ult., by the Bristol Musical Association; the principals were Madame Billinie Porter, Miss F. Armstrong, Mr. E. T. Morgan, and Mr. Montague Worlock. Mr. George Riseley presided at the grand organ, and Mr. Gordon, as usual, filled the post of conductor.

Mr. F. N. Löhr is busy at Plymouth preparing the Vocal Association for a second performance of Gounod's "Redemption," which was such a success last year. This will be followed at Christmas by "The Messiah," and there will be a third Concert later in the season, the programme of which has not yet been decided upon, but it will probably include some new work of interest.

The first of the Exeter "People's Concerts" was given early last month. These are Concerts of popular music at cheap rates.

Mr. Farley Sinkins announces three Subscription days, with two Concerts on each, during the coming season, the first of which will be the 23rd inst., for which date the same distinguished band of artists has been secured that we have already enumerated as engaged to perform at Bristol on the 24th inst.

The Victoria Hall Organ Recitals began on Saturday, the 20th ult., and will be continued as usual during the winter.

The Exeter Branch of the Western Counties Musical Association will give Cummings's "Fairy Ring" and Hatton's "Robin Hood" in November, and later in the season the Association itself promises Handel's "Alexander's Feast" and an Organ Concerto, Mendelssohn's "First Walpurgis Night," and Gade's "Psyche."

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE arrangements for the scheme of Choral and Orchestral Concerts are as follows: The season will be ten weeks in duration, commencing Monday, December 8, and terminating Saturday, February 14, 1885, during which period it is intended to give thirteen Subscription Concerts—five choral and eight orchestral. The choral works will be (1) Mendelssohn's "Elijah," on December 16; (2) Handel's "Messiah" on the morning of January 1, 1885; (3) "Messe des Morts" (Berlioz), on January 22; (4) Handel's "Israel in Egypt," on February 10; and (5) selections from the works of Handel on February 12, this last Concert being in commemoration of the bi-centenary of Handel's birth. The Orchestral Subscription Concerts will take place on successive Tuesday evenings from December 9 to the close of the Concerts, with almost unbroken regularity, and the usual popular Concerts will be held every Saturday evening during the season. The following artists have been already engaged: sopranos, Madame Valleria, Miss Thudichum, Miss Minnie Hauk, Miss Annie Marriott, and Miss Clara Samuell; contraltos, Madame Patey, Miss Marian McKenzie, Miss Alexandra Ehrenberg, and Madame Trebelli; tenors, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Joseph Maas, and Mr. Charles Chilly; basses, Mr. W. Ludwig and Mr. W. H. Brereton; violinists, M. Marsick, Miss Anna Harkness, Herr Robert Heckmann (from Cologne); Pianists, Herr Franz Rummel (from Berlin), Professor H. Barth (from the School of Music, Berlin), and Madame Essipoff. Other engagements are pending. The orchestra will number seventy-six performers, as last season, with Herr Heckmann as chef d'attaque, and Mr. Manns, as I mentioned lately, will again be the Conductor.

The orchestral programmes are only in course of consideration, but I learn that Mr. Cowen's Cambrian Symphony will be performed. It is to be hoped that Brahms's latest Symphony, No. 3, will also be given. Chamber music is comparatively seldom heard in Glasgow, but the appointment of Herr Heckmann to the principal violin desk, together with the engagement of three members of his Cologne quartet party in the orchestra, will give an opportunity, which I trust will not be passed over, of including some chamber pieces in the programmes, which will doubtless be a welcome feature to not a few.

In connection with the operations of the Executive Committee of these Concerts, I may mention that in addition to the standing arrangement with the Edinburgh Choral Union for the engagement of the orchestra, it has been also secured for three Concerts in Paisley, two of them instrumental and one choral, Gadsby's "Lord of the Isles" being the work to be performed. There will also be two Concerts at Ayr with the band, at one of which will be given "The Creation," with Mr. McNabb as Conductor; also at Dundee, choral, and at Aberdeen, orchestral, a Concert each.

The Hillhead Musical Association, one of the oldest Societies in Glasgow of a semi-private character, though none of them are very venerable in age, will, during the first half of the session, practise Mendelssohn's "Loreley" and Sullivan's "On Shore and Sea." Mr. W. T. Hoeck, under whose instruction the Society has not fallen behind, to say the least, will be the Conductor as before. Signor Zaverlat, now in Woolwich, held the post for some years.

The Uddington Musical Society, which enjoys the valuable training of Mr. James Allan, Conductor of the Glasgow Select Choir, is to take up Romberg's "Lay of the Bell," which it will doubtless produce in due time with the same great attention to expression that marked the rendering of Cowen's "Rose Maiden" at the last Concert.

At Rutherglen, in the same "air," to use a Scotch word, the Choral Society, conducted by Mr. W. Macintyre, will study Gadsby's "Lord of the Isles."

The Choir of Queen's Park United Presbyterian Church will practise Sullivan's "Festival Te Deum," Mr. Hoeck, Organist of the church, being the Conductor.

Arrangements have been made for a short series of Monday Evening Organ Recitals in St. Andrew's Hall; the first of which was announced to take place on the 29th ult., by Mr. Best, of Liverpool. Some of the leading choirs and choral societies of the city are engaged to sing part-music between the organ performances, and thus lend variety to the entertainment. Mr. Taggart's male-voice choir was announced in connection with Mr. Best's Recital, and Dr. Spark, of Leeds, and other well-known organists will take part in the series. It is well known that the very fine suite of rooms in our west end, known as St. Andrew's Halls, has not been a paying affair to the citizens to whom we are indebted for the building. The time must come, however, when the halls will be self-supporting, but they should long ago have been taken over by the Town Council, our City Hall being a somewhat dingy and shabby building, with surroundings of the most unpleasant nature. The organ of the City Hall, too, to which an organistship is attached, is a miserable instrument. If Glasgow had depended on municipal encouragement of music, the art here would indeed have been in a low condition.

A male voice Choral Society has been started in connection with the 3rd Lanarkshire Rifle Volunteers, being rather a revival of one which had been allowed to die. Some appropriate musical pieces will be studied, but such compositions as Callcott's "Queen of the Valley" will very probably be practised, there being ample musical talent among our Glasgow Volunteers.

An Amateur Orchestral Society has been formed in the southern suburb of Crosshill. It is to be trained by Signor A. Gabriele, who has had considerable orchestral experience, and under whom it is hoped the Society will make a name for itself.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE winter series of Choral and Orchestral Concerts, now for some years established through co-operation with the Glasgow Choral Union, will be resumed for the season on December 10. Eleven Concerts in all will be given, eight of them orchestral and three choral. The choral works are Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri" (December 15) and Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" (January 12, 1885). For the former, Madame Valleria, Miss Alexandra Ehrenberg, and Messrs. C. Chilly and W. Ludwig have been engaged; and for the latter, Misses Clara Samuell and Hope Glenn and Messrs. Henry Guy and Barrington Foote. A miscellaneous selection from Handel's works will be given on February 9, on the occasion of the bi-centenary of the great Saxon's birth, with Miss Annie Marriott, Madame Patey, and Mr. E. Lloyd as vocal soloists. Mr. Manns will, as before, conduct the Orchestral Concerts, and Mr. Collinson the choral performances. The solo pianists at the former are likely to be Miss Marie Krebs, Madame Essipoff, Herr Barth, and M. Fritz Blumer; while M. Marsick and Herr Heckmann, who is to be the chef d'attaque this year, will be among the violin soloists. It was in contemplation at one time to have produced Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's new Oratorio "The Rose of Sharon," but the idea has had to be abandoned.

The Choral Union has begun its practices, and made very fair progress with its share of the work of the season. Considerable improvement is perceptible in the musical tone of the Society this year, while there is a sensible addition of general culture, which cannot but have a marked effect on the taste of the singing. Indeed, to speak plainly, there has been for some years an appreciable want of refinement in the Edinburgh Choral Union, the result being that the Society did not take by any means the position it might have held with more care in these matters. Mr. T. H. Collinson, the new Conductor, is an excellent acquisition to the Society, alike by reason of his musical ability and his gentlemanly and courteous bearing, and under his charge progress of the highest character is confidently looked for. The action of the proprietors of the Music Hall, by the way, in restricting the number of sittings, with the view of a wider separation of classes of seats, is likely to have a prejudicial effect on the financial returns, though it is to be hoped better counsels will prevail. The hall is not a large one, and is far from being well-planned or sensibly appointed.

The Choral Society in connection with St. Giles's Cathedral will give a performance of the "Messiah" and the "Creation," Mr. J. O. Sinclair being the Conductor.

Mr. John Kirkhope's Private Choir is practising Barmby's Cantata "The Lord is King."

Mr. Waddel's Choir is studying Bach's "St. Matthew Passion." Mr. Waddel's Chamber Concerts this year are to be held in the evening. The first Concert will take place on the 13th inst.

MUSIC AT THE TURIN EXHIBITION.

No. II.

INTERRUPTED only by the excessive heat of the summer months, the orchestral Concerts at the Turin Exhibition have taken place, and still continue, every Sunday. Fifteen have already been given by the excellent orchestra of the Teatro Regio of Turin, under the direction of Faccio, the programmes being always varied and interesting. Other orchestras from our principal musical cities have been called in from time to time to strengthen our own symphonic power and capacity. In July, for instance, was heard the Bologna orchestra, led by the eminent artist and composer, Luigi Mancinelli. Formed by a phalanx of talented musicians, this orchestra obtained nearly as much success as Martucci's Neapolitan did in May. Mancinelli is now one of the musicians on whom Italy reckons most. He has proved himself the worthy successor to the celebrated and never to be forgotten Angelo Mariani, whose post he now fills at Bologna, and to him we owe the best interpretations of Wagner's music, of which he is a warm admirer. As a composer, he holds a high place; his overtures and intermezzi for the tragedies of "Cleopatra" and "Messalina" are compositions which reveal an original and lively talent. He has also distinguished himself in the writing of church music, being chapel master at St. Petronio, for which he has written a "Missa Solemnis," and he has now ready a romantic opera called "Isora di Provenza," which will be given in October at Bologna with a good company of singers. Amongst the pieces which had most success at Turin may be mentioned his own compositions; a symphony by Beethoven; some fragments by Wagner; and the "Saul" overture, by Bazzini, director of the Milan Conservatoire, this last being repeated to satisfy the enthusiastic calls of the public. A much appreciated curiosity, which had also to be repeated, was "Vieux-temps's Polonaise" for violin solo, which Mancinelli made all his first violins—twenty-two, I think—execute together with a precision and effect which must be heard to be believed. I, to tell the truth, am much against these tour de force, but when they arrive at such perfection, one cannot but admire them. Signor Mancinelli's orchestra numbers one hundred and thirty performers. At the fourteenth of Faccio's Concerts, that most important work, the Symphony in D, by Giovanni Sgambati, was performed. The vast learning, elevated views of art, and rare inventive genius of this young composer place him in the highest rank. Although of the advanced school, he does not ape any master, retaining not only a personal, but an Italian character in all his compositions. Wagner held him high in his estimation, as also does Liszt, whose pianoforte pupil he is. Indeed, Wagner it was who introduced him to the Germans, and made him publish at Schott's, of Mayence, his two Quintets, his Concerto for piano and orchestra, and the score of the great Symphony in D.

This work has been heard in London, and much admired when executed at the Crystal Palace in 1882. I assisted at its excellent performance by the Crystal Palace orchestra, and I recollect the great impression it produced on the public. I must also say that I could not but admire the promptitude with which the English noticed the beauties, and understood the structure and symphonic value of a composition, moulded in the purest classic form, and in which not a single concession is made to vulgar or common-place effects. Sgambati, however, had the same flattering appreciation given to his work in Paris, when it was performed at the Trocadero at one of the international Concerts.

At Turin it caused a decided fanatismo; intense attention during the five movements of the symphony; loud applause at the most salient points; and an encore for the charming serenade which precedes the finale. The programme of this memorable fourteenth Concert was completed by the overture to "La part du diable," by Auber, the prelude from "Tristan and Isolde," by Wagner, and Mancinelli's overture to "Cleopatra."

A few words now on the exhibition of musical instruments, but only in a general way, for the particulars are too poor to be worthy of a detailed description. The centre of the great industrial gallery, communicating with the concert hall, is devoted to the musical instruments, their presence being made obvious not only by the towering organs, but at times also by the unconnected sounds of the pianos and harmoniums, which inspired lovers of music play at the same time, each one suiting his own taste. On the walls are painted many lyres, suggestive of the utmost bad taste.

Naturally there is an abundance of pianofortes, and with these I will occupy myself, especially on account of their industrial importance, a thing too little attended to in Italy, where a great deal is said about musical supremacy, but where, in many cases, we are very inferior to other nations. For pianos we are ever subjected to foreign importations, as not only France, Germany, England, Russia, and America, have better makers, but even the small countries of Belgium and Switzerland. I do not deny that a piano may be a rascally tormentor; but now that it is a necessary household article, there ought to be in Italy a proportionate production to the demands on such a trade. Makers should not only be able to furnish vertical instruments by the dozen, but ought to finish grand pianos of real worth. We have a few makers, their names are Brizzi and Nicolai, at Florence; Aymonimo and Roseler, at Turin; Maltarello, at Vicenza; and no doubt they have progressed since the days when they were simply cabinet makers, who put together a few boards in the shape of a piano in which to stow away hammers and keys made in Paris or Vienna. So great, indeed, is the diffidence felt by an Italian maker that the best amongst the pianos manufactured here are always marked with some foreign name. The progress made since the Milan exhibition in 1881 is remarkable, and be it noted during that period, not only has every help been denied by Government which, it would seem, hates music, but instead of increasing the duty on foreign pianos it has diminished it, and an increase has been put on all foreign material necessary to the fabrication. Vertical pianos are better made here than grands, and their sale is great, owing to their moderate price. The grands fail generally in evenness, the centre is often veiled and nasal in tone, and the bass generally hard and dry. The treble, on the contrary, is nearly always good, clear and brilliant. However, these defects are now decreasing, and I met with some grands which might sound well for concert playing.

Still inferior to the pianos are our organs. But in a country where cavatinas and dance-music are oftener played on the organ than Frescobaldi's or Bach's specially-written compositions, what is to be expected? Meanwhile, the makers follow the old track—make cheap instruments provided with noisy stops, and wanting the necessary pedals to play Sebastian Bach's grandest fugues. The best of the four or five organs exhibited at Turin is that built by Collino Brothers, at Turin, and those who have not heard the instruments at the Albert Hall or at the Trocadero may feel satisfied with it.

The musical season at Turin closed well with performances at the Regio. "Mefistofele," by Boito, splendidly inaugurated them, the chief attraction in it being the admirable singing and acting of Signora Pantaleoni (Margherita). Great ovations were obtained by Faccio for his fine execution of the Prologue. "Dejanice," by Catalani, will follow "Mefistofele." This opera, given last year at La Scala, only obtained a mediocre success, owing to the tenor's important part being rendered by Verguier, then completely deprived of voice. At Turin this part is to be taken by Mierzwinsky, who undoubtedly will not fail in this particular.

F. FILIPPI.

THE Crystal Palace Saturday Concerts will commence on the 18th inst. There will be twenty Concerts, ten before and ten after Christmas. The programmes for the first ten Concerts contain many items of much interest to amateurs, and include the following works:—Brahms—Third Symphony in F (first time at these Concerts); Beethoven—Symphonies Nos. 3 and 5, Pianoforte Concerto in E flat, and Violin Concerto; Schubert—Symphony No. 9, in C; Schumann—Symphony No. 3, in E flat (Rhenish); Liszt—Orchestral Interlude, "Salve Polonia" (first time in England); Cowen—Symphony No. 4, in B flat minor (first time at these Concerts); A. C. Mackenzie—Instrumental Movements from the "Rose of Sharon"; Saint-Saëns—Pianoforte Concerto No. 2, in G minor, &c., &c. At the sixth Concert, on November 22, Gounod's "Redemption" will be repeated, and at the tenth Concert, on December 20, Berlioz's Te Deum for three choirs, with Orchestra and Organ Concertante, will be given for the first time in England. For the Concerts after Christmas, commencing February 14, it is announced that the bi-centenary birthdays of Handel and Bach will be celebrated by a selection from their works; that Brahms's birthday on March 7 will be signalled by the production of his Fourth Symphony, should the work be ready for performance; that Raff's last Symphony, "Im Winter," will be produced on February 21; that Selections from Wagner's later Operas will be given, and that Beethoven's Choral Symphony will be performed at the last Concert. The artists engaged are: Vocalists—Madame Valleria, Miss Minnie Hauk, Miss Mary Davies, Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Griswold, Miss Hilda Wilson, Madame Trebelli, Madame Patey, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. J. Maas, Mr. Pyatt, and Mr. Santley; Pianoforte—Mlle. Clotilde Kleeberg, Mr. Franz Rummel, Herr Barth, and M. Fritz Blumer; Violin—Mynheer Theodor Werner and Herr Robert Heckmann; Violoncello—M. Jules Lasserre. Mr. Manns's Benefit Concert will take place on April 25.

In our last number we gave a list of some of the principal compositions to be performed during the coming season by the Sacred Harmonic Society at St. James's Hall, and we now find by the prospectus, just issued, that Bach's "God's time is the best," and Goetz's "By the waters of Babylon" will be included in the programmes of the six Concerts, commencing on November 7. An important feature of the season will be the performance of Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's new Oratorio "The Rose of Sharon," in which Miss Emma Nevada will make her début in London, the singers being, with one exception, the same as those engaged for the work at the Norwich Festival. This will be produced at the first Concert, under the conductorship of the Composer.

MR. ISAAC ABBOTT, of Leeds, has just erected in the Church of the Ascension, Balham, an organ of three manuals, forty-one stops, six composition pedals, those of the great organ acting on the pedal organ; double-action foot pedal to great to pedals; tremulant to the swell organ, the pedals as recommended by the College of Organists. This instrument will be opened at the Harvest Festival on the 2nd inst., when a selection of music will be played by Mr. Adolphus Antoine.

From Sydney, Australia, comes the intelligence of the early death (aged thirty-one) of Miss Clara Whomes, an excellent pianist who occupied a leading position in the musical circles of this important colonial centre. Miss Whomes was a student at the Royal Academy of Music for nearly four years, and her loss will be severely felt by the music lovers of the district in which she had laboured during the latter portion of her brief career.

THE Royal Albert Hall Choral Society, in its prospectus for the season 1884-5, announces ten Concerts. A special interest will be felt in these performances, as it has been decided to produce Wagner's "Parsifal" for the first time in this country, and—very wisely, we think—in the original German. Two representations of this important work will be given—at the first Concert, on Monday evening, November 10, and on Saturday afternoon, November 15—and the original artists from Bayreuth, Fraulein Therese Malten (Royal Singer, Dresden), Herr Heinrich Gudehus (Royal Singer, Dresden), Herr Theodor Reichmann (Royal Singer, Vienna), and Herr Gustav Siehr (Royal Singer, Munich), have been specially engaged for the occasion. The following works will also be given during the season: Berlioz's "Faust," Mendelssohn's "Elijah," Haydn's "Creation," Gounod's "Redemption," Handel's "Messiah," and (if arrangements can be made for its production) Berlioz's "Te Deum." Engagements have been concluded, or are pending, with Madame Albani, Madame Valleria, Miss Griswold, Miss Anna Williams, Mrs. Hutchinson, Madame Patey, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. Charles Wade, Mr. Santley, Mr. Henry Pyatt, Mr. R. Watkin Mills, and Mr. Barrington Foote. The Conductor is Mr. Barnby (to whose exertions the Society owes so much of its success), and Dr. Stainer presides at the organ.

A SPECIAL Service of Thanksgiving for the Harvest was held in St. John's Church, Waterloo Road, on Thursday, the 25th ult., the choir of the church being joined by that of the mother church of St. Mary, Lambeth, and accompanied by a small orchestra of strings and wind, in addition to the organ. We understand that this is the first occasion on which any orchestral instruments have been introduced into this church, and it is therefore a double pleasure to record the success which attended the efforts of those responsible. The singing of the choirs was marked by good tune and purity of tone throughout, and both solos and choruses were highly commendable. The music consisted of Tours's Evening Service in F, Dr. Stainer's anthem "Ye shall dwell in the Land," and, after the sermon, Dr. Wesley's "Blessed be the God and Father," besides several well-known hymns in which the congregation joined very heartily. The same Service was rendered on the previous evening, but without orchestral accompaniment, at Lambeth Church. On each occasion, Mr. Henry J. Dart, Organist of St. John's, presided at the organ, and Mr. Ernest Slater, Organist of Lambeth Church, conducted.

THE prospectus of Mr. J. A. Mathews's "Choral and Orchestral Society," in Cheltenham (founded in 1870), announces weekly Oratorio Practices during the season 1884-85, and also (provided a sufficient number of members can be procured) an Afternoon Class for Oratorio Practice, Violin Classes, and a Ladies' Harmony Class. The regulations for the Singing Competition of 1885 are also given; and the dates of the Annual Examinations of Vocal and Instrumental Music, and of Elementary Musical Knowledge, in connection with Trinity College, London. A great success was achieved last season by the two Concerts which were given, at the first of which the Handel Festival Selection, 1883, and at the second Gounod's Oratorio "The Redemption," were performed; and the first Concert of the coming season is advertised to take place in the Assembly Rooms, on Tuesday evening, November 11, the programme to consist of Rossini's "Stabat Mater," and Mr. C. H. Lloyd's Cantata "Hero and Leander," produced at the recent Worcester Festival, to be conducted by the composer.

THE Harvest Festival at St. Michael's, Bowes Park, was celebrated on Wednesday, the 24th ult. The choir at Evensong was largely augmented, numbering over fifty voices, and was accompanied by an efficient orchestra of twenty performers. The music comprised: Service in E flat by Dr. Stainer, a new anthem, "Blessed be Thou," by Dr. Bunnett, and Chorus after sermon, "The Heavens are telling." At the conclusion of the service the overture to "Saul" was performed, the solo organ part being supplied by Dr. C. W. Pearce, who also presided at the instrument throughout the service. Mr. Henry J. Baker conducted.

THE Borough of Hackney Choral Association has issued its prospectus for the coming season, which promises to be of considerable interest. Foremost in importance is the announcement of Dvorák's "Stabat Mater," a work which has lately attracted such well-deserved attention. Mendelssohn's "Athalie" will also be given by the choir, but without the customary recitations; and at the same Concert a selection from the works of Handel will be brought forward, including some very fine but little-known pieces from "Time and Truth" and "Hercules." Haydn's "Creation" is to occupy one of the evenings, and at the last Concert of the season a selection will be given from the works of living English composers, the most important being Mr. Cowen's "St. Ursula" and Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's orchestral ballad "La belle Dame sans Merci." The Concerts will be given, as usual, in Shoreditch Town Hall, and Mr. Ebenezer Prout will continue to hold the post of Conductor.

THE Birmingham Festival Choral Society, under the conductorship of Mr. Stockley, promises for the season 1884-85, a series of four Concerts at the Town Hall, commencing on the 30th inst., the list of works to be performed comprising Mendelssohn's "Elijah," Schubert's Grand Mass in E flat, J. F. Barnett's Cantata "The Ancient Mariner," a selection from the compositions of Handel, Spohr's Oratorio "The Last Judgment," and Smart's Cantata "The Bride of Dunkerron." The vocalists engaged are Madame Valleria, Miss Anna Williams, Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Thudichum, Madame Enriquez, Miss Helen D'Alton, Miss Damian, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. Joseph Maas, Mr. J. W. Turner, Mr. Harper Kearton, Mr. Bridson, Mr. Barrington Foote, Mr. Ludwig, and Signor Foli; Organist, Mr. Stimpson. The annual performance of "The Messiah" will take place on December 26, the solo vocalists being Miss Clara Samuelli, Madame Mudie-Bolingbroke, Mr. Joseph Maas, and Mr. Brereton.

THE Nottingham Sacred Harmonic Society promises three Subscription Concerts for the season 1884-85, the first, at the Albert Hall, on the 29th inst., when Berlioz's "Faust" will be performed, conducted by Mr. Charles Hallé (vocalists, Miss Mary Davies, Messrs. E. Lloyd, H. Pyatt, and Santley); the second, at the Mechanics' Hall, on December 11, the work selected being Handel's "Judas Maccabæus," under the conductorship of Mr. John Adcock (vocalists, Madame Valleria, Miss Marian McKenzie, Messrs. J. Maas and Harrison); and the third, in the same room, on March 12, 1885, the programme to consist of Signor Randegger's Cantata "Fridolin," and Mendelssohn's "Loreley" and "Walpurgis Night," when it is hoped that Signor Randegger will be able to conduct his own work, the vocalists engaged on this occasion being Madame Marie Roze, Messrs. Harper Kearton, F. King, and Brereton.

THE prospectus of the North London Musical Society, which has just been forwarded to us, announces that it is established for the "advancement of all branches of music amongst its members, and to provide the highest class of Instruction and Practice at the lowest possible cost." There will be a Choir, an Orchestra (curiously enough consisting of "strings only"); six Concerts are to take place during the season, musical soirées are to be held monthly, and three balls are to be given on dates yet to be fixed; but whether the music for these entertainments is to be selected from the stringed orchestra of the establishment is not stated. The musical director is Herr Heinrich Kreuz, and there is a list of patrons and of the members of the committee; but, considering that the "highest class of instruction" is promised, it seems strange that the prospectus should be silent as to the names of the professors engaged.

THE first Concert for the coming season of the Monday Popular Concerts will take place on the evening of the 27th inst., and the series will comprise twenty-one performances, from that date until March 30, 1885. Twenty Concerts will also be given on Saturday afternoons, extending from November 1 to March 28, 1885. The prospectus is not yet issued; but the season will commence with Herr Barth as pianist, Madame Norman-Neruda, first violin, and Signor Piatti, violoncello.

THE seventeenth series of Concerts of the Wolverhampton Festival Choral Society will commence on November 3, with Cowen's "St. Ursula" (conducted by the composer) and Bennett's "May Queen." On December 29 "The Messiah" will be given, and on January 26, 1885, an Orchestral Concert will take place, at which some rarely heard examples of Handel's works will be performed, in recognition of the bi-centenary of his birth. On March 20 the bi-centenary of the birth of Bach will be celebrated by a performance of the "Passion" (St. Matthew). The vocalists include Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Anna Williams, Miss Mary Davies, Mdlle. Elly Warnots, Miss Hope Glenn, Miss E. Lloyd, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. J. Maas, Mr. H. T. Bywater, Mr. Wade, Mr. Brereton, Mr. R. Hilton, and Mr. F. King. The band and chorus will consist of 300 performers, under the conductorship of Dr. Swinnerton Heap.

The St. Leonards and Hastings Choral Union, under the conductorship of Dr. Abram, announces that Gounod's Oratorio "The Redemption" will be given at a special service, to be held in St. Paul's Church, on Wednesday evening, the 22nd inst. A performance of Mendelssohn's Oratorio "Elijah" will take place on Wednesday evening, November 19; Spohr's "Last Judgment" will be given on December 3, and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" on December 17. Dr. Abram's Oratorio "The Widow of Nain," with a new work, will be rehearsed after Christmas; and, as 1885 will be the bi-centenary of the birth of Handel, "Israel in Egypt" and "The Messiah" will be put into rehearsal early in the new year, performances of which will take place about Eastertide, when it is anticipated that a grand Handel Musical Festival will be held in the Borough.

THE prospectus of Mr. Stockley's Orchestral Concerts, at the Town Hall, Birmingham, for the coming season, announces a series of four Concerts, the compositions selected for performance including Cowen's new Welsh Symphony (conducted by the composer), Beethoven's 7th Symphony, Raff's Italian Suite, Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, Saint Saëns's "Le Rouet d'Omphale," Cowen's "Language of the Flowers," &c. The artists engaged are Madame Rose Hersee, Miss Clara Samuell, Fraulein Heffelmann, Madame Patey, Madame Trebelli, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. Joseph Maas, Mr. Brereton, and Signor Foli; pianoforte, Miss Agnes Miller; violin, Mr. Carrodus; violoncello, Mr. Ould; and organ, Mr. Stimpson. The first Concert takes place on the 16th inst.

THE 188th Monthly Concert of the St. George's Glee Union was held at the Pimlico Rooms, on the 5th ult., under the direction of Mr. Joseph Monday. The artists were Miss Woodhatch, Miss Bessie Diamond, Miss Leonora Pople, Mr. W. Nicholl, and Mr. Chaplin Henry. The part-songs by the choir included "Where art thou, beam of light?" Bishop; "Fairy Song," A. Zimmermann; "In these delightful pleasant groves," Purcell; "All among the barley," E. Stirling, and "Who shall win my lady fair," R. L. de Pearsall; the last two items being deservedly redemanded. Miss Spearing and Mrs. Edmonds contributed pianoforte solos, and Mr. F. R. Kinke played the accompaniments. The Concert was one of the best ever given by the Society.

THE members of the Grosvenor Choral Society gave their 151st Monthly Concert at the Grosvenor Hall, on Friday, the 19th ult. The programme consisted of a miscellaneous selection. The solo vocalists were Miss Maud Cameron, Mrs. Isabel Browning, Mr. Arthur Weston, and Mr. Alfred Grieve, all of whom were well received in their respective solos, &c. The part music was exceedingly well rendered. Mr. H. C. Tonking contributed two violin solos, Mr. G. R. Egerton and Mr. George Winny presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. David Woodhouse conducted.

THE prospectus of the South London Choral Association announces that during the season will be performed Handel's "Judas Maccabæus" and "Acis and Galatea," Van Bree's "St. Cecilia's Day," Costa's "Eli," Gaul's "Holy City," and Bennett's "May Queen." An orchestral Concert will also be given. The various classes in connection with the Institute will continue their operations as heretofore. Mr. Leonard C. Venables retains the post of Principal of the Institute and Conductor.

THE Tufnell Park Choral Society, now entering upon its thirteenth season, recommences its practices on the 7th inst., in the St. George's Church Room, Carleton Road, Tufnell Park, under the conductorship of the founder, Mr. W. Henry Thomas. It has been resolved that a small amateur orchestra shall be formed to accompany the choir during a portion of the time appointed for each meeting; and, should the band become sufficiently numerous, the last half-hour will be devoted entirely to orchestral music. The works to be rehearsed, with a view to their performance during the season, are Mr. C. H. Lloyd's Cantata "Hero and Leander," Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's Oratorio "The Rose of Sharon," and selections from several important compositions of past and present masters.

THREE Subscription Concerts are announced to be given by Mr. Spark at the Public Hall, Worcester, during the season 1884-85, commencing on November 3. The artists engaged are Miss Ella Lemmens, Madame de Fonblanque, Madame Carlotta Patti, Madame Enriquez, Madame Isabel Fassett, Miss Jennie Dickerson, Mr. Joseph Maas, Mr. Henry Guy, Mr. Farley Sinkins, Signor Ghilberti, and Mr. Barrington Foote; Pianoforte, Mr. Harvey Löhr and Signor Tito Mattei; violin, Mdlle. Anna Lang, Miss Bertha Brousil, and Signor Papini; violoncello, M. de Munck; double-bass, Signor Bottesini; organ, Dr. Spark; Conductors, Mr. Harvey Löhr and Signor Mattei.

THE twelfth Annual Festival of the London Church Choir Association will take place in St. Paul's Cathedral on Thursday, November 6, commencing at 7.30 p.m. A new Evening Service (in C major), composed specially for the occasion by Mr. Thomas Tallis Trimmell, Mus. Bac., Oxon., will be produced; and for the Anthem will be repeated Henry Smart's "Lord, Thou hast been our refuge," composed for and performed at one of the past meetings of the Association. The Service Book, which has just been published, also contains new hymn-tunes and chants, written for the occasion by Mr. E. H. Turpin and others.

THE Orchestral Society at Bromley (Kent) resumes, in increasing numbers, its weekly practice on Saturday, the 4th inst. For immediate rehearsal are chosen Mozart's Symphony in E flat, Handel's Overture to "Samson," Raff's "Festmarsch" (Op. 139), and Gounod's "Funeral March of a Marionette." The Plaistow and Bromley Choral Society likewise meets about the same time, and intends to begin its labours with Handel's "Let thy hand be strengthened" and Jensen's "Feast of Adonis." These will be soon followed by either Barnett's "Ancient Mariner" or Hofmann's "Melusina." Mr. F. Lewis Thomas is re-appointed Conductor of both Societies.

At a special General Meeting of the Gravesend and Milton Choral Association, held on the 9th ult., it was arranged to give three Concerts, under the direction of Mr. Charles R. Green, during the season 1884-85. At the first Mendelssohn's "Elijah" will be performed, the second will consist of a Miscellaneous Selection, and for the third the Committee will choose a new work by one of the living composers, in response to the favourable reception given to the production of Benedict's "Graziella" and Gounod's "Redemption." The season will commence during the present month.

MR. WILLIAMS gave a Concert, at the New Cross Hall, on August 30, which was well attended and highly appreciated. The feature of the evening was the production of an Operetta "A Cruise in the Bay of Biscay," words by Mr. Ernest A. Williams, and the music by Mr. A. G. Pritchard. The Operetta was preceded by a miscellaneous selection, in which Miss E. Pritchard won several encores, and Mr. Pritchard was very successful in his musical sketches. Mr. John Cross, Miss Perry, and Mr. Williams gave valuable aid.

AN American paper informs us that Mr. F. N. Crouch, composer of "Kathleen Mavourneen," "Dermot Astore," &c., is now engaged on an Autobiography, which will be called "Before and Behind the Scenes." The work will embrace sketches of theatrical authors, musical composers, painters, singers, and dancers during the present century. The first volume was completed many months ago, and the second is far advanced.

At the Tonyfelin Chapel, Caerphilly, on Wednesday evening, the 10th ult., Mr. Brinley Richards delivered a Lecture upon Ancient and Modern Music, interspersed with numerous pianoforte selections from the works of the great masters, illustrating the progress of music from the 15th to the 19th century. The lecturer gave his services gratuitously, as a compliment to the Rev. J. P. Davies, the pastor of the chapel. The vocal parts were rendered by Mr. Tom Felix and Llinos Rhondda, who were loudly applauded, and, in one instance, received an encore to which they responded.

A CONCERT was given at the Birkbeck Institution on the 3rd ult., by the members of the Violin Classes, under the direction of Mr. W. Fitzhenry. The rendering of the selections by the classes reflected much credit on the instructor, and received considerable applause. The vocalists, Miss Margaret Hoare, Mr. Edwin Bryant, and Mr. J. T. Hutchinson, were successful in their songs, &c., and Mr. T. E. Gatehouse won enthusiastic encores for his violin solos. The programme was varied by an excellent reading by Mr. W. E. George. Mrs. W. Fitzhenry and Mr. H. M. Higgs presided at the pianoforte.

MR. H. F. SCHRÖDER, formerly of St. George's Chapel, Windsor, who died at St. Albans (where he had been Organist of St. Peter's Church upwards of thirty years) on August 29, was a pupil of the late Mr. C. Lucas, and had proved himself an accomplished musician by the composition of several successful pianoforte pieces, a Sacred Cantata, and an unpublished Oratorio, "Gideon." His father, Charles Schröder, is the sole surviving member of the Private Bands of George IV., William IV., and her present Majesty.

We regret to announce the death of Mr. Thomas Wyatt Gunning, which took place at Ventnor, Isle of Wight, on the 14th ult. Although a barrister by profession, Mr. Gunning was a well-known amateur musician, and took the deepest interest in all matters relating to the art. He also occasionally contributed to the musical columns of the press, and many years ago was connected with THE MUSICAL TIMES.

THE Royal Victoria Hall and Coffee Tavern (long known as the Victoria Theatre) has now opened for the season. Amongst the attractive items promised are what are now termed "Variety Entertainments" and Lectures; Professor André's Alpine Choir, with soloists, being announced to appear every Monday evening. We trust that the enterprise shown by the managers of this Institution will meet with well-deserved reward.

THE prospectus of the Dover Harmonic Society promises three Concerts during the season 1884-85. Handel's "Messiah," Rossini's "Stabat Mater," Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," and J. F. Barnett's "Ancient Mariner" being the works selected for performance. The first Concert takes place on December 9.

MENDELSSOHN'S "Hymn of Praise" will be sung, with full orchestral accompaniment, at Holy Trinity, Tulse Hill, on Saturday, the 4th inst., in celebration of the annual Harvest Festival. The arrangements are in the hands of Mr. Humphrey J. Stark, Mus.B., Organist of Holy Trinity, who will conduct the Service and Cantata.

THE Organ Recital on the Albert Hall organ, in connection with the Health Exhibition, on Wednesday, the 3rd ult., was given by Mr. W. Pinney, whose performance included the March from Costa's "Eli," Chopin's Prelude in E minor, a selection from "Dinorah," and other items, all of which were much appreciated.

THE competition for the Henry Smart Scholarship took place at the Royal Academy of Music on the 25th ult. The examiners were Messrs. H. C. Lunn, Walter Macfarren, H. R. Rose, C. E. Stephens, and Sir G. A. Macfarren (Principal), Chairman. There were four candidates, and the scholarship was awarded to William John Kipps.

A HANDSOME timepiece was recently presented to Mr. F. E. Choveaux by members of the congregation of All Saints', Battersea, on the occasion of his resigning the office of Organist, which he has filled for four years and a half. A beautifully illuminated testimonial was also given to Mr. Choveaux.

THE Highbury Philharmonic Society announces four Concerts for the coming season. The works to be performed will be selected from Mr. C. H. Lloyd's new Cantata "Hero and Leander," Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night" and "Midsummer Night's Dream," Rossini's "Stabat Mater," Gade's "Crusaders," and Handel's "Alexander's Feast." The rehearsals commence on the 6th inst. Dr. J. F. Bridge retains his post as Conductor.

MR. HULBERT L. FULKERSON has returned to town from Cleveland, Ohio, where he has been singing with much success at the May Festival and also at a large number of Concerts with Madame Trebelli, Miss Beebe, Mr. Whitney, and others.

A CHORAL Festival will be held at the Church of St. Augustine and St. Faith, Watling Street, E.C., on Monday evening next, the 6th instant (St. Faith's Day), commencing at 7.30. At the conclusion of Evensong, Dr. Stainer's Cantata "The Daughter of Jairus" will be sung.

THE Anniversary Service in connection with the Guild of St. Luke will be held at St. Paul's Cathedral, on Friday evening, the 17th inst. (the eve of St. Luke's Day), at half-past seven. The musical arrangements will be entrusted to the choir of the Lay Helpers' Association.

THE Manningham Vocal Union, under the conductorship of Mr. James H. Rooks, announces for the thirteenth session Mr. C. Harford Lloyd's new Cantata "Hero and Leander," Jensen's "Feast of Adonis," and Sir Julius Benedict's "Graziella."

A PERFORMANCE of Mendelssohn's "Antigone" will be given at the Walworth Scientific and Literary Institution, on the 28th inst., under the conductorship of Mr. W. J. S. Gadsby. The English version of the drama, by W. Bartholomew, will be recited by eight elocutionists.

THE Auckland Musical Society commenced its practices on the 23rd ult., in the South Road Schoolroom, when Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" was put into rehearsal, the performance of the work being fixed for Tuesday, December 16.

THE Clapton Philharmonic Society will practise for the ensuing season A. C. Mackenzie's "Rose of Sharon" and "The Bride," C. Harford Lloyd's "Hero and Leander" and Jensen's "Feast of Adonis." Dr. Gordon Saunders is the Conductor.

REVIEWS.

Drei Lieder. Gedichte von O. Roquette. Englisch-Übersetzung von Mrs. D. V. Ashton, für Soprano oder Tenor, mit Begleitung des Pianoforte von Algernon Ashton. Op. 8. [Leipzig: Breitkopf and Härtel.]

THESE three songs, although truly German in feeling, should command an extensive sale amongst English vocalists, who now begin so thoroughly to appreciate the Lieder of Robert Franz as to make them turn aside from the conventional songs of the day. No. 1, "In der Fremde" ("In a strange land"), has a continuous independent pianoforte accompaniment, so inseparably woven in with the voice part as to demand perfect sympathy between singer and player; No. 2, "Waldruhe" ("The repose of the forest"), has an appropriately tranquil theme, charmingly accompanied; and No. 3, "Neuer Frühling" ("Youthful Spring"), is a joyous and animated song, which might take rank with many on the same subject by the standard writers. In all these pieces the treatment, both of voice and pianoforte, is so excellent as to appeal most decisively to an artistic audience; and we cannot too earnestly commend them to professional, as well as to high-class amateur singers.

Tarantelle for the Pianoforte. By Stephen Jarvis.
[B. Williams.]

THE conventional form for our modern specimens of dance tunes seems to be so decided that tolerably good performers could play one extempore. The Tarantella has always been a favourite, and when we say that any lively subject running along with two triplets in the bar, with occasional breaks, in the minor key, and a change in the middle of the piece into the tonic major, will satisfy eighteen listeners out of twenty, there can, perhaps, be no obvious reason why a composer should write for the other two, unless he really wishes to become a martyr to his art. Mr. Jarvis comes not before us for the first time as a composer of this style of piece, and we may conscientiously say that, although slavishly adhering to the model we have indicated, he has here given us a really good specimen of the Tarantella. The theme in A minor is full of life, and its repetition in A major is effective, though hardly laying claim to the merit of novelty. Both for practice and performance we recommend this piece to all amateurs with agile fingers.

Little Bo-Peep. Humorous Part-song for four voices. Composed by Harry Dancey. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

It is becoming quite the custom to compose nursery ditties as Part-songs and to set nursery tales as Cantatas. Like every other fashion, there is a danger of these compositions wearing out their welcome; but, judging from the specimen before us, Mr. Dancey has as much right to enter the field as many who have already achieved a success with such works. There is much feeling for the humour of the words displayed throughout this song, the treatment of the phrase "When she awoke, she found it a joke," especially, being extremely effective. If well sung, this little composition could not fail to be warmly received.

A Village Story. Song. Words by Mary Mark Lemon. Music by Jules de Sivrai.

[Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.]

ALTHOUGH, of course, the "old story," this unpretentious little ballad, both in words and music, will commend itself to all who love to tell a simple tale appropriately coloured for voice and pianoforte. The occasional alterations of time are effective, and the harmony to the line "The old church-bells are chiming," contrasts well with that which surrounds it, and sympathises happily with the feeling of the poetry.

Autumn Dreams. No. 1. For the Pianoforte. Composed by E. Clara Guillaïn. [Ambrose and Co.]

It appears that there are two numbers of "Autumn Dreams," but only one has reached us. This is a well written Adagio in C minor, having, as it indeed should have, all the effect of an improvisation. If this composer can give us any amount of pieces as refined and artistic as the one before us, they will be certain to make their way, even in this over-productive age.

Four Characteristic Pieces for the Pianoforte. By Henry Stiehl. [Goddard and Co.]

THESE are, perhaps, a little want of interest in these Sketches as pieces, but as Studies for touch and phrasing they are excellent. No. 4 is, perhaps, the most pleasing of the set, and for amateurs who cannot play as freely in C sharp minor as in more usual keys, it will be found excellent practice. All the pieces are written for somewhat advanced performers; but there is no undue display of technical power as a pianist, or scholastic knowledge as a theorist; and students desirous of adding to their stock of modern sterling music cannot do better than procure Mr. Stiehl's latest contribution to our rapidly increasing repertory.

Lament on the Death of His Royal Highness the late Duke of Albany. Composed for the Pianoforte by Lillie Albrecht. [Duncan Davison and Co.]

It is not often that occasional pieces live long after the occasion which called them forth has passed away; but this unpretentious little sketch may be conscientiously commended on its own merits; and being thoroughly within the reach of even moderate players who can command variety of touch, will no doubt become a general favourite.

Impromptu in F major. For the Pianoforte. By Charles Hallé. [Forsyth Brothers.]

As an able exponent of the thoughts of others, Mr. Hallé has so nobly earned a name in this country that he has a right to be heard when he addresses us in his own person. His reticence as a composer must increase our estimate of his modesty when we find so excellent a piece from his pen as the Impromptu before us. Imbued with a knowledge of, and love for, the classics of the pianoforte, and a consum-mate master of his instrument, we might reasonably expect that he could write nothing which would not be welcomed by musical listeners; but in this composition we have not only the grace and refinement of an accomplished artist, but the charm of melody which appeals to all; and although nimble fingers are indispensable for its due realisation, the piece will be certain to please even in that mixed assembly known as a "drawing-room audience."

Bonnie Lassie. Song. Written by Robert Allan. Composed by Arthur C. Haden.

[London Music Publishing Company.]

MR. HADEN has here given us a charmingly fresh and melodious little song, with just as much of the Scottish flavour as the words seem to suggest. The slightly varied harmony at the commencement of the second verse is extremely effective. We shall be glad again to welcome a composer who can provide us with such pure and healthy vocal trifles in these troublous musical days.

Bach's Sacred Air, "My heart ever faithful." Transcribed for the Pianoforte by Berthold Tours.

[Weekes and Co.]

THE more students are trained to "sing" on the pianoforte the better; and this is why we always look with favour upon "Transcriptions" of vocal pieces, of course always assuming that the music is worth transcribing, and that the task is performed by a thoroughly competent artist. Both these conditions are fulfilled in the composition before us; and we cannot therefore too strongly recommend it to pianists of classical taste. Bach's beautiful air is too well known to need any comment upon its merits from us; and the attractive manner in which Mr. Tours has arranged it for our household instrument should ensure for it a wide acceptance.

How to excel in Singing and Elocution. A Manual for Lady-Students. By Jessie Murray-Clark.

[Cramer and Co.]

We cannot say that we see anything original in this book; but the facts gleaned from more important essays will be found carefully arranged, and throughout her work the authoress shows an intimate practical knowledge of the subject. The remarks on Elocution are extremely good.

Overture to Sir Frederick Ouseley's Oratorio "Hagar." Arranged for the Organ by B. W. Horner.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

IN our last issue we noticed an organ arrangement of Sir F. G. Ouseley's Overture to "St. Polycarp." Here is a transcription of the prelude to the later oratorio, which it may be remembered was produced at the Hereford Festival in 1873. Structurally, it consists of an introductory Maestoso pomposo in E minor, leading to an allegro in the same key, both in common time. The principal movement is very spirited, the flowing and tuneful second subject, however, affording the requisite relief. The Overture comes to a bright conclusion in the major key. In general, the style is more modern than might be expected, and the piece would form an effective item in the programmes of organ recitals.

Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis in A. By John E. West.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS may be declared, without hesitation, to be one of the best settings of the evening canticles recently produced. Mr. West is evidently a sound musician, and he has apparently studied the music of our classic church composers with advantage. In the combined vigour and solidity of his music his service is somewhat suggestive of the style of Goss, but he indulges more freely in abrupt transitions of key and in chromatic progressions. He never, however, permits liberty to degenerate into license, and his work may, therefore, be commended alike to conservative and progressive choirmasters.

FOREIGN NOTES.

A NEW opera by Herr Wilhelm Freudenberg, entitled "Cleopatra," is shortly to be brought out at the Bremen Stadt-Theater, whereof Herr Angelo Neumann, the energetic impresario of the, now defunct, so-called "Wagner Theater," is at present the managing director. Wagner's

"Nibelungen" will also be produced here during the season. Herr Neumann, it must be admitted, fills his new post with zeal and ability, and is likely to raise the hitherto obscure operatic establishment of Bremen to a position of eminence in Northern Germany, similar to that acquired for its sister Hansa-town, Hamburg, by director Pollini. We heartily wish Herr Neumann every success. Decentralisation, whatever its drawbacks in a political sense, has rendered an immense assistance to the development of art in Germany in past years, when every ruler of a principality, however small, took a pride in fostering its progress or at all events maintained an establishment around which such tendencies might cluster and constitute it at any moment into an artistic centre, recognised as such by the entire musical world. Now that the German Empire has been firmly established, politically, it is a matter of congratulation for art-lovers generally to notice that, so far from the residential theatres of the minor states materially suffering in their artistic influence by the change, renewed activity is being displayed by not a few of them, while some of the purely municipal establishments, notably those of Hamburg, Leipzig, Frankfurt, and Bremen, have within the last few years either already become or are in a fair way of becoming distinct centres of musico-dramatic art. Hence, although a number of high-minded dramatic artists have within recent times constituted themselves into a company for the establishment of a model German stage (Deutsches Theater) at Berlin, no similar attempt has, as yet, been made in the new German capital as regards the lyrical drama, and decentralisation in this direction still flourishes. Long may it continue to do so!

We extract the following from a recent number of the Allgemeine Deutsche Musik Zeitung:—"The approaching Berlin Concert season bids fair to prove one of exceptional activity. The prospectus of the Philharmonische Gesellschaft alone foreshadows such a quantity of orchestral and solo performances as to scarcely leave room, one would think, for other similar undertakings. And yet, the proposed twenty Philharmonic Concerts form but a fraction, though, of course, an important one, of the sum total of projected Concerts for or with orchestra. Thus, the artists of the orchestra of the Royal Opera will hold their annually recurring ten or twelve Symphony-Soirées; the Wagner Society, the Sing-Akademie, the Stern'sche Gesangverein, and several minor Societies will have their usual Concert evenings, to say nothing of chamber-music, vocal quartet, and virtuoso performances. The fact that more general use is to be made during the coming season of the hall of the 'Philharmonic' must be distinctly welcomed in the interests of the musical life of the metropolis. In addition to a portion of the Concert series of the Philharmonische Gesellschaft, the public performances of the Wagner Society, of the Stern'sche Gesangverein, of the Cäcilien-Verein, and doubtless also of some other Societies, will in future be held in the newly decorated and enlarged hall of the 'Philharmonic,' whereby the long-standing question as to a suitable locality has been set at rest, at any rate for a time. The Concerts of the Philharmonische Gesellschaft will be divided into four series, the first two of which will be under the protectorate of the Royal Academy of Arts, and will be conducted by Professor Joachim, in the hall of the Sing-Akademie. The two remaining series are to be held in the Philharmonic, under the direction respectively of Professor Dr. Franz Wüllner and Professor K. Klindworth; the final Concert to take place on March 27, 1885. Besides the above, four extra Concerts are announced during the season. The following is the array of artists who will appear as solo performers in the course of these Concerts:—Professor Joachim, Professor Auer, Herren Stanislaw, Barcewicz, J. Ondricek, Madame Norman-Néruda (violin), Herr D. Popper (violoncello), Professor Leschetizky, Mesdames Sophie Menter, Montigny-Rémaury, Annette Esaipoff and Clara Schumann, Herren Alfred Grünfeld, Camille Saint-Saëns, Eugen d'Albert, Hans von Bülow and Franz Rummel (pianoforte); Herren Georg Henschel, Staudigl, Gudenus, and Winkelmann; Mesdames Henschel, Malten, Rosa Papier, Spies, and Rosa Sucher (vocalists), besides numerous others. The Wagner Society will give its usual two Concerts, under the direction of Professor Klindworth, and the Stern'sche Gesangverein has planned four public performances under the conductorship of Professor Rudorff, the first to consist of Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul,' the second of Handel's 'Samson,' the third of scenes from Gluck's 'Orpheus,' and Bruch's 'Schön Ellen,' and the final one of Bach's St. Matthew Passion music, the latter to take place in the Garnison-Kirche. The Cäcilien Verein contemplates the production of Robinstejn's 'Paradise Lost,' and of the new choral work 'Sakuntala,' by Philipp Scharwenka."

A separate performance of Wagner's "Parsifal," with King Louis of Bavaria as the sole audience, is intended to be held at the Munich Hof-Theater next month.

At the Leipzig Stadt-Theater 219 performances of Opera took place during the past season, including the first production on any stage of Goldschmidt's "Heliantus," Nessler's "Der Trompeter von Säckingen," and Bungert's "Die Studenten von Salamanka." The season just commenced at the establishment in question is to include, as specially attractive features of its répertoire, Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde," Schumann's "Genoëve," Holstein's "Haideschacht," and Reinecke's "König Manfred."

The new Schwerin Hof-Theater, erected on the site of the building which some few years ago was destroyed by fire, is approaching its completion, and will probably be inaugurated during the coming winter. The entire framework of the new edifice consists of either stone or iron, whereby the danger arising from fire is reduced to a minimum. The roof also is constructed of iron, and is said to present a very ornamental appearance. The Schwerin stage, it will be remembered, was one of the first to produce Wagner's "Ring des Nibelungen" in Germany, after the memorable first production of that gigantic work in 1876 at Bayreuth.

Gounod's early opera "Philéon et Baucis" was revived on the 4th ult., with great success, at the Dresden Hof-Theater.

Nessler's new opera, "Der Trompeter von Säckingen," was produced at the opening performance of the present season at the Bremen Stadt-Theater, and was received with at least as much favour as on the occasion of the first representation of the work at Leipzig.

The interesting posthumous opera by Otto Claudius, "Der Gang nach dem Eisenhammer" (referred to in our last number), recently performed at the theatres of Namburg and Halle, is likewise to be produced during next season at Berlin, Dresden, and Leipzig.

Another posthumous opera, that of "König Hiarne," by Marschner, first brought out some time since at the Munich Hof-Theater, will also make the round of German operatic stages during the coming winter.

Herr August Wilhelmj, the world-famed violin virtuoso, is about to establish, at his private residence in Wiesbaden, a "high school for violin playing," which will be officially opened in May next. A few select pupils, however, are already receiving instruction there, and are forming a nucleus of what is likely to become a very flourishing art institution.

Herr Franz Rummel, the eminent pianist, has accepted a professorship at the well-known Sternsche Conservatorium at Berlin.

A new edition is just now being published, in twelve separate parts (by Otto Zanke, of Berlin), of A. B. Marx's "Life and work of Ludwig van Beethoven," edited and revised by Dr. Gustav Behnke. Marx was a contemporary of the giant interpreter of absolute music whose life he attempted to portray; and the fact of a new edition of his work having been thought advisable, while reiterating the generally acknowledged merits of it, likewise serves to remind us of the still existing want, notwithstanding the most able recent researches, of an exhaustive standard biography of the greatest master of his art in modern days.

A score edition, as well as a pianoforte transcription of "The Messiah" is about to be published by the well-known Leipzig firm of F. Kistner. The interest attaching to this new issue of Handel's masterpiece is derived from the fact that the editor is Herr Robert Franz, a musician whose special competency for the task cannot for a moment be questioned. Herr Franz's score, will, we are informed, be based upon the added orchestration supplied, with a reverend hand, by Mozart, and will likewise contain some amplifications of his own. In regard to the latter, the editor is doubtless aware that he is treading on delicate ground, and that his undertaking will give rise to some justifiable criticism on the part more especially of purists, who object, on principle, to the touching up of the "old masters."

The State subventioned theatres of Berlin, in accordance with a royal decree lately published, will be in future illuminated by the electric light.

At the Paris Grand Opéra, little of importance to the musical world generally has taken place during last month. The principal operas performed were "Freischütz," "Le Prophète," "Faust," "Les Huguenots," "L'Africaine," and "Robert le Diable." Meyerbeer, one of the co-creators of that encyclopædian spectacle known as "grand opera," still predominates, as will be noticed from the above répertoire. In "Faust," Mlle. Isaac, after a prolonged absence from the French capital, made her rentrée this season, and was very well received. The Opéra Comique recommenced its performances on the 1st ult., with Bizet's "Carmen," with Madame Galli-Marié in the title rôle. Mozart's "Zauberflöte," and Boïeldieu's "Le Calife de Bagdad," are to be revived by this institution during the present season. Altogether, however, the lyrical drama generally is not likely to receive a fresh impetus from these two representative French institutions for the next few months.

A revival of what may be justly called Gluck's romantic opera, "Armida," is contemplated by the director of the Paris National Opéra, M. Vaucorbeil. It being thought advisable, however, to revise the orchestration of the work for the purpose of adapting it to modern stage requirements, M. Gounod was asked to undertake the task, a request which—very wisely, we think—he has altogether declined.

We shall not be at all surprised if Wagner's "Die Meistersinger," truly and essentially German as that work is from beginning to end, will, after all, prove to be the herald of a general acceptance of the poet-composer's works in France, where so much foolish opposition is even now being exhibited in some quarters to the dead master, on account of his nationality. A representation of this masterly picture of honest German Philistine life during the middle ages, Shakespearian in spirit, and supported musically by all the subtleties of Wagnerian art, is, as already mentioned in these columns, in course of active preparation at Brussels, with the French version of the book from the pen of M. Victor Wilder. With regard to this forthcoming performance, Le Ménestrel remarks: "This will prove a most interesting event, since, of all Wagner's operas, 'Die Meistersinger' is the one which is most easily transferred upon the French stage, and which, moreover, is least hostile to our ideas concerning the musical drama." Least hostile! as if true art, which is of no country, were to be judged upon such narrow considerations by educated France. Our neighbours across the channel are gifted with a quick perception and appreciation of the truly national in works of art, and the new French version of Wagner's "Meistersinger" having once been successfully brought out in Belgium, the production and intelligent appreciation in the French capital of one of the artistic masterpieces of all ages will, we venture to predict, in the interest of Frenchmen themselves, follow as a matter of course.

An interesting exhibition of musical instruments, illustrative of the history of instrumentation, is projected to take place next month at Paris. A series of historical Concerts, in connection therewith, is likewise promised, and the undertaking bids fair to prove a very successful one.

A commemorative tablet is to be affixed to the house No. 42, Rue Mazarine, at Paris, where, some two hundred years ago, the first performance of a French grand opera took place, and which is therefore looked upon as the original home of the present national institution. The opera produced on that occasion (on March 13, 1671, according to some authorities, though there is some uncertainty about the exact date) was one in five acts, entitled "Pomone," with words by Perrin, and the music by Cambert. It proved immensely successful, remaining upon the répertoire for a period of eight months.

Madame Sophie Menter has accepted the professorship at the Conservatoire of St. Petersburg, which post had been rendered vacant by the death of M. Louis Brassin.

Herr Niels Gade is just now engaged upon writing an orchestral Suite, to be entitled "Holbergiana," in connection with the bi-centenary of the birth of the poet Holberg, which will be celebrated in December next, at Copenhagen.

A musical conservatoire—the first institution of the kind ever established in Holland—was inaugurated last month at Amsterdam, in connection with the society "Tot Bevordering der Toonkunst," and aided by a small grant from the municipal authorities. The director of the young institution is Herr Franz Coenen.

A series of lectures on musical subjects, delivered on different occasions by King Oscar of Sweden, in his capacity of President of the Royal Academy of Music at Stockholm, is about to be published collectively, together with some chorals from the same illustrious pen. A German edition of the work is likewise in course of preparation.

The first public Concert of the pupils of the new Academy of Music, founded by Rossini (in accordance with the testamentary directions of the master), at his native town, Pesaro, has recently taken place, the result, according to the Italian press organs, being a most satisfactory one. The young institution is conducted by the maestro Pedrotti.

The Milan music publisher, Signor Sonzogno, has, it is stated, purchased a posthumous opera by Halévy, entitled "Noë," which in all probability will be first brought out on an Italian stage. The opera in question had been left by the composer of "La Juive" in a completely finished state, with the exception of the details of orchestration. The latter had been supplied, soon after Halévy's death, by his son-in-law, Georges Bizet, the popular composer of "Carmen." A double interest thus attaches to this posthumous work of a composer whose versatile talent contributed not a little to the glorification of the Paris Grand Opéra in the palmy days of the empire, and whose latest production, whatever its merits, should, one would think, not have been allowed to be performed for the first time anywhere outside of France.

The sentence in our Turin paragraph of "Foreign Notes" in our last issue, making it appear as if Signor Mancinelli had conducted both the Neapolitan and the Bolognese orchestras, should, in part, have run thus: "Both the Neapolitan and the Bolognese orchestras having produced a most marked effect under the conductorship respectively of the Maëstri Martucci and Mancinelli."

At Madrid died the well-known dramatic author Garcia Gutierrez, whose "El Trovador" was the drama upon which the libretto of Verdi's "Il Trovatore" is constructed.

CORRESPONDENCE.

JUBILEE OF THE MUSICAL OPENING OF THE BIRMINGHAM TOWN HALL IN OCTOBER, 1834.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—The month of October will bring us to the Jubilee of the opening of the Birmingham Town Hall, in October, 1834. In the Musical Library for November, 1834, pp. 88-94, we have a full account of the musical performances on October 7, 8, 9, and 10, 1834, and the names of all the performers. On the evening of October 8, was performed the late Chevalier Neukomm's Oratorio "David," composed for that occasion. On the previous evening, he had performed his own organ Fantasia, "A lake scene interrupted by a thunder-storm." On the evening of October 8, at the theatre, was performed his Concertante, for flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon, horn, trumpet, and double-bass, by Messrs. Nicholson, Cooke, Willman, Mackintosh, Platt, Harper, and Dragonetti. I am told that this Concertante is to be found in score in a German edition of his works. The double-bass part used, I believe, to be occasionally taken by Andre (who was at Birmingham) on his keyed-serpent. The Concertante was preceded by Neukomm's spirited song "The British Oak," which was well sung by Mr. Machin. Of the fourteen principal singers, I believe that Madame Clara Novello alone survives. I may add that the contralto songs and parts were taken by two male counter-tenor singers, Messrs. Hawkins and Terrail.

Yours, &c.,

AN AMATEUR.

THE ORGAN AT CANTERBURY CATHEDRAL.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—I was much pleased with the paragraph which appeared in your last issue relative to Canterbury Cathedral Organ, and most heartily endorse your remarks on the insufficiency of such an organ to the requirements of our Cathedral music. The subscriptions towards the new instrument flow in very tardily (at present the amount is only £1,508), and unless some kind friend, or friends, come forward liberally it will still be some years before the desired object is attained—£3,150. It may not be generally known that the manuals ascend only to E, that the swell also only descends to tenor C, and that the pedal organ (?) contains but one octave!

It is surely needless to say more to show how necessary it is for a new organ to be built for our splendid Cathedral. The Dean and Chapter have no available funds to devote to this object, and they are now assisting me in every way to attain the desired end. Subscription lists are open, and any donations may be paid to the Fund through the banks here, or by cheque to myself or any member of the Committee. Apologising for intruding so much on your valuable space,—I remain, yours faithfully,

W. H. LONGHURST.

The Precincts, Canterbury, Sept. 22, 1884.

In a letter from Dr. A. H. Mann, which appeared in our last number, the writer's address—King's College, Cambridge—was inadvertently omitted.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

* * Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur. Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all Subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

ARTHUR PEARSON.—Dr. E. Hodges was born at Bristol, July 20, 1796. Clementi died at Evesham, March 9, 1832.

F. HERBERT.—You should apply to the Secretary.

EDOUARD.—Novello, Ewer and Co., 1, Berners Street, W.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

ABERFELDY, N.B.—An Organ Recital was given in St. David's Episcopal Church, on the 11th ult., by Mr. Jesse Timson, Organist and Choirmaster to Sir Robert Menzies, Bart. The programme included the Sonata in C minor (Mendelssohn); Prelude and Fugue, in C minor (Bach); "Hallstone" chorus (Handel), Offertoire in G (Wély), "Quasi Pastorale" (Smart), &c.

BANGOR, IRELAND.—A Concert was given in the Good Templar Hall, on the 15th ult., under the direction of Mr. W. J. Kempton, of Belfast. The vocalists, Miss M'Mechan, Miss Mitchell, Miss Agar, Mr. Kenneth Stewart, Mr. J. Young, and Mr. W. J. Devers won much applause, as did also Mrs. Hyde (solo pianoforte), and Mr. Haines and Mr. Swanton (violin). A choir of sixteen voices gave a selection of part-songs, and the programme was varied by two recitations by Mr. R. O. Stanley. The hall was crowded.

BOLTON.—On Saturday, the 13th ult., Mr. S. W. Pilling opened a new organ in Little Lever Church, and on the same day Organ Recitals were recommended in the Bolton Town Hall by Mr. W. Mullineux.—The principal event of the month has been a Festival of Sacred Song, held in the Town Hall, on Wednesday, the 17th ult., under the auspices of the Bolton Congregational Sunday School Union. The object of the promoters was to improve congregational singing, and, to further this laudable view, they included in the programme several well-known hymns, which were sung with evident feeling and unanimity. A choir of 300 voices, selected from the several Congregational Chapels in the town (the Borough Organist at the instrument), joined with marked heartiness in the pieces allotted to them, and the solos, duets, and quartets were well rendered. Mr. James Smethurst, leader of the United Choir, composed a number of pieces specially for the occasion.

CHELTENHAM.—Harvest Festival Services were held at St. Mary's Church, Charlton Kings, on the 18th and 21st ult., the Services being fully choral. At the high celebration Helmore's arrangement of Merbecke's Service was sung. For the Anthem a selection was taken from Weber's Jubilee (Harvest) Cantata, solo by the Rev. Nigel Brown, and Gounod's "Sing praises unto the Lord." The singing of the choir was of marked excellence, showing the careful training of the Choirmaster, Mr. C. Baldwin, and the Organist, Mr. E. Artwood.

DUNSTER.—On Sunday, the 7th ult., the Annual Harvest Festival was celebrated in the Parish of Dunster. The services commenced with a celebration of the Holy Communion, at 8 a.m. in the Priory Church, followed by a second celebration in the Parish Church at midday. Matins and Evensong (fully choral), took place at 11 a.m. and 6.30 p.m., the preachers respectively being the Rev. R. Utten Todd (Rector of Dunster), and the Rev. E. J. Houghton, of St. Luke's, Torquay. The musical portion of the services was efficiently rendered by the Choir, and included "Thou visitest the earth," Dr. Greene (solo by Rev. R. Utten Todd); "Ye shall dwell in the land," Dr. Stainer (solos by Rev. J. Utten Todd and Dr. Clark); and Services by Goss and Bunnett. Mr. J. Warriner, L. Mus. T.C.L., &c., presided at the organ, and after Evensong performed selections from Mendelssohn's Third Organ Sonata, Finale to Wély's First Organ Sonata, &c.

EASTBOURNE.—The Annual Benefit Concert of Mr. Julian Adams took place on Wednesday evening, the 3rd ult., before a large audience, including the Crown Princess of Sweden. The solo vocalists were Miss Agnes Larkom, Madame Enriquez, and Mr. Chiller, all of whom were highly appreciated. Miss Anita Paggi was very successful in her flute solos, and Mr. Adams's pianoforte playing was a feature of the Concert. Mr. S. G. R. Coles was an efficient accompanist.

ENNSKILLAN.—Mr. Matthew Arnold's Matinée Musicale was given in the Protestant Hall, on the 17th ult., the executors being Miss Edith Arnold (aged 11), Master Charles Haydn Arnold (aged 13), and Mr. Matthew Arnold. Considerable surprise was manifested at the talent displayed by Master and Miss Arnold. A well arranged programme was excellently rendered and much admired by a select and appreciative audience.

ERITH.—Harvest Thanksgiving Services were held on Sunday, the 21st ult., at the Parish Church, which has lately been restored at a cost of £7,000, the edifice having been built in the twelfth century. The services were fully choral, the Te Deum, &c., being smart in F. Birch's Athanasian Creed had a fine effect. Bunnett in F was the evening service. The Anthem both morning and evening was "The wilderness" (Goss), the solo parts of which were efficiently rendered by Messrs. W. L. Hodgson and James Anderson. Mr. William Sanderson (organist) conducted. The proceeds of the offertory and the fruit, &c., were devoted to the Erith Cottage Hospital. The sermons, both morning and evening, were preached by the Rev. T. W. Hardy, vicar.

EXETER.—The People's Concerts were resumed on Saturday evening, the 6th ult., in the Victoria Hall. The instrumental selections were well played by the Royal Marine Band, under the direction of their Conductor, Herr Froehner. Solos were contributed by Mr. Tocker (flute), Mr. Eilford (cornet), and Mr. E. T. Meester (pianoforte). The principal vocalist was Miss Marian Helmore.

FALMOUTH.—On Saturday evening, the 20th ult., a Musical Entertainment was given in aid of the benefit fund for the inmates at the St. Paul's Retreat. The part-songs and choruses were well sung by the Saints' day Choir of All Saints' Church. A feature in the Concert was the excellent violin and pianoforte performance of Miss Adela Duckham, ten years of age, a student of the Guildhall School of Music. Solo solos were contributed with much success by Messrs. Vinson, Hills, and Chard; Mr. Reginald A. Shoosmith gave a violoncello piece, and Messrs. Rogers and Bishop, at the pianoforte and harmonium respectively, gave admirable renderings of two of Mendelssohn's "Lieder ohne Worte." The Concert was under the conductorship of Mr. W. J. Shoosmith.

FILEY.—A Concert in aid of the restoration of the Parish Church was given in the Spa Saloon, on Tuesday, the 9th ult. Miss Annie Marriott, who kindly gave her assistance, was highly successful in Gounod's "Worker," "The Bailiff's daughter," and "Robin Adair." Several amateurs of considerable ability also gave their aid.

FOLKESTONE.—The octave comprising the Dedication Festival of St. Mary's was brought to a close on Monday, the 15th ult., by the performance of Gault's Holy City, with an augmented choir, supported by the organ and strings, under the conductorship of the Organist, Mr. Dugard. The Vicar, after an opening prayer, delivered a short address, in which he invited the large congregation present to regard the music not as an entertainment to be listened to critically, but rather as a devotional service offered up to God in the presence of His people and in His house. The solos were given by Mr. Kempton and Mr. Horace Pope in excellent form. Miss Daly presided at the organ, and the performance was most successfully carried out.—On Tuesday evening, the 16th ult., a Concert was given in the Wesleyan Chapel, by Mr. H. S. Roberts, Mr. J. R. C. Roberts officiating as Conductor and leader of the orchestra. The solo vocalists were Miss E. Phillips and Mr. Clements. Miss Phillips was highly successful in "Let the bright seraphim," "From mighty Kings," and Costa's "I will extol Thee." The orchestral portions of the programme were well rendered. The Concert, which was in aid of the organ fund, was thoroughly appreciated.

FROGMORE, HERTS.—Mr. John C. Ward gave a Recital, at Holy Trinity Church, on the 15th ult., on the new organ erected by Messrs. Hele and Co. There was a large attendance of parishioners and gentry from the neighbourhood of St. Albans. Handley's "Comfort ye" and "Every valley" (sung by Mr. Ward) and Mendelssohn's Organ Sonata No. 7, were special features in the Recital, which gave great satisfaction.

HARROW WEALD.—The annual Harvest Festival was held in the Parish Church on Thursday evening, the 4th ult. The service was fully choral, the prayers being intoned by the Rev. T. M. Everett, Vicar of Ruislip. The Canticles were sung to Stainer's setting in F, the Anthem being the chorus "Lovely appear," from The Redemption, the solo in which was finely sung by Master F. Charlton. The whole of the music was excellently rendered, and reflected the greatest credit on the choir. The sermon was preached by the Rev. A. M. Maynard, of Wembley. Mr. Kenneth J. Tarrant, Organist and Director of the Choir, presided at the organ throughout.

HUNGERFORD.—An Organ Recital, in connection with the Home Missions, was given in the Parish Church on Wednesday, the 3rd ult., by Mr. G. H. Swift, the Organist. The programme, which was well selected, was excellently rendered and highly appreciated.

HURSTPIERPONT.—The Harvest Thanksgiving Festival was held in the Parish Church, on the 10th ult. The morning service opened with hymn 382. The Psalms and Canticles were sung to chants by Honkins, Crotch, Gauntlett, and others. The anthem was "The earth is the Lord's," by Albert Lowe, and hymn 381 was the recessional. The choir sang with precision and care. As a concluding voluntary the Organist (H. C. Young, B.A., Cantab.) played Calkin's Harvest Thanksgiving March. The Choral Society held its first practice meeting for the season on the 17th ult.

LANCASTER.—The second of a series of Organ Recitals was given in the High Street Independent Chapel, on Tuesday evening, the 16th ult., by Mr. William Stuart, Organist. Vocal solos were contributed by Miss Smith and Mr. Sykes. The selection comprised compositions by Morandi, Gade, Handel, Smart, Wélv, and Fuzagalli.

LEEDS.—The first Organ Concert of the season attracted a large audience to the Town Hall on the 13th ult. Dr. Spark's selections included the March from Beethoven's Reiss of Acheron, Handel's Concerto in F, Bach's Grand Prelude and Fugue in C minor, and a selection from Haydn's Creatioes. The Leeds Harmonic Union gave several glees and part-songs, including a new chorus for male voices, "Ring out, ye crystal spheres," by Dr. Spark.

MANNINGHAM.—A series of special Services was commenced at St. Luke's Church, on the 10th ult., in connection with the dedication of a new organ (built by Mr. J. J. Binns, of Bramley), which has been presented to the church by Mr. J. Ambler and Mr. James Wood. The Recitals were given by Mr. F. C. Atkinson, Mus. Bac., Organist of Norwich Cathedral, Mr. J. H. Rooks, Organist of St. Paul's, Manningham, and by the Organist of the church, Mr. J. H. Loveless.

MELBOURNE.—At the Metropolitan Liedertafel Concert, on July 27, at the Town Hall, Mendelssohn's music to Sophocles' Greek Drama Edipus was given, with all the necessary adjuncts, including a complete orchestra, double chorus, and eight dramatic reciters. The performance was extremely good throughout; and much credit is due to the care and intelligence displayed by the Conductor, Mr. Julius Herz. The second part of the programme commenced with Pratten's Concert-stück for the flute, finely played by Mr. John Radcliff, who at the conclusion was presented by Judge Casey, President of the Society, with the highest award they have the power to bestow—their golden lyre, which has never before been given to any outside the members of the Society, except to artists of the highest distinction, and the speaker congratulated the recipient upon being absolutely without a rival. The vocalists were Mrs. Armstrong and Mr. Armes Beaumont, who were warmly received, Madame Elmlad giving an excellent rendering of Liszt's First Piano-forte Concerto.

NOTTINGHAM.—The fortieth anniversary of the opening of St. Barnabas' Cathedral, was celebrated on Sunday, August 31, with great ceremony. The Mass selected was Henry Farmer's in B flat, which the composer conducted. The solo vocalists were Miss J. Chambers, Miss Shearston, Mr. L. Gregory, and Mr. J. Taylor. The solo during the offertory was admirably sung by the Rev. Father Burns. Mr. W. Gregory presided at the organ, and Mr. A. R. Watson led the band. The sermon was preached by the Bishop. After the service, Father Burns presented Mr. Farmer with an exquisite ivory and silver bâton, as a slight acknowledgment of the friendly interest he had always taken in the choir of St. Barnabas.

RAMS-GATE.—An Organ Recital was given at Christ Church, on Wednesday, the 17th ult., by Dr. Longhurst, Organist of Canterbury Cathedral. A very good selection, including the overture to the "Occasional Oratorio"; Prelude and Fugue in G, Op. 37, Mendelssohn; Toccata, D minor, and Fugue, D Major, Bach; and the "Hallelujah Chorus," from Beethoven's Mount of Olives, were well rendered. The organ, built by Messrs. Walker and Sons, of London, has recently been enlarged by Mr. Brown, organ builder, of Deal, and considerable improvement has been made by the addition of several choice stops. Dr. Longhurst played in excellent style, and displayed to advantage the good qualities of the organ. A collection was made in aid of the organ fund.

ROMFORD.—The annual Harvest Festival at St. Edward's Church was held on the evening of the 24th ult. The service was fully choral, and was well rendered by a choir of about forty voices. Dr. Bunnett's Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in F were used, and the anthems were "The Heavens are telling" (Haydn) and the "Hallelujah Chorus" (Handel). The music was under the direction of Mr. W. G. Bayley, the Organist.

SAINT ASAPH.—A morning and evening Concert, under the patronage of the Lord Lieutenants of the counties of Denbigh and Flint, were given at the National Schools, on Tuesday, the 9th ult., by Miss Minnie Jones, R.A.M., assisted by Miss Jeanie Rosse, Messrs. T. Bartley, J. L. Williams, Felix C. Watkins, and T. Ashford, vocalists; solo violin, Miss Stephenson; pianist, Miss Fanny Webb, R.A.M. Well-selected programmes were admirably rendered. Miss Jones met with a warm reception, and, considering that these were the first Concerts given by her, she is to be congratulated upon her success.

SALTBURN-BY-THE-SEA.—A Concert was given in the Ruby Street Hall on Monday evening, the 22nd ult., by the Greenbank Choir of Darlington. Mr. W. Hodgson (violin) and Mr. C. Stephenson (piano-forte) contributed instrumental pieces, and Mr. W. Heald conducted. There was a large audience.

SANDWICH.—On Wednesday, the 10th ult., an evening Concert was given in the Assembly Rooms by Mr. Frank May, assisted by Miss Margaret Hoare, Miss Eleanor Rees, Mr. W. H. Cummings (vocalists), Mr. H. C. Tonking (violin), and Mr. W. G. Wood, F.C.O. (piano). A well-selected programme was efficiently carried out, and the artists fully maintained their high reputation. There was a select and appreciative audience.

SHREWSBURY.—The St. John's Choral Society's first rehearsal of the third season, will take place on Tuesday evening, the 7th inst., under the musical conductorship of Mr. Arthur W. Marchant, Mus. B., Oxon., F.C.O., Organist and Choirmaster of the Parish Church.

TYNEMOUTH.—Under the auspices of the Tynemouth Recreation Association, and with the kind permission of Major Stephenson, M.P., the Band of the 3rd Durham Artillery Volunteers (under the direction of Mr. T. Robinson) gave an excellent Concert in the Aquarium, on the 5th ult. The vocalists were Mrs. J. Miller and Mr. W. Sewell, of South Shields. An interesting programme was well rendered.

WESTBURY-ON-SVERN.—Miss Morgan, of Newnham, gave a Concert, on Thursday, the 18th ult. Miss A. T. Jones, harpist (silver medallist, R.A.M.), played two solos with much taste and skill, and joined Miss Goyen in a duet for harp and piano. Miss Mabel Woods was very successful in two violin solos, and Misses Mary, Annie, Gwyneth, and Mildred Morgan, contributed several songs and duets. Mr. John Hunt, of Gloucester, conducted, and also sang a song of his own composition, and Mr. William Morgan gave "The Fisher Boy," by Miss Mabel Woods, which was encored. Amongst others who assisted were Messrs. Hart, Ashwood, John Morgan, and Frank Morgan; Miss Goyen, Miss Woods, and Mr. W. H. Morgan acted as accompanists.

WOLVERHAMPTON.—The engagement of Miss Eleanor Falkner at the Exhibition on Wednesday evening, the 17th ult., was very successful, a large audience being attracted to the main court by the announcement of her name, in addition to the much-improved band of Mr. C. F. Hayward. Miss Falkner sang several popular and some new items in an artistic manner, and won several hearty encores.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. Walter H. Hall, Organist and Musical Director to St. Luke's, Germantown, Philadelphia, U.S.A.—Mr. John C. Ward, Organist and Choirmaster to Holy Trinity Church, Haverstock Hill, N.W.—Mr. Fred. W. Saville, to St. Mary's, Dublin.—Mr. H. S. Vincent, to Bishopwearmouth Church, Sunderland.—Mr. Alfred W. # THE HOLY CITY

A SACRED CANTATA

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"The work is an honour to English Art, and has elevated its composer into a place of distinction amongst native musicians."—Queen.

"A good sound musical work is this 'Holy City.' I have no hesitation in saying that it creditably represents English art, and does honour not only to the skill but to the judgment and taste of Mr. Gaul."—Daily Telegraph.

"The reception was favourable in the extreme, and the Cantata must henceforth be classed among the successes which the Birmingham Musical Festivals have brought to light."—Standard.

"The 'Holy City' is evidently the work of a thoughtful as well as a clever composer, and should make its mark among thoroughly English productions of a sacred character."—Musical Times.

"We hope and believe that the reception given last night to Mr. Gaul and to his 'Holy City' Cantata will prove an earnest of its popularity and acceptance throughout the length and breadth of the land."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"A most interesting, tuneful, and scholarly work."—Manchester Courier.

"This fine work will considerably enhance Mr. Gaul's reputation as a musician."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

Vocal Score, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; Ditto, paper boards, 3s.; Ditto, scarlet cloth, 4s.; Voice parts, for the use of Choral Societies, each 1s. A selection of Soprano and Contralto Movements for School Use, 1s. 3d. Band Parts on Loan. Tonic Sol-fa Edition, 1s.

London: NOVELLO, EWER and Co.

RUTH

Words by EDWARD OXFORD

Music by ALFRED R. GAUL.

"Ruth' is a work of sterling power; its musical form is that of perfect tunefulness combined with simplicity and strength. There is nothing involved about it, nor the least straining after unattainable effects. The composer has grasped his theme in a thoroughly sympathetic manner, and has produced a work which is worthy of the subject. . . . One of the sweetest numbers in the cantata is Ruth's solo, 'Entreat me not to leave thee,' which is instinct with pathetic expression. . . . Boaz's solo, 'Go not from hence, my daughter,' is another effective number. . . . A chorale, 'Nightfall,' is an exquisitely beautiful conception; and the intermezzo, 'Daybreak,' and the jubilant Wedding Chorus which follows, are full of spirit and vivacity, rushing forward with a joyous bound that carries the audience completely away. An enthusiastic encore was given to the intermezzo and chorus."—Bradford Observer.

"That the idyllic story of Ruth is one admirably adapted for artistic illustration is unquestionable, and poets, painters, and musicians have over and over again made it a subject for the exercise of their talents, and we have no hesitation in saying that in its poetical and musical treatment by Mr. Oxford and our townsman, it has been invested with increased interest. . . . Pieces such as Mr. Gaul's Opus 34 are much wanted, and we believe that when the 'Ruth' Cantata is heard in our Town Hall it will be at once accepted as a valuable addition to our stock of music suitable for performance by fairly advanced and advancing societies."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"Bright, tuneful, fresh, and musicianly—this work will be a great favourite, and will add to Mr. Gaul's reputation. The second part will be liked better than the first; it opens in the harvest-field, and here the real idyll begins, and with it the charm and grace and freshness of Mr. Gaul's inspiration. The maidens' chorus, bright as the morning it greets, and the men's robust and vigorous reply, well introduce the fresh and melodious joy-breathing music of Ruth, the chastened yet hopeful address of Naomi, and the hearty generous welcome of Boaz. . . . The work closes with a short but spirited chorus, 'Rejoice, for blessings round us fall,' which will bear comparison with anything Mr. Gaul has written. An effective fugal passage carefully worked out, but not overdone, is inserted between strains of joyful acclamation of considerable freshness and vigour."—Birmingham Weekly Dart.

"Ruth' has been set to music by several composers; none, however, has become so worthily popular as the Cantata under notice. Although somewhat simple in parts it contains some charming music, and is highly characteristic of the story it so vividly illustrates."—South Wills Express.

"Full of flowing melody."—Salisbury Times.

Novello's Primers of Musical Biography

ROSSINI

TO BE FOLLOWED IMMEDIATELY BY

CHERUBINI, MENDELSSOHN,

AND OTHERS.

PROSPECTUS.

Some years have passed since Mr. Joseph Bennett began, in the Musical Times, a series of biographical notices which are still far from ended. The original purpose was a limited one—namely, to throw light upon the personality of famous musicians by means of extracts selected and arranged from their letters and other writings. Hence the series had for first title "The Great Composers, sketched by themselves."

Consequent upon the remarkable favour with which the notices were received, it was determined to extend their scope, and, while making prominent the Masters' own testimony, to deal with each subject in a complete biographical form, as far as allowed by the limits necessarily imposed. The words "sketched by themselves" were therefore dropped from the title.

It was further resolved to make additions in the case of the composers dealt with under the original idea, and to issue the notices separately as "Primers of Musical Biography."

The intention of "Novello's Primers of Musical Biography" is to convey, as clearly as the limits of an elementary work will allow, a just idea of each composer's personality, and to record the principal events of his life. Knowledge of what a man is helps the understanding of what he does. These little books may serve, therefore, as a first step towards acquaintance with the genius and compositions of the masters to whom they are devoted.

For the copious extracts made from letters, &c., throughout the series, no apology is offered. They are the best material upon which to base an estimate of character.

LIFE OF MOZART

BY

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN

BY

PAULINE D. TOWNSEND.

THREE VOLUMES, CLOTH,

WITH FIVE PORTRAITS,

AND

PREFACE BY SIR GEORGE GROVE, D.C.L.

Price £1 11s. 6d.

THE TIMES.

"Mr. Grove, in his brief and able preface, calls the publication in an English dress of Otto Jahn's famous biography of Mozart 'an event in our musical history,' and his statement cannot be considered an exaggeration. . . . The English public is to be congratulated upon a translation of his monumental effort which may without exaggeration be called excellent. Miss Townsend has done her work with skill and conscientiousness, and we doubt whether a much more careful comparison with the original than we have thought it necessary to undertake would discover many, or any, serious blunders."

DAILY NEWS.

"He (Jahn) has made admirable use of Nissen, with his laborious compilation, and of all other authorities, and he has succeeded in producing a work which is complete without being confusing through excess of detail, and in which the interest of the narrative is not broken by undue reference to other writers who, treating of the same points, have treated them differently and often incorrectly. . . . The work has been well translated, and it is prefaced by a brief but interesting introduction from the pen of Mr. George Grove."

THE ATHENÆUM.

"It is with great pleasure that we are able to speak in terms of the highest praise of the manner in which Miss Townsend has acquitted herself of the by no means easy task of translation. In so voluminous a work as the present it is almost inevitable that a few slips should be found; but those that we have noted are not only extremely rare, but mostly of slight importance. . . . We have done inadequate justice in this review to one of the most important works in the whole domain of musical literature; our excuse must be the absolute impossibility of dealing fully with it within reasonable bounds. We conclude by most cordially recommending it to all who are interested in music, and need only add that the printing and general appearance of the volumes are worthy alike of their contents and of the reputation of the firm which publishes them."

VOICE-TRAINING EXERCISES

AND

CHARLES W. PEARCE.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS, &c.

"My dear Sir,—I am much obliged to you for sending me your Voice Exercises. They seem to me admirable, and doubtless will prove of great utility.—I am, yours faithfully,
"Tenbury, July 14, 1884. "FREDERICK A. G. OUSELEY."

"This is a novel work, both in plan and detail, and the combined labours of a well-known scientific lecturer on the voice and an excellent musician have brought the undertaking to a successful issue. . . . The exercises are melodious and attractive, and are planned to do their work without the possibility of strain or fatigue. The pianoforte part is everywhere judicious and artistic. These very complete and satisfactory training exercises are printed in six different books for the same number of voices, thus: soprano, mezzo-soprano, contralto, tenor, baritone, and bass. The work may be safely and cordially recommended to vocal students and even to practised singers, quite apart from any grounds of discussion concerning methods of teaching."—Musical Standard, August 30, 1884.

"The conjunction of science and musicianship expressed by the names of the two authors of this well thought of and well carried out work is a sufficient guarantee as to its objectivity and musical adaptability. The work is published in six distinct parts; each part being complete in itself, and specially adapted for a given vocal type. The parts are severally headed Soprano, Mezzo-Soprano, Contralto, Tenor, Baritone, and Bass. By this means of distinct publication, transposition as ordinarily employed in adapting different exercises for different voices becomes unnecessary. The exercises are built upon the principles previously advocated by Mr. Behnke in 'The Mechanism of the Human Voice,' and by Mr. Lennox Browne and Mr. Emil Behnke in 'Voice, Song, and Speech.' In accordance with this plan of action, the authors have divided each part of the work, as adapted to distinct voices, into sundry sections. They deal, in the case of the female voices, first with the lower thin register, then take the lower and upper thin registers, then the whole compass of the voice, and finish with the various musical embellishments. The scheme in the case of each part of the voice deals systematically with resonance, attack, flexibility, &c. In the case of the male voices, they commence with the lower thick register, advance to lower and upper thick registers, and then exercise the voice throughout its compass. The exercises are, with great skill, arranged so as to give a maximum of benefit with a minimum of fatigue. They are melodious and natural, and are consequently pleasant of performance. The accompanying pianoforte part is helpful without being either distracting or unduly prominent; and the work is throughout characterised by artistic forethought and good musicianship. Its popularity will doubtless be extensive in accordance with its merits."—Academic Gazette, September 1, 1884.

"Mr. Behnke and Dr. Pearce have issued a series of 'Voice-Training Exercises,' one for each of the six voices—soprano, mezzo, contralto, tenor, baritone, and bass. They are constructed so as to fit in with the vocal principles which Mr. Behnke teaches, while at the same time they are melodious and interesting."—Tonic Sol-fa Reporter, August, 1884.

"This is a valuable series of vocal studies, based on the principles advocated in 'The Mechanism of the Human Voice,' by E. Behnke, and in the more elaborate work, by Messrs. Lennox Browne and Emil Behnke, entitled 'Voice, Song, and Speech.' The exercises now referred to are entirely practical, and consist of four divisions, calculated, respectively, to develop the lower thin register, the lower and upper thin registers, the whole compass of the voice, and the command of embellishments and grace notes. The music is associated with different vowels and consonants, so as to cultivate verbal pronunciation as well as musical intonation. The exercises are published for each of the several ranges of voice—soprano, mezzo-soprano, contralto, tenor, baritone, and bass; and from their utility and cheapness they deserve to find a very large sale."—Illustr. London News, August 9, 1884.

"Messrs. Chappell and Co. have just issued a series of 'Voice-Training Exercises,' prepared by Messrs. Emil Behnke and Charles W. Pearce, in separate books, for soprano, mezzo-soprano, contralto, tenor, baritone, and bass. The combined simplicity and utility of the plan upon which these studies have been written will commend them to the notice of professors and students alike. Theoretical subjects are wisely eschewed and the books deal solely with matters that concern the actual training of the voice. Proper importance has been lent to the system of production, and the exercises on Resonance and Attack will especially be found excellent. Altogether Messrs. Behnke and Pearce's studies are of a description that cannot fail to be used with beneficial effect."—Sunday Times, August 31, 1884.

"These exercises are based upon the principles of voice-production and voice-cultivation laid down in the recently-published 'Voice Song, and Speech' of Dr. Lennox Browne and Mr. E. Behnke. They are published in six forms, slightly varied to suit soprano, mezzo-soprano, contralto, tenor, baritone, and bass voices; and the different sections of each book are arranged with due regard to the proper employment of the high and low registers of each voice. The first exercise is intended as a help in the production of resonance; and subsequent exercises are devoted to securing good methods of attack, flexibility, the sustaining of tones, &c. That the work is based upon sound philosophical principles is certain, and it may be said with confidence that no better exercises for the purposes of voice cultivation are to be met with. No attempt is made to teach the art of singing from notes. The compilers' efforts have been directed to special objects—the production of pure vocal tone and the power of commanding the vocal organs—and we can confidently recommend the publication to those who are pursuing these objects. Thousands of young persons of both sexes are endowed by nature with capabilities for becoming good singers, but a small minority only of those thus endowed know how to use what has been given. The new exercises by Messrs. Behnke and Pearce may be used as reliable helps by all earnest students."—Birmingham Gazette, August 14, 1884.

"In compliance with a general request, the authors undertook the task of writing six books of voice-training exercises on the principles advocated in two works, which ought to be in the hands of all preachers, lecturers, public singers, and teachers of music and elocution, viz., 'The Mechanism of the Human Voice,' by Emil Behnke, and 'Voice, Song, and Speech,' by Lennox Browne and Emil Behnke. These great works, which are having an immense and ever-increasing circulation, created a necessity for the exercises before us. There is a volume each for tenor, baritone, bass, soprano, mezzo-soprano, and contralto. This plan has been adopted—firstly, because it facilitates the distinct treatment of the various voices, necessitated by differences in their respective mechanisms; and, secondly, because the studies can be consecutive, instead of being intermixed with others not suited to the singer's voice, thereby materially reducing the price of the work. In order to remove unnecessary obstacles in the singer's path everything has been written out at full length, thus saving the trouble of transcription. We note with pleasure one very important feature, and that is that the exercises are not only useful and scientific, but also melodious and attractive. The authors have conferred a great boon on the musical world and on the public generally by the publication of these exercises, which so happily combine science with simplicity, and system with charm. The very youngest pupils will feel and enjoy all this, and the elder ones will see that a new era has dawned in instruction books for singers."—Oldham Evening Chronicle, August 19, 1884.

"... The work comprises six books on voice-training exercises, written on the principles advocated by Mr. Emil Behnke and Mr. Lennox Browne. It is, as far as we can see, altogether outside the range of ordinary voice-tutors. First, there is a separate book for each class of voice. The idea which apparently governed the authors was that this plan facilitated the distinct treatment of the various voices necessitated by differences in their respective mechanisms, and allowed of the studies being consecutive, instead of intermixed with others not suited to the singer's voice. The middle part of each voice is treated first (a compass of only five notes), and afterwards this compass is expanded both ways until the entire vocal range is under proper control. By this treatment—which is peculiar in itself—the organ is strengthened and improved, and a firm basis is given for the addition of the vocal superstructure. A definite purpose is assigned to each exercise, and in those on 'Resonance' it is to be found for the first time a scientific attempt to cure what is commonly known as 'throatiness.' This attempt certainly has the merit of boldness, and we anticipate, of considerable efficacy. These are the distinctive characteristics of the work. It is purely practical; it is laden with no theoretical disquisitions or explanations. The authors even in commencing are in a revolutionary spirit. They at once abandon the old exercises on intervals, rightly believing that they have little to do with voice-training proper. The exercises are emphatically practical; but they are enhanced in value by pretty and attractive melody, occasionally rising far above the character of mere training compositions. We must not omit to congratulate our eminent and still young fellow-townsmen on his part in the work. It reflects considerable credit on him, and is an additional laurel well won."—Salisbury Times, August 2, 1884.

"The Voice-Training Exercises are in six books, for Soprano, Mezzo-Soprano, Contralto, Tenor, Baritone, and Bass—an excellent arrangement, saving teachers much trouble, and pupils much confusion."—The Musical Star (Edinburgh), September, 1884.

THE PECK TESTIMONIAL FUND.

It has been thought fit and proper that Mr. Peck, the chief clerk of the late Sacred Harmonic Society, should, if only for long service in the cause of Music, be awarded a Testimonial. Although his work has been unseen and unrecorded, it is nevertheless felt that not a little of the orchestral efficiency of the great historical Society was, under the direction of the lamented Sir Michael Costa, due to Mr. Peck's patient labours; while every performer engaged, whether vocal or instrumental, principal or choral, must, in some way or other, have had the advantage of Mr. Peck's attentive aid. Moreover, sympathy is felt for him in consequence of the difficulties he must necessarily experience in trying to engage, at an advanced age, in a new sphere of duties. Besides, the fact that those difficulties are intensified by family cares and trials enforces the claims he fairly has upon the Musical Profession and General Public.

A Committee, therefore, has been formed for the purpose of establishing a Fund for Mr. Peck's benefit.

The following gentlemen have already joined the Committee:—

"Dear Sir,—I have now got your 'Special C.O.' working to perfection. The Pedals being unfixed, and castors put under your elevators, allow the Pianoforte to be removed as easily as one without Pedals, which is a very great advantage over other attachments. It has a very fine appearance, is comparatively cheap, and is easily attached.

By Her Majesty's Royal Letters Patent

GRANTED TO

WM. CHINNOCK DYER.

The above-named would draw the attention of the Members of the Musical Profession and Trade to his

PATENT ACTION

FOR ATTACHING

Organ Pedals to a Pianoforte

Which Action he has, after continued study, brought to perfection, and gained the approval of Her Majesty's Commissioners of Patents. Letters Patent from the French Government have also been received by the Inventor.

ADVANTAGES OF WM. CHINNOCK DYER'S PATENT PEDAL ACTION.

1. It is not complicated; and as all the material used in manufacturing the same is well-seasoned mahogany, weights and springs not being used, it is warranted never to get out of order, and will last as long as any Pianoforte.
2. It is perfectly noiseless in its working, as it is carefully finished, and all the moving parts carefully bushed with red cloth.
3. It is by far the easiest and most convenient Action for attaching Organ Pedals to a Pianoforte.
4. It does not in any way interfere with the Sound-board of the Pianoforte; and the Pedals belonging to the same need not be taken away, as is the case with other Actions.
5. It may be attached to any Pianoforte without the slightest injury to the same.
6. The Action belonging to the Pianoforte is not in any way deteriorated, as the keys of the same are drawn down in the most natural manner at the place where they are played upon by the fingers.
7. A delightful and easy pedal touch is ensured, as the Action draws down the keys with the greatest ease.
8. The notes respond to the lightest pedal touch.
9. Repetition on the Pedals is as prompt and effective as that of the keys of the Pianoforte.
10. The touch of the Pianoforte is unaltered.
11. It is THE ONLY perfect and satisfactory Action for attaching Organ Pedals to a Pianoforte.
12. All the usual annoyances are entirely obviated, and a lifetime's pedal practice ensured without any further trouble or expense.

"13, Waltherton Road, St. Peter's Park, London, W.
 "I have much pleasure in stating my opinion that Mr. Wm. CHINNOCK DYER'S Patent Action for attaching Organ Pedals to a Pianoforte is likely to prove very valuable to Organists and Students of the Organ.

It possesses several advantages over other Actions which have come under my observation, and I shall have no hesitation in recommending the invention to my friends and pupils.

"F. E. GLADSTONE, Mus. Doc., Cantab."

"Dunsham House, Weston-super-Mare.

"I have minutely examined Mr. Wm. CHINNOCK DYER'S Pedals and Action attached to a Piano, and find it in every way satisfactory. The points that strongly recommend his patent are:—

- 1.—Simplicity of Action, and therefore no liability of getting out of order.
- 2.—Quick and ready response to the lightest Pedal touch, so that all degrees of tone are readily obtainable.
- 3.—It is perfectly noiseless in working, which character, seeing that no springs are used and that all the centres are carefully bushed, it is likely to retain after constant use.
- 4.—Compared with the roller-board action—which hitherto I have considered the only satisfactory method of attachment—this new action is inexpensive, and it is not in any way less effective.

"I believe it only wants to be well-known to become the general mode of attaching Organ Pedals to Pianofortes.

"ARTHUR E. CROOK, Mus. Bac., Cantab.,

MODERN SONG WRITERS.

II.—FRANZ LISZT.

BY FR. NIECKS.

THE name of Franz Liszt suggests to most people in the first place the phenomenal pianist, and only in the second place the composer. And, as a composer, the master is thought of first as a writer of pianoforte pieces, then as a writer of symphonic poems, next as a writer of oratorios and masses, and only lastly, if at all, as a writer of songs. This at least is the case in this country, where Liszt is little studied and adversely criticised, and consequently rarely heard, and hardly ever understood. Or should I have said, Liszt is rarely heard, and hardly ever understood, and consequently little studied and adversely criticised? England, however, does not stand alone in her inappreciativeness. Almost every European country neglects Liszt as much. Italy and Spain are closed to him,* and France shows no sympathy. Germany is an exception, though no brilliant one, for there, too, the composer Liszt does not get his due, at least not in all places. How he fares in his native country I do not know. Will this always be so, or is there any likelihood of a change in the attitude of the public? I am inclined to think that we shall see before long as complete a veering round of popular opinion in the case of Liszt as that which within the last fourteen years we have witnessed in the case of Berlioz. When this comes to pass, the Hungarian, like the French master, will for a time be as much blindly over-rated and frantically lauded as he was before blindly under-rated and frantically abused. And the critics—the blind that lead the blind—will again forget the past, swallow their own words—opinions, judgments, prophecies, and all—and look as infallible as ever. What with the misrepresentations of prejudiced critics, and the fooleries of the manufacturers of would-be poetical magazine articles, Liszt has become a myth in his lifetime. He is represented on the one hand as a being possessed of all the most precious, bodily and mental, natural and supernatural, qualities, as an angel of light, a god; and, on the other hand, as the very opposite of this. Although both portraitures are false, there is nevertheless more truth in the former than in the latter. The fact is, a man and artist like Liszt cannot be easily gauged. In examining so unique a phenomenon it is difficult to maintain the necessary objectivity and equanimity of mind—to avoid being unduly attracted or repelled by one or the other quality, by one or the other phase. We of the present day have no means, except by his pianoforte compositions, to judge Liszt as a pianist. But happily there is no need for a judgment on that point, it has long been given unanimously; friends and enemies are agreed that he stands alone, unapproached and unapproachable; the Paganini of the pianoforte, but a Paganini with intellectual powers which the Italian violinist could not boast. It is otherwise with Liszt, the composer. So few of his important orchestral and choral works are performed, and these few so unfrequently, that to most of us the master is all but a complete stranger. With regard to Liszt, the man, we are in a better position to judge.

* This, of course, is not to be taken literally; for in these two countries, especially in Italy, works of his may occasionally, though very rarely, be heard.

The master still dwells with us, and does not grudge his society; and what is even more valuable, he has furnished in his literary writings a faithful picture of his character and its development. These writings, which till lately had lain for the most part buried in the pages of the Gazette Musicale, are now made more easily accessible by L. Ramann's* collection and translation (from French into German), published by Breitkopf and Härtel, of Leipzig. They set forth strikingly the poetic bent, the passionate force, the piquant intellectuality, the universal sympathy, and the amiable disposition, of his nature. And they indicate also certain defects and a want of balance in the various faculties and tendencies: a preponderance of imagination over logic, of mobility over persistence; a predilection for colour, variety, and picturesqueness, even to the neglect of form, unity, and beauty.

The subject of this essay is "Liszt as a songwriter," but were I to limit my remarks strictly to his songs I should certainly fail to do justice to my theme. To prevent the reader from regarding my allusions to other compositions and my biographical notes as superfluities, I shall state the reasons which determine me to take the proposed course. My reasons are two: (1) With every noteworthy artist, and with none more than with Liszt, art and life are inseparable, the one being but an emanation from and manifestation of the other. (2) The individual works of an artist can only be fully understood, are only seen in their true light, when viewed in connection with the totality of his achievements.

Franz Liszt was born at Raiding, in Hungary, on October 22, 1811. At an early age his musical talents manifested themselves—first by his ear and memory, and, when he began to practise the pianoforte, by his technical dexterity, prima vista reading, and power of improvisation. Before long the boy was able to play in public, and by a concert at Pressburg he made such an impression that six noblemen were induced to provide the means for the prosecution of his studies. Having thus secured to him an annual subsidy of 600 florins for six years, Adam Liszt, the father and teacher of Franz, who up to that time had been in the service of Prince Esterhazy, gave up his post so that he might entirely devote himself to the education of his son. In 1821 the latter and his parents set out for Vienna, where the young musician studied, till 1823, pianoforte playing under Czerny, and harmony and counterpoint under Salieri. During the latter part of his stay in the Austrian capital Liszt gave two concerts, at the second of which he played Hummel's B minor Concerto and improvised on a given theme. When the boy had ended his improvisation, somebody strode precipitately forward, and, stepping on the platform, kissed him. This somebody was Beethoven. From Vienna the Liszt family went to Paris, Franz giving concerts as they travelled along at Munich, Stuttgart, and Strassburg, exciting everywhere the greatest wonder and admiration. Here, they said, is a new Mozart! Adam Liszt expected that his son would be admitted as a pupil of the Paris conservatoire, which was indeed the object of their journey. Great was therefore their disappointment when, in spite of high recommendations, they were told that the regulations of the institution forbade the admission of foreigners. Being balked of this hope, Franz's further artistic training was limited to instruction in composition, which he received first from Paër and afterwards from Reicha.

The division of a man's life into periods, of an artist's works into styles, is generally a more or less arbitrary proceeding. In the case of Liszt, however, we find that his life and artistic career present a natural division into two parts distinctly separated and characterised. The first part comprehends his activity as a pianoforte virtuoso and composer of virtuosic pianoforte compositions; the second his activity as a teacher, conductor, and tone-poet; a writer of symphonic poems, oratorios, masses, and other sacred and secular choral works. The first period, the time of fermentation, of individual evolution, of mental and moral development and formation, extends from his arrival in Paris, in the middle of December, 1823, or rather from his father's death, in 1827—what precedes may be regarded as a Vorschule, a preparatory schooling, as training in contradistinction to education—to 1849, when, finally abandoning the life of a travelling virtuoso, he settled down at Weimar.

Liszt cannot but have learned much from his teachers, but it does not seem that he was markedly influenced by any one of them. This will hardly be wondered at, for, although they were men of talent and note, none of them was a man of genius nor possessed of a striking amount of originality. The real instructors of Liszt were Paganini, Beethoven, Schubert, Chopin, and Berlioz. His transcriptions of Paganini's caprices, of Beethoven's symphonies, of Schubert's songs, Berlioz's "Symphonie fantastique," overture to "Les Francs-Juges," &c., have quite another significance than his fantasias on operatic airs. They are studies in the fullest and widest sense of the word. Chopin's works afforded no material for transcription, but they left their impress on many of Liszt's compositions and on his style generally. Even more potent in the making of the man than these musical influences were the religious, literary, and social ones, which may be summed up in the names of Chateaubriand, Victor Hugo, Lamartine, George Sand, Lamennais, Saint-Simon, Enfantin, Fourier, and Ballanche. Nor should the most important, the personal influences, be overlooked. There are many to be found among the celebrities above named, of whom his friend George Sand calls for special mention, and to whom ought to be added his more than friend, the Comtesse d'Agout, who subsequently became known in the literary world as Daniel Stern.* Liszt himself shall now describe to us this time of fermentation, this storm and stress period; none, of course, can know so well as himself what his experiences were, and few could better interpret them. I dwell on these matters, because I hold them to be indispensable if we wish to understand the man, and let me remind you once more that l'artiste c'est l'homme, an adaptation at least as true as its original, le style c'est l'homme, and certainly applicable to Liszt.

"You know that time of youth, the life-period from the fifteenth to the twenty-fifth year," writes Liszt at the end of May, 1838, whilst staying in Venice, to Lambert Massard, of Paris. "You know that then, more than at any other time, man surrenders himself to the outer world, and men, things, and places win the greatest influence over his imagination. Such a variety of things enter his heart, and dominated by the fate-like need of loving he gives up a part of his I to whatever he comes in contact with. At this time the young man, stupefied by the tumult of his own thoughts, has hardly begun to live, he as yet only strives for life. In him all is curiosity, desire, restless aspiration, ebb and flow of the most opposed volitions. Without a guiding thread he loses himself in the labyrinth of his still unregulated passions—the simple, easy, natural, makes him smile compassionately. He oversteps all bounds, is eager for obstacles, despises both the good he could do and the feelings that could make him happy—he is pitifully tortured by the sting of youth.

"This time of consuming fever, dissipated strength, energetic and mad life-manifestation I have passed through on the soil of France. Here also lie the ashes of my father; here, on the sacred burial-ground, my first sorrow found its asylum. How could I but feel myself a child of a country where I had suffered and loved so much? How could I have dreamt that I had entered life in another? that in my veins flows the blood of another race? that my people lived elsewhere?

"A sad occurrence awakened suddenly the feeling that I thought extinguished, and which nevertheless only slumbered, anew in me. One morning I read at Venice, in a German newspaper, a detailed account of the misfortune which had befallen Pesth. This account called forth in me a real agitation. An extraordinary sympathy, a lively, irresistible need urged me to assist the many sufferers. . . .

"Through these inward agitations and feelings the sense of the word 'fatherland' was revealed to me. I transported myself suddenly back into the past, and found in my heart the treasures of the recollection of my childhood pure and untouched. A grand landscape spread out before my eyes. That was the well-known forest out of which sounded the huntsman's call; that was the river Danube rushing down over the rocks; that was the wide meadow-land on which pastured peaceful flocks in freedom; that was Hungary, the vigorous, fertile soil which generated such noble sons; that my home-land. 'And I also,' I exclaimed, in a fit of patriotism at which you may perhaps smile, 'I also belong to this ancient strong race; I also am a son of this sturdy, untamed nation, which surely is yet destined for better days.'"

We now discern without difficulty the prominent features of Liszt's personality: a bright poetic intellect and a warm heart, both easily impressionable and inflammable; a frame of mind and tendencies developed, if not engendered, by the French romanticism that reached its acme in 1830, and permeated religion, philosophy, and political economy, as much as literature; and, in addition to these, a strong, proud feeling of nationality. His early writings in the Gazette Musicale prove that Germany, too, with her art and literature, counted for something in his education; nay, in those days he even called himself a German;* still, as yet at least, this influence was decidedly secondary, and though in after years it became stronger, its potency, perhaps, never equalled that of the others.

Up to 1849, then, Liszt was chiefly a virtuoso and composer of virtuosic pianoforte pieces. But most of these pianoforte pieces—not a few of which may now be regarded as obsolete—have qualities of style and matter which distinguish them from the generality of this kind of composition. Indeed, as regards style Liszt's achievements were epoch-making, for he was the creator of what has been called the orchestral pianoforte style, the now prevailing style. Moreover, apart from his remarkable transcriptions of Schubert's songs, &c., he planned and executed works which presaged what he one day would be. There were schemes of Titanic orchestral works; but also finished compositions of great beauty and lasting value—for instance, the "Années de Pèlerinage," some of which he wrote as early as 1835—1836. This was the year in which the clearing process began, and the first

* Although artistically she was more influenced than influencing.

* At least, I noticed him doing so on one or two occasions; but, although I remember being struck by the fact, I do not remember with certainty whether it was in the Gazette Musicale or in unpublished private letters. That it was during the time of his residence in Paris I am certain.

indubitable signs of his poetic endowment made their appearance. But I must say no more of this first period of Liszt's career. It is time that I should speak of the songs, which belong to the second period.

With a few unimportant exceptions—"Tre Sonetti di Petrarca," "Angiolin dal biondo crin," &c.—Liszt's songs were composed since his settlement in 1849 at Weimar, being, therefore, contemporaneous with his great orchestral and choral works. The number of his songs is very considerable. The German collection (Franz Liszt's "Gesammelte Lieder"—Leipzig: C. F. Kahnt) contains as many as fifty-seven, and these are not all. Kistner, for instance, has published three songs for a soprano voice ("Hohe Liebe," "Gestorben war ich," "O lieb, O lieb!"), and a single song (Die Macht der Musik); and then there is the dramatic scene by A. Dumas, "Jeanne d'Arc au bûcher." But some of my readers will object that a dramatic scene is not a song. True, and the same may be said of many compositions which the composer has sent into the world under that name.

Most of Liszt's songs are musical illustrations of the thoughts and images suggested by the poems. Songs they are only in the primary and general sense—namely, in the sense of "something sung"; short, they are Gesänge not Lieder.* Liszt frequently treats the poems which he chooses for composition as plain prose, disregarding their form, mercilessly destroying metre, rhythm, and cadences, and the recurrence of these in the several strophes. In fact, the musician overthrows with a light heart what the poet has taken the greatest trouble to construct. The words of a genuine song are the revelation of a mood; the different feelings expressed—if there are more than one—have their roots in this one mood; and the incidental images are subordinate, of tributary not independent significance. But the musical illustration of every phrase and word leads to an undue emphasising of the incidental, and a blurring, if not effacing, of the essential. The only true song is the strophic song, which confines itself to the realisation of the emotional key-note of the poem. Hence, if the musician wishes to form a partnership with the poet, he must respect the latter's formal and ideal disposition. Of course I am speaking only of genuine songs, not of poems which are wrongly so called by their authors or accepted as such by musicians.

The above is what may be called the "absolute" ideal of a song; it is the result of æsthetic consideration of the genre. But, besides this absolute ideal, individual ideals are possible and admissible. It is the duty of the critic to find and place himself on the standpoint of the artist he criticises. He must see his ideal, and see it as it is seen by him. And if he does that there can be no doubt that he will admit that though Liszt's songs are not always songs in the strict meaning of the word, they are almost always compositions full of interest and beauty. The excellences and defects are indeed too patent to be overlooked by any but those who cannot or will not see. Liszt's most attached partisans and the foremost of thorough-going progressists temper their praise with gentle blame, and his most determined opponents and the staunchest conservatives temper their blame with warmest praise. Thus, Franz Brendel ("Geschichte der Musik"), whilst acknowledging the master's profound comprehension of the contents of his poetic subjects, and the rich colouring and splendid picturing of the musical composition—qualities which place "these works in their originality" beside the best that has been produced in this branch of the art—does not hesitate to point out that Liszt's songs are not songs in the German sense; that this composer requires more room, and in his principal works in this genre approaches the ballad and dramatic scene; that, lastly, he lacks the concentrated inwardness (Innerlichkeit) of the German song, the self-contained unity of the pervading mood (Gesamtstimmung), which is the characteristic of the German song, more especially the older German song. August Reissmann ("Geschichte des deutschen Liedes"), on the other hand, whilst regretting Liszt's lack of form-giving power, and condemning his breaking-up of the poetic form, and the interpretation of the contents only in its separate details, speaks in glowing terms of the composer's luxuriant imagination, wealth of expression, and unsurpassed capability and mastery of the tenderest and most passionate emotions, and in conclusion remarks that the treatment, though objectionable, "interests, because a significant personality presents itself in it, and seizes us like the vehement impulse of a strongly excited person, whose endeavour to impart, and the feeling of the inadequacy of his means of expression, set in motion every fibre, so that the right expression threatens to burst his breast." There is some truth in this last remark of Reissmann's, only the fact is greatly exaggerated. It is possible to be more fully in sympathy with him when he says: "He who wishes to copy Liszt without caricaturing him, must be a Liszt, and phenomena such as he are even rarer than comets."

Somehow almost all Liszt's critics dwell exclusively on what distinguishes him from other song writers; they overlook, or at least neglect to state, the fact that among his songs are to be found several whose form and matter are such that they might have proceeded from the pen of the most orthodox writer. It is, indeed, the misfortune of this master to be constantly judged by an insignificant fragment of the totality of his compositorial achievements. With some artists this is a safe enough proceeding; not so with a chameleon-like being like Liszt. Variety, dissimilitude, contrast, nay heterogeneity, wherever we turn. Compare the self-sufficient esprit and bravura of the Fantaisies, Reminiscences, Amusements, and Soirées, with the earnest striving of the Sonatas and Cercos; the sweet soothing "Consolations" with the wild, exciting "Galop chromatique"; the sensuality of the "Mephisto-Walzer" (the second of the episodes from Lenau's "Faust") with the purity of "Die Legende der heiligen Elizabeth"; the worldliness of the "Rhapsodies Hongroises" with the religiosity of the oratorio "Christus," the "Missa choralis," "Missa solennis," and "Coronation Mass." And even if we remain in narrower bounds, what an immense diversity presents itself to us in the master's orchestral works, his "Faust" and "Dante" symphonies and his twelve symphonic poems—"Ce qu'on entend sur la montagne," "Tasso," "Les Préludes," "Orpheus," "Prometheus," "Mazepa," "Festklänge," "Héroïde funèbre," "Hungaria," "Hamlet," "Hunnenschlacht," and "Ideale." Liszt's manifoldness is in like manner exhibited in the songs. The settings of Goethe's songs, for instance, have another character than those of Heine's or Redwitz's. And how different again from the settings of these German poems are those of the French verses of Victor Hugo!

With regard to form, we may divide Liszt's songs into three classes: (1) Genuine songs—namely, such as are simply melodious, and, although sometimes through-composed, respect the metrical structure of the poem; (2) Chamber cantatas. Thus I venture to call, for want of a better name, the more extended compositions, often many-membered, and, in some instances, a mixture of recitative and air; (3) Im- provisations, the less distinctly articulated organisms, generally declamatory or wavering between recitative, air, and arioso. Otto Lessmann ("Franz Liszt. Eine Charakterstudie") applies indiscriminately the word to all of Liszt's songs, I think wrongly.

* In this respect our composer is but the last degree of a climax; for in the songs of Schubert, Schumann, Franz, and Liszt this tendency makes itself increasingly felt.

To the first class belong the settings of Oscar von Redwitz's, Joseph Müller's, and Heine's poems—"Es muss ein Wunderbares sein" ("Love's Marvel"), "Das Veilchen" ("The Violet"), and "Du bist wie eine Blume" ("A flower thou resemblest"). The most remarkable specimens of the second class are the settings of Heine's "Die Lorelei" ("The Loreley") and Goethe's "Es war ein König in Thule" ("The King of Thule") and "Mignon's Lied" (Mignon's song, "Know'st thou the land?"). The settings of Goethe's "Ueber allen Gipfeln ist Ruh'" ("Wanderer's Night Song") and R. von Bügelben's "Und sprich: Sieh auf dem Meer" may be cited as illustrative of the third class.

I need hardly tell the reader that there are no sharply drawn separating lines between these classes, and that if he sets about classifying the songs he will find himself often in doubt what to do with one or the other of them. But the proposed scheme is nevertheless not useless; it has, among other advantages, that of helping us to a better understanding of the composer's procedures and the nature of these compositions. About the songs of the first class, which is the least numerous and made up, as it were, of exceptions, I shall say nothing; they can be, and are sure to be, appreciated by all who make their acquaintance, be they classicists or romanticists, progressists or reactionists. It is otherwise with those of the second and third classes; here we may have to change our standpoint.

One hears it sometimes said that Liszt has been more successful than other song writers in wedding music to words. This may be true, but it can be true only in the strictly literal sense—"to words." For in the majority of cases he gives so much attention to the constituent phrases and words that the "poem" is lost sight of. The music acts as a dissolvent. Indeed, the new method leads to a result the very reverse of what is intended. Liszt's object no doubt was to co-ordinate music and poetry, and thus attain a fuller agreement, a more perfect unison, than had been previously known. But what is the actual result? A greater discrepancy than ever; nothing less than the domination of music and the almost entire annihilation of the poem. In fact, the poet proposes to make a certain thing and the musician, in finishing what the other has begun, turns out something altogether different. "Amphora cepit institui; currente rota cur urceus exit"? There are many exceptions to be found, especially among the shorter songs, in which the underlying mood which gives unity to the poem is firmly seized and held fast throughout. But in most cases this unity is sacrificed to the multiplicity of the details. If we read first the poem and then compare with it Liszt's musical setting, we are struck by the disproportion existing between the two, and between the parts and the whole—a disproportion in force, and more frequently both in length and force. What the poet only glances at the musician contemplates; what with the former is merely a passing expression, a figure of speech, is with the latter an emotion, a picture. Take, for instance, his setting of the words "himmelhoch jauchzend, zum Tode betrübt" (literally, "heaven-high jubilating, sad unto death") in the charming "Freudvoll und leidvoll" (Clara's song). But almost any other song of Liszt's will furnish examples of undue emphasis. One of the most striking examples is the well-known and much appreciated setting of Heine's "Die Lorelei" ("The Loreley"), a poem which in its simplicity, terseness, and unity of mood realises one's ideal of a song; being, indeed, a real folk-song, but which, under the hands of the musician, swells into a chamber cantata, or, if you like the term better, into a grand scena, wherein declamatory passages alternate with scenitenas, and a varied series of views of the inner and outer world are depicted.

As long, then, as we insist that in a song the first business of the music is to reinforce the emotional key-note, and thus to consolidate into a close union the parts of the poem, and make the latter as a whole more impressive, Liszt will again and again disappoint us. If, on the other hand, we can bring ourselves to look upon the poem simply as a programme, as a congeries of picturesque items suitable for musical illustration, the master's songs will be to us full of interest and delight. There is hardly a bar in them without some happy touch. Now the composer moves us to the very heart's core by his true accents of joy and sorrow; now he helps us to realise the various aspects of natural scenes—of hill and valley, of wood and field, of river and sea, in light and shadow, at peace and at war with the elements; and ever and anon there comes a flash that brings to us a revelation—a new thought, a new feeling. His force and subtlety of characterisation and illustration are equally marvellous. He dares even to attempt, and I think successfully, the translation into music of the exhalation of flowers that fills the air with sweet fragrance ("Flower and scent"). One who can do all this can be no ordinary man, he must be a magician, he must be a man of genius. Liszt's genius as a composer has been doubted by many. In most cases it was insufficient acquaintance with the master's works or a narrow-minded conservatism which caused the doubt. However, the fact that Liszt's works are very numerous, and of unequal merit, some of them wholly unworthy of him, should not be forgotten. Also this should be remembered, that there are not only various degrees, but also various kinds of musical genius. Spontaneity and reflection, inner and outer impulse, are, apart from craftsmanship, the chief factors of artistic production. In Liszt's production reflection has, generally speaking, a larger share, and outer impulses come oftener into play, than in that of most of the other great composers.

I hail with pleasure the publication of a representative collection of Liszt's songs ("Albums of German Song." No. II. Franz Liszt), which we owe to Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co. It will enable musicians and amateurs to extend their acquaintance with this interesting master's works without the necessity of a great expenditure of money or time. I say I hail with pleasure the publication of these twenty of the best of Liszt's songs, because I am confident that it will win the master many friends, and bring nearer the day when he shall be esteemed according to his worth.

What I said a few months ago (January, 1884), in connection with the Robert Franz Album, about translations of songs in general and Mr. Hueffer's translations in particular, applies also to the present volume of the "Albums of German Song." Mr. Hueffer's translations are often happy, but now and then provoke criticism. Sometimes the objectionable points might be removed; at other times one does not see how it could be done—for instance, where Mr. Hueffer translates, in Goethe's poem "Kennst du das Land?" (Mignon's song), the words "Kennst du es wohl?" by "Know'st thou it well?" which is a literal translation, but not a rendering of the meaning. Of course, Mr. Hueffer knows this as well as anybody else. But how bring out the meaning and yet make the words march with the music? I tried and gave it up, and consequently cannot blame Mr. Hueffer for doing the same. On the contrary, he has my full sympathy; a man grappling with the impossible has a right to expect as much from his fellow-men. One remark more and I have done. Having to choose between two evils, I should have preferred, in "Du bist wie eine Blume" ("A flower thou resemblest"), the contraction "I'd" to "I would" (p. 49, line 1, bar 6), as that would have made the alteration of Liszt's three notes of varied value into four monotonous crotchets unnecessary.

LOCAL COLOUR

By F. CORDER.

LOOKING through the advertisement pages of my favourite weekly journal the other day, my eye was arrested by one sentence in the following advertisement:—

MR. HENNINGS J. GUBB Arranges, Transposes, Harmonises, or provides Accompaniments (Orchestral or Pianoforte) to Author's own Compositions. Tunes taken down from dictation. Music invested with any desired nationality or local colour. Ha'mony taught by correspondence. Address, 1, 294, Jerry Buildings, Somers Town.

It was not the advertisement as a whole which attracted my attention, for I had long been aware that persons of Mr. Gubb's peculiar calling are in no inconsiderable demand, owing to the large number of composers in what I may call the lower walks of musical life. The average music-hall singer or quadrille-band player gets, in the course of his professional life, so saturated with the particular kind of music he constantly hears, that, whether he possess musical talent or not, he cannot help producing original compositions in his particular line. As he has probably never received the least proper instruction, he has to call in the services of some one like Mr. Gubb, who puts these noble works into the form in which they are so readily printed by the publishers and so eagerly bought by the public. This is the universally recognised basis of English art, and I have nothing to say against it, only it would be better if all those who follow Mr. Gubb's profession would educate themselves into fitness for it.

The phrase about "Music invested with any desired nationality," excited my curiosity. I resolved upon the spot to interview the advertiser, and, invoking to my aid the powers of the various "circles" of metropolitan railways, lines of trams, and finally an antediluvian specimen of suburban cab, I tracked the great musician to his lair in the wilds of unexplored North London. No doubt Mr. Gubb would inhabit a less-out-of-the-way locality if he could, so I shall not dwell on this topic further than to say that my journey gave me something of that horror of the Infinite which Mr. Procter portrays in his well-known description of a journey through the universe. I found Mr. Hennings J. Gubb a very pleasant man, for I am not one of those who esteem people in proportion to the amount of soap and water they use. On my stating the object of my visit my host courteously offered full explanations of all the mysteries of his art. "Between brother artists," he was good enough to say, "there need be no concealments." Finding him so ready to oblige, I therefore led up to my principal subject of enquiry by a few general questions relative to his profession. He informed me that he did a very good business with amateur composers, "even among the most upper classes," as he said with some pride. Songs were by far the most general kind of compositions sent to him to be "tittivated," but there was also considerable production of pianoforte pieces of a vague and unambitious kind, the prevalent taste running much on the so-called Gavottes or "Danses." Did he not consider it remarkable that the music-hall singers who were unable to write down their own compositions should invent sometimes such capital tunes? "No, sir; it is not very extraordinary, considering all the circumstances. You only hear the few lucky hits they make; you little know the enormous quantity of unsuccessful songs they publish and sing, and the still more prodigious quantity which the publishers refuse. Why the great —" and he named a certain star artiste or lion comique, as they grotesquely style themselves, has dictated to me at this table no less than seven hundred songs in the past twelvemonth; come nearly every day, he does, with as many as half-a-dozen at once sometimes. Then they copy one another shameful, they do, and put in phrases out of the old and forgotten songs. Even their best songs are never original." What was the biggest job he had ever been engaged on? "Well, the biggest and hardest job was arranging an opera for a certain Indian rajah, which he tried to get performed at his own house in Kensington, but nobody could sing it. It was the queerest stuff you ever did hear—all out of rhythm, and in no key whatever. But he paid well, and my experience of real Indian music on that occasion was of good service in giving eastern flavour to other people's works, for that season Indian music was all the rage." Here we approached the subject I was curious about, and I asked him to explain his method of imparting "local colour." "With much pleasure," replied Mr. Gubb. "You give me a few bars of melody, your own if you like, and by merely altering the accompaniment and the value of a note here and there, you shall see that it can be made of any nationality you like." I played on the piano, which stood at hand, the first eight bars of "Home, sweet home." "Ah!" said my friend, with a queer smile, "I have met with a good many people who thought they had composed that. I could write a book upon the history of that tune and the way it has been maltreated. The story goes that Sir Henry Bishop cribbed it from a Sicilian popular song. But where did the Sicilians get it from? They haven't much music of their own. This song is to be found in many different forms among the gipsy music of Hungary, Bohemia, Spain, and the Basque provinces, besides being a Venetian gondolier's song and I don't know what besides. I shouldn't wonder if it was originally composed for the opening of Solomon's temple. There never was, and never will be, such a popular tune. All other variations may be forgotten, but Thalberg's 'Home, sweet home' is immortal. To this day composers make successes out of wretched songs by dragging in (quoting they call it) that melody as a refrain. Didn't that descending passage in the second part suggest the theme of the Adagio of Beethoven's Fourth Symphony? I'm sure it did. And what is the last Christy Minstrel success? why that very second part of 'Home, sweet home,' with scarcely a note altered. They call it 'Wait till the clouds roll by.'"*

Mr. Gubb was so eloquent on this subject that there is no knowing where he would have ended had I not brought him back to the point by remarking that if the tune was of so polyglot a character it would perhaps form no good test for his powers. Mr. Gubb smiled pityingly at my ignorance. "What we call local colour is only the conventional means by which we label a tune with any particular nationality. If you want to paint a Scotchman you give him a plaid and a kilt, but all Scotchmen don't wear kilts and plaids. If I played you the best known Hungarian version of 'Home, sweet home,' as it occurs in Liszt's Thirteenth Rhapsody for instance, you might recognise the tune, but you would not say at once, 'That is Hungarian.' But if I arrange it thus— and he played—

* It is rather an odd coincidence that, at the moment of penning these words, a street organ outside my window has just struck up "Home, sweet home," and simultaneously a brass band in the distance is playing "Wait till the clouds roll by." I could wish that the coincidence extended to the keys they are playing in.—F. C

"the tune may be a trifle disguised, but the Hungarian national flavour is the main thing, and that we get."

"We do, indeed," I admitted; "and you mean that what we call local colour is simply the most prominent mannerisms of national music, and that to apply these by main force to any music—to drag them in anyhow and everywhere, is to give the desired national flavour?"

"Precisely," replied my host; "that's how it's done. The real Venetian version of our tune is very curious, but not nearly so Venetian as this, for instance:—

I don't know who started the idea that a rocking accompaniment like this was particularly Italian, especially as the Venetian gondola songs are all unaccompanied, and not in the least in this style, but it is an accepted thing now. With Spanish songs it is different; there the inevitable guitar and castanet accompaniment gives you stereotyped mannerisms. Bizet had a very easy job of it over 'Carmen.' Here is a Habanera for you"—

I drew Mr. Gubb's attention to the curious fact that a "double pedal" or "drone bass" may be used to give various national flavours. "Yes," he said, "it does seem odd. The same means that Gounod employs for French pastoral effects Grieg uses to give a Scandinavian twang, Rubinstein for a Persian flavour, and Chopin for a perfect Polish style. The two last, to be sure, depend largely on the Slavonic minor scale—by the judicious use of which we can imitate all the more unfamiliar national styles, including Chinese and ancient Greek, but your drone bass is, after all, the greatest resource. Here is 'Home, sweet home' in Eastern dress:—

and again, by a very slight alteration we can convert it into one of those lumbering Norwegian Cow-dances, I think they call them, which Grieg has introduced us to."

"I perceive," said I, "that you have studied this subject deeply. It must require considerable skill as well as knowledge, though, to apply these artifices with success." Mr. Gubb bowed with the air of a man acknowledging a well-deserved compliment. "It certainly does," he replied, "require both knowledge and skill, if you intend to perform your task creditably, that is. A young man some time ago brought me a Symphony and said that he knew Symphonies wouldn't go down without some special feature, so would I make it Norwegian. Well, I did so, but before he could get it brought out some one else produced a Norwegian Symphony, so he brought it back and asked me to make it something else, say Welsh. Well I made it Welsh, but he had bad luck again, for another Welsh Symphony was just announced as I finished it. I am now translating it, as I may say, into Persian, and if that don't do I shall give it up. But of all the tough jobs in the way of national colour I never had one to beat that opera I arranged for young Lord—well, I mustn't let out his name; that's against my rules. 'Make it like them things of Wagner's,' says he, and when I studied up a few of 'em to see what it was he wanted, I found it took all I knew to do it. You have to break the music up all into little bits, as you may say, and put just the most preposterous accompaniments and outrageous harmonies you can think of. This you understand is what the general public imagines is Wagnerism—not that it really is.

"Stay, I can give you an idea of how we do it by taking 'Home, sweet home' again." And he played as follows:—

"This style is all the rage now, but it takes such a time to write in it, being, as 'twere, all against nature and exactly the reverse of what one's own impulse would lead one to write, that I have to charge very high terms. The fact is, it is the best dodge out for concealing the absence of ideas in the music. When nobody knows what on earth you're doing of, they can't say that you're doing wrong, though common sense ought to teach 'em that in such case the odds are ten to one that you are doing so."

I expressed my approval of Mr. Gubb's wise aphorism, and, after a little more conversation, took my leave of him.

"By-the-bye," I said at the door, "Is there anything which you could call English national colour? Scotch, Irish and Welsh I know, of course; but how would you make a composition have an English flavour?"

"Hardly possible, sir," was the reply of the artist. "The only individuality I have yet discovered in English music is the Song which goes into a Waltz, and you will admit that that is not always available as a means of imparting local colour; but if I may say so without conceit, I think that outsiders—that is to say, foreigners—will hardly fail to recognise the hand of Hennings J. Gubb in most English music, and this must be our substitute for local colour. Good morning, sir."

And is it so? thought I, as I pursued my tedious way homeward. Is there to be found in all English music—even mine own—a feeble striving to imitate that of all other nations—a Gubbiness, in fact? Heavens, what a word! Brother musicians, if we cannot get English local colour—if we cannot found an English school—let us lay down the pen and suffer meekly the reproach of being an unmusical nation; but do not—oh! do not—let it be said that our attempts have resulted only in—Gubbiness!

SERMONS ON MUSIC.

DEALING last month with a wholly different subject—"Our Five Hundredth Number"—the remark was made that in musical literature a combination of literary excellence and technical knowledge is hard to obtain, for the reason that "crowds of musicians have plenty to say which the public would profit by hearing, but the grace of expression is denied them; and many men possess that grace, but are not musicians." Illustrations of this remark crop up on all sides. When a local paper can inform its readers that "Madame — sang her Aria with all the grace of the most lovely canto fermo," and a church dignitary state that Mendelssohn sketched out his ideas on the spinet, it is evident that all writers on music do not ground their remarks upon a basis of sound scientific knowledge. As regards the Press this is inexcusable. What right has anybody to report even a local Concert unless he can distinguish canto fermo from cantilena, which we suppose was the word intended in the former instance. With regard to the clergy it is different. They are more or less obliged to preach sermons on music now and then, at Choral Festivals, openings of new organs, and the like. They have a strong conviction that music is an essential element of worship, and they want to set this fact before their congregations, either to justify the amount of music admitted in the ordinary services of their Church, or some special display which they are called upon to enhance by their eloquence. Now as a rule the preachers on such occasions are drawn from one of two classes, either those clerical musicians, few in number but generally most learned, who can discourse on all the intricacies of Church music, Gregorian modes, Plain Song, &c., from the earliest ages to the present day, or gentlemen with a considerable love of music, but no scientific knowledge, and a taste which, being uncultivated, may as often lead them wrong as right. We are apt, therefore, to get a sermon either too dry and abstruse to convey much idea to the ordinary hearer, or one which, after a few "very mixed" observations on music, merely ends in the conventional remarks to members of choirs to learn their music and be reverent in their behaviour.

While admitting that the latter type of sermon will probably be of great use to the congregations before whom it is delivered, one cannot help wishing that for once a congregation of real musicians—none but artists, or those amateurs who have a right to rank with artists admitted—could be gathered together and addressed by one who was a master in both callings—at once a divine and a musician. One could fancy such a person addressing his hearers in some such words as these: "Brethren, what is the origin of music? Whence came to man the gift of melody, the divine harmony, which, first speaking to his inner ear, are by him transmitted to paper, and then, by the fingers and the breath of other men, brought into life in the outer world. Other arts, we all know, are founded on imitation. The hues of the flowers of the field and the sunset sky, the form of cloud and wave, and of God's noblest work, man; these we know the painter or sculptor catches and combines till his canvas glows with the 'light that never was on sea or land,' or the marble is kindled almost to life and speech. The arching branches or the springing leaf give rise in the architect's brain to stately aisles or frond-encrusted pillar; but the musician, whence comes his inspiration? Is it from the song of the bird, the murmur of the sea-shell, or the whisper of the wind? No. Imitation, the absolute basis of all other arts, is the destruction of his. Let him once copy a sound of nature, and his art is lost. Since it has no prototype in the kingdom of nature, whence comes it then? Do we not read in the vision of that blessed Apostle, who was admitted to see more than ever man saw before, of golden harps, of trumpets held in angel-hands, of the new song sung before the Throne. Yes, brothers, there is the home of music. It is through 'Heaven's eternal arches' that rings the great fundamental chord of all, each note of which has more resolutions than any diminished seventh ever dreamt of by man. If a son of art speaks home to the innermost hearts of men, it is because he has caught some faint far-away echo of that mighty harmony, some fragment which he is permitted to shape and fashion into a thing of beauty for mortal ears. This is why music lends itself as it does to praise. Speak words of praise and they fall cold and dead from tongue to ear; sing them, and the spirit rises on wings of aspiration until it joins the unnumbered throng prostrate in adoration before the great white Throne. Ponder, then, sons of art, your high and holy responsibility. Let not the fire kindled at Heaven's Altar be swung in any unhalloved censer before a god of this world. Let each strain caught by your inner ear be returned to heaven as pure as when it left the golden gates, and let the life which enshrines so noble a gift be consecrated to the service of the Giver."

Were an ideal preacher to enlarge on such themes as these, would he seem to musicians but an enthusiast and a visionary?

THE amazing success of the Health Exhibition, following upon that of the Fisheries last year, gives ample proof that the South Kensington authorities have discovered the means of supplying a great public want, and it may seem ungracious to introduce a discordant note in the chorus of congratulation with which their efforts to combine instruction with amusement have been greeted. But musicians, whether professional or amateur, cannot regard with unmixed feelings the treatment their art has received in connection with the undertaking. Not a word can be said against the open-air performances of our fine military bands. On the contrary, they have supplied evidence in proof of the oft-made assertion that in this department we can hold our own against foreign nations. The drop of bitterness has been infused in the cup by those who should have known better—namely, the organists called upon to give daily recitals on the magnificent instrument which stands in the Albert Hall. Once more has there been superstitious worship of the ugly idol known as "popular taste," and that in a manner peculiarly disgraceful. Some excuse may be found for public caterers who fear the pecuniary loss which might befall them by aiming "above the heads of the people," though there is ample reason for asserting that the general tendency is to underrate rather than otherwise the assimilative capacity of the multitude for high-class music. But nothing whatever can be urged in palliation of those who drag their art through the mire for the sake of merely winning applause from hearers too vulgar to appreciate recitals of genuine organ music. The correspondence we have received on the subject would, if printed, occupy many pages of THE MUSICAL TIMES, and that the complaints are well founded is plain from the sample programmes before us. In one series of three recitals the name of Bach occurs once, while that of Mendelssohn appears only in connection with transcriptions. Per contra we have Raff's Cavatina, a Minuet of Bennett (presumably from the G minor Symphony), and a Nocturne of Chopin. This, however, is a very mild instance. The "Turkish Patrol" figures in one programme, Sullivan's "Lost Chord" appears to have been in great request, and operatic overtures and selections abound. There is no occasion to draw a hard and fast line limiting the programmes to works actually written for the organ. Indeed, every recital might include one or two arrangements of suitable pieces in order to indicate the adaptability of the instrument. But it is insufferable that at South Kensington, where art in general is supposed to be cared for, the divinity of the arts should receive injury at the hands of those who ought most jealously to guard its interests. It will go forth to the world that the boasted musical progress of the English nation is after all but a sham, for even in places where the work of elevation and instruction is carried on under official auspices it is considered requisite to except music from the scheme of operations. It is not necessary for our purpose to name individual offenders. But it would have been a dereliction of our duty to have remained silent in presence of what appears to have been a professional scandal, and a few plain words in season may lead to an improvement next year.

THE Report of Dr. Stainer, Inspector of Music, on his Examination of the Students of Training Colleges in Great Britain for the year 1883, affords much matter for serious thought on the healthy progress of the art at these Institutions. With the able assistance of Mr. W. A. Barrett and Mr. W. G. McNaught, Dr. Stainer has evidently instituted a most searching enquiry as to the result of the teaching adopted; and we are sorry that we cannot extract more fully from his paper. Let us quote, however, his remarks upon the general ignorance of so many of the pupil-teachers, who, in order to secure their "pass," are obliged, on entering the College, to give time to music which they can ill spare from other subjects. "These backward students," it is said, "are, moreover, a burden to the musicmaster, they endanger the success of the part-singing, and if they fail in the examination they also injure his professional reputation. On many occasions I have been quite pained at the nervous anxiety of these unlucky students, who have perhaps laboured assiduously for nearly two years in order to pass a short practical examination, which would have presented no difficulty at all had they not been really neglected as pupil-teachers." On the whole, the papers on the theory of the art are said to have been tolerably well worked; but Dr. Stainer (as well as the Assistant Inspectors) complains that a larger number of marks is given to the theoretical paper than to the practical work; and the Report says: "Many students have admitted that they could, by committing rules to memory, resolve suspensions and discords on paper, without having in their mind the least notion of the probable musical effect of what they had written." Although not openly expressed in the Report, it is evident that much inconvenience is experienced in procuring accurate results when, as Mr. McNaught says, "The sight-tests were sung sometimes by the fixed Do method, sometimes by the movable Do method, sometimes by the tonic sol-fa notation." The uniform system of examination which it has evidently been the aim of Dr. Stainer to adopt, must be sadly interfered with by such a conflict of notations; and we sincerely hope that this difficulty, with the others hinted at in the Report, will be duly considered by "My Lords," to whom the document is officially addressed.

THE "Girl's Own Paper" is doing good service in the cause of music, and we have much pleasure in drawing the attention of our readers to its pages. From time to time articles have appeared from some of our most eminent artists, vocal and instrumental, showing the true manner in which the various branches of the art should be studied; and it need scarcely be said that such well considered papers by practised teachers of the subjects upon which they treat must be of the utmost value. But it has been reserved for Miss C. A. Macirone to contribute a series of Essays upon the true mission and power of music, the remarkable literary merit of which would entitle them to high rank, even did they not bear evidence of that thorough knowledge of the art which might be expected from the talent and experience of the authoress. Under the heading "A Plea for Music," these articles clearly demonstrate the great influence for good which intellectually trained executants can spread far and wide, and the elevated position the art should occupy in the scheme of education. Music, truly says the writer, "is a language—a living language—a language which, written, is intelligible to students of all nations—which, spoken, has a meaning for all mankind." We much regret that space will not allow us to quote largely from these interesting papers, more especially those portions in which the necessity of abolishing the idea of music being a mere "accomplishment" for girls, is insisted upon—but the following little extract is too valuable to be passed over: "One of the first evidences of reformation in amateur music would be the study and presentation of compositions having an interest and a beauty of their own, independent of any which they owe to the executive skill of those who perform them. For though very difficult music is sometimes very fine music, it by no means follows that fine music is always difficult." If Miss Macirone's salutary teaching should do anything to lessen that love for, and admiration of, individual display in our "drawing-room Concerts," there may be some hope of real progress in an art the beauties of which have been so long hidden by the vanity of those who should reveal them.

We much regret to announce that the health of Mr. Joseph Bennett has become so seriously impaired by overwork that his medical advisers have ordered him to take absolute rest for a time. His articles upon the "Great Composers," which have been so long a conspicuous feature in our journal, will therefore be suspended; but we have every hope that they will be resumed in the course of two or three months. Meantime, we are certain that our readers, who will most assuredly miss the writings of our esteemed and much valued contributor, will deeply sympathise with the cause, and join with us in the earnest wish that he may return to his literary labours completely restored by his enforced holiday.

NORWICH MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

AMONG the musical gatherings of the year, that which has been held at Norwich during the past month will occupy the place of honour. In more respects than one it has presented features of special note. In the first place, it has this year, so to speak, attained its majority, the present being the twenty-first Festival held since 1824, when the series commenced. It may, therefore, be described as a venerable institution. But, so far from showing any signs of old age, it has distinguished itself by an unusual amount of activity. Since the year 1852, when Dr. Bexfield's "Israel Restored" and Mr. H. H. Pierson's "Jerusalem" were produced, there has been, we believe, no occasion at Norwich on which the two chief novelties of the Festival have been by English composers. Two such works as Mr. Mackenzie's "Rose of Sharon" and Dr. Stanford's "Elegiac Ode" would be enough to give especial importance to any Festival; but the Norwich Committee, acting under the advice of their Conductor, Mr. Randegger, have done more for English art than this. At each of the miscellaneous concerts given, the claims of native talent have been ungrudgingly recognised, and in this respect Norwich has shown itself not unworthy to sustain comparison with our other festival centres.

Not only in the selection of its programmes, but in their execution, it is gratifying to be able to note progress. The Norwich chorus, three years since, was somewhat severely, and we must add justly, criticised for its shortcomings. That the managers took to heart the friendly counsel given them at the last Festival is plain from the improvement noticeable this year in the chorus singing. It cannot be said that the East Anglian choristers equal those of Lancashire or Yorkshire; but the fault is not theirs. Nature has not endowed them with such resonant and powerful voices as those with which she has favoured the dwellers in the North of England; and all that could be reasonably expected from them they did. Both in precision and attack, especially the latter, a marked improvement was to be perceived. Possibly the Committee may have it in their power to further increase the efficiency of the chorus by setting their faces like flints against the idea that length of service gives a prescriptive right to a place in the orchestra. The fact that a member of the choir has sung for thirty years furnishes at least a presumption that he or she is no longer so useful a member as formerly; and in such a case it is imperative that the individual be sacrificed for the good of the body corporate.

Of the soloists who took part in the Festival we shall speak as we notice the various performances; we may here take the opportunity of congratulating the managers on not engaging one "bright particular star" at preposterously high terms. The star system is the curse of music in this country, and the only way to bring prime donne to their senses is to resist their exorbitant demands. It is far better, not only in the interests of art, but for the sake of the festival itself, to spend money in securing a good ensemble than to impair the general efficiency for the sake of procuring the services of some public favourite. The orchestra, which numbered sixty-nine members, included a very large proportion of the finest players from London, and only needed a little more strength in the string department (in which it may be said in passing, amateurs were certainly out of place) to be absolutely beyond criticism.

The Festival commenced on the evening of Tuesday, the 14th ult., with a performance of "Elijah," the morning of that day, and the whole of the preceding, having been occupied with rehearsal. Concerning Mendelssohn's oratorio it is superfluous to say more than a word or two with regard to the rendering. This, though not the best in our recollection, was more than creditable. The chorus was occasionally wanting in refinement, but they sang with spirit and correctness. With one exception, the cast of soloists was familiar. Every one knows how Miss Williams, Miss Damian, Madame Patey, Mr. Maas, and Mr. Santley sing in "Elijah"; the record of their names is sufficient guarantee for the excellence of their work. The exception just referred to was Miss Emma Nevada, an American vocalist, who sang the soprano music in the second part of the work. Miss Nevada's previous career had been exclusively operatic; never before had she sung off the stage. It was no light task therefore for her to make her first appearance in a concert-room with such an air as "Hear ye, Israel"; and her nervousness was so great as to prevent her doing herself full justice. She was able, nevertheless, to prove the possession of high artistic qualifications. The opening movement of the air was given with exquisite taste and feeling, but her voice has hardly sufficient power to enable her to do full justice to the following Allegro. Later in the Festival, when she had recovered her composure, she was heard to much greater advantage; and before its close she had fully justified her selection by the committee for the important post she held.

Gounod's "Redemption," which was given on the following morning, attracted an overflowing audience, every seat in the hall being occupied. How far this was due to curiosity concerning the music, and how far to the fact that the Prince and Princess of Wales were present at the performance, it would be difficult to say, though from the interest which has been everywhere excited by Gounod's oratorio we are inclined to think that the result would probably have been the same had Royalty not honoured the festival with its presence. The "Redemption" is now so well known to our readers that criticism is as unnecessary as in the case of "Elijah." As a whole, the work was excellently given. Mr. Randegger's tempi were, in several cases, perceptibly faster than Gounod's, and some of the movements lost in breadth and dignity from this cause, and the intonation of the chorus was occasionally at fault in the more difficult passages, but, with these reservations, the performance must be warmly commended. The cast of soloists included two novel features, Miss Nevada taking the soprano solos and Mr. H. E. Thorndike singing the music of the second Narrator. Miss Nevada was not only far more at her ease than on the previous evening, but was better suited with the music. Her success was proportionately greater. Mr. Thorndike made his mark in the important part of the second Narrator, declaiming the music with much intelligence; his clear pronunciation of the text deserves special mention. The other soloists, Madame Patey and Messrs. Lloyd and Santley, sang the parts they have so often sung before in a manner which requires no criticism.

The first of the two chief novelties of the Festival—Dr. Stanford's "Elegiac Ode"—was produced on the Wednesday evening under the direction of the composer. The words are taken from Walt Whitman's Burial Hymn for President Lincoln. There are some who look upon Whitman as a poet of genius, while others regard him as little better than a lunatic. It is not our duty now to discuss this question, but we must say that it is long since we met with anything more eccentric than the words which Dr. Stanford has selected for treatment in his Ode. Whitman is not the first who has sung the praises of Death as the deliverer from the troubles of life; but he is surely the first who ever apostrophized the King of Terrors in such words as these:—

Come, lovely and soothing Death,
Undulate round the world, serenely arriving, arriving,
In the day, in the night, to all, to each,
Sooner or later, delicate Death.

Or again—

From me to thee glad serenades,
Dances for thee I propose, saluting thee—adornments and feastings for thee;
And the sights of the open landscape, and the high-spread sky are fitting,
And life and the fields, and the huge and thoughtful night.

This may be poetry, but to ourselves we confess it is more like incoherent mauding. Leaving on one side the question of its poetical merit, we are bound to allow that the words are well suited for musical illustration, and to add that the composer has taken full advantage of the opportunity they offered him. Dr. Stanford is known as a staunch adherent of the new school. He writes under the influence of Brahms, and the first and last movements of the Ode recall faintly the spirit—though not the actual themes—of the "Schicksalslied" and the "Gesang der Parzen." We intend no reflection on the composer in saying this; there are very few who are so gifted with individuality of style as to show no trace of the influence of others. Dr. Stanford has written an extremely effective and pleasing work, and in many parts, especially in the opening chorus, his music possesses real charm. The most attractive number, though scarcely to our mind the best, is the soprano solo with female chorus, "From me to thee." Taken all in all we consider the "Elegiac Ode" the best work the composer has yet given us, though we fear that the subject may prevent its becoming so popular as, on its musical merits, it deserves. It was excellently rendered; the chorus sang the by no means easy music admirably, while Miss Anna Williams and Mr. Thorndike did full justice to the solos. The remainder of the programme included the "Jupiter" Symphony, Mr. Wingham's Concert Overture in F, already heard at the Crystal Palace, a pleasing Part-song, "The calm," by Dr. Horace Hill, the Festival chorus-master, who conducted the performance, and various miscellaneous solos, of which we need only name the "Couplets du Mysoli" from Félicien David's "La Perle du Brésil," in which Miss Nevada's brilliant vocalisation created a great effect.

In speaking of Mr. Mackenzie's oratorio we are met by the difficulty that it presents so much material for remark that it is quite impossible to do full justice to it within any reasonable limits. Our labours are fortunately lightened by the full analysis of the libretto which appeared in last month's MUSICAL TIMES, to which we must refer our readers for details as to the plot of the work, and the general division of the movements, and we shall confine ourselves to speaking of the music.

Before entering into any criticism of the separate movements of the oratorio it will be well to say a few words as to the general form which Mr. Mackenzie has chosen. Instead of the customary division of each number, as in Handel's and Mendelssohn's works, the composer, remembering that he is writing a "dramatic" oratorio, has adopted the outlines of a grand opera. Each scene is complete in itself, but within a scene one number always leads without a break into another. There is a twofold advantage in this method; not only is greater continuity and unity given to the music, but untimely interruption by applause is rendered all but impossible. Another very important feature of the new work is the systematic employment of Leitmotive. These have, it is hardly needful to remind our readers, been used in oratorio before, notably in "Elijah" and "The Redemption," but never so persistently nor with such effect. In other respects Mr. Mackenzie follows the example of his great predecessors; he is no despiser of orthodox forms, of which many specimens will be found in his work; he rather within these old forms handles new material in such a manner as to produce a whole which is at once novel and artistically satisfying. The only grave fault to be found with the oratorio is its length; and for this the composer is less to blame than the librettist, who has laid out the work on too large a scale for ordinary performances. Fortunately there are many numbers which can be, and probably on future occasions will be, omitted without detriment to the dramatic continuity and coherence of the work.

The oratorio opens, after a short orchestral prelude, chiefly developed from the melody sung in the third part by the Sulamite to the words "My love is strong as death," with a Prologue suggesting the parabolic character of the drama. This is effectively set as a declamatory contralto solo in B minor; the change to the tonic major, with the entry of the brass instruments and organ at the close, to the words "We speak concerning Christ and his Church," is especially striking. The pastoral chorus with which the first part commences, "Come, let us go forth into the field," is flowing and melodious, but is far surpassed by the tenor solo which follows, "Rise up, my love," one of the most charming numbers in the oratorio, in which a lovely melody is set off by a most elegant accompaniment, in which what may be called the "vineyard theme" plays a prominent part. In this number, as also in the duet into which it leads, we find a more vocal style of writing than is common in Mr. Mackenzie's earlier works. After a resumption of the pastoral chorus, the first scene concludes with an orchestral intermezzo, entitled "Spring morning on Lebanon." The entry of Solomon and his courtiers, in the second scene, is in strongly marked contrast to what has gone before. Among the most noteworthy parts are the orchestral introduction, in which one of two important themes, always associated with the King, plays a prominent part, the broad and polyphonic chorus "God save the King," and Solomon's two songs "Thou art lovely, O my friend," and "Unto my charger," so unlike each other, and yet both so appropriate to the dramatic situation. Our space will not allow us to enlarge on the skill shown by the composer in the treatment of his Leitmotive throughout this scene; readers of the score will have no difficulty in following the thread of the ideas.

In the second part of the oratorio even a higher level is reached than in the first. The scene, it will be remembered, is in Solomon's palace. After a melodious song for the Sulamite, "The Lord is my Shepherd," which is likely to be a favourite number with soprano singers, we have the temptation of the captive maiden by the women of Solomon's court. The whole of this scene is no less remarkable for dramatic truth than for musical beauty, the soprano solo, "Tell me, O thou whom my soul loveth," perhaps, bearing away the palm where all is worthy of commendation. But it is in the following section of the work, the Procession of the Ark, that the climax is reached. This scene opens with a broad and massive chorus in G major, "Make a joyful noise unto the Lord," written in the free contrapuntal style, and as distinctly sacred in character as anything to be met with in Handel. The procession begins with a March, constructed mainly on the two "Solomon themes," and the maidens of Jerusalem pass with timbrels and dances; their chorus, "We will praise His name in the dance" (C minor), is remarkable for the individuality given to it both by the use of a scale containing the augmented second and by the piquant orchestration. The following chorus of Elders, "Beautiful for situation" (G major), while less striking in itself, is in effective contrast to the preceding. Next come the Shepherds and Vinedressers, in whose chorus, "Give ear, O shepherd of Israel," a reminiscence of the pastoral chorus of the first part is introduced with admirable effect. The bright and spirited chorus of Soldiers, which succeeds, is founded chiefly upon the Solomon themes; while that of the Priests, "I will wash my hands in innocence," brings entirely new material. Here the old ecclesiastical style is adopted with great success. When the ark passes, born by the Levites, the whole people break forth with a grand chorus, "Arise, O Lord, into Thy rest," which in effect transcends all that has preceded it. It is impossible to speak too highly of the genius, for it can be called no less, which has inspired Mr. Mackenzie in this part of his work. The constant variety in the choruses, the ever increasing interest, and the grand climax reached at the close, place this scene among the finest compositions produced during the present generation. Such language may appear exaggerated to those who have not heard the oratorio; but we believe that every one who was at Norwich will heartily endorse every word we have said. After the procession has passed, the temptation of the Sulamite is renewed by the women; but she remains firm, and the second part of the work ends with her declaration "My Beloved is mine, and I am His."

The orchestral introduction to the third part, descriptive of the sleep of the Sulamite, is a very poetical and fanciful number. The vagueness and indistinctness of the mental impressions during sleep are admirably portrayed in the music, not only by the orchestral colouring but also by the harmonic progressions. The same train of thought is continued through the following scene, the Sulamite's dream, which is set as a free recitative, the chief musical interest lying in the accompaniments. Very striking here is the triple repetition of the exclamation "Beloved!" each time differently harmonised, and interrupted by the "sleep motive." Another point of interest is the mysterious semi-chorus of watchmen, "Get thee one way or other." At the end of the dream the Sulamite's temptation recommences. Solomon's air "Threescore the queens," of which the second movement, "The daughters saw her," is particularly good, is followed by a quaint solo for the Sulamite, "Lo, a vineyard hath Solomon at Baalhamon," remarkable for its irregular rhythm. A short duet with the King leads to the finale of the third part, which commences with the Sulamite's emphatic declaration "My love is strong as death," the theme of which has been already heard in the prologue. This is subsequently combined in an ingenious manner with the chorus of women, "Art thou so simple?" bringing the part to an effective close.

The first scene of Part IV., though containing much good music, hangs fire a little, and may advantageously be shortened, as it adds nothing to the dramatic interest. The vinedressers of Sulam are lamenting the absence of the captive maiden, and praying for Divine favour. As they finish their devotions the Sulamite is seen approaching from the valley, and prayer is exchanged for praise. A brilliant chorus, "Sing, O Heavens," in Mr. Mackenzie's best style, is followed by a flowing unaccompanied quartet, which, graceful as it is, is certainly not one of the strongest numbers of the work; the subject of the chorus is then resumed with considerable modification in its treatment. The following scene between the Sulamite and the Beloved is one of the best portions of the Oratorio; the duet, "In thy shadow I will sit with delight," is full both of tenderness and passion. A short recitative introduces the hymn for solo voices and chorus, "For the flame of love is as fire," appropriately broad and simple in its character. In the peroration of this number, the theme "Love is strong as Death" is given out with grand effect by the full chorus in unison, and with the alternation of these themes the fourth part of the work ends. The epilogue which follows, excellent as a piece of sacred music, is a distinct anti-climax; and we strongly advise its omission at future performances.

We have devoted so much space to the analysis of "The Rose of Sharon," undoubtedly the most remarkable English work of modern times, that we must speak very briefly of the performance. The cast comprised Miss Nevada (the Sulamite), Madame Patey (First Woman), Mr. E. Lloyd (the Beloved), Mr. Santley (Solomon), and Mr. Thorndike (An Elder), all of whom did ample justice to the music. Miss Nevada and Mr. Lloyd, on whom the heaviest part of the work rested, sang most charmingly; the young lady was exactly suited with her part, and more than confirmed the favourable impression she had already made. The choruses, which are far from easy, were splendidly sung; the choir evidently enjoyed their work, and were doubtless also inspired by the presence of the composer, who conducted. The orchestra, on which so much of the effect depends, was admirable; and, taken all in all, it is seldom that an important new work has been presented under more favourable auspices. At the close a scene of indescribable enthusiasm ensued, and it was several minutes before the storm of applause subsided. With graceful appropriateness to the title of the oratorio, the ladies of the chorus pelted the composer with the roses with which they had decorated themselves for the occasion. Mr. Mackenzie's triumph was as brilliant as it was fairly earned; and we offer him our warmest congratulations on the greatest success he has yet obtained. "The Rose of Sharon" is not only a valuable contribution to English music; it is in our deliberate opinion the greatest oratorio written since "Elijah."

Our notice of the Festival has already extended to such a length that we must pass as hastily as possible over the remaining concerts. The most important work given at the miscellaneous concert on the Thursday evening was

Mr. Cowen's "Scandinavian" Symphony, played under the direction of the composer and received with the usual warmth. The novelties of the evening were an effective scena, "Apollo's Invocation," written by Mons. Massenet for Mr. Maas, which gave our distinguished tenor an excellent opportunity, of which he fully availed himself; a capital Madrigal, "It was a lover and his lass," composed and conducted by Mr. Barnby, for which the choir obtained a well-merited encore, and a new March, "Camp Life," the chief interest of which lies in the fact of its being composed for the occasion by the veteran, Sir Julius Benedict, for so many years the conductor of the Norwich Festival.

With regard to "The Messiah," given on the Friday morning, it is needless to do more than record a good performance, the soloists in the first part being Miss Nevada, Miss Damian, Mr. Maas, and Mr. Santley; while, in the second, Miss Nevada was replaced by Miss Anna Williams, Miss Damian by Madame Patey, and Mr. Santley by Mr. Thorndike, Mr. Maas singing the tenor music throughout. The Festival concluded the same evening with Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night," of which a good account was given, though the choir, not unnaturally, appeared somewhat fatigued by the week's exertions, and a miscellaneous selection, in which, by desire, was included the final duet and hymn from "The Rose of Sharon." This was not comprised in the original scheme, but such a general wish was expressed that a portion of the work should be repeated that the Directors modified their original scheme. The only other absolute novelty of the programme was a very graceful and charming part-song, "The Rhine Maiden," composed for the Festival by Dr. Bunnett. It was a happy thought to conclude with a selection of characteristic and humorous orchestral pieces, mostly so familiar that a record of the fact will suffice.

In looking back at the festival now past, we have only to congratulate the managers on a brilliant success. Not only have they done much for English art, but the performances which have been given have been worthy of the programmes. How much of this result is due to the energy and ability of the conductor, Mr. Randegger, and the chorus-master, Dr. Horace Hill, those will best know who have had the largest experience in musical festivals.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

THE twenty-ninth annual series of the Saturday concerts at the Crystal Palace commenced on the 18th ult. We noticed the prospectus in our last issue, and therefore may now confine our attention to the two concerts given last month. The opening piece of the first concert was Weber's overture to "Preciosa," which was played with a spirit and delicacy sufficient to prove that the orchestra was in its best "form." The favourable impression produced by this number was confirmed by the subsequent performance of Brahms's third symphony (in F major), which was twice heard at St. James's Hall, under Herr Richter, last season, but which had not previously been given at the Palace. Mr. Manns had evidently taken great pains with the preparation of the work, and the result was worthy alike of his own reputation and of that of his orchestra. The concert concluded with a very brilliant and lively "Lustspiel-ouverture" (overture to a comedy), by the recently deceased composer, Friedrich Smetana. A new violinist, Mynheer Theodor Werner, a native of Holland, made his first appearance at Sydenham with only moderate success. He was ill advised to attempt Beethoven's concerto, a work which is clearly beyond his means. His execution is very fair, though the intonation was not always faultless; but his tone is thin and wiry, and his "reading" wanting both in breadth and charm. He was more successful later in the afternoon with Ernst's "Airs Hongrois." Madame Valleria, the vocalist at this concert, sang, as she always does, most artistically, and delighted her audience both with the "Selva opaca" (from "William Tell") and with Spohr's "Rose softly blooming."

There was but one novelty at the concert on the 25th, but that was one of importance, being a selection from Mr. Mackenzie's "Rose of Sharon." The oratorio is so fully spoken of in another column that a few words will suffice in this place. The selection given included the song "Rise up, my love," exquisitely sung by Mr. Lloyd, and the two instrumental movements "Spring morning on Lebanon" and "Sleep." Of these three numbers, the song produced the most effect, apart from the context, and the "Sleep" prelude the least. This proves nothing against the value of the music; on the contrary, we are disposed to consider the last named piece the best of the three—in its proper place. Mr. Mackenzie's work hangs so well together, and the various portions are so interdependent that much of it will no more bear separation from its proper surroundings than will the music of Wagner. The whole selection was charmingly played and warmly received, Mr. Lloyd's song creating the most enthusiasm. The young French pianist, Mdle. Clotilde Kleeborg, who has been heard at Mr. Manns's benefit concert last year, gave an excellent performance of Beethoven's great concerto in E flat, subsequently playing with no less effect solos by Chopin, Mendelssohn, and Handel. The only other point requiring notice in this concert is the admirable performance of Schubert's ninth symphony, which Sir George Grove, we think, on very insufficient evidence, persists in calling the tenth.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

THE commencement of the London musical season may be said to date from last Monday, when a large gathering of amateurs in St. James's Hall listened, with evident enjoyment, to the first of Mr. Arthur Chappell's programmes. The honoured name of Beethoven headed and closed the scheme, the first item being the Quartet in E flat, Op. 74, and the last the clever Variations "Ich bin der Schneider Kakadu." The names of the executants in the former and more important work—Madame Norman-Néruda, Herr L. Ries, Herr Hollander, and Signor Piatti—are almost a guarantee of excellence in performance; but, as a matter of fact, we have heard a better ensemble, some portions of the Quartet suffering to a certain extent from a want of the proper balance of tone. Misfortunes seldom come singly, and Herr Barth, who has gained acceptance at our best concerts as a pianist of no ordinary ability, failed to give perfect satisfaction in Schumann's Etudes Symphoniques. His rendering of this remarkably original series of variations was cold and devoid of poetic feeling, contrasting unfavourably with other readings familiar to London audiences. It is fair, however, to add that Herr Barth was unfortunate in his instrument, which was not only poor in quality of tone, but out of tune. Nevertheless an encore was demanded, and the pianist responded by giving a sympathetic version of Chopin's Nocturne in F, Op. 15, No. 1. The finest performance of the evening was that of a spirited Violin Sonata in A minor, of Tartini, by Madame Néruda. The work is No. 1 of a set of six newly published, under the editorship of M. Leonard, of Brussels, who is responsible for the pianoforte accompaniment. An apology was circulated for Mr. Edward Lloyd, who had been announced to sing, and his place was taken by a young Italian vocalist, Mdle. Barbi, who earned well merited applause in an air of Buononcini and two of Schubert's Lieder "Die Schöne Müllerin." Mdle. Barbi's voice is a mezzo-soprano of only moderate calibre, but she sings with considerable refinement and intelligence. Among the announcements for the season we note that Herr Joachim will appear on February 14, and that the pianists engaged include three new-comers, namely, Mdle. Kleeborg, Mdle. Marie Fromm, and Mr. Max Pauer.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE orthodox musical season here only commences, as a rule, with October, when the several Winter Concert series are started; but there has been no lack of operatic music in Birmingham for some months past, no less than four distinct series of grand opera, besides several visits of comic opera companies, testifying to the local popularity of this form of entertainment. Among the former may be mentioned the English, the Royal English, and the Carl Rosa Opera Companies, and among the latter the "Princess Ida" and "Iolanthe" companies, organised by Mr. D'O'ly Carte. The only novelties or quasi-novelties introduced by these various companies have been the "Mefistofele" of Boito, and "The Beggar Student" of Millöcker, for which the public were indebted to Mr. Carl Rosa's enterprise, Mr. Julian Edwards's "Victorian," and Verdi's "Ballo in Maschera," performed here for the first time by the Royal English Company, of which Madame Julia Gaylord and Miss Philippine Siedel are the leading members. Although the performances of some of these works were anything but exemplary, they were well received by the public, and the large audiences assembled, night after night, showed unmistakably that the taste for lyric art is growing here.

The local Concert season opened brilliantly on the 2nd ult. with the first of Messrs. Harrison's four Popular Concerts, which was of a miscellaneous character, and scarcely worthy, in some respects, of the high artistic resources brought into play, including in the vocal department, Madame Christine Nilsson, Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Hope Glenn, Mr. Edward Lloyd and Mr. Frederic King; and as representatives of instrumental art, Mr. Louis Engel (harmonium), Mr. Van Biene (violoncello) and Mr. Sidney Naylor (pianist). Madame Nilsson, whose spirits were apparently as youthful and exuberant as ever, though she sang with more evident effort than on some previous occasions, showed in Beethoven's grand scena "Ah Perfido" that her vocal powers are practically unimpaired, and that she has lost none of her old dramatic fervour and intensity. The trivial Offenbach duet from "Les contes d'Hoffman," in which she subsequently joined Miss Hope Glenn, was so much to the taste of the audience that it had to be repeated, and a similar anti-climax was achieved in the second part of the Concert, when Madame Nilsson, after singing Bach's devotional song "My heart ever faithful," to which Mr. Van Biene contributed the violoncello obbligato, diverted herself and the audience by singing a commonplace coquettish little song by Mr. Engel, "Is it yes?" which, at the desire of the audience, she repeated. Mrs. Hutchinson's light sweet soprano voice and excellent method favourably impressed the audience in Purcell's "Nymphs and shepherds," and in Gounod's tender song "Comme la naissante aurore." Miss Hope Glenn's rich contralto voice and earnest impressive style were well suited for Haydn's "Spirit Song," and the lady delighted the audience so much by her subsequent singing of "Caller Herrin," that she was compelled to contribute another song, Lover's "How to ask and have." Mr. Edward Lloyd was effective in an air from Halévy's "La Juive" and a new song by Stephen Adams, and Mr. Frederic King's selection comprised Schubert's "Erl King" and Verdi's "Eri tu." Instrumental music occupied a very subordinate place in the programme, and comprised one movement from Beethoven's Sonata in A for pianoforte and violoncello, a Fantasia for the latter instrument by Mr. Van Biene on themes from "La Figlia," and a harmonium solo by Mr. Engel.

The annual Invitation Concert of the Birmingham Clef Club, on the 8th ult., attracted an overflowing audience. The selection comprised Mendelssohn's String Quartet in E flat (Op. 12), Beethoven's Quintet for strings in the same key (Op. 4), one of Spohr's incomparable Violin Duets, No. 2 (Op. 39), a couple of Chopin's Waltzes (Op. 42, No. 5, and Op. 34, No. 3) for pianoforte, a Violoncello solo—Popper's Sarabande and Gavotte (Op. 10)—a couple of Flute solos by F. E. Bache and Berbiguier, songs by Salaman, Parry, and Pinsuti, and Reichardt's part-song "The image of the rose." The violin playing of Messrs. Abbott and Ward, and the flute performances of Mr. James Mathews, were the features of the Concert.

On the 11th Dr. Swinnerton Heap gave the first of a new series of Chamber Concerts, which are designed to fill the void created by the discontinuance of Mr. Stratton's Concerts. The selection comprised Beethoven's String Quartet in C (Op. 59, No. 3), Mendelssohn's Sonata for pianoforte and violoncello in B flat (Op. 45), Schumann's E flat Quartet for piano and strings (Op. 47), Chopin's pianoforte Fantasia in F minor (Op. 49), and Molique's Melod'ies for violin solo (Op. 47). Mr. J. T. Carrodus, Mr. Speelman, Herr Bernhardt, and M. Vieuxtemps composed the string quartet, and the pianist was Dr. Heap. The two quartets were admirably rendered. Mr. Carrodus charmed all hearers by the beauty of his tone and the refinement of his phrasing in the Molique selection, and Dr. Heap displayed high technical skill in conjunction with a thorough and sympathetic appreciation of the intellectual qualities of the work, in the Chopin Fantasia.

Mr. Sims Reeves's Concert on the 15th attracted, as usual, a large audience, more particularly in the unreserved places. The popular tenor, who was in capital voice, sang "The Lord is very pitiful" (from Benedict's "St. Peter"), Blumenthal's "Requital," "The Macgregor's gathering," and, on a redemand of Blumenthal's song, "Come into the garden, Maud," in all of which he won great applause. Miss Mary Davies was especially successful in Cowen's song "My love is late," Cecile Hartog's "Swinging," and Bishop's old song "Love has eyes." Madame Antoinette Sterling's fine voice and excellent style were displayed to advantage in "The reaper and the flowers" (Cowen), "Love's old sweet song" (Molloy), and "We're a noddin'," two of her songs being encored. Mr. Maybrick sang a new song of his own, "The Abbot," and Callcott's "The friend of the brave," in both winning hearty applause; and Mr. Iver McKay exhibited a tenor voice of pleasing quality in Marzials's ballad "Never to know." In the instrumental department, Signor Papini (violin) joined Mr. Sidney Naylor (piano-forte) in Wolff and Vieuxtemps's arrangement of airs from "Don Giovanni," and in the two Bohemian duets by Dvorák (from Op. 32), and won a redemand by his finished performance of a Barcarole and Saltarella by Spohr.

Mr. Stockley's first Orchestral Concert, on the 16th, was, in a merely commercial sense, the most successful of the kind which has been given here for many years, and its musical interest and artistic excellence fairly justified the favour bestowed upon it. The orchestral selection comprised Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, the overtures to "Oberon" and "Le Nozze di Figaro," a Procession and Pilgrims' March from a new opera entitled "Vera," by Mr. Martin Roeder, a young Berlin composer residing at Milan; a short Intermezzo for strings, by Mr. Allan Macbeth, Conductor of the Glasgow Choral Union; and, in conjunction with the piano-forte, Mozart's Concerto in E flat, composed in 1785, played on this occasion for the first time in England. The band performances altogether were creditable, if not immaculate, one or two of the Mendelssohn numbers evidently needing an additional rehearsal. The excerpt from Mr. Roeder's opera, which was produced some three years ago, is characteristic, dramatic, and worked up with true Wagnerian breadth of phrasing. Mr. Macbeth's Intermezzo is graceful and piquant, but not distinguished by any great originality. Miss Agnes Miller's playing in the Concerto was marked, not only by excellent technique and power, but great refinement and expressiveness; and in Brahms's Rhapsodie in G minor (Op. 79) at a later period she confirmed the good impression produced by her previous effort. Madame Trebelli, who was in excellent voice, sang Meyerbeer's "Nobil Signor" and Gounod's Serenade "Quand tu chantes" (violoncello obbligato by Mr. Ould) in her best style, and on a redemand for the latter, the piquant Gavotte from "Mignon." Mr. Brereton was especially successful in Handel's "O ruddier than the cherry" and Mozart's "Qui sdegnò."

The first production here by the Carl Rosa Company of Boïto's "Mefistofele" in English, on the same evening as Mr. Stockley's Concert, caused a certain division in the ranks of local musical amateurs, but the attendance nevertheless was in both cases satisfactory. For the effective representation of Boïto's work, larger executive resources and scenic accessories were evidently needed than any touring company, however well appointed and organised, could be expected to muster. The weird and strange character of the work, however, impressed the audience greatly; the Brocken scene, in particular, being a great success, and the very original quartet at the end of the garden scene in the second act, and the beautiful duet for Helen and Pantalís at the opening of the classic Walpurgis, had to be repeated in compliance with enthusiastic encores. Madame Marie Roze gives an original and powerful study of Margaret, preserving the rustic grace and naïveté of the character throughout, and is suitably statuesque and classical in the part of Helen. Mr. Barton McGuckin appears to advantage both vocally and histrionically as

Faust, but in Mephisto Mr. Ludwig is a little too stoney and declamatory for the ideal fiend, besides being afflicted with a somewhat too pronounced vibrato in his vocal utterances. Of the other novelty of the Carl Rosa series, Millöcker's "Beggar Student," it must suffice to say that it is lively and amusing, though too trivial for the attention of a company of such pretensions as that directed by Mr. Carl Rosa. The plot is very similar to that of "The Lady of Lyons," whilst the music belongs to the school of Offenbach, without the character, sparkle, and melodic strength of the composer of "The Grand Duchess."

MUSIC IN THE WEST.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE first of the season of the Monday Popular Concerts drew a large attendance on the 6th ult., though the Colston Hall was not so absolutely crowded as we should have liked to see it. The programme opened with Beethoven's Overture "Leonora," No. 3, in C, which was very well rendered on the whole. The Symphony was Mendelssohn's ever popular "Italian," and the improvement in the performance of this great work over that of last season was very noticeable, there being very little room left for criticism. The first movement was played in a most spirited fashion, and the feeling of the Andante was extremely good, although there was a decided tendency to hurry the tempo towards the end of the movement. The work of the horns in the third movement was not quite perfect, but the Presto was truly inspiring, and the whole Symphony seemed greatly appreciated by the audience. Wagner's Overture to "Tannhäuser," always a favourite in Bristol, was given with even more than the usual vigour and force. Mendelssohn's Overture to the "Midsummer Night's Dream," with the Scherzo and Wedding March; Glinka's Scherzo "Komarinskaja," and a selection from Gounod's "Faust" completed the work of the band. The vocalists were Madame Wilson-Osman and Mr. W. Thomas, of Bristol Cathedral, who both experienced a hearty reception. Mr. George Riseley, who was most warmly welcomed, conducted with his usual ability.

The 26th Saturday Popular Concert was given by the Bristol Musical Association on the 18th ult., when Haydn's "Creation" was performed: Soloists, Miss Rhoda Fryer, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. W. Thomas; grand organ, Mr. George Riseley, principal violin Mr. F. Gardner, Conductor, Mr. George Gordon.

The second Monday Popular Concert took place on the 20th ult., before a large audience. The chief feature was Schumann's Grand Symphony in C, No. 2, given for the first time in Bristol. The Symphony had evidently been carefully and intelligently studied, and was played with point and fine expression. One or two slight weaknesses were observable, but as a whole it was a great success, and was heartily received by the audience. The overture to "William Tell" closed the first part of the programme, and was splendidly played, the last movement being certainly "fast and furious." The introduction to the first and third acts of "Lohengrin" opened Part II., and then came Paganini's "Il moto perpetuo," arranged for the orchestra by Mr. Cowen. This quite took the audience by storm, and proved the skill of the first violinists to be of a very high order; they played with most astonishing precision, and thoroughly deserved the enthusiastic applause accorded them. A selection from Verdi's "Il Trovatore" was the last item. Mr. Goldsmith and Mr. W. Thomas were the vocalists, Mr. Carrington was, as usual, the able leader of the band, and Mr. Riseley's splendid conducting contributed no little to the success of the Concert. During the season Mr. Walter Macfarren will visit us, and will conduct his "Pastoral Overture." Mr. Ebenezer Prout will produce an organ Concerto specially written for these Concerts, and Mr. F. Cowen has promised to direct the performance of his new Welsh Symphony. It is also intended that Beethoven's "Eroica" and Choral Symphonies, Goetz's No. 1 (in F), Brahms's No. 3, and Schubert's No. 2 (in C), shall be given during the season. It is sincerely to be hoped that the support needed for the permanent continuance of these excellent Concerts will not be lacking. Mr. George Riseley gave Organ recitals at the Colston Hall on the 2nd, 4th, 11th, and 25th ult.

We are delighted to hear that Mr. and Mrs. Pomeroy, in spite of the numerous discouragements they have met with, have decided to continue the Classical Chamber Concerts during this winter, and that the first is to take place this month. We heartily wish them success and more adequate support than has hitherto been accorded to them.

The most noteworthy event of the past month in Exeter has been the first Concert of the orchestral Society, recently formed under the auspices of the Western Counties Musical Association. It was well attended, and the audience seemed thoroughly pleased. The programme was interesting and not too ambitious. The overtures were excellently played, "Masaniello" being encored, as was also "The Guitarr," a pizzicato for strings. Mr. J. Pomeroy, of Bristol, gave two violoncello solos which were admirably played and much appreciated, and Guilman's First Symphony for Organ and Orchestra was exceedingly well received, the soloist, Mr. D. J. Wood, Organist of the Cathedral, being enthusiastically recalled. The whole performance reflects the greatest possible credit on the energy and perseverance of the Conductor, Mr. R. B. Moore. The band consisted of strings, complete wood wind, cornet, three trombones, euphonium and drums; and the fact that the whole of the performers, with the exception of the solo violoncello, were Exeter men, looks well for the progress of music in the city.

Mr. Farley Sinkins gave two Subscription Concerts at the Victoria Hall, Exeter, on the 23rd ult. The attendance in the morning was fairly large, and in the evening the hall was crowded. The artists were Madame Valleria, Madame Enriquez, Miss Ella Lemmens, Miss Henden-Warde, Mr. Joseph Maas, Mr. Barrington Foote (vocalists); Signor Bottesini (contra bassist), Mlle. Anna Lang (violinist) and Mr. Harvey Löhr (pianist). The programmes included selections from Handel, Rossini, Spohr, Verdi, Meyerbeer, Chopin, Gounod, Pintsuti, Balfe, Vieuxtemps, Bottesini, &c., and the audience showed themselves most appreciative. The same distinguished party visited Bristol on the 24th ult., and gave a grand Concert in Colston Hall, under the management of Mr. G. Buckland. Signor Bottesini's playing was the great feature of the evening, and drew forth unlimited enthusiasm.

The first of Mr. Augustus Aylward's Popular Orchestral Concerts took place at Salisbury, on the 15th ult., and was in every way a great success. The Band, numbering upwards of thirty, performed Mozart's Symphony No. 5 in D, the Overture to "Crown Diamonds," Barnett's "Elf Land," &c., &c. The vocalists were Mrs. Pelham Clay, Miss Maud Farebrother, and Mr. Pelham Clay. The Conductor, Mr. Augustus Aylward, met with a most cordial reception from orchestra and audience, this being his first appearance since his severe illness.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

IN addition to the engagements for the Choral Union Concerts I have to mention those of Miss Agnes Zimmermann and Mr. J. T. Carrodus. Miss Zimmermann has not been in Glasgow for a number of years. Her quiet classic style of playing will come to many as a relief from the extravagance and noise which too much mark the "advanced" school of pianoforte performance. Mr. Carrodus is no stranger in Glasgow. He was for a number of seasons the leading violin at the Orchestral Concerts, besides appearing frequently as a solo violinist, in which latter capacity he will come at this time.

I am now able to state the leading works which are to be performed at the orchestral Concerts here (and of course in Edinburgh, where the instrumental programmes are precisely the same), they are as follows:—Symphonies: Beethoven, Nos. 2, 5 and 8; Brahms, No. 3 in F; Cowen, No. 4 in B flat minor (Cambrian); Haydn, No. 9; Mozart in C (Linz); the last four for the first time. Concertos: Bach, for two violins and string orchestra; Bazzini, violin; Chopin No. 1, piano; Mozart in D minor, piano (these also for the first time); Beethoven, No. 5, piano, and in D, violin; Schumann in A, piano. Overtures: Beethoven, "Leo-nora," No. 3; Bach, in C; Mendelssohn, "Fingal's Cave"; Spohr, "Jessonda"; Méhul, "La chasse du jeune Henri"; Smetana, "Comedy"; Wagner, "Die Meistersinger," the last three for the first time. There are other familiar overtures in the list which I need not name. Among the miscellaneous works may be mentioned the following, to be performed for the first time: Beethoven, Andante in A minor, from Quartet for strings, Op. 59; Berlioz, three movements from "Romeo and Juliet"; Dvorák, Scherzo Capriccioso, and Notturmo for strings; A. C. Mackenzie, two instrumental movements from "The Rose of Sharon" ("Spring morning on Lebanon," and Prelude to third part, "Sleep"); Rubinstein, Characteristic dances from Grand Ballet "The Grape." Herr Hugo Heermann (solo violinist) will come in place of Miss Harkness, previously announced. On the Handel night in February, the programme will include the Overture to the Occasional Oratorio, an Organ Concerto, and Concerto for two orchestras.

What may be considered the first important Concert of the season was that given by the Glasgow Select Choir, on September 27, in St. Andrew's Hall. Some changes for the better have been made in the Choir, the soprano part in particular having been strengthened, if not in number, at least in quality. The general tone of the Choir is now admittedly fuller and richer. This improvement was nowhere more apparent than in Stevens's glee, "The cloud-capt towers," which was sung with splendid effect. In Eaton Fanning's accompanied choral ballad, "The Miller's wooing," which was very favourably received, the good points of the Choir were conspicuous. This melodious little piece, which was sung here for the first time, is sure to become a favourite with Societies. Sir George Macfarren's "Break, break," and Miss Macirone's "Ride a Cock-horse" (first time here), were among the successes of the Concert. Mr. James Allan conducted.

I may now mention some of the arrangements of our amateur Musical Societies. The Kyrle Choir has chosen Anderson's "Norman Baron" and Jensen's "Feast of Adonis" for performance (in keeping with the benevolent objects of the Society) at a Concert on November 28, in aid of the Sick Children's Hospital. The Dennistoun Association, which is conducted by Mr. T. S. Drummond, has selected Mendelssohn's "As the hart pants." The choir of St. Stephen's Established Church will practise Farmer's Mass in B flat. The Crosshill Society, which is this year under the charge of Mr. Alexander Patterson, will study W. H. Cummings's "Fairy Ring." The Partick Society (Mr. H. McNabb) is to take up Jackson's Cantata "The Year," and that of Pollokshields, Hofmann's "Cinderella." St. Vincent Street United Presbyterian Church Choir, which has always been distinguished for good Concerts, will this season produce Gaul's Cantata "Ruth," under Mr. H. McNabb, Choirmaster. The same work will be practised by the Gurvan Choral Union, which is also conducted by Mr. McNabb.

The series of Organ Recitals on Monday evenings, in St. Andrew's Hall, came to an end for the present on the 13th ult., the hall being engaged for some weeks on these nights by the Directors of the City Hall Saturday Evening Concerts. So far, the Organ Concerts, to distinguish them so, have been fairly successful in point of attendance. The organ performances have been judiciously varied with choral music, Mr. Taggart's Male Voice Choir singing on two evenings and the Musical Union on another. The Concerts which are to take the place of these will be of much the same character as those in the City Hall; somewhat higher, indeed, as they will appeal to audiences of a rather better class.

The introduction of organs in our Presbyterian Churches is making rapid progress. What may be regarded as the first step up the ladder on the part of the "Free Church," somewhat anomalously named, as it is the most strict of the three Presbyterian bodies, was the employment of an organ for the first time in the College (F. C.) church, Rev. Mr. Reith's, on Sunday, 12th ult. An organ was also used in Divine worship for the first time on the same day by the Wellington United Presbyterian congregation in their splendid new church in the western part of the city. Dr. E. J. Hopkins presided at the latter instrument at the different Services, and gave a Recital of organ music on Tuesday, the 14th ult., in order the better to display its resources,

Mr. Frederick Turner, from the Royal Norwood College for the Blind, has been appointed Organist and Choirmaster. A remarkably fine instrument has been erected (by Messrs. Willis) in Anderston U.P. Church, and was used for the first time on the 5th ult. Mr. Black, the lately appointed Organist, officiated. A Recital was given on the new organ by Dr. A. L. Peace on Monday the 13th.

A Musical Society has been formed in connection with the Glasgow Athenæum, a reading club and educational institution of standing and usefulness. Mr. J. Ives, Mus. Bac., teacher of the music classes in the club, will train and conduct the new Society, which has already obtained a good many members—old and present pupils.

It is a matter of wonder that hitherto there has been no club of the professional musicians of Glasgow, now a pretty numerous body. An association of such has, however, just been formed, and already forty to fifty of our best musicians have joined. Mr. Julius Seligmann, the oldest professor of music in the City, has appropriately been chosen as President. Beside dining together once a month or so, the members, it is expected, will occupy their time together in reading and hearing papers on musical subjects. They may, probably, also give somewhat of a benevolent direction to the Society.

On the evening of the 23rd ult. (the Sacramental Fast), a Concert of sacred music was given in the City Hall, by the Glasgow Select Choir. Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion," and Gounod's "By Babylon's wave," were the lengthier works performed. In the latter the Choir made a remarkable impression, their tone-force, of the purest quality, being something wonderful. Several examples were afforded of the most refined part-singing, as in Sullivan's "Watchman, what of the night," and Macfarren's "Remember me, Lord," from "King David," while the solos, sung by members, were not behind in excellence of interpretation. Mr. James Allan conducted in his usual unostentatious but effective manner. There was a very large audience.

On the same evening, in St. Andrew's Hall, the Glasgow Tonic Sol-fa Choral Society brought forward the Oratorio "Azariah," by the Rev. Marcus Hast. The work is not by any means of a high-class character, but it has several tuneful numbers, and, on the whole, it pleased very well. The choruses were sung with great vigour, one being encored. Signor Foli took the title-part, and Miss Agnes Liddell, Miss Emily Dones, and Mr. D. Lewis, were the other members of the usual quartet of solo voices. A fairly competent band supplied the orchestral accompaniments, and Mr. T. Berry presided at the organ. Mr. W. M. Miller conducted.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

MR. WADDEL'S Chamber Concerts have now taken so firm a hold on the musical public of Edinburgh that they are no longer to be considered in the light merely of an experiment. It is true that the scheme now embraces vocal solos, instead of being confined to instrumental music, but the character of the programme remains otherwise unaltered, and the growing appreciation of this class of musical entertainment is evidenced by the fact that the Concerts are this season held in a much larger room than before. The change that has now been made, from the afternoon to the evening, will also afford a better opportunity to many of becoming acquainted with the concerted instrumental masterpieces of Haydn and Beethoven, known only as yet, relatively speaking, to the few. The first of the three Concerts announced to be given this season took place on the 13th ult., in the Art Saloon, George Street, in presence of a gratifyingly numerous audience. Haydn's Quartet (No. 52, Op. 65) and Mendelssohn's Trio (No. 1, Op. 49) were among the chief concerted numbers in the programme, and these were worthily interpreted by Messrs. Waddel, Winran (in place of Mr. R. C. Mackenzie), J. K. Mackenzie and Paton, first and second violin, viola, and violoncello respectively, and Mr. Tom Craig, piano. Mr. Waddel played Schumann's Abendlied, also Nardini's antique Allegro Grazioso, and was awarded an encore for the latter. Miss Noble, who has been studying in Germany, was the vocalist of the evening. Miss Noble's selections were from Wagner, Schumann, and Schubert, and careful study was manifested in all she sang. Mr. Tom Craig particularly distinguished himself in Chopin's Ballade in A flat, which he played with remarkable neatness of touch.

A Concert was given on the 11th ult., by the Glasgow Select Choir. Their programme was of a "popular," though not necessarily of a common, character, the Concert forming one of a series being held on Saturday evenings in the Music Hall. There is apparently some change in the personnel of the Choir, but for the better, I think. A new choral ballad, by Eaton Fanning, with accompaniment (piano, in this instance), was performed with really brilliant effect, and very favourably received. Gounod's exquisite arrangement of "The last rose of summer," which, I think, ought to be better known, was warmly encored, a good evidence of increased refinement of taste among our "popular" audiences. Among the successfully rendered humorous selections, I may mention "Ride a cock-horse to Banbury Cross," by Miss Macirone, a most musicianly and, at the same time, entertaining setting of the familiar nursery rhyme; next, Lover's "Rory O'More," harmonised by W. Hume, and "Kitty Clover," words said to be by Edmund Kean, the tragedian (probably also the air), arranged by Mr. A. Patterson, a member of the choir. The two latter were encored. A marked and exemplary feature of the choral performances of this expert body of vocalists is much naturalness of expression, to the avoidance of strong contrasts of piano and forte, and of exaggerated crescendo and diminuendo. Several solos were sung with acceptance by members. Mr. James Allan, to whose high artistic instinct the choir owes so much of its success, was at his usual post of Conductor, and Mr. W. D. Swan acted as accompanist.

During the past month the Kennedy family have given a series of Concerts of Scotch music, Highland and Lowland. Mr. Kennedy, senior, whose name has been so long associated with this class of entertainment, formerly given with so much success by Wilson and Templeton, still sings with all his old spirit, pathos, and humour, if his voice now is hardly what it once was; and he is assisted by his talented family, Mr. Robert, and Misses Helen, Marjory, and Maggie Kennedy.

A performance of Haydn's oratorio "The Creation" was given in the Music Hall, on the Fast Night, 23rd ult., by the Edinburgh Select Choir. Precision of attack and artistic finish marked the choral singing, although fuller volume was desirable, and the able manipulation of organ and piano by the Messrs. Hartley, father and son, fairly well compensated for the absence of orchestral accompaniment. The solos were sung with excellent effect by Messrs. Reid and Hogg, a lady member of the choir, and a young gentleman with a pleasing baritone voice.

At Leith, on the same night, in Junction Street Hall, to a rather meagre audience, a Concert of Sacred and Secular Music was given, the principal performers being Miss Sylvani (contralto), Mr. T. E. Gledhill (tenor), Mr. Tom Walker (baritone), and Mr. J. K. Mackenzie (violinist).

THE BACH FESTIVAL AT EISENACH.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE Bach Festival, which took place at Eisenach on September 28 and 29, is an event which calls for more than a passing notice. The little Thuringian town was, it is well known, closely connected with the family of Bach, and especially with the two greatest of the name. John Christopher was organist there in the latter part of the seventeenth century; and there, in 1685, was his more famous cousin, John Sebastian, born, in that pleasant house on the Frauenplan in Eisenach, which still preserves his memory. And now that all but two hundred years have elapsed, the town has roused itself to do honour to one of its greatest citizens. The statue of Sebastian Bach which has just now been erected, is placed in a position well suited to commemorate one who was first and foremost a composer for the Church. It stands in the great marketplace at the eastern end of the principal church of the town, that of St. George. Nor is it in other respects unworthy of its subject. The sculptor, Professor Donndorf, whose monument to Schumann at Bonn is justly celebrated, has taken Bach in a standing attitude, his left hand resting on an open volume of music, placed upon a desk of which the pedestal is formed by an angel. So far as we are aware, there is no authentic picture of Bach's full-length figure; for this, therefore, the sculptor must have the exclusive credit, and we cannot but admire the ease, and, at the same time, the dignity of the pose. The head, in its masculine strength, shows itself at the first glance as an excellent portrait. The artist has indeed possibly gone too far in his resistance to the fashion of bringing up to an imaginary standard, or "idealising," the faces of famous men—a fault which reduces the value even of Krauer's fine bust, which we have seen in Mr. Klemm's shop at Leipzig. Professor Donndorf, on the contrary, has kept closely to Hausmann's portraits, and few will seriously quarrel with the result. The general opinion of critics, at the time that the new statue was unveiled, was highly favourable to the work. This ceremony took place on the afternoon of Sunday, September 28. The proceedings began with a very interesting "Trompetenfanfare." An oration was made by a local ecclesiastic; the statue was exposed to view, the sculptor congratulated, and a choral ("Allein Gott in der Höh sei Ehr'") sung by the school children. Then there was a procession of little girls with flowers, which soon lay in heaps at Bach's feet, and six enormous wreaths were placed among them by different musical societies. Two were from Eisenach itself, one from Erfurt; the other three were from the Berlin Sing-Akademie, the Leipzig Bach-Verein, and—it is gratifying to add—the Cambridge University Musical Society. Among the musicians who attended the festival were Professor Joachim, the two biographers of Bach, His Excellency Herr C. H. Bitter (Prussian Minister of Finance), and Professor Spitta; Professors Blumner and Schaeffer, heads respectively of the Sing-Akademien at Berlin and Breslau; Herr von Herzogenberg, the director of the Bach-Verein at Leipzig; the Baron von Loën, superintendent of the Weimar Theatre; the Abbé Liszt, and Herr Wasielewsky. Among Englishmen we noticed Sir Herbert Oakeley, Messrs. Otto Goldschmidt, Villiers Stanford, John Farmer, and R. L. Poole. There were also some members present from the Grand-ducal houses of Weimar and Meiningen. The one man, however, to whom the Festival owes most is Herr von Eichel-Streiber, already distinguished by his princely munificence to the town of Eisenach, who, although by no means a professed musician, has devoted himself with generous and unflagging enthusiasm to superintending the arrangements of the Bach Festival.

For readers of THE MUSICAL TIMES the chief interest will attach to the Concerts which accompanied the event, and which claim attention as being the first Concerts since Bach's time in which his works have been produced precisely as he intended them to be produced, only with the greater perfection which numbers and the selection of performers make attainable in modern times. It is this fact which makes the Eisenach Festival one of distinct historical significance. Here we had no "additional accompaniments," no "new parts"; everything was played as written, and by the instruments for which it was written. The only exception to this rule was caused by the sudden indisposition of the performer on the corno di caccia, whose place was taken at the last moment by a player on the common vent-horn from Weimar. Otherwise the identical instruments of the original were used throughout, and the Mass in B minor was heard at last, as it should be, with the trumpet restored to the place usually occupied by the clarinet, and the oboe d'amore to that of the ordinary hautboy. The result would have been a surprise to the writers of "new parts," who have acted on the theory that the orchestra is an entirely modern invention, and that all older music must be adjusted to the standard raised by Mozart and Beethoven—and these, too, a certain school delights in regarding as antiquated—for fear that otherwise they might appear imperfect and even flat. We venture to say that it was only necessary to attend the performance of the "Hohe Messe," at Eisenach, to be undeceived in any such fancy. We have heard the Mass often, but never before realised the variety, the richness, and the originality of its mere orchestral effects. In particular, we have to notice the brilliancy of the use here made of the trumpet. Sometimes, as in the orchestral Suite in D major, which was given in the second Concert (and especially in the well-known gavotte), the trumpets are introduced in such a surprising way as almost to persuade us that it is not instruments but a choir of human voices that we hear asserting themselves above the strings. Herr Julius Kosleck, of Berlin, who played the first trumpet, is not only a highly gifted performer, but an artist whose aim it is to restore his instrument to the high position which it held a century and a half ago. His own instrument is an exact copy of one three hundred years old, which he found in a shop at Heidelberg. Those were the days when musicians knew how to play upon and to write for the trumpet. But the invention of an easier and more versatile instrument in the clarinet drove its predecessor out of the field, and no one seems to have cared for the noble and sonorous quality of sound which was lost by the substitution. Herr Kosleck's trumpet, however, cannot be compared with those in common use; it is distinguished, to start with, by its extraordinary range, going as high as E in alt (for instance, in the "Cum sancto Spiritu" in the Mass). And it need not be said that its timbre is of a kind that cannot possibly be represented, as is usually done, by the clarinet. We are glad to say that it is already stated that Herr Kosleck has been invited to introduce his remarkable re-discovery to the London public when the Mass in B minor is produced next Spring. We have left ourselves too little room to speak of the oboe d'amore as played by Herr Wieprecht, also of Berlin. It was used more than once in accompaniment to the solo voice in the Mass, and in the second Concert in the so-called "pastoral" symphony, and the air "Schlafe," in the Christmas Oratorio; and its effect, though less novel than that of the trumpet, had a peculiar pathos, quite distinct from that of the simple hautboy.

The performance of the Mass was one of remarkably uniform excellence. Herr Joachim conducted; and we may remark that his beat was regularly a good deal faster than that to which we have been accustomed in the Concerts of the Bach Choir. The impression made by this change (for instance, in the "Dona nobis pacem") was certainly striking, but we are inclined to question whether it is altogether so well adapted to the style of some of the choruses as a more solemn pace. The band was mainly formed by the Court-orchestra of Weimar, strengthened by picked musicians from Berlin, Meiningen, and other places, under the leading of Herr Halir, the talented first-violinist at Weimar; and the chorus was selected from the choral societies—more than seven in number—of Weimar, Erfurt, and Eisenach. Among the soli Herr Staudigl, the famous Carlsruhe bass, and Fräulein Spiess, who sings an exquisite and rarely trained alto, were conspicuous. The only noticeable defects in the performance were an uncertainty, due doubtless to nervousness, in the opening chorus, and a slight falling in tone at the end of the "Et incarnatus est." Herr Staudigl was also rather inclined to hurry the time in the rapid passages. But, as a whole, the Concert was not only a decided success, but a genuine achievement of which Eisenach may justly be proud. The second Concert, to part of which we have already alluded, was of a miscellaneous character. Herr Joachim surpassed himself in the great Chaconne, and, with Concertmeister Halir, led the Concerto for two violins. The performance of the Motett "Singet dem Herrn" was a masterpiece of choir training, though we confess we have heard it with more pleasure when sung by the smaller choir of men's and boy's voices in Bach's own Thomaskirche at Leipzig. Among the other pieces in the programme the only one ineffectively rendered was the great Prelude and Fugue in G minor; nor can the organist, Herr Schulz, of Berlin, excuse himself by the imperfections of his instrument. True, it was feeble in the pedals and incapable of striking effects; but this will not account for the inaccuracy (to use the gentlest term) of Herr Schulz's playing or the absolute monotony of his registration. But it has to be admitted that the old art of organ-playing has fallen into deplorable decay in Germany at large. We cannot remember an occasion in which we have heard a performance in that country at all approaching a satisfactory result. With this one exception, and with the unfortunate drawback that the electric light in the church where the Concerts were given was very inconstant on the second evening, and often seriously disturbing from the noise it made, the Eisenach Festival has done more than justify the expectations of those who promised themselves an enjoyment of an almost unique kind. It has vindicated for the town the honour of being worthy to have produced Bach.

MR. SAMUEL HAYES announces a short season of Italian Opera at Her Majesty's Theatre, commencing on the 3rd inst. with Rossini's "Il Barbiere di Siviglia." Whether it is politic on Mr. Hayes's part to preface his new venture by a long address, telling us that Italian music has entered deeply into the hearts and feelings of the English nation, and that it is absurd to suppose that it "should be allowed to fall into decay for the exhibition of a Gothic and unvocal school," we will not stop to discuss, as this assertion will be most satisfactorily answered by the amount of patronage bestowed upon his efforts. The prospectus informs us that the operas "will be presented in the completest manner possible," and that the following artists are engaged: Mdle. Bianca Donadio, Mdle. Arnoldson (their first appearance in England), Mdle. Annie Abu, Mdle. Carlotta Desvignes, Mdle. Le Brun, Mdle. Helen Franch, and Mdle. Anna de Belocca; Signor Frapolli, Signor Padilla, Signor Castelmari, Signor Zoboli, and Signor Foli. There are to be three Conductors, Signor Bottesini, Mr. Gilbert H. Betjemann, and Signor Tito Mattei. The performances will be given on four evenings of the week—namely, Monday, Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday; and the prices of admission will be greatly reduced from the usual scale of charges at the Italian Opera.

A HARVEST Thanksgiving Service was held at the interesting and fine old church of St. Giles', Cripplegate (one of the few city churches that escaped destruction in the great fire), on Monday evening, the 13th ult. The musical arrangements were in the hands of Mr. R. J. Pitt, the Choir-master of the church, who conducted a creditable performance of Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion," in the accompaniment of which a small orchestra was employed in addition to the organ. The solos were taken by Master H. Tebbutt, principal soprano of Brompton Parish Church; Messrs. H. Weir (alto), of All Saints' Margaret Street, Chapman, and J. Haddon. At the conclusion of the Cantata, after the collection of the Offertory, a "Second Part" (term strangely suggestive of the Concert-room) followed, consisting of the duet "O lovely peace," the solos "O God have mercy," "O rest in the Lord," and "With verdure clad," the "Hallelujah" Chorus, and a Hymn. We fail to see the object of the performance of a musical medley of this class—emphatically it serves no artistic end; judging, too, from the behaviour of the congregation, at times the reverse of what it ought to have been, the more important causes of devotion and worship seemed to have been by no means furthered. The Allegro and March from Handel's Occasional Overture were played on the organ and band (a most unhappy combination, in our opinion, for the purposes of an out-voluntary) at the conclusion of the Service.

HARVEST Festival Services were held at the Church of St. Edmund the King and Martyr, Lombard Street, commencing on Thursday, the 2nd ult. At noon a Choral Celebration was given, the Communion Office being Dr. Garret in A, and a Paternoster in A, by Mr. W. M. Wait (Organist of All Saints', Clapton), the latter composition being written expressly for this occasion, subsequent to which a Te Deum in F (Winchester) was sung. Evening took place at 7.30, commencing with a Processional Hymn, the remainder of the music at this Service being the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis (Winchester in F); Anthems, "The Lord hath done great things" (Smart) and Handel's "Hallelujah Chorus." The Services were continued on the following Sunday, when the greater portion of the music was repeated, an anthem by Calkin, "I will magnify Thee, O God my King," and a solemn Te Deum (Garrett in D) being substituted for the anthems of the festival evening. The choral music was excellently rendered, under the able conductorship of Mr. C. E. Tutill, the Director of the choir. Miss Kate Westrop presided at the organ, and at the close of each Service gave a short Organ Recital.

WE have followed for some years past, and recorded with much pleasure from time to time, the artistic progress of that brilliant and sympathetic pianist, Herr Franz Rummel. Only in our last number we apprised our readers of his having been enlisted amongst the professors of one of the leading musical institutions of Germany—viz., the Stern'sche Conservatorium of Berlin. This appointment having, of course, definitely determined the virtuoso's residence at Berlin during the best part of the year, his participation in the performances of the leading Concert institutions of that capital becomes a matter of course. Thus we have already been informed of the success achieved by Herr Rummel, at the opening Soirée of the present season of the Royal Orchestra at Berlin, in his "brilliant, thoughtful, and poetic" rendering of Schumann's Pianoforte Concerto in A minor. The epithets applied here merely condense the laudatory tributes accorded to the artist's performance by the Berlin press; and there can be scarcely a doubt that his position as a leading pianist, in a capital overflowing with more or less gifted virtuosi of his instrument, has become firmly established.

ON Sunday evening, September 28, Mendelssohn's Cantata "Lauda Sion" was performed at the Royal Military Chapel, Wellington Barracks, with a complete orchestra and chorus, numbering seventy, under the direction of Mr. Richard Lemaire, the Choirmaster of the Chapel. The occasion was the Harvest Festival. There is no organ in the Chapel, but the services are always well accompanied by a portion of the Guards' bands. Processional Hymns were used, and Dr. Bunnett's popular Evening Service for the Canticles, which had been most effectively scored for the orchestra. Mendelssohn's work was admirably rendered. We understand that a series of Special Musical Services is to be given in the same locality, and under Mr. Lemaire's conductorship. On each occasion one of the standard Oratorios or Cantatas will be rendered by a complete orchestra and choir. The first Service is to take place on the evening of Advent Sunday (30th inst.), when Mendelssohn's "Lobgesang" will be performed. The Services will commence at 6 p.m., and no tickets will be required for admittance.

ON the 6th ult (St. Faith's Day), a Special Service took place at the church of SS. Augustine and Faith, Old Change, City, the Rector, the Rev. W. H. Milman, officiating. The Canticles were sung to Stainer in A, the anthem being "Then shall the righteous" and "Happy and blest" (Mendelssohn). The service was followed by Dr. Stainer's Cantata "The Daughter of Jairus." This, as well as the service, was most creditably performed by the choir of the church, with the additional assistance of one treble and four adult voices. The treble solos were taken by Master W. Tylor of the Temple Church, those for the tenor and bass being allotted to Messrs. Newth and Martin, of St. Augustine's Choir, the whole being under the direction of Mr. C. E. Miller, the Organist and Choirmaster, who presided at the organ. A very large congregation seemed fully to appreciate the beauties of Dr. Stainer's work, and the good taste displayed in its rendering.

THE "Church Oratorio Society," established for the singing of Oratorios and other sacred music in churches, announces that Spohr's "Last Judgment" and Mendelssohn's "Elijah" will be placed in rehearsal during the coming session, and that the first-named work will be sung at a service in St. Matthew's Church, Oxhey, on December 3. The Society, under the conductorship of Mr. James Turpin, Mus. Bac., will only give its aid under three conditions—viz., that the music shall form part of a Service; that no charge be made for admission; and that the poor be duly accommodated. The Organist to the Association is Mr. E. H. Turpin.

The 189th Monthly Concert of the St. George's Glee Union was held at the Pimlico Rooms, on the 3rd ult. A very attractive miscellaneous programme was well rendered, the artists being Miss Madeline Hardy, Miss Cowdery, Miss Nellie Watts, Miss Clara Myers, Mr. Hirwen Jones, and Mr. J. D. Balfé. Miss Alice Ivimy contributed a violin solo, and Mr. F. R. Kinkeed presided at the pianoforte. Mr. Joseph Monday conducted.

ON the 7th ult. the annual presentation of diplomas, certificates, and medals to the successful candidates at the examination in connection with Trinity College, London, took place in the hall of the institution, Mandeville Place, Manchester Square. The Rev. H. G. Bonavia Hunt, F.R.A.S., the Warden, presided, and after the distribution delivered the inaugural address of the session. The five principal honours were the degree of licentiate of the College, and these were awarded to William Alexander Collisson, Edward Hulton Middleton, William Henry Barrow, Joseph Curtis and William James D. Butt. The two first-named students had already obtained University honours. Two silver medals, given by Mr. Bradbury Turner, the director of studies, have this year been won by Miss Maud Lee (singing), who is the Sims Reeves vocal exhibitor of the College, and Mr. Arthur Le Strange (pianoforte).

WE regret that we cannot find room for the full particulars of the scheme for the promotion of popular Musical Education in Paisley for 1885, a prospectus of which has been forwarded. We may, however, mention that Examinations will be held in May next year for Junior, Elementary, Intermediate, Matriculation, and Advanced Certificates, prizes being given to students who pass the two last named Examinations satisfactorily. Two Scholarships of £10 each are also offered to Paisley students who are best prepared to enter the Tonic Sol-fa College, Trinity College, or the Royal College of Music; and prizes of various amounts for Part-singing, Solo Sight-singing, Violin playing, and Original Composition and Harmony. Assuredly all who wish well to the progress of sound musical education owe a deep debt of gratitude to the promoter of so excellent and comprehensive a project.

THE session for the evening classes at Owens' College, Manchester, was opened on the 13th ult. with a lecture on "Science and Art," by Dr. Hiles, one of the lecturers on Harmony and Composition. In the course of his address Dr. Hiles asserted that music, "apart altogether from acoustics, was an exact science, having a minute classification, a nicety of proportion, an intimacy of relationship, a delicate discrimination of duration, weight and quality, beyond all other arts and most sciences." During the lecture he announced that four "Hargreaves" Scholarships, of the value of £15 per annum, would be competed for at the close of the session, and expressed an earnest hope that when this offer became generally known many young men would be attracted to the Harmony Classes, and also that it would materially aid in raising the tone of musical tuition in the whole district.

THE Harvest Thanksgiving Services at Christ Church, Westminster Bridge Road (Rev. Newman Hall's), were held on Wednesday and Sunday evenings, the 15th and 19th ult. The musical selection comprised Tallis's Responses (festa setting), special Psalms and Hymns, Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in F (E. Prout), the chorus "All men all things" ("Lobgesang"), and an anthem, "Rejoice in the Lord, O ye righteous," specially written for the occasion by Mr. J. R. Griffiths, Organist and Director of the Choir. The recitatives and solos in the anthem were well rendered by Mr. George Whillier, and the choral portion of the Service was sung with care and expression. The church was crowded on each evening.

THE Harvest Thanksgiving Services at the Church of SS. Augustine and Faith, Old Change, were held on Sunday last, the 26th ult., Mr. C. E. Miller presiding at the organ. The morning music consisted of Stanford's Te Deum and Benedictus in B flat, Dr. G. C. Martin's complete Communion Service in C, with Barnby's "O Lord, how manifold," for the offertory anthem; and at Evensong the Service was Miller in D (composed for last year's Festival of the London Church Choir Association), with Goss's "Fear not, O Land," for the anthem.

THE Harvest Festival Services at St. James's, Clerkenwell, were held on Sunday, September 28, when selections from Haydn's "Creation" were excellently rendered by a largely augmented choir, with Miss Ornarey, Mr. H. Cooper, and Mr. Egbert Roberts as solo vocalists. Mr. James Robinson presided at the organ. The church was crowded.

THE Concert season of the Bach Choir in 1885 will open at St James's Hall on Thursday evening, February 19, when will be performed a selection from J. S. Bach's "Christmas Oratorio," also (for the first time in England) a short Oratorio by Friedrich Kiel, called "The Star of Bethlehem," and (for the first time in London) Hubert Parry's "Scenes from Shelley's 'Prometheus Unbound.'" This Concert will be followed, on Saturday afternoon, March 21, by a Festival performance of J. S. Bach's Grand Mass in B minor, organised by the Bach Choir in conjunction with the Henry Leslie Choir and others, and to be given at the Royal Albert Hall, with a chorus of about 600 voices and proportionate orchestra, on the 200th anniversary of the birthday of the composer.

A SPECIAL feature of the Harvest Festival held at Holy Trinity Church, Tulse Hill, on the 4th ult., was an excellent rendering of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" by a choir numbering about eighty voices, and a full orchestra. The solos were undertaken by Mr. J. Probert and Masters H. Townsend and F. Walenn. The choruses were admirably given, and the instrumental portions of the work, played by a band which included as leader Mr. Pollitzer, left little to be desired. The Organists were Messrs. E. J. Quance and Mr. W. E. Stark, who also played several voluntaries before the service. Mr. Humphrey J. Stark, to whom much credit is due for the success of the Festival, conducted with care and ability.

THE Church of St. Luke's, Chelsea, was re-opened on the 18th ult.—St. Luke's Day—on which occasion, after a short sermon by the Rev. R. Eyton, M.A., Handel's "Dettingen Te Deum" was performed with full orchestra. The band, numbering about forty, was led by Mr. S. Dean Grimmon. The ordinary Church Choir was augmented to the extent of some hundred voices, and throughout the work unmistakable evidence was given of careful and adequate preparation, the choruses being sung with unflinching precision and accuracy of intonation. Miss A. W. Mackie presided at the organ, Mr. F. E. W. Hulton, Mus. Bac. Oxon., officiating as Conductor. The church was densely crowded.

HARVEST Thanksgiving Services took place at St. Mark's Church, Marylebone Road, on Thursday, the 9th, and Sunday, the 12th ult. Great credit is due to Mr. W. Howard Magrath, the Organist, for the energy shown in the preparations and rehearsals for these Services, which have proved so highly successful. The Special Psalms were sung to chants expressly composed for the Festival. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were Goss in A; the Anthem, "I will magnify Thee," by the same composer. The choir of St. Mark's was assisted by Mr. Martin Morris's choir, of St. Mary's, Bryanstone Square. Mr. Magrath gave a short Organ Recital after the Thursday Evening Service.

AT the recent examinations for Degrees in Music at the University of Oxford the following candidates satisfied the Examiners:—For the degree of Bachelor in Music—J. Langran, Hertford College, and Tottenham, London, N. For the degree of Doctor in Music—J. C. Bridge, M.A., Exeter College, and Chester; H. J. Edwards, Keble College, and Barnstaple; H. Walsley Little, New College, and Brixton Rise, London, S.W.; C. J. Vincent, New College, and Hampstead, London, N.W. Examiners—Sir F. A. Gore Ouseley, M.A., D.Mus., Christ Church, Professor; C. H. H. Parry, M.A., D.Mus., Exeter, Choragus; E. G. Monk, D.Mus., Exeter.

AT the annual general meeting of the Cheltenham Musical Society, the reports presented by the Secretary and Treasurer were highly satisfactory, three Concerts having been most successfully given during the past season, at which Bach's "Christmas" Oratorio, Flotow's "Martha," Barnby's 97th Psalm, Dr. Bridge's "Hymn to the Creator," and Hofmann's "Melusina" were performed. The practices for the season have commenced, under the conductorship of Mr. von Holst, who has succeeded Dr. Dyer.

THE St. John at Hackney Musical Society commenced its rehearsals for the present season on the 14th ult.; Conductor, Mr. Arthur Trickett, F.C.O. The works to be performed are Sterndale Bennett's "Woman of Samaria" and Barnett's "Ancient Mariner."

HARVEST Thanksgiving Services were held at St. Saviour's, South Hampstead, on the 18th and 19th ult., when the organ, which has been reconstructed by Messrs. Hill and Son, was re-opened. The services were fully choral, including the Te Deum, by H. Smart, and the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, by A. J. Greenish, F.C.O. The following anthems were very fairly rendered:—"I will give thanks" (Barnby), "Ye shall dwell in the land" (Stainer), and "O Lord, how manifold" (Barnby). The offertories throughout the Festival were devoted to the St. Saviour's Mission Room, and the fruit, &c., to the sick poor. Mr. A. J. Greenish (Organist) conducted, and after evening service gave an Organ Recital.

THE Harvest Festival at St. Peter's, Lordship Lane, Dulwich, took place on Sunday, September 28. The Services were well rendered by the choir, which was augmented for the occasion. The Te Deum was sung to Hopkins in G, and the anthem was "Thou visitest the earth" (Greene), the tenor solo being taken by Mr. Johnson, of St. Peter's choir. In the evening the Cantate and Deus Misereatur were Bunnett in F, and the Anthem, "Ye shall dwell in the land" (Stainer), bass solo, Mr. Langmead (Guildhall School of Music). After the Evening Service Mr. A. F. Grainger gave a short Organ Recital.

MR. W. BALY, for fifteen years Conductor of the Exeter Madrigal Society, was recently presented with a purse of sovereigns, the gift of 110 subscribers, on the occasion of his retirement from the post of honorary Conductor. The gift was accompanied by a book, which bore an inscription recording the fact that the testimonial was "In appreciation of fifteen years of unremitting attention to the office, and as a token of the friendly feeling entertained for him generally by the members of the society." The presentation was made by Mr. G. Franklin, J.P., in the presence of a number of members of the Society and friends.

HARVEST Thanksgiving was celebrated in Christ Church, Battersea, on Saturday and Sunday, the 11th and 12th ult. The services throughout were fully choral, and capitally rendered by the choir of the church. The Anthems were "Ye shall dwell (Stainer), "O Lord, how manifold" (Barnby), and "The Earth is the Lord's" (Lowe). At the choral celebration of Holy Communion, Woodward in E flat was the service chosen. The church was tastefully decorated, and the services attracted crowded congregations. Messrs. Whyte and Moore were the soloists, and Mr. S. Leighton presided at the organ.

THE members of the Grosvenor Choral Society gave their 152nd Monthly Concert at the Grosvenor Hall, on Friday, the 17th ult. Niels Gade's Cantata "The Erl-King's Daughter" formed the first part of the programme, the solos being well rendered by Mrs. Luff, Madame Florence Winn, and Mr. Frank May. The choruses were given with much vigour and precision. The second part consisted of a miscellaneous selection, the above named vocalists, with the addition of Mr. Atherton Furlong, being the soloists. Mr. David Woodhouse conducted.

THE Annual Harvest Thanksgiving Services were held at St. Simon's Church, Upper Chelsea, on Sunday, September 28. Best's Benedicite was sung in the morning, and at the evening service, Bunnett's Cantate Domino and Deus Misereatur in F. The anthems were "O Lord how manifold" (Barnby), and "Fear not O Land" (Goss). The music was under the direction of the Organist and Choirmaster, Mr. Henry A. Evans, and the singing of the choir was excellent throughout. The vicar, the Rev. Alfred J. Myers, B.A., preached the sermons.

AT the East London Union for Advanced Education (evening classes), Jubilee Street, Stepney, the Committee has secured for the Thursday evening violin classes, the services of Mr. A. Parker, professor of the violin and violoncello to the Birkbeck Institute and South London College of Music; and of Mr. Goodwin, of the Royal Academy of Music, for the Tuesday evening pianoforte classes.

WE understand that Dr. F. E. Gladstone is writing a secular Cantata, entitled "Constance of Calais," for the concluding Concert of the ensuing season of the Highbury Philharmonic Society.

THE Harvest Festival at Eccleston Square Church, Belgrave Road, took place on Wednesday, September 24. An address was delivered by the Pastor, the Rev. Dr. Hiles Hitchens. The Service consisted of several anthems and solos suitable to the occasion, amongst them being an anthem for unison voices, "Praise ye the Lord," composed by the Organist of the Church, Mr. Rowland Briant, F.C.O., under whose direction the musical arrangements were given. The church was tastefully decorated with flowers, fruit, &c., and was filled with a large congregation.

HARVEST Thanksgiving Services were held at St. Luke's Church, Uxbridge Road, W., on Saturday evening and Sunday, the 18th and 19th ult. Luard Selby's Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in A, and Berthold Tours's new anthem, "While the earth remaineth" (the tenor solo in which was sung by Mr. C. Scudamore), were used at the Saturday evening Service. On Sunday evening the anthem was "All Thy works," by E. H. Thorne; and Mr. F. G. Cole presided at the organ. The large choir of the church sang admirably throughout.

THE Harvest Thanksgiving Services at the Parish Church of St. Mary, Balham, were held on the 2nd and 5th ult. At Matins the Te Deum was sung to Dykes's Setting in F, and the Communion Service to Woodward, in E flat. At Evensong the Service was Tours in F, and the Anthem, Lowe's "The earth is the Lord's." Dykes's Te Deum being also sung at the conclusion of the Service on the Thursday. Mr. H. W. Weston, Organist and Choirmaster, presided at the organ during the Festival, and after Evensong on Sunday played a selection of music.

OUR attention has been called to a slight inaccuracy in our account of the recent Harvest Festival at St. John's Church, Waterloo Road, by a correspondent who mentions an orchestral service held in the church in the year 1872. Since that time, not unnaturally, both Vicar, Organist, and Choir have changed; and the spirit of our statement is therefore scarcely incorrect. We willingly, however, add the words "under the present régime" to our statement that the occasion in question was the first on which orchestral instruments had been used in the church.

THE Harvest Festival at St. Paul's Church, Forest Hill, was held on Friday, September 26. The Service used on the occasion was Bayley in F, and the anthem consisted of the first part of Haydn's "Creation." The accompaniments were sustained by a quartet of brass instruments, in addition to the organ. The Festival was continued on the following Sunday, when the anthems were "Blessed be the name of the Lord," by Gadsby, and "O that men would praise the Lord," by Mr. J. H. Maunder, Organist of the Church. The services were very successful.

HARVEST Thanksgiving services were held in Dulwich College Chapel of Ease, on the 12th ult. The music was of a Festival character, and excellently sung by the choir; the chanting of the psalms being especially deserving of praise. B. Tours's Service in F was used; and the creeds were set by Dr. E. J. Hopkins. The anthem was "Ye shall dwell in the land" Dr. J. Stainer; and the Offertory Sentences were by Dr. G. C. Martin. Mr. William H. Stocks (Organist of the Chapel) presided at the Organ.

THE prospectus of the sixth season of the Subscription Smoking Concerts announces that five Concerts will be given at the Cannon Street Hotel, commencing on the 18th inst. The services of Mr. Frank Arnold (violin) have been secured, and engagements are pending with other instrumentalists. Mr. Fountain Meen and Mr. Alfred Izard will preside at the pianoforte. The usual "Ladies' Concert" (not included in the subscription) will take place on May 12, 1885.

THE Middlesbrough Musical Union, which performed "The Redemption" so successfully last season, promises its subscribers Mendelssohn's "Elijah" on December 17, with Misses Marianne Fenna and Jeanie Rosse, Messrs. D. S. Macdonald and Frederic King. Mr. Kilburn will, as usual, direct the performance.

THE Conductorship of the Rochester, Chatham, and Strood Choral Society, vacant by the resignation of the Rev. Precentor Nutter, has been accepted by Mr. J. A. Kappay, a musician well known in the locality.

THE Devonport Choral Society announces three Concerts at the Public Hall during the season 1884-5, Handel's "Acis and Galatea," C. H. Lloyd's Cantata "Hero and Leander," and Sir Sterndale Bennett's Cantata "The May Queen" being the works selected for performance. The vocalists are Miss Agnes Thornhill, Messrs Charles Abercrombie, Edwin T. Morgan, and W. H. Jarvis, with full band and chorus; Hon. Conductor, Mr. S. Bradbury. The first Concert takes place on the 19th inst.

MRS. REGAN'S Three Subscription Concerts, at the Assembly Rooms, Digby Hotel, Sherborne (the first of which was announced for the 22nd ult.), judging from the programme forwarded to us, will prove highly interesting to the lovers of classical music. The instrumentalists engaged are, violin, Mr. Frye Parker, R.A.M.; viola, Mr. Regan, R.A.M.; violoncello, Mr. W. E. Whitehouse; and flute, Herr Oluf Svendsen; vocalists, Miss Spenser Jones and Miss Effie Clements; pianist, Mrs. Regan.

THE prospectus of the "Chamber Music Society," at New-castle-upon-Tyne, for the fifth season, 1884-5, announces that five Concerts will be given in the Assembly Rooms, commencing on the 7th inst. The artists already engaged are, first violin, Messrs Joachim, Ludwig Straus and Henry Holmes; second violin, Messrs Frye Parker and Speelman; viola, Messrs Gibson and Bernhardt; violoncello, Messrs Piatti, Vieuxtemps and E. Howell; pianoforte, Miss Agnes Zimmermann and Mr. Rea, and a vocal quartet.

THE Kyrle Choir gave a performance of "Elijah" on the 16th ult., in Trinity Chapel, Poplar. The soloists were Miss Edith Phillips, Miss Clara Myers, Mr. R. Bennetts and Mr. Albert Orme. At a second performance of the Oratorio on the 23rd ult., the soloists were Miss Alice Fripp, Mrs. Dean, Mr. John Probert, and Mr. Bicknell Young. Mr. Malcolm Lawson conducted, and Mr. E. H. Turpin accompanied on the organ at both performances.

THE Society for the Promotion of Orchestral Playing, recently formed in Manchester, under the direction of Dr. Hiles, will doubtless do much towards the encouragement of this important branch of the art, by affording the same facility for the practice of combined instrumental, as now exists for the practice of choral, music. Classes for the violin are already in active operation; and arrangements are in progress for instruction upon other instruments. We cordially wish the Society every success.

MR. WALTER MACFARREN has during the past month been giving his lecture, "The Literature of the Pianoforte," before crowded audiences in Birmingham and its immediate neighbourhood. The Lecture was illustrated by a Recital, in which Mr. Walter Macfarren performed selections from Mozart, Beethoven, Cramer, Weber, Mendelssohn, Chopin, Schumann, Sterndale Bennett, and also some of his own compositions, upon a fine Broadwood Concert Grand Pianoforte.

HARVEST Thanksgiving Services were held at St. James the Less, Westminster, on Sunday, the 19th ult. The Evening Service consisted of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis set to the Parisian Tone by Dr. Stainer, and the anthem "While the earth remaineth" by Berthold Tours, which was most effective, both the choir and the soloist doing full justice to this bright composition. Mr. H. M. Higgs presided at the organ.

THE Festival of the Medical Guild of St. Luke was held on the eve of the feast of its patron, Friday the 17th ult., at St. Paul's Cathedral. The musical arrangements have since the previous gathering passed into the hands of the choir of the Lay Helpers' Association, by whom, under the direction of Dr. G. C. Martin, the service was rendered. Handel's "To Thee, Cherubin and Seraphin," from the Dettingen Te Deum, was sung as the Anthem.

HARVEST Festival Services were held at Christ Church, Somers Town, on the 19th ult. The church was tastefully decorated for the occasion. At the Evening Service two anthems were sung—Stainer's "Ye shall dwell in the land" and Barnby's "O Lord, how manifold," both being well rendered by the choir, the bass solo in the first-named being sung by Mr. H. Hussey. Mr. Samuel Moore presided at the organ at the Evening Service.

THE Harvest Festival was held at St. John's, Balham, S.W., on Thursday, the 2nd, and Sunday the 5th ult. The Evening Service on both occasions was Tours in F. The usual Sunday Choral Celebration (at 10.15) was sung to Tours in F, and the Morning Service to Dykes in F. There was also a new anthem "O sing unto the Lord," written for the Festival by the Organist and Choirmaster, Mr. Frederick W. Doe.

THE Monthly Organ Recital at St. John the Evangelist, Waterloo Road, was given by the Organist of the church, Mr. Henry J. B. Dart, on the 14th ult. The programme, which was well selected, included Bach's Prelude and Fugue in A minor, and Schiller March, Meyerbeer; in which Mr. Dart effectively displayed the resources of his fine instrument. The vocalist was Miss M. Tunnicliff.

THE London Orchestral Society, established for the purpose of giving Concerts in aid of the Poor Missions of the Church of England, continues its practices on Friday evenings at St. Michael's Schoolrooms, Buckingham Palace Road. Works by Handel, Kreutzer, Haydn, Schumann, Mendelssohn, &c., will be placed in rehearsal for the season.

POPULAR Ballad Concerts have been given by Miss Jeanie Rosse's Concert Party during September and October at various towns with much success, the local papers speaking in the highest terms of all the vocalists, especially of Miss Rosse and Miss Margaret Hoare. Violin and pianoforte solos by Miss Kate Chaplin and Miss Nellie Chaplin respectively, have also been most warmly praised.

UNDER the direction of Madame Edith Daniel, a Concert in aid of the Brixton Orphanage was given at Loughborough Chapel, Brixton, on the 14th ult. The programme was successfully supported by Madame Frances Brooke, Miss Annie Matthews, Madame Daniel, Miss Alice Seymour, Mr. John Cross and Mr. Robert Poole. Miss Minnie Hailstone accompanied.

THE Agent-General for South Australia, Sir Arthur Blyth, K.C.M.G., announces that there is a vacancy for a Professor of Music in the University of Adelaide. The candidates must be graduates in Music of either a British or an Irish University. Particulars can be obtained by applying at the Office of the Agent-General, 8, Victoria Chambers, Westminster.

MR. MICHAEL WATSON'S Choir commenced its practices for the season 1884-5, on the 21st ult., at the Public Hall, Rye Lane, Peckham. Mendelssohn's "Elijah," J. F. Barnett's "Ancient Mariner," a new Cantata Buffa, entitled "Aladdin" (libretto by E. Oxenford, and music by Michael Watson), with various Part-Songs, Madrigals, &c., will be performed.

THE death of Sir Charles Freake, which took place on the 6th ult., removes from us an earnest patron of music, his gift of the building at South Kensington, first used for the National Training School for Music, and now for the Royal College of Music, showing in a practical form his desire for the progress of the art. The funeral took place in the Cemetery at Brompton on the 11th ult.

It is officially announced that Mr. Willing's Choir has been disbanded, but we understand that an amalgamation will be effected with Mr. Geaussen's Choir, and that Concerts will be given during the ensuing season at St. James's Hall. Lovers of choral music will be glad to hear that so satisfactory an arrangement has been decided upon.

It is with much regret that we record the death of Mr. Handel Gear, which occurred at his residence, Seymour Street, Portman Square, on the 16th ult. Mr. Gear was well known in the metropolis for many years as a highly-respected professor of singing, and his loss will be keenly felt by his many pupils and friends.

THE Festival of the London Church Choir Association takes place on Thursday next, the 6th inst., in St. Paul's Cathedral, commencing at 7.30. For full particulars of the musical arrangements we refer our readers to our October issue.

A HARVEST Thanksgiving Service was held at the church of St. Alban, Wood Street, (City), on Monday evening, the 13th ult., at which Mendelssohn's 95th Psalm was sung.

MISS SOMERVILLE has, on the adjudication of Sir Julius Benedict, been awarded the Junior National Prize of £5 given by the Academical Board of Trinity College, London. Miss Somerville is one of the pupils of Mr. Oxley's class for harmony in the Galashiels Academy, and is the first Scottish student who has carried off this honour.

AN Organ Recital will be given at the Church of St. Nicholas, Cole Abbey, Knightbridge Street, E.C. (of which church the Rev. H. C. Shuttleworth is Rector), every Tuesday during the present month, at 1 p.m. That on the 4th instant will be given by Mr. C. E. Miller.

THE Free Scholarships at the Music School, under Miss Macirone, in Baker-street, have been awarded by Professor Sir G. A. Macfarren as follows:—The Senior Scholarship, to Kathleen Hester Brady; and the Junior Scholarship, to Gladys M. Wood.

MADAME ISABEL FASSETT has returned from her visit to America, where she has been singing with considerable success.

REVIEWS.

Short Settings of the Holy Communion. Edited by G. C. Martin. Nos. 1—6. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

The editor of this well-timed series rightly says that "Church music which is modern in form, interesting to a choir and devotional in effect, whilst also of easy execution and of moderate compass for the voices, is certainly much needed in these days when choral services are almost universal." Whether the qualities named are likely to be found in the present services our readers may judge for themselves when we say that the settings before us are composed respectively by Mr. J. B. Catkin, Dr. Garrett, Dr. Stainer, Sir George Elvey, Mr. Berthold Tours, and Mr. W. A. C. Cruickshank. The choral celebration of the Communion is an outcome of the high church movement, and hence composers have a field in which to work unhampered by the dread of possible comparisons, for, with one or two exceptions, the masters of the classic period of English church music did not employ their talents on this solemn portion of the liturgy. Before making any observations on the present services individually, it will be well to state that they comprise the Kyrie, Gloria, and Gratias Tibi, Credo, Sursum Corda, Sanctus, Gloria in Excelsis, Benedictus, and Agnus Dei. They are thus available for use in places where an advanced ritual prevails, while in others a selection may be made of such portions as may be deemed advisable. Further, they are all in four part harmony without any contrapuntal elaboration, and with scarcely any repetitions of words.

Mr. Catkin's setting is in C major throughout, and is studiously simple, broad and diatonic. That of Dr. Garrett is mostly in A, but the Kyrie, of which two settings are given, and the Benedictus, are in E. The style of the music is generally bright and spirited, and the organ at times asserts a modest sense of independence. Dr. Stainer's Kyrie might almost be termed an air with variations, as he harmonises it in six different ways. His Service is essentially, but not obtrusively, modern in character, and its melodic interest should render it popular. It is in F, with the exception of the Sanctus, which is in A. Sir George Elvey offers a solid and Church-like setting in E, but in the Benedictus a modern style of accompaniment is adopted towards the close, and a beautiful version of the Agnus Dei for soprano solo and chorus, in E minor, deserves mention. As might be anticipated, Mr. Berthold Tours's Service in C is modern in feeling, the organ giving forth grandiose chromatic harmonies even when the voice parts are in monotone. In general the style of the music is melodious and elegant, and there can be but little question that to ordinary hearers it will prove remarkably attractive, though conservative musicians may chafe somewhat at some of the composer's independent progressions. Mr. Cruickshank can scarcely as yet be said to have made a reputation as a composer of sacred music. He writes fluently, and evidently possesses a vein of agreeable melody—which indeed has been already proved in his refined and graceful songs—but he has scarcely imparted sufficient dignity to some portions of his Communion Service. Not that the music generally is open to the charge of flippancy or undue lightness, but occasionally we come across a phrase in the accompaniment which sounds secular and unchurchlike. It is worth while to indicate even a slight shortcoming in the present instance, for the composer has ability which, with experience, will enable him to take a high position among writers of Service music. It will be noted that the above series offers considerable variety to organists and choirmasters desirous of instituting choral celebrations of the Communion. This is as it should be, for dull uniformity is as much to be deprecated in liturgical music as in other branches of the art.

I am well pleased; Why assemble the heathen; The Lord give ear to thee; The fool within his heart; Rejoice, O ye righteous. By Josef Rheinberger. Octavo Anthems, Nos. 268—272. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THOUGH Herr Rheinberger's instrumental compositions have obtained a certain amount of recognition in this country, it is safe to assert that his name is but little known in choir stall and organ loft. The present series of anthems are marked Op. 40, Nos. 1 to 5, and they are, therefore, somewhat early efforts, as the composer's published works already number considerably more than a hundred. They are for four voices, with an ad lib. accompaniment, which should not be used except as a matter of necessity. While occasionally there is a suggestion of Mendelssohn, and now and then of Spohr, in general Herr Rheinberger's music is remarkably fresh and vigorous; and if interpreted by well-trained choirs it could not fail to create a strong impression. The translations are for the most part well done; but with a little thought such sentences as "Will I on Him be calling," and "To thy rest, then, do I bid thee, my soul, be turning," might have been avoided. As each number of the series has merits of its own, it may seem invidious to make any distinction; but choirmasters may be advised to select either the second or the fourth in the order named for vigour of style, and the third or fifth for dignity and melodic beauty.

Twenty Songs for a Soprano or Tenor Voice; with Pianoforte accompaniment. Composed by Franz Schubert. The English version by Natalia Macfarren. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS collection of Schubert's songs contains some of the very best of those charming little poems, many of which had won the heart of the public and established the composer's fame before his more important works were even known. "The Erl-King," which commences the volume, recalls to our recollection the facsimile of the original MS., in which each division of the bar in the right hand part of the accompaniment moves in two quavers, the triplets being an afterthought. How much this modification of the first idea adds to the dramatic colouring of the song we need not say. Of the nineteen other vocal pieces grouped together in the favourite octavo edition we must speak with reverence, seeing that for many years they have been amongst our dearest friends. We may mention, too, that the English version, by Lady Macfarren, not only follows the notes most sympathetically in every song, but reads so well as scarcely to give the impression that the words are not those to which the music was originally wedded. In "The Erl-King," "Rose among the Heather," "Mignon," "To the Beloved One," and "Margaret's Prayer" (from "Faust") this merit is especially observable. The volume before us, with the two which have preceded it—the first for a mezzo-soprano and the second for a contralto voice—will do much towards popularising Schubert's songs; for that they will have an extensive sale amongst all who can appreciate the highest specimens of pure song writing cannot be doubted.

The Elements of Music. By F. W. Davenport. Published under the authority of the Royal Academy of Music. [Longmans, Green, and Co.]

THIS work, by one of the Professors of Harmony and Composition at the Institution, is commended, in the preface, to the study of those who enter the Royal Academy of Music as pupils, and to all candidates in the Local Examinations of Musical Students who are not in the Academy. Certainly, much care seems to have been exercised in compiling the book, which is sufficiently explicit upon every point to prepare students for those Examinations in the Elements of Music recently instituted by the Academy. The "Definitions," at the commencement, will clear up many doubts upon the real meaning of several words which are too often but vaguely explained in Instruction-Books; and we may also mention, as an important feature in the work, the clearly written foot-notes, which will, we think, be read with interest even by musicians themselves. The chapters on scales, intervals, and time, are especially good; and we earnestly recommend young pupils to study the example on page 36, in which the same series of notes is grouped according to different time signatures. There is much misapprehension on this subject; and as this want of accurate knowledge lies at the root of half the false accent we constantly hear from amateur executants, pupils in their early studies should be taught to make up bars of their own, under the supervision of a master, and to confirm the truth of these exercises by carefully examining the grouping of the notes in published compositions. The preface to the work before us, written by Sir George Macfarren, the Principal of the Institution, at once stamps it as an Academy Text-book.

Twelve Vocal Duets. Book I. Composed by Ciro Pinsuti.

Nine Sacred Duets. Composed by Henry Smart. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE six duets by Pinsuti—"After the rain," "Out in the sunshine," "I love all things," "I sing because I love to sing," "Passing away," and "The voice of the waterfall"—contained in Book I. of this collection, need no eulogy from us, as they have long been acknowledged both by pupils and teachers, as amongst the most charming of the many vocal contributions from this melodious and refined writer. Their publication, however, in the cheap octavo form now before us is a real boon; for we know by experience how much they are taught in classes at schools; and to have these six little gems placed within our reach at little more than the former price of only one is a matter of much importance. Mr. Smart's beautiful sacred duets may now also have the chance of attaining the popularity they deserve by their issue in the same form. The calm and devotional feeling, artistic treatment, and pure vocal writing displayed throughout these compositions, should strongly recommend them to all who can appreciate real and unconventional religious music. No. 1, "There was joy in Heaven"; No. 3, "When brighter suns and milder skies"; No. 5, "The Sabbath bell"; and No. 9, "Evening," have been for many years our favourites; but not one of their companions is at all inferior to these, either in melodious beauty or deep sympathy with the text which they illustrate. All who know the compositions of Henry Smart must agree with us how very much a love for his music grows with familiarity; and to those, therefore, who are still unacquainted with some of the duets in this book, as well as to the many who may retain only a slight recollection of their merits, we strongly commend this volume as a valuable souvenir of the composer.

Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in D. By the Rev. E. V. Hall, M.A. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

It goes without saying that a preceptor should be a practical musician, but as the rule is not always observed, we may congratulate Worcester Cathedral, where the office is at present held by the composer of this Service. The Rev. Mr. Hall has evidently mastered the technicalities of composition, and he writes with boldness and freedom. With the exception of a false accent at the outset there is no fault to which attention need be drawn, while the broad and expressive style of the music cannot fail to prove acceptable to hearers who are satisfied with comparative simplicity. The Service is within the means of ordinary amateur choirs, while it is equally worthy of attention from cathedral choirmasters.

Arrangements for the Organ. By George C. Martin. Nos. 4 and 5. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE increase in the number of genuine organ compositions will never entirely supersede the necessity for arrangements. Musicians need only insist upon the pieces selected being suitable to the kind of instruments, and upon the necessary skill and care with which the task of transcription is accomplished. In the last named respect the present arrangements are thoroughly satisfactory. Dr. Martin understands the instrument, and he manages to secure effect without any needless piling up of technical difficulties. It is open to question whether the Romanze and Scherzo from Schumann's Symphony in D minor are suitable for the organ, but no doubt can be entertained concerning the Adagio from Beethoven's first piano Sonata, Scarlatti's "Cat's" Fugue, or the air from Bach's Suite in D.

My soul doth magnify the Lord. Sacred Cantata for Soprano Solo and Chorus. By Townshend Driffield. [Liverpool: J. Smith and Son.]

It may be presumed that Mr. Driffield calls his setting of the Magnificat a Cantata because it is not only too elaborate for church use, but too secular in style. The opening numbers are open to the charge of flippancy, but later on he infuses more dignity into the music, and even gives us some tolerable fugal writing. At the same time, it must be said that the musicianship generally is not of a high order, and any candidate presenting the Cantata as a University exercise would inevitably be plucked. The composer has decided feeling for melody, and should pursue his studies before again committing himself to paper.

Original Compositions for the Organ. No. 34, Sketch in C minor, by J. E. West; No. 35, Fugue in E minor, by J. E. West; No. 36, Minuet and Trio, by B. Luard Selby. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE issue of this useful publication advances apace, and the present numbers will be found acceptable by organists. Though not so designated, Mr. West's Sketch resembles a Minuet in form and rhythm. The manner is stately but the harmonies are chromatic, and, within its limits, the trifle has considerable individuality. The structure of the fugue is peculiar. After the exposition, in which we have a real answer, another subject is announced and duly answered, the first theme recurring in the pedals. The display of counterpoint is extremely modest, but the piece will prove effective as a voluntary. Mr. Selby's Minuet is a smoothly written and graceful piece, and if scarcely in what is known as the genuine organ style, is by no means too secular for church purposes.

Danse des Nymphes. Pour Piano. Par Folcardet. [Francis Brothers and Day.]

A SPIRITED and well written dance, effective, and easy to play. The subject in the subdominant offers a good contrast with the principal theme, and the harmonies throughout are well considered. Certainly the G sharp in the fourth bar of the last line should be A flat, but the composer in his notation errs in distinguished company.

FOREIGN NOTES.

AN interesting revival, that of Weber's Opera "Sylvana," is announced shortly to take place at the Hamburg Stadt-Theater, whose able director, Herr Pollini, while distinctly favouring at his establishment the modern Musik-Drama, is by no means averse to an occasional retrospective glance at the neglected works of the past. Weber's "Sylvana," completed at Darmstadt in 1810, was produced for the first time on any stage at Frankfurt, on which occasion Caroline Brandt (afterwards the composer's wife) represented the title part. The opera was performed on several other German stages, notably at Berlin (in 1812), for which occasion Weber had written two new airs, for tenor and soprano respectively. But the work did not remain long on the repertoire, and had been quite forgotten when, nine years afterwards, the same composer obtained such a signal triumph at the Prussian capital with his maturer work, "Der Freischütz." "Sylvana" has, however, been remounted as recently (speaking comparatively) as 1855 (at Dresden) and 1858 (at the Kroll'sche Theater of Berlin). For the purpose of the revival of the work, at Hamburg, the libretto has been remodelled by

Herr Ernst Pasqué, and additional music has been supplied (from other works of the composer) by the skilful hand of the Mannheim Capellmeister, Herr Ferdinand Langer, in order to suit the early production of Weber's genius to the enhanced requirements of the modern operatic stage. For the latter, we have a precedent in Sir Julius Benedict's additions to the score of Weber's "Oberon," which are likewise based upon motivi from other compositions by the same master. The experiment, at all events, will be an interesting and instructive one, and the fact of its being made at all furnishes one more proof of the growing estimation in which the composer of "Freischütz" and "Euryanthe" is being held in his native country, as the true originator of what is now universally recognised as the German "Musik-Drama."

The recent discovery is announced in German papers of a hitherto unknown symphony by Mendelssohn. The work is said to appertain to an early period of the composer's career, and to have been presented by him, in March, 1825, to Herr Mosevius, from whom it passed into the hands of Messrs. Hientz, music publishers of Breslau, at whose establishment, if we read the story aright, the precious document has just been "discovered." Although a music publisher's would be the least likely place where we should expect such inconsiderate trifles as a Mendelssohnian symphony to be hidden away, we are bound to state the further particulars furnished by our informants—viz., that the work consists of four movements, and is written for stringed orchestra, in the key of F minor.

The Neue Zeitschrift für Musik quotes an interesting and, as yet, little known reference to Richard Wagner, made by the poet Heine in a conversation with Heinrich Laube, and alluded to by the latter in one of his letters written in 1843. "I have known for ten years," said Heine, "this young musician, who at his post at the Dresden Theatre has become famous within the space of two months. His inexhaustibly productive nature, supported and urged on by a vivid and constructive mind, had always interested me, and had inspired me with the hope that a personality thus imbued with the spirit of modern culture should be capable of furthering the progress of modern music. Misfortunes of the oddest kind, which drove him even into Russia, had, for a time, withdrawn him from my observation, and great indeed was my surprise when, in the winter of 1838, I beheld him suddenly entering my room in Paris. Here was an artist's audacity! With a wife, one or two operas, a slender purse, and a monstrously big ravenous creature of a Newfoundland dog, this man had braved the storms of the ocean, coming straightway from the Dwina to the Seine, in order to obtain celebrity in Paris! And in this Paris too, where the halt of Europe competes for noisy fame, where everything, even that which has been earned by merit, has to be bought or at all events to be paid for, before it can come into the market and be appreciated." The otherwise frivolously inclined poet, continues Laube, related this instance of German perseverance in quite a reverential manner, adding: "Well, he was not successful; but neither has he altogether failed. Outwardly poorer, but richer within, the wandering musician has returned to Saxony, who has received her son in a praiseworthy manner, and who will reap much honour from his doings yet."

The festivities in connection with the unveiling of the Bach monument, at Eisenach (a detailed account of which appears in another column), took place on September 28, in accordance with the programme shadowed forth in these columns. Among the numerous tokens of general interest aroused by the occasion may be instanced a telegram received by the Festival Committee from Tiflis (Caucasus), worded as follows: "The representatives of the Imperial Russian Musical Association of Tiflis hereby do homage to the genius of the great Johann Sebastian Bach."

The official inauguration of the new Gewandhaus at Leipzig will, according to present arrangements, take place in the second week of December next. The festive performances on this occasion will extend over three days, on the first of which Beethoven's overture "Zur Weihe des Hauses," and his Ninth Symphony, as well as Mendelssohn's setting of the 114th Psalm, are to be produced, the second being devoted to Handel's "Messiah," and the third to works by Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Weber, Schumann and Schubert. It should be added, however, that these arrangements are neither complete, nor the period mentioned above definitely decided upon.

The programme of the excellent Symphony Concerts of the Royal Orchestra at Dresden will include the following numbers during the present season—viz., Serenade, No. 4 (Jadassohn); a Symphony (Count Hochberg); Scandinavian Symphony (Cowen); Ballet music from "Colomba" (Mackenzie); Concert Overture (Richard Strauss); Overture to an opera "Die verkaufte Braut" (Smetana); and Symphony in D minor (Raff).

Herr Bülse, the famous Berlin conductor, has just returned to the German capital after the completion of a Concert tour with his orchestra, embracing no less than 154 Concerts, given in 76 towns, in Germany and Holland, and with a highly satisfactory result, both artistically and financially.

Herr Bitter (the Prussian Minister of State), the able author of a biography of Johann Sebastian Bach, has just published a new volume entitled "Die Reform der Oper durch Gluck und Richard Wagner's Kunstwerk der Zukunft."

We have much pleasure in announcing the long expected publication (in the Peters Edition) of Herr Julius Strockhausen's "Method of Singing" (Gesangsmethode), which will, doubtless, be welcomed alike by professional artists and amateurs.

Mr. Goring Thomas's opera "Esmeralda" was performed at the Hamburg Stadt-Theater, for the first time, on September 27, and achieved a complete success.

Six representations of Italian Opera are announced to take place during the present month, at the Kroll'sche Theater of Berlin. The principal vocalists retained for this short season are Madame Gerster-Gardini and Signori Campanini, Golosi, and Maini (of La Scala.)

The Meiningen orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Hans von Bülow, will shortly start upon a Concert-tour in Germany and Austria. The excellent institution in question proposes to give three Concerts at Vienna, for which Johannes Brahms has promised his active co-operation.

Johann Strauss, the celebrated Viennese composer and conductor of dance music, was the recipient of a popular ovation on the 15th ult., this having been the fortieth anniversary of his first appearance as a Conductor at a Concert given by him at Hietzing, near the Austrian capital.

Herr Heinrich Bötzel, the "phenomenal" tenor of the Hamburg Opera, is about to give a short series of representations at the Vienna Hof-Theater, commencing with the inevitable "Postillon de Lonjumeau."

Anton Rubinstein will be at Hamburg during the earlier part of this month to conduct the first performance there of his new comic opera "Der Papagei" (The Parrot), after which he will proceed to Berlin, where his Oratorio "Paradise Lost" is to be produced, on the 17th inst., by the Cäcilien-Verein.

Eugen D'Albert, the highly gifted young pianist and composer, well known to London Concert-goers, has, it is stated, recently become the husband of Fräulein Salingré, of the Cobourg Hof-Theater, who, since the event referred to, has resigned her engagement at that institution.

Heinrich Marschner's almost forgotten opera "Adolph von Nassau," is shortly to be revived at the Hof-Theater of Hanover. The libretto of the work, originally written by Heribert Rau, is being revised for this purpose by Herr Richard Pohl.

Antonin Dvořák is shortly expected at Berlin, where he will conduct, at one of the Philharmonic Concerts, his Pianoforte Concerto and his Overture "Husitzka."

Four overtures to Shakespearean dramas—viz., "Romeo and Juliet," "Othello," "Macbeth," and "The Tempest," have been discovered amongst the posthumous papers of Joachim Raff, and have been handed, by the composer's widow, to the Director of the Meiningen orchestra, by whom these compositions will probably be first produced in public.

Herr Max Bruch is just now engaged upon a work for solo voices, chorus, and orchestra, the text of which is founded upon scenes from Homer's "Iliad."

Under the name of Concerts Modernes, the famous Populaires, of Paris, founded by M. Pasdeloup, and conducted by him for a number of years, have just been revived under the direction of M. Benjamin Godard. The inauguration of the present season took place on the 19th ult., the following having been some of the principal numbers in the programme: Symphony, No. 2, and Poème Symphonique, "Phaëton" (Saint-Saëns), conducted by the composer, Fantaisie Hongroise (Liszt), Invocation and Polonaise for Orchestra (Ritter), Overture, "Loreley" (Bruch), Entr'acte, from "La Colombe" (Gounod), Airs de Ballet, from "Hamlet" (Ambrose Thomas). At the succeeding Concert, October 26, Beethoven's C Minor Symphony was the most important feature. It remains to be seen whether, under the new régime, as much favour will be shown to the works of Richard Wagner as had been the case when M. Padeloup conducted the institution.

The seven hundredth performance of Rossini's "Guillaume Tell" was recorded on the 11th ult. at the Paris Grand Opéra, where the work was first brought out on August 3, 1829.

M. Gounod is said to be at present engaged upon the composition of a new opera, the dramatic action of which is based upon Lamartine's poem of "Jocelyn."

A monument, for which subscriptions are now being raised in France, is to be erected to the late Victor Massé at his native town, Lorient.

M. Alexandre Guilmant, the excellent Organist of La Trinité, Paris, is at present in Riga for the purpose of exercising his skill on the famous cathedral organ of that town in a series of Recitals.

The Brussels Opera-house has been connected by telephone wires with the Royal residence at Ostend, where, it is said, the performances can be distinctly heard and enjoyed. The system employed is the invention of M. Rysselberghe, a Belgian.

A memorial tablet was unveiled, in September last, at Perugia, his native town, to Morlachi, the whilom Dresden Capellmeister, whose name will be best remembered as that of the intriguing colleague of Carl Maria von Weber during the latter's efforts to organise a German opera at the Saxon Capital. The tablet in question has been erected in commemoration of the centenary of the composer's birth.

Our Turin correspondent writes: "Since Signor Filippi's able article appeared in your last number two Concerts have been given at the Exhibition by the Parma orchestra, conducted by the brother of the famous tenor Campanini, viz., on October 3 and 5 respectively. Campanini, a still younger man than his Neapolitan colleague, Martucci, wielded his bâton with much skill, and in part rivalled Mancinelli in conducting several pieces from memory. Mancinelli never has any music before him. Two numbers of the programme were novelties, a March by the Parmese Maestro, Rossi, and an 'Idillio sul Mare' by the Maestro Bolzoni, the probable successor of Faccio as Conductor of the Turin orchestra. Throughout these performances the beauty of the wood-wind instruments, for which Parma is justly famous, was as apparent as was that of the horns in the Neapolitan, and of the violoncelli in the Bolognese bands. At the Regio, the brilliant opening performance of 'Mefistofele' was followed by 'William Tell,' in which the Polish tenor Mierzwinsky admirably sang the part of Armando; Signorina Bellincioni, as Mathilde, and Signor Delfino Menotti, as Tell, acquitting themselves equally well of their respective tasks, the performance altogether being a highly satisfactory one. Catalani's 'Dejanice' is announced for to-night (October 21). Yesterday the band of forty-three amateur working-men, conducted by the brother of Signor Ciro Pinsuti (so well-known to your readers), arrived here from Sinalunga. They played admirably the by no means easy 'Vesperi Siciliani,' and the 'Saluto all'Esposizione,' composed specially for the exhibition by Signor Ciro Pinsuti. His brother, Domenico, has for thirty-eight years gratuitously conducted this small, but noteworthy band, and still devotes himself to it with youthful energy and enthusiasm."

The connection between cholera and art, or rather the disciples thereof, has recently become painfully apparent in Italy. At Naples, for instance, all church festivals, or secular celebrations, are prohibited, the theatres are closed, and music masters find themselves forsaken by their pupils. Nor are the funds at the disposal of the local authorities sufficient to materially alleviate the distress caused by the epidemic in this quarter. Perhaps some members of the English musical fraternity will come forward to assist their brethren on the other side of the Alps in their present unmerited troubles! Bis dat, qui cito dat.

A new opera by the Maestro Luigi Mancinelli, entitled "Isora di Provenza," was produced for the first time on the 2nd ult., at Bologna, where it achieved a most decided success. The finale of the first, and the prelude to the third act were, amongst other numbers, enthusiastically encored. Signor Mancinelli, it should be added, is one of the most prominent advocates of Wagner's music among his Italian fraternity, and his new work, like those of the great majority of modern composers, is consequently imbued with the teachings, if not the style, of that master.

The Maestro Almicare Ponchielli has just completed a new opera entitled "Marion Delorme."

The death is announced, on the 10th ult., at Mannheim, of Jean Becker, the eminent violin virtuoso, and leader of the world-famed "Florentine Quartet." Becker was born at Mannheim in 1836, where he studied under Vincenz Lachner, and afterwards became leading violinist at the Hof-Theater. In 1866 he took up his residence at Florence, and there founded, with Masi, Chiostrì, and Hilpert, the quartet party which, by its excellence and extensive Concert-tours, acquired a cosmopolitan fame. He also led many years ago at the Monday Popular Concerts in London.

At Paris died last month Louis Lacombe, a composer of more than ordinary merit, among whose works may be instanced two dramatic symphonies, with soli and choruses, entitled, respectively, "Manfred" and "Arva"; an opera, "La Madone" (produced at the Theatre Lyrique in 1860), and the cantata "Sappho," written for the Paris International Exhibition of 1878. Lacombe was born in 1818, at Bourges.

Carmelo Bellini, a musicmaster, and brother to the famous composer of "Norma," whom he survived by forty-nine years, recently died at Catania, at the age of eighty-two.

The death is announced, on the 2nd ult., at Vienna, of Madame Therese Bach-Marschner, the widow of the composer of "Templer und Jüdin," who in after life had contracted a second marriage with Dr. Otto Bach, the former director of the Mozarteum, in Salzburg. Madame Bach-Marschner had in her younger days, as Fräulein Janda, acquired no inconsiderable reputation as an operatic singer, both at continental capitals and in London. She was a pupil of Donizetti.

The death is also announced, at Strassburg, of M. Waldteufel, the well-known composer of waltzes, and whilom director of the orchestra at the court balls during the last French Empire. The deceased was eighty-three years of age.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

* * Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all Subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. #### BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

BARNET.—The Annual Harvest Thankgiving Services took place in the Parish Church, on Sunday, the 19th ult. The occasion was specially marked by the opening of the first portion of a large three-manual organ, erected by Messrs. Hill and Son. At all the services there were very large congregations. The anthem in the evening was "The Lord hath done great things," the treble solo being well sung by Master Heath. Collections were made towards the fund for completing the organ, at which Mr. H. W. Poole, the Organist, presided.

BATH.—On Sunday evening, September 28, Rossini's Stabat Mater was sung at St. Mary's Church. There was a large attendance. An orchestra, led by Herr Van Praag, was engaged, and Mrs. Murray presided at the organ. The principal vocalists were Miss Marie Gane, Mrs. Stone, Mr. Joseph Falconer, and Mr. Montague Worlock. The work was very well rendered, Miss Gane and Mr. Worlock particularly distinguishing themselves.

BIRKENHEAD.—On the 1st and 5th ult., the annual Harvest Thanksgiving Services were held at Holy Trinity Church, which was profusely decorated for the occasion. The services were full choral. Mr. Billinie Porter presided at the organ. On Monday evening, the 6th ult., at the Queen's Hotel, Mr. Billinie Porter was presented with a handsome tea and coffee service in recognition of his services as Organist of St. Matthew's Temporary Church for two years. Mr. Chas. Hamilton presented the testimonial, which was suitably acknowledged by the recipient.

BRADFORD.—On Sunday, the 12th ult., the Annual Harvest Festival was held in St. Paul's Church, Manningham, the large professional Choir of the church being assisted by several members of the Manningham Vocal Union. Sullivan's Te Deum in D, and J. H. Rooks' Jubilate in D, were the services in the morning, and the anthem "While the earth remaineth" (Touru), and Offertory sentences by Gaul were most artistically sung. In the evening Dr. Hiles's setting of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in F, with anthems "Fear not O Lord" (Goss), and Handel's Hallelujah Chorus, the latter being preceded by the Trio "Lift thine eyes" (Mendelssohn), were rendered with much spirit and precision. The Choir throughout the day evidenced the result of most careful training on the part of the Organist and Choirmaster, Mr. J. H. Rooks, who played the accompaniments, and also as voluntaries in the morning, "Cantilène" (Salomé); Mozart's Fantasia in F minor, and in the evening Ouseley's "Andante espressivo," Mendelssohn's "Heaven and the earth display," and Bach's Prelude and Fugue in a minor.

BRIGHTON.—A very successful Ballad Concert was given by Mrs. Pertwee and Miss Bertha Moore, in the Hove Town Hall, on the 16th ult. Miss Moore and Miss M. Mackenzie received enthusiastic encores, and Mr. Bernard Lane and Mr. Pierpoint were also thoroughly appreciated. Mr. Viotti Collins contributed two violin solos, and Madame Rose Koenig was the solo pianist. The accompanists were Miss Ada Bright and Mr. W. N. Roe.

BRISBANE, AUSTRALIA.—The chief musical event of the year took place on August 8, when the Musical Union performed Gounod's Sacred Trilogy, The Redemption, for the first time in Queensland and the third in Australia. The Albert Hall was crowded with a fashionable and critical audience, there being nearly 1,000 persons present. No work yet attempted by the Union has so greatly taxed its resources as The Redemption, yet it is gratifying to be able to state that the strain was admirably borne. The performers paid unusual attention to the baton, a necessary thing in so intricate a work. The orchestra has never had so favourable an opportunity of showing what it can do, and it did not miss the opportunity. There is an immense quantity of the most delicate orchestration required, and it was a theme of general remark that it was excellently rendered throughout. The steadiness of the orchestra was especially noticeable in the opening, and also in the typical passage which occurs so often throughout the Oratorio. The "March to Calvary" was another success for the band, and although in one or two of the movements there was some unsteadiness, it was not of such extent as to be noticed by more than a few amongst the audience. No portion of the choral work was open to adverse criticism, the more massive choruses, especially the magnificent final one, being given with great breadth of effect. Notwithstanding the length to which the performance extended, the attention of the audience was riveted to it throughout, and the soloists going out for a "breath of fresh air" were indulged in to a very small extent, so desirous was the audience not to lose a note of the music. The final chorus, already referred to, was sufficiently enticing to keep people in their seats to the last, the usual rush for cloaks and coats before the end of the performance being happily conspicuous by its absence. The only thing connected with the Concert to be regretted is that while the performers have their "hands in" this fine work could not be given two nights running, or performed again within a short interval. It may be taken for granted that the Union will repeat The Redemption at some future time. It would be a pity that so much labour on the part of the energetic and talented Conductor, Mr. Jefferies, should be devoted to only one performance.

BRISTOL.—On Monday, the 13th ult., the members of the Bristol Choral Association gave a sacred Concert at Redland Park Church, the programme consisting of Alfred Gaul's Cantata Ruth, and a miscellaneous selection of sacred pieces. The soloists were Miss Marie Gane, Mrs. Wright, Miss Wetherman, and Mr. H. J. Dyer. The Choir, numbering 130 voices, was under the Conductorship of Mr. Walter Kidner, and Mr. F. C. Maker presided at the organ. The Cantata received an excellent interpretation both by soloists and Choir.

BROCKLEY.—An Organ Recital was given at St. Peter's Church by Dr. C. J. Frost on September 26, when an excellently selected programme was most artistically rendered, so well, indeed, that it was at times difficult to believe that the instrument has only two manuals and is very poor in pedal stops. The singing of the choir on the occasion afforded ample evidence of Dr. Frost's painstaking and skilful training.

BROUGHTON.—The Harvest Thanksgiving Services were held at St. John's Church, on the 3rd and 5th ult. The church was beautifully decorated with corn, fruit, and flowers, and the services were well attended. The Rev. Canon Davenport Kelly was the preacher on Friday evening. The special anthem was Lauda Sion (Mendelssohn). The choir, numbering upwards of sixty voices, sang admirably, especially in the choruses. The solos, of which there were only two, were rendered with much taste and feeling by Master Evans and Mr. H. Usher; and the whole performance reflected great credit upon the Organist and Choirmaster, Mr. W. Mullineux, F.C.O., who presided at the Organ throughout, and contributed greatly to the success of the service by his accompaniments. On Sunday special anthems were sung—in the morning "Hallelujah" (Beethoven), the Rev. W. Doyle, M.A. preaching the sermon; and in the evening "In splendour bright," and the chorus "The heavens are telling" (Haydn).

BURTON-ON-TRENT.—Miss Constance Norris gave a Concert at St. George's Hall on the 20th ult. before a large audience. Miss Norris, who is an excellent contralto vocalist, was assisted by Miss Maud Cameron, Mr. A. S. Kinnell, and the Burton Orpheus Quartet, Mr. H. T. Abbott, accompanist. The singing of the beneficiaire was much admired, and the whole of the vocal music was highly successful, several encores being demanded. Harp solos were also contributed by Mr. D. Ffrench Davis, and received with warm applause.

CHELMSFORD.—The Annual Harvest Thanksgiving Services were held in St. John's Church, on Sunday, the 5th ult. The Church was beautifully decorated with flowers, fruit, and corn. The morning service, which was well attended, opened with the hymn, "Come, ye thankful people, come." The psalms were chanted to Battisbill, Fussell, and Turle, in G. The Venite, to Tomlinson in G; Jubilate, to Helmore in F; the Benedicite being sung instead of the Te Deum to an arrangement by Stainer, De Lacy, &c. The Responses to the commandments were sung to Dr. A. H. Mann in A flat, and the Gospel Glorias to music composed by the Organist. The Offertory Sentences were from Dr. Martin's book. A Special Children's Service was held in the afternoon, and was also well attended. In the evening, the Service commenced, as in the morning, with the hymn, "Come, ye thankful people, come." The psalms were chanted to Stainer, Savage, and Russell, in C. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were sung to Dr. Bunnett's fine service in F. The anthem "O give thanks unto the Lord," by E. A. Sydenham, was admirably sung by the choir. An excellent sermon was preached by the Rev. Lewis Parkin, Rector of Ingatstone. Harvest Hymns, from H. A. & M., were sung during the day, and after the offertory in the evening had been collected, Winchester's Te Deum in F was sung as a solemn act of thanksgiving. Mr. A. G. Barnard, Organist and Choirmaster of the Church, presided at the organ throughout the day, and played as Voluntaries, Andante Grazioso in G (Henry Smart), Andante in E (Mendelssohn), Chorus, "Trust thou in God" (Mendelssohn), and "Silver Trumpets" (Viviani).

CHRISTCHURCH, N. Z.—The works chosen by the Musical Society for its second Concert, on August 21, were Handel's Theodora and Schubert's Song of Miriam, both works being presented for the first time in the Colonies. The solos in Theodora were taken by Miss Taylor, Mrs. Long, Miss Rowley, Mr. J. C. Puschell, and Mr. E. Cane. The composition on the whole was very fairly rendered. In the Song of Miriam the solo part was well sung by Miss Spensley, ably supported by the Chorus and Orchestra. Both works were received with much enthusiasm by a very numerous audience. The Concert was under the conductorship of Mr. Wells.

DARLINGTON.—Harvest Festival Services were held in St. John's Church on Friday, the 10th ult., and the Sunday following. At Evening on the Friday the music consisted of the Cantata Domno and Deus miseratur (Kent in C), and Anthem "I will give thanks" (Baraby). Special Psalms were sung to chants by Battisbill and Humphreys, and Baraby's Responses were used. The music on Sunday was similarly festive in character. Dr. Martin's Offertory Anthem, "If we have sown," and a Kyrie by the Rev. J. E. Beckwith, were sung in the morning; and in the evening the service commenced with the hymn, "Come, ye thankful people, come," to Sir Geo. Elvey's "St. George," and the Anthem was "O Lord, how manifold are Thy works" (Baraby). Mr. C. Stephenson ably presided at the organ, and played with much effect "Grazioso in F" (Smart), "March in E flat" (Wély), "Andantino" (Bunnett), "Vienna March" (Clark), "Andante religioso" (Wély), and "Harvest Thanksgiving March" (Calkin).

DENBIGH.—Miss Fanny Webb, R.A.M., gave a Concert on Friday, the 10th ult., the artists being Miss Maggie Ivor Jones, Mr. T. Bartley, Eos Meirion, Gomerydd, Mr. Harding Roberts; Messrs. J. W. Allen and F. Jones, violinists; Miss Webb, R.A.M., and Miss Bancroft, accompanists. The programme, which was miscellaneous, was excellently rendered, and thoroughly appreciated. The Mayor of Denbigh spoke in high terms of Miss Webb, and alluded to the valuable services she had rendered the Vale of Clwyd Choir, stating that it was partly due to her strenuous efforts that the choir had carried off the prize at the Liverpool Eisteddfod.

DERBY.—On Tuesday, the 7th ult., Mr. Herbert Drury gave his Annual Concert in the Drill Hall to a large audience. The vocalists were Miss Clara Samuell, Miss Marian McKenzie, Mr. Seymour Jackson, and Mr. D. Harrison. A violin solo by Mr. J. T. Carrodus was an important feature of the evening. Several of Mr. Drury's pupils took part in the programme and acquitted themselves in a highly creditable manner. The Concert was very successful.

EARLING.—A very successful Concert was given at the Lyric Hall, on the 22nd ult., under the direction of Messrs. Harold Savery and Ernest Hodges, assisted by the following artists: Miss Agnes Thorndike, Mrs. Dyke, Miss Lena Law, Mr. Hy. Kynaston, and Mr. Chas. Medcraft, vocalists; and Mr. H. C. Tonking, solo violinist. Messrs. T. Gollmick and W. H. Tuffey were the Conductors.

EASTBOURNE.—Mr. Henry Bailie, Organist and Choirmaster of All Souls Church, gave his fourth Organ Recital of the season on Tuesday, the 14th ult. The programme included Handel's Fifth Organ Concerto, and selections from the works of Rossini, Schumann, Wély, Blumenthal, and Merkel.

EDMONTON.—On Tuesday evening, the 14th ult., a Concert was given in aid of the St. Mary's Marlborough College Mission. The vocalists were Mesdames Clara West, Lottie West, Mary Chamberlain, R.A.M., Messrs. Offord, Bendell, and Freeman. Violin, Mr. A. Baddeley; clarinet, Mr. G. Hepworth; pianoforte, Miss Cook. The Concert was a great success.

EXETER.—On Monday, September 29, the annual Dedication and Harvest Festival Services took place at the Church of SS. Michael and All Angels, and passed off most satisfactorily to all concerned in the preparation thereof. The chief attraction in connection with the services was, perhaps, the presence of the military instrumentalists, who had been especially engaged for the occasion, and whose performance proved highly effective. The church was tastefully decorated with fruit, flowers, &c., and presented a very handsome appearance. The morning service was opened by the clergy and choir singing the hymn "Salve Festa Dies," the ancient processional of the English Church, the music of which was provided by the Rev. J. B. Powell. During the time the procession was walking through the aisle, the adult members of the Choir sang the verses of the hymn to the accompaniment of the military instruments on two cornets, horn, and euphonium. The hymn was carefully rendered; indeed, the singing of the whole of the music throughout the service reflected much credit on the training of the Choir by the Organist, Mr. W. H. Richmond, who presided at the organ during the Festival. The Introit used was "O Praise the Lord," G. A. Macfarren; Kyrie, Dr. Stainer, in F; Sequence, "To Thee, O Lord, our hearts we raise," the Rev. J. B. Powell; Gloria and Gratias, W. H. Richmond; Credo, Dr. Stainer. While the offertory was being made, the Cujus Animam, from Rossini's Stabat Mater, was performed on the organ, with cornet obbligato by a member of the Marine band. In the Communion Service the Benedictus and Agnus Dei were from Dr. Stainer in F; and the "O Salutaris" was taken from Rossini's Messe Solennelle. The words had been adapted by the Rev. T. R. Hall, and the music arranged by Mr. W. H. Richmond. Masters Frederick Walenn and Herbert Townsend, from Mr. Stedman's London Choir, were added to the St. Michael's Choir for the occasion. The "O Salutaris" was sung by Master Walenn as a solo, and was beautifully rendered. B. Agutter's Pater Noster was used, Dr. Stainer's Gloria, and Mr. Richmond's Nunc dimittis in F. The sermon was preached by the Rev. J. W. Bennett, Vicar of St. Paul's, Avenue Road, Regent's Park, London. At the evening service eleven members of the Royal Marine Band from Plymouth took part in the musical portion of the service. The band consisted of two first violins, two second violins, viola, violoncello, double-bass, two cornets, bass trombone, and timpani, while the organ, at which Mr. G. N. Prior, of Ramsgate, presided, supplied the wind (reed) effects. The service opened with the slow movement from Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony, after which the choir and clergy entered the church in procession, singing the hymn "Salve Festa Dies," and were accompanied by four members of the Militia Band. Tallis's Festal Responses were used, and Dr. Stainer's Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in A were rendered with full orchestral accompaniments. The hymns sung during the offertory were to the arrangement of Mr. Richmond, who is the composer of the Te Deum in D major, which followed. The music for the orchestra was also scored by Mr. Richmond. The sermon was preached by the very Rev. the Dean of Exeter. It must be mentioned that prior to the late morning service, Mr. George Colson, on behalf of the members of the Choir, presented Mr. Richmond with a handsome ivory bâton as a token of their appreciation of the services he had rendered them.

FAVERSHAM.—The Harvest Thanksgiving Service took place on Thursday evening, the 2nd ult., in the fine old Parish Church. The choir, conducted by Mr. W. H. Drake, was largely augmented, and the organ, at which Mr. C. H. Drake presided, was aided by a small band. The usual hymns were sung with good effect, but the chief feature of the music was the performance of Mendelssohn's Lauda Sion, which was well rendered. The sermon was preached by the Rev. J. Carter.

Hemel Hempstead.—Mr. Whatmoor gave a Pianoforte Recital at the Town Hall, on Monday evening, the 13th ult., before an appreciative audience. The programme included Beethoven's Sonata in A major, Mendelssohn's Cantecio in F sharp minor, and selections from the works of Scarlatti, Handel, Schumann, Rameau, Gounod, Kirchner, and Chopin, all of which were excellently rendered. Mr. H. W. Whatmoor gave valuable aid in a pianoforte duet.

HERNE BAY.—A very successful Organ Recital was given at Christ Church, by Mr. E. A. Crutenden, on the 3rd ult., the programme, which was thoroughly classical, being well selected and excellently rendered. Mr. Garçon Leader, R.A.M., and Mr. Graham contributed some vocal solos with much effect; and the Choir gave evidence of Mr. Crutenden's careful training in Mendelssohn's "How lovely are the messengers," and Handel's Hallelujah Chorus.

HOLLYWOOD.—The first of a series of Organ Recitals for the present season, was given in the Church of SS. Philip and James, on the 14th ult., by Mr. W. F. W. Jackson, Mus. Bac., Oxon., Organist of Hollywood Church, before a large and appreciative audience. The programme was well selected, and included the Sonata, No. 1 (Mendelssohn), Introductory Movement, March, The Redemption (Gounod), Organ Symphony in C minor (C. M. Widor), the airs "Waft her, Angels," "O had I Jubal's lyre," and the chorus "Fixed in His everlasting seat" (Handel), Grand Prelude and Fugue on the Westminster Chimes (J. C. Ward), soprano solo "Et incarnatus est" (Jackson), Adagio from the Notturmo for wind instruments (Spohr), and variations on "Rousseau's Dream" (Craddock). The execution of the various items throughout the programme was highly artistic, and showed the thorough command Mr. Jackson has over the instrument.

Huddersfield.—The first of a series of four classical Chamber Concerts, arranged by Mr. Walter Shaw, was given on the 13th ult. in the Parish Church Schools, the artists being Signor Riseigari and Herr Hunnemann, violins; Mr. Walter Shaw, viola; Mr. Frank Weston, violoncello; Miss Amina Goodwin, solo pianist; Miss Emilie Norton, vocalist; and Mr. J. E. Ibeson, accompanist. The programme—which included a Quartet by Haydn, Chopin's Introduction and Polonaise Brillante, for pianoforte and violoncello, and Saint-Saëns's Grand Quintet in A minor, for pianoforte, two violins, viola and violoncello—was finely rendered throughout. Favourable mention must also be made of the pianoforte performance of Miss Goodwin, and also of the songs contributed by Miss Norton.

HURSTPIERPOINT.—An Organ Recital was given in the Parish Church, on Saturday, the 4th ult., by the Organist, Mr. H. C. Young,

B. A., Cantab., who played selections from the works of Smart, Haydn, Mendelssohn, Lemmens, Calkin, Batiste, and André. The organ is a three-manual one, by Hill and Son, and its power and tone were much admired.

IRVINE.—Mr. Hinchcliffe, Organist of the Parish Church, gave his annual Recital on the evening of the 17th ult., assisted by Miss Hudson, whose songs were highly appreciated. The programme of organ pieces was varied and well selected, and Mr. Hinchcliffe's performance gave, as usual, the utmost satisfaction.

KEIGHLEY.—The new organ in the Baptist Chapel, Slack Lane, recently erected by Messrs. Driver and Lupton, was opened by Dr. C. J. Frost, on the 18th ult., when he gave two Recitals, including works by Best, Hiles, Mailly, Boelly, Guilment, Frost, Guiraud, Greson, Merkel, Mendelssohn, Turpin, Handel, Jordan, Chipp and Archer. The members of the choir sang the vocal illustrations in an admirable manner, and Dr. Frost's fine playing was thoroughly appreciated.

LANCASTER.—The annual Harvest Festival at St. John's Church was held on the 16th ult. The service was full choral, and the anthem, "I will give thanks" (Barby), was sung by a large choir. Before the service an Organ Recital was given by the Organist, Mr. John Wilson.

LEEDS.—The lecture-session of the Mechanics' Institute and Literary Society was inaugurated by a Concert at the Albert Hall on September 24. The principal vocalists were Miss Agnes Larkum, Madame Edwyn Frith, Mr. Charles Abercrombie, and Mr. Edwyn Frith, all of whom were highly successful; Miss Larkum, who made her first appearance in Leeds, especially winning warm and well-deserved applause for her refined rendering of two solos, an encore for the second, "Within a mile o' Edinbro' Toun," being too decisive to be resisted. The Misses Molyneux (pianoforte and violin) were the only instrumentalists.

LEICESTER.—In connection with the Harvest Thanksgiving Services of Hill Street Chapel a very effective performance of the greater part of Haydn's Creatio was given with full band and chorus, in the Temperance Hall, on Sunday afternoon, the 5th ult. The hall was crowded, many persons being unable to gain admittance. The soloists were Miss Dent, Messrs. G. W. Orchard and T. B. Laxton. The band was led by Mr. Kitby, Mr. Henry Nicholson conducted, and Mr. J. T. Pye, Mus. B., was the Organist.

LINCOLN.—Mr. Barraclough's first Autumn Concert took place on Friday, the 10th ult., when the Corn Exchange was filled with an appreciative audience. The vocalists were Madame Patey, Miss Anna Williams, Miss Ada Patterson, Mr. Sydney Tower and Mr. Franklin Clive, with Signor Mattei as pianist.

LIVERPOOL.—The annual distribution of Prizes in connection with the Liverpool centre of Trinity College, London, took place on the 11th ult., in the Concert Room of St. George's Hall, the ceremony being performed by the Mayor. Addresses were delivered on the occasion by the Mayor and by Mr. E. H. Turpin; and prior to the distribution a short vocal and instrumental Concert was given by prize-winners. A large congregation was attracted to the Cathedral Church of St. Peter, on Saturday afternoon, the 16th ult., to hear a performance of Dr. F. E. Gladstone's Sacred Cantata Philippi. This work is admirably suited, as its second title, Church Oratorio, implies, for church use, being comparatively easy of performance by a limited chorus, with only an organ for the accompaniment. Much care had evidently been bestowed in the preparation of the Cantata as was evidenced by the admirable manner in which it was re-rendered. The fugal passages were promptly and vigorously attacked, and due attention paid to light and shade both in the choruses and solos, under the Conductorship of the Cathedral Organist, Mr. F. H. Burstall. The accompaniments were played with much skill by Mr. Charles Collins. The Precentor of the Cathedral, the Rev. R. A. English, read the prayers with which the Oratorio was introduced and concluded. The work was listened to with so much interest that it is not improbable a second performance may be thought desirable. Dr. Bridge's Mount Moriah is also, we believe, to be given at one of the services.

NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE.—The usual winter series of popular Concerts was successfully inaugurated on Saturday evening, the 18th ult., in the Town Hall. The vocalists were Madame Tomsett and Messrs. Welch and Goodhead. The great attraction of the evening was the fine violin playing of Mr. Carrodus. The Concert opened with an organ solo played in a masterly manner by Mr. Rea, who also officiated as accompanist. Miss Kate Liddell assisted at the pianoforte.

NEWNHAM-ON-SEVERN.—The Harvest Festival and Commemoration of the re-opening of the Parish Church was celebrated on Thursday, the 2nd ult. There was a celebration of the Holy Communion at 8 a.m., and full Choral Service at 11 and 7.30; the preachers respectively being the Rev. Canon Mayne, Vicar of St. Catherine's, Gloucester, and the Venerable Archdeacon Sheringham, Gloucester. Dykes's Te Deum in F, and Barby's "O Lord how manifold" were sung in the morning; and during the Offertory C. L. Williams's "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace." In the evening the anthem was "The grace of God" (Barby). Special Hymns were also sung at both services. Mr. Francis Morgan presided at the Organ at the Morning Service, and Mr. W. H. Morgan at the Evening Service. At the close of the latter, and in the vestry, the Archdeacon paid a compliment to the choir boys for the manner in which they sang, and said that they reflected great credit on their trainer, Mr. W. Morgan.

PARKSTONE.—On Saturday, the 18th ult., a Pianoforte and Violin Recital was given in St. Peter's Schoolroom, the performers being Mr. F. Norman Adams, pianoforte, and Miss Lillian Dixon (pupil of Mr. Carrodus), violin. The solo and concerted playing of both artists could not fail to win the sympathy of an audience capable of appreciating music of the highest merit. The programme was exceedingly well selected.

PORT ELIZABETH, CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.—A Concert of Sacred Music was given in the Congregational Church, Pearson Street, by the members of the Church Choir, under the conductorship of Mr. W. C.

Elliott, on Monday evening, September 8. An excellently selected programme was well rendered, the solo vocalists being the Misses Beldon, Edwards, and Redford; Messrs. Plummer, Goldsborough, Prim, Vizard, and Kennedy. Mr. T. Mackay presided at the Organ.

ST. LEONARDS.—A performance of The Redemption was given in St. Paul's Church, on Wednesday evening, the 22nd ult., in aid of the fund for the organ, which has recently been enlarged by Foster and Andrews, and now consists of four manuals and about fifty stops. As the proceeds were for the Organ Fund, it was deemed advisable to dispense with an orchestra. The entire work was played on the organ by Dr. Abram, and the manner in which the several orchestral effects were realised speaks volumes for the amount of time and study he must have spent on the score. The Choir numbered about 200 voices, and consisted of the Church Choir, assisted by Dr. Abram's Choral Union. The solos and the parts for the narrators were rendered by members of the Choral Union, with the addition of Mr. Winn, of St. Paul's Cathedral. As Dr. Abram was at the organ his duties as Conductor were ably performed by his nephew, Mr. E. Kennard, Organist of Blacklands Church, Hastings. The whole work was exceedingly well rendered. This is the first instance in which this Oratorio has been sung in its entirety in a parish church.

STRATFORD-ON-AVON.—The new Organ, erected by Messrs. Hewins, in St. James's Church was opened on Thursday, the 9th ult. Being the occasion of the Harvest Thanksgiving, the Service was Choral throughout. The Sermon was preached by the Rev. —Llewellyn, Vicar of Holy Trinity, Worcester. Mr. J. H. Caseley, Organist of the Parish Church, presided at the organ, and after the Service gave a Recital, displaying the qualities of the various stops to great advantage. The instrument, which cost £350, has given entire satisfaction, and is much admired for its sweetness of tone combined with power.

SUNBURY-ON-THAMES.—The Harvest Festival at St. Mary's Church took place on the 10th ult. The choir was augmented by a portion of the choir of St. James, New Hampton, and the singing throughout reflected much credit on the Honorary Organist and Choirmaster, Mr. Warner Higgins, who presided at the organ. The same evening the annual Choir Dinner and Concert took place, the musical arrangements being under the direction of Mr. Edwin Bishop, who also contributed two solos. Mr. David Knott and Mr. John Vicary were the accompanists.

SWANSCOMBE, KENT.—Thanksgiving Services were held on Sunday, the 5th ult., at All Saints' Church. The usual hymns from Ancient and Modern and special Psalms from the Cathedral Psalter were used—Te Deum (Dykes in F), Anthem, "Fear not, O Land" (Goss) (solo, Mr. Spencer); and Tours's Communion Service. Evening—Antem, "Blessed is the man (Stainer); Harvest Hymn by Redhead. Appropriate sermons were preached by the Rev. J. T. Christie, vicar. The voluntaries, from the works of Lefebure-Wély and Gounod were admirably played by Mr. T. H. Jarvis, Organist and Choirmaster. The church was crowded.

WALLINGFORD.—The annual Harvest Festival was held in the Parish Church of St. Mary's on the 16th ult. Holy Communion was celebrated at 7 and 8 a.m., Matins 10.30, and Choral Evensong and Sermon at 8 p.m., the preacher being the Rev. Haskett Smith, Vicar of Anwick, Lincolnshire. Tallis's Festal Responses were used. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were sung to Dr. Bunnett's setting in F, and the anthem was "The earth is the Lord's" (Albert Lowe). Mr. F. A. Clarke, Organist and Choirmaster of the Church, presided at the organ.

WATFORD.—During the Conversazione which was given at the Public Library, on the 1st ult., an excellent Concert took place, under the direction of Mr. James Turpin, Mus. Bac., Cantab. The programme was exceedingly interesting, and included solos on the violin and pianoforte, by the Rev. C. J. Langley and Mr. James Turpin respectively, and songs by Miss Clara Field, Miss Kate Cutler, Messrs. Spicer, W. J. Brooks, and A. G. Wand.

WELLINGTON, N.Z.—The fifth Concert of the Orchestral Society was given on Tuesday, September 2, before a large and appreciative audience. The high character of the Society's former Concerts was in this one fully maintained, both in regard to the selection of pieces and their execution. Mozart's Don Giovanni Overture was the opening piece, and the central feature of the Concert was Beethoven's Symphony No. 4, in B flat, which was performed for the first time in Wellington. With the exception of a few comparatively unimportant slips, it was admirably played. Cowen's "Yellow Jasmine" and Flotow's little-known Overture to Indra were also given, the former being rendered with all the grace so necessary to its effect. Mrs. George Cotterell, an excellent professional vocalist, sang Beethoven's great scena "Ah perfido" with much success, and also contributed one of Sterndale Bennett's songs. Two male-voice quartets, and the bass song from Smart's Bride of Dunkerron, were sung by amateurs, and completed the programme. The Concert was, as usual, under the direction of Mr. Robert Parker, Organist of St. Paul's, who has acted as Conductor of the Society since its formation.

WESTBURY-ON-TRYM.—The annual Harvest Thanksgiving Festival was held on Sunday morning, September 23, and following Tuesday evening, at the Parish Church, which was beautifully and artistically decorated. The morning Service commenced with the hymn "Come, ye thankful people, come." The Responses were Tallis's; the "Te Deum" (in which Masters Lowther and Chandler took the solo part) was Allen's in F, and the anthem, Barnby's "O Lord how manifold." At the Tuesday evening Service, at which a crowded congregation was present, the Westbury Choir was augmented by the choir of Stoke Bishop, Henbury, Redland Green, and St. Saviour's, and numbered about 100 voices, under the conductorship of Mr. E. Townsend. The Service was fully choral, and opened with Processional Hymn, "Come, ye thankful people, come." The Responses (Tallis) were intoned by the Rev. V. P. Wast, of St. Saviour's. The chants for the psalms were Spohr in A flat, and Grand Chant by Humphreys in C. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were by Winchester in B flat, and the anthem "O Lord how manifold," Barnby. The Recessional Hymn was "The Church's one foundation." The singing was excellent throughout, and showed the result of careful training. Mr. H. J. Bristowe Davis presided at the organ, and at the close of the Service played Dunster's "Marche des Mousquetaires."

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. S. Wesley Martin, to St. Michael's, Wool 1 Street.—Mr D. Colley, Organist and Choirmaster to St. George's Church, Altrincham, Cheshire.—Mr. John Eagleton, Organist and Choirmaster to Sydenham Chapel, Forest Hill.—Mr. A. ORCHESTRA

THE LIBRETTO WRITTEN BY F. E. WEATHERLY

THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY

CHARLES HARFORD LLOYD.

Price One Shilling and Sixpence.

Orchestral parts, 16s. Full score in the Press.

TIMES.

"Throughout this well constructed piece the music is impressive and very delicately scored. Among the remainder of the numbers Hero's monologue and the final elegy on the death of the lovers deserve special mention. Mr. Lloyd's cantata earned the applause it fully deserved."

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"Judged as a whole, 'Hero and Leander' strengthens hope of the young Oxford musician, who should now be numbered amongst our coming men."

STANDARD.

"'Hero and Leander' was received with signs of unequivocal gratification, and at the conclusion Mr. Lloyd was heartily called back to the platform to receive the plaudits of the public and the executants who had laboured in his behalf."

DAILY NEWS.

"The work is replete with musical interest, and is well written in its choral and orchestral details, which were thoroughly well realised. 'Hero and Leander' will doubtless be in request by choral societies."

MORNING POST.

"The vocal portion is elegantly written, the expression of hope to which the music leads is admirably brought in, and the work ends in a fashion which leaves the hearer well pleased both at the design and the execution. Unlike many of the works written for like occasions and heard no more, 'Hero and Leander' will occupy a permanent place in the répertoires of choral societies, as its many merits will increase with better acquaintance."

DAILY CHRONICLE.

"The chief characteristic of Mr. Lloyd's music is its entire suitability to the subject. Its melody is fluent and rhythmical, the instrumentation is not so heavy or complicated as to throw the vocal parts into a secondary position, and over all there is the warmth and glow of colour appropriate to the incidents and the scene."

ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

"There is much merit in the music—sufficient indeed to justify its repetition in London, and its wide acceptance by choral societies."

ACADEMY.

"Is a work of much charm and considerable merit."

THE HOLY CITY

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"The work is an honour to English Art, and has elevated its composer into a place of distinction amongst native musicians."—Queen.

"A good sound musical work is this 'Holy City.' I have no hesitation in saying that it creditably represents English art, and does honour not only to the skill but to the judgment and taste of Mr. Gaul." Daily Telegraph.

"The reception was favourable in the extreme, and the Cantata must henceforth be classed among the successes which the Birmingham Musical Festivals have brought to light."—Standard.

"The 'Holy City' is evidently the work of a thoughtful as well as a clever composer, and should make its mark among thoroughly English productions of a sacred character."—Musical Times.

"We hope and believe that the reception given last night to Mr. Gaul and to his 'Holy City' Cantata will prove an earnest of its popularity and acceptance throughout the length and breadth of the land."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"A most interesting, tuneful, and scholarly work."—Manchester Courier.

"This fine work will considerably enhance Mr. Gaul's reputation as a musician."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

Vocal Score, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; Ditto, paper boards, 3s.; Ditto, scarlet cloth, 4s.; Voice parts, for the use of Choral Societies, each 1s. A selection of Soprano and Contralto Movements for School Use, 1s. 3d. Band Parts on Loan. Tonic Sol-fa Edition, 1s.

London: NOVELLO, EWER and Co.

RUTH

Words by EDWARD OXFENFORD

MUSIC BY ALFRED R. GAUL.

"Ruth' is a work of sterling power; its musical form is that of perfect tunefulness combined with simplicity and strength. There is nothing involved about it, nor the least straining after unattainable effects. The composer has grasped his theme in a thoroughly sympathetic manner, and has produced a work which is worthy of the subject. . . . One of the sweetest numbers in the cantata is Ruth's solo, 'Entreat me not to leave thee,' which is instinct with pathetic expression. . . . Boaz's solo, 'Go not from hence, my daughter,' is another effective number. . . . A chorale, 'Nightfall,' is an exquisitely beautiful conception; and the intermezzo, 'Daybreak,' and the jubilant Wedding Chorus which follows, are full of spirit and vivacity, rushing forward with a joyous bound that carries the audience completely away. An enthusiastic encore was given to the intermezzo and chorus."—Bradford Observer.

"That the idyllic story of Ruth is one admirably adapted for artistic illustration is unquestionable, and poets, painters, and musicians have over and over again made it a subject for the exercise of their talents, and we have no hesitation in saying that in its poetical and musical treatment by Mr. Oxenford and our townsman, it has been invested with increased interest. . . . Pieces such as Mr. Gaul's Opus 34 are much wanted, and we believe that when the 'Ruth' Cantata is heard in our Town Hall it will be at once accepted as a valuable addition to our stock of music suitable for performance by fairly advanced and advancing societies."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"Bright, tuneful, fresh, and musically—this work will be a great favourite, and will add to Mr. Gaul's reputation. The second part will be liked better than the first; it opens in the harvest-field, and here the real idyll begins, and with it the charm and grace and freshness of Mr. Gaul's inspiration. The maidens' chorus, bright as the morning it greets, and the men's robust and vigorous reply, well introduce the fresh and melodious joy-breathing music of Ruth, the chastened yet hopeful address of Naomi, and the hearty generous welcome of Boaz. . . . The work closes with a short but spirited chorus, 'Rejoice, for blessings round us fall,' which will bear comparison with anything Mr. Gaul has written. An effective fugal passage carefully worked out, but not overdone, is inserted between strains of joyful acclamation of considerable freshness and vigour."—Birmingham Weekly Dart.

"Ruth' has been set to music by several composers; none, however, has become so worthily popular as the Cantata under notice. Although somewhat simple in parts it contains some charming music, and is highly characteristic of the story it so vividly illustrates."—South Wilts Express.

"Full of flowing melody."—Salisbury Times.

A DRAMATIC ORATORIO
FOUNDED ON THE SONG OF SOLOMON

THE WORDS SELECTED FROM HOLY SCRIPTURE BY

AND THE MUSIC COMPOSED EXPRESSLY FOR THE NORWICH MUSICAL FESTIVAL, 1884, BY

A. C. MACKENZIE.

Paper cover, 5s.; Paper boards, 6s.; Scarlet cloth, 7s. 6d.

THE TIMES.

"The reception of the work here was decidedly favourable, and at the end the composer received a perfect ovation, in which the chorus and the audience took part with equal cordiality."

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"At the close the general verdict was unmistakable; cheer after cheer rang through the hall, while the members of the choir rained down flowers upon the fortunate composer. The Norwich audience thus stamped the oratorio with their approval. They could do no other and be just."

STANDARD.

"I have already alluded to the hearty reception given to Mr. Mackenzie, who richly deserved all the encomiums passed upon him. The knowledge of orchestral combination, the contrapuntal skill displayed no less in the instrumental than in the vocal parts, and, above all, the ease and grace of the melodies, together with the poetic feeling which underlies it, all set the seal of nobility upon 'The Rose of Sharon.'"

DAILY NEWS.

"It is one of the most important works of its class that has been produced for many years, and will doubtless speedily find wide acceptance."

MORNING POST.

"Mr. Mackenzie has produced a work which will make a distinct mark in his own career, as well as in the history of modern music. . . . It is the most remarkable endeavour of a high character which has as yet been achieved by an Englishman, and as such it deserved the enthusiastic reception which was accorded to it at the conclusion."

DAILY CHRONICLE.

"Considered from any aspect, 'The Rose of Sharon' is a credit to British musical art, and as such should be cultivated in public esteem."

ATHENÆUM.

"The composer has put forth his full strength, and has not only surpassed everything he has previously done, but in our deliberate opinion has produced by far the finest oratorio ever written by an Englishman. . . . By his new achievement Mr. Mackenzie has placed himself at the head of living English composers, and shown the possession of genius as distinguished from highly cultivated talent."

ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

"'The Rose of Sharon' contains much beautiful and impressive music. The vocal writing—both for the soloists and the chorus—is fluent and effective; the orchestral details being throughout full of picturesque colouring and contrast."

WEEKLY DISPATCH.

"This has been a red-letter day for English music. Among the company of young composers who are striving successfully to raise the musical status of the country, Mr. A. C. Mackenzie may be accorded the foremost place, and he has now gained a conspicuous triumph in the most difficult branch of the art—namely, oratorio."

SUNDAY TIMES.

"It was listened to from the first note to the last, not only with patience and rapt attention, but with a delight which the audience could not at times refrain from showing. The interest of the story, the charm and the grandeur of the music, the excellence of the performance—all combined to impress upon the hearer one simple but decisive opinion, that 'The Rose of Sharon' is a magnificent work, and brings fresh honour to English art and additional fame to its gifted composer."

NORWICH ARGUS.

"The scene of enthusiasm witnessed in St. Andrew's Hall on the termination of Thursday morning's performance has probably never been equalled in the history of the Norwich Festival. . . . Again and again was Mr. Mackenzie recalled to the platform, and each time was the same rapturous ovation repeated. The excited assemblage shouted with delight, and assuredly, we repeat, put in a 'best on record' in the way of festival receptions."

ARTHUR O'LEARY.

WAYSIDE SKETCHES FOR THE PIANOFORTE.

"A group of elegant sketches, the production of a refined and thoughtful musician who is gradually working his way to a position of importance."—Musical Times.

"This new number (No. 3) is brief, but there is more music contained in its four pages than is contained in forty of many a better known writer."—Queen.

"Mr. Arthur O'Leary's compositions denote considerable powers of invention as well as constructive knowledge."—Observer.

THEMA IN C MOLL.

"To utilise the three-movement sonata form in a work of variations is, as far as we know, an original, and at all events a happy, thought. The composer possesses both imagination and skill. The pianist's task is under the hand and interesting, and in a great measure (as, for instance, in the grand cadence of the Adagio) of surprising originality. The first glance is sufficient to show that the work is that of a ripe and much experienced musician."—Deutsche Musiker Zeitung.

"The work before us shows such masterly treatment of material, such earnest striving in the right direction, and such artistic taste, that we cannot pass over the Variations without comment. This work is worthy of closer attention."—Frankfurter Zeitung.

"Musically excellent, and worthy of note."—Leipzig Signale.

TOCCATA IN F MAJOR FOR THE PIANOFORTE.

"Amongst the musicians of our own country Arthur O'Leary has a prominent position. Famous as a teacher, Mr. O'Leary is widely known as an editor and composer. Evidently art is the source from which he gets his inspiration, and not the wish to found a popular reputation. The Toccata in F is a fine specimen of its class; the general construction of the work reveals masterly and artistic treatment. The music is sparkling throughout, and the perforation is a magnificent piece of workmanship."—Derbyshire Gazette.

THE BLACK KNIGHT.

ROMANCE FOR PIANO. New Edition. Price 3s.

Included in Syllabus of Local Examinations (R.A.M.) for 1885. "Mr. O'Leary's production is exceedingly well written. It is decidedly interesting."—Monthly Musical Record.

ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS AND CONCERT HALLS IN LONDON.

DURING the past month a correspondence has been going on in the columns of the Times on a question of deep importance to all interested in the progress of music in the metropolis. In the notice which appeared of the last Richter concert, the crowded audience was pointed to as a proof that there exists in London a large demand for high-class orchestral performances, and the opinion was expressed that "if Mr. Manns, or some other conductor of established reputation, would start Saturday evening concerts at St. James's Hall during the winter months, their ultimate success might almost be predicted with certainty." This remark called forth a letter from Mr. J. C. Rodriguez, pointing out that between the autumn series of Richter concerts and the commencement of the Philharmonic Society's season at the end of February there were no orchestral concerts to be heard in London except at the Crystal Palace, which is very tedious of access, and further complaining of the expensiveness of high-class concerts, a ticket for a stall mostly costing fifteen shillings, Mr. Rodriguez said that in New York the highest charge at the best concerts does not exceed five or six shillings. The discussion was continued by Mr. Ganz, who spoke with authority, as having himself given orchestral concerts at St. James's Hall, which he had been obliged to discontinue for want of proper support. Mr. Ganz stated that the expenses of such concerts were enormous, and that those which he had given cost him from £250 to nearly £300 each. In his opinion the only way to establish such a series of concerts as was suggested by the Times was to form a committee of gentlemen willing to guarantee a sufficient sum to meet any possible loss on the first two or three seasons.

In the same issue of the Times in which Mr. Ganz's letter appeared, another correspondent, writing under the initials of "S. H. S.," drew attention to the fact that the great want of Central London was an adequate concert-hall. With the single exception of St. James's Hall, which is not large enough to render orchestral concerts at popular prices remunerative, there is not one building in the metropolis available for the purpose required; the Albert Hall being not only too large, but, owing to its situation, nearly as difficult of access for residents in many of our suburbs as the Crystal Palace itself; while Exeter Hall, which would fulfil most, if not all, of the requirements, is no longer used for concert purposes. A leading article in the same day's journal summed up the discussion, but failed to offer any practical suggestion, the writer contenting himself with the remark that in some way or other the demand for high-class orchestral concerts would probably ere long be met.

The entire subject, it may be at once admitted, is not free from difficulties; but the questions raised in connection with it are of sufficient interest to deserve ventilation. Put in their simplest form, they resolve themselves into two—viz., Can good orchestral concerts be made to pay, and if so, how? and secondly, Where should such concerts be given? On both these points we propose to say a few words in the present article.

The experiment of giving high-class concerts of instrumental music has been tried several times in London during the past ten years. The largest and most complete effort in this direction was unquestionably tionably the series of nightly concerts, both orchestral and vocal, at the Royal Albert Hall, given in the winter of 1874-5, under the joint management of the directors of the Albert Hall and the firm of Messrs. Novello and Co. At these concerts every class of good music was brought forward, one night in each week being devoted to the classical school, another to the modern German, a third to oratorio, a fourth to the works of native composers, while the tastes of those who prefer the lighter style was catered to by a "Ballad Night" on Mondays, and a "Popular Night" on Saturdays. The concerts continued for seven weeks; but it was found that the public support was insufficient to meet the enormous expenses incurred, and that the conducting of such a series of entertainments required a separate business organisation, the work being too heavy to be carried on even by a firm of such large resources as that of Messrs. Novello. As bearing upon the second question that we shall have to discuss, we may say here that in our opinion the non-success of these concerts was in no small degree due to the locale. The Albert Hall lies so far west that frequent visits to it are for many amateurs altogether out of the question. Had the hall been situated at Charing Cross, or in the city, the result would without doubt have been different. Even as it was, we are informed that the concerts did not fall very far short of paying their expenses, and had it been practicable to continue them they would probably have ultimately become remunerative.

A somewhat similar experiment, though from a different point of view, was that which was tried at the Royal Albert Hall in the years 1873, 4 and 5, when performances of Bach's "Passion, according to Matthew," and other sacred works, were given on nearly every evening during Passion week. The results as regards attendance were, we believe, fairly satisfactory, though here again the locality, no doubt, exercised an unfavourable influence.

Coming now to speak of concerts given at St. James's Hall, we may mention those of Mr. Ganz, resulting, as we already know from himself, in such a heavy loss; the two series given by Madame Viard-Louis in 1878-9, and Mr. Cowen's Saturday Orchestral Concerts, given in 1880, the last-named precisely meeting the want hinted at by the Times in the remarks which called forth the discussion spoken of at the beginning of this article. Of all these enterprises the same story has to be told—excellent performances, insufficient support. The inference is obvious. Every new undertaking requires time, often a long time, to win public confidence; and in the case of orchestral concerts the attendant expenses are necessarily so great that few, if any, of our entrepreneurs have sufficient capital to be able to afford the loss involved in continuing to give the concerts until they have obtained so firm a footing as to become self-supporting. Even the Monday Popular Concerts, the cost of which are far less than that of any orchestral concerts, were, it is well known, carried on at a loss for some years; but the manager, relying on the goodness of the entertainment he offered to the public, persevered, and the concerts are now, we believe, a very profitable affair.

The plain truth is that any really good series of concerts in London can ultimately be made to pay if any one can be found willing to lose sufficient money over them for the first few seasons. This, as already hinted, is where the shoe really pinches. How is the difficulty to be met? There are two ways that suggest themselves. Why should not some of our millionaires step forward and take up the matter? There are many men in London to whom the few thousands required to establish such concerts upon a firm basis would be a mere trifle. It is by no means an impossible hypothesis that some of the wealthy art patrons, who think nothing of giving thousands for a picture, or who make magnificent donations to our public institutions, would be equally ready to endow, if we may use the word, such an enterprise if the case were fairly put before them. Or, on the other hand, the needful sum might be raised by a guarantee fund, as suggested by Mr. Ganz, a plan which has been already tried with complete success at the Glasgow Orchestral Concerts conducted by Mr. Manns. A number of spirited citizens of Glasgow came forward to support these concerts. For the first few years the losses were heavy, and the gentlemen had to put their hands into their pockets for a considerable amount. Perseverance, however, brought its reward, and at the present time we believe these concerts are so prosperous that nearly if not quite all the liabilities incurred in past years have been discharged, and the prospects of the coming season are so bright that the committee have felt justified in going to the expense of a considerable increase in the number of the orchestra.

Take another case—that of Bristol. In the year 1877 Mr. Riseley commenced a series of orchestral concerts in the Colston Hall. These concerts, which were given fortnightly, were undertaken entirely at the conductor's own risk; and it must be borne in mind that the expenses attendant upon them were proportionately far heavier than would be the case in London, as many of the performers had to be engaged from Birmingham and London, the local musical resources being incomplete. At a very heavy pecuniary loss Mr. Riseley continued year after year, till at last he, like so many before him, had to give up a struggle which was too costly to be longer carried on. At this point a number of gentlemen in Bristol took the matter up, feeling that it would be a disgrace to their city if such concerts were abandoned for want of proper support. A guarantee fund was raised, and the future of the Monday Popular Concerts at the Colston Hall appears now to be secured. Surely if at Glasgow and Bristol a sufficient number of music lovers can be found to establish orchestral concerts, there ought to be no real difficulty in London, where there are at least twenty amateurs to every one to be found in the provincial cities.

A very important point, and one that should certainly not be overlooked in dealing with this question, is that high-class orchestral concerts, of the kind of which we are now speaking, should not be carried on as a business speculation. We do not mean to say that they should be given at a loss, but that no individual, or individuals, should have any pecuniary interest in their success. To some this may appear an impracticable, if not Quixotic, condition; that it is not so in reality is proved by the fact that at the present time there is at least one musical institution in London which is successfully conducted on these lines. We refer to the Borough of Hackney Choral Association, a local society which, solely through the policy it has consistently pursued, has obtained more than a local reputation. At all the concerts of this Association a full orchestra is engaged; the prices of admission are lower than at any other orchestral concerts in London, and the Shoreditch Town Hall, in which the concerts are given, will only accommodate a little over a thousand people; and yet the Association pays its way. The few pounds in hand at the close of a season are carried over to the next account; and should there be a slightly larger surplus than usual the only result is that rather more money is spent on the concerts of the following season. The Association pays its way not by means of a guarantee fund, in the ordinary sense of that term, but because the members dispose of subscription tickets sufficient to cover about three-fourths of the expenses of the concerts; and further that the plan is adopted of never engaging expensive "stars" as soloists. Experience has proved that it is possible to bring audiences together to hear music rather than to hear singers; for if at these concerts a somewhat "stronger" cast than usual is advertised—an experiment which has been occasionally tried—it is not found to make any perceptible difference in the receipts. It may be suggested that a merely local society, depending to a large extent upon a suburban clientèle, scarcely affords a basis for calculating the probable results of a similar policy at the West End; but to this it may be replied that the list of subscribers to the Association contains names of residents in all quarters of London, thus proving that amateurs will support an institution founded upon a purely artistic basis. If subscribers can be found who will come from such distances as Kensington, Clapham, and Dulwich to so inconvenient and unaristocratic a neighbourhood as Shoreditch for the mere love of good music, without the attraction of favourite vocalists, what may not be done under proper management at some more central locality? We have referred especially to the Borough of Hackney Choral Association, because the unusually low prices charged for admission to its concerts bear more particularly upon our argument; but we believe there are other societies, such as the Sacred Harmonic and the Bach Choir, from which the commercial element is altogether absent, though we are unable to say whether or not in these cases the pecuniary results are as satisfactory as in that which we have mentioned.

This brings us to the second question we propounded at starting, Where should such concerts be given? To this in our present condition in London, as regards accommodation, it is very difficult, if not impossible, to give a satisfactory answer. It is a surprising fact that London is worse off as regards large concert-rooms than any of our most important provincial cities. Liverpool possesses two excellent concert-rooms in St. George's Hall and the Philharmonic Hall; Manchester has its Free Trade Hall; at Birmingham, Leeds, and Newcastle the Town Halls are excellently adapted for concerts; at Bristol the Colston Hall meets all requirements; the same may be said of the City Hall, Glasgow; while even as far south as Plymouth and as far north as Aberdeen there are concert-rooms large and commodious enough for all ordinary purposes. In London, with its four millions of people, there are only two large halls available—the Albert Hall and St. James's Hall. Of these, the former, as we have already said, is too large and too far west; the latter, excellently situated, and admirable in its acoustic properties, is hardly large enough to hold sufficient money to render expensive concerts remunerative at popular prices. In Central London there is absolutely no other place, now that Exeter Hall is no longer used for musical purposes, in which orchestral concerts can be given; for the Promenade Concerts at Covent Garden stand upon a different footing altogether. We have many smaller rooms, admirably adapted for chamber concerts, such as Princes' Hall and the Steinway Hall; but for an orchestra the choice is restricted to the two localities named. At St. James's Hall the sole chance of making an orchestral concert pay its expenses is to charge for the tickets the high prices of which Mr. Rodriguez complains, prices which to a large number of music lovers are virtually prohibitory. The only way to reduce the expenses without detriment to the artistic character of the performances would be to decline to engage soloists who ask very high terms; but this, by diminishing, at least for a mixed public, the attractiveness of the entertainment, would involve a risk which few concert-givers probably would care to run.

There is but one solution of the difficulty which occurs to us as possible. A new hall, suitable alike for public meetings and for concerts, has become an imperative necessity in London. What is required is a concert-room which shall be at least as large as the Town Halls in Birmingham and Leeds, if not larger; it ought to seat not fewer than 4,000 people besides the performers. It was objected in the Times, in answer to "S. H. S.'s" suggestion, that while we can increase the number of an orchestra or of a chorus to any extent required, the power of a solo voice is but limited, and that in a very large room the soloists are necessarily at a great disadvantage. This is of course true of a building with so enormous an area as that of the Albert Hall, for example, as many singers know to their cost; but that such a hall as that which we propose need not of necessity be too large for solo music is proved by the experience of the concert-room at the Crystal Palace, in which the Saturday concerts are given. This room when full will hold 3,900 persons; and, as the galleries are only narrow, its superficial area is larger in proportion than that of any other room with which we are acquainted. Yet here there is certainly no difficulty in hearing a solo even at the farthest end of the hall. Provided, therefore, that the acoustic properties of the proposed hall be satisfactory, there is no reason to suppose that 4,000 persons, or even more, could not be well accommodated in it; and the obvious advantage of such a building would be that while twice as much money might be put into it (to use the technical phrase) as into St. James's Hall, the expenses would not increase in anything like the same proportion. The first cost of the erection of such a hall would of course be very great; but, if the locality were judiciously selected, we think there is little doubt that it would prove a good investment. We are disposed even to believe that there is room for more than one new concert hall in London. In addition to the large one which we propose, somewhere at the West End, another in the City itself—say, in the East Central District, if a suitable site could be found—would probably be largely patronised. This would not need to be so large as the other; a room containing 2,000 to 2,500 persons would probably be sufficient. In both cases, however, it would be needful that the buildings be erected with a special view to concert requirements; there should be a sufficiently large orchestra, with a good organ, ample accommodation in the matter of cloak-rooms and retiring rooms for soloists, chorus, and orchestra; it would be well also if smaller halls were added in which chamber concerts could be given. We have pointed out, briefly and imperfectly, what is in our opinion required. Till some further accommodation is provided we see little probability of the permanent establishment of such concerts as are desired; and it is to be hoped that ere long a company may be formed for the purpose of erecting some such building as we have indicated in the course of our remarks.

HEINRICH SCHÜTZ

By WILLIAM H. CUMMINGS.

THE pithy sentence, "Coming events cast their shadows before," should be realised at this moment by all lovers of music. We are on the threshold of the year 1885, which will be remarkable as a triple centenary. Already notes of preparation are in the air, announcements have been made by various musical societies that they propose in some fitting way to recognise the centenary of George Frideric Handel, born February 23, 1685, at Halle, and also the centenary of John Sebastian Bach, born March 21, 1685, at Eisenach.

Here then are the names of two immortals whom we shall delight to honour, but who is the third? To our shame it must be confessed that there seems to be great danger that we shall altogether forget to do honour to the centenary of one whose claims for remembrance and recognition are fully as strong as those of Handel and Bach.

Heinrich Schütz (Henricus Sagittarius), born just one hundred years before those twin stars, by his genius and work led the way, and foreshadowed the path so successfully explored by them. The name of Schütz will, I fear, be quite new to the majority of my readers; he is not to be found in "Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians," it will, therefore, be interesting briefly to relate his biography:—Schütz was born at Köstritz, Saxony, on the 8th of October (some writers say the 5th), 1585. He was descended from a family of position, his father having been burgomaster of Weissenfels, and his grandfather a privy counsellor. In 1591 his father removed to Weissenfels to take possession of his inheritance, and here the beautiful voice of the son attracted so much attention that at the age of fourteen, in 1599, he was taken into the service of the Count Palatine Moritz, of Hesse-Cassel, by whose order he received a thorough education in arts and literature, under the superintendence of the best masters. He remained with the Prince for eight years, and in 1607 was admitted to the University of Marbourg, where he made the study of the law a speciality, and in two years achieved remarkable success and honour. All this time, however, it was quite apparent that the natural bent of his genius tended to the art of music; the Prince Moritz therefore removed him from the University, and sent him to Venice to study music under the celebrated master Gabrieli, generously undertaking to defray all the necessary expenses. It is doubtful whether the offer was accepted with alacrity, or whether Schütz hesitated at first definitely to adopt music as a profession. It is however certain that he arrived in Venice in 1609, and immediately commenced the study of composition under Gabrieli. This master was considered by many of the musicians of the day as a wild innovator; but Schütz adopted all his master's theories, and soon brought to public notice valuable evidence of his diligence as a pupil. In 1611 he published a set of Madrigals for five voices. In the following year his master died, Schütz, therefore, removed to Cassel, where the Prince bestowed on him a yearly pension of 200 guilders, which may have been insufficient for the wants of the composer, who resumed the practice of the law; but his remarkable abilities as a musician becoming known to John George, elector of Saxony, Schütz was summoned to Dresden to receive the appointment of Court Music-director. From this time he devoted himself exclusively to his beloved art, and was soon recognised as the most distinguished musician in Germany. The elector, to show his appreciation of his merit, presented him with a gold chain and portrait. In 1619 Schütz married the daughter of Chretien Wildeck, the tax-master of the electorate; she died in 1625. In 1628, in consequence of the war which ravaged Germany, Schütz removed to Venice, where the following year he published a book, in the preface of which he writes, I went to Venice for the second time, to inform myself of the new sort of music which had been developed there since my first journey, and which was now in use. The new music was doubtless the composition of Monteverde. In August, 1631, the father of Schütz died, and he returned to Dresden, where he stayed but a short time, and afterward journeyed to the principal towns in Italy. In 1634 he again passed through Germany, still suffering from the plague of war, and eventually settled for four years at Copenhagen, where he was received with much distinction; he left Denmark in 1638 and went to Brunswick and Lüneburg, returning to Copenhagen in 1642. He received the appointment of Chapel-master to the king, but the happy restoration of peace to Germany enabled him to go back to Dresden, where he spent the remainder of his days. Becoming afflicted with deafness he devoted himself to the study of the Scriptures, and the composition of sacred music, producing numerous Psalms and Motets, and four settings of "The Passion." Two years before his death, at his request, his pupil, Bernhard, director of music at Hamburg, composed a funeral chant for five voices, in the style of Palestrina, for performance at his funeral. Schütz died on November 6, 1672, in the 88th year of his age, having been Chapel-master to the Elector of Saxony fifty-seven years. Much of his church music was planned for performance by a double choir, and was largely coloured by orchestration for stringed and wind instruments. It is remarkable for its true expression of the sentiment of the text, for rhythm and sweetness of cadence. A list of the compositions by Schütz would be lengthy, and must be reserved for a future occasion; but mention may be made of his Opera "Daphné," composed to a libretto translated by Opitz from Rinuccini, remarkable as being the first German opera. His most beautiful composition is said to be an Oratorio on "The Passion," preserved in manuscript in the Royal Library at Dresden. Schütz added the grace of the Italian manner to the strength of the German school, and was the first to give due place to solo and chorus in musical illustrations of Bible narrative. Unfortunately for us, so far as I know, the music of Schütz is not easily obtained, with the exception of some very beautiful extracts from his "Passion Music," introduced to public notice by Herr Pauer in 1873, and published by Novello, Ewer and Co. These are to be had, and I recommend them to the notice of my readers in the hope that their beauty and excellence will induce some London Musical Society to take them into consideration, with a view to a fitting performance in 1885 to celebrate the centenary of Heinrich Schütz, justly called by his contemporaries "The Father of German Music."

HECTOR BERLIOZ'S "TE DEUM."

By J. S. SHEDLOCK, B.A.

THIS extraordinary work, which Mr. A. Manns intends shortly to produce at the Crystal Palace, was first performed at the church of St. Eustache, Paris, on April 30, 1855, under the composer's direction. When the work has been heard the musical critics will tell us what they think of it; meanwhile, we propose to give a brief description of the various movements, hoping to interest those who are unacquainted with the score. The work is usually spoken of as one for two choirs, orchestra and organ, although in reality there are three: a first choir of sopranos, tenors and basses; a second choir similarly composed, and a third of children's voices. This children's choir, in performance, ought to be separated from the other two choirs, and placed on a raised platform not far from the orchestra. But the composer, in a note prefixed to the full score, intimates that this third choir may be dispensed with, although he adds that "il contribue puissamment à l'effet." In three out of the six sections of the work it is not even employed, and when used it doubles (with few and comparatively unimportant exceptions) the other voices either in unison or in the octave. For his orchestra Berlioz demands 25 first violins, 24 second, 18 violas, 18 cellos, and 16 double-basses—in all 101 strings. Of wood wind: 4 flutes, 4 oboes, 4 clarinets, an English horn, bass clarinet, and 4 bassoons. Of brass: 4 horns, 2 trumpets, 2 cornets, 6 tenor trombones, 1 ophicleide, and 1 tuba. Also kettledrums, drums, gross-caisse, and cymbals; and besides, the organ.

For his first choir he requires 100 voices (40 sopranos, 30 tenors, and 30 basses), the same for his second, and for the third 600, or, as he naively says in a note, "aussi nombreux que possible."

The first movement opens with a succession of chords for orchestra and organ alternately. The organ then gives out a bold theme, which is afterwards combined with the principal subject led off by the sopranos. To save space we give these two melodies together, as they occur after the one marked a has been treated in fugal style:—

Ex. 1.

The movement might really be described as an irregular double fugue on two subjects, or we might even say three, if we include a counter-subject which plays rather an important part in the opening. A clear knowledge and remembrance of the two themes quoted will enable the listener to understand the main scope and design of the whole movement. The one marked a forms in one place the material for an able stretto, while part of the other in another place is employed near the close with a strange progression of chords. Berlioz cleverly avoids consecutive fifths and octaves in the instrumental parts, but they are perceptible to the ear if not to the eye—

Ex. 2.
Voices.

The piece opens in F major but closes on the chord of F sharp as dominant of B major, the key of the following movement—i.e., "Tibi omnes." Here at first only female voices are employed, supported by wood wind without bassoons, horns, and strings, with sparing use of double-basses. The organ opens with a quiet symphony of sixteen bars, and it also plays a few bars between the vocal phrases. At the words "Plœni sunt cœli" the three choirs combine, and at the words "gloriæ tuæ" the full force of the orchestra is heard for the first time. The vibrating cymbals will here attract attention. The opening phrase, repeated so many times during the course of the piece, with slight variations according to the different words, is as follows—

Ex. 3.

Ti - bi, ti - bi om - nes An - ge - li.

It is allotted to men's voices after we have passed from heaven to earth, from Cherubim and Seraphim to Apostles, Prophets, and Martyrs. This second section winds up like the first with the forte "tuæ gloriæ." The phrase (Ex. 3) is then taken up by bass voices in the key of E, the subdominant, followed by a vigorous forte passage, and the movement concludes with a repetition of the opening symphony, this time allotted to strings, wood wind, and cornets. We cannot now describe the beautiful, quaint, and simple effects of harmony, and the delicacy of the orchestration. The composer, as we have seen, has at his command a huge array of forces, but the various instruments are used singly or in small groups to give variety of tone-colour; it is only once or twice they all unite for a burst of sound. And to one other feature of this movement we would call attention. Example 3 is repeated a number of times, but each time accompanied in a different manner. The reiterated phrase gives unity to the whole piece; the surroundings, variety. The third movement is the prayer "Dignare Domine;" there are no trombones, tuba, or drums used. A short symphony for organ, with pizzicato chords for strings, leads to the entry of the voices—sopranos of first choir and the basses of the two choirs. Over a long violoncello pedal (D) the sopranos enter singing—

Ex. 4.

Dig - na - re Dom - i - ne.

At the fifth bar the basses come in with "Domine," thus—and immediately afterwards the tenors answer with the theme. Soon the music modulates to the key of F major, and there is a long pedal F also assigned to the cello; from F we get to A, and from A to c; from there we proceed to e flat, and by enharmonic modulation to e natural. As the violoncellos ascended, so in like manner do they descend: from e to c sharp, then to A, F, and finally to D, when the movement closes. Over this curious bass the voice parts—i.e., sopranos and tenors, move about in rather a vague manner; the bass voices follow the violoncello notes, sometimes singing exactly with them, sometimes muttering several words in monotone fashion over one long note. Twice in the course of the movement first basses sing fifth above. To give proper effect to this number the bass voices must be deep and full-toned; the pedal notes indicated above show what they have to sing, and here is their part just at the end—

Ex. 6.

Spe - ra . . . vi - mus, . . .

The double-basses are not used after the opening prelude, and the organ comes in only in one or two places; the violins and violas for the most part support the voices, while the wood-wind instruments move about in an independent and often original manner.

In the next number, "Christe Rex gloriæ," neither trombones nor organ are used. The key is again D major. The voices enter at once with a phrase commencing—

Ex. 6.

TENORS AND BASSES.

Tu Chris - te tu Rex glo - ri - æ.

After this theme has been repeated with four-part and different harmony, we come to the following—

Ex. 7.

Tu de - vic - to mor - tis a - cu - le - o.

These two quotations will enable us to follow the first section of the movement. Example 6 is treated in stretto fashion, the voices coming in at the interval of a second below; Examples 6 and 7 are worked together. A sudden and Beethovenish transition from the key of D to that of F occurs near the close of this section.

When we come to the words "Ad liberandum," &c., the tenors of the first choir take up a plaintive theme; violins and violas strike piano pizzicato chords, the wood wind and first horn move along quietly with detached chords or short legato phrases, only the violoncellos supporting this slender fabric of sound. In one passage the violas divide, accompanying the vocal part in unison and octave. At the words "Tu ad dexteram" the orchestration becomes pretty full; the wood wind sustains the voices; and to these the pizzicato quaver figure of strings and long-sustained notes for horns, with occasional roll of the drum, must produce a striking contrast. We now return to the opening theme, this time set to the words "Sedes ad dexteram Dei." The passage begins forte; then we have a long crescendo passage, and after some effective writing for the voices they come to a close with the usual cadence, while the orchestra winds up with a few bars in which the principal theme is again heard. No. 5 is the prayer "Te Ergo Quæsumus." The key is G minor. The English horn and bass clarinet is used, and also the trombones, but there is no organ. Throughout this short movement the orchestration is very varied and, so far as we can judge, very effective. The principal theme is first heard in the opening symphony and then taken up by a tenor solo—

Te er - go quæ - su - mus te quæ - su - mus Domi - ne, &c.

This theme is accompanied by strings, with an agitated figure indicated in first bar of Ex. 8. After a time sopranos of both choirs sing in monotone "Fiat super nos misericordia tua Domine," accompanied, piano, by cornets and trombones. The tenor solo is followed a second time by a similar passage. The key now changes to G major. In the soft ending we notice first a triplet phrase—which has already cast its shadow before it in the first part of the movement, then the delicate accompaniment of wood wind, and lastly, the principal theme (Ex. 8) in major, harmonised for unaccompanied voices with melody in bass. When they cease, two pizzicato chords for strings bring the movement to an end, and well does this quiet end contrast with the loud and harsh organ tones heard at the opening of the next piece. Of the sixth and concluding number of the work, Berlioz, in his Mémoires, says:—"Le finale (Judex crederis) est sans aucun doute ce que j'ai produit de plus grandiose." And in a letter to his son Louis, dated April 27, 1855 (only a few days before the performance), he writes:—"Yesterday we had our first rehearsal at St. Eustache, with the orchestra and 600 children. It is beginning to progress. It is colossal! There is a finale which, I verily believe, is grander than the Tuba mirum of my Requiem." As yet, however, we can neither endorse nor contradict the composer's opinions.

Ex. 9.

Spe - ra . . . vi - mus, . . .

The organ opens with a theme which plays throughout the movement a very prominent part. We give it as first heard from the basses of the first choir—

Ex. 10.

Let us call it the Judgment theme. The key is E flat minor, but by means of an enharmonic modulation the sopranos come in on B as dominant of E minor; the tenors take up the theme still a semitone higher, on the C. The other voices of the two choirs gradually enter; we hear the cry of hope ("In te Domine speravi"), and the imploration ("Non confundar in æternam"). Strange modulations, weird harmonies produced by passing notes, mutterings of the violoncellos and double-basses, long sustained notes of the trombones and ophicleide forcing their way through the body of voices supported by strings and wood wind, and the inexorable Judgment theme—all attract notice in the long drawn-out sentence which closes with a diminuendo on the chord of B flat minor.

Hitherto, it may be remarked, the movement has had no key signature. It commenced, as we have said, in E flat minor. Berlioz now having made up his mind to remain for a time in one key, or its relative major, puts a signature of five flats. The sopranos of both choirs then begin thus—the phrase, or portion of one, consisting of the notes of the descending scale of B flat minor. The music continues for a time in melodious though rather mournful strains. The orchestral accompaniment contains no brass, and is principally occupied in supporting the voices. A modulation is soon made to D flat, the relative major, and the basses sing a phrase remarkable for its diatonic and tuneful character—

Ex. 12.

The key-note heard at the beginning of each bar speaks of the praise repeated "per singulos dies," while the phrase from Ex. 11 points to the hopes of the worshippers (see Ex. 12, a) during this act of praise. This phrase (Ex. 11) is now sung in the major key (D flat) to the words "per singulos dies," and when the "laudamus te" follows, the ominous sounds of the Judgment theme are uttered by the bass voices, supported by horns and double-basses pizzicato; the strings continue with the phrase of which Ex. 11 gives the commencement. This combination of themes is extremely interesting, and we are sorry that want of space forbids further quotation.

is repeated again and again, haunting one like the Nibelungen rhythm in Wagner's trilogy. The sustained notes mentioned above increase in intensity. In vain in loud and piercing tones the voices cry "In te Domine speravi," the violins give out the phrase associated with the prayer "Bless thy heritage," but the dreadful sounds are heard through everything. Soon the organ supports the bass instruments; the voices sing in unison and octave, and four drums (sans timbre) give the rhythm of the Judgment theme. An enharmonic modulation leads us from E flat minor to E minor; the time changes from 9-8 to 3-4. Most effective in one place is the wild burst of the voices with the "heritage" phrase to the words "non confundar"; and this same phrase is given out in soft tones by strings without double-basses after the singers have ended with a diminuendo "in æternam." Towards the close of the movement the key changes to B flat major. The music reminds us of the middle section in D flat; there is the perpetual striking of the tonic and the reiteration of the "Salvum" theme; but the voices are singing "Non confundar in æternam," and terrible sounds are heard from the orchestra. The day of judgment seems to have come. Berlioz now puts forth his whole strength: the shouting of the voices, the blare of the brass, including ophicleide and tuba, the piercing notes of the flutes and clarinets, the Judgment theme in diminished form furiously played by the violins—such are the sounds with which the piece hastens to a close. However, four bars before the end, the milder tones of the "heritage" theme are heard throwing, as it were, a gleam of light and hope over the dire scene: then come two bars fortissimo with the tonic chord, and all is over. In the full score a movement follows, entitled "Marche pour la présentation des Drapeaux"; but it has really nothing to do with the Te Deum. Although not a military occasion, the March was, however, played at St. Eustache. For its performance, in addition to a big orchestra, twelve harps are needed.

REMINISCENCE OF CATALANI.

ALTHOUGH a man may have reached the extremest limits of old age he has still one enjoyment left, the intellectual power of realising the scenes of his early youth, and even of enacting them over again, sometimes in their minutest details, a power which clings to his brain even when his physical faculties have all deserted him. This magic influence was roused within my own mind on reading, in the French papers of the 15th of September, the account of the marriage of Mdlle. Deslandes, the great-granddaughter of Madame Catalani! The announcement brought to memory my own last souvenir of the great singer, and the visit I paid her on her arrival in Paris in the year 1849, a few months before her death.

I found her in a little entresol of the Hotel de l'Amirauté, in the Rue Neuve St. Augustin, a small lodging of no pretension; indeed, after all the wealth and grandeur through which she had passed, no better than the one from which she may have started on commencing the glorious career which had led her through the palaces of royalty and the saloons of the highest nobility of every country in Europe. The last time I had beheld her was in London, at a Concert given at the Hanover Square Rooms, when she sang her magnificent "Rule Britannia," with as much power and energy as she had ever displayed in her best days at the opera. She had sung in the first part of the Concert her famous air of "Nel Cor pia non mi sento," and, subsequently, Mozart's duet "Ah perdona," with Mrs. Salmon; and in my mind's eye I beheld her as she then stood before me—on the platform of the Hanover Square Rooms—dark, towering, superb, beside the fair soft Englishwoman, pronounced even by her rivals as the purest, most accomplished, and refined singer of her day, overpowered, perhaps, but not outshone, by the tremendous majesty of Catalani. The exquisite English fairness of the one, brought out by the blue satin dress she wore, contrasted with the solemn robe of dark maroon velvet in which the Italian singer was attired, the flaxen ringlets worn by Mrs. Salmon, according to the fashion of the day, falling down each side of her face, with the tight bandeaux and braided coronet of jetty blackness surmounting the regal brow of Catalani. The small bunch of white roses which adorned the bosom of the pale blue satin dress of the one, with the blazing star, the gift of the Emperor of Russia, which shone forth with dazzling lustre upon the bodice of the other, completed the opposition.

With this image still fresh in my memory, I ran lightly up the uneven stair of the little entresol, and rang the bell with an impatient jerk, eager to behold the reality of my dream.

The small drawing-room into which I was ushered was dark and low, the one window opening on to the courtyard of the hotel and looking direct into the open windows of the apartment opposite. It was some time before I could distinguish the shrunken form of the great prima donna as she half rose to greet me from the depth of the arm-chair in which she was literally embedded. In a moment my dream of the past was put to flight by the reality of the present, and I stood staring in mute astonishment at the little bent figure before me. Madame Catalani was attired in a loose dressing-gown of warm woollen stuff, and on her head she wore a large cap, with broad frilled border, scarcely to be distinguished from a nightcap save by the band of dark red ribbon which encircled it, tied in a large flat bow in the middle of her forehead. She was sitting with her feet resting on a chaufferette, knitting exactly like any other old lady who might have passed her life in the fulfilment of the most humble domestic duties, instead of having been the favourite of kings, the courted and admired of emperors; and when I looked around at the faded furniture and threadbare carpet, the shabby curtains and cheap ornaments, I could not help remembering the lovely villa on the Quai de Billy, where the tables were all of Florentine mosaic, and the curtains throughout the whole suite of rooms composed of the shawls of Indian cashmere, many of them of great value, which the prima donna had received as presents from the royal and noble personages whom in the course of her wanderings she had delighted with her song. But Catalani, who had always maintained her presence of mind and self-possession, together with the simple habits of her early life, while flattered by the adulation of the great, had preserved the same philosophy amid the comparative mediocrity which now surrounded her. She recognised me at once, and laid down her knitting to take my hand in hers and press it warmly. Her eyes were still bright, and her cheek, although shrunk and hollow, was tinted with the fresh and wholesome colour imparted by a pure and quiet conscience, for never, through all the temptations which beset the artist amid the heat and corruption of theatrical life all over the world, did the faintest breath of calumny ever tarnish her fair name. Her voice, too, was still lively and penetrating, and her gestures betrayed no symptom of the tremulous hesitation of old age. All her ancient bonhomie and simplicity of manner seemed to return as she welcomed me, and she became at once as cordial and familiar in her manner as though but a few months instead of many, many years had elapsed since we had met. She was just as merry as in the olden time, and perhaps unconsciously our conversation drifted into the scenes of bygone days. It began with the foolish commonplace observation on my part, "I suppose you follow the opera; Rossini's 'Semiramide' is being played in perfection just now." "No, indeed, amico mio, simply because I hate music!" I was dumbfounded! If she had told me that she hated her children, her country, the air from which she drew her life, I could not have been more astonished. "Good heavens! and why?" I exclaimed, the sudden thought flashing across me that the comparison between the jadis et aujourd'hui which generally forms the basis of the artistic taste of all elderly people must have been the reason of the dislike. "Because I have had too much of it!" replied she, laughing heartily at my astonishment, "fifty years of unceasing harmony; fifty years' endeavour to please the especial public before whom I was called upon to sing; fifty years of humble invocation to the Virgin, not for a blessing on my dearly beloved children, nor for health or happiness for myself, but for a benediction on my crotchets and quavers. Dio mio! when I think of what a wicked sinner I have been, it makes me tremble lest my repentance should not be accounted sufficient expiation." And the dear old lady crossed herself devoutly as she said this although the words were accompanied by that sudden twinkle of the eye which I have so often noticed with Italians when giving utterance to a phrase of the kind. The incident brought to mind the night of the opening of the opera house in London when the prima donna with her husband, Valabrègue, and I, jingled all three together in an old yellow hackney coach, and we were all equally anxious, but each displaying our anxiety in our own peculiar manner. I myself was silent and taciturn, Valabrègue never ceased to gabble and fidget, pulling down the glass, pulling it up again, never quiet one moment, suggesting, worrying, questioning, taking snuff, sneezing, while Madame was leaning back with her knitting on her lap and her rosary between her fingers, her figure swaying to and fro as she recited the paters and avers in a murmuring tone so rapidly that every now and then she was forced to pause to take breath. The expression of the countenance at an interval of more than forty years was exactly the same. I could almost fancy that the knitting itself had not been changed, but that it was the same piece on which she was now engaged (a long shawl of unbleached wool with a diamond pattern in black and white), and I asked her jocosely if that were the shawl I had so often beheld her knitting in the foyer of the London opera house so many years ago. She laughed gaily and told me that she always had one of them on hand because she could "always find someone to give it to." The expression paints the warm heart of the woman.

The dear old lady was in a communicative mood. She loved to refer to her early days, and I led her on to tell me of Sinigaglia and of the convent where she was brought up. She always asserted that nature had fitted her for a religious life, and that she had preserved the same preference until now.

"Just imagine, amico mio, the disappointment I experienced when my father first announced to me that he had fixed my destiny and that I was not only to leave the convent but to leave him likewise, and my uncle and aunt and my cousins. . . . Aime! it was that unlucky week in Lent when the Maestro di Capello and the Princess of Perugia, who, being on a visit to her palazzo at Sinigaglia, came to the convent and happened to hear me sing the Miserere. Only a girl of fourteen was I then, full-grown of my age, to be sure, but knowing nothing whatever of music, only just beginning to learn with Sister Lucia, who they said had been a great singer in her time, but was then old and toothless. I was her favourite pupil in the class because I could understand what she meant to say, while the other girls would repeat the words of the motetts and canticles exactly as she sang them, making ill-natured fun of her efforts to pronounce them correctly.

"Well, on one certain Blessed Holy Friday, our dear convent of Santa Lucia di Gubbio was honoured by the presence of the Maestro di Capello of the Princess of Perugia, and when I sang the Ave verum, which had been allotted to me, everybody was obliged to make way for him as he came bustling up the aisle to get near the grating. The Superior was a noble lady, who had once moved in the great circles of Rome, and came forward to greet the Maestro, whose coat of sky blue silk embroidered in silver, and white satin waistcoat, all spangled in gold, with his red heeled shoes and diamond buckles, his white kersey-mere breeches and silk stockings, with his long ivory-handled rapier at his side, made a tremendous impression upon the novices, as you may suppose. They all pressed forward to catch a sight of his brilliant figure. The reverend lady was most gracious in her answers to the questions the Maestro addressed to her concerning me, and his high-flown compliments regarding my voice and style seemed to please her exceedingly. He bent low on one knee and kissed the hand she extended towards him through the grating; but when he rose and wanted to take mine also, I drew back, and folded both my hands beneath the loose sleeves of my novice's robe, and he laughed right merrily to see my angry gesture, and spread his fingers to the air, and flourished his hand above his head as he exclaimed: 'Brava! brava per Bacco, that rabbia is inimitable; the very thing. It will do, it will do!' which sent the novices into a simultaneous giggle. I thought him the most odious of God's creatures, and drew back shrinking from the grating in dread lest the smallest portion of my consecrated attire should touch the tinsel and frippery of his worldly dress. But he only laughed the more at my marked aversion, and wagged his head as he rubbed his chin, measuring me, as it were, from head to foot, and murmured loud enough for all to hear: 'A leetle more embonpoint—just a soupeçon more shoulders and bosom—the rest is all perfect.' I thought I should have fainted. The Superior was evidently displeased at my behaviour. She frowned, and bade me retire with the rest of the novices, who, on their part, scuttled away chattering and giggling, as is the wont of convent-bred young girls whenever any prospect of an event presents itself to vary the monotony of convent life. But while my companions all rushed pell-mell to the flower garden, only open to them on Sundays and Church Festivals, I fled to the chapel, and flung myself upon my face before the altar of Our Blessed Lady, and with tears and supplications implored her to come to my help, and guide me in the right way. When the nuns came pouring in for afternoon service they found me lying there, my dress all disordered, my face bathed in tears, and as they had already been made aware that I had been summoned to the parlour after the Office—for news travelled fast at Santa Lucia di Gubbio—they thought that the summons had been issued for a scolding, and soothed and comforted me with every exaggeration of sympathy. At afternoon service two of the older nuns took me between them on their bench in the chapel, and I lay there so snugly concealed by their long sleeves and thick woollen veils, hoping to escape the lynx eyes which, ever since the morning, had haunted me with their cunning leer; that, although sobbing convulsively all the while, I became gradually soothed by the sound of the organ into a calmer state of feeling. Just as the Stabat Mater was beginning, I saw the Maestro walk leisurely up the aisle and listen. His figure was even more resplendent than in the morning. He was attired in full evening dress, ready for the fish banquet at the Palazzo—coat of scarlet velvet, embroidered in gold; white satin breeches, all flourished and spangled; and waistcoat with diamond buttons, ruffles and jabot of point lace. His cane resounded on the mosaic pavement with measured strokes as he advanced, a little finesse on his part to draw attention to his person, and he looked around with evident delight at the effect he produced, as every head turned to gaze on him with admiration. The powder flew from his frizzled toupee, and the ribbon of his cadogan wagged to and fro, as he turned to look on this side and on that to see the ladies peeping at him through the transparent veils of muslin, which it was then the fashion to wear at Sinigaglia. He had evidently entered only to hear the music, for when the melody began he glided quickly forward towards the convent grating with one hand lifted to his ear, and his whole body bent forward to listen for the solo which was to follow the prelude. As the thin wiry tones of Isolina's voice instead of mine rang out with shrill piercing echo above his head, he stepped back as if with indignation, then, waving his forefinger backwards and forwards in the air, he shook his head with such an angry motion that the powder flew from his ailes de pigeon in such a cloud that the poor old women kneeling on the pavement beside him began to sneeze, and the boys of the Carita to laugh outright, while the large gold hoops at the Maestro's ears rattled against the stiff gold spangles of his coat collar, as, shrugging his shoulders, he turned abruptly round with a grimace of the utmost disdain, and shuffled out of the chapel in all haste. I could not help laughing, for I knew by this that Isolina's singing had disgusted him, and, notwithstanding my own uncomfortable dread at what was about to happen—for I felt that Isolina, who had always set herself up as the most accomplished singer of San Gubbio, had made a complete fiasco—I was comforted at the proof given by the Maestro that his opinion of her talent was much the same as my own.

"The awful moment came at last. No sooner was the Office ended than I was summoned to the presence of the Superior. I entered the parlour with a faint heart and trembling step, for as the door slowly opened and the thick heavy curtain was drawn aside I beheld the hated figure of the Maestro stretched almost at full length in the great arm chair, the Bishop's chair we used to call it, as it was seldom used save upon the occasion of the visits of his Eminence to the convent. The little withered face and wizened figure of the Maestro made a most disagreeable picture in that saintly frame, I thought, and jarred discordantly with all around. The moment I entered he rushed forward to seize me by both hands, and, perceiving the intention, I thrust them into my loose hanging sleeves. The dreadful old man laughed heartily while I blushed deeply, and the tears welled up into my eyes as he chuckled me under the chin and called me 'little prude.' The parlour of Santa Lucia di Gubbio is a place to be remembered, and I see it now as fresh in memory as on that eventful day. A large lofty room, panelled and corniced in dark oak, the ceiling painted by Bramante, representing the approach of the righteous to the seat of judgment, and the freshness of the colouring and the details of the procession, composed of the costumes of all countries, had often served to divert attention from the sermon or the scolding which any poor little delinquent novice might have been summoned thither to receive. Round three sides of the room was painted one continuous garden landscape. Between the oaken panels which were carved out in the most delicate open scroll work, imitating balconies from whence the garden was supposed to be viewed—the old Italian garden of Bramante's time, filled with sombre cypress groves and wide-spreading cedars—with fauns and satyrs in old grey stone, and the pine-covered hills showing against the deep blue sky beyond. Here and there a clairière through which the sunlight seemed to pour joyously, lighted up the gloom and gave air and space to the whole scene. On the other side the space was occupied by a high casement opening on to the real garden belonging to the convent, and here nature was contrasted in the light and shadow of the landscape. A complete wilderness of flowers bathing in the sunlight, vine-covered tunnels of trellis work, terrace upon terrace gently descending to the stream which ran at the foot of the hill—a branch of which had been turned from its onward course for the greater embellishment of the convent grounds. The Maestro jumped up from his reclining posture with all the agility of a monkey leaping from the cocoa tree, and, seizing me by both elbows, thrust his wizened visage so close to mine that the great hairy wart on his chin almost touched my cheek, making me draw back until I was forced against the harpsichord. And then he flung himself on to the music-chair, and spreading his handkerchief on his knees and placing his snuff-box on the sounding-board, asked the Superior if I could sing Marcello's hymn 'I cieli narrano.' The answer was conclusive, for without speaking she raised her eyes to heaven and clasped her hands in admiration.

"He did not even consult me, but struck the first chords of the hymn, and when he had finished the prelude, exclaimed 'Andiamo!' and in a low cracked voice sang the first few notes of the air. What a power is music, my friend! I had stood cold and trembling at the Maestro's side, almost resolved to remain silent; but no sooner had the suggestion of the divine melody reached my ear than I felt myself borne away by inspiration, and forgetting in a moment all my grievances against the Maestro, burst forth into the clear full notes of the invocation with as much true emphasis and self-possession as though I had been merely rehearsing before my companions in the music-room. Not a word did the Maestro utter during the performance. I only observed that his touch upon the keys of the instrument grew softer and more long drawn out as the strain proceeded, and I saw in the great bronze-framed mirror opposite that his lips were compressed and his eyes were closed, while the lemon-coloured complexion had paled to sickly white. For me, while my cheeks were burning and my eyes aflame, my hands were icy cold and my whole frame shivering; and when the strain was over I still stood motionless, overcome by a double emotion—angry with myself at having sung no better, and yet vexed that I had sung so well. But the Maestro had recovered himself very soon. He wheeled himself round upon the music chair and looked up into my face with an expression almost paternal, and then resuming his flippant tone, he exclaimed, 'What can be the melodies of angels in Heaven who for the most part can never have learned to sing, nor even have studied a single note of solfeggio, compared to the divine trills and ascending scales of this angel child?' And he kissed the tips of his snuff-stained fingers towards me with a familiar gesture at which my very soul revolted. To my great surprise, for I had ever looked upon the Abbess as something holy as the Saints in Paradise, the reverend lady, instead of resenting the irreverent pleasantry which made me shudder from head to foot and cross myself beneath the shadow of the music stand, merely laughed and tapped upon the harpsichord the large black fan which hung suspended from her waist by a thick silver chain. And when the lesson was over she drew from her pocket the large flat box of enamelled silver, full of those sweetmeats called pascaletti, for the making of which our convent had so great a reputation that his Holiness the Pope himself was pleased to receive a hundred boxes of them at every Easter-time. The Superior handed the box to the Maestro di Capello, who, with his snuffy fingers, fumbled about for two of the largest, then, asking me just to sound the 'fa' which had so enchanted him, popped one of them into my open mouth, and crunching the other himself, declared that no confetti were equal to those made at the Gubbio, and as I slowly sucked mine away also, I am ashamed to confess that I forgot the affront and all my other troubles at the moment and smiled with satisfaction as I agreed with his opinion." Although an interval of more than half-a-century had elapsed since the event, the narrator laughed heartily at the recollection of the Maestro's unseemly trick, and the sinful enjoyment to which she had given way.

"The Maestro then withdrew into the recess of the window with the Superior. The reverend lady had evidently forgotten that she had omitted to dismiss me from the apartment, for she spoke in her ordinary tone, not even condescending to lower her voice to a whisper, although the conversation was all concerning myself. I did not hear the question put by the Maestro, for his speech was somewhat obscured by the continued crunching of the pascaletti with which he had filled his left hand. Some allusion to the opera and Pergolesi and Paer and the Agnese I had caught, but nothing distinctly. The answer, however, was conclusive. 'There will be no difficulty,' said the Abbess, 'her father is the goldsmith and jeweller whose shop is under the open archway at the corner of the piazza. He is a good man and loves his children; but the family is numerous and he would be glad to see our Angelica well provided for. I will promise him the job of the silver sconces, voted by the Town Council to be placed in the side chapel at Saint Gregorio; to quiet his conscience, for I fear he will have some few scruples which we shall find it difficult to dispel, and nothing less than the promise of the silver sconces with his own name engraven on the sockets, as the silversmith employed to execute the Seraphim presented by the town, will make him look with favour upon our scheme.' 'Ah, by San Gregorio himself—there could be none so well fitted to manage a diplomatic transaction as the reverend lady of Santa Lucia di Gubbio.' The plan of the Seraphim was a masterpiece, and would be sure to succeed"; and then he kissed her hand as he had done mine, leaving upon its snowy surface traces of the snuff he had been inhaling and the pascaletti he had been crunching, which the Abbess, without the least symptom of disgust, wiped away with her cambric handkerchief, embroidered with the arms of the convent.

"Well, the diplomacy of the Abbess was successful, sure enough. The Seraphim holding the sconces were irresistible to my father's artistic soul, and the prospect of the celebrity throughout the whole country which such high patronage would bestow, irresistible likewise to his ambitious nature. And everything occurred according to the anticipation of the plotters against my peace. My father, hitherto the kindest and most indulgent of parents, was on this occasion obdurate, and resisted the prayers and tears of the child he loved so well. His excuse lay in his numerous family, the uncertainty of commerce at Sinigaglia, and the danger of displeasing the Princess; while I beheld a danger greater still by far in the step to which I was about to be compelled—that of displeasing the Holy Mother to whom I had vowed my prayers and devotion, and to whom I had sworn a solemn oath to dedicate my life. My secret determination had always been to take the vows at the end of my novitiate, and remain in the convent all the days of my life. All this was to be defeated by the unholy wish expressed by the Maestro di Capello. The whole world seemed to have turned against me, and in my despair I began to believe myself accursed, and that the Virgin Mary had refused my homage. No wonder that, with all this doubt and terror on my mind, I should have fallen into a state of gloomy despondency and completely lost all hope and courage. But, notwithstanding this, I was compelled to rehearse the music of the Agnese every day under the superintendence of the hated Maestro, whose gleeful irony at my religious scruples and arguments against what he called my selfish obstinacy in seeking to keep for myself alone the enjoyment of a gift destined to be shared by all, completely silenced all outward expression of my feelings.

"Well . . . the hated time approached, and I grew more and more nervous and impressed with the sinful act in which I was about to engage, until, as might have been expected, I was so utterly prostrated that the doctor declared that reason—nay, life itself—would be endangered were the strain upon my nerves to be maintained much longer. It was not the fact of appearing on the stage—of singing before the public, for already was the love of art astir within me, fostered, in spite of all resistance on my part, by the enthusiastic praises of the Maestro—it was the mortal sin of breaking my vow to the Virgin and the abandonment of the novice's holy uniform, which proclaimed my allegiance to her divine authority, my enrolment in her holy service which affected me and filled my soul with such terror that at last I was thrown upon a sick bed from which I hoped I never more might rise. I was carried to the infirmary, and placed in a small retired cell entirely alone, so that my brain might have no excitement and my imagination enjoy complete repose. . . . But a few days now were wanting to the date fixed for the production of the Agnese, and so great was my despair, that when, by the advice of the Maestro maledetto, the pretty peasant dress was spread out upon the counterpane, the jaunty little cap with its pink ribbons laid beside me on the pillow, I closed my eyelids firmly until the lay-sister who attended me had turned aside, and then I stretched forth my arms to the blue serge frock with hanging sleeves and the muslin veil thrown across it which hung at the foot of my bed, and never took my eyes

"It was one morning when I lay thus brooding over my sorrow, and resolved to die, that I was aroused by a scuffle which was taking place at the door of the little cell. I heard the voice of the Abbess and that of the Maestro in merry altercation, and presently the door flew open, and the laughing face of the reverend mother was beheld as she struggled to gain possession of a paper held by the Maestro, who, after one or two efforts to enter, which were frustrated by the opposition of the Abbess and the lay sister, with his usual readiness in overcoming difficulty, placed the packet upon the end of his cane, and, stretching out his arm, sent the paper fluttering on to my bed, laughing heartily at his success. The broad red seal appended to the official looking packet aroused me from my apathy. It stood out so bright against the snowy coverlet, that, in spite of myself, I was led to examine it. I knew it on the instant. It was the large red seal of the Vescovato, which I remembered well, from having seen it appended to every document and ordonnance emanating from the Bishop of Sinigaglia, to which on church fêtes the convent pupils were allowed to press their lips. The countenance of the Abbess beamed with delight. The Maestro stood at the door of the cell, forbidden to enter, but he tucked his hated yellow cane beneath his arm, and after blowing a kiss, with his ten fingers all outspread, towards me, he hummed the air with which the part of Agnese commences. He clapped his hands together with such tremendous energy, evidently meaning that such would be my reception at the opera, that the very walls of the cell seemed to shake with the reverberation. He then—odious man that he was!—bowed to the very ground, and making pantomimic signs of the throwing of flowers at my feet, and letting fly whole cages full of doves above my head, he left me at last; and I heard him all down the long corridor humming the air he had taught me, and knocking his cane against the hard tessellated flooring in token of applause.

"And the Abbess in her turn now approached my pallet to offer me her congratulations, less noisy, perhaps, but none the less repugnant to my feelings. She claimed my gratitude, forsooth! for having brought all this about. She took both my hands in hers and guided them to breaking the seal of the envelope, and while I trembled with such awe that the pallet shook beneath me, she read aloud the strange contents. It was a mandate, written in the Bishop's own hand, conferring upon me the privilege of appearing upon the boards of the opera house, at Sinigaglia, in the dress of the novice of Santa Lucia di Gubbio, and granting me full and plenary absolution for the apparent desecration of the habit, in consideration of the glory to be conferred upon the town by the magnificent subscription to be raised on the occasion of the visit of the Pope, whose progress through the province had aroused every city on the road to rivalry in the splendour of his reception. All this was childish and absurd you will say, but it did not appear so then, and the great burthen of the sin was taken off my soul, so that the whole thing appeared in a totally different light to what it had done before. My father came to soothe and reconcile me to my new position, and the Maestro flattered and courted me so that I soon grew strong and well enough to rehearse the opera on which he had set his mind. And so one day he came to fetch me in one of the carriages belonging to the Princess of Perugia, and carried me away, more dead than alive, wrapped in my convent cloak, to stand in front of, what appeared to me, a yawning abyss of sin, with the scarlet curtains of the boxes figuring to my mind the flaring fires of hell all round it. I gathered the dark cloth cloak tightly around me and looked neither to right nor left, while the Maestro played the recitative. Now comes the strangest portion of my story. Is it not a wonderful thing, cavo amico, and does it not display the perversity of human nature? Before that first rehearsal, which I had so much dreaded, was half concluded, the music had charmed me from my allegiance. I forgot my vow to the Virgin Mary and the holy dress I wore, the place where I stood and the people by whom I was surrounded, and threw my whole soul into the concerted pieces with as much energy and enthusiasm as I had always done in the motetts sung in the choir of the Gubbio; and by the time the rehearsals were completed and the real performance was ready for announcement, the Maestro's wicked prophecy had been accomplished. The novice's blue serge and white muslin veil had been all thrown aside and replaced by the neat little cap with pink ribbons, the short petticoat and lace apron of the well-to-do country peasant girl. The incessant praise and flattery, the voluptuous music, the pathetic strains to be sung with that wondrous basso who personated the father, and the soft love scenes with young Frazini, the tenor, had turned my head, and alas! my fate was sealed. Not in the peaceful convent-cell was I to pass my life, but on the boards of the public opera; not in the holy quiet and devotion for which by nature I was framed, but amid the glare and tinsel of the public stage.

"The Abbess consoled me by her undiminished affection and approval, and when the day arrived for the gala performance and the whole Roman Court of high-born Monsignori, with here and there a gorgeously attired Cardinal, filled the boxes of the house, and I found myself the star towards which all eyes were turned, I felt that, after all, this was my real vocation, and wondered how I ever could have doubted it. The Maestro was devoted. He looked upon me as an artistic marvel of his own creating, and the Abbess of Santa Lucia di Gubbio regarded me as the great illustration of the convent. To the day of the worthy lady's death I always sang on each Good Friday before the chapel grating, and you must have heard how the singing at San Gubbio of Sinigaglia never failed to bring all the great folks into the town and money into the convent chest. . . . And the Abbess rewarded me by many and many a box of pascaletti and—shall I own it?—the sweet confections have often soothed me, when far away in distant lands, into forgetfulness of my early vow and resignation under the moral trials to which my life—all brilliant and glorious as it has been—has subjected me."

G. C.

At the recent annual Choir services in St. Margaret's Church, Prestwich, a new organ was opened by Dr. Bridge, Organist of Westminster Abbey. In the morning the service was Garrett's in F, and the anthem "Sing praises unto the Lord" Gounod; in the evening Attwood's service in C was sung, the anthem was "I will give thanks" (Barnby), and the Lord Bishop of Manchester preached a sermon, selecting for his text 1 Corinthians xiv. 26, the concluding sentence: "Let all things be done unto edifying." Commencing by saying that the musical portion of the service at the church had latterly much improved, the preacher immediately proceeded to damp the ardour of those who had laboured in the cause by asserting that anthems were pleasing to a cultivated musical taste, a quality which he (the Bishop) did not possess, but that he did not believe there were fifty such compositions in the whole of the ecclesiastical répertoire which were suitable for ordinary congregations. How he arrived at this opinion considering that, confessedly, he knew nothing about the matter, we cannot say. Now we might here pause to consider how, on the occasion of the meeting convened at St. James's Palace to discuss the formation of the Royal College of Music, another ecclesiastical authority—the late Archbishop of Canterbury—in alluding to the power of music as an aid to devotion, said "We could not very safely borrow each other's sermons, for we might become very unorthodox; nay, it would hardly do to use our forms of worship, without any discrimination, alike in all our places of worship; but this much good we are able to do—to use the same hymns, and to join in the same tunes, and thus music is really harmonious in uniting us together in the highest acts of our religious worship." At the same meeting His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh affirmed that "there is hardly a village in the United Kingdom in which the religious services do not testify to the innate love of music to be found in the English people, and the excellence which might be attained by a better and more complete instruction," and Mr. Gladstone, in remarking upon this observation, said that "the music in the ordinary churches of the Church of England fifty years ago was a disgrace to the country and to the religion it professed," observing, as he advanced in his excellent speech, that the art "is now recognised as an essential part of the institutions of the country." Continuing, however, to force his individual sympathies and antipathies upon the congregation, the Bishop declared, in this remarkable sermon, that "he was very fond of hearing the Psalms chanted," but "sometimes," he said, "if the words of the anthem were not taken from the Psalms, if his thought happened to stray for a moment, he found it utterly impossible to recover his place, so that he might once more join in the singing." As the singer of any music who suffered his "thought to stray" would experience the same difficulty, we can scarcely accept this as an argument on the preacher's side. Having expressed himself very much in favour of the musical services of Messrs. Moody and Sankey—the literary merit of whose hymns, we presume, must have struck him, as he confessed his incapacity to judge of music—he proceeded to say that where the Organist or Choir-master was allowed to select the hymns and tunes, he sometimes found strange results. As he did not name any person whom he would appoint to this duty, we are left to guess at his wishes in this respect, but we presume that he would desire the selection to be made by the clergyman, an office which might fitly be assigned to him were no person admitted to holy orders who had not passed through a sufficient amount of musical training to enable him to distinguish good compositions from bad. We agree with the Bishop that in a church service there should be no "clap-trap attractions"; but when he tells us that not only the humblest and the poorest of listeners must be appealed to, but even the "idiot" who might be drawn into the church, we tremble lest he should wish us to adapt our music to the level of the intellect of this last named member of the congregation.

A LITTLE puff of an instrument called the "Rock Harmonicon," which appears in a provincial newspaper, contains some information respecting a popular piece by Handel which is worth repeating. The paragraph runs as follows: "The Rock Harmonicon, which is no toy, but a perfect instrument, has before been described in these columns. Thousands of my readers have heard the music that is brought out of it under the skilful manipulation of Messrs. Till. 'The Harmonious Blacksmith'—which is one of the sweetest and least noisiest of Handel's productions—is the melody that charms me most at these entertainments. A very beautiful air it is, and is more effective when played on the harmonicon than on the piano. Its celebrity, however, is owing in great part to the tranquillising effect it always produced on George the Third during the periodical attacks of his distressing malady. 'Send for my dear Handel,' was the request of the poor old King when he felt his hallucinations approaching. When he imagined himself to be an eight-day clock, or a pump, the soothing strains of 'The Harmonious Blacksmith,' under Handel's manipulation, generally brought him back to a correct view of the realities of things and a proper understanding of his own identity." Now it strikes us that the great merits of the "Rock Harmonicon" (of which we confess to know nothing) might have been plainly set forth without any criticism upon "The Harmonious Blacksmith," which, by the way, it is extremely generous of the writer to admit is the "least noisiest" of Handel's productions. A "beautiful air" it is, no doubt (although Handel had nothing to do with its composition), but considering that George the Third did not come to the throne until 1760, and that Handel died in the previous year, we can scarcely see how the monarch could have sent for his "dear Handel" when, in the latter part of his life, he felt his hallucinations approaching, that he might, by listening to the composer's manipulation of "The Harmonious Blacksmith," regain his tranquility of mind. It is evident that the writer of this paragraph, in his desire to say something of which he obviously knows nothing, has got slightly "mixed."

THE immense number of important new works which are performed in the Metropolis in consequence of their success out of it, must almost lead us to the conclusion that if we had no provincial Festivals we should have no new music. Looking through the records of several past years, we shall certainly find that at least all the now well-known compositions for choir and orchestra have been written for, and produced at, one of these great musical gatherings, and that London must wait to hear them until some energetic Metropolitan Musical Societies, emboldened by the effect these works have created elsewhere, resolve to include them in the programmes of their annual series of Concerts. Birmingham, Leeds, Bristol, and Norwich have set noble examples of encouragement to the great artists existing around us, and may indeed point with pride to the many works, now universally recognised as classics, which their enterprise alone has called into being. By those who have the direction of the many musical institutions of the Metropolis this should be a matter for serious consideration. Year after year conventional congratulations are offered upon the interesting character of a prospectus for the season simply because some composition, duly and safely stamped with public approval, is announced to be given; but grateful as all music-lovers must be for this admission of the fact that the storehouse of gems in the art is constantly being enriched by new specimens, it cannot but be coupled with regret that London merely ratifies a verdict which has already been pronounced upon their value. We have of course no desire to underrate the importance of presenting works of acknowledged excellence before a London public; yet we cannot but think that if a commission were given to one of the eminent creative artists of the day for an original composition to be produced by a Metropolitan Society, it would not only be of the utmost benefit to the institution itself, but would create a new interest in the choral executants by making them feel that they are working to a success of their own, instead of endeavouring to repeat one triumphantly made by others.

CONSIDERING that the opposition to the Three Choir Festivals emanated from Worcester, it is extremely gratifying to record the unanimity of feeling in favour of their continuance displayed at the final meeting of the stewards of this year's Festival, held at the Guildhall, on October 25. The report stated that the total sum received from collections, offertories, and donations, for the Clergy Widows' and Orphans' Charity, amounts to £1,112 3s. 9d. (£9 less than in 1881), the receipts for the sale of tickets to £4,904 19s. 6d., and the expenditure to £4,465 2s. 6d., leaving a balance in hand, after paying all expenses, of £439 17s. These pecuniary results are indeed extremely satisfactory; but still more so to our artistic readers will it be to find that the highest clerical authorities are most warm in their praise, not only of the object of the Festivals, but of the means by which that object has been so successfully carried out. The Dean, after proposing that thanks be given to the Bishop for acting as President of the Festival, said "It gave himself and the chapter great satisfaction to assist in the work of the recent Festival. He felt they could not put the Cathedral to a better use than for the holding of these great religious services—and he looked upon the Festival Services as nothing else—and they felt it a duty as well as a pleasure to endeavour to make the Festival a success." When we say that the resolution declaring "that the balance of £439 17s., now standing to the credit of the stewards, be placed on deposit, to be at the disposal of the Standing Committee, to be applied by them for the preservation of the property of the stewards of the Festival, and for the benefit of the charity of the Musical Festival of the Three Choirs," it will be evident to all that the preservation of these time-honoured meetings is now sufficiently assured to render any further allusion to the possibility of their discontinuance quite unnecessary.

THE letter from Mr. James Walter Brown, in our present number, draws attention to the small sums paid to choirmen in our Cathedrals in so sensible and temperate a manner that we have little doubt of its effect upon all who have the subject really at heart. When matters have run on for many years in a certain groove, we are too apt to imagine that all must be right, simply because nobody complains that they are wrong. In the present day, however, reform moves rapidly onward; and as murmurings upon the low rate of remuneration received by Cathedral singers are by no means likely to come from the singers themselves, we are glad to find that their cause has been championed by an "onlooker" who speaks earnestly and firmly, not only in sympathy with those employed in the church service, but in sympathy with the best interests of the service itself. For as our correspondent truly says, the musical portion of our Cathedral service is not only an important, but the most important feature of it, and when we find that one canon, for a comparatively light duty receives £700 a year and a permanent residence, whilst six choirmen, for attending two services every day, have only £430 divided amongst them, we begin to think whether such a preponderance of power exists on the clerical side to justify such an extraordinary disproportion in the payment for the duties exacted. Of course we know that music has gradually grown to its present high position in the Cathedral service; but what we complain of is that the sums given to its professors have not grown with it. Whether the plan proposed by Mr. Brown be adopted or not, there can be no question that something must shortly be done if we desire that a high state of efficiency in our Cathedral choirs shall be maintained; and we sincerely trust that the letter to which we refer, although, as its writer says, "insignificant as 'a grain of mustard seed,'" may be the germ from which something more effectual may spring.

ALTHOUGH we have from time to time given examples of "Curiosities of Musical Criticism," culled chiefly from the provincial journals, we unhesitatingly affirm that the one to which we are about to refer far transcends any hitherto placed before our readers. It appears that the recently published "Autobiography of Hector Berlioz" has been sent for review to a certain newspaper, and, we presume, placed in the hands of a critic who is supposed to know quite enough about music and musicians to notice any book relating to the art. A preface is of course a great assistance to those who find it safer to write round the subject of a work, than upon it; and the reviewer, therefore, gaining his information from this convenient source, tells us that Berlioz was driven to write his autobiography "by the fact that the accounts of his life are crowded with errors and inaccuracies"; that "a certain number of lovers of art have shown some curiosity on the subject, and this curiosity the great musician is prepared to gratify." The suspicion as to the writer's utter ignorance upon the composer's career excited by this sentence, is ripened into certainty by that which follows: "If Mr. Berlioz relies upon his artist friends as buyers and readers of his book, he is likely to have but a small circulation, and one cannot help thinking that, in spite of professed indifference, he really has his eye on the great public as much as anybody." We are inclined to think that the "great public" is a little more acquainted with the history of the deceased composer than he who—innocent even of the knowledge of his death—undertakes to write about him; and in kindness therefore—as he may have the lives of other great creative musicians to review—we beg to inform him that Mendelssohn, Chopin, Rossini, Cherubini, and many more whose names he perhaps may have heard of, have, unhappily for the art which they so enriched, passed from amongst us.

THE generous and unreserved appreciation extended by our German neighbours to genuine and original musical talent wherever it may assert itself, is finding a fresh illustration in the cordial reception with which Mr. Mackenzie's compositions appear to be met everywhere in the Fatherland. Thus at Darmstadt, where our gifted countryman's Opera "Colomba" was first produced some months since, the same composer's orchestral ballad "La belle dame sans merci" was recently included, as the novelty of the evening, in the programme of one of the excellent Concerts of the Grand-Ducal orchestra. What can be more appreciative than the following observations concerning that work, contained in the leading Darmstadt journal, the Neue Hessische Volksblätter: "The novelty of the evening, the Symphonic poem from the pen of the already highly-esteemed and gifted English composer, Mr. A. C. Mackenzie, is a tone-picture which must be ranked equal to the best contributions to orchestral literature in modern days. That which distinguishes Mackenzie most favourably from many others amongst his contemporaries in a similar field is the freshness and originality of his invention, the characteristic beauty of his motivi, and their bold yet thoroughly musicianlike elaboration. His instrumentation betrays the hand of a well-trained and highly cultured musician; it presents an interesting study in itself, and contains instrumental combinations of peculiar beauty and distinct originality."

"PARSIFAL" AT THE ALBERT HALL.

THE first performance in this country of the music of Wagner's "Parsifal"—his last, and as we may take it, considering the unimpaired vigour of his intellect at the time of its elaboration, also his most mature stage-work—is an event of sufficient importance in itself to call for a few prefatory remarks, in a journal specially devoted to the best interests of the art, concerning the artistic propriety of such an undertaking. When Richard Wagner, at the time of the first production, in 1882, of what proved to be in more than one melancholy sense his "Schwanen-Gesang," expressed a desire that "Parsifal" should henceforth be reserved exclusively for the Bayreuth theatre, even as the Bayreuth theatre had been set apart from all others for the better carrying out of his artistic aims; the master doubtless had excellent reasons for thus assigning an exceptional position to this the final effort of his genius. "Parsifal" is indeed a work apart, unlike any other existing music-drama, those of the poet-composer himself not excepted; one that will not lend itself, by any standard of artistic propriety, to be included in the répertoire of an ordinary operatic establishment. It is a drama with a distinctly religious tendency, a "sacred festival play," abounding with symbolical meaning and mystic allusions. It embodies moreover—as pointed out by us in our review of the book of "Parsifal" at the time of its publication—a psychological problem akin to that underlying Goethe's "Faust," inasmuch as, however widely different the individuality and aspirations of their respective heroes, the fundamental aim of both works is to depict the struggle of a superior mind (representative man, in fact) in his progress towards purification and eventual fitness for a higher sphere of existence. This process of refinement, however, is essentially an inner one, and if it is to be represented at all in drama, craves for the aid of that most profoundly suggestive of all arts, music. Goethe very wisely, or perhaps of necessity, does not attempt to lay bare the psychic influences which have transformed his hero into the already purified being we find him at the opening of the second part of "Faust." The great German poet, moreover, only partially solves the problem involved in his "world-drama" by having recourse to the religious mysticism pervading the closing scenes of his work. And here, again, the added music of Robert Schumann, more especially to these closing scenes, has rendered most valuable assistance to the elucidation of the poet's intentions. The author of "Parsifal," on the other hand, combining in himself the qualities of poet and musician, has most appropriately transferred the delineation of the psychological changes in the character of his hero, "the pure-minded youth, by sympathy enlightened" (as well as much of the individualisation of the other personages in his drama) into the orchestra, while the final solution of his drama was already provided for by the atmosphere of christianity which pervades the legend upon which it is founded. So far, then, the music of "Parsifal," or at any rate the greater part thereof, should speak for itself even apart from the dramatic action intended to accompany it, and of other stage accessories. Music, moreover, of so subtle and complex a description as that of the later scores of Wagner requires in itself a minute and separate study before the drama whereto it is wedded can be fully appreciated. Nevertheless it will not for a moment be questioned that even a "sacred" music drama, and above all one having Wagner for its author, cannot be converted into an oratorio without grievous injustice to the work itself unless the fact be constantly present to the mind of the listener. In the music of "Parsifal," one brief interval excepted, the "local colouring" is a sombre one from beginning to end; a sustained effort only genius of a high order could be capable of

But while this gloom visits the ear musically, the eye absolutely requires the relief of the action on the stage and of its scenic surroundings in order to raise the imaginative faculties of the spectator into the sphere of solemnity and mystic awe intended by the poet-composer, and successfully realised at the Bayreuth performances. As far, then, as a just appreciation of Wagner's maturest stage-work is concerned, the audience which fairly filled the Albert Hall on the occasion of the first performance in England of "Parsifal" as an Oratorio, were very nearly approaching the position of a blind listener, with perception "at one entrance quite shut out." Keeping this fact in mind, and regarding the performance in question as having afforded an excellent opportunity for musical amateurs to become acquainted with the intricate musical details of a drama the full significance of which can only be measured by careful study and repeated hearing, no reasonable objection can be urged against it from an artistic point of view. The works of the world's great masters belong to the world, and "Parsifal" cannot claim an exceptional position, in this sense, for itself. If, in deference to the master's wishes, its stage performance is to be confined for the present to the little Bavarian town whence it emanated, the reservation will, to our thinking, prove advantageous to the ultimate appreciation of the full significance of the work itself, and the reasonableness of Wagner's restrictions will in that case be fully vindicated. Meanwhile the great majority of the general musical public, being unable to join the annual pilgrimage to the "Mecca of Music," as Bayreuth has been called, will eagerly seize upon every opportunity to become acquainted with at least the music appertaining to the last production of the most remarkable art-reformatory genius of modern days; or with as much of it as may be vouchsafed to them in the Concert-room.

That the latter assertion is in no way exaggerated has been abundantly proved by the vast assembly which attended the two performances of "Parsifal," as an Oratorio, given by the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society on the evening of the 10th and the afternoon of the 15th ult. At the sight of an audience so numerous, and we may add so enthusiastic, even those least in sympathy with the undertaking must have felt that the Conductor of the Society was only reaping his just reward for the untiring zeal and energy by which alone this performance had become possible. Mr. Barnby, after having made a careful study of the work in its stage performances at the Bayreuth Theatre, and thus imbibed, as it were, the spirit of its composer, has since been most indefatigable in his efforts to render the first performance of the "Parsifal" music in England a worthy one. In this he has been entirely successful, and he has the satisfaction of knowing that his name will henceforth be linked with one of the most remarkable events in the musical life of the metropolis. The repeated and detailed allusions made in these columns to the subject of the drama in question will, without any reiteration on our part, doubtless render the reference to the leading agents therein perfectly intelligible to our readers. Some considerable curtailments had necessarily been made in the score, partly in order to satisfy the stipulations made by the heirs of the composer (alluded to in our Foreign Notes some time back) and partly for the purpose of reducing it to the average limit of a Concert performance. Among those portions of the work which, as a matter of course, were here produced in their entirety, must be instanced the final scene of the first act, with its solemn celebration of the ritual of the Holy Grail by the assembled knight guardians, and the similarly grand and impressive closing scenes of the entire work. In both these junctures of the drama the choral music forms an all-important feature, and, thanks to the admirable training bestowed upon it by the Conductor, the choristers proved themselves fully equal to their arduous task, the sonority of the male being admirably blended with the suavity of the female (boys in the original score) voices, the two combined producing an almost overpowering effect, more especially in the scene of the Feast of the Holy Grail of the first act. The rendering of these portions of the entire work was in itself an achievement of which any Conductor might well be proud. The bright and graceful choral writing assigned to the Flower Maidens in Klingsor's enchanted garden was less satisfactorily realised, though it had gained somewhat in airiness and abandon at the second performance. The difficulties of this number—consisting of a double chorus and six solo voices, each, as it were, independent of the other—are, however, very great, as was demonstrated by the innumerable rehearsals required previous to its perfect realisation at the Bayreuth performances. The intricate and elaborate details of orchestration, which form so important an item in the later scores of Wagner, received an interpretation which, taking the two performances together, it would be difficult to match anywhere outside of Bayreuth. Here, again, Mr. Barnby has shown how thoroughly he has identified himself with the traditional spirit associated with the Bayreuth performances, and how well he knew how to communicate this spirit to the instrumentalists under his command. It remains to say a few words of unqualified praise respecting the able manner in which the German artists engaged for these performances—viz., Fräulein Malten (Kundry), Herren Gudehus (Parsifal), Scaria (Gurnemanz), and Schuegraf (Amfortas)—acquitted themselves of their trying and somewhat thankless share in the proceedings. Separated from the dramatic action, which alone can impart due force and meaning to it, the dialogue in "Parsifal" not unfrequently produces an effect of laboured tediousness even upon the reverently disposed listener, certain notable instances, of course, excepted; such as the great scene between the hero of the drama and Kundry towards the close of the second act. In the latter, Fräulein Malten fully rose to the height of a dramatic situation presenting peculiar difficulties to the interpreter; her performance throughout the work having been marked by a rare dramatic fire and declamatory power. Those who heard this gifted artist here for the first time must have been greatly struck by her magnificent and perfectly trained soprano voice, which commanded the vast building in its every part without ever appearing at all unduly strained. Frequent and enthusiastic applause were the just reward of her altogether exceptionally fine realisation of the weird and mysterious character of the Gralsbotin. Equally meritorious was the rendering on the part of Herren Gudehus and Scaria of their respective important parts, the two artists as well as their lady companion having, it is scarcely necessary to remind our readers, been associated with the German stage-representations of the work. Herr Schuegraf who, on the other hand, could not boast of a similar advantage, appeared to be somewhat under the influence of nervousness, but his delivery of the music assigned to the stricken guardian King of the Grail, was nevertheless impressive, being marked throughout by artistic feeling and earnestness. Upon the close of the second performance, Mr. Barnby was the recipient of a perfect ovation on the part of an audience, whose reverent attitude on both occasions was not the least remarkable feature thereof, and whose tribute of gratitude to the successful organiser of a worthy interpretation of the music of Wagner's last music-drama derived additional zest from the fact that the opportunity of hearing the work in England will probably not recur for some considerable time to come. According to an arrangement lately made, the composer's widow has re-acquired the right of performance of the music of "Parsifal" from the publishers, Messrs. Schott and Co., and that work will henceforth again be entirely appropriated for the Bayreuth theatre. This decision, which in the best interests of the drama itself we are unable to deplore, has been delayed just long enough to afford an opportunity for English admirers of the poet-composer to become acquainted with at least the greater part of its musical details; whilst those amongst them, whose circumstances may permit it, will doubtless undertake the journey to Bayreuth the better prepared to appreciate, in its entirety, a work which will require the maturing influence of the lapse of a generation or two before its full artistic significance can be rightly gauged.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

THE Saturday Concert of the 1st ult. opened with a very fine performance of Berlioz's Overture "Le Corsaire." This interesting and effective work had not been heard at the Crystal Palace for nearly twenty-two years. It was followed by Chopin's Concerto in E minor, brilliantly played by Mdlle. Clotilde Kleeberg, of whose performance of Beethoven's Concerto in E flat we spoke last month. The only actual novelty of the concert was an orchestral interlude, entitled "Salve Polonia," from Liszt's new oratorio "Stanislaus." The whole work is not yet published, and we are, therefore, unable to say in what connection the interlude is introduced. From its title, and from the fact that the principal subjects on which it is constructed are Polish national airs, the piece has apparently a patriotic character. The form which Liszt has adopted is that which is familiar to us in his Rhapsodies; that is to say, it consists of a number of very free variations or metamorphoses of the principal themes, with subsidiary connecting matter, often of a very vague character. The musical value of the "Salve Polonia" is not great; it relies chiefly for its effect on brilliant and frequently noisy orchestration. It was admirably played by Mr. Manns's orchestra, but its reception was not very enthusiastic. Beethoven's Symphony in C minor completed the orchestral portion of this concert. The vocalist was Madame Minnie Hauk, who made her first appearance at Sydenham, choosing for her solos "Elsa's Dream" from "Lohengrin," the "Styrienne" from "Mignon," and the "Habanera" from "Carmen."

Herr Barth's splendid playing of Brahms's second concerto for piano (Op. 83, in B flat) was the most noteworthy feature of the concert on the 8th. Since the first production of this important work at the Crystal Palace, rather more than two years ago, it has been occasionally heard in London, and amateurs are in a better position to estimate its merits and defects. The latter lie on the surface and may be summarised as over-development and diffuseness, especially in the first and third movements, and an occasional want of melodic charm. But against these are to be placed the breadth of conception of the first allegro, the musicianly treatment of the subjects throughout, the contrapuntal skill displayed, and the beauty and grace of the finale, one of Brahms's happiest conceptions. On the whole, it may be fairly said that the excellencies of the work outweigh its faults, and, while surpassed by some few of its author's other compositions, it will rank as among his noteworthy efforts. The pianoforte part is enormously difficult, needlessly so, we cannot but think, in proportion to the effect produced; but it was played by Herr Barth with such mastery, both as regards execution and conception, as distinctly to enhance his position as a player of the first rank. Two small orchestral pieces, both by French composers—a minuet from Massenet's opera, "Manon," and a "Sérénade Hongroise," by Janczières—were given for the first time at this concert. The former is very quaint and graceful, and the latter lively and brilliant; but neither is of sufficient importance to require detailed notice. Of music so well known as Bennett's overture to "The Naiads" and Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, the mere record of an excellent performance will suffice. Madame Trebelli was the vocalist at this concert.

The fifth concert of the series, on the 15th ult., commenced with Gluck's overture to "Iphigénie en Aulide," with Wagner's close. It will be remembered by those who know the opera that the overture leads without a break immediately into the first scene. A close for concert purposes was written by Mozart and was formerly invariably used. Wagner, feeling that this ending destroyed the poetic unity of the work, wrote another, in which he returns to the opening theme, as Gluck himself does in the first scene of the opera. That the change is for the better will hardly admit of dispute, and we believe that Wagner's coda is all but universally adopted now when the overture is performed. The symphony at this Concert was the "Eroica." M. Lasserre, one of our most eminent violoncellists, made his first appearance at the Crystal Palace with an interesting and melodious concerto by Eckert, formerly conductor of the Grand Opera at Berlin, and a pupil and friend of Mendelssohn. M. Lasserre subsequently played two solos—a Nocturne by Chopin and a piece of his own composition entitled "Fileuse." Miss Griswold contributed the vocal music, and the concert concluded with a brilliant performance of the overture to "Guillaume Tell."

The concert of the 22nd was devoted to Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's oratorio "The Rose of Sharon." The work itself has been fully discussed in this paper last month, on the occasion of its first production. A further notice appears in another column of the present issue; a few remarks upon the performance are therefore all that will be required now. The soloists were mostly the same as at the recent performance by the Sacred Harmonic Society; the most important change being the substitution of Mrs. Hutchinson for Miss Emma Nevada in the soprano part. The music of the Sulamite was very effectively rendered; while Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Santley completed a cast which left nothing to desire. The orchestra, from want of familiarity with the music, made more slips than are usual at a Saturday concert; and the chorus, which was that of the Sacred Harmonic Society, though showing an improvement on their previous performance of the work in St. James's Hall, left much to desire in precision of attack. As showing the interest which the oratorio has excited, it is worth mentioning that the Norwich Festival Choir offered to come to town expressly to take part in the performance. Unfortunately, this offer could not be accepted, as there was not sufficient room on the orchestra. The work was considerably cut, to bring it within the necessary length for a Saturday concert, and it gained thereby in effect. It attracted one of the largest audiences that have ever been seen at Sydenham, and excited as much enthusiasm as on previous occasions, Mr. Mackenzie, who conducted the performance, receiving a genuine ovation at the close. There can be no doubt that "The Rose of Sharon" has established its position as the finest oratorio produced during the present generation.

MONDAY AND SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

TAKING into consideration the absorbing interest of certain other musical performances during the past month, no blame can accrue to Mr. Arthur Chappell for not bringing forward any novelties of importance at his Concerts, for the same might have failed to receive due attention. His programmes having in the main consisted of familiar works, our remarks upon them need not extend to great length. What, for instance, could be said about the first of the Saturday Concerts, on the 1st ult., when the scheme consisted of Mozart's Quintet in E flat, Beethoven's Trio in E flat, Op. 70, No. 2; Locatelli's Violoncello Sonata in D, and Bach's Italian Concerto? To use a favourite formula in the analytical notes, these works "speak for themselves." It may be mentioned, however, that Mr. Santley sang Gounod's "Le Juif errant" and Raff's "Near thee," two selections not worn threadbare by frequent repetition. The sound classical style of Herr Barth was well suited to the Bach Concerto. The programme of the following Monday may be dismissed with equal brevity, the principal items being Mozart's Quartet in E flat, No. 4 of the Haydn set; Beethoven's Sonata in D, Op. 10, No. 3; Corelli's Violin Sonata in D, and Spohr's Piano Trio in E minor, Op. 119. Herr Barth was again the pianist, and Miss Carlotta Elliot the vocalist. There was a great crowd on Saturday, the 8th, the principal attraction for the public being Beethoven's Septet, which was performed by Messrs. Straus, Hollander, Lazarus, Mann, Wotton, Reynolds, and Piatti. A very welcome addition to the number of acceptable pianists at these Concerts was made in Mdlle. Clotilde Kleeberg. The audience quickly recognised the merit of her playing, both in Beethoven's Trio in B flat, Op. 11, for piano, clarinet, and violoncello, and in her solo pieces, Chopin's Etude in C minor, Op. 10, and the Ballade in A flat. Not only does Mdlle. Kleeberg play with remarkable clearness and accuracy, but she possesses a charming and sympathetic touch and sufficient physical power for the interpretation of the greatest works written for the instrument. Some violin pieces by Veracini, played by Herr Straus, and songs by Mr. Santley completed the programme. Again, on Monday the 10th, there was little or nothing on which to comment. Spohr's Quartet in E minor, Op. 45, which opened the Concert, displays the best qualities of Madame Néruda as a leader, as do all works by this composer. Mdlle. Kleeberg made her first appearance before a Monday audience, her solos being Bach's Prelude and Fugue in F sharp, and an Allemande, Courante, and Gigue in G minor, by Handel. Madame Néruda played an Adagio by Nardini, and Paganini's brilliant Moto perpetuo, and the programme ended with Beethoven's Piano and Violoncello Sonata in F, Op. 5, No. 1. Mr. Thorndike was the vocalist.

Rather more interest attached to the programmes of the 15th and 17th. On the first-named occasion Mozart's Duet in G, for violin and viola, was performed for the first time. This is one of two works composed during the master's visit to Salzburg, in 1783. They are living witnesses to Mozart's amiability of character, as the following extract from Otto Jahn sufficiently proves:—"Michael Haydn had been ordered by the archbishop to compose some duets for violin and tenor, perhaps for his special use, but, owing to a violent illness, he was unable to finish them at the time appointed; the archbishop thereupon threatened to deprive him of his salary. When Mozart heard of the difficulty he at once undertook the work, and, visiting Haydn daily, wrote by his bedside to such good purpose that the duets were soon completed and handed over to the archbishop in Haydn's name." The duet in G consists of three movements, not remarkable in any way, though, as Jahn observes, "a multitude of delicate touches betray the master's hand." Schumann's very characteristic Sonata in F sharp minor, Op. 11, was played by Mr. Charles Hallé, and Beethoven's Quartet in F, Op. 18, No. 1, and his Sonata in A, for piano and violin, Op. 12, No. 2, completed the instrumental programme. Miss Alice Barbi contributed the vocal music. Another work of Mozart was performed for the first time on the following Monday, namely, the Trio in B flat, No. 5, the middle movement of which pleased greatly. A magnificent performance of Beethoven's Quartet in F, Op. 59, No. 1, was given under the leadership of Madame Néruda. Miss Zimmermann might have easily made a more interesting pianoforte selection than Liszt's arrangements of Bach's organ Fantasia and Fugue in G minor. Granting the cleverness of this and similar transcriptions by the same hand, they are not legitimate pianoforte music. A very pleasing feature of the programme was the duet singing of Miss Louise Phillips and Madame Isabel Fassett; Schumann's three duets, Op. 43, and a fanciful trifle entitled "Morgenroth," by Tchaikowsky, could scarcely have been rendered with more charm. Two masterpieces of the first order were performed on Saturday, the 22nd, namely, Mendelssohn's Quintet in B flat, Op. 87, and Schumann's Piano Quartet in E flat, Op. 47. The former headed the programme of the first Monday Popular Concert in 1859, and the latter was not heard until six years later, owing to the silly prejudice against Schumann's music which has now happily passed away. Mdlle. Kleberg rendered Schubert's somewhat hackneyed Impromptu in B flat, and Signor Piatti displayed his unrivalled tone in a Largo of Boccherini and his own Siciliana in A minor. Mr. Maas contributed airs by Handel and Mozart.

It is quite possible that the programme of last Monday was intended as an experiment. Haydn was represented by his Quartet in G, Op. 17, No. 5, and his Trio in E flat, No. 5; Mozart, by an Adagio in E, for violin; and Mendelssohn by his Pianoforte Fantasia in F sharp minor, Op. 28. The public showed their appreciation of this selection by severely staying away, and Mr. Arthur Chappell is not likely to offer many more schemes of a similarly unexciting nature. The pianist was a new comer, Mdlle. Marie Fromm, of whose antecedents nothing appeared to be known. She played neatly and correctly, without evincing any remarkable ability. Madame Néruda rendered the Mozart excerpt exquisitely, but the piece suffered by the substitution of the pianoforte for the original orchestral accompaniment. Mention should be made of an extremely well written and effective song, "To the Queen of my heart," by Ernest Ford, sung by Mr. J. Robertson, a vocalist with a light but pleasing tenor voice.

RICHTER CONCERTS.

THE orchestral Concerts associated with the name and the transcendent abilities of Herr Hans Richter are apparently becoming more popular every year. Nor is the reason for this very far to seek. The eminent Viennese

Conductor, who gained a European reputation by his masterly direction of the famous "orchestra of virtuosi" assembled at the now historical first performance of the "Nibelungen" Tetralogy at Bayreuth, has ever since been looked upon as the interpreter par excellence of the music of Richard Wagner. Hence the admirers of all shades and degrees in this country of the late reformer's works expect, as a matter of course, that the Concerts bearing Herr Richter's name shall afford the otherwise rare opportunity of hearing excerpts from the scores of the departed master. And that the number of Wagner admirers is a large and increasing one was again sufficiently demonstrated by the crowded aspect presented by St. James's Hall on the three occasions to which we shall presently refer more in detail. It is clear that what may be called the "popularity" of the poet-composer in this country has been steadily gaining both in breadth and in depth since the master has disappeared from the field of an art controversy whereof he was the centre; and at this phenomenon in English musical life Herr Richter must be the first to rejoice. On the other hand, it must be a source of no little embarrassment to him, at times, to know how to frame the programmes of his annually recurring series of Concerts so as to satisfy the cravings of the great majority of his supporters for Wagnerian strains. The genial Conductor's position, in this respect, may not inaptly be compared to the dilemma brought down upon himself by Goethe's "Zauberlehrling":—

Werd' ich nun nicht los!

The spirits that he cited he cannot now control. The extracts from Wagner's scores which properly lend themselves for Concert performance may almost be counted on the fingers; hence, their continual recurrence in the programmes of these Concerts. Yet there is an abundant store of orchestral works, equally interesting and instructive to the art-student, at his disposal which might with advantage be varied with the masterpieces of Beethoven and Wagner by the splendid forces under his command. Perhaps Herr Richter will see his way out of his peculiar difficulty by adding an historical element to his admirable Concerts in the future. He has already given us in succession the nine symphonies of Beethoven. Why not follow this up by an historical survey of the development of the Symphony, as such, or of the Overture, leading up to Wagner's orchestral "Preludes," &c. The sphere of truly artistic influence in this direction is practically unlimited, and such a scheme would, we are persuaded, likewise meet with the approval of the specific Wagner admirers who form, at present, the chief supporters of the Richter Concerts, since it does not by any means exclude that element of modern progress in the art so ably advocated by their Conductor.

The present short autumnal series comprised three Concerts only, given at St. James's Hall, on October 28 and the 4th and 11th ult. respectively. There was, as already indicated, an exceptionally large attendance on each occasion; Herr Richter, upon making his first appearance on the platform, being greeted by a perfect storm of applause, indicative of the high esteem in which his excellent qualities, both as a musician and private personality, are held in this country. The first part of the opening Concert of the series consisted entirely of works by Wagner, including the Overture to "Tannhäuser," a combination of orchestral portions from "Der Ring des Nibelungen," the prelude to the third act of "Die Meistersinger," and the "Trauer-Marsch," from "Götterdämmerung." Of these, only the second in enumeration was a quasi-novelty, being a combination of scenes from the two last dramas of the Tetralogy, "Siegfried" and "Götterdämmerung," illustrative of Siegfried's meeting with Brünnhilde, after successfully penetrating through the circle of fire surrounding her rocky abode, and his subsequent leave-taking of the Valkyrie in search of fresh adventures. This orchestral arrangement, which has its precedents in similar extracts made by Wagner himself for the purpose of production in the Concert-room, had been skilfully made by Herr Richter according to indications communicated to him by the late composer. It was received with much applause. Schubert's Ninth Symphony, in C (or, according to Sir George Grove's surmises, his tenth), formed a glorious conclusion to a highly satisfactory evening. At the second Concert the name of Wagner was again conspicuous with the bright and richly-coloured Overture to "Die Meistersinger," the sombre complexed yet feverishly agitated introduction and closing scene to "Tristan und Isolde," and the boisterous and marvellously characteristic "Ritt der Walküren," from the second part of the Tetralogy. Liszt's "Hungarian Rhapsody," No. 4, produced a somewhat tame effect in these surroundings, but its vivacious character and varied rhythms pleased the audience, who applauded its performance to the echo. This fourth "Hungarian Rhapsody," as the excellent analytical programme tells us, is an orchestral paraphrase of Liszt's Rhapsody, No. 2 (in C sharp and F sharp), originally written for pianoforte solo, and was performed here for the first time. A highly satisfactory interpretation of Brahms's third Symphony (in F) concluded the second Concert. The final evening of the season opened with a very spirited and conscientious performance of the Overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," the most remarkable, perhaps, in the great trios of Weber's overtures, from which a new departure in the development of the operatic prelude is to be dated. There was much applause, and a demand for a repetition, which the Conductor very judiciously declined. The remainder of the first part was most agreeably filled by Mr. Edward Lloyd's excellent rendering of the "Probelieder," from "Die Meistersinger," and the familiar excerpt from "Der Ring des Nibelungen," called "Wotan's Abschied und Feuerzauber," in which Mr. F. King declaimed, though not very intelligibly, the music in which the irate parent, Wotan, consigns the brave Valkyrie to her scarcely merited doom. The third and last Concert of the present short series concluded with the customary and appropriate performance of Beethoven's sublime masterpiece, the Ninth Symphony, the purely orchestral movements of which were rendered to absolute perfection by the splendid body of instrumentalists inspired by that most sensitive and communicative of all bâtons wielded by Herr Richter. The choral portions of the finale, however, suffered grievously from indistinctness of phrasing, which, we are quite aware, is almost impossible to attain in a work presenting such difficulties to vocalists, but which, nevertheless, should not be passed by unheeded in a performance aspiring to, and, in other respects, fully realising, a high standard of excellence. The solo vocalists on this occasion were Miss Amy Sherwin, Madame Isabel Fassett, Messrs. E. Lloyd and Frederic King. At the conclusion of the Concert, Herr Richter was the recipient of sufficiently demonstrative tokens of the appreciation in which the services he is rendering to true art are held in this country, to assure him of a most hearty welcome when next he assumes his accustomed post in front of his splendid orchestra at St. James's Hall.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

THE inaugural Concert of the season, on the 7th ult., was one of the highest interest, not only to the lovers of sacred art, but to the well-wishers of the Society; for by presenting the London public, for the first time, with Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's exceptionally successful Oratorio, "The Rose of Sharon," the keen desire to hear a work which created so profound an impression at Norwich was gratified, and honour was done to a composer who has achieved a world-wide fame, by an Institution of all others most appropriately fitted for the undertaking. After the exhaustive review of the Oratorio which appeared in the last number of THE MUSICAL TIMES, our readers will scarcely here expect anything like an analysis of the work; but the impression produced by listening to a composition of such magnitude dissociated from Festival surroundings deserves a record, as evidencing that in a first notice great effects have not been unduly eulogised, or small defects charitably passed over. Let us, then, at once say that, in spite of the many shortcomings in its rendering, to which we will afterwards allude, our opinion upon the work is in every respect materially strengthened by a second hearing, not only on its merits as a pure artistic creation, but as a successful model of a sacred composition which aims at engraving some of the new modes of thought upon those which have been sanctioned by ages. For it must be remembered that, as a Dramatic Oratorio is not a Drama, instead of creating a desire to hear it with the accessories of dress and action, the work should so vividly present the scenes by the aid of music which shall intensify the text, as to ideally realise the several phases of the narrative to the hearers. This merit we claim for "The Rose of Sharon." The approach of Solomon's cavalcade, with its effect upon the villagers, the striking group of choruses in connection with the procession of the Ark, the chorus of the maidens of Jerusalem, with "timbrels and dances," the bold soldiers' chorus, and the tender and loving music of the last Part, in the vineyards of Sulam, for example, are in themselves powerful mental pictures, and we contend would be vulgarised by a visible embodiment of the scenes and events which they depict. That the efforts of the composer have been materially aided by the excellent libretto from the sympathetic hand of Mr. Joseph Bennett cannot be doubted; but it is not every artist who has the "courage of his convictions" sufficiently to work unflinchingly on his theory, even when the materials are provided for him; and we congratulate Mr. Mackenzie, therefore, upon his unqualified success in a work which follows only the traditions of the past when they can be made to strengthen the framework of the future. It would be repeating our former criticism upon the Oratorio were we to dwell upon the unconventional nature, as well as the abstract beauty, of Mr. Mackenzie's music; but we may say that the masterly manner in which he has used the leitmotiv throughout the work, the exquisite variety of colouring in the instrumentation, the bold contrapuntal effects in the part-writing, where such effects are needed to emphasise the text, and the poetical feeling—more powerful than words—of the two purely orchestral movements, "Spring morning on Lebanon," and "Sleep," appealed to us with additional eloquence by increased familiarity, and produced a marked impression upon the vast audience assembled. The principal singers were Miss Nevada, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. H. E. Thorndike, and Mr. Santley, with one exception the same as those engaged in the rendering of the work on its production at Norwich. Unfortunately Miss Nevada was suffering from indisposition, and although she exerted herself to the utmost, could scarcely do full justice to the music assigned to her; but Miss Hilda Wilson was excellent throughout, and created such an effect in her solo, "Lo! the King," as to elicit a spontaneous burst of applause as warm as it was well deserved. The serious defects in the performance, to which we have already referred, rested with the choir, the members of which although obviously interested in their work, were compelled to disregard delicacy, vigour, and decision of attack, in the endeavour to secure accuracy. That this latter important quality was not always attained was certainly no fault of the singers, for it soon became evident that sufficient rehearsal had not been possible; and one catastrophe (only averted by the readiness of the composer, who conducted) was by no means the only instance of an unsteadiness which occasionally imperilled the success of the work. Mr. Mackenzie has shown much judgment by omitting the contralto and bass airs at the commencement of the fourth part, and also the Epilogue. It becomes a question, however, whether the part of the Elder could not also be spared, his music being certainly not essential to the effect of the scene in which he is engaged. That the interest of the hearers gradually increased as the work progressed and the varied dramatic events unfolded themselves, was sufficiently obvious, not only by the frequent bursts of well-timed applause, but by the earnest manner in which every note was followed in the book by the majority of the audience. It need scarcely be said that the intelligent conductorship of the composer made itself felt both by executants and listeners; and that the unanimous call for Mr. Mackenzie at the end of the second part, and the overwhelming plaudits showered on him at the close of the performance, by the orchestra and audience, was alike a genuine expression of this feeling and a decisive proof that they had assisted at one of the greatest successes of modern times.

For some reason difficult to explain, Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" had not been heard for a considerable time in our principal Concert-rooms previous to its performance on the 21st ult.

Though perhaps not so universally popular as "Elijah," Mendelssohn's first oratorio is regarded with the utmost admiration by all genuine lovers of music, proof of this being afforded by the large audience that assembled on this occasion. It is unpleasant to be compelled to declare that the performance left much to desire in the one respect where excellence should have been a matter of course—namely, in the rendering of the choruses. If the choir had been a scratch body, brought together for some special purpose, the feeble attack, general unsteadiness, and complete absence of refinement and all the higher qualities of choral singing might be understood and forgiven; but with a trained body accustomed to work together such faults are unaccountable, and the more so as in former seasons the Sacred Harmonic Choir has given admirable performances of various works. The falling off this season must not be permitted to continue, or the results to the Society will inevitably be disastrous. Public confidence once forfeited is not easy to regain, as the history of the parent Society too well proves. Mr. Cummings is an able chorusmaster and Mr. Charles Hallé an admirable conductor; but the system of having one conductor for rehearsals and another for performances is hazardous at the best. It is not our duty to suggest what should be done, and, having stated disagreeable facts, we look with confidence for an improvement on the next occasion. The soloists in "St. Paul" left nothing whatever to desire. Mr. Santley was in splendid voice, and has never rendered the music allotted to the Apostle with greater impressiveness. Equal praise may be accorded to Mr. Lloyd; while Miss Clara Samuell and Miss M. Hancock, in the less important soprano and contralto music, were thoroughly satisfactory.

BOROUGH OF HACKNEY CHORAL ASSOCIATION.

No more healthy sign of the progress of musical taste could be desired than the prosperity of our larger choral societies in the suburbs of London. Among the best of these is the Hackney Choral Association, of which Mr. E. Prout is the Conductor, and which gave its first Concert for the season at the Shoreditch Town Hall on the 3rd ult. Not only was the room crowded, but the Choir overflowed into the balconies, and, as the performance proved, the increase in numbers has resulted in a corresponding improvement in power and quality. The first part of the Concert consisted of Mendelssohn's "Athalia," which was given without the aid of a reciter. As to the expediency of this plan there is likely to be some difference of opinion. The recitation may be regarded as a tiresome interruption of the music, but some of the latter is so essentially dramatic that without the necessary explanation its effect is weakened. This remark applies more particularly to the second part of the work, when the plot begins to thicken. A compromise might be effected by giving some argumentary matter in the programme, but we scarcely think the precedent set by this Society is likely to be generally followed. The second part of the Concert consisted of a selection from the works of Handel, including some numbers of the little known Oratorios "Hercules" and "The Triumph of Time and Truth." The former work was revived a few years ago by Mr. Henry Leslie, but the latter has not been heard, so far as we are aware, for many years. From it were selected the expressive air "Guardian Angels, Oh protect me," and the tuneful air and chorus "Dryads, Sylvens, with fair Flora." The "Hercules" excerpts were two choruses, the splendid "Jealousy, infernal pest," and the lighter, though thoroughly Handelian, "Love and Hymen." As already indicated, the choral singing throughout the evening was of a high order of excellence, and Miss Marianne Fenna, Madame de Fonblanque, and Miss Damian were admirable as the soloists. At the next Concert, on the 2nd inst., Dvorák's splendid "Stabat Mater" will be performed.

GUILDHALL SCHOOL OF MUSIC.

ANOTHER important feature has been added to this already vast and elaborate Musical Institution in the formation of a juvenile stringed orchestra, and this new body took part in a highly interesting Concert at the Mansion House, on the 1st ult. The students' orchestra, as it is termed, consisted of fifty-two executants, of whom twenty-four were young ladies, and their playing reflected the utmost credit on Mr. Weist Hill, who, as Principal of the school, has proved himself to be the right man in the right place. The chief items in the programme were a Russian Suite, Op. 81, by R. Wuerst, and a Suite in E, Op. 22, by Dvorák. The former is clever and pleasing rather than original, but the latter has a full measure of its composer's peculiar freshness and individuality. Several very promising pupils appeared as soloists, those deserving especial mention being Miss Edith Umpelby (soprano), Miss Alice Heale (contralto), and Miss Cora Cardigan (flautist). At the conclusion of the Concert the prize-winners of the year were presented with their various awards by the Lady Mayoress, among the successful competitors being Miss Frances Allitson, for the composition of an overture in classic form; Mr. R. O Morgan, for a sonata for piano and violin, and Miss Florence Marse, Miss Lily von Kornatzki, Miss Kate Eadie, and Mr. W. J. Barton, for the best performances of certain pianoforte works by Beethoven.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

IN contributing this the first article appearing in these columns anent music and musical events in Liverpool, we have pleasure in recording the fact that this city has within recent years made a distinct advance in the direction of higher musical culture, and with the agencies and competition now at work we may confidently anticipate a gradually increasing interest corresponding more approximately to that of other large towns, such as Birmingham, Leeds, &c., where the divine art is so admirably fostered by the means of triennial festivals and other potent agencies.

Liverpool is, however, fortunate in the possession of two Societies which can admit few peers in the North of England, and whilst bearing somewhat similar and almost conflicting titles, their organisations and bases of operations are entirely distinct, each treading consistently in the path originally laid down. The Philharmonic Society, having been established some thirty or forty years ago, can claim an extensive experience, enhanced by varied management and general direction. The series of twelve Subscription Concerts, which are given by this Society each season, comprise items in all the departments of musical art, and whilst the recent acquisition of Mr. Hallé's band has given an increased prominence to the purely orchestral features, the programmes continue full of interest and variety.

The Philharmonic Choral Society is, on the other hand, of but recent origin, and whilst its establishment was the outcome of a difference with the parent Society, this severance is now hailed by the musical public of Liverpool as a distinct advantage, in that it has brought about the formation of a healthy, vigorous, and powerful Society, specially promoted for the performance of important choral works on a large scale, under the conductorship of that accomplished musician, Mr. Alberto Randegger, who has already won for himself the respect and esteem of numerous Liverpool friends. This was evidenced in a practical manner during his last visit to the city, when the occasion of his recent auspicious marriage was taken advantage of by the members of his Society to present him with a handsome silver fruit service, in commemoration of the happy event.

With a success almost phenomenal in its intensity, the Philharmonic Choral Society presented to the public during last season four oratorios, each remarkable for its own distinctive features. The "Elijah," "Messiah," "Redemption," and "Israel in Egypt" followed in consecutive order, and the rendering of the "Elijah," as the initial performance, and Gounod's "Redemption," as one demanding special delicacy and finish, will long be remembered for their excellence by those fortunate enough to be present. These successes were so marked that the Society was specially engaged to repeat the performances of "Elijah" and "Israel in Egypt" at the Eisteddfod Festival, held at the large pavilion (erected for the purpose), in September last.

The present season of the Society was opened in St. George's Hall, on the 7th ult., with a brilliant performance of Mr. Randegger's Cantata "Fridolin," and Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night." The fact of the Conductor's own work forming the important item of the evening lent an additional interest to the occasion, and all concerned did their utmost to make the rendering of Mr. Randegger's dramatic work as perfect as possible. The performance, under his direction, was one of finished excellence, the choral portions of the work being especially prominent for their general brilliancy, verve, and tone, and the effect in some of the more striking situations, when the combined force of band, chorus, and organ were brought into play, was exceedingly impressive. The principals also, comprising Miss Annie Marriott, Mr. Henry Guy, Mr. Frederic King, and Signor Franco Novara, greatly added to the artistic rendering of the work, it being reserved for the last mentioned artist to create such an impression by his remarkable power, range, and tone, that his early re-appearance here will be looked forward to with considerable favour and interest. His operatic training served him in good stead in the dramatic part which he had to sustain. At the conclusion of "Fridolin" the talented composer was recalled to the platform by the continuous plaudits of the audience, whose enthusiasm lasted for several minutes. In the second part Mr. Lucas Williams distinguished himself in the "Walpurgis Night" music, which concluded a Concert full of interest and pleasure. The next appearance of this Society is to take place on New Year's eve with a performance of the "Messiah," which will be followed in February by what is announced as a "Grand Handelian Bi-centenary Performance" of "Judas Maccabæus," which will doubtless attract a crowded house. The season will conclude in March with Mendelssohn's "St. Paul."

The season of the Philharmonic Society having commenced on September 30 last, is already well advanced, and in the four Concerts which have now been disposed of, Liverpool has had the opportunity of canvassing the respective merits of such artists as Madame Valleria, Miss Carlotta Elliot, Mr. Brereton, Mr. Santley, Miss Marianne Fenna, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. H. Kearton and Mr. Bridson. The four last mentioned artists formed the "cast" for a performance, on the 4th ult., of Gade's "Psyche" and Weber's "Preciosa." Gade's pleasing Cantata was well rendered by band, chorus, and principals alike, Miss Fenna acquitting herself creditably in a somewhat trying part, and Mr. Bridson lending to his music unusual verve and finish. Amongst other items which have come under contribution at these Concerts may be mentioned Beethoven's Symphony in D, Brahms's Grand Symphony in F, No. 3—being its first performance in Liverpool—and Schubert's Symphony in C, all of which have received a careful and faithful interpretation under Mr. Hallé's direction. At the fourth Concert of the Society, held on the 18th ult., Mr. Santley was the vocalist; and Signor Bottesini, after an absence of thirteen years, delighted his listeners by his incomparable executive skill. The choral feature of this Concert was the creditable performance of Eaton Fanning's orchestral choral ballad, "The Miller's Wooing," which bids fair to rival the popularity of his well-known part-song "The Vikings." The subsequent Concerts of the Philharmonic Society comprise Beethoven's pianoforte Concerto in C minor, a Christmas performance of Handel's Oratorio "Jephtha," Cowen's Welsh Symphony (first time), Raff's Symphony "Leonore"; and for the concluding Concerts we are promised Berlioz's sacred trilogy, "The Childhood of Christ," Dvorák's "Stabat Mater," and other selections suitable to the Lenten season.

In proceeding to refer to Mr. Hallé's series of Orchestral Concerts it is gratifying to state that these, perhaps, more than any other agency, exercise a material influence and attractiveness over the musical public of Liverpool. Whilst, to those not versed in the "wheels within wheels," it may appear somewhat singular that a series of Concerts should be held under similar auspices in the hall belonging to the premier Society, and apparently in open, but healthy rivalry with that Society, the benefit is certainly the public's, and if each undertaking thrives on its own particular lines, such competition can scarcely be regarded as injurious. Certain it is that Mr. Hallé, by the evidences which he has already given, intends this season to eclipse his former efforts in bidding for popularity—and with an orchestra increased to 100 performers, his Concerts, as far as this department is concerned, are almost as near perfection as it is possible to attain. The special feature of the present series is to include at least one item of Wagner in each Concert's programme—which will thus aid in completing the education of the Liverpool public in the Wagnerian school, which Mr. Hallé has done so much to foster. The excerpt selected for performance at the second Concert of the series, on the 11th ult., was, culled from the great Bayreuth sensation, "Parsifal," and was, of course, accorded a finished rendering. Madame Norman Néruda was the solo violinist. At the Concert held on the 25th ult., an exceptionally interesting and attractive programme was performed, and a crowded audience testified to the success of the caterers. The orchestral items comprised Raff's Grand Symphony "Im Walde," and the Overtures to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger," and Mozart's "Il Seraglio," and Miss Agnes Zimmermann played Schumann's Concerto in A minor, and also examples of Chopin and Liszt. The chief feature and attraction of this Concert was, however, in the engagement of Madame Albani, whose magnificent voice and faultless method delighted her hearers in the three excerpts from opera and oratorio, which were allotted to her.

On Thursday, the 6th ult., the Pro-Cathedral was again crowded on the occasion of the repetition of Dr. Gladstone's Church Oratorio "Philippi." The work can scarcely be said to make great demands upon the executants, but is eminently suited to performance under the conditions and facilities at the disposal of the Cathedral Organist, who has had deserved success in placing such works before the public. Mr. Burstall himself conducted, and with a choir of some seventy picked voices, efficient soloists, and a skilful organ accompaniment, the Oratorio received a very careful rendering, reflecting considerable credit on all concerned.

With commendable ambition, the Young Men's Christian Association (Tonic Sol-fa) Choral Union essayed, on the evening of the 15th ult., a performance of Haydn's "Creation," with Miss Mary Davies, Mr. J. W. Turner, and Signor Foli as principals, and, on the whole, the Oratorio received a satisfactory rendering.

The success of Mr. Mackenzie's "Rose of Sharon" at the Norwich Festival has been considerably discussed in local musical circles, and whilst the large expenditure involved in its adequate rendering has proved somewhat of a bar to its performance in Liverpool, we believe the Philharmonic Choral Society have not abandoned the idea of giving the work as a special Festival performance, which would, doubtless, meet with deserved success.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

MUSIC, like everything else, appears to be suffering more or less from the general depression of trade just now, but it is gratifying to find that the declining support complained of by operatic managers and the conductors of classical chamber and cheap popular Concerts, does not extend to either orchestral or high class choral music. The subscription list for Mr. Stockley's Orchestral Concerts this season is the largest for many years, and the Festival Choral Society, which has had many hard struggles of late, appears to have fairly turned the corner at last, and has entered upon what promises to prove an unusually prosperous season. At the opening Concert of the twenty-fifth series, which took place on October 30, the Oratorio was Mendelssohn's "Elijah," which is always a safe card to play in Birmingham, when the executive resources are on a fairly adequate scale, as they were on this occasion. The Society's name, of course, is a guarantee for the excellence of the choral and orchestral rendering of any work it may attempt; and with Madame Valleria, Madame Enriquez and Mr. Ludwig as principal vocalists, nearly every condition of a satisfactory performance was in this instance secured. Madame Valleria, whose accession to the ranks of oratorio singers is of comparatively recent date, made an excellent impression in the chief soprano music by the charm of her voice, the finish of her style and method, and the fervour which she exhibited, more particularly in the part of the widow, whose son is raised to life by the intercession of the Prophet. She sang the grand air "Hear ye, Israel" with an intensity and dramatic feeling that fairly took the audience by surprise. Madame Enriquez was intelligent and artistic as usual in the principal contralto part, especially distinguishing herself in Jezebel's famous scene, and singing the two vocal gems, "Woe unto them," and "O rest in the Lord," with appropriate feeling and vocal skill. The Elijah of Mr. Ludwig, though presenting many commendable features, was not, as a whole, a very satisfactory performance, being occasionally wanting in reserve and refinement, besides generally unsteady in intonation. In the scene with the Priests of Baal, and the impetuous air "Is not His word like a fire?" Mr. Ludwig's performance was loudly and deservedly applauded. It would be superfluous to dilate on the merits of Mr. Edward Lloyd's singing of the tenor solos, "If with all your hearts," and "Then shall the righteous," in which charm of voice, fervour and refinement of expression were happily blended. The concerted movements were somewhat unequal. The quartets, "Cast thy burden," and "O come every one," were admirably rendered, but in some of the other numbers, the intonation of the singers was occasionally at fault. No praise can be too high for the choral singing, which was of rare excellence throughout.

On the 6th ult., the Musical Section of the Midland Institute gave another of those Madrigal Concerts which were introduced with such success last season, the Madrigal singing on this occasion being pleasantly relieved and supplemented by the pianoforte playing of Mr. R. Rickard. At former Concerts some interesting specimens of the early Italian Madrigalists were presented, but the programme in this instance was entirely drawn from the works of English composers new and old, among the most effective being Bennett's "Sweet Stream," Smart's "Cradle Song," Pearsall's "Allan-a-Dale," and Macfarren's part-song, "The sands of Dee." The choir contains some excellent voices, but is a little lacking in animation and expressive power. Mr. Rickard's splendid technique was displayed to advantage in Schumann's "Carnovale"—a somewhat inappropriate selection for a short popular Concert—a Capriccio by Scarlatti (with Tausig's additions), Gottschalk's "Pasquinade," two familiar pieces of Chopin, Rubinstein's Tarantella in G minor, Weber's "Invitation à la Valse," and Liszt's transcription of the celebrated "Rondo à la Clochette" of Paganini. In the Chopin and Weber selections, there was, perhaps, a little too much of the virtuoso, and somewhat too little of the sympathetic musician, but, on the whole, Mr. Rickard's playing was very effective and praiseworthy.

Messrs. Harrison's second Concert on the 17th, which drew even a larger audience than the previous one, resembled it in the miscellaneous character of the programme and the preponderance of vocal music: but was decidedly superior in the character of the selections and their adaptation to the executive resources. The latter comprised in the vocal department Madame Albani, Miss Annie Marriott, Madame Trebelli, Mr. Maas, and Mr. Santley, and as representatives of instrumental art, Mr. R. Rickard, pianoforte; Herr Otto Bernhardt, violin; Mr. Stimpson, organ, and Mr. Frederic Cliffe, accompanist and conductor.

The preliminary note of the Birmingham Musical Festival of 1885, was confidently sounded at the meeting of the General Committee on the 22nd, when the Orchestral Committee presented their report descriptive of the arrangements, so far as they are yet completed, for next year's celebration. Much satisfaction was expressed at the announcement that M. Gounod's new work is already completed and in the hands of the publishers, and that in the opinion of competent judges who have tried it over, "Mors et vita," is not inferior in scope, interest, or musical excellence to the "Redemption." Besides the new work by M. Gounod, the Orchestral Committee were able to announce that commissions had been accepted by Antonin Dvorák, and no less than six English composers—namely, Mr. Mackenzie, Dr. Bridge, Dr. Villiers Stanford, Mr. F. Cowen, Mr. Ebenezer Prout, and Mr. Thomas Anderson, of Birmingham. The appointment of Herr Richter to the conductorship of the Festival, in succession to the late Sir Michael Costa, to whose worth the Orchestral Committee paid a cordial and well merited tribute, affords a guarantee for the maintenance of the old standard of executive excellence.

The lovers of comic opera, whose name in Birmingham is legion, have had no cause to complain of any dearth of that form of entertainment during the past month. At the Prince of Wales's Theatre, one of Mr. D'Oyley Carte's touring companies has been nightly charming large audiences with the grotesque humour and ear-haunting melodies of the "Princess Ida," which, in a merely musical sense, is accepted here as one of the best things Mr. Sullivan has achieved since "The Sorcerer." At the Theatre Royal, Planquette's lively and spectacular extravaganza "Nell Gwynne," has proved equally attractive to another and less musical section of the public, thanks chiefly to the excellence of the scenic accessories and the spirit of the acting.

Of the second Concert of the Festival Choral Society, which took place on the 27th ult., when Schubert's Mass in E flat, and Barnett's Cantata, "The Ancient Mariner," were performed, particulars must be reserved for your next issue.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

THE county of broad acres, as it is so often called, has just entered upon a musical season which will probably be regarded as the most eventful that it has ever experienced. Not only each town, but almost every outlying village, can now-a-days boast of its own organisation and its series of winter Concerts, and the list of approaching gatherings, more particularly as regards the West Riding, has consequently assumed enormous dimensions. Not a few of the announcements which have appeared possess features of deep interest to musicians.

The amateurs of Leeds are once more indebted to Mr. Rawlinson Ford for the admirable series of Classical Concerts which he has undertaken to provide this season. The support which was extended to a similar enterprise on his part a year ago has encouraged him to augment the number of Concerts, and if one may augur anything from the attendance at the opening Concert on October 21, Mr. Ford is not likely to have to complain of want of encouragement at the close of the present series. The event alluded to brought with it several novelties, and a few fresh performers. The whole of the executants were English, and the reception they met must have been reassuring to the friends of English art. There was but one instrumental solo, which, however, was eminently acceptable, namely, Mr. Henry Holmes's performance of Beethoven's Romance in G (Op. 40). It was the first appearance of Mr. Holmes at these Concerts, and his performance will have had the effect of endorsing in the minds of a discriminating Leeds audience the reputation which he has already won among English violinists. Schubert's Post-humous Quartet-Satz—an early and comparatively slight example of the neglected genius of that composer; Spohr's exacting double Quartet, No. 2, in E flat (Op. 77), and Mendelssohn's Octet, in E flat (Op. 20)—another youthful composition—furnished excellent material not only for the skill of the executants but for the critical faculties of the audience. The performers were—first Quartet, Messrs. Holmes, Parker, Gibson, and Howell; second Quartet: Messrs. Burnett, Grimson, E. Roberts, and Charles Ould. The vocalists were Mr. W. H. Brereton and Miss Ambler, acquaintance with both of whom was resumed with delight. Mr. Charles Wilkinson (Leeds) and Mr. Alfred Benton (Leeds) presided respectively at the pianoforte and harmonium. At the second Concert, on the 18th ult., the audience were favoured with the appearance, for the second time, of Mr. Walter Bache, whose ardent discipleship of his master, Liszt, once more found expression in his selection of pieces for performance. The Concert was remarkable for more reasons than the appearance of Mr. Bache, however. It afforded an opportunity, one of the earliest in this district, of hearing a composition by Dvorák, whose works have become the subject of much curiosity. The selection was the Trio in F minor (Op. 65), which, to say the least, opened up much material for reflection, more especially with regard to the strange and entirely independent character of its opening movement. Signor Piatti, and Herr Peiniger, who were welcomed again to Leeds, gave, as usual, each an interesting contribution to the Concert. Miss Clara Samuëll's excellent voice and refined style were also agreeable features of the Concert.

The visits of the Carl Rosa Opera Company are invariably associated with pleasant experiences, and Mr. Wilson Barrett's admirable establishment is never seen to greater advantage than when its stage is given up to operatic performances. The visit of the company, which began on October 27, was more particularly noteworthy on account of the first performance in Leeds of Boïto's "Mefistofele," a work which in this as in other quarters has aroused much interest. The performance was in every respect worthy of a composition of such importance, and the attitude of the house, from that of cautious observation, became one of approval. With Madame Marie Roze as Margaret, and Mr. McGuckin, Mr. Ludwig, and Miss Marian Burton to represent the other leading characters, the opera, as may be imagined, was heard and seen to the best advantage.

The revival at Belgrave Chapel, Leeds, on the 17th ult., of Mr. Wm. Carter's sacred Cantata "Placida the Christian Martyr" attracted considerable attention. It is many years since the work was produced, and considering its tunefulness and general attractiveness it is somewhat remarkable that it has for so long been lost sight of. Among the vocalists who sustained the principal parts were Miss Annie Woods and Mr. Dan Billington. Mr. J. F. Clarke presided at the organ.

Madame Christine Nilsson appeared in St. George's Hall, Bradford, on the 7th ult., and in the Victoria Hall, Leeds, on the 12th ult., being accompanied on each occasion by Miss Hope Glenn, Madame Mathilde Zimeri, Signor Parisotti, Signor Bisaccia (pianist), and M. Hollman (violoncellist).

The Concert provided by Mr. Sewell at the Technical College, Bradford, on October 21, although somewhat remote from the present date, is worthy of notice on account of its refined programme and excellent combination of performers. Mendelssohn's String Quartet in E flat (Op. 12), Beethoven's Kreutzer Sonata, Prout's Piano Quintet, and other works of equal interest, were rendered by Messrs. Carodus, Strelitskie, Sewell, Charles Ould, and Herbert F. Sharpe.

At the opening Concert of the Halifax Choral Society, on October 22, two important works were produced—Rossini's "Stabat Mater" and the "Walpurgis Night"—the Society having the assistance of Mr. R. S. Burton, as Conductor, and his orchestra. The solos were ably rendered by Miss Annie Abu, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Seymour Jackson, and Mr. W. Riley.

The cultivation of chamber music is becoming popular in most of the West Riding towns. Halifax shares in the general development which has taken place in musical matters, and is favoured this season with a series of Classical Concerts, arranged by Mr. J. H. Sykes. The first Concert of the series, which took place on the 30th of October, included Schumann's elaborately conceived Quintet, Mozart's Quartet in D (Op. 21), Mendelssohn's Trio in D minor (Op. 49); and solos for the piano, by Raff and Brahms, and for the cello, by Guilman and Piatti. The executants were Mr. M. Kellett (violin), Mr. G. Sowerbutts (second violin), Mr. J. Drake (viola), Mr. F. Weston (violoncello), and Mr. J. Edgar Ibeson (piano). The vocalists were Madame Gardiner and Mr. T. Buckland.

The first Concert of the twentieth season of the Bradford Subscription Concerts, which took place in St. George's Hall on October 31, will be memorable chiefly for the appearance of Madame Albani and the production of Raff's "Lenore" Symphony. Madame Albani was in excellent voice, and appeared to great advantage in a couple of Donizetti's songs, the rendering of which exhibited her marvellous facility of execution, while her performance of the air from "St. Peter," "I mourn as a dove," gave her an opportunity for fine vocal expression. Along with Raff's Grand Symphony, were Wagner's Scene of the Rhine Daughters, from the "Götterdämmerung," and Delibes's Slavonic air with variations ("Coppelia"), to all three of which ample justice was done by Mr. Hallé's band. The Conductor's own solos—Chopin's Romanza and Rondo, from the Concerto in E minor—to which the band played the accompaniment, and Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 12, were received, as Mr. Hallé's performances invariably are by Bradford audiences, with a feeling akin to enthusiasm.

Mr. W. Hemingway's Concert at Halifax, on the 7th ult., included as vocalists Miss Ella Lemmens, Madame Enriquez, Mr. Joseph Maas, and Mr. Farley Sinkins; and the instrumentalists were Mdlle. Anna Lang, Signor Bottesini, and Mr. H. Löhr (pianist). The programme was an admirably selected one, and the audience was worthy of the occasion.

On the 12th ult. several of the leading members of the Carl Rosa Opera Company took part in a Concert at Huddersfield, arranged by Messrs. Wood and Marshall. The vocalists were Madame Burns, Miss Josephine Yorke, Mr. B. Davies, Mr. Henry Beaumont, Mr. G. H. Snazelle, and Mr. Leslie Crotty. Professor Bowling was the conductor and accompanist, and Mr. Whewall Bowling joined his brother in a pianoforte duet.

Herr St. Hensé gave the first of a series of Chamber Concerts in the Bradford Church Institute on the 15th ult., and put forth an excellent programme, which included among other items Grieg's Sonata for pianoforte and cello (Op. 36), Beethoven's Trio in E flat (Op. 70), and Bargiel's Trio (Op. 26), not to mention several other pieces equally interesting to amateurs. In the Concert Herr St. Hensé, himself an admirable pianist, was associated with Signor Risegari and M. Vieuxtemps, each of whom contributed solos.

Mr. Misdale's second Chamber Concert of the season took place on the 21st ult. The executants were Herr Ferdinand Hartung (violin), Mr. F. Weston (violoncello), and Mr. Misdale (piano). The familiar B flat Trio of Schubert, Gade's Novelletten for piano and strings (Op. 29), and Rubinstein's three pieces for piano and cello (Op. 11)—the first movement of which was left out for want of time—constituted a welcome programme of concerted pieces; and each of the executants gave solos, the works selected for that purpose being from Spohr, Wieniawski, Moszkowski, and Piatti. The vocalists were Madame Armitage and Mr. Mellor.

Among other events which call for notice was the performance of the "Erl-King's Daughter" and the "May Queen" by the Yeadon and District Harmonic Union, on the 5th ult., and of Mr. Barnby's "Rebekah" by the choir of Kirkgate Chapel, Bradford, assisted by members of the Festival Choral Society, in the Bradford Technical College, on the 13th ult.

MUSIC IN THE WEST.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

LAST month's music was begun in Bristol by Mr. George Riseley's Organ Recital at Colston Hall on the 1st ult., and on the 3rd the third Monday Popular Concert was given at the same place. The Concert opened with the overture to "Ruy Blas," finely rendered by the band. This was followed by Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, very well though not faultlessly played. Paganini's "Il moto perpetuo," arranged for orchestra, was repeated by desire, and was as delightfully played as at the previous Concert; and the remaining items were the overture to "Zampa"; "Grossmütterchen," Langer; Intermezzo, "Spring Morning on Lebanon," from the "Rose of Sharon," A. C. Mackenzie; and a selection from the "Pirates of Penzance." The vocalist was Miss Eleanor Rees, who has given us so much pleasure on two former occasions, and who contributed three songs in a truly admirable manner.

On the 5th ult. two Concerts were given at Colston Hall by Mr. Dan Godfrey's band, when Madame Trebelli was the vocalist. The audiences were not very large, owing probably to the Concerts not having been sufficiently advertised.

The first of the Classical Chamber Concerts for the present season took place on the 12th ult., at the Victoria Rooms, before an appreciative but sadly limited audience. It surely must argue ill for the standard of music in Bristol that such a fine programme as was announced should fail to bring together a larger number of listeners. The executants were as follows: first violin, Mr. Henry Holmes; second violin, Mr. John Pardew; viola, Mr.

Ellis Roberts; violoncello, Mr. J. Pomeroy; contra-bass, Mr. J. Reynolds; grand piano, Mrs. Viner-Pomeroy. The first piece was Onslow's Quintet in A minor, for two violins, viola, violoncello, and contra-bass. It was not altogether successfully rendered, the contra-bass being decidedly out of tune in several places, and the performers not being always together, more especially in the last two movements. Boccherini's Sixth Sonata, for violoncello and piano, was next given, this being substituted for Scharwenka's Sonata in E, for the same instruments, which was on the programme. Mr. Pomeroy played with great skill and taste, and was heartily applauded. We were very sorry to miss Mr. Holmes's Violin Solo, which was announced as the third item. Haydn's String Quartet in G was the substitute; and last, but not least, came Hummel's Quintet in D minor, for piano, violin, viola, violoncello, and contra-bass. This was a great success, Mrs. Pomeroy playing in an extremely clever and spirited style, and all keeping well together. The performance of Mr. Holmes throughout the evening was, as usual, beyond criticism.

On the 15th ult. the Bristol Musical Association gave its twenty-seventh Saturday Popular Concert in Colston Hall, which was crowded in every part. The vocalists were Miss Berta Foresta, Miss Madeline Kelley, Mr. E. T. Morgan, and Mr. J. C. Mather; violin, Mr. F. S. Gardner; grand organ, Mr. George Riseley; pianoforte, Miss Maud Bennett. The chief works given were Beethoven's Choral Fantasia and Romberg's "Harmony of the Spheres." Mr. George Gordon was the Conductor.

The fourth Monday Popular Concert took place on the 17th ult., before a large audience. Mr. Cowen's "Cambrian" Symphony, No. 4, in E flat minor, was the chief work, and it received very fair justice at the hands of the orchestra and was heartily applauded, the composer—who conducted his work—being recalled. Weber's Overture "Der Freischütz" was excellently played, and the first part concluded with Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody in F, arranged for orchestra by the composer, in which the almost impossible time was admirably kept. The most interesting piece in the second part was Handel's Largo, set for solo violin, harp and organ. The vocalist was Miss Margaret Hoare. Mr. George Riseley conducted as usual.

Organ recitals were given on the 8th and 22nd ult., by Mr. Riseley, at Colston Hall.

Two grand Concerts are to be given on the 5th and 6th inst., at Colston Hall, by the Bristol Musical Festival Society, the chief works to be performed being Haydn's "Creation" and Dvorák's "Stabat Mater."

Miss Aylward's sixth and last Chamber Concert took place at the Assembly Rooms, Salisbury, on the 27th ult. The programme included Schumann's pianoforte Quartet in E flat (Op. 47), and the Schubert Quintet in A (Op. 114), &c. Miss Mary Davis was the vocalist.

The Choral Society will give its second Concert of the season on the 10th inst., when Gade's "Psyche" will be performed, with Miss Amy Aylward and Mr. Thorndike as the principal vocalists.

Mr. Barré D. Bayley's Morning and Evening Concerts took place at Exeter, on the 10th ult., and were, from an artistic point of view, highly successful. The most striking feature of the Concerts was M. Hollman's magnificent performance on the violoncello, his grand tone and exquisite taste exciting the utmost admiration. Hummel's Trio, Op. 12, and Mendelssohn's Trio in D minor, played by Herr Gustave Ernest, Mr. Bayley, and M. Hollman, were excellently rendered. Three "Pensées Fugitives," by Heller and Ernst, were given by Herr Ernest and Mr. Bayley, whose violin playing was marked by much grace and elegance. Herr Gustave Ernest accompanied throughout with much taste and discretion, and played several solos (notably Liszt's Rhapsodie Hongroise, Nq. 14) with great skill and success. Several of Mr. Bayley's pupils played with considerable credit to themselves and to their instructor, and Miss Henden Warde contributed the vocal music.

The Exeter branch of the Western Counties Musical Association gave its annual Concert on the 20th ult., when the works performed were Cummings's "Fairy Ring" and Hatton's "Robin Hood." The chorus-singing was excellent, showing a marked improvement in precision and attack, and the solos were all sung by amateurs (members of the branch) in very creditable style. The Band, led by Mr. C. E. Bell, consisted of strings and flute (members of the Orchestral Society) and harmonium, judiciously and effectively played by Mr. A. Thousson, Organist of St. James's. Mr. D. J. Wood, Mus. Bac., F.C.O., Organist of the Cathedral, conducted.

Mr. Farley Sinkins's Second Subscription Concert is announced for the 4th inst., and later in the month the Madrigal and Oratorio Society's Concerts will be held, the latter Society promising Handel's "Samson." The Plymouth Vocal Association performed Gounod's "Redemption" on the 5th ult., before a large audience. The Band, ably led by Mr. Pardew, played with great precision, and much credit is due to the Honorary Conductor, Mr. Löhr, who spared no pains to make the Concert a success. The choir did its work admirably, as also did Mr. Faull, the Organist. The soloists were Madame Garty-Maynard, Miss A. Dwellley, Miss Burdwood, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. A. L. Wills, and Mr. Worlock.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

A MEETING of the guarantors and subscribers to the Choral and Orchestral Concerts was held in the Council Chamber, on October 28, the Lord Provost in the chair. The report of the Executive Committee for the past season was read, from which it appeared that the success of the Concerts had again been most marked. The total receipts amounted to £3,152 19s. 4d., and the expenditure to £2,950 4s. 8d., leaving a balance to the good on last season's Concerts of £202 14s. 8d. The Committee regret that in consequence of a reduction in the number of seats they will be necessitated to raise the rates of subscription, and to make a corresponding increase on the prices for single tickets to all other parts of the hall. The Lord Provost, in moving the adoption of the report, expressed the hope that before long some reasonable arrangement would be come to with the proprietors of the Music Hall for increased accommodation, and he deprecated the idea of building an opposition building. Sheriff Thorn, in seconding the motion, remarked that the public taste had now reached that point when they could fairly calculate on an audience of three thousand people, if they only had a hall to accommodate them. If they had such a hall they could not only lower their prices, but could extend the benefits of that musical education which was derived from these Concerts. Readers of THE MUSICAL TIMES are already cognisant of the scheme for the ensuing season. The orchestral programmes will be almost precisely the same as those at Glasgow. The pianoforte soloists engaged are Madame Essipoff, Professor Heinrich Barth, Mr. Lindsay G. Deas, and Herr Franz Rummel; the solo violinists are Mr. J. T. Carrodus, Herr Robert Heckmann, and Herr Hugo Heerman. Mr. Manns will, as usual, conduct the orchestral Concerts, and Mr. T. H. Collinson the Choral Concerts.

The Philharmonic Society, under the joint conductorship of Mr. Carl D. Hamilton and Mr. Francis Gibson, have commenced the season's practisings.

The second of Mr. Waddell's Chamber Concerts took place on October 27, in the Art Saloon, George Street. An interesting feature of the evening's entertainment was the début of Miss Macgregor, a young violinist of 15, who was for several years a pupil of Mr. Waddell, and has been lately studying at Leipzig. Miss Macgregor played the opening movements from Viotti's Twenty-second Concerto and a Sonata by Corelli. Her technique is good and her tone remarkably matured. Among the Concerted pieces were Hummel's Quartet, Op. 74.

Miss Frances Simpson, from Newcastle, essayed a performance of pianoforte music, in the Masonic Hall, on October 28, but made little impression on an Edinburgh audience. The pianist seemed most at home among the modern composers, scoring a decided success both with Scharwenka's "Staccato Study" and in Mayer's "La Fontaine." Miss Kate Simpson, contralto, and Mr. Fred. Mace, tenor, contributed vocal solos.

The first of a series of popular Saturday Evening Concerts, under the auspices of the directors of the Literary Institute, took place in the large hall of the Institute on the 1st ult. The bill of fare submitted, though light, was good of its kind, but owing to the high prices—high for the class intended to be attracted to the entertainment—the attendance was limited. A number of instrumental pieces were played by Mr. Poyser and others in excellent style. Miss Mackenzie, of St. Giles's Cathedral, who sings with taste and expression, contributed some songs with considerable acceptance. Mr. Dambmann acted as Conductor to the Concert.

The Jubilee Singers from Fisk University, a body of coloured people with many good musical points and many bad ones, appeared in the Music Hall, on the 3rd ult., before a large audience.

Mr. Charles Hallé and Madame Norman Néruda gave a Concert in the Music Hall, on the afternoon of Saturday, the 8th ult., in presence of an audience which filled the room to overflowing. The most thoroughly acceptable of the items forming the programme was, perhaps, the Kreutzer Sonata, of Beethoven, for piano and violin. Schumann's pianoforte Sonata, in F sharp minor (Op. 11), was played by Mr. Hallé for the first time here. The Concert was altogether of the most enjoyable nature.

Mr. Poyser, late leader of the orchestra in the Theatre Royal, which was burned in June last, took a benefit Concert on the 11th ult., in the Music Hall, with the assistance of some members of the band, and of Mr. Sims Reeves. Mr. Gilbert Campbell, a native of the city (who has been studying in Italy), appeared at this Concert, and showed himself the possessor of a very good bass voice.

The Carl Rosa Opera Company began a week's engagement at the Lyceum Theatre on the 18th ult., "Carmen," "Esmeralda," and "La Favorita" being among the operas represented. Good audiences were the rule.

A Concert was given by the choir of West St. Giles's Church, on the 19th ult. The programme was hardly such as is usually associated with church choirs, consisting, as it did, for the most part of instrumental chamber music, vocal quartets, &c., but it was very good of its kind.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

THE veteran pianist, Mr. Charles Hallé, accompanied by Madame Néruda, gave a Concert here on the 7th ult. Hitherto the patronage of the Glasgow public has been scantily accorded to "Chamber Music," but on this occasion the Concert hall of the elegant suite of buildings known as the Queen's Rooms, was filled to overflowing. The programme embraced Beethoven's Sonata in E flat, Op. 81, "Les adieux, l'absence, et le retour," Schumann's Sonata for piano and violin in A minor, Op. 105, a Duo for these instruments by Heller and Ernst, and Liszt's Rhapsodie Hongroise (in D flat, No. 12). It is unnecessary to say how well these and the other numbers in the programme were interpreted by Mr. Hallé and his companion artist. On the 14th ult. Madame Christine Nilsson and party appeared in St. Andrew's Hall. The Concert, like most Concerts by touring stars and their satellites, was of a not altogether satisfactory character, the classic and the ephemeral and commonplace being in unpleasant juxtaposition. Madame Nilsson was heard in the Scena by Beethoven, "Ah, perfido," in the lovely duet "La luna immobile" from Boito's "Mefistofele" (with Miss Hope Glenn) and in the Jewel Song from "Faust," in all fully satisfying the highest expectations. Signor Foli sang a trashy song, "Jerusalem," by Henry Parker (amusingly like Gounod's "Nazareth"), and the everlasting "I fear no foe"; Miss Hope Glenn achieved a legitimate success in the Arietta from Gluck, "Vieni che poi sereno," but unfortunately afterwards injured herself in the estimation of the most discerning of the audience in some inferior music of the day. Some violoncello solos were contributed by Herr Hollman, whose tone, I would remark, is too uniformly powerful, but who is an undoubted artist. It is not necessary further to notice the Concert, except to say that considering the very high prices charged for admission, there was a wonderfully large audience.

Concerts of a somewhat similar character took place in the City Hall and St. Andrew's Hall on two or more Saturday evenings during the month, by Mr. Sims Reeves and party, Madame Patey and party, Madame Georgina Burns, and Mr. J. T. Carrodus and others, the respective entertainments being under the direction of the Abstainers' Union. Mr. W. Nicholl, a native of Glasgow, who is studying in London at present, made a promising début at the Concert of the last-mentioned touring company—that of Madame Burns and Mr. Carrodus.

Miss Agnes Liddell, of Glasgow, a pupil of Signor Visetti, and a really skilful vocalist of mezzo-soprano range, gave a Concert in the Queen's Rooms on the 5th ult. Miss Liddell was assisted by Miss Amy Carter (contralto), Mr. Sinclair Dunn, now of London, formerly of Glasgow, and a tenor vocalist of taste; Mr. Bantock Pierpoint, Mdle. Lippmann (piano), and Herr Gallrein (violoncello). The Concert, as a whole, was good in an executive sense, but a large proportion of the vocal selections were of a trifling or meretricious character.

Away in the far east of our rapidly extending city, a performance of Dr. Stainer's "Daughter of Jairus" was given on the 13th ultimo by the choir of Parkhead Parish Church, under the conductorship of Mr. Robert Buchanan, junr. What is less common, hereabout at least, the tenor and bass were the best voices in the chorus, though the soprano and alto were by no means weak. The choir was commendably well up in the music and precise in attacks and intonation. The solos were satisfactorily rendered, and with the carefully played piano and harmonium accompaniments, by Messrs. James and A. D. Buchanan, the Cantata was altogether remarkably well presented. Organ Recitals are now frequent in Glasgow all over the year, and are chiefly undertaken with the view of clearing off the debt on the instruments, so many of them being but of recent introduction. Mr. J. A. Robertson gave an organ performance, on the 17th ult., in Downhill Church, the more legitimate of the selections being from Mendelssohn, Batiste, and Lefebure-Wély.

To speak of neighbouring places, the Vale of Leven Choral Society is to produce, ere long, Mendelssohn's "As the hart pants," and Macfarren's "May Day," and will give a Handel bi-centenary Concert in the Spring. Study of the Oratorio "Judas Maccabæus" is being actively engaged in by the Dumbarton Choral Union for performance on the 23rd inst. Gounod's sacred Trilogy, "The Redemption" is to be presented by the choir of Linlithgow Abbey Church this month. The Organist, Mr. J. J. Finlay, of Glasgow, has trained a choir of boys for the treble and alto parts in divine praise on Sundays in Cathedral fashion—something notable in a Scottish Presbyterian Church. The choir thus exclusively consisting of males, and increased to sixty voices, will, it is expected, do ample justice to their share of the oratorio. The accompaniments will be organ, harp, trumpets, and trombones. The new Kilpatrick Association, which is under the energetic direction of Mr. J. Thomson, is practising Farmer's Mass in B flat.

Another organ, the second in the denomination, has been introduced in the "Free Church" in Glasgow—viz., by the Westbourne Congregation. Mr. A. Gern, London, is the builder. The inauguration of the new instrument took place on the 18th ult., Mr. A. J. Eyre, of the Crystal Palace, performed, and the Choir sang some sacred pieces under the leadership of Mr. Gallie, Organist of the church.

The Glasgow Tonic Sol-fa Choral Society intends to produce Mr. Mackenzie's new Oratorio "The Rose of Sharon" sometime in the early part of next year.

Brisbane, September, 1884.

THE most remarkable of recent musical events in this distant region have been the two performances of Gounod's sacred Trilogy "The Redemption" by our local Musical Union, on August 7 and September 19 last, in the Albert Hall, the former being the ordinary quarterly Subscription Concert and the latter a complimentary benefit tendered by the members of the Musical Union to their Conductor, Mr. R. T. Jefferies, in special recognition of his services during the past twelve years. The first rendition of "The Redemption" here, which was also the first given in the colony, attracted an enormous audience, there being nearly a thousand persons present, including his Excellency, Sir Anthony Musgrave (the Governor) and Lady Musgrave and suite, and many leading citizens, drawn, not alone by the novelty of the work, but also by its loud-voiced heralding by the English musical press as a production of extraordinary merit and design, calculated to tax the resources of the Union to the utmost. The attendance on the second occasion, though slightly less, was, if possible, more appreciative, and confirmed the profound impression created by Gounod's treatment of so great a subject. The orchestra and voices numbered upwards of a hundred; and considering the difficulties abounding in the composition and its unconventional style, the rendering of the work was in every respect satisfactory, the skill of the Conductor, Mr. Jefferies, materially contributing to this result. The orchestra was excellent in the now famous "March to Calvary," as well as in the various suggestive descriptions of Chaos, Darkness, Earthquake, the Apostles in Prayer, &c., exhibiting in the second Concert the benefit of additional practice. The choruses were given with much precision and effect, especially the Chorus of Passers-by, "Ha! Thou that dost declare," and of Priests, "Can He not"; the elaborate choral pieces, "Saviour of men," "Unfold, ye portals," and the Hymn of the Apostles. The tenor, who undertook the part of Narrator, was clear and distinct, and in the trying recitatives upheld worthily the task allotted to him; and favourable mention may also be made of the gentleman upon whom the duty of Bass Narrator fell. The lady who sang the solo "While my watch I am keeping" did justice to this vocal gem; and the same may be said of the soprano who sang the Recitative "Ye mountains, ye perpetual hills." The instruments were strengthened by piano, organ, and a contingent of unseen brass to give effect to the part of the Prophetic Choir, at the opening of the second part.

Whatever opinions may exist here as to the mode of treatment selected by Gounod for so sacred a theme as the "Redemption," and there is a wide diversity, there is but one opinion in respect to the music pure and simple, unstinted praise being unanimously accorded to the marvellous beauty and power of the music, both vocal and instrumental, raising Gounod, indeed, as a composer, to the highest pinnacle. The musically experienced in our community candidly declare that no such work has before left so marked an impression upon listeners. The success achieved by the Musical Union is mainly due to the untiring energy of its Conductor, Mr. R. T. Jefferies.

Between the two Concerts above-mentioned, Miss Alice Sydney Burvett has given several Piano Recitals at the Town Hall, to fair houses, with much success, her playing being considered by some local critics to be of the highest class. Her programme embraced compositions by Beethoven, Chopin, Thalberg, Gottschalk, and Kowalski. The Brisbane Orchestral Society, now about twelve months old, conducted by Mr. H. J. Pollard, gave a satisfactory Concert during the past month, comprising the usual miscellaneous selection of vocal and instrumental music.

The latest-born Musical Society, the "Liedertafel," commenced by the Rev. E. Spicer, of this city, has passed into the hands of Herr Schmall, after giving one Concert of a promising, but far from note-perfect character. Although a new organisation, it is in point of fact but a repetition of the Old Orpheus Glee Club, which for many years discoursed sweet music in our midst, and then died out of existence.

MUSIC AT DARMSTADT.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

AMONG the many musical entertainments of the season, the Concert of those admirable artists, Madame Norman Néruda and Mr. Charles Hallé, may indeed be called an event of particular interest. In one of Handel's Sonatas, Madame Néruda displayed her executive powers to great advantage, and was rewarded with overwhelming applause, but greater still was the admiration at the highly intellectual manner in which she interpreted it; and the well-known assertion of Hans von Bülow's, that she is the only rival of Joachim, was fully confirmed by the splendid style in which she rendered the various pieces of the programme assigned to her. Mr. Chas. Hallé is a pianist of the good old school. He understands how to give every composition its true reading, and his playing, both with regard to brilliancy of execution and depth of poetic feeling, was thoroughly appreciated.

The last Concert of the "Musikverein," under the able direction of Herr Hofmusik-director C. Mangold, contained an exceptionally fine performance of Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri." The unfaded glow of oriental colouring and the melodious solo-parts, which were in excellent hands, left a lasting impression on the audience.

In a Concert of the Grossherzogliche Hof-Musik, which consisted of Schumann's Symphony in D minor, and some orchestral pieces of less importance, Mr. Mackenzie's orchestral ballad, "La belle dame sans merci," was one of the most interesting features. In this splendid work the composer displays unusual skill in the instrumentation, the various combinations being at once striking and highly original. It met with a very warm reception, and will surely make its way in the Concert rooms of Germany.

The last Concert of the Quartettverein included Haydn's Quartet in B major, the lovely Adagio and sprightly Finale in which gave infinitely greater satisfaction than Brahms's Sextet for stringed instruments in B major, a work which, on account of its heaviness and unclear forms, does not find many admirers.

There was a highly interesting programme at the second Concert of the Grossherzogliche Hof-Musik, the orchestral numbers being the Allegro and Adagio of the unfinished Symphony in B minor, by Schubert; the Vorspiel to "Parsifal," by R. Wagner, and Beethoven's Symphony in A major. The soloists of the evening, Fräulein Martha Remmert, gave unequivocal proofs of her high powers as a pianist in Weber's Polonaise, with orchestral accompaniment, and in Liszt's Fantaisie Hongroise.

The last novelty at the opera was Nessler's "Trompeter von Säckingen," which proved a complete success, not, however, on account of the music, which, on the whole, is trivial and wanting in originality, but rather owing to the libretto, which is founded on Scheffel's splendid poem of the same title, and the really magnificent mise-en-scène.

THE opening address delivered by Sir Herbert Oakeley, on the 4th ult., before the Edinburgh Association for the Education of Women, at the Music Class-room of the University, was so eloquent in its advocacy of the higher claims of music upon the attention of lady students, that we regret the impossibility of transferring a portion of his discourse to our columns. We may say, however, that the lecturer announced his intention of beginning at the rudiments of musical theory and proceeding "step by step to explain the chief chords in use." We congratulate the pupils upon having secured the services of so earnest and able a teacher.

IN connection with the approaching bi-centenary of Handel's birth, Mr. F. G. Edwards delivered his popular Concert-Lecture, "Glimpses into the Life and Character of Handel," at the Union Church, Putney, on the 13th ult. The musical illustrations comprised airs from Handel's oratorios; the so-called Largo, arranged for the violin; the slow movement from the Fourth Organ Concerto; and selections from the Water Music (Pianoforte). A large portrait of Handel, several fac-simile specimens of his handwriting, (including the fac-simile MS. of the "Messiah," kindly lent by Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co.) were on view. There was a large audience.

THE first Vocal and Instrumental Concert of the North London Musical Society, was given at the Assembly Rooms, Stoke Newington, on Thursday, the 6th ult., before a large audience. The programme, which was selected from the works of Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Haydn, Gounod, Spohr, Schumann, &c., was rendered in a most satisfactory manner. The choir sang several pieces very ably, including Schumann's "Gipsy Life," and a Serenade "All go to rest," from the opera "The Golden Age," by Herr Heinrich Kreuz, the Musical Director of the Society.

THE Rev. Sir F. A. Gore Ouseley, professor of music in the University of Oxford, presented, on the 14th ult., in the Manchester Town Hall, the certificates awarded in the recent examinations in connection with the Society of Professional Musicians. In an address which he delivered on English music, Sir F. Ouseley said the tendency to imitate and copy foreign models was one of the principal difficulties which English musical art had had to encounter at almost every stage of its progress, and in the days of Handel it was developed to a most pernicious extent. What he desired was the formation of a real and genuine English school of musical art, and it would be indeed a glorious jewel in the crown of that Society if they could overcome this unpatriotic habit of servilely copying the composers of other countries, and thus foster national art by united action, by determined resistance to the demands of bad taste, and by wise organisation and suppression of all personal jealousies. We are glad to find eminent musicians like the Oxford Professor calling attention to the important subject of the future of English music; for, as he truly said, "probably at no previous time have there been greater facilities for its healthy growth." The members of the Society of Professional Musicians are evidently desirous of materially aiding what may now be termed a national movement; and it is the duty, therefore, of all earnest artists to encourage and sympathise with their efforts in the cause.

THE first Examination for the degree of Bachelor in Music at the University of Oxford will commence on Tuesday, January 27, 1885, at ten o'clock, in the Schools. Attention is directed to the following clause of the Statute (Statt. Univ., Tit. VI. Sect. III. § 1) relating to this Examination:—"Nemini sese examinandum sistere liceat, nisi qui aut Magistris Scholarum aut Examinatoribus in prævia quam vocant examinatione in Universitate Cantabrigiensi satisfecerit, aut testimonium a Delegatis secundum Statutum Tit. VIII. Sect. II. § 2, creatis acceperit, aut Examinatoribus seniorum candidatorum qui non sunt de corpore Universitatis in literis Anglicis in Mathematica in lingua Latina et vel in lingua Græca vel in una saltem lingua moderna (videlicet Gallica vel Germanica vel Italica) satisfecerit: cujus rei testimonium exhibeat Professore Musicæ." The names of gentlemen who intend to present themselves will be received by Mr. Geo. Parker, the Clerk of the Schools, on or before Tuesday, January 20, 1885, on payment of the statutable fee of £2. Candidates who are not already Members of the University must Matriculate before the day of Examination. Subjects of Examination: Harmony and Counterpoint, in not more than four parts. Text-books: Ouseley's "Treatise on Harmony," and his "Treatise on Counterpoint, Canon, and Fugue."

THE first performance in London of Mr. C. H. Lloyd's Cantata "Hero and Leander," took place at the Athenæum, Camden Road, N., on Tuesday evening, the 11th ult., under the direction of Mr. W. Henry Thomas. The soloists being Miss Marianne Fenna and Mr. Bridson, who were highly successful in the impassioned duet "Thou lovest me." The choruses were sung by the Tufnell Park Choral Society with much expression, the nuances in the epilogue, one of the best numbers of the work, being especially noticeable. Mr. Eaton Fanning's part-song "The Miller's Wooing" gave the choir an opportunity for vigorous singing, and a selection from "Acis and Galatea" showed that they could sing also with steadiness and precision. Miss Kate Fusselle, Miss Daisy Bayley and Mr. Fulkerson contributed solos, the first-named lady singing "O had I Jubal's lyre" in a very artistic manner. At the second Concert, on the 16th inst., "Hero and Leander" will be repeated, and Beethoven's "Engedi" will be given with orchestral accompaniments.

THE Birmingham Festival Committee have accepted a short work by Dr. Bridge for their next meeting. The composition is a setting of Toplady's hymn "Rock of Ages" for baritone solo, chorus and orchestra. The Latin version of the Hymn is by Mr. Gladstone, to whom it is dedicated, by permission, and who "cordially wishes success to the work." The English words are also fitted to the music, but the Latin version will be given at Birmingham, Mr. Santley taking the solo.

DR. SPARK, the Organist of Leeds Town Hall, has given a series of Musical Lectures and Organ Recitals in Scotland during the past month with much success. On the 3rd ult., he gave the inaugural lecture at the Mechanics' Institute, Dumfries, the subject being "English Opera"; on the 4th he was at Galashiels, lecturing on the "Classical Masters"; on the 5th at Ayr, on "The National Ballad Music of England, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales"; on the 6th at Rothsay, on "Ballad Music"; and on the evening of the 7th he gave an Organ Recital in the new Public Hall in Stirling. To illustrate his lectures efficiently, Dr. Spark brought with him four admirable Yorkshire vocalists—Madame Evison, Miss E. Kennedy, Mr. Farrer Briggs, and Mr. G. Dodds.

THE usual Monthly Concert of the St. George's Glee Union was held at the Pimlico Rooms, on the 7th ult. The chief feature in the programme was J. B. Van Bree's Cantata "St. Cecilia's Day." The solos were ably taken by Madame Wilson Osman, and the choruses were well sung by the choir. The glee, for male voices, "Hohenlinden" (Dr. T. Cooke), was particularly well sung. The other part-songs were "Now tramp o'er moss and fell" (Bishop), and "Awake! the starry midnight hour" (Mendelssohn). In the first part of the Concert songs were contributed by Madame Wilson Osman, Miss Alice Grey, Mr. A. M. Shepherd, and Mr. Thurlby Beale. Mrs. Edmonds and Mr. F. R. Kinke presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. Joseph Monday conducted.

THE sudden closing of Her Majesty's Theatre, after three or four performances of Italian Opera, absolves us from dealing critically with the rendering of the works presented. If Mr. Samuel Hayes be sincere in his desire to restore the prestige of a form of art of late somewhat discredited, he went about his task in the strangest possible manner. Three or four capable artists do not constitute an opera company, and the public now-a-days is somewhat exigent in the matters of orchestra, chorus, and scenic arrangements. We firmly believe that careful performances of opera in any language and at reasonable prices would meet with adequate support; but it cannot be said that Mr. Hayes met any of the conditions of success.

DURING the past month some very successful Popular Chamber Concerts have been given at the Highgate Literary and Scientific Institution, under the direction of Mr. Gilbert H. Betjemann. The music performed has been of a high-class character and excellently rendered by Messrs. G. H. Betjemann, Lewis Hann, C. W. Doyle, Charles Ould, G. R. Betjemann, J. Booth, Ebenezer Prout, and Charles S. Macpherson. Mr. G. H. Betjemann introduced violin solos at each Concert, and Mr. Ould also contributed cello solos. The solo vocalists were Miss Alexandra Ehrenberg, Madame Rose Hersee, and Miss Ada Doyle. Accompanists, Mr. G. R. Betjemann and Mr. C. H. Ould.

THE members of the Wood Green Choral Society gave their first Concert on Thursday evening the 20th ult., at the Masonic Hall, Wood Green. F. Cowen's Cantata "The Rose Maiden" formed the first part of the programme, the solos being well rendered by Miss Kate Coldrey, Miss Amy Sargent, Mr. W. Glazier, and Mr. Joseph Wilson. The choruses were given with much vigour and precision. The second part consisted of a miscellaneous selection, the above named vocalists, with the addition of Miss Elfrida Roberts and Miss Jessie Dinsdale being the soloists, Mr. A. J. Hadrill ably presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. Plant Coldrey conducted.

UNDER the direction of Fraülein Anna Vogt (Mrs. Henry Clark), a Concert by the students of the London Organ School and International College of Music was given at Princes' Hall, Piccadilly, on Tuesday evening, the 4th ult. Results highly creditable to the College were displayed by the pupils. Miss Alice Seymour, Monsieur J. A. Anschütz, and Signor Luigi Meo also assisted.

THE Schumann Society of Detroit, Mich., U.S., will give its first grand Concert of the season on the 6th inst., assisted by foreign artists and local talent. Two other Concerts will take place before next summer, the full orchestral accompaniment being a great attraction. Mr. J. de Zielinski ably directs the chorus and orchestra.

At the Harvest Festival at St. John's Church, Bethnal Green, on October 30, there was an orchestra of 29 performers, in addition to the Organ. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were Stainer in F, the anthem "I will give thanks," (Barnby) and "The heavens are telling" (Creation) The voluntaries before and after service were "Marche Romaine" (Gounod) and "Cornelius" March (Mendelssohn) for orchestra and organ. Mr. Henry J. Baker, Organist and Choirmaster of St. Michael Bowes, Southgate, presided at the organ, and Mr. W. H. Ward, Organist of the church, conducted.

The Monthly Organ Recital, at St. John's the Evangelist, Waterloo Road, was given on Tuesday, the 11th ult., by Mr. James Higgs, Mus. Bac., Oxon., Organist of St. Andrew's, Holborn. The programme included Handel's Overture to "Esther," Bach's G minor Fugue, Mendelssohn's Sonata in B flat (No. 4), a Larghetto for the organ, by Dr. F. E. Gladstone, Köhler's well-known Andante and Variations, and the Overture to Spohr's "Last Judgment." Mr. Higgs's playing was marked by great breadth of style. The vocalists were Miss Sussetta Fenn and Mr. Sinclair Dunn.

The Apollo Musical Club, Chicago, announces three Concerts, under the direction of Mr. William L. Tomlins, for the season of 1884-5. At the first, Rossini's "Stabat Mater" and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise"—with Miss Emma Juch, Miss Emily Winant, Mr. Whitney Mockridge, Mr. Clarence E. Hay and Mr. Clarence Eddy as soloists—will be performed; at the second, Max Bruch's "Frithjof" and miscellaneous selections for male voices, including the Prize Songs composed for the Apollo Musical Club; and at the third, Mendelssohn's "Elijah." The season commences on the 11th inst.

A PERFORMANCE of Mendelssohn's "Antigone" was given on October 28 at the Walworth Institution, under the direction of Mr. W. J. S. Gadsby. The choruses were capitally sung by a choir of about twenty-five, the "Hymn to Bacchus" especially being given with great spirit and energy. Miss Ada Mellon was very successful in her delivery of Antigone's lines, and met with great favour at the hands of the audience. Besides conducting the choral portions of the work, Mr. Gadsby recited the part of Creon, and the remaining six characters were capably rendered. Mr. W. W. Hedgcock accompanied.

A PRIVATE Invitation Concert, inaugurating the reopening of Brixton Hall, was given by the proprietor, Mr. R. J. Chard, on Tuesday evening, the 18th ult. The vocalists were Miss Margaret Cockburn, Miss Spenser Jones, Mr. Edward Dalzell, and Mr. James Budd. Instrumental selections were played by the band of the Grenadier Guards, under the conductorship of Mr. Dan Godfrey. Mr. Turle Lee accompanied. In addition to other important improvements, a large organ, by Messrs. Gray and Davison, is in course of erection.

MADAME EVANS-WARWICK gave an evening Concert on October 30, at Ladbroke Hall, assisted by Miss José Sherrington, Madame Adeline Paget, Madame Vera (pupil of Madame Evans-Warwick) Madame Gwynne, Mr. Reginald Groome, Mr. Herbert Jay, and Mr. Egbert Roberts. Solo pianists, Herr George Asch and Mr. Archie Evans; violin, Mr. Basil Althaus; Conductors, Mr. Charles Evans and Mr. Edward Holmes. Madame Evans-Warwick also gave a Concert at the Royal Victoria Coffee Hall on the 6th ult.

The first Concert of the eighth season of the Lavender Hill Choral Society was given on the 18th ult. The chief feature in the programme was Anderton's Cantata the "Wreck of the Hesperus," in which both solos and choruses were very well rendered, the former being taken by Miss Jessie Ross, Mr. W. Dyffryn and Mr. C. Ortnor. Miss Edith Aloof, Miss Wallis, and Miss Stammers also contributed to the programme. Mr. J. R. Jekyll conducted, and Miss Minnie Bird accompanied.

The first volume of "Pitman's Musical Monthly," which has just been forwarded to us, handsomely bound, contains a good collection of popular vocal and instrumental music, with criticisms upon passing events both in town and country. The work is well got up and deserving of support.

THE Free Concerts at Whitefield's Tabernacle, Tottenham Court Road, have been resumed during the past two months, and the building has been filled to its utmost capacity on each occasion. The programmes are of a popular character, and consist of vocal solos, interspersed with solos for violin, organ, and pianoforte, artists well known in the musical profession being engaged on each evening. The Concerts, which will be carried on through the winter months, are under the direction of the Organist, Mr. Arthur Dorey.

THE prospectus of the Finsbury Choral Association, under the conductorship of Mr. C. J. Dale, has been forwarded to us too late for notice of the inaugural Conversazione, at which several artists of eminence assisted. The first Concert was announced to take place on the 27th ult., at Holloway Hall, and the two remaining ones of the session on February 12 and March 26, 1885. The vocalists already engaged are Miss Marianne Fenna, Miss Fusselle, Miss Eliza Thomas, Mr. Arthur Thompson, Mr. Redfern Hollins, Mr. Hilton, and Mr. Bridson.

A CONCERT of Sacred Music was given at Lower Tooting Union Church, under the direction of Mr. James H. Weager, on Thursday, October 30. The principal vocalists were Miss Clara Marni, R.A.M., and Miss Wollaston, both of whom were highly effective in the solos allotted to them. Miss Fleishman contributed a violin solo; and duets for pianoforte and American organ were played by Mrs. Weager and Mr. C. J. Viner. The choral portion of the programme was rendered by members of the Borough of Hackney Choral Association.

THE members of the Grosvenor Choral Society gave their 153rd Monthly Concert at the Grosvenor Hall, on Friday, the 21st ult. The programme consisted of a good miscellaneous selection. The solo vocalists were Miss Kate Winifred Payne, R.A.M., Madame Alice Woodruffe, Mrs. Isabel Browning, Miss Minna Graham, Mr. Hirwen Jones, and Mr. Arthur Roach. Mr. H. C. Tonkin played two violin solos with much success. Mrs. T. P. Frame accompanied and Mr. David Woodhouse conducted with their usual ability.

THE Rev. J. Thomas, M.A., who died at his residence in Huddersfield, on October 25, was well known by professional and amateur musicians in the North of England. He was the founder of the Fitzwilliam Street Philharmonic Society; and took much interest in the cultivation of music in Sunday Schools. He was also an excellent musician, and a good violin player, taking a leading part in Chamber and Orchestral Concerts, and composing and arranging for local bands and Festivals. His loss is deeply felt by a large circle of friends.

THE Kyrle Choir gave a performance of the "Creation," on the 6th ult., in St. Clement's Church, Notting Hill. The principal vocalists were Miss Annie Selous, Mr. John Probert, and Mr. James Blackney. The Choir gave a second performance of the Oratorio in St. Bride's, Fleet Street, on the 19th ult., the soloists being Miss Edith Phillips, Mr. Reginald Groome, and Mr. Albert Orme. Mr. Malcolm Lawson conducted, and Mr. E. H. Turpin accompanied on the organ on both occasions.

AN Organ Recital was given at St. Saviour's, South Hampstead, on the 12th ult., by Mr. Arthur J. Greenish, F.C.O., in aid of the Organ Restoration and Church Repair Fund. The programme included the following interesting selection:—Occasional Overture (Handel); Andante con Moto (Haydn); Allegro Pomposo (Smart); Cavatina (Raffi); Toccata and Fugue, D minor (J. S. Bach); Romanza in G (Beethoven); Fanfare (Lemmens); Marche Religieuse (Chauvet); Offertoire (Batiuste).

MISS FLORENCE WYDFORD'S Annual Concert took place at the Horns Assembly Rooms, on the 13th ult., and proved very successful. Miss Wydford was assisted by Miss Agnes Larkcom, Mrs. M. Clark, Mr. Thurley Beale, Mr. Cannon, and Mr. Bayne. Mr. Merton Clark was an efficient accompanist.

SPOHR'S "Last Judgment" will be sung at St. John's Church, Waterloo Road, on the three Thursdays of Advent (the 4th, 11th, and 18th inst.), after shortened Evensong, at eight p.m.

A VERY successful Concert was given by the North London High School for Boys, at the Hampstead Vestry Hall, on the 14th ult., when Edmund Rogers's humorous Cantata "Beauty and the Beast" was performed by the Orchestral Band and Chorus of the school, numbering over one hundred performers. The artists engaged were Misses Edith Welding and Marie Hayward; Mr. A. S. Pardon and Herr Conrad Formes. Mr. Septimus Payne, the Head Master, conducted.

THE Ballad Concert given in the Royal Victoria Coffee Hall, Waterloo Road, on the 20th ult., under the direction of Miss Clara Wollaston, was a decided success. The vocalists were Madame Clara West, Miss C. Wollaston, Miss Lottie West, Mr. Arthur Weston, Mr. James Bayne, and Mr. G. A. Pritchard; solo violinist, Miss Colvina Waite; solo pianist, Mr. W. West; accompanists, Messrs. Pritchard and West.

THE Civil Service Vocal Union's first Smoking Concert of the season was held at the Freemasons' Tavern on Thursday evening, the 20th ult. The programme comprised some well rendered part-music, and solos were successfully sung by Messrs. Schartau, A. E. Twiss, C. Chilley, and A. B. Eady. Flute solos were played by Mr. C. Spencer West, and Mr. J. H. Maunder conducted.

WE regret to announce the death of Mr. Joseph Skeaf, a well-known professor of music in Liverpool, which took place on the 1st ult. Mr. Skeaf has had several pupils who have obtained high honours, and was recognised as an able and earnest teacher. He held the post of Organist for many years in the New Jerusalem Church, Bedford Street, and his name will be long remembered in connection with the Saturday Evening Concerts.

THE prospectus of the Luton Choral Society (Conductor, Mr. Charles Inwards) announces for its eighteenth season (1884-5) three Concerts, commencing on the 15th inst. The works selected for performance are Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," Haydn's "Creation," and Handel's "Messiah." Special efforts will be made by the Society to give an efficient rendering to the last-named Oratorio, in honour of the bicentenary of the composer's birth.

ON the 20th ult. Gaul's Cantata "Ruth" was given in the Trinity Presbyterian Church, Maryland Point, Stratford, by the choir, assisted by a few friends. The soloists were Miss Lines, Miss Amy Egerton, and Mr. Laird Donald; Miss Kendall and Mr. H. A. Donald presiding at the pianoforte and organ respectively. Mr. H. T. Minter was the Conductor.

A CONCERT was given on Tuesday evening, the 4th ult., in the Pentonville Road Congregational Church. The vocalists were Miss Rees, Miss M. L. Evans, Miss Ellen Chapman, Mr. W. A. Ashton, and Mr. Dyved Lewis. Organ solos were given by Mr. Closs, and Mr. Marsh contributed a violin solo. The pianoforte solos by Miss Josephine Agabeg were received with rapturous applause.

THE Weekly Organ Recitals at the Church of St. Nicholas, Cole Abbey, Queen Victoria Street, have been given during the past month as follows: On the 11th ult., by Mr. W. H. Stocks (Enfield); on the 18th (in lieu of the 4th, when the organ was unplayable), by Mr. C. E. Miller; and on the 25th, by Mr. James Hallé. They will be continued during the present month, at one p.m., on Tuesdays.

THE third of the series of popular entertainments, at the Kentish Town Institute, took place on the 11th ult. The vocalists were Miss Minnie Oliver, Miss L. Wicks, Mr. Edwyn Bishop, and Mr. F. Pawley. Miss Jessie Taylor contributed a pleasing pianoforte solo of her own composition, and Mr. A. C. Schäfer ably filled the post of accompanist throughout.

DR. GLADSTONE'S Oratorio "Philippi" will be performed by the Gloucester Choral Society on the 9th inst. The work will be given with full orchestral accompaniments, the band and chorus numbering 200, and will be conducted by the composer.

SPOHR'S Last Judgment will be sung at St. Paul's Cathedral on Tuesday evening the 2nd inst. The service commences at seven.

A HIGHLY successful Concert was given at the Town Hall, Bermondsey, by the Popular Ballad Concerts Committee, on Monday evening, the 24th ult. The band of the Grenadier Guards performed several selections under Mr. Dan Godfrey, and the vocalists were Madame Hirleman, Miss Eleanor Rees, Messrs. Tapley, Evans and Rousbey. Mr. W. Henry Thomas was, as usual, the Conductor.

A SPECIAL Service will be held in St. Margaret's Church, Westminster, on the 4th inst., at 7.30. Dr. Bridge's "Hymn to the Creator" will be performed with string band and augmented choir. Dr. Gladstone will conduct. At the end of the Service Dr. Bridge will play one of Handel's Organ Concertos.

IN consequence of the Christmas holidays, it will be necessary for us to print the January number some days earlier than usual. All matter and advertisements intended for insertion in this number should, therefore, reach the office on or before the 20th inst.

IT is said that a legacy of 6,000,000 roubles has been bequeathed to the pianist, Madame Menter, by the Russian millionaire, Baron de Stieglitz.

REVIEWS.

Notes on the Cultivation of Choral Music and the Oratorio Society of New York. By H. E. Krehbiel.
[New York: Edward Schuberth and Co.]

IN the October number of the MUSICAL TIMES we alluded, in an "Occasional Note," to this book quoting the remark that "one hundred and fourteen years ago there was not in all musical Europe a single amateur Choral Society," and also the highly complimentary allusion to the state of Choral Music in the manufacturing towns of England. The work is now before us; and although no doubt it possesses very decided local interest, so admirably is it written, and so exhaustively has the author treated his subject, that we have little doubt of the wide acceptance of the Treatise outside the musical cities of America, and more especially in that the musical cultivation of which Mr. Krehbiel so warmly and so justly extols. In his Preface the author truly says, "The singing Societies of Germany, by their diffusion of knowledge concerning the masterpieces of choral composition, and their nurture of a warm interest in music, were, beyond question, the most potent of the factors employed in the work of lifting that country to the eminence which it now occupies in music. The composers of the Viennese School of the eighteenth century wrested the supremacy from Italy by the virtue that lay in the freshness, vigour, and richness of their creations; these creations became the models for the succeeding generations, and the composers became the musical lawgivers; but for the cultivation of the national musical spirit which established the conservatoires, orchestras, and choirs in which artists were educated in a manner that enabled them to maintain its proud supremacy, Germany rested, in a great measure, upon the impulse which went out from the crowning achievement of Fasch, the accompanist at the Court of Frederick the Great, of Prussia. To-day there are in the country that gave birth to this movement three hundred cities and towns with singing societies and orchestras engaged in performing the best music written." It must be remembered that Fasch was the founder of the Singakademie, and we quite agree with Mr. Krehbiel's assertion that this institution "has remained a model for all singing societies up to the present time." Tracing the progress of the several choral associations in New York which preceded the birth of the "Oratorio Society," many acute remarks are made concerning the causes which led to their dissolution. No doubt a review of these failures has been of inestimable service in laying the foundation of the Society which has done so much to promote a love for sacred music in America; and we quote the final sentence of the work before us in proof, not only of the high position the Society has attained, but of the effect of its example in other musical centres: "If, as Goethe says, it is the curse of a wicked deed that it must go on giving birth to new wickednesses, it is also the blessing of a virtuous act that many virtues follow in its train. The measure of merit due to the Oratorio Society is not full when the record of its direct accomplishment is written—there remain the products of its influence. Mr. Thomas's Chorus Society can fairly be counted amongst its fruits, and it has either stimulated to new life or caused the organization of a number of societies in Newark, Jersey City, Nyack, Rochester, and other places." Mr. Krehbiel (who is, we believe, musical critic of the New York Tribune) has done good service by the publication of this book; and we commend it to the attention of all who take interest in the healthy progress of choral music.

The name of Herr Draeseke is one which has not yet made its way in England, though the composer is by no means a young man, having been born in 1835 at Coburg. We are not in a position to give much information about him, as the biographical notices to which we have access are very scanty. We learn from Mendel's "Conversations-Lexicon" that he was educated at the Conservatoire in Leipzig, whence he went to Weimar, where he became intimate with Liszt and his pupils, especially Hans von Bülow. The article from which we obtain our information speaks of him as a "talented but highly eccentric composer," and sums up its notice by stating that the great fault of his works are diffuseness and irregularity of form, concluding with the expression of the hope that when the composer has passed through the period of youthful exuberance he may produce something more important and more valuable.

It is impossible to pronounce a final opinion upon any work so elaborate in character as the "Requiem" now before us from a mere reading of the vocal score, especially as the accompaniment contains no indications of the instrumentation. Besides this, it must be remembered that in nearly all modern music many passages will be found, of which the most experienced musician can hardly realise the full effect without hearing them, to say nothing of the well-known fact that many things sound better than they look on paper. Our remarks on Herr Draeseke's work must therefore be taken with a certain amount of reserve. Still, there are leading characteristics of the music about which it is hardly possible to be greatly mistaken. Foremost among these are the vagueness and irregularity of the forms, and the undecided tonality. For example, the opening movement commences with a "ground bass" of five bars in length, first given out by the basses alone, after which the solo voices enter in succession. This would be an intelligible enough way of beginning but for the fact that the ground bass itself cannot be said to be in any key. It certainly commences and ends in B minor; but an A natural and a C natural, which are foreign to that key, are introduced in such a manner as to disturb all the feeling of tonality, and in the first three pages of the movement there are hardly two consecutive bars in the same key. Again, while there are several movements in the work, which are obviously intended as fugues, there is not a single one of these in which the subject receives its correct answer. This probably results from the fact that the subjects themselves are too vague to convey a distinct impression of either a tonic or dominant key. Take, for instance, the theme of the "Kyrie"—

It would be difficult to say whether this is meant to be in B minor or in D major; from the fact that the answer commences on B, we presume the former, though then the A natural is out of the key; but if it is in B minor, the C sharp at the end of the second bar should be answered by G sharp, whereas we find G natural. Another explanation may of course be that the subject is in the old Æolian mode; but if this view be taken, the answer is still incorrect, and the subject unsatisfactory from its vagueness. The same unclearness of form characterises to a greater or less extent the whole work. Strained, harsh, and positively ugly modulations are of constant occurrence, and we honestly confess that we have seldom examined a new composition with more regret and even irritation at misapplied and wasted talent. That the work is clever we do not deny; occasionally Herr Draeseke has natural and even pleasing ideas; but the constant effort to be new, at whatever cost, makes the music most unpleasant to listen to. It is of course possible, perhaps even probable, that many things would sound less harsh when the dissonances were allotted to different qualities of orchestral tone than when they are played on the piano; and, as we have already said, we give our opinion of the work with some reserve. We see that the "Requiem" is announced to be given in London during the present season by the London Musical Society, and shall be very glad if the performance shall cause us to modify the unfavourable view of the music which we have derived from its perusal.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE prospectus of these Primers of Musical Biography tells us how the series of papers in THE MUSICAL TIMES, originally entitled "The Great Composers, sketched by themselves," grew under the hand of their author until they became complete biographies, and that the favour with which they were received led to their publication in a separate form, several additions being made to those written under the early title. In their present shape they will certainly prove highly valuable to the musical student, as well as to the many who desire to know something of the character of those who have by their compositions so thoroughly won their sympathy. The life of Rossini traces the composer's career with remarkable minuteness, considering the space at the disposal of the author, several extracts from the musical journals of the time materially aiding the interest of the narrative. Many of the anecdotes scattered throughout the volume are extremely good, the following, even if not true, being sufficiently characteristic of Rossini's sang froid to be quoted: "On one occasion, as the Monarch (George IV.) and Rossini were engaged in singing a buffo duet, the august bass stopped, exclaiming that he was wrong in the time. 'Sire,' answered the composer, 'you have the right to do what you please. Go on; I will follow you, even to the tomb.' Go on they did, the royal performer at his sweet will, the other in courtly attendance."

Ye Gallant Men of England. Four-part Song.

The Moorland Witch. Four-part Song.

Poetry by Edwin Waugh. Composed by Edward Hecht.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THESE two compositions (published in the second series of "Novello's Part-Song Book") are favourable examples of Mr. Hecht's style, and will form welcome additions to the répertoire of Choral Societies. The first has an appropriately bold theme, most artistically harmonised, and with some effective changes of key. The very quaint words of the second song have received a truly sympathetic setting. The alternations between 2-4 and 6-8 rhythms are extremely happy, and a characteristic use is made of the "chord of the thirteenth," where the phrase closes in the major key. There are many good points in this well-considered vocal piece which will fully repay careful practice.

Te Deum and Benedictus in F. By Charles L. Williams.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE organist of Gloucester Cathedral states that in this Service he has made use of the ancient plain song of the Church. This is true; but only in a limited sense. Some passages have a pleasantly archaic character, but the greater part of the music is essentially modern, more particularly in certain very abrupt transitions of key. In this respect the "Benedictus" is more advanced than the "Te Deum," but we prefer the latter to the former, as containing the most striking points. Mention may be made of the treatment of the words "The sharpness of death," and "in glory everlasting," as two out of several effective episodes. Though the voices are occasionally divided into eight parts, the counterpoint is for the most part note against note, and the Service is neither too difficult nor too elaborate for ordinary use.

Præludium und Fuge für zwei Pianoforte. Sonata in D minor for the Organ. By W. Battison Haynes. [Leipzig: F. Kistner. London: Novello, Ewer & Co.]

THE composer of these works is not the talented organist of the Priory Church at Malvern, but a nephew of the same, who, we believe, has studied at Leipzig. A sound musical training in Germany generally leaves its impress on young musicians, and Mr. Haynes is no exception to the rule. The Prelude and Fugue for pianoforte is numbered Op. 6, and the work bears internal evidence of the composer's knowledge of, and admiration for, the music of Brahms. The key is E flat, and the prelude is a movement in condensed sonata form, the bold and dignified first subject, which is elaborated at some length, contrasting effectively with the suave and melodious second theme. There is no working out, and the end is quickly reached after the return of the second subject in the tonic key. The fugue subject, in 6-8 time, does not promise well, and the development is not marked by any noteworthy display of scientific device, but as abstract music it is effective, particularly the peroration. The Organ Sonata, Op. 11, is a work of even greater promise. It opens with a solemn largo based upon the principal subject of the succeeding allegro risoluto. This movement is worked out at considerable length and with much energy and breadth of style, the form being strictly symphonic. When its stormy course has been run we have an andante cantabile in B flat, 6-8 time, in welcome contrast, this portion of the work being written with considerable melodic charm and grace. The next section is a scherzo, in G minor, 3-4 time. The term scherzo applied to any music for the king of instruments may seem inappropriate, but Mr. Haynes's example is vigorous rather than light and playful, and though it shows a good deal of orchestral feeling it cannot be said to be unsuited to the organ. In form it is again strictly orthodox, the trio or intermezzo being in E flat, poco meno mosso. The finale is a lengthy fugue based on a simple and well marked subject, and elaborated with as much contrapuntal skill as knowledge of musical effect. The coda is especially striking and worthily closes a work which we may, without hesitation, describe as a very important addition to the repertory of the first-class organist. We say first class advisedly, for Mr. Haynes does not spare his executant, many of the passages, both for manuals and pedal, being of considerable difficulty. Marks of expression are given, but the registering is left to the taste and fancy of the player, as in Mendelssohn's organ works. Mr. Haynes is undoubtedly a composer of great promise, and further essays from his pen will be looked for with interest.

Holiday Songs. Written by Mrs. Alexander; and set to Music by Lady Arthur Hill. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

AMONGST the juvenile Christmas lyrical offerings so temptingly appealing to the many parents and guardians whose hearts and purses are open to holiday influences, the elegant volume before us must take high rank, not only on account of the charmingly melodious, yet unpretending, music contributed by a composer whose vocal pieces have already secured her a cordial welcome, but because of the pure and simple poetry to which it is set. If from the twelve songs contained in the book we especially mention "All things bright and beautiful," "An early Cowslip," "Dreams," "At Sunset," "The Seasons," "Longings," and "In the Distance" (adapted from Lady Hill's popular ballad "In the gloaming"), it is simply that we claim the right, as reviewers, to name our especial favourites; but we are perfectly ready to have our judgment overruled by a nursery jury, freely admitting as we do, that the work is a little casket of gems. Something, too, must be said in praise of the artistic manner in which the songs are treated, both in the harmonies and accompaniments; for we hold the faith that good music should be sought for in small as well as in large compositions, and that "Holiday Songs," therefore, ought to live long after the holidays are over, and even be looked back to with pleasure in after years. The work, which is dedicated, by permission, to Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales, has a Title-page and Frontispiece beautifully illustrated in colours, both appropriately representing child-life amidst lovely and sympathetic country surroundings.

Novello, Ewer and Co.'s Music Primers. Edited by Dr. Stainer.

Double Scales, systematically fingered. A supplement to all existing Pianoforte Schools. By Franklin Taylor. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS new number of Novello's "Music Primers" is designed to set at rest the question of fingering double scales, upon which subject, unfortunately, such a diversity of opinion at present exists. Mr. Franklin Taylor is doubtless a high authority; but as he admits that no two teachers agree entirely on the method to be adopted, we fear that he will find it extremely difficult to establish the system he here advocates. Unquestionably a uniformity of fingering is most desirable; but considering that even the scale of C in thirds, where no black key intervenes, is fingered differently by various masters of technique, it is scarcely likely that any definite system for all the scales will receive universal acceptance. Mr. Taylor bases his system upon the proposition that "since the right and left hands are the exact counterparts of each other, but reversed, so the fingering which is good for one hand must be good for the other, but in the reverse direction, the right hand executing ascending that which the left hand executes descending, and vice versa." This idea is well and conscientiously worked out, and we feel convinced that so thoughtful a book will receive that attention from the profession which it undoubtedly deserves.

Children's Voices. A Book of Simple Songs. Set to music by Robert B. Addison. Illustrated by Harriet M. Bennett. [London: Hildesheimer and Faulkner.]

AS the season is approaching when "Children's Voices" will claim the right to be heard, this book may be cordially recommended as an excellent vehicle for their utterance, both music and poetry being precisely what we should choose as a Christmas present for juvenile songsters. We have before spoken in high terms of the more important compositions of Mr. Addison, and have now much pleasure in bearing testimony to the excessive merit of his more unpretending work; for every song in this elegant little volume, although simple, as such nursery ditties should be, is touched with an artistic hand, and will please the musical, as well as the unmusical, listener. The illustrations are exquisite throughout; and the general plan of the book does the utmost credit to all concerned in its arrangement.

Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis in B flat. By F. W. Saville. [Weekes and Co.]

THE gift of melody exceeds in value all other natural musical endowments, and Mr. Saville evidently possesses it. This Service is characterised by a flow of tune, and the harmonies sometimes remind one of Spohr. He is too fond of chromatic passing notes, and in some places the dignity of style which should pervade church music is scarcely maintained. On the whole, however, the merits of this setting outweigh the defects, and with congregations it would certainly be popular.

FOREIGN NOTES.

AT Cologne the first of the famous Gürzenich-Concerts—so called from the locality in which they are held—of the present season took place on October 28 under the direction of Dr. Wüllner, the successor of Dr. Ferdinand Hiller as principal of the Cologne conservatorium, and also as Conductor of the Concert institution in question. Under the new régime a complete change is likely to be effected in the general character of these Concerts. Dr. Hiller, by virtue of his great and undisputed merits as a musician, has exercised for many years past something very like a dictatorship in matters musical in the Rhenish Cathedral town, whose inhabitants were fain to submit to his personal likes and dislikes in the Concert-room. Wagner, amongst other modern composers, was severely excluded from the Gürzenich when Dr. Hiller wielded the bâton; yet his audience cherished a sneaking desire for an occasional taste of the forbidden fruit, but dared not give it utterance. Since the retirement of the veteran master from the Institution, matters in this respect have, however, taken a different turn, and for the first time in the annals of these Concerts, the gorgeous and festive strains of Wagner's Overture to "Die Meistersinger" resounded in the hall of the Gürzenich, and were applauded to the echo, on the opening night above referred to. In numerous other directions, too, Dr. Wüllner is said to have already succeeded in infusing a new spirit into the musical life of a city which is justly looked upon as an important centre of the art in Germany. All honour to Dr. Hiller in his well-earned retirement from a long public career he may well look back upon with just feelings of satisfaction and pride. But modern progress in the art, or at least the semblance thereof, as represented in the spirit of the age, will assert itself, and sooner or later claim recognition in every community; and the city of Cologne may be congratulated upon the acquisition of a musician who is likely to guide these aspirations with a firm and moderate hand.

Reports received by us from Hamburg respecting the first performance at the Stadt-Theater, on the 11th ult., of Rubinstein's operatic novelty "Der Papagei" (referred to in our last number) speak of "a very sympathetic reception" of the work on the part of the public, who "repeatedly called both composer and performers before the curtain"—not a very unusual compliment nowadays to be bestowed at a first performance, though scarcely a criterion as to actual success. It is strange, however, whatever the ultimate verdict upon this latest production by the genial composer may be, that the operatic works of Rubinstein should be so much neglected almost everywhere outside of his native country, Russia. About this time last year two operatic novelties from his pen were brought out by the enterprising impresario, Herr Pollini, likewise at the Hamburg Theatre. One, the biblical-drama entitled "Sulamith" (constructed upon similar lines underlying those of Mr. Mackenzie's "Rose of Sharon") is a work of no ordinary merit, saturated with rich Oriental colouring, musically, and by no means devoid of dramatic coherence, albeit divided by the compiler of the libretto (Julius Rodenberg) into a series of tableaux. The choruses form a distinct feature in the work, and some of them, notably those for female voices only, contain passages of great beauty. The performance, as the writer, who was present on the first occasion, can testify, was on the whole an excellent one, and its reception sufficiently enthusiastic to warrant the prediction that one or the other of Herr Pollini's German colleagues would soon follow the initiative given by him and include the successful novelty in his répertoire. The other work above alluded to, by the Russian composer, and produced in conjunction with "Sulamith," at the Hamburg Theatre last year, was a humorous trifle of a, perhaps, deservedly ephemeral character, entitled "Unter Räubern" (Among Robbers); which, however, appeared to find much favour with a certain portion of the audience. Taking into consideration the very pertinent question of the opposite tastes prevailing amongst modern audiences, and which has been so cleverly met by the versatile composer of the two diametrically opposed compositions just referred to, we may reasonably be surprised why they have not been heard of outside Hamburg. It is true that the composer's "Nero" has recently been placed upon the répertoire of the Operas of Brussels and of Ghent; but what, we may ask, is that amongst so many emanating from the same source, which have been "successfully brought out" during, say, the last ten years in one country or another?

Herr August Bungert, whose name has been mentioned in these columns in connection with the performance, at Leipzig, of his opera "Die Studenten von Salamanka," is just now engaged upon the elaboration of a most ambitious work. Following in the footsteps of Richard Wagner, Herr Bungert has recently completed the book of what is intended to take the form of a musical tetralogy, entitled "The Homeric World," each main division of which is to be complete in itself, for the purpose of separate performance. The poet-composer, as we must call him (though he has yet to win his spurs in the double capacity indicated), is at present staying at Creuznach, where lately he recited to a private audience the dramas appertaining to his entire work. According to a paragraph in the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, the reading produced a very marked impression, and the general opinion was that great things may be expected upon the final completion of the undertaking. Herr Bungert has already proved himself a composer of no ordinary merit both in his Symphonic poem entitled "Auf der Wartburg," and in the opera above referred to. But his apparently equally remarkable poetic gifts have been a surprise even to his friends, and much interest is felt in the progress of the Tetralogy.

At a Concert recently given at Frankfort by Dr. Hans von Bülow, with his celebrated Meiningen orchestra, the programme included the second Pianoforte Concerto by Brahms. The eminent pianist-conductor played the pianoforte part of the work, and, for the purpose probably of demonstrating the superiority of his orchestra, that body of instrumentalists went through the orchestral portions of the Concerto without the aid of a Conductor, and likewise without a hitch. The feat produced the intended "sensation," and its accomplishment is, of course, now making the round of German papers. Without disparaging in the least the well known merits of the Meiningen artists, it would probably not be very difficult to find other orchestral bodies with whom a similar experiment could be successfully tried. But if so, it may be asked by an unsophisticated musical public, cui bono?

A young pianist, Herr Arthur Friedheim, has recently attracted considerable attention by his masterly performances both at Berlin and other German musical centres. Herr Friedheim is a pupil of Franz Liszt, and a brilliant career is predicted for him by those most competent to judge.

A new opera, by Felix Draeseke, entitled "Gudrun," was performed, for the first time, on the 5th ult., at the Royal Theatre of Hanover, and achieved an unmistakably great success. The work, the subject of which has been treated at least half a dozen times during the last twenty years by German composers, either in the form of opera or cantata, is said to be one of the most important additions to modern musico-dramatic literature.

An interesting discourse was delivered, on the 7th ult., at a meeting of the Berlin Tonkünstler-Verein, by Herr Wilhelm Tappert, on the subject of the history of musical notation. The speaker, who has been for a number of years engaged upon the elucidation of a subject so interesting to the music historian, was favoured by a numerous and appreciative audience, who expressed a wish that the results of Herr Tappert's investigations should be made generally accessible in book form, an undertaking which, having regard to the numerous musical specimens required to be interspersed in the text for the purpose of illustration, would probably meet with serious objections on the part of private publishers. It is therefore proposed to use the influence of the Society in order to insure the publication of so important a work at Government expense.

At the Weimar Hof-Theater, where it was originally brought out some time since, M. Saint-Saëns's Opera "Samson and Delila" has recently been revived with considerable success.

A monument is shortly to be erected to Joseph Haydn in the Esterhazy Garden, situate in one of the suburbs of Vienna. The statue of the composer, which will form the principal part of the design, is nearly completed and is the work of Herr Heinrich Natter.

A successful first performance of Boito's Opera "Mefistofele" took place on the 9th ult., at the Stuttgart Hof-Theater, where the work is likely to remain permanently in the répertoire.

We extract the following from the Leipzig Signale: "Three interesting jubilee performances are impending at the Berlin Opera—viz., the 500th production at that institution of Weber's 'Freischütz,' the 200th of Meyerbeer's 'Prophet,' and the 100th of Spohr's 'Jessonda.' According to arrangements now in progress, the 500th performance of the most popular German opera more especially will assume a festive character, with all the best artists of the establishment contributing to its worthy rendering."

By permission of the German emperor, special performances are to be held at the State-subsidized theatres of Berlin, Hanover, Cassel, and Wiesbaden for the benefit of the fund now being raised for the purpose of erecting a monument to Carl Maria von Weber in his native town, Eutin, in Holstein.

The Musikalisches Centralblatt, of Leipzig, a journal to which we have occasionally referred in these columns, has ceased to exist.

Three special performances of Wagner's "Parsifal" were held at the Munich Hof-Theater, in the solitary presence of King Louis of Bavaria, on the 5th, 7th, and 8th ult. The following were the artists engaged in the interpretation of the work: Parsifal, Herr Vogl; Kundry, Frau Vogl; Amfortas, Herr Gura; Klingsor, Herr Fuchs; Titael, Herr Kindermann; Gurnemanz, Herr Siehr.

The following laconic announcement appears in Continental music journals: "I am unable to satisfy the solicitations on the part of collectors of autographs, and I likewise wish to dispense with the receipt of compositions, manuscript or otherwise, unless specially asked for. Franz Liszt." It may be doubted, however (for such is human nature), whether even this pert declaration will have the desired effect upon the poor Maestro's persecutors.

At the Paris Opéra, M. Ambroise Thomas's Opera "Françoise de Rimini" (first produced in April, 1882) was revived on the 12th ult., with Mdlle. Isaac in the title-rôle. Some considerable curtailments had been appropriately made, but the performance nevertheless extended over four hours. The work will probably remain in the répertoire for some time. The Théâtre-Italien commenced its winter season on October 26, with "Lucia," Madame Sembrich singing the part of the heroine, this having been her début in the French capital. The lady's success was a complete one, and the press organs are unanimous in her praise, M. Vitu, the able critic of Le Figaro, considering her acting to be as perfect as her vocalisation; adding that she reminds him at once of the incisive style of a Patti and the undefinable charm of a Nilsson. At a subsequent performance at the same institution, Madame Valda, an American singer, made her first appearance, respecting which a correspondent of the Standard writes as follows:—"Since the first appearance of Sophie Cruvelli, some thirty years ago, charmed and surprised a Parisian audience, no event has taken place in the musical world that can vie in importance with the début of Madame Valda at the Italian Opera last night (November 1). Madame Valda is a native of the United States, but her training and method are thoroughly Italian. She is a perfect musician, and her voice is strong as well as flexible and sweet. The opera was Verdi's "Un Ballo in Maschera," in which she took the singularly trying part of the page, and the difficult music of which she executed with the most artistic finish. Madame Valda's appearance is, moreover, eminently calculated to secure the favour of the spectator. She acts naturally and with thorough dramatic instinct, and she obtained a success which for many years has been without a precedent on the lyric stage. Like Patti and Albani, she sings without any apparent effort, and her rendering of "Saper vorreste" excited genuine enthusiasm." Thus it would appear, then, that the ranks of prime donne are being well recruited, and that the "star system" is not, for the present, likely to be discouraged for want of suitable objects of adoration.

Just before our going to press, the announcement was made in Paris that M. Ritt, the former lessee of the Ambigu, and the Opéra Comique, has accepted the post of director of the Grand Opéra, vacated by the death of M. Vaucorbeil. M. Ritt, it is added, will conduct the institution in partnership with M. Gailhard, the tenor.

The Opéra Populaire, which has lately had to close its doors, is to be reopened under the name of Opéra Moderne, under the management of M. Aimé Gros, the former director of the Lyons Opéra. Under the auspices of M. Gros, the performances of M. Saint-Saëns's "Etienne Marcel" (which had been interrupted by the failure of the establishment) will be resumed at an early date.

A most painful sensation was produced some three weeks ago at the Paris Opéra Comique, during a performance of Rossini's "Il Barbiere." Mdlle. Van Zandt, the youthful and talented prima donna, had undertaken, for the first time, to sing the part of Rosina. Upon making her entry in the second act, it was remarked that the lady was evidently suffering from an indisposition, the symptoms of which closely resembled those usually exhibited by persons while under the influence of an overdose of alcohol. Immediately a perfect storm of indignation arose in the house, which only subsided after the lady, who was apparently unwilling to leave, had been led off the stage. Presently it was announced that Mdlle. Van Zandt was too unwell to continue her part, and that Mdlle. Mezeray had kindly undertaken to do so in her stead. No suitable costume being at hand, the latter sang the part of Rosina in usual evening dress, and the opera proceeded without any further interruption. This extraordinary incident, however, has caused a deal of excitement in musical and theatrical circles of the capital. The outcry on the following day in the press-organs against the unfortunate singer was unanimous, and the immediate cancelling of her contract was generally demanded. Mdlle. Van Zandt, it should be added, bears an irreproachable character; she is the chosen favourite, moreover, of Paris society, and a frequent guest at the most fashionable salons. The incident is doubtless capable of a satisfactory explanation, and that publicly offered by the lady, and testified to by medical certificates—viz., that being in a nervously excited state, previous to her début in so important a part, she had had too frequent recourse to a soothing medicine prescribed for her—should be unhesitatingly accepted, and the matter be allowed to drop.

Two new journals devoted to music and the sister arts have just been started in France—viz., the "Nantes Moderne," at Nantes, and "La Nouvelle Revue du Lyonnais," at the latter town.

Henri Wieniawski's violin, a Pietro Guarneri of the first order, has passed into the skilful hands of M. Jeno Hubay, the late eminent and congenial virtuoso's successor at the Brussels Conservatoire.

A new season of German Opera, under the direction of Dr. L. Damrosch, was commenced, on the 17th ult., at the Metropolitan Opera-house of New York, with Wagner's "Tannhäuser." Meyerbeer's "Huguenots," and Beethoven's "Fidelio" (with Fräulein Marianne Brandt in the title part) were announced to follow. The present scheme comprises thirty-eight performances, to be supplemented by twenty more, provided the undertaking should prove successful.

Auguste Emanuel Vaucorbeil, the Director of the Paris Grand Opéra, died, almost suddenly, on the 2nd ult., at Paris. M. Vaucorbeil was a pupil of Cherubini at the Conservatoire, and was in his time a prolific composer of almost every description of music. An opera from his pen, entitled "Bataille d'Amour," was successfully produced at the Comique in 1863, and another operatic work, "Mahomet," remains as yet unperformed. He undertook the arduous and responsible duties of director of the national operatic establishment in 1879, as successor to M. Halanzier, and in that position has displayed much energy and ability; his reformatory efforts, on the other hand, being greatly hampered by the traditional laxity in several departments of the institution over which he presided. The deceased artist had just reached his sixty-fourth year.

The death is announced, on October 31, at New York, of Signor Brignoli, once a favourite tenor at Her Majesty's Theatre, and associated, twenty-five years ago, with the début of Adolina Patti in New York.

Another once highly esteemed tenor, Ludwig Joseph Cramolini, died at Darmstadt, at the age of seventy-nine. The deceased was for a number of years an active member of the Darmstadt Hof-Theater, from which establishment he retired some ten years since.

At Paris died recently the once famous singer Signora Erminie Frezzolini. Born at Orvieto, in 1818, she achieved her greatest triumphs about forty years ago in the French capital, as well as in London, Vienna, and Florence.

The death is announced at Huy (Belgium), of Godefroid Camauer, a composer of some merit, and founder of the Société d'Amateurs of that town. He was born at Bergen-op-Zoom, in 1821.

At Neuilly, near Paris, died Jules Jean Baptiste Creste, composer of several operas, amongst them "M. rinettes" and "Les trois Sultanes" which have been successfully produced at Paris.

The death is also announced, at Berlin, of the veteran artist, Gustav Reichhardt, the composer of the once popular German patriotic song, "Was ist des Deutschen Vaterland," and numerous other vocal pieces. Reichardt, who was a pupil of Zelter (Mendelssohn's early instructor), was born in 1797, at a village near Demmin (Pomerania), where his father was the pastor, and had nearly completed his eighty-seventh year.

CORRESPONDENCE.

CATHEDRAL CHOIRS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—In this month's issue of THE MUSICAL TIMES I observe three advertisements for lay clerks in cathedrals, the average remuneration offered being a little under £70 per annum. In one instance, an alto is required for the metropolitan church of the northern province; and, doubtless with a view to secure a man of unimpeachable respectability, who shall also be a capable musician, the munificent stipend of £60 a year is offered. That the successful candidate may not be too much elated by his good fortune, and to prevent his ambition from soaring to the hope of soon securing a post where even higher emoluments may be had, he "must be prepared to sign an agreement to stay two years." In a second case the fixed stipend is £70 a year, with eightpence for every attendance at church, making it, say, £65 a year; and in the remaining instance the salary offered is £80 a year.

I may mention, by way of preface to the few remarks which, with your kind permission, I propose to make on the above subject, that they are those of an onlooker only, and not of an interested individual. Having, however, had some opportunity of becoming acquainted with the status of the choirs of several of our cathedrals, and exceptional facilities for being made thoroughly intimate with the inner working of one in particular, I am impelled to write this letter in the hope that, although it be in itself as insignificant as "a grain of mustard seed," it may be the germ from which something more effectual may spring.

Speaking broadly—with the exception of two or three places where better salaries are paid—the average stipend of a lay clerk in our provincial cathedrals is less than £80 per annum; I question whether, taking them all round, they would even average £70. At York, as above cited, there are lay clerks who are paid £60 a year; at Carlisle some are paid £50—and these are "full duty" men, who have to attend two services each day throughout the year—there may be cathedrals where even lower salaries are paid.

Now, that the musical portion of the service in our cathedrals is a very important feature, must be admitted by everyone; in my humble opinion it is the most important. Nay, more, it is the only feature in which a cathedral service differs from that in the poorest parish church in the land; for strip it of its music, and what is left? The reading of four portions of Scripture each day, and the preaching of two sermons each Sunday. And how are the emoluments apportioned? I find that in the cathedral above-mentioned, where £80 is offered for a tenor singer, the sum of £8,250 a year is expended on the last-named part of the services—i. e., the reading and preaching. At York, which offers £60 for an alto, £5,000 is annually expended on the five caputular members of the body; at Gloucester, which offers £65 for a lay clerk, the dean and four canons receive among them £4,500; and at Carlisle, where three out of the six choirmen are paid £50 a year each, the dean and four canons receive £4,300. Or, to look at the matter in another way, whereas one canon, for three months' duty, involving the reading of the lessons at one service each day, and the preaching of one sermon a week during that period, is remunerated with £700 a year, and a permanent residence, the whole six choirmen, for attending two services every day in the year, have only £430 divided among them.

Now I do not for one moment wish to enter into the question whether the deans and canons are overpaid; I am content for my present purpose to assume that they are not. But I do say, most emphatically, that if the musical service in our cathedrals is to be maintained in a state of efficiency, some greater inducement must be held out to vocalists of ability to enter the choirs than such miserable stipends as are offered in your advertisement columns this month. I know that, if the question were put to them, the chapters would plead that the funds at their disposal for choir purposes do not allow them to pay higher salaries. Granted that this is so, and further that the efficient rendering of the musical portion of the service is essential; what is the remedy? It appears to me to be very simple, and what I would propose is this. On the next occasion when a canonry becomes vacant in such of the cathedrals as are in an impecunious state touching funds for choir and general purposes, let the remaining caputular members of the body take such steps as may be necessary to procure the abolition of such fourth canonry, and to apply the income so set free in augmentation of the fund from which the musical staff is paid. By this plan, vested interests would be preserved inviolate, and the dean and remaining canons would be more than compensated for the trifling increase of work devolving upon them, by the satisfaction they would have in the perfection of their musical service. Should they, however, object to their duties being increased, the sum thus placed at their disposal would be sufficiently large to allow of their engaging an assistant minor canon, between whom and the existing minor canons the work could be so apportioned that no one individual would have more to do than at present.

I am aware that I leave this proposal in a crude state, but I think I have said enough to show that it is one solution of the difficulty, and that if the matter were taken up with spirit by the parties whom it touches most closely, it could be carried to a successful issue.

I am, Sir, Your obedient Servant,

JAMES WALTER BROWN.

MUSIC FOR THE PEOPLE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—At the present critical juncture, with regard to music in England, I earnestly beg you will allow me a space in your columns to suggest that practical steps may be taken simultaneously throughout the country to generate a taste for good music among the masses.

Notwithstanding the repeated assertions of eminent musicians also well-meant assertions embodied in the speeches at the meeting of the then proposed Royal College of Music, on February 28, 1882, to the effect that we are a most musical nation, I fear this hypothesis is hardly compatible with facts.

Through the influence of our aristocracy, who must be fashionable, we manage, and that not without difficulty (to wit, the fresh and lamentable Covent Garden failure), to support the Opera for three months during the year, in a city of nearly four millions of inhabitants, whilst theatres out of number and music (?) halls are crammed every night during the whole year, where operettas, musical burlesques, and songs of the day are provided.

Having referred to the Royal College of Music, I will incidentally mention here, that over two years previous to the meeting held at Manchester, on the 12th December, 1881, I suggested through the medium of a contemporary, the establishment of a National Conservatoire, which should enjoy a fixed annual subscription from Government—whose lethargy on this point is most regrettable—and the support of the public generally, who, as I then explained in detail, would benefit by the existence of such an establishment on the basis I referred to, and to which I still adhere for practical purposes. As one step towards the desired result, there must be a radical change in the performance of music provided at most of the theatres. Opera houses may lack attendance, the theatres are always patronised; a mixed public finds its way to them nightly. Here is the grand occasion to inculcate taste for good music. Instead of the usual commonplace selections given between the acts, which the public happily drows with clatter, let the managers make it known that in future good music only will be performed; the progressive change from this step alone would ultimately become palpable.

It must be admitted that the management of the Annual Covent Garden Concerts possesses all available means to perform on certain nights the principal parts of whole operas, in lieu of mutilated fragments, arranged sensationally, which astonish, but do not impress; this would enable the masses to have a thorough idea of operatic works at a moderate cost.

At present we cannot with the best intentions expect the working classes to attend operas or expensive Concerts far away from their homes; but instead of local suburban Concerts being composed of endless ballads and oftentimes performances in which music is the smaller element, let operas in recital and chamber music be given, with piano and American organ as ground work; for I maintain that it is in recital that you can best appreciate operatic works, from a purely musical point of view.

I propose the immediate establishment of a "Reform Musical Association," whose first step should be to issue a circular to the clergy and mayor of every town throughout the United Kingdom, earnestly desiring them to choose a suitable centre, where the best music only shall be performed, under the guidance of real earnest local musicians, at exceptionally low prices of admission. The music at the first onset must be of that nature that will appeal to the non-musical as to the musical, and this will readily be found in the expounding of Mozart's endless beauties.

Above all, let the question of pure monetary gain, which has nipped many a musical undertaking in the bud, be set aside entirely.

Every effort should be made by the supervising centre established in London, with a view of securing both in the metropolis and country towns the due performance of really good works, and it is my conviction that gradually an extraordinary change would take place in the national taste for the pure art, which, once acquired, would be indelible.

It may be invidious to make comparisons, but let us compare the English with the foreign city and town working man, as to musical taste. The former has no idea of refining his mind with good and instructive music. And why? Because it is not afforded to him in his neighbourhood (I refer here especially to London), except in the shape of the grotesque and often the vulgar. The latter, for a few pence, and often for nothing, can be musically entertained and become a fair critic.

Fearing I may have already overstepped the limits of the space you are disposed to grant me, and relying on your courtesy, I will divide my remarks, and send an appendix to my present communication for insertion in your January publication. My views will then be completely explained for the due consideration of those whom it may and should concern. Meanwhile, I remain,

Sir, yours faithfully, O. L.

VOLUNTARIES IN DIVINE WORSHIP.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—On this subject, as on most others, there seems to be a diversity of opinion. As one who is deeply interested in the "Worship of Praise," and who loves to hear good congregational singing, I crave your indulgence respecting the above subject. A well known organist has said, at the Church Congress meeting, "that he often thought if he were a clergyman he would abolish voluntaries altogether," and that "after hearing a solemn and impressive sermon, to let off some grand fireworks on the organ was not at all likely to attain the effect desired by the preacher." The above remarks I most heartily endorse. Having previously doubted whether voluntaries in divine worship were really of any good, these few words from an eminent musician led me to think more seriously on the subject; and I must admit that, as far as I can discern, voluntaries in places of worship had better be "altogether abolished." Since churches and chapels are places for worship, and the people assemble there solely (as we sincerely hope they do) for devotional purposes, and no other, I claim that if voluntaries are not aids to devotion they had better be left out entirely. What are voluntaries really intended for? Are they an aid to devotion? (as some people claim them to be, but which I very much doubt), or do they serve as a kind of musical gratification or musical display? Of course, the playing of voluntaries has grown to be a custom nearly all the world over, in churches and chapels where there is an organ or harmonium; but I cannot see that they improve the service, either from a devotional or a musical point of view. On the other hand, I think there is something most impressive in the silence that precedes the service; and that when the last words of the sermon are uttered and the benediction pronounced, to leave the sacred edifice in quietness, meditating upon the solemn words we have heard, is more likely to produce good results than the loud crash on the organ generally resorted to immediately the minister finishes.—I remain, yours faithfully,

MR. JOSEPH BENNETT.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—By virtue of having been a regular reader of the MUSICAL TIMES for the last fifteen years, I beg you will allow me to express my sincere regret at the cause which has led to the temporary suspension of the articles on the "Great Composers," I refer to the indisposition of Mr. Joseph Bennett. From the first I have read these interesting papers with unmixed pleasure, and feel assured I am but expressing the sentiments of many, who, alike with myself, have derived not only satisfaction, but profit from their perusal, when I repeat my assurance of concern at Mr. Bennett's failure of health. I have been fortunate enough to read other articles written by Mr. Bennett which have been ever remarkable for their lucidity and an entire lack of prejudice or bias. Within the last few days I have read his sketch of the "Life of Mendelssohn" (Hueffer Series), and could not but contrast its graphic pages with a book I read a short time ago—Liszt's "Life of Chopin"—in which there is so little of Chopin and so much of the glorification of Liszt in the way of word-painting. I earnestly hope that a few months' rest will have the effect of completely restoring Mr. Bennett to health and vigour, and that he may be permitted to return to the work which he is so eminently fitted to carry out both by ability and experience.—Yours faithfully, Liverpool, November 22, 1884.

ORGANIST.

[As we are certain that the kindly wishes of our correspondent are fully shared by all our readers, we gladly take the opportunity of announcing that Mr. Bennett is already much better; and we have every hope that the interval of cessation from work which he at first proposed to himself may be shortened.—Ed. Musical Times.]

ORATORIOS FOR THE PEOPLE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—The Choir of the Kyrle Society has for some years given Oratorios in churches and chapels in the poor districts of London. The performances are free to all. A large number of letters from the clergy and others are now before the Committee, and more are constantly arriving, asking for performances which cannot be given unless additional funds are forthcoming. We would ask all those to whom the pleasures of music come so easily to aid in bringing them to the far larger number to whom they rarely come at all. Will you then kindly allow us to appeal in your columns for funds to extend this part of the Society's work? Subscriptions, large or small, or donations will be duly acknowledged by the honorary Secretary at this address.—I am, Sir, your obedient Servant,

OCTAVIA HILL,

Treasurer of the Kyrle Society.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

* * Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance. Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur. Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications. We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies. Notice is sent to all Subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

PSALTER, N.Z.—There is no reason why the reciting-note should be shortened to half-a-bar when one syllable only is recited to it: the whole bar should be held in order to maintain the musical rhythm of the Chant. We have never heard of such a practice before, with regard to Anglican Chants; wit: Gregorians the case is different.

WILLIAM CLARK.—B flat on the third line of the treble staff.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

BATH.—On Saturday afternoon, the 1st ult., the Pump Room was crowded in every part to hear the fine orchestra under the conductorship of Herr Van Praag. A feature in the programme was the introduction of vocal music by Miss Marie Gane, whose singing was greatly admired. The orchestral selections included the Overtures to Zampa and La Gazza Ladra.

BEDFORD.—Mr. Diemer commenced his third series of Monday Popular Concerts, on October 27, before a large and critical audience. Miss Agnes Zimmermann was the pianist, and the vocalist Miss Winthrop.

BOLTON.—A testimonial Concert was given to Mr. Henry Taylor on the 12th ult., in the Town Hall, which was well attended. The artists were Miss Clara Samuelli, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Taylor, and Mr. Santley, vocalists; Signor Risegari, solo violin; Mr. Edward Hecht, solo pianoforte; and Mr. Johnson, accompanist. Mr. Taylor was well received in all his songs, and it is to be hoped that there will be a substantial token of the appreciation of his services.

BRIGHTON.—Miss Annie Tate, R.A.M., gave her annual Ballad Concert in the Royal Pavilion, on Wednesday evening, October 29, assisted by Miss Emilie Lloyd, R.A.M., Mr. Joseph Heald, and Mr. G. M. Barling (vocalists); Mr. W. M. Quicke (solo violin), Mr. Landfried (solo cornet), and Mr. W. Kuhse (solo pianoforte). Mr. W. Norman Roe conducted and accompanied. The programme was excellently rendered, the artists being received with the greatest favour. —Mr. E. H. Thorne gave a Concert at the Pavilion on Wednesday afternoon, the 13th ult., which was highly successful. Mr. Thorne was assisted by his son, Mr. H. Thorne, Mr. A. Ashton, Mr. H. Smith, Mr. Carrodus, Signor Pezze, and Miss Ada Bright. The programme was well selected, and included compositions by Mr. Thorne and Mr. Ashton.

BURTON-ON-TRENT.—On Thursday evening, the 20th ult., Barnett's Ancient Mariner, and a miscellaneous selection, were given in the large hall, by the members of St. Paul's Institute Choral Society. The soloists were Miss Marie Gane, Miss Mary Tunnicliffe, Mr. A. Castings, and Mr. K. Andrews; leader of the orchestra, Mr. F. Ward; Organist, Mr. George Barnes; Mr. A. B. Plant, Mus. Bac., Oxon., F.C.O., conducted. The rendering of the work by soloists, choir, and orchestra was thoroughly successful.

CAVAN.—On Friday, the 14th ult., the first of a series of Organ Recitals was given in the church by Mr. J. W. Dry, Organist. A short service was read by the Rector, the Rev. F. J. Hamilton, M.A., after which the following pieces were played:—Sonata No. 2, Mendelssohn; Nazareth, Gounod; Prelude and Fugue, G minor, Bach; Communion, Grison; Offertoire in E Flat, Wély; Evening Prayer and Festival March, Smart.

CHELTENHAM.—The first of Mr. Matthews's Subscription Concerts, in connection with the Cheltenham Choral and Orchestral Society, was given in the Assembly Rooms, on the 11th ult. The programme consisted of Rossini's Stabat Mater, Hero and Leander (C. H. Lloyd), and selections from the works of Berlioz, Gluck, and Handel. The solo vocalists were Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Hope Glenn, Mr. J. Probert, and Mr. W. H. Brereton. The works were excellently rendered. Mr. E. G. Woodward led the band, Mr. Taylor presided at the organ, and Mr. Pollock was the harpist. The Conductors were Mr. Matthews and Mr. Lloyd.

COLNBROOK, NEAR WINDSOR.—On Tuesday evening, the 4th ult., an Evening Concert was given in the Town Hall, by the members of the Colnbrook Choral Society, under the conductorship of Mr. Richard Ratcliffe. The programme contained solos, duets, quartets, and a selection of part-songs.

DURHAM.—On Tuesday evening, the 11th ult., a very good performance of Mr. J. C. Grieve's Oratorio Benjamin was given by the choir of St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church, Blackhill. The solo vocalists were Miss Shield, Mr. J. A. Anderson, Mr. C. Stephenson and Mr. G. Brown, assisted in the concerted pieces by Miss Hopper, Miss McDonald and Mr. W. Bain. Miss Peacock presided at the organ and Mr. Bain conducted.

EALING.—Mr. Bradley gave two Pianoforte Recitals in the Lyric Hall on Tuesday, the 11th ult., which were highly successful. The programmes included works by Brahms, Dvorak, Saint-Saëns, and Rheinberger, which were well rendered. The vocalist was Miss Grosvenor Gooch. Duets or two pianos were played by Mr. Bradley, assisted by Messrs. Battison Haynes, and C. W. Perkins.

EASTBOURNE.—A performance of Mendelssohn's Lobgesang was given on the 20th ult., at the Pavilion, by Mr. Henry W. Hardy's Choir. The solo portions were well sung by Miss Carlisle, and Mr. T. P. Tomes, Miss A. Carlisle assisting in the duet "I waited for the Lord." Considering the smallness of the band the Sinfonia and accompaniments were well played, but the singing of the Choir was not equal to previous occasions. The Cantata was followed by a selection from Haydn's Creation. Mr. Hardy conducted.

ECKINGTON.—On Sunday, the 9th ult., special services were held in the United Methodist Free Church. The Anthem in the morning was "The Lord is Great in Sion" (W. T. Best), and at the evening service a selection from The Messiah was sung. On Monday evening, the 10th ult., a selection from Mozart's Twelfth Mass, with orchestral accompaniment, was rendered in excellent style. Mr. Fitton presided at the organ.

ELTHAM (KENT).—A successful Ballad Concert was given at the Public Hall, on the 10th ult. The programme comprised some well executed pianoforte duets by Miss Ada Newton and Miss Ida Schroeder, and songs and part-songs. The solo vocalists were Miss Mortimer, Miss Greatrex, Miss Smith, Mr. H. Newton, Mr. C. E. Tutill, and Mr. Hagon. A feature of the evening was the performance by Messrs. Boniface, Hagon, Tutill, and Newton, of several part-songs. Miss Ada Newton was an efficient accompanist.

ENNISKILLEN.—The Choral Festival and Harvest Thanksgiving was celebrated in the Parish Church on Friday, the 21st ult. The Service was full choral, the combined choirs numbering over 150 voices; Barby's Tallis was used, and the Special Psalms were chanted with great precision. The anthems were, in the afternoon, "The Heavens are telling," Mr. Hamilton, B.A., singing the recitative and air "In solendour bright," effectively; and at the evening service, a selection from Handel's Messiah, including recitative and air "Comfort ye," and Hallelujah Chorus, was sung. Mr. Arnold conducted, and played during the offertory, as voluntaries, "He shall feed His flock" (Messiah), and "With verdure clad" (Creation).

GREENOCK.—A large audience was attracted to the Town Hall on October 28, by the announcement of a Concert by the Orpheus Club, in aid of the funds of the Charitable Society for the relief of the unemployed poor. Relying upon their reception last season, Mr. Middleton, the Conductor, repeated some of the best items in former programme, and with very decided success. Amongst the most attractive pieces may be mentioned Mendelssohn's "Hunter's Farewell," Müller's "Spring's Delights," "The Three Chafers," and "Lutrow's Wild Chase" (Weber) all of which were excellently sung by the choir. Some vocal solos were also given, and Mr. Middleton's two organ solos were highly appreciated.

HEWWOOD, MANCHESTER.—A very successful rendering of Root's Cantata Belshazzar's Feast, was given on the 4th ult., by the Choir, in the Congregational Church, to a crowded audience. The solo vocalists were Miss Maden, Mrs. Holden, Mr. P. Gow, and Mr. J. Boardman. Mr. Knight, the Choirmaster, conducted, and Mr. W. H. Jewell presided at the organ. Before the commencement of the second part, a March, composed and arranged for Organ and Orchestra by the Organist, was played, and received with great applause. Able assistance was rendered by members of the Local Volunteer and Borough bands, with Mr. W. D. Hill as leading violinist. The Mayor, T. F. Mackinson, Esq., presided, and gave the connective readings in a very efficient manner.

Huddersfield.—An Organ Recital was given in the Methodist New Connexion Chapel, on the 17th ult., by Mr. T. Berry, which was highly successful, and thoroughly appreciated. After the Recital Dr. Roberts's Cantata Johak was performed, the solo singers being Mrs. Patterson, Miss England, Messrs. Daltry, Weavill, and J. Varley. There was an efficient Choir, under the direction of Mr. S. Kendall.

HURSTPIERPOINT.—The second of a series of Organ Recitals was given in the Parish Church on the 8th ult., by the Organist, Mr. H. C. Young, B.A., Cantab. The programme contained selections from the works of Handel, Haydn, Smart, Leo, Batiata, Gounod and Scotton Clark, and included Dunster's "Festival March." A collection was made in aid of the Choir Fund.

JEDBURGH, N.B.—Mr. James A. Crapper gave an Organ Recital in the Parish Church, on Tuesday, the 18th ult., before a highly appreciative audience. The programme, which was selected from the works of Handel, Haydn, Mozart, J. Kinross, and Scotton Clark, was admirably rendered. Vocal solos were contributed by Misses Anderson, Rawdin, and Telfer, and Messrs. John Hartley and T. S. Smail. The selection included a March in C, and an anthem, "Seek ye the Lord," composed by the Organist, the solo being excellently sung by Mr. John Hartley. Miss Rawdin deeply impressed the audience by her excellent rendering of "He shall feed his flock" and "He was despised."

LEAMINGTON.—A Choral Festival was held at the Parish Church, on the 5th ult., in which most of the choirs of the town and neighbourhood took part; the voices numbered two hundred and fifty. The music was selected by Mr. Spinney, who presided at the organ and had the entire arrangement of the Festival. The Processional Hymn was sung by three different choirs, starting from the North, South, and West doors of the church simultaneously, and all led by trumpets. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Neville Leigh, Precentor of Leeds Parish Church. —A third series of the Classical Chamber Concerts are being given by Mr. Frank Spinney, the first Concert having taken place on the 8th ult., the second on the 22nd, and the third is announced for the 6th inst. The string quartet consists of Messrs. F. Ward and Heden, violins; Mr. Spinney, viola; Mr. Mander, cello. Quartets by Beethoven, Haydn, Mozart, and Spohr, and Pianoforte Trios by Beethoven and Mozart have been performed. The vocalists are Miss Henden-Warde, Fraulein Heffemann, Miss Eilen Marchant, and Miss Fusselle. It speaks well for the musical culture of Leamington that such strictly classical Concerts should have been continued for three years. —An excellent performance of Elijah was given by the Musical Society, in the Public Hall, on the 18th ult., to an overflowing audience. The band and chorus numbered about one hundred and eighty. The solo vocalists were Miss Anna Williams, Miss Ada Patterson, Madame Patey, Mr. Sidney Tower, and Mr. Franklin Clive. Mr. Frank Spinney conducted, and the entire work was given with great spirit on the part of soloists, band, and chorus.

LEEK.—The Festival of Church Choirs in the Rural Deanery of Leek was held in St. Luke's Parish Church on the 13th ult. The prime object of the Festival was to promote the efficiency of church choirs. The Anthem was Stainer's "What are these that are arrayed in white robes," which was well sung. Mr. Gee presided at the organ.

LICESTER.—The Musical Society's series of Concerts for this season commenced on Wednesday, the 5th ult., with a Concert by Mr. Chas. Hall's band. The orchestral numbers were the overtures to Esmeralda, Tannhäuser, and Semiramide, the Italian Symphony, and Delibes' Valse Lente, and Pizzicato. Mr. Hallé played the Romanza and Rondo from Chopin's E minor Concerto, and Liszt's Twelfth Rhapsody, and Madame Isabel Fasset sang the "Inflammatus," from Dvorak's Stabat Mater, Benedict's "By the sad sea waves," Haydn's "Spirk song," and Randeegger's "Sleep, dearest sleep," with cello obbligato, played by M. Vieuxtemps. The magnificent performance of the overture to Tannhäuser, and the Italian Symphony, was especially noteworthy. —The second of Mr. J. Herbert Marshall's Subscription Concerts was held in the Temperance Hall, on the 18th ult. The great feature of the evening was the singing of Madame Albani, who was received with much enthusiasm. The other artists were Misses E. and A. Marriott, Mr. Maas, and Mr. Barrington Foot, vocalists; Miss A. Dinelli, solo violinist; and Mr. Giuseppe Dinelli, solo pianist. There was a large audience, and the Concert proved a great success.

MIDDLETON.—On Tuesday, the 18th ult., Mr. Sinclair gave a Concert in the Co-operative Hall. The vocalists were Messrs. Oldfield, Springthorpe, R. G. Eaves, Webb, and the Apollo Glee Club (male). Mr. J. Greaves conducted, and also contributed solos.

MORLEY.—The members of the Choral Union gave a Service of Praise in the Ebenezer Schoolroom, on the 16th ult., which was well attended and very successful. The programme consisted of selections from Handel's Judas Maccabæus and Mozart's Twelfth Mass. The solos were taken by Misses Lofthouse, Sharp, and Messrs. Marshall and Tolson. Mr. T. Earnshaw presided at the organ. Handel's Dettingen Te Deum is the next work to be performed by the Choral Union.

NEW BRIGHTON.—A most successful Concert was given at the Palace on the 9th ult. The programme consisted of selections from Elijah, Samson, Creation, Jephtha, God, Thou art great, and sacred songs by Cowen. The artists were Miss Margaret Leyland, Miss Alice Jones, Miss F. Fuiton, Mr. Hughes and Mr. Alexander Phipps. "O rest in the Lord" and "Return, O God of Hosts" were artistically rendered by Miss Margaret Leyland.

NEWBURY.—On Tuesday, the 11th ult., two Concerts were given in the Town Hall by the members of the Newbury Amateur Orchestral Union, in aid of the proposed District Hospital. The principal artists engaged to assist the amateurs were Miss Catherine Penna and Madame Mudie Holingbroke (vocalists), and Mr. T. E. Gatehouse (solo violin). The orchestra consisted of forty performers, Mr. H. Lewis being the leader; Mr. A. Walton, Mus. Bac., accompanist; and Mr. W. D. Eatwell, Conductor. Both Concerts were well attended, in the evening the hall being filled in every part. The vocalists were highly successful, and amongst the most attractive features in the programme were the violin solo of Mr. Gatehouse—so finely played as to induce a spontaneous encore, which the performer complied with—and a Fantasia, "The Forge in the Forest" (Michaelis), in which Mr. Clinch played an anvil solo; Mr. James Brown presided at the harmonium.

NEWPORT, MON.—On Wednesday, the 19th ult., the members of the Choral Society performed Handel's Messiah. Eos Morlais conducted in the place of Mr. Thomas Jones, absent in consequence of a family bereavement. The soloists were Madame Patey, Miss Anna Williams, Miss Ada Patterson, Mr. Sydney Tower, and Mr. Franklin Clive, all of whom were highly appreciated. There was a large audience.

OTTAWA, CANADA.—A very interesting Organ Recital was given by Mr. J. W. F. Harrison, at Christ Church, on Friday afternoon, October 17. The programme, selected from the works of the best masters, was admirably rendered. The vocalist was Mr. Rowan-Legge.

PAISLEY.—At the Town Hall, on the 13th ult., through the enterprise of Mr. Fraser, a Concert took place, the principal feature in the programme of which was the singing of Mr. Sims Reeves, who gave such an excellent rendering of some of his most popular songs—including "My Pretty Jane," "The Bay of Biscay," and "Tom Bowling"—as to elicit the utmost enthusiasm. Miss Agnes Liddell, Madame de Fonblanque, and Mr. Gilbert Cambell were also thoroughly appreciated; and the performances of Miss Nettie Carpenter (violin), Mr. Henry Nicholson (flute), and Mr. Emile Berger (pianoforte) were received with warm and well deserved applause.

READING.—Mr. H. J. Hendy gave his annual Concert, at the Victoria Hall, on the 18th ult., which was well attended by the leading families of the town and neighbourhood. The solo vocalists were Miss Jessie Royd, Madame L. Russell, Mr. Sinclair Dunn, and Mr. Critchley, all of whom were highly appreciated. Mr. Rippon and Mr. Hendy were very successful in their violin and pianoforte solos. Mr. Hendy's playing being a conspicuous feature of the Concert. The programme was well selected.

RETFORD.—A Concert, under the direction of Mr. Hamilton White, was given on Wednesday, October 29, the chief feature being the excellent rendering of unaccompanied part-music by Mr. White's vocal class. Songs, pianoforte solos, and duets were also contributed by pupils of Mr. White.

ROSTREYOR, NEAR NEWRY.—On Tuesday evening, the 11th ult., a Concert was given in the Skating Rink, before a large audience. The programme included, among other features of interest, a duet "O di qual Ontag," sung by Miss Steele and the Hon. Arthur Canning; "Absent, yet present," by Mr. Quin; and Balfie's "Trust her not," by the Misses Rebecca and Harriet Morgan. The other vocalists were Mrs. Douglas, who sang Braga's Serenata (violin obbligato by Dr. Douglas), the Hon. Miss Canning, and Mr. W. P. Morgan. The Messrs. Hobart also gave some violin solos in excellent style. Dr. Vesey contributed a reading, and the Hon. Mr. Canning a recitation from Shakespeare. Mr. Barry M. Githoly, Organist of St. Mary's, Newry, conducted, and played the accompaniments.

SADDEN, LANCASHIRE.—On Saturday, the 1st ult., Mr. Thomas Sharples gave his sixth annual ballad Concert in the British School. The vocalists were Miss Henrietta Tomlinson, Mr. M. Burrell, Mr. Fred. Gordon, and Mr. R. Moorhouse, all of whom were highly successful. Mr. Myers fully maintained his reputation as a soloist and accompanist.

ST. LEONARDS-ON-SEA.—A performance of Mendelssohn's Elijah was given on the 19th ult., in the Royal Concert Hall, in aid of the Infirmary. The soloists were Miss Jessie Royd, Madame Poole, and Mr. Ralph Wilkinson, assisted by members of the Choral Union. Miss Jessie Royd was heard to great advantage in "Hear ye, Israel," and Madame Poole did full justice to "Woe unto them," "O, rest in the Lord," and the music of Jezebel. The two tenor solos were effectively rendered by Messrs. Simpson and Seemark respectively. The choruses were well sung. There was a small, but efficient, orchestra, led by Mr. Morris, and Mr. E. Kennard presided at the organ. Dr. Abram conducted.

STURROSBURY.—The members of the Harmonic Society gave a very successful Concert, on Thursday, October 28, in the Music Hall, the programme comprising Haydn's "Autumn" (The Seasons), and a miscellaneous selection. The solo vocalists were Miss Catherine Penna, Miss Nellie Griffiths, Mr. J. Gawthrop, and Mr. T. Bott. Mr. E. Pritchard, the Honorary Organist, played the organ accompaniments, and Mr. J. A. Lea conducted.

SOUTHAMPTON.—The sixth annual Concert of the Above Bar Choral Society was given in the Watts Memorial Hall, on Thursday evening, October 30, the programme consisting of Belshazzar's Feast, and a miscellaneous selection. The principal vocalists were Mrs. Mackey, Miss Hawkesworth, Miss Lottie West, Mr. Joseph Tapley, Mr. H. O. Mackey, Mr. Worrall, &c.; leader of band, Mr. J. D. Wilson, bandmaster, 2nd H.R.V.; Conductor, Mr. R. Pim.

SUDBURY, SUFFOLK.—An excellent Concert was given at the Town Hall, on October 30, by the All Saints' Choir, assisted by several friends. The vocalists—Miss Sparrow, Miss Brown, Mrs. Sparrow, Messrs. H. A. Partridge, H. Wilson, and F. Pattie, and Master Allen Berry—were highly successful, and a violin solo (encored), by Master G. Leopold, and a pianoforte solo by Mr. George F. Bruce, were prominent features in the programme. Mr. H. A. Partridge conducted.

TODMORDEN.—The members of the Musical Society gave their first Concert for the season, on the 12th ult., in the Town Hall. The Woman of Samaria formed the first part of the programme, and the second was miscellaneous. Mr. J. Fielden conducted, and the principal vocalists were Miss Fannie Sellers, Miss Cragg, Mr. Macdonald, and Mr. McCall. Mr. Knott was an efficient accompanist.

UPTON-ON-SEVERN.—A Concert was given in the Town Hall, on Thursday evening, October 30, by the members of the Malvern Glee Club, conducted by Mr. W. F. Newton. A well arranged programme was admirably rendered. The instrumentalists were Messrs. Newton, Davis, and Winkle, and vocal solos were contributed by Messrs. Elzy, Elliott, Franklin, Davis, Newton, and Walker.

WEM, SALOP.—On Sunday, the 9th ult., Mr. Prendergast, Organist of the Parish Church, gave his monthly Organ Recital after Evening Service. The programme included March "Silver Trumpets" (Vivian), Offertorio in G (Lefebvre-Wely), Fantasia "The Storm" (Batiste), "O had I Jubal's lyre" (Handel), "Fix'd in His everlasting seat" (Handel), and "Marche Funèbre" (Beethoven).

WHITBY.—On Monday evening, the 17th ult., a Concert of Sacred Music was given by the Bruiswick Wesleyan Choir. The programme consisted of solos, duets, and choruses from the great masters; solo vocalist, Miss P. Falkingbridge. The choir gave a good rendering of the Gloria from Mozart's Twelfth Mass. There was a large audience. Mr. Rennison ably officiated at the organ.

WILTON.—On the 12th ult., the Guild of St. Mary, assisted by a few friends, performed the Rev. J. C. Berkeley's Cantata, Muriel, the Little Mermaid. The work has been much enlarged since its first performance; and two new choruses, a waltz, "Floating in the Water," and the march, "Hail to Sebastian," were much applauded. Miss Olivier, as Muriel, was encored for her singing of "Farewell"; Mr. Douly, as the Spirit of the Storm, rendered with great force the song "The Storm is o'er the ocean," and the quartet for male voices, "A Serenade," was much admired. The Chorus, which had been trained by the Rev. J. C. Berkeley, sang well and steadily. Much of the success of the Concert was due to the admirable conducting of Mr. J. F. Ridley. By request, a second performance of the Cantata was given on the following night.

WINDSOR.—The members of St. George's Choir, assisted by Miss Ellen Atkins, gave their annual Concert at the Albert Institute on the 13th ult. The glees were excellently sung by Messrs. Stilliard, Packer, Hunt, Clinch, and Shepley; Mr. W. Clinch, Mr. D. S. Shepley, and Mr. James Gawthorpe were highly successful in their solos, the singing of the last named gentleman being a feature of the Concert. Miss Atkins gave an effective rendering of "Oh! had I Jubal's lyre," which was received with warm applause. Mr. H. Hunt contributed a violin solo, and Mr. Walter Parratt was solo pianist and accompanist.

WOLVERHAMPTON.—The Festival Choral Society is to be congratulated upon the enterprise shown in inaugurating the season on the 3rd ult. with the production of such an important work as Mr. Cowen's St. Ursula. Although the band was not on the extensive scale which might be desired, on the whole the Cantata received a successful interpretation, the principal vocalists—Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Hope Glenn, Mr. Edward Lloyd and Mr. Brereton—giving the music allotted to them with excellent effect. The work was conducted by the composer. Sterndale Bennett's May Queen, which is well-known and appreciated in Wolverhampton, received a highly satisfactory rendering, under the conductorship of Dr. Swinnerton Heap.

WORCESTER.—A Recital was given on the new organ in the Public Hall on Monday, October 27, by Mr. W. Haynes, Organist of the Priory Church, Malvern. An excellent and varied programme was finely rendered, and fully exhibited the beauty of the instrument. Part-songs and glees were also contributed by members of the Amateur Vocal Union, and solos by Miss Pitt, Mr. Spark, and Mr. Wilmhurst. Mr. S. James accompanied the vocal pieces.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. J. Thomas, Organist and Choirmaster to All Saints' Church, King's Heath, near Birmingham—Mr. George Higgs, Organist and Director of the Choir to St. Mark's, Marylebone Road, W.—Mr. Ernest H. Smith, A.C.O., Organist and Choirmaster to St. Mary's Parish Church, Westerham, Kent.—Mr. A. Edward Dean, Organist and Choirmaster to the Parish Church, Henley-on-Thames.—Mr. James B. By Her Majesty's Royal Letters Patent
WM. CHINNOCK DYER.

The above-named would draw the attention of the Members of the Musical Profession and Trade to his

PATENT ACTION
 FOR ATTACHING
Organ Pedals to a Pianoforte

Which Action he has, after continued study, brought to perfection, and gained the approval of Her Majesty's Commissioners of Patents. Letters Patent from the French Government have also been received by the Inventor.

ADVANTAGES OF WM. CHINNOCK DYER'S PATENT PEDAL ACTION.

1. It is not complicated; and as all the material used in manufacturing the same is well-seasoned mahogany, weights and springs not being used, it is warranted never to get out of order, and will last as long as any Pianoforte.
2. It is perfectly noiseless in its working, as it is carefully finished, and all the moving parts carefully bushed with red cloth.
3. It is by far the easiest and most convenient Action for attaching Organ Pedals to a Pianoforte.
4. It does not in any way interfere with the Sound-board of the Pianoforte; and the Pedals belonging to the same need not be taken away, as is the case with other Actions.
5. It may be attached to any Pianoforte without the slightest injury to the same.
6. The Action belonging to the Pianoforte is not in any way deteriorated, as the keys of the same are drawn down in the most natural manner at the place where they are played upon by the fingers.
7. A delightful and easy pedal touch is ensured, as the Action draws down the keys with the greatest ease.
8. The notes respond to the lightest pedal touch.
9. Repetition on the Pedals is as prompt and effective as that of the keys of the Pianoforte.
10. The touch of the Pianoforte is unaltered.
11. It is THE ONLY perfect and satisfactory Action for attaching Organ Pedals to a Pianoforte.
12. All the usual annoyances are entirely obviated, and a lifetime's pedal practice ensured without any further trouble or expense.

TESTIMONIALS.

"13, Waltherton Road, St. Peter's Park, London, W.

"I have much pleasure in stating my opinion that Mr. Wm. CHINNOCK DYER'S Patent Action for attaching Organ Pedals to a Pianoforte is likely to prove very valuable to Organists and Students of the Organ.

It possesses several advantages over other Actions which have come under my observation, and I shall have no hesitation in recommending the invention to my friends and pupils.

"F. E. GLADSTONE, Mus. Doc., Cantab."

"Dunsham House, Weston-super-Mare.

"I have minutely examined Mr. Wm. CHINNOCK DYER'S Pedals and Action attached to a Piano, and find it in every way satisfactory. The points that strongly recommend his patent are:—

- 1.—Simplicity of Action, and therefore no liability of getting out of order.
- 2.—Quick and ready response to the lightest Pedal touch, so that all degrees of tone are readily obtainable.
- 3.—It is perfectly noiseless in working, which character, seeing that no springs are used and that all the centres are carefully bushed, it is likely to retain after constant use.
- 4.—Compared with the roller-board action—which hitherto I have considered the only satisfactory method of attachment—this new action is inexpensive, and it is not in any way less effective.

"I believe it only wants to be well-known to become the general mode of attaching Organ Pedals to Pianofortes.

"ARTHUR E. CROOK, Mus. Bac., Cantab.

 the German Empire.

EXTRACTS FROM REVIEWS.

"A thoroughly good collection, full of good music, and worthy of a place in the libraries of our Cathedrals. We shall be glad to see further efforts from this composer."—Church Times.

"They are one and all well written and tuneful. . . . The collection may be fairly pronounced to be above the average of such publications.
 . . . In these Six Anthems we find evidences of much careful and thoughtful work."—Musical Times.

 between supplication and thanks, giving are clever."—Athenaeum.

"Rarely does so much fresh and bright material come to us in the shape of Anthems. . . . All these Anthems contain short solos, and the voices require to be efficient to do the music justice; but any well-trained choir, we feel sure, would take pleasure in singing Mr. Crament's music."—Choir.

A minor from this Work, in St. George's Hall, Liverpool, on October 2, and again at the opening of the Organ in Fairfield Presbyterian Church, on October 13. In the annotated programme for the last occasion he writes:—"The name of the composer sufficiently indicates his nationality, and it is also a gratifying proof of the serious purposes to which Scottish musicians are devoting themselves in the varied branches of musical art. The spirited and well-developed movement named above is from 'Twenty-four Musical Sketches for the Harmonium,'

CAROLS FOR USE IN CHURCH DURING CHRISTMAS AND EPIPHANY

BY R. R. CHOPE, M.A., VICAR OF ST. AUGUSTINE'S, SOUTH KENSINGTON, &c.

The Music Edited by HERBERT STEPHEN IRONS, late Organist of Southwell Minster.

With an Introduction by S. BARING-GOULD, M.A., Rector of Lew-Trenchard, Author of "The Lives of the Saints," &c.

In this work there are Carols for Christmas Eve, Christmas Day, St. Stephen, St. John, Holy Innocents, New Year's Eve, New Year's Day, Circumcision, Epiphany, Sundays after Epiphany, Conversion of St. Paul, Purification of B.V.M.

The Traditional Carols are from different Counties and Countries—the Modern by well-known Authors.

"The Epiphany Carols are a noticeable feature in the book, and give it a special value. Mr. Chope has done a real service by the publication of this book."—Guardian.

"By far the best and most copious collection of Carols. We earnestly recommend it."—Literary Churchman.

"A real treasure; an admirable book."—John Bull.

"We hail the appearance of this work with the highest satisfaction, and think that Mr. Chope has laid all lovers of Carols—and indeed we may say all good Christians—under a lasting debt of gratitude by this admirable collection of Carols."—The Choir.

"We welcome with great pleasure Mr. Chope's 'Carols for use in Church during Christmas and Epiphany.' The music is most carefully edited by Mr. Herbert Stephen Irons, who has introduced some original melodies; and there is a learned and interesting historical essay by Mr. Baring-Gould. This book should be found at all Christmas choir festivals. Well adapted for the Church services."—Saturday Review.

Applications for Grants of Carols, Music, or Words should be sent to the Rev. R. R. CHOPE, Vicarage, 117, Queen's Gate, South Kensington, S.W., and should contain a stamped and addressed envelope for reply. A liberal reduction is allowed to the Clergy, Organists, and Schoolmasters on introducing the book.

"Carol singing in church is becoming every year more popular."—Guardian, December 27, 1883.

"Christmas Carols are fast becoming the rule, while but a few years ago the churches where they had been adopted might have been counted on the fingers."—Morning Post, December 26, 1883.

"Epiphany Carols were sung on Sunday in many churches in London, where carol singing is rapidly becoming very popular."—Morning Post, January 8, 1884.

"The Carols have been taken up with much enthusiasm by the younger part of the congregation, and I have hope that we shall have for the first time a large congregation on Christmas evening. I have long felt the want of such a book."—R. G. BULKLEY, St. John's Vicarage, Dukinfield.

"Your Carols will, I hope, become familiar and dear to many who in after life may be in a position to extend their appreciation and teaching."—C. E. COOPER, The College, Hurstpierpoint.

"I congratulate you on so excellent a compilation. I hope it may have a wide circulation."—LIONEL DAWSON-DAMER, Canford Vicarage.

"I am delighted with the book."—W. D. V. DUNCOMBE, The College, Hereford.

"For the third time in twelve years I am introducing your excellent Carols into a country parish."—J. S. HODSON, D.D., Sanderstead Rectory.

"They were taken up with heartiness, and were a source of delight and pleasure to the congregation, many of whom are old Englishmen, who remember singing them."—CHARLES W. HOLLANDS, Bonne Bay Parsonage, Newfoundland.

"A valuable boon to the Church. It will give me pleasure to recommend them. No. 21 has been sung every Christmas Day in Turvey for centuries. The whole village comes to church at three p.m. to sing it."—ROBERT HORWOOD, Holmwood Cottage, Turvey.

"I am very anxious to introduce into my church (St. Michael's, Folkestone) this Christmas your beautiful book."—EDWARD HUSBAND.

"We had our Carols on Christmas Day, and shall of course continue them during the season till Septuagesima. They went uncommonly well, and everyone was delighted."—CAMPELL LOCK, Chalton Rectory.

"It is with great pleasure that I am able to inform you that the more we know of your book the better we like it. It is very likely that before long St. Michael's people will carol from Christmas to Lent."—CHARLES PEPPER, St. Michael's C.E. Schools, Manchester.

"This is the third year my choir have sung your Carols, and I like them exceedingly. They are a vast improvement upon the rubbish which is often sung. Having lived in the land of carols—viz., Wales—where the people go to church at six a.m. to sing them, I can speak from experience."—G. A. PUGH, Curate of Wombourne.

"No such mode of praise has been used in our ancient church since the Reformation."—J. E. SEDGWICK, Stamford-le-Hope Rectory.

"We use the Carols altogether, instead of hymn-books, throughout the Christmas and Epiphany season, and the people seem to appreciate the change."—T. WOOLLEN SMITH, Calverton Vicarage.

"There are some charming Carols interspersed throughout the whole book. I feel sure my congregation will appreciate them. I am rather tired of 'Ancient and Modern' for Christmas and Epiphany."—FORBES WINSLOW, St. Paul's Lodge, St. Leonards.

8VO, PRICE 6d.

THE HOLY CITY

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"The work is an honour to English Art, and has elevated its composer into a place of distinction amongst native musicians."—Queen.

"A good sound musical work is this 'Holy City.' I have no hesitation in saying that it creditably represents English art, and does honour not only to the skill but to the judgment and taste of Mr. Gaul."—Daily Telegraph.

"The reception was favourable in the extreme, and the Cantata must henceforth be classed among the successes which the Birmingham Musical Festivals have brought to light."—Standard.

"The Holy City" is evidently the work of a thoughtful as well as a clever composer, and should make its mark among thoroughly English productions of a sacred character."—Musical Times.

"We hope and believe that the reception given last night to Mr. Gaul and his 'Holy City' Cantata will prove an earnest of its popularity and acceptance throughout the length and breadth of the land."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"A most interesting, tuneful, and scholarly work."—Manchester Courier.

"This fine work will considerably enhance Mr. Gaul's reputation as a musician."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

Vocal Score, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; Ditto, paper boards, 3s.; Ditto, scarlet cloth, 4s.; Voice parts, for the use of Choral Societies, each 1s. A selection of Soprano and Contralto Movements for School Use, 1s. 3d. Band Parts on Loan. Tonic Sol-fa Edition, 1s.

London: NOVELLO, EWER and Co.

RUTH

MUSIC BY ALFRED R. GAUL.

"Ruth" is a work of sterling power; its musical form is that of perfect tunefulness combined with simplicity and strength. There is nothing involved about it, nor the least straining after unattainable effects. The composer has grasped his theme in a thoroughly sympathetic manner, and has produced a work which is worthy of the subject. . . . One of the sweetest numbers in the cantata is Ruth's solo, 'Entreat me not to leave thee,' which is instinct with pathetic expression. . . . Boaz's solo, 'Go not from hence, my daughter,' is another effective number. . . . A chorale, 'Nightfall,' is an exquisitely beautiful conception; and the intermezzo, 'Daybreak,' and the jubilant Wedding Chorus which follows, are full of spirit and vivacity, rushing forward with a joyous bound that carries the audience completely away. An enthusiastic encore was given to the intermezzo and chorus."—Bradford Observer.

"That the idyllic story of Ruth is one admirably adapted for artistic illustration is unquestionable, and poets, painters, and musicians have over and over again made it a subject for the exercise of their talents. And we have no hesitation in saying that in its poetical and musical treatment by Mr. Oxford and our townsman, it has been invested with increased interest. . . . Pieces such as Mr. Gaul's Opus 34 are much wanted, and we believe that when the 'Ruth' Cantata is heard in our Town Hall it will be at once accepted as a valuable addition to our stock of music suitable for performance by fairly advanced and advancing societies."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"Bright, tuneful, fresh, and musically—this work will be a great favourite, and will add to Mr. Gaul's reputation. The second part will be liked better than the first; it opens in the harvest-field, and here the real idyll begins, and with it the charm and grace and freshness of Mr. Gaul's inspiration. The maidens' chorus, bright as the morning it greets, and the men's robust and vigorous reply, well introduce the fresh and melodious joy-breathing music of Ruth, the chastened yet hopeful address of Naomi, and the hearty generous welcome of Boaz. . . . The work closes with a short but spirited chorus, 'Rejoice, for blessings round us fall,' which will bear comparison with anything Mr. Gaul has written. An effective fugal passage carefully worked out, but not overdone, is inserted between strains of joyful acclamation of considerable freshness and vigour."—Birmingham Weekly Dart.

"Ruth" has been set to music by several composers; none, however, has become so worthily popular as the Cantata under notice. Although somewhat simple in parts it contains some charming music, and is highly characteristic of the story it so vividly illustrates."—South Wales Express.

"Full of flowing melody."—Salisbury Times.

VOICE-TRAINING EXERCISES

EMIL BEHNKE

AND

CHARLES W. PEARCE.

Price Eighteenpence. In Cloth Boards, Three Shillings.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS, &c.

"Tenbury, July 14, 1884.

"FREDERICK A. G. OUSELEY."

"October 4, 1884.

"I like the Vocal Exercises very much; they are scientific, systematic, and ingenious.

"JOHN STAINER."

"This is a novel work, both in plan and detail, and the combined labours of a well-known scientific lecturer on the voice and an excellent musician have brought the undertaking to a successful issue. . . . The exercises are melodious and attractive, and are planned to do their work without the possibility of strain or fatigue. The pianoforte part is everywhere judicious and artistic. These very complete and satisfactory training exercises are printed in six different books for the same number of voices, thus: soprano, mezzo-soprano, contralto, tenor, baritone, and bass. The work may be safely and cordially recommended to vocal students and even to practised singers, quite apart from any grounds of discussion concerning methods of teaching."—Musical Standard, August 30, 1884.

"The conjunction of science and musicianship expressed by the names of the two authors of this well thought of and well carried out work is a sufficient guarantee as to its objectivity and musical adaptability. . . . The exercises are, with great skill, arranged so as to give a maximum of benefit with a minimum of fatigue. They are melodious and natural, and are consequently pleasant of performance. The accompanying pianoforte part is helpful without being either distracting or unduly prominent; and the work is throughout characterised by artistic forethought and good musicianship. Its popularity will doubtless be extensive in accordance with its merits."—Academic Gazette, September 1, 1884.

"They are constructed so as to fit in with the vocal principles which Mr. Behnke teaches, while at the same time they are melodious and interesting."—Tonic Sol-fa Reporter, August, 1884.

"This is a valuable series of vocal studies, based on the principles advocated in 'The Mechanism of the Human Voice,' by E. Behnke, and in the more elaborate work, by Messrs. Lennox Browne and Emil Behnke, entitled 'Voice, Song, and Speech.' . . . The exercises are published for each of the several ranges of voice, and from their utility and cheapness they deserve to find a very large sale."—Illustr. London News, August 9, 1884.

"They will not only be found most valuable and admirably adapted to the purpose for which they were written, but they are at the same time melodious and attractive. The work is quite devoid of theory, for which the authors refer elsewhere, and it is divided into progressive parts, each part containing exercises on the various details requiring cultivation and development in the production of a good voice. These exercises are the best of the kind we have seen, and clearly printed and neatly got up. We wish the authors every success in their endeavours to facilitate the cultivation of vocal art."—Public Opinion, September 12, 1884.

"A personal experience in my own family enables me to speak in the highest terms of Mr. Behnke's method, which is absolutely invaluable for increasing the power, resonance, and flexibility of the voice, both in speaking and singing, and I am glad to be able to recommend the exercises as being thoroughly practical and most useful."—C. D. Household Words, October 11, 1884.

"The combined simplicity and utility of the plan upon which these studies have been written will commend them to the notice of professors and students alike. Theoretical subjects are wisely eschewed, and the books deal solely with matters that concern the actual training of the voice. Proper importance has been lent to the system of production, and the exercises on Resonance and Attack will especially be found excellent. Altogether Messrs. Behnke and Pearce's studies are of a description that cannot fail to be used with beneficial effect."—Sunday Times, August 31, 1884.

"That the work is based upon sound philosophical principles is certain, and it may be said with confidence that no better exercises for the purposes of voice cultivation are to be met with. No attempt is made to teach the art of singing from notes. The compilers' efforts have been directed to special objects—the production of pure vocal tone and the power of commanding the vocal organs—and we can confidently recommend the publication to those who are pursuing these objects."—Birmingham Gazette, August 14, 1884.

"The authors have conferred a great boon on the musical world and on the public generally by the publication of these exercises, which so happily combine science with simplicity, and system with charm. The very youngest pupils will feel and enjoy all this, and the elder ones will see that a new era has dawned in instruction books for singers."—Oldham Evening Chronicle, August 19, 1884.
