At Mr. Stockley's fourth and last Orchestral Concert, on the 24th ult., the principal features were Gade's Fourth Symphony—which had to be substituted at short notice for Dr. Villiers Stanford's Serenade, owing to the difficulty of procuring copies—Sullivan's "In Memoriam" Overture, two of Dvorák's Slav dances, Schubert's "Rosamunde" ballet music in G, Weber's Overture to "Der Freischütz," and Handel's Fourth Organ Concerto, to which Mr. Stimpson, who played the organ part, contributed some additional band parts, calculated to meet the requirements of the modern orchestra. The playing of these various pieces showed that the band, which numbers 80 performers, is steadily gaining in strength, unity, and precision, and that it is in a fair way to occupy the same relative position in Birmingham as that filled so creditably by Mr. Hallé's orchestra in Manchester. Madame Patey sang Gounod's "Golden thread" and Haydn's "Spirit song" in her most effective manner. Mr. Maas excited great enthusiasm by his singing of Handel's "Sound an alarm," which had to be repeated, Meyerbeer's "Disperso il crin," from "L'Etoile du Nord," and Wagner's "Prize song." Miss Nannie Reynolds favourably impressed the audience by her playing of Chopin's Andante Spianato and Polonaise in E flat; and her father, the contra-basso player, created a great sensation by his masterly playing of Lasserre's Fantasia on "Fra Diavolo."

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THERE has been almost a dearth of musical performances in Leeds during the past month. Bach's "Passion" Music, according to St. Matthew, given in the Leeds Parish Church, on the 4th ult., attracted a large congregation. The Parish Church has for half a century borne a very high reputation for the richness of its choral services, and for the able manner in which, on special occasions, sacred works of the highest class are performed by the choir. The "Passion" was produced in this instance on a scale of completeness which is seldom reached in any of our English churches. The ordinary choir was supplemented by a chorus of ladies and gentlemen connected with various musical organisations in Leeds. Mrs. Hutchinson and Mrs. Creser sang two of the principal parts, the others being in the hands of Mr. Charles Blagbro', Mr. Morton, and Mr. Theodore France, members of the choir. The Church now possesses an organ of the very finest quality, and in Dr. Creser an organist and choirmaster who combines executive ability of a high order with good taste and considerable experience. The accompaniments consequently occupied an important place in the performance, which, generally, was very impressive.

On the 22nd ult., Gade's "Erl-King's Daughter" was given in the Leeds Church Institute by the Emmanuel Choral Society to a moderate audience. Considering that this is only its second session, the Society has made considerable progress in the musical art. Very fair justice was done to the beautifully coloured choral numbers, but the rich instrumental scoring had no place in the performance save in the shape of a pianoforte accompaniment, an accompaniment which, it ought to be said in justice to the pianist, Mr. Horace Reyner, was admirable. The soloists were Miss Annie Woods (soprano), Miss Greenwood (contralto), and Mr. H. Wilson (baritone), all of whom sang with judgment and fair vocal ability. The Conductor was Mr. J. Lister Smith, who discharged his duties efficiently. A miscellaneous programme followed the Cantata.

The special performance in memory of the late Duke of Albany, given by Dr. Spark on the great organ in the Town Hall, on March 29, was attended by a large and most sympathetic audience. The programme was judiciously selected, and included Beethoven's Funeral March (from his Sonata in A flat), Mendelssohn's air, "O, rest in the Lord," a Selection from Mozart's "Requiem," the Dead March in "Saul," and other appropriate pieces, all of which were admirably played.

On the 3rd ult., at the Mechanics' Institution, Bradford, the Temperance Choral Society performed a new historical Cantata, entitled "Magna Charta," by Mr. Henry Coward, of Sheffield. The event attracted some attention. The Bradford Observer speaks of the work as "honest and earnest," but certain it is that the Cantata will never set the musical world on fire. Mr. Coward has a good knowledge of harmony, and a certain fund of a rather mechanical kind of melody; but there is neither imagination nor dramatic instinct to fuse these elements into a warm and living unity. The Cantata is constructed as a succession of clearly-defined solos and choruses, alternating in a rather perfunctory fashion. The part of Justice is taken by the soprano, Stephen Langton by the tenor, and King John by the bass. The performance was an efficient one. The soloists were Miss Tomlinson, Mr. J. W. Calverley, and Mr. W. Golden; and the accompaniments were rendered by Mr. W. H. Tate and Mr. W. H. Haste. Mr. T. H. Salter was the Conductor.

At St. James's Schools, Idle, the first of three Subscription Concerts, promoted by the Idle Harmonic Union, was given on the 3rd ult. The performances consisted of sacred and secular choruses and songs. The Concert was very successful. Dr. Stainer's new Cantata "St. Mary Magdalen" was produced on the 3rd ult., by the Shipley Choral Society, in the Victoria Hall, Saltaire. The work was excellently interpreted under Mr. Alfred Broughton's management, and well received. The soloists were Miss Clara Jowett, Mrs. Ashcroft Clarke, Mr. Charles Blagbro', and Mr. J. Dewhirst. The Cantata was followed by several miscellaneous items. On the 9th ult. Spohr's "Calvary" was given in Airedale College Hall. The choral portions were sung by members of the Bradford Festival Choral Society, and the principals were Miss Clara Jowett, Madame Armitage, Mrs. Clarke, Mr. A. Broughton, and Mr. Thornton Wood. On the 22nd ult. the Bradford St. Cecilia Society performed the third part of Schumann's "Faust" and Schubert's "Song of Miriam." Schumann's music to "Faust" is entirely new to this part of the country; indeed, the music generally of that composer is but seldom produced in Yorkshire. It is difficult to say why this is the case, for such works as have been given, "Paradise and the Peri," for instance, have been followed with encouraging results. But Schumann is only for the cultivated musician who can follow his uneasy and ever-varying currents of thought, and those who would interpret his fanciful tone pictures must first overcome great difficulties. On this occasion the Society, although but a body of amateurs comparatively unaccustomed to such trying ordeals, succeeded most intelligently, to the credit not only of themselves but of Mr. Hecht, their Conductor.

A few of the leading musicians of the North of England assembled in the Leeds Town Hall, on the 23rd ult., under the presidency of Dr. Hiles, of Manchester, to receive a deputation from the Society of Professional Musicians. The meeting decided to support the Society, the object of which is to organise the profession of music throughout the country.

MUSIC IN THE WEST.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

MUSIC has rather flagged in Bristol lately, and, except for the Monday Popular Concerts, there has not been much going on of great interest. The fourth Popular Concert of this season was given on March 31, when, in consequence of the death of the Duke of Albany, the programme was preceded by the Dead March in "Saul," followed by the National Anthem, the immense audience standing throughout. The programme, a very interesting one, was as follows:—Overture, "The Flying Dutchman," Wagner; Grand Symphony, "The Scandinavian," F. H. Cowen; Air, "O mio Fernando," Donizetti; Overture, "Der Freischütz," Weber. Part II.: Concerto in G minor, for pianoforte and orchestra, Mendelssohn; Song, "Sunshine and Rain," Blumenthal; Largo (arranged for solo, violin, harp, organ, and orchestra), Handel; "Melodie à l'Espagnole," Cowen; Song, "Light in Darkness," Cowen; Selection, "Il Trovatore," Verdi. The work of the band was remarkably good throughout the evening, only a few slight faults being noticeable. Mr. Cowen conducted his Scandinavian Symphony, which received a masterly interpretation, and was warmly applauded. Mr. Cowen also conducted his other composition and the Largo, in which latter piece the solos were undertaken by Mr. Carrington (violin), Mr. Cheshire (harp), and Mr. Riseley (organ). In Mendelssohn's G minor Concerto, Miss Maud Bennett, a young local pianist, evinced a firm, clear touch and good execution. The vocalist was Miss Eleanor Rees, Westmoreland Scholar of the Royal Academy of Music, who created a most favourable impression.

The fifth Concert was given on Easter Monday, when a more "popular" programme than usual was selected. The attendance was so large that many were unable to gain admission, and numbers stood throughout the Concert. The first item was the Overture to the "Midsummer Night's Dream," followed by the Scherzo and Wedding March, admirably played by the band. Then came Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, which was most attentively listened to, and evidently highly appreciated. The interpretation of this beautiful work reflected the greatest credit on both Conductor and band. The first part closed with Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony. Part II. opened with a selection from "Faust," given for the second time this season, by special desire, and was followed by Nicolai's Overture to the "Merry Wives of Windsor," which is always popular in Bristol. The vocalists were Miss L. Phillips, of Bath, and Miss Ethel Winthrop, who each contributed two songs, and were heartily applauded, being recalled after each effort.

The Saturday Musical Association gave Cowen's "Rose Maiden," in Colston Hall, on the 6th ult., and a miscellaneous selection, with Mr. Gordon's usual chorus and band, and with Mr. Riseley at the organ. On the 19th ult. the People's Concert Society gave a Concert, when Hutchinson's Cantata "The Story of Elaine" was the principal item. It was very fairly performed, and there was a good audience. On the same evening the musical play "Guy Mannering" was given at the New Theatre Royal, with Mr. Sims Reeves and his son, Mr. Herbert Reeves, as two of the chief characters. It is almost needless to say that Mr. Sims Reeves received enthusiastic applause on his appearance. His singing quite fascinated the large audience, and as the evening went on he was cheered again and again.

Mr. George Riseley gave Organ Recitals at Colston Hall, on the 3rd and the 12th ult., and two on Good Friday, in the afternoon and evening, when the programmes consisted of sacred music.

Miss Aylward's second Chamber Concert was given at the Assembly Rooms, Salisbury, on the 17th ult., when the programme was confined entirely to Beethoven's works, and included the Quintet in E flat (Op. 16), the Kreutzer Sonata, and the Septuor in E flat (Op. 20). Miss Aylward was associated with Mr. Burnett (violin), Mr. W. H. Hill (viola), Mr. Whitehouse (violoncello), Mr. A. Aylward (contra-bass), Mr. Malsch (oboe), Mr. Lazarus (clarinet), Mr. Catchpole (horn), Mr. Wotton (bassoon). Mr. Albert James contributed two songs, and the audience, which was large, was highly appreciative.

The Choral Society gave "St. Paul," on the 22nd ult., with full band and chorus. The principal vocalists were Miss Margaret Hoare, Miss Alexandra Ehrenberg, Mr. Hayden, and Mr. Thorndike. Mr. Aylward conducted.

On Palm Sunday Rossini's "Stabat Mater" was given at the pro-Cathedral with full orchestral accompaniment.

At the last of the Exeter Concerts for the present season a novelty was produced in the shape of a Symphony, for organ and orchestra, by M. Guilmant. This proved to be the well-known Sonata in D minor, which has been most effectively arranged in its new form by the author. The instrumentation is excellent, and the work was received with much applause. This is, as far as I am aware, its first performance as a Symphony in England. On Good Friday Gounod's "Daughters of Jerusalem" was sung at the Cathedral afternoon service, the choir being augmented by about fifty amateurs, selected from the various choral societies of the city, as was also the case at the afternoon service on Easter Day.

Two Concerts were given in the Victoria Hall, Exeter, on the 17th ult., on the occasion of the Seventh Annual Festival of the Western Counties Musical Association. The programme at both Concerts was of an exceptionally high and attractive character. In the afternoon Mozart's "Requiem Mass" and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" were produced in a manner not unworthy of their exalted character and of the reputation of the band and chorus to whom the onerous duty was assigned. The chorus numbered 311 voices, viz., 108 sopranos, 76 altos, 57 tenors, and 70 basses. They were contributed by the various branches as follows: Budleigh Salterton, 18; Exeter, 110; Exmouth, 26; Honiton, 20; Newton Abbot, 18; North Devon, 15; Porlock, 1; Sidmouth, 4; Silvertown, 21; Taunton, 17; Teignmouth, 10; Tiverton, 29; Wellington, 22. The band comprised 66 performers, of which 29 were professional and 37 amateur players. As in the case of last year's band, it was again noticeable that only two players were resident east of Bristol. The soloists were Miss Fonblanque, Miss Mary McLean, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Bridson. Mr. D. J. Wood was Conductor, and Mr. E. M. Vinnicombe, as Organist and Accompanist, and Mr. M. G. Rice, as leader of the band, acquitted themselves with marked ability. The afternoon Concert was well attended, and was a decided success in every way. The "Requiem Mass" was the first work on the programme. Of the choruses, the "Sanctus" was, perhaps, the most successful joint effort on the part of the orchestra and chorus. Miss Fonblanque's telling soprano was heard to great advantage in "Te decet hymnus" and in the concluding solo, "Tuba mirum," and Miss McLean was highly successful in the "Benedictus." Mr. Lloyd did full justice to the parts allotted to him, and Mr. Bridson made a most favourable impression. Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," which followed, was by no means a less significant triumph for both orchestra and chorus. The three introductory orchestral movements were, as a whole, very effectively rendered, and the work of the chorus throughout was very satisfactory. The solos were taken by Miss Fonblanque and Mr. Lloyd in a manner which left nothing to be desired. At the evening Concert the pièce de résistance was Smart's Cantata "The Bride of Dunkerron," which was performed for the first time in Devonshire, and most favourably received. The rendering of the choruses, though not altogether faultless, was marked by an efficiency of interpretation and executive power which was very commendable. Miss Fonblanque, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Bridson were the soloists. There was a large attendance, and the festival of this year was certainly the greatest success that has been achieved by the Association.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

MUSIC in the Scottish Metropolis was last month chiefly associated with the commemoration of the Tercentenary of Edinburgh University. The proceedings in connection with this important event lasted four days, and, thanks to the energy and spirit of the occupant of the Music Chair, Sir Herbert Oakeley, a position of prominence was given to the art, which was simply its due. It is not in place here to do more than record the musical portion of the celebration, but it may be mentioned that Sir F. A. Gore Ouseley and Mr. Charles Hallé were among the number of distinguished men on whom the honorary degree of LL.D. was conferred, at the meeting held for the purpose in the United Presbyterian Synod Hall, on Thursday, the 17th ult.

On Wednesday, the 16th, the Commemoration celebration commenced with a service in the Cathedral Church of St. Giles, restored, it may be mentioned, through the munificence of the late Sir William Chambers. After prayer by Dr. Lees, the incumbent, and reading of the lessons by Professor Taylor, the musical part of Wednesday's service was entered upon by the singing of the Old Hundredth Psalm by a choir of 200 voices, sixty of them students. The Te Deum was sung to Hopkins's chant. Very few of the congregation took part in the latter, the music being unfamiliar and the noble hymn itself little known. Dr. Story's hymn "Within our Father's house," to the music by Sir Herbert Oakeley, was better rendered. After an eloquent sermon by Professor Flint, in which he claimed a very high place for the University as a reflex of the national religious life, the congregation joined heartily in singing Luther's hymn "Now thank we all our God," the service coming to a fitting conclusion by a very effective rendering of the "Hallelujah" Chorus from the "Messiah."

On the afternoon of the same day Professor Oakeley gave an Organ Recital in the Music Class-room, Park Place. The programme embraced selections from Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Pleyel, Bach, and Ouseley, the latter being represented by his prelude for organ in F major, all being played with excellent effect, and in presence of a fashionable and distinguished assemblage.

On Friday afternoon, the 18th, the members of the University Musical Society gave a Concert in the Music Hall, under the direction of Professor Oakeley. The Choir, about one hundred and fifty in number, was carefully selected as to musical efficiency, and supported by an orchestra of fifty-eight performers, chiefly from Edinburgh and Glasgow, some students being among the number. The choral pieces had all been heard before at University Concerts, but they have never been better sung. The choralists seemed to be on their mettle, inspired by the occasion no doubt, and in regard to expression, volume of tone, and tunefulness, the singing was all that could be desired. Professor Oakeley's setting of "Alma Mater," appropriately opening the Concert, was vigorously sung. Then followed Mendelssohn's "Festgesang" Chorus, and Bishop's "Hail to the Chief," both excellently rendered. Sir H. Oakeley's "Home they brought her warrior dead," one of his happiest efforts and very effective in its choral adaptation, was carefully and feelingly interpreted. The only other choral arrangement that need be referred to is the Scottish melody "What's a' the steer," which, being unaccompanied, was a capital test of the ability of the Association—a test which they stood perfectly in every respect. The Overtures to "The Magic Flute" and "Euryanthe" were played very well indeed, considering the impromptu character of the band. Equal justice was done to the March from Sir F. Gore Ouseley's Oratorio "St. Polycarp"—included in compliment to the Oxford Professor, who was present, and who must have been gratified by the hearty appreciation of his scholarly and tuneful music. Professor Oakeley's "Edinburgh" March was also in the programme. The Concert, which was excellent all through, was concluded by the singing of the National Anthem.

At night a Students' Symposium took place in the Music Hall. Many of the distinguished visitors attended it. The Symposium was of the nature of a Smoking Concert, and with its absolute freedom of restraint, and its homeliness and good feeling, was of the most thoroughly enjoyable character.

On Saturday evening, the 12th ult., an Organ and Choral Concert took place in the Music Class-room, Park Place, under the direction of Professor Oakeley. The programme included the Overture to Haydn's "Seven Last Words," the Credo, Sanctus, and Gloria from Oakeley's Service in E flat, and other of the Professor's own compositions. The choral part of the programme was undertaken by members of the Edinburgh Choral Union, under the conductorship of Mr. Collinson.

A performance of Haydn's Oratorio "The Creation" was given, on the 15th ult., in Edinburgh pro-Cathedral, by the choir connected with that church. As a rule the choruses were satisfactorily rendered, the solos, too, being in competent hands. An efficient band played the accompaniments. Mr. R. McHardie conducted.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

NUMEROUS Concerts have taken place since my last letter, mostly by the musical associations of the city and its neighbourhood.

The fourth Annual Concert of the Glasgow University Choral Society was given on March 25, in the Bute Hall, which has just been added to the University by the munificence of the Marquis of Bute. The chorus, assisted by a few honorary members, numbered eighty voices, and the orchestra thirty-five instrumentalists, including some well-known amateurs, led by Mr. W. H. Cole, all being under the direction of Mr. Montague Smith, Organist of the University. The selection of choral music included Mendelssohn's "Festgesang" chorus, Müller's "Spring's Delights," A. C. Mackenzie's "A Franklyn's Dogge," and Mr. Montague Smith's spirited part-song "To arms," orchestrally accompanied. The solo singing was quite a feature of the entertainment, several airs being sung by individual members of the Society with conspicuous ability. Beethoven's Trio in C minor, for violin, cello, and piano, was played with considerable taste. The orchestra played the Overtures, "Crown Diamonds" and "Fra Diavolo." At the final rehearsal prior to the Concert, the members of the Society presented a handsome ivory and gold bâton to Mr. Montague Smith as a mark of esteem.

The Glasgow Select Choir, conducted by Mr. James Allan, gave its final Concert for the season on March 29, in St. Andrew's Hall, the programme consisting chiefly of hymns and anthems, the latter called in Scotland scripture sentences (to disarm prejudice, doubtless), all being selected from the hymnals of our three leading Presbyterian denominations. These Concerts, of which the choir has given several in Glasgow and other towns, are highly valued by all who are desirous of raising the standard of divine worship in Scotland, as examples of what congregational singing might and should attain to—an "ideal rendering" in fact of church praise. The choruses were given with the usual exquisite taste and refinement, and there was a large audience.

At Kilmalcolm, near Glasgow, on March 28, A. R. Gaul's Cantata "Ruth" was performed by the Musical Association, a body of some fifty chorists, under the charge of Mr. Paterson Cross, of Greenock. The "Chorus of Reapers," and particularly the finale "Rejoice," were very well sung indeed. The soloists who represented the characters of Ruth, Naomi, and Boaz acquitted themselves with care and taste. Misses Ross and Thomson officiated at the piano and harmonium.

The Spring Fast-day occurred on the 3rd ult., and on that evening Concerts were given by the Glasgow Tonic Sol-fa Society (under Mr. W. M. Miller) with Haydn's "Creation," Miss Mary Davies, Mr. Welch, and Signor Foli being the principals; the Glasgow Select Choir with a programme of sacred part-songs, motets, &c.; and the Musical Union (conducted by Mr. W. Moodie), a transpontine Society, which essayed the "Messiah."

On the previous evening, the 2nd ult., the Crosshill Musical Association gave a very satisfactory rendering of Mr. Edwin Such's cantata "Narcissus and Echo," the work creating a highly favourable impression. It seems remarkable that such a pleasant work as it proved to be has not been heard here before, but I shall quite expect that now the cantata is known, with its attractiveness and comparative simplicity, it will be in request by societies. Mr. Peter Smith conducted, and Mr. G. W. Hopper accompanied on the piano.

So intimate are the relations, one way and another, between Glasgow and the Vale of Leven—where the novelist Smollett was born, and of whose once "limpid stream" he sang in still remembered lines—that mention may quite fittingly be made of a Concert, which took place on the 4th ult. in the Town Hall of Alexandria, by the Vale of Leven Choral Society, and at which Handel's "Acis and Galatea" was performed. The chorus, which numbers about a hundred voices, and is under the excellent training of Mr. James Love, acquitted themselves well. The soloists were Mr. Arthur Castings (tenor), from Hereford Cathedral, in room of Mr. J. Howell, indisposed, Mrs. Haden, from Dundee, and Mr. Robert Riddell. A good band, under Mr. Cole, of Glasgow, played the accompaniments.

On the 9th ult. the Glasgow South Side Choral Society, which is under the conductorship of Mr. A. McKean, gave a performance of Jackson's Cantata "The Year" in the City Hall, the audience being a fairly numerous one. This is probably the second occasion only on which this melodious composition of the Masham bearer of the musical name has been heard in Scotland. The singing of the South Side Choral Society might be more refined, but it is marked by vigour and invariable tunefulness, and all the parts are fairly mature in tone. The waltz-like chorus, "Oh, the flow'ry month of June," and the unaccompanied part-song "Let us quit the leafy arbour" were by far the best rendered choral numbers—the latter showing what the choir might do in expressive singing.

The Glasgow Temperance Choral Society, which draws its members from the various temperance bodies in the City, came before their friends on the 11th ult. with a modest programme of part-songs, glees, and choruses. Mr. John Bell conducted.

Heinrich Hofmann's Cantata "Melusina" was produced on the 10th ult., in the Dixon Hall, by the Pollokshields Musical Association, which has the distinction of having been the first Society in Britain to "do" one of the composer's choral works, which on that initiatory occasion was also "Melusina." In the interval, "Cinderella," by the same composer, has likewise been brought forward by the Society. A very good rendition indeed was given of "Melusina," the simpler work of the two, on the present occasion, the choir being extremely good, and the solos if not in quite such competent hands as formerly, being still respectably executed. Mr. W. T. Hoeck conducted, and there was a small orchestra in addition to piano and harmonium.

Gade's "Psyche" was given by the Partick Musical Society, on the 11th ult., under the experienced bâton of Mr. H. McNabb. The performance reflected considerable credit on the choir and soloists.

A somewhat curiously arranged musical entertainment was given in the City Hall, on the evening of Saturday, the 12th ult. Seven "select" choirs (so styled), were brought forward, each singing two part-songs or glees. The occasion drew a crowded house, and the praiseworthy object for which the Concert was got up, namely, to provide funds towards the establishment of a branch in Glasgow of the London Tonic Sol-fa College was largely benefited. Some of the singing was very good, and some of it was poor. It would be invidious to enter into particulars, as competitive singing was not the intention of the promoters of the Concert.

On Monday evening, the 14th ult., Dr. Stainer's new Cantata "St. Mary Magdalen" was performed by the Musical Association connected with Pollokshields Parish Church, of which Mr. Alfred Heap is Organist and Choir-master. The accompaniments were represented by a piano and harmonium. Mr. Robert Donaldson, jun., and Miss Smith took part with Mr. Heap in the accompaniments. Mr. Heap using the bâton in conducting the choruses and concerted numbers. There was an excellent attendance.

An excellent performance of F. H. Cowen's Cantata "The Rose Maiden" was given in Uddington (near Glasgow), on the 15th ult., by the Musical Association, Mr. James Allan conducting. The choral singing was marked by the greatest possible attention to expression. On the same date the choir of Camphill United Presbyterian Church rendered a programme of secular music in the hall of the church. Much attention is given to music by this congregation, and the choir makes frequent appearances. The chief item in the selection of pieces was Jensen's "Feast of Adonis," and among the smaller numbers the finely written chorus "Let the past be dead" from Mackenzie's "Colomba."

The Hillhead Musical Association, which has now ended its twelfth year, chose for its Concert, on the 16th ult., Alfred Cellier's setting of "Gray's Elegy," together with part-songs by Mendelssohn, Schubert, &c. Mr. W. T. Hoeck conducted.

On the 18th ult. the first Concert of the Glasgow Southern Boys' Choir took place in the Dixon Hall. The object of the Association is to draw attention to the advantage of boys' voices for church choirs, these being almost unemployed except in Episcopalian churches. The juveniles made a very good appearance in some part-songs and glees, the tenor and bass parts being supplied by local choralists, members of the Society, who take an interest in its prosperity. Mr. H. McNabb is its trainer and Conductor.

An able Society, if somewhat limited in point of numbers, has existed for eleven years at Bothwell, near Glasgow, and is now under the conductorship of Mr. W. T. Hoeck. It gave its second Concert for the season on the 18th ult., Mackenzie's Cantata "The Bride" and Macfarren's "May-day" forming the chief part of the programme.

I have only further to note a Concert on the 18th ult. by the Mount Vernon Musical Society, under Mr. James Allan, at which Parker's Cantata "Sylvia" was produced with very fair success. I think this exhausts Association Concerts for the month and for the season. I have something to tell about the financial results of the last Choral Union season, but it must stand till next month, seeing I have encroached so much on your space already.

MUSIC IN AMERICA.

New York, April 8.

THE sale of seats for the Wagner performances has been so great that another series of three Concerts will be given on May 7, 9 and 10. To the singers who are to appear in the first Concerts (as already reported in this correspondence) Madame Nilsson will be added for the May series. The programmes are of the highest degree of interest, and comprise large portions of "Tannhäuser," "Lohengrin," "Parsifal," "Rheingold," and "Die Walküre."

The usual amount of interest in the musical Festivals is this year heightened, and in some places brought almost to fever heat, by the promise of so much Wagner music, and the actual presence of the great Viennese trio of Wagner singers, who arrived yesterday in New York by the "Alaska." The Wagner rehearsals for orchestra have gone on steadily for some time, and the full rehearsals will now be unintermitting. The outline of the tournee under Mr. Thomas (with Materna, Winkelmann, and Scaria) includes Concerts in New York, Boston, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, St. Louis, Milwaukee, Detroit, Toledo, and Cleveland; and, in Canada, Montreal and Toronto; while formal musical Festivals will be held in Richmond, Baltimore, Washington, Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, Chicago, Memphis, Kansas City, Minneapolis, and Buffalo.

The Cincinnati Festival, which is the Sixth Biennial in the regular series, occurring on May 20, 21, 22, 23, and 24, will include, besides the extended Wagner selections, the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven, Brahms's "German Requiem," "Israel in Egypt," and "The Redemption." The Festivals in the other cities named will be hardly less important, so you may readily judge of the musical ferment now discernible in this country.

Here, in town, we are not so easily stirred, but we are very busy, with the Wagner music actually sounding notes of preparation, one opera going, another coming, and the customary crescendo of one season's series of concerts, all of which rise to the greatest height about this time, in order to end the year's work with éclat.

The last of the (extra) Orchestral Matinéés of the Brooklyn Philharmonic series occurred on March 19, with an excellent programme.

The fifth New York Philharmonic Concert was as follows: Symphony, G minor, (Mozart); Concerto, No. 4, D minor (Rubinstein), Mr. Rafael Joseffy; Symphony in C, No. 2, Op. 61 (Schumann). The performance of the Mozart work by an orchestra so excelling in the interpretation of modern scores was a triumph of the art of conducting quite beyond description.

Sullivan and Gilbert's opera "The Princess Ida" has been withdrawn.

The seventh Brooklyn Philharmonic Concert presented the Bach Toccata in F, arranged for orchestra by Esser; the third part of Schumann's "Faust" music, and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. Miss Amy Sherwin and Miss Winant were among the solo singers.

The programme of the sixth Concert of the Symphony Society was as follows:—Overture, Scherzo and Finale (Schumann); Concerto for Pianoforte, with Orchestra (Raff)—Pianoforte, Herr Carl Faelten; Grand Quatuor (Op. 131), scored for full orchestra by Carl Mueller (first time in America), Beethoven; "Rheingold," Entrance of the Gods into Walhalla (Wagner). The Beethoven Quatuor was, upon the whole, very well received by the judges and critics (who, in New York at least, are not invariably the same persons).

At the final Concert of the New York Chorus Society Dvorák's "Stabat Mater" was produced for the first time in America, before an overflowing audience. The performance was admirable, and the work made a profound impression. The best criticism which has been written of it says:—

"Seldom has a new work of sterling merit met with such immediate and emphatic success. Those who observe the signs of the times must perceive that now the fountains of Italian music are exhausted a new stream of melody is being turned into European music. It is more healthy in tone, less artificial in structure, and suggests the open fields and forests rather than the hot-houses in which floriture and rank arias are reared. The 'Stabat Mater' illustrates this new tendency. It is not only full of melody, but the melody is simple and yet never commonplace, because it rests on a substantial, rich, and varied harmonic basis. The accompaniment also is melodious in all its parts, and this gives the score a polyphonic aspect, although never at the expense of clearness. The changes of key are often surprisingly beautiful, being sometimes brought about through suspension, at other times by an abrupt but natural transition which suggests Schubert in manner rather than in substance. The instrumentation gives evidence of an exquisite colour sense, rare even at the present day. All the families of instruments are impartially considered, and true genius is displayed in the manner in which certain instruments are combined with the voices, no less than in the transitions from one tint to another, which are always arranged with a sense analogous to that for complementary colours and contrasts in the world of sight; and this is a feature to which most composers do not pay sufficient attention. Dvořák's treatment of the voices is no less commendable than that of the instruments."

It will perhaps be no news to you that Mr. Thomas has secured for the Chorus Society next season the new work which Mr. A. C. Mackenzie is writing for the Norwich Festival.

Mr. Abbey's opera season ends this week, and Mr. Mapleson's begins on Easter Monday. Mr. Abbey has produced nothing of moment since my last writing. Gounod's "Romeo and Juliet" is again announced for to-morrow evening, but announcements and subsequent non-performances of it have been so frequent as to become a standing joke.

Mr. Abbey's retirement leaves the question "what next?" yet unanswered formally as concerns the new opera-house. He has offered to manage affairs next year if the directors will re-imburse him for his losses to date. Meantime, he has a performance appointed for his benefit, on April 21, which is likely to prove a "thumper." Mr. W. H. Vanderbilt yesterday sent his cheque for four thousand dollars (say, £800) as the price of his own box for that evening.

Mr. Mapleson and his company have returned to town. He really had extraordinary pecuniary success in the "Far West," particularly in San Francisco. So far he proposes positively nothing of any consequence for his Spring season here.

Last evening the New York Orchestra Society gave its first Concert. This is a new, completely equipped band, composed of the younger members of the profession, who do not find entrance into the ranks of the Philharmonic, &c. It is under the direction of Mr. W. G. Dietrich, a musician of reputation, and performed in a very good manner a rather ambitious programme.

With the end of the present (third) series of the Boston Symphony Concerts, Mr. Georg Henschel resigns his post as Musical Director, intending, as you know, to go with Mrs. Henschel to England. The two are giving three farewell vocal Concerts here, which are marked by their wonted good taste of conception and performance. Mr. Henschel's successor in Boston will be Mr. W. Gericke, the fact of whose coming has been contradicted by the Vienna newspapers, but is now officially announced.

Miss Henrietta Beebe has very often of late appeared in Concerts, singing in a really grand and noble way quite beyond anything she had attained before, either in America or during her visit to England.

At the Royal Academy of Music, the Lady Goldsmid Scholarship was competed for on the 5th ult. The Examiners were Messrs. W. Dorrell, H. R. Eyers, F. B. Jewson, H. C. Lunn, Walter Macfarren, Harold Thomas, Frederick Westlake, and the Principal (Chairman). The Scholarship was awarded to Lilian Munster. The Stern-dale Bennett Scholarship was competed for on the same day. The Examiners were Messrs. W. Dorrell, H. R. Eyers, F. B. Jewson, Walter Macfarren, C. Steggall, F. Westlake, and the Principal (Chairman). The Scholarship was awarded to Septimus Webbe. The Santley Prize (a purse of ten guineas, for accompaniment on the piano-forte) was competed for on the 7th ult., and awarded to Agnus Serruys. The Evill Prize (a purse of ten guineas for declamatory English singing) was competed for on the same day, and awarded to Walter Mackway. The Llewelyn Thomas Gold Medal (for declamatory singing) was also competed for on the 7th ult., the Examiners at the three last-named competitions being Messrs G. H. Betjemann, C. Santley, and J. Barnby (Chairman). The Medal was awarded to Marie Etherington. The Parepa-Rosa Scholarship, for vocalists, was competed for on the 21st ult. The Examiners were Messrs. F. R. Cox, W. H. Cummings, E. Fiori, and M. Garcia (Chairman). The Scholarship was awarded to Fanny Eliza Rowe. The competition for the Residue of the Potter Exhibition (two terms) was competed for on the 24th ult. The Examiners were Messrs. H. R. Eyers, H. C. Lunn, Brinley Richards, F. Westlake, and the Principal (Chairman). The Exhibition was awarded to G. W. F. Crowther.

A CORRESPONDENT writes to us as follows:—"The St. Leonards and Hastings Choral Union having just completed its fourteenth season with a second performance of Gounod's 'Redemption,' it may interest some of your readers to trace the musical progress of these towns during the past few years. The Choral Union, like most other Societies, began with comparatively few members, but under the skilful guidance of its popular Conductor, Dr. Abram, it has gradually gone on increasing, till at the present time it numbers nearly 200 members and undertakes works that few societies would have courage to attempt. During the present season the Union has performed, either in church or concert-room, Gounod's 'Redemption,' Stainer's 'St. Mary Magdalen,' Spohr's 'Last Judgment' and 'Calvary,' and Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul.' Last November Dr. Stainer's 'St. Mary Magdalen' was performed twice in St. Paul's Church, Mr. H. C. Nixon, Mus. Bac., presiding at the organ, and Dr. Abram conducting, the tenor solos being undertaken by Mr. Kenningham. During Advent Spohr's 'Last Judgment' was twice performed in the same church, Mr. E. Kennard presiding at the organ and Dr. Abram conducting; and during Holy Week two very fine renderings of Spohr's 'Calvary' were given, with Mr. W. Goss Custard at the organ and Dr. Abram conducting. Early in December a very successful performance of 'The Redemption' was given in the large Concert Hall before an overflowing audience. For this a special picked orchestra was engaged and led by Mr. Carrodus. The solos were taken by Miss Annie Marriott, Miss Spencer Jones, Mr. Joseph Maas, and Mr. Fred. King, and the rendering of the whole composition was most satisfactory. The same work, owing to general desire, has just been repeated, when, in addition to the orchestra, a large organ of forty stops (recently erected) was made available and ably presided over by Mr. E. Kennard, the soloists being Miss Annie Marriott, Madame Patey, Messrs. Kenningham, Birch, and Winn, and the Conductor Dr. Abram. Within the last fourteen years most of the standard Oratorios have been performed by the Union, amongst which may be mentioned Sullivan's 'Martyr of Antioch,' Gade's 'Crusaders,' Rossini's 'Stabat Mater,' Schubert's 'Song of Miriam,' Bach's 'Passion' (St. Matthew), Mendelssohn's 'Athalie,' &c. In conclusion, we much congratulate the two towns on having such a Society, and the two towns and Society combined on having such a Conductor and worker as Dr. Abram."

THE 146th Anniversary Festival of the Royal Society of Musicians took place at St. James's Hall, on the 1st ult., under the presidency of Sir Farrer Herschell, Q.C., M.P. The Chairman, in proposing the health of Her Majesty, referred in sympathetic terms to the recent death of the Duke of Albany, who was one of the patrons of the Society, and this toast, as well as that of "The Prince of Wales and other Members of the Royal Family," was drunk in solemn silence. An eloquent speech on behalf of the objects of the Charity was made by Sir Farrer Herschell, and subscriptions to the amount of upwards of £1,000, including two or three legacies, were announced by Mr. W. H. Cummings, the Hon. Treasurer. The artists who assisted at the Concert were Miss De Fonblanque, Mdlle. Gabrielle Vaillant (violin), and the London Vocal Union, under the direction of Mr. Fred. Walker. Mr. Harvey Löhr acted as accompanist at the pianoforte.

THE 183rd monthly Concert of the St. George's Glee Union was held at the Pimlico Rooms, on the 4th ult. The programme, which was composed of sacred music only, included "God, Thou art great" (Spohr), "Hear my prayer" (Mendelssohn), and Dr. Stainer's "The Daughter of Jairus." Madame Wilson Osman, Miss Marie Etherington, Miss Louise Augarde, Mr. Reginald Groome, and Mr. Stanley Smith were the soloists. In addition to the choruses in the above, the Choir contributed "Judge me, O God" (Mendelssohn) with great effect. The pianoforte and harmonium were presided at by Mr. F. R. Kinke and Mr. H. Schartau respectively, and Mr. Joseph Monday conducted, as usual.

MESSRS. NOVELLO, EWER AND CO. will open a branch house in New York on July 1, their agreement with Messrs. Ditson and Co., who have so long acted as their agents, expiring at that date.

THERE was an impressive series of services on Easter Day at St. Anne's, Hoxton. Holy Communion was celebrated at seven o'clock; again at eight, and at eleven o'clock there was a Full Choral Celebration of the Holy Communion, the Service being Waiton's "Plain Song," with the Easter Hymn and "The strife is o'er" as processional hymns. At half-past three there was a special service for children with processional hymns, Tallis's responses, &c. At seven o'clock there was a Festal Evening, at which an orchestra, conducted by Mr. Goldring, was engaged. After the processional hymn "Christ is risen" had been sung, the band and organist played the "War march of the Priests" ("Athalie"). The band also joined in the Easter Hymn, the effect of the cornet and euphonium in the "Alleluias" being very striking. The Anthem "O give thanks" (Goss), also scored for the orchestra by Mr. Goldring, was performed in a most impressive manner. The sermon was preached by Rev. C. J. Oliphant and as an "Offertoire" the band played with the organ a March in G, by R. Dawre, from the "Lion of Judah," and, after the Benediction, "The Hallelujah" Chorus ("Messiah"); then "Brightly gleams our banner" was sung as a Recessional, and the Service concluded by a performance on the organ of "Worthy is the Lamb" and "Amen" ("Messiah"). The musical arrangements were under the direction of Mr. G. Dixon, the Organist and Choirmaster, who presided at the organ.

The seventh series of the Denmark Hill Concerts was brought to a termination at the Surrey Masonic Hall, Camberwell, on Tuesday evening, the 8th ult. The executants were Herr Joachim, MM. Ries, Zerbini, and Piatti; Miss Agnes Zimmermann occupying the post of pianist. With such a combination of artistic skill little need be said of the manner in which the various items were interpreted, and in no instance did the performance fail to command the highest indications of appreciation. The programme comprised Schumann's Quartet in A minor, Op. 47, No. 1; Max Bruch's Kol Nidrei, for violin-cello; Schumann's Romance in F sharp, Nachtstück in D flat, and Noveltette in F (pianoforte); Spohr's Recit. and Adagio from Sixth Concerto, Nos. 15, 20, and 7 of the Hungarian Dances (Herr Joachim); and Beethoven's Trio in E flat, Op. 70, No. 2 (Miss Agnes Zimmermann, MM. Joachim and Piatti); Mr. Georg Ritter was the vocalist, contributing Mozart's Aria "Il mio tesoro," Schubert's "Den neugierige," and Nicolai's "Spielmannslied." Mr. Zerbini accompanied. The series, from an artistic standpoint, may be pronounced successful in an eminent degree, and, though comparatively well attended, entitled the entrepreneur, Mr. Arthur Chappell, to greater support than the Concerts obtained.

SPOHR'S "Last Judgment" was excellently performed on Good Friday evening, at a Sacred Concert at New Cross Hall, under the direction of Mr. Stedman, for the benefit of the Post Office Orphan Home. The solos were sung by Masters Herbert Townsend, Willie Hull, and Fred. Walenn, Mr. Bernard Lane and Mr. Franklin Clive, the latter gentleman giving much effect to the dramatic portions of the work. The Choir consisted of Mr. Stedman's choir-boys and gentlemen, and the orchestra was led by Mr. Victor Buziau. In the second part, Miss Meredith Elliott achieved a decided success by her very effective singing of the "Lost Chord," and the admirable trumpet playing of Mr. Walter Morrow, in the obligato to "The trumpet shall sound," also deserves notice. Mr. T. Pettit and Master Gussie Toop presided at the harmonium and pianoforte respectively.

WE have received a Prospectus of the London Choral and Orchestral Society, which has been formed for the purpose of giving Concerts, in aid of Missions of the Church of England, in the poor districts of London. Ladies and gentlemen with good voices and a knowledge of music are invited to join as members of the choir, and also gentlemen instrumentalists, both strings and wind, for the orchestra. A nominal subscription of 2s. 6d. per annum has been fixed to meet incidental expenses. Names of those willing to assist and help forward the work of this Society may be sent to W. H. Bailey, Hon. Sec., 44, Netherwood Road, West Kensington; or to T. H. Wilkins, Hon. Conductor, 8, the Pavement, Clapham.

THE students of Madame Sainton Dolby's Vocal Academy for Ladies had a Concert at the Steinway Hall, on Thursday afternoon, the 3rd ult. The main object of entertainments of this description is of course to afford pupils in various stages of training the opportunity of facing public audiences; but Madame Sainton Dolby rarely fails to include some features of genuine musical interest in her programmes. Thus, on the present occasion, the solo singing was varied by excellent performances of Brahms's fine Motet "How long, O Lord," and a very fresh and charming Cantata entitled "Bethlehem," by Reinecke, in which the talent of the Leipzig Capellmeister is seen at its best. Among the pupils whose efforts justified strong hopes of their success as vocalists were Miss Mary Willis, Miss Fanny Moody, Miss Florence New, and Miss Amy Foster. Several first appearances were made, the most successful being that of Miss Hyde, who displayed a light but well trained voice in "With verdure clad." Miss Clarke in Gounod's "There is a green hill" proved her possession of a very fine contralto voice, which, however, is not yet fully under control. The part music was conducted by M. Sainton, and Mr. Leipold presided at the pianoforte.

THE second Biennial Festival of the Chicago Musical Festival Association will take place in the Exposition Building, on the 27th, 28th, 29th, 30th, and 31st inst., under the direction of Mr. Theodore Thomas. The solo vocalists will be Madame Amalia Friedrich-Materna (from the Imperial Opera House, Vienna), Miss Emma Juch, Miss Emily Winant, Herr Hermann Winkelmann, Mr. Theo. Toedt, Mr. Franz Remmert, Mr. Max Heinrich, and Madame Christine Nilsson. The choir, which numbers nine hundred trained voices, has been rehearsing under the direction of Mr. W. L. Tomlins since October last, and a special feature of the selection for the closing matinée will be the singing of the children's chorus, formed from Mr. Tomlins's classes, comprising one thousand voices. The orchestra will be composed of one hundred and seventy of the best instrumentalists in the country, selected especially for the Festival. The programmes, which are of the highest interest, include Haydn's "Creation," selections from Wagner's operas, Berlioz's "Messe des Morts," and Gounod's "Redemption."

ON Monday evening, March 31, an excellent performance of Mendelssohn's "Antigone" (which formed the first part of the programme) was given in the large Hall at Euston Station by the members of the Euston Glee Union, under the direction of Mr. Stephen Kilbey. The quartet "O Eros" was admirably sung by Messrs. Westlake, Harding, Reider, and Wand; Mr. H. Kinsell recited the connective lyrics very effectively, and the whole work was ably rendered. In the second part of the programme Miss Nellie Hudson, Messrs. Westlake, Wand, Johnson, and Gostic were highly successful in their vocal solos. Mr. S. Chapman was an able accompanist.

THE last of the winter series of free Entertainments for the People was given by the Bethnal Green Choral Society, and an efficient band, on Wednesday evening, March 26. The programme consisted of Dr. Stainer's "Daughter of Jairus," and a miscellaneous selection. The soloists were Madame Clara West, Miss Lottie West, Mr. C. J. Murton, and Mr. Henry Prenton. In the miscellaneous portion of the programme, the special features were a duet "Thou shalt keep the Commandments," and a new anthem "Lord I call upon Thee," both by Mr. John E. West. Mr. H. Baynton led the band, Mr. John E. West, F.C.O., presided at the organ, and Mr. R. A. Slater conducted.

THE Easter services at St. Helen's Church, St. Quinten's Park, North Kensington, were very successful. The services opened by the choir singing the Easter Hymn. The anthem was "The Lord is King" (Pittman). The sermon was preached by the vicar, the Rev. Dalgarno Robinson. In the evening the Easter Hymn was again sung during the procession of the choir, the anthem being "Christ our Passover" (Goss), the solo excellently rendered by Master F. B. Fletcher. The sermon was preached by the Rev. F. L. Meares. Great credit is due to the Organist and Choirmaster, Mr. F. K. Blanche, for the efficiency of the choir.

THE full prospectus of Mr. Gye's season at the Royal Italian Opera adds but little to the details we were enabled to furnish in our March number. The name of Mdle. De Vere, however, (who was announced to appear for the first time in England) is now omitted from the list of soprani, Madame Fürsch-Madi, Mdle. Leria, Madame Hélène Crosmond, Mdle. Laterner, and Mdle. Velmi, with the well-known artists already named by us, making this important department of the company exceptionally strong. M. Jourdain, a tenor, is the only male vocalist new to us. It may be mentioned that Massenet's "Le Roi de Lahore," with Madame Durand in the principal part, will be revived; and "Aïda" is also promised, the character of the heroine by Madame Adelina Patti. M. Reyser's "Sigurd" and the Italian version of Mackenzie's "Colomba" will be amongst the interesting items of the season, which is advertised to commence on April 29, too late, of course, for notice in our present number.

YE London Glee Men, under the direction of Mr. Richard Mackway, gave a Smoking Concert, the last of the season, at the Guildhall Tavern, on the 17th ult. The careful training of the voices was shown by the delicate rendering of Cooke's glee "Strike the Lyre" and Edwin Ball's part-song, "How fair is the rose." Schumann's "Battle Song" was finely sung, and equal excellence was attained in Beethoven's "Chorus of Prisoners," from "Fidelio"; Hatton's "April Showers;" "Phillis," by A. H. D. Prendergast; and Reay's characteristic setting of George Withers' quaint verses, "I lov'd a lass." G. W. Martin's "Haste ye soft gales" was also well sung by the Messrs. Newton, and songs were contributed by Messrs. Glazier and Pawsey, the latter being encored in Nelson's "Madoline." Pianoforte solos were contributed by Mr. W. Horsey, and Balfe's duet "Excelsior" was sung by Messrs. R. Mackway and Frank Ward.

THE tenth annual Dedication Festival, at St. Michael's Bowes Park, Southgate, was celebrated on Monday, the 21st ult. A special feature this year, was the addition of a small orchestra at Evensong, which was most effective in the canticles, hymns, and anthem. The Anthem was "Blessing, glory," &c. (Tours), and the Canticles were by Dr. Stainer, in E flat. After service, Handel's Fourth Concerto in F was performed, the organ part being supplied by Mr. C. W. Pearce, Mus. Bac., who also accompanied the service throughout. Mr. Henry J. Baker conducted.

THE thirtieth Annual Report of the Melbourne Philharmonic Society shows that the number of Vocal and Instrumental Subscribing Members has largely increased, and that many names have also been added to the subscription list. The production for the first time in the Southern hemisphere of Gounod's "Redemption" is referred to as "the most important event in the history of the Society during the year"; and cordial thanks are given to the Hon. Conductor, Mr. David Lee, for having conducted the public performances of the Society, and also to the other honorary officers.

THE London Church Choir Association purposes holding a Festival, we understand, in Rochester Cathedral, on Whit-Monday, when the music written for, and sung at, the last Festival, namely Mr. C. E. Miller's Evening Service in D and Dr. Stainer's anthem "And all the people saw the thunderings and the lightnings," will be repeated. For the annual Festival in November, Mr. Thomas Tallis Trimmell is to compose the Service, and the late Henry Smart's anthem, "Lord Thou hast been our refuge" (composed for and originally produced by the Association) will be performed.

ON Good Friday the Walworth Choral Society gave "The Messiah," with full band and chorus of 160 performers, in the Surrey Masonic Hall. The principals were Miss Margaret Hoare, Miss Helena Watkis, Mr. Frederick Cundy, and Mr. Frank May. Miss Hoare gained an encore for "I know that my Redeemer," as did Miss Watkis for "He was despised," and Mr. F. May for "Why do the nations." The choruses were well sung. Mr. F. Crome led the band, Mr. W. W. Crome presided at the harmonium, and Mr. H. E. Curtis conducted.

THE thirty-first performance of new compositions by members of the Musical Artists' Society took place at the Grosvenor Gallery, on Saturday, the 5th ult. The first, and most important work in the programme was a pianoforte quartet in C minor, by Miss Alma Sanders, which had gained the prize offered by Trinity College, London, last year. It contains a good deal of clever and effective writing, and affords conclusive proof of its composer's high-class musicianship. The executants were Miss Sanders, M. Wiener, Mr. Ellis Roberts, and M. Libotton. A pianoforte trio in E, by Mr. E. Aguilar, is full of pleasant melody, which, however, is not subjected to much elaboration, and the pianoforte part is unduly prominent throughout. Other successful items in the programme were Mr. Walter Macfarren's part-song "Daybreak," and another entitled "A Border Ballad," by Miss O. Prescott.

ON Good Friday evening the choir of the Assembly Hall, Mile End, assisted by friends, gave a performance of Handel's "Messiah." The soloists were Madame Carlotta Ide, Miss Agnes Coulson, Miss Rosina Cave, Miss Jeannette Bartlett, Mr. Dyved Lewis, and Mr. Charles T. Marriner, all of whom were most successful, especially Madame Ide whose voice was heard to much advantage in the airs "Rejoice greatly" and "I know that my Redeemer liveth"; and Mr. Dyved Lewis who displayed much artistic feeling in the rendering of the Passion music. Mr. Duncan Callow was an efficient organist, Mr. J. R. Poulter played the trumpet obbligato, Mr. Leonard Brown led the band, and Mr. G. Day Winter (who is to be congratulated on the training of his choir) conducted. The hall was crowded with an appreciative audience.

ON Thursday, the 3rd ult., Madame Rose Stummvoll gave an evening Concert at the Lecture Hall, 69, Upper Street, N. The room was well filled by an appreciative audience, and a good programme was efficiently carried out. Madame Stummvoll was very successful in Bishop's "Lo, here the gentle lark," and Ganz's "Sing, sweet bird"; as well as in the duet, "The syren and friar" (Emmanuel), in which she was joined by Signor Lahdi. A word of praise is due to Miss Annie Bryett, who accompanied most of the songs and contributed two pianoforte solos.

THE Cape Musical Monthly—the first number of which, for March, has been forwarded to us—seems to promise that South Africa will now be provided with a journal which possesses a general, as well as a local interest, by not only reflecting the state of the art in that Colony, but by reporting the principal European and foreign musical news. The periodical—having very much the appearance of our own MUSICAL TIMES—is well got up, and contains several original articles, one, "Pianists of the Day," being by Mr. Franklin Taylor.

A CONCERT was given at Whitefield Tabernacle, Tottenham Court Road, on the 16th ult., under the direction of Mr. Arthur Dorey. A well selected programme was executed, much to the satisfaction of a very large audience, by Madame Talbot-Cherer, Madame Godolphin, Miss Madeline Hardy, Messrs. A. Thompson, Leyton Barker, and Franklin Clive (vocalists), Miss Alice Ivimy (violin), and Miss Alice Jones—who made a successful first appearance (piano). Mr. Dorey was much applauded for his organ solo.

HAYDN'S "Creation" was given in the Schoolroom of New Court Chapel, Tollington Park, on Friday, the 18th ult., under the conductorship of Mr. A. J. Greenish, F.C.O., the chorus consisting of about one hundred voices. The principal artists were Miss Hoare, Mr. Probert, and Mr. Frank May, all of whom elicited hearty applause for their excellent rendering of the respective solos. Great credit is due to Mr. Greenish for the admirable manner in which the choruses were given. Miss Knight accompanied on the piano, and Mr. Walter Hughes on the organ.

MR. A. C. MILLER, of Edinburgh, writes to inform us that in consequence of his now onerous position in the firm of J. Miller and Son, Letterpress Printers, East Assembly Lane, he is reluctantly compelled to suspend the publication of the "St. Cecilia Magazine" for the present.

We much regret to learn that Sir Michael Costa has had a serious relapse, and remains in a very precarious condition. He was seized with a fit of apoplexy early on the morning of the 26th ult., and up to the moment of our going to press was gradually sinking. We had hoped to have been able to announce that the improvement reported throughout last month was sustained, but we fear that this last attack is of so serious a nature as to preclude any hope of a favourable change.

A PERFORMANCE of "Judas Maccabæus," under the direction of Mr. Alfred J. Dye, took place at Christ Church School Room, North Finchley, on the 21st ult., before a large and appreciative audience. The soloists were Mrs. Alfred Dye, Mrs. Boothby, Miss May Cartwright, Mr. A. Lawrence Fryer, and Mr. A. L. Reynolds. The band and chorus numbered one hundred and twenty performers. Mr. C. Vere presided at the harmonium, and Mrs. Edwards at the piano. The rendering of the work was highly creditable to all concerned.

THE members of the Grosvenor Choral Society gave their 145th monthly Concert, at the Grosvenor Hall, Buckingham Palace Road, on the 18th ult. The principal vocalists were Miss Edith Phillips, Miss Annie Gatland, Mr. Henry Yates, Mr. A. J. Reynold, and Mr. Frederick Williams. The part-songs were well rendered, the most successful being a chorus of Houris—ladies voices (Schumann) and "The cloud capt' towers" (Stevens); solo violoncello, Mr. Mackenzie. Miss Florence Hartley accompanied, and Mr. David Woodhouse conducted.

MR. JOHN FARMER announces a recital of his fairy opera "Cinderella," at St. James's Hall, on the 2nd inst. The soloists will be Miss Mary Davies, Miss Clara Samuell, Miss A. Ehrenberg, and Miss Marian Mackenzie; Messrs. Edward Lloyd, H. Pyatt, and Musgrove Tufnail. The choruses will be sung by Mr. Stedman's Choir of boys and gentlemen. The band and chorus will number about two hundred performers and will be conducted by the composer. Mr. Philip Beck will be the Reciter.

An excellent performance of Handel's "Messiah" was given at the Shoreditch Town Hall, on Good Friday evening, by the North-East London Choral Society, and an efficient band. The soloists were Madame Clara West, Miss Ellen Chapman, R.A.M., Miss Coyte Turner, Miss Lottie West, Mr. C. J. Murton, and Mr. T. Lawler, junior; organist, Mr. L. B. Prout, R.A.M.; trumpet, Mr. Davin; leader, Mr. Borchitzski; conductor, Mr. John E. West, R.A.M., F.C.O.

SUBURBAN Musical Institutions are evidently rapidly multiplying. A meeting for the purpose of establishing a Conservatoire in Clapham has recently been held at the residence of Mr. Alderman De Keyser, when the preliminary business connected with the undertaking was discussed; and, under the title of the "Surrey Conservatoire of Music," the school, with a list of competent professors in every branch of the art, is announced to open at Sternale House, Clapham Common, on the 3rd inst.

THE new organ in Westminster Abbey will, we understand, be opened, when complete, by a performance of Handel's Dettingen Te Deum, with the accompaniment (in addition to those of the composer) of trumpets and drums. The precise date it has not yet been found possible, we believe, to fix. A performance of Gounod's "Redemption," with orchestral accompaniment, is to be given on the afternoon of Ascension Day, Thursday, the 22nd inst.

WE regret that we cannot find space for an abstract of the Lecture upon the Sonata, which was delivered before the members of the Rump Steak Club by Mr. E. van der Straeten, at their last gathering at Anderton's Hotel. Considering that this Club usually confines its discussions to topics of literary and political interest, the reading of this paper is one more of the many signs of the spread of educated musical taste.

WE understand that Gounod's "Redemption" will be performed in Toronto at the semi-centennial celebration which takes place in June, this being the second time it has been given in this city.

THE Festival of the Sons of the Clergy takes place in St. Paul's Cathedral, on Wednesday afternoon, the 14th inst., commencing at 3.30. Gadsby in C, the service composed for the Festival of 1875, will be repeated on this occasion, and the anthem is to be Handel's Dettingen Te Deum in its entirety. Sullivan's "In Memoriam" Overture will open the service, and form, perhaps, the greatest musical attraction of the Festival.

Two Special Choral Services were given at St. Thomas's, Portman Square, on the 12th and 25th ult., when Gounod's "Redemption" was performed by the St. Thomas's special service choir. The soloists were Miss Florence Davis, Miss White, Miss Minnie Hyam, Mr. Henry Yates, Mr. Sackville Evans, and Mr. Henry Baker. Messrs. E. H. Birch and Walter E. Stark presided at the organ, and Mr. Edmund Rogers (Organist of the church) conducted.

So far as we are aware, Organ Lectures are a new feature in musical education, and we are glad, therefore, to find that at Trinity College, London, Mr. F. H. Bradley, one of the Organ Professors of the College, will, during the next term, deliver an illustrative course on the Works of Bach. With so experienced an organist as Mr. Bradley, there can be no doubt that these lectures will prove of high educational value.

ON Good Friday the choir and orchestra of Dr. Seddon's Tabernacle, Victoria Park, Hackney, under the direction of Mr. C. J. Rayner, gave a performance of "The Messiah" to a crowded and attentive audience. The soloists were Mesdames Minnie Gwynne and Hipwell, Messrs. Evans and Beare. Organ, Mr. Geo. Hedges; leader of the band Mr. Henry Baynton.

THE Marlborough Choral Society gave a performance of Farmer's "Christ and His Soldiers," at Ashburnham Chapel, Chelsea, on Thursday, the 3rd ult. The solos were rendered by Misses Stammers and Piffin, and Messrs. Powell and Bowles. The accompaniments were played by Mr. H. A. Evans, and Mr. T. R. Macrow conducted.

THE Monthly Organ Recital at St. John's the Evangelist, Waterloo Road, was given on the 1st ult., by Mr. Henry J. B. Dart, who played an interesting selection from the works of Bach, Handel, Mozart, Mendelssohn, Rheinberger, Lemmens, and Guilman. Mr. F. Winton was the vocalist.

THE Jubilee Singers of Fisk University arrived at Liverpool on the 13th ult., and are about to commence a tour through the principal towns of the kingdom. The original company, strengthened and improved since their last visit in 1871, will sing the Slave Songs which were then so favourably received.

MR. SINCLAIR DUNN gave his Entertainment "Songs of Britain," at the Birkbeck Institution, on the 9th ult. assisted by Miss Susetta Fenn and Miss Minnie Lawrie. Mr. Dunn was highly successful in all his vocal illustrations; especially in Berthold Tours's song "Unforgotten," and his lecture was also listened to with the utmost interest.

THE Kyrle Choir, under the direction of Mr. Malcolm Lawson, gave a performance of "The Messiah," in St. John's Church, Waterloo Road, on the 9th ult. The soloists were Miss Alice Fripp, Mrs. Oram, Mr. Regina Groome, and Mr. Albert Orme; Mr. E. H. Turpin presided at the organ.

A PERFORMANCE of Edmund Rogers's Cantata "The Pilgrim's Progress" was given at St. Jude's, Whitechapel, on the 18th ult. The soloists were Mrs. Arthur Chapman, Miss Frances Hipwell, Mr. Alfred Kenningham, and Mr. Mariner. Mr. Statham presided at the organ, and the composer conducted.

THE annual Festival of the London Gregorian Choir Association will take place at St. Paul's Cathedral on Thursday, the 15th inst., commencing at seven p.m. Application for tickets should be made to the Secretaries, Mr. H. M. Low, 12, Bread Street, E.C., and not to the Dean or Canon.

HILLER'S "Song of Victory" will be sung, with augmented choir, at the Church of St. Augustine at St. Faith, Watling Street, on Monday, the 26th inst. at the Dedication Festival. The Service, admission to which is free, commences at half-past seven p.m.

REVIEWS.

My Musical Life. By the Rev. H. R. Haweis, M.A.
[W. H. Allen & Co.]

ONE of the great objections to the books of amateur musicians upon the art which they affect is that, although they may write a great deal about music, they will unquestionably write very much more about themselves. The Rev. Mr. Haweis is no exception to this rule; and, knowing his weak point, he takes care in his opening chapter to prepare his readers for what is to follow. "I think it was Lord Beaconsfield," he tells us, "who said that a man was usually interesting in proportion as his talk ran upon what he was familiar with; and that as a man usually knew more about himself than about anything else, he seldom failed to be tolerable if his self-centred talk turned out to be unaffected and sincere. To talk about one's self and to be dull is nevertheless possible. In the early pages of this volume I shall have to do the first to a considerable extent; let me hope to avoid the second." Having thus cleared the ground, he proceeds to tell us that his former work, "Music and Morals," had made him many friends, and, he hopes, few enemies, that "the publishers were liberal," and that the volume is now in its twelfth edition. Then commences his autobiography. He recollects coming to London from Norwood, and passing through Kennington, where he stopped at a friend's house, when he saw an organ "with black keys where the piano's are white, and white where the piano's are black." One of his early reminiscences is the Exhibition of 1851; "I remember," he says, "perfectly well falling into a kind of dream as I leant over the painted iron balcony and looked down on this splendid vista. The silver bell-like tones of an Erard—it was the 1,000 guinea piano—pierced through the human hum and noise of splashing waters, but it was a long way off. Suddenly, in the adjoining gallery, the large organ broke out with a blare of trumpets that thrilled and rivetted me with an inconceivable emotion. I knew not then what these opening bars were. Evidently something martial, festal, jubilant, and full of triumph. I listened and held my breath to hear Mendelssohn's 'Wedding March' for the first time, and not know it! To hear it when half the people present had never heard of Mendelssohn, three years after his death, and when not one in a hundred could have told me what was being played—that is an experience I shall never forget." It may here be said that, as Mendelssohn died in 1847, it seems strange to affirm that at the Exhibition of 1851 half the people present had never heard of the composer, and "not one in a hundred could have told me what was being played"; but it must be recollected that the author throughout his work believes his own knowledge of the music of the day to accurately represent that of the people: "Someone called me," he says, "as I was told afterwards, but I did not hear. They supposed that I was following, they went on, and were soon lost in the crowd. Presently one came back and touched me, but I did not feel. I could not be roused, my soul was living apart from my body. When the music ceased, the spell slowly dissolved, and I was led away still half in dreamland." There can be little doubt that many other persons have been transported to "dreamland" by Mendelssohn's music, but they do not write books to say so. Passing onwards through his "musical life," Mr. Haweis says that he remembers Sainton and Piatti "as young men with their hair jet-black," and also gives us many little anecdotes of eminent artists who were at that time in their prime. His talk upon violins is unquestionably that of an enthusiast, as well as a thinker; but we question whether the reader will care to know that he became possessed at the age of six years "of a small red eighteenpenny fiddle and stick, with that flimsy bow and those thready strings which are made apparently only to snap, even as the fiddle is made only to smash," and that when he had done with it, his nurse "removed the belly, and found it made an admirable dust-pan or wooden shovel for cinders, and, finally, excellent firewood." We quite agree with our author that "music should be discussed and written about just like any other art," and really believed that this had been done for many years past; but Mr. Haweis boldly asserts that "the musical criticisms of the day deal chiefly in technicality and personality, and it is rather unfortunate that the few writers who occasionally venture out into the deep, and discourse on music per se, are deficient in the one thing needful—'musical perception'; in that ocean they cannot swim, and the sooner some of them get to shore the better." That Mr. Haweis believes himself to be one of those exceptional critics who can swim is amply proved in every page of his book; but some who watch his evolutions might perhaps wish that he would "get to shore" a little sooner. There can be no question that the "fine writing" which is so obtrusive in the volume before us obscures some of the author's best thoughts; and although nobody seems more aware of this fact than himself, he evidently sees no reason to correct it. Of his own performance on the violin he often speaks in enthusiastic terms, but the following will, we are certain, prove interesting to those listeners who may have thought that he occasionally lacked depth of feeling: "Moments came to me," he tells us, "when I was playing—I seemed far away from the world. I was not scheming for effect—there was no trick about it. I could give no reason for the rallé, the p, the pp, the f. Something in my soul ordered it so, and my fingers followed, communicating every inner vibration through their tips to the vibrating string until the mighty heart of the Cremona pealed out like a Clarion, or whispereed tremblingly in response. But those moments did not come to me in mixed, buzzing audiences; then I merely waged impatient war with a mob.

"They came in still rooms where a few were met, and the lights were low, and the windows open towards the sea.

"They came in brilliantly lighted halls, what time I had full command from some platform of an attentive crowd gathered to listen, not to chatter.

"They came when some one or other sat and played with me, whose spirit-pulses rose and fell with mine—in a world of sound, where the morning stars seemed always singing together."

It appears more than probable that it was but rarely that any of these conditions were fulfilled; and few, therefore, must, we fear, have heard Mr. Haweis at his best.

When our author can manage to get away from himself and talk about the art and artists of the world, there is really much—very much—to admire in his book. His recollections of Liszt are particularly interesting; and the rhapsody upon Wagner and his operas seems to be the result of an earnest study of the man and his works. Scattered throughout the volume, too, we have some excellent observations upon the progress of music in this country: and although we may not always agree with the opinions expressed, the long experience of the writer in the world of art at least entitles him to respect. As a book of gossip upon music and musicians it will no doubt be extensively read, for Mr. Haweis is always a genial and intelligent companion; but we are sorry that he assumes the office of a teacher, and we think it a pity that he has called his work "My Musical Life."

Harmony. A Treatise, including the Chords of the Eleventh and Thirteenth, and Harmonisation of given Melodies. By Henry Gadsby. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

WE recollect the time when the publication of a book on Harmony by an accredited theorist was looked upon as an event in the musical world; for the conventional code of rules so thoroughly satisfied the teachers of the day that a new book was presumed to represent a new system, and although usually treated with apathy by the majority, scarcely ever failed to raise up a few zealous champions of the author's views, who stoutly maintained their truth against the world, and endeavoured with all the earnestness of real artists to gain converts to the faith. Since the appearance of the "Treatise on Harmony," by Dr. Alfred Day, in 1845, however, the multiplication of works upon the science has scarcely ruffled the surface; for the revolutionary ideas therein promulgated have been partially accepted by so many that each professor now teaches only what he himself believes, and no definite system has, therefore, been for years recognised. Thus much we think it necessary to say in noticing a book by so eminent an artist as Mr. Gadsby, who has certainly earned the right to speak on the subject and to be listened to with respect; for were we to state, for example, that the chord of the eleventh on the dominant—in which he thoroughly believes—is utterly repudiated by the Professor at the University of Oxford, it would seem, without our prefatory remarks, that instead of merely putting forward his own views upon what ought to be taught, he wishes to be accepted as a radical reformer. Let us at once say, however, that one or two features in his book strike us as being at least worthy of debate. In the first place, at page thirty-six, he gives a sequence of what are usually termed "Secondary sevenths," prepared and resolved according to the received rules; but, at page sixty-one, he says "All the foregoing chords containing dissonants may be sounded without the preparation of the dissonant note." This may or may not be an oversight; but as we see nothing in any part of the work about the preparation of any discords except those of suspension, we presume that the assertion is intentional. Then we are told that the title "Neapolitan Sixth" is arbitrarily given to a chord of the sixth formed on the subdominant of a major or minor key; and that "it contains the intervals of a minor third and minor sixth." If the derivation of other chromatic chords were not fully entered into, we might consider that the author—like many theorists of the olden time—believed this to be all that was necessary to be said upon the matter; but seeing that even the double-rooted chord of the augmented sixth on the minor sixth of the scale is fully explained, we cannot understand why the student should be permitted either to think it immaterial to know what is the origin of the Neapolitan sixth, or to be left to find out the root for himself. Passing from the consideration of these and some similar points to the manner in which the several subjects are arranged and explained, we have nothing but unqualified praise to award. The dominant discords are most clearly and logically set forth, and some very useful exercises are given for the student to work. The Harmonisation of Unfigured Bases and of Given Melodies form most important features of the volume; and some excellent and highly valuable hints on the invention of a melody are also to be found, amongst which the rule that "no melody should ever be written without the proper harmony of every note being present in the mind of the writer" may be especially recommended to young composers. In our review upon Mr. Gadsby's work we have not been tempted into saying where our opinions upon the classification of chords do not accord with his. Some day, we hope, these differences of opinion may be reconciled and a recognised system established; but that day has not yet arrived; and meanwhile we cordially welcome this latest contribution to our rapidly-increasing stock of theoretical text-books.

Church Songs. By the Rev. S. Baring Gould and the Rev. H. Fleetwood Sheppard. [W. Skeffington and Sons.]

THE compilers of this book are careful to insist upon the aim they have had in view. They feel that the Church of England needs to take more advantage than she has hitherto done of the power of song, especially as certain heretical movements have gained much of their influence over the masses by recognising this power, and employing it with freedom. To use their own words, the collection is "intended to be to the Church of England what the songs of the Salvation Army and Messrs. Moody and Sankey are to their respective adherents, combining, it is hoped, their popularity and singableness without any trace of vulgarity or irreverence." The words, we are further informed, are intended to convey definite ideas of sound Catholic doctrines, which are pre-supposed, rather than insisted upon, in our hymnals. The songs are to be made "a vehicle for impressing some facts necessary to salvation on the minds of those who sing them." This is not the place in which to enter on a disquisition respecting religious dogmas; and it will therefore be sufficient to say that the literary portion of the volume embodies such teaching as only church people can accept, though with one or two exceptions the doctrines of the advanced section are not brought into prominence. With regard to the music the editors have been almost as liberal—may we say as eclectic—as the "heretics" whose procedure they condemn. There is an adaptation from "Il Trovatore," though so altered as to be almost unrecognisable, and several from Tyrolean and other national sources. On the whole, we do not recognise its great superiority to that which the editors condemn. It is the same in kind, though the vulgar element is certainly less pronounced; and as it may be necessary to fight schism with its own weapons, the book may fulfil a useful purpose. It should be explained, to prevent misconception, that the songs are not intended for ordinary church services, but for special purposes, mission meetings, gatherings of children, working-men, teachers, and like occasions.

Original Compositions for the Organ. No. 28, Introduction and Fugue; No. 29, Allegretto. By F. E. Gladstone, Mus. Doc. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

DR. GLADSTONE'S contributions to the present series of pieces deserve to be received with favour. The first of them opens with much brightness and vigour, and the fugue subject, which commences at the twenty-third bar, is a well-marked and easily recognisable theme. It is not developed at any great length, and a coda, built chiefly on the introductory matter, brings the composition to an effective conclusion. The Allegretto is a suave flowing movement in G, 3-4 time, but rather discursive in the middle, and modern in feeling. The musicianly character of these pieces will recommend them to favourable consideration by organists.

The Offertory Sentences. Composed by J. F. Bridge, Mus. Doc. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

AS this setting is in use in Westminster Abbey, it may already be said to have received the stamp of approval by high authority. Dr. Bridge is so good a musician that criticism of such trifling efforts from his pen can scarcely be considered needful. Still, there is a difficulty in setting words not intended for, and in some instances not suitable for, musical illustration. The composer has made skilful use of such opportunities as exist, and has avoided all sense of incongruity in the most awkward sentences. Simplicity is the main characteristic of them all, but they vary in musical effectiveness, among the best being No. 2, "Lay not up for yourselves"; No. 9, "He that soweth little"; and No. 13, "Charge them that are rich." There are no solo passages, the whole being written for voices in ordinary four-part harmony.

Hymns and Chants for Female Voices. Compiled and set to music for three treble voices, for the use of the Ipswich High School. Under the musical editorship of Edward Nunn. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE Head Mistress of the Ipswich High School tells us in her preface to the words that the absence of a sufficient number of Hymns suitable for a school in any one collection has induced her to compile this Hymn-book; and certainly the musical portion of the work could not have been entrusted to abler hands than those of Mr. Nunn, who is professor of singing at the school. In his task he has been assisted by several eminent composers, who have contributed some valuable pieces to the volume, which we can scarcely doubt will be most extensively used now that singing forms so important an item in all good educational establishments.

A Series of Organ Pieces in Various Styles. By Edwin M. Lott. Nos. 7 to 12. [Edwin Ashdown.]

MR. LOTT is evidently a victim to the prevailing mania for pieces in the old dance forms associated with the Suite. Thus No. 9 is a Sarabande and No. 10 a Galliard, the former being quite unsuitable as a voluntary, though meritorious in its way, as is also the latter to a greater extent. No. 7, two Andantes, and No. 8, Andante piacevole, are pleasing, and so in an eminent degree is the opening of No. 12, Scène Pastorale ("The Storm") though the movement depicting the tempest is poor enough. No. 11, Prelude and Fugue in D, is not remarkable for scientific treatment. There is no regular second subject nor anything like elaboration of device. On the whole, the composer is best in his simplest mood.

FOREIGN NOTES.

THE centenary of the birth of Louis Spohr, to which we referred in our last issue, was celebrated in an impressive manner, on the 5th ult., at Cassel, where for a number of years and up to the time of his death, in 1859, he had been the leading figure in musical circles. The monument of the composer, at the Theaterplatz, had been profusely decorated with wreaths and flowers, the Choral Society of Cassel brought its vocal tribute to the memory of genius, and in the evening a festive performance of Spohr's finest dramatic work, "Jessonda," was ushered in by a prologue, written for the occasion by Herr Paar. In the latter, the composer is characterised as "an artist who, while regarded with especial pride by the people of Cassel, really belongs to the world, and whose noble works find admirers wherever a love for true art exists." No one will dispute the truth of this eulogium. Spohr's artistic position is that of mediator between the classical and the romantic schools in music. There are certain specific characteristics which mark the individuality of every composer of genius in his music, and in the case of Spohr the excessive use of modulations made by him may not inaptly be considered suggestive of this mediating influence between the two schools, to both of which he may be said to have belonged. While in his orchestral and chamber works the classical element predominates, he is ranked among the founders of the romantic school in his operas, though in the latter field he was overshadowed by the superior dramatic genius of his contemporary, C. M. von Weber. However that may be, and quite irrespective of his great merits as the founder of a new school of violin-playing, there can be no question that Spohr's place in musical history is an assured and an honourable one, and that his operatic works, amongst others, by no means deserve the fate assigned to what has been ironically called "Capellmeister-music." It is to be regretted, therefore, that so few German operatic establishments should have, as far as has come under our notice, marked the recent centenary of the birth of Louis Spohr by the revival of one or the other of his music-dramatic works, while, on the other hand, full justice has been rendered to his memory in the various press organs both of his native country and elsewhere.

Mr. C. Villiers Stanford's new opera "Savonarola," which was produced for the first time at the Hamburg Stadt Theater, on the 18th ult., has achieved a genuine and unmistakable success; and according to information which has reached us from several quarters there, the general impression of musicians is that a valuable addition has been made to the permanent répertoire of the establishment in question. Similar favourable accounts regarding "Savonarola" are echoed throughout the Hamburg press. Herr Riccius, the well-known critic of the Hamburger Nachrichten devotes an exhaustive and most eulogistic article to the work in that journal, which may be summed up in the following sentence: "As regards intrinsic musical importance, fertility of imagination, clever and, at the same time, solid elaboration, dramatic instinct, as well as honesty and seriousness of artistic purpose, this work far surpasses all other operatic novelties produced here during the last few years; and yet we have witnessed a good many during that period, and amongst them some of undoubted merit and by well-reputed composers." For further details respecting Mr. Stanford's opera, we refer our readers to the special report published elsewhere in our present issue.

Mr. Mackenzie's opera "Colomba" was announced to be performed at the Darmstadt Hof Theater, on the 29th ult., though not as a "Festoper" in connection with the royal wedding, as originally intended, on account of the mourning of the Court. Mr. Mackenzie's successful new work has likewise been definitely accepted by the directors of the Imperial Opera of Vienna, where it will be brought out during next season, there being also a probability of its production at Zurich, where the "Burns" symphony of our gifted countryman, as well as the Ballet music from "Colomba," were recently performed with great success in the Concert Room.

The ceremony of unveiling the monument of Johann Sebastian Bach is announced to take place at Eisenach, on the 28th of next month. There will be a performance on the same day, at the Church of St. George, of the Mass in B minor, and on the succeeding day a grand Sacred Concert will be held, to be followed by another Concert performance at the theatre in the evening.

M. Massenet's five-act opera "Manon" has met with a highly favourable reception on its recent production at the La Monnaie Theatre of Brussels, and is spoken of in eulogistic terms in the Guide Musical.

The Wiener Signale contains the following paragraph, dated from Paris: "The musical world will be interested to learn something definite as to the new Oratorio on the composition of which Charles Gounod is at present engaged. The work in progress is entitled "Mors et Vita," and is divided into several principal parts, representing respectively the eternal rest of the dead, a Requiem, a Dies Iræ, and concluding with a vision of St. John. Gounod, who already commenced sketching his ideas for the work some two years since, hopes to conclude it during the present year. The new Oratorio will be first produced in 1885, at the Birmingham Festival, and after that at the Paris Trocadéro, under the auspices of the Union Internationale, in 1886, each time under the personal direction of the composer.

M. Gounod's opera "Sapho" was revived with great success at the Paris Opera last month. This interesting early work of the composer of "Faust" was originally brought out as a three-act opera in 1851. It was then revised and curtailed, and in this form produced in the French capital, in two acts, seven years later. Once more remodelled and touched up by the hand of the mature master, the opera has now been presented again to French audiences as a four-act music drama, with the result above indicated.

At the Festival of the International Union of Composers, held at the Paris Trocadéro, on the 18th ult., some fragments from an unpublished opera "Hulda," by César Franck, and a vocal composition by Alfred Bruneau, entitled "Léda," formed the principal features of attraction. M. Faure and Madame Fidès Dévries were the leading vocalists, M. B. Godard conducting the orchestra.

A grand music Festival is to be held on August 2 and 3, at Turin, in the form of an international competition for choral societies, brass and military bands, &c.

The question as to whether we are justified in disturbing, without any apparent necessity, the mortal remains of our great men resolves itself to one of taste. It was decided in the negative some years ago, in the case of our own Shakespeare, in deference to the veto pronounced in the inscription over the immortal poet's grave. No such special consideration, however, interferes with the decision of the municipality of Vienna, who have determined to gather together in the central walk of the chief cemetery of the Austrian capital the earthly resting-places of all famous musicians buried in its vicinity, or even at some distance from it. For this purpose the remains of Beethoven and Schubert will be exhumed at the churchyard of Währing, while those of Gluck and Haydn will be, in like manner, transferred from their original abodes if, in the case of the latter, permission can be obtained of the Esterhazy family, in whose service the composer of the "Creation" lived and died. The graves of these great men, who have shed the lustre of their genius upon the artistic life of Vienna, will then be "conveniently arranged," side by side, at the central cemetery for the benefit of the amateur visitor, and for the honour and glory of the capital generally.

Adalbert von Goldschmidt's new opera "Heliantus," as already briefly stated in our last number, was produced for the first time at the Leipzig Stadt Theater, on March 26, and achieved a moderate success, which, however, was enhanced on the repetition of the performance a few days later. Herr Goldschmidt is, like Wagner, his own poet, and the subject of his new work—a semi-legendary one appertaining to the period of the conversion by means of the sword of the early Saxons to Christianity—is said to be skilfully treated from a dramatic point of view, though suffering somewhat from undue length. As to the merits of the music, widely divergent opinions obtain at present among Herr Goldschmidt's critics, all agreeing on this one point, however—viz., the possession on the part of the young composer of original power; the point of difference being as to whether this power has been used for good or for evil. Herr Otto Lessmann, of the Allgemeine Deutsche Musik Zeitung, sums up his very able remarks on the work in a recent number of that paper as follows: "An exceptional talent, and noble and earnest artistic aims, we unreservedly recognise in this composer. On the other hand, his artistic taste will yet have to undergo a process of refinement, his invention and elaboration of detail acquire yet more freedom and independence in order that to him, in his artistic relationship to Richard Wagner, the words once pronounced by Hegel may not some day become applicable, viz., 'of all my disciples one only has understood—and he has misunderstood—me.'"

A festive gathering of male choirs of Northern Germany is to be held at Hamburg, on the 6th and 7th of next month. The number of choristers on this occasion will be 1,500, and 180 instrumentalists will form the orchestral complement. The Conductor will be Herr Carl Reinthaler.

The famous Gewandhaus Concerts of Leipzig will henceforth take place in the new building erected for the purpose, the final Concert performance in the historical "Gewandhaus" having taken place on March 27 last, when Beethoven's Ninth Symphony was produced, under the direction of Herr Reinecke.

Dr. Ferdinand von Hiller, the veteran German musician, who for so many years has been the leader of musical society at Cologne, will, it is stated, resign his positions as principal of the Conservatorium and conductor of the Gürzenich Concerts of that town next autumn, on account of his failing health. Various rumours are current as to the probable choice of his successor, Herr Gernsheim being apparently the favourite candidate to the post about to be vacated.

Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel, the eminent Leipzig publishing firm, announce the impending issue of the first complete and critically revised edition of the works of Franz Schubert, the publication to commence with next year. The new standard edition will comprise both the already published and the hitherto unpublished compositions of the master, in the editing of which a number of eminent musical authorities will be engaged. It is needless to recommend so meritorious an undertaking to the attention of amateurs.

The erection of monuments to musicians, both living and dead, is again the order of the day. Wagner is to have one at Leipzig, Flotow one at Darmstadt, Liszt will shortly see his statue unveiled in the park of his friend, Cardinal Hohenlohe, at Schillingsfürst, while it is also contemplated to erect a statue at Brussels to the late M. Féty, the Belgian musical savant and founder of the Brussels Conservatoire.

The first performance at the Berlin Opera House of a portion of Wagner's "Nibelungen Ring," viz., "Die Walküre," which took place on the 7th of last month, is an event in the annals of the musical life of that metropolis, inasmuch as the director of the institution, Herr von Hülsen, had hitherto excluded the giant work altogether from his répertoire. The performance is generally described as an indifferent one, Herr Niemann's splendid realisation of the part of Siegfried forming the central attraction.

The Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, the excellent music journal founded by Robert Schumann, has entered upon the fiftieth anniversary of its appearance with the 3rd ult. The high artistic tone and solidity of its contents sustained by our German contemporary throughout this period, justify us in predicting for it a prolonged continuance of its position as a leading element in the musical press of Europe.

Herr Hans Richter, the Capellmeister par excellence, has been appointed successor to Herr Gericke, the late director of the Concerts of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde, at Vienna, an important post in the musical world, as all amateurs know. Herr Richter will, as the Neue Freie Presse, of Vienna, states, retain at the same time his office of Conductor of the Viennese Philharmonic Concerts as well as his position at the Imperial Opera.

The death, on the 6th ult., at Lubeck, of the veteran German poet, Emanuel Geibel, deserves notice in these columns since he has inspired more than one composer of note to wed their music to one or other of his joyous, life-breathing, or tenderly pathetic lyrical poems; he having, moreover, written several librettos, and amongst them that to which Mendelssohn wrote his fragmentary music of "Loreley."

Old opera-goers will hear with regret of the death of one who, some forty or fifty years ago, charmed all Europe by her fairy-like appearance, whose every gesture was gracefulness, whose every movement a poem. Marie Taglioni has just died, at the age of eighty, at Marseilles. Born in 1804, at Stockholm, where her father was the ballet-master at the theatre, she was trained from an early age for her profession. She made her first appearance at the Paris Opera in 1827, where she soon acquired an enormous popularity, which was likewise extended to her in this country on and after her first visit in 1838. Marie Taglioni was married in 1832 to the Comte de Voisins, whom she survived by some twenty years.

At Stuttgart, died, on March 22, Professor Dr. Ludwig Stark, one of the founders of the Conservatorium of that town, and co-editor of the well-reputed Lebert-Stark'sche Pianoforte Schule.

At New York, died, on March 12, the baritone singer, Wilhelm Formes, the youngest brother of Carl and Theodor Formes, at the age of fifty.

We also record the death, at Marseilles, of Hippolyte Gondois, a musician of merit, formerly a laureate of the Grand Prix de Rome, and composer of a successful comic opera, "Don Blas."

AID FOR DISMISSED MEMBERS OF CATHEDRAL CHOIRS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—In consequence of the judgment delivered by Mr. Justice North in the action of "The Attorney-General v. The Dean and Canons of Manchester," great changes are now taking place in this Cathedral, whereby all those members of the choir, both gentlemen and boys, not on the Foundation are dismissed, leaving a staff of four boys, two altos, one tenor, and one bass to render the services. A similar case occurred some months ago at York Minster, when, through want of funds, three members of the choir were discharged, one being an elderly man, who had sung for many years, and for whom a small subscription has been started. I have computed the number of lay clerks in Cathedral and Collegiate establishments to be about 250, and I venture to ask through your columns if amongst this number some united action could not be taken to provide for such emergencies as above-stated and for those who suffer by them, they generally being men too old to obtain other Cathedral appointments. Could not the Choir Benevolent Fund, which has been a great blessing to lay clerks, take up this matter, and add to their useful work something of the character I suggest? If Deans and Chapters are deprived of the power to help those who make the Cathedral service so deservedly popular, the only resource left is, by mutual action, to help themselves.

I am, yours respectfully,
E. MARRIOTT.

The Cathedral, Manchester, April 16.

HARMONIUM PARTS FOR ORATORIOS AND CANTATAS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—I have little doubt that there are many towns in other British Colonies situated musically as ours is—viz., possessing several good Choral Societies, capable of giving acceptable and adequate renderings of oratorio and cantata music. The harmonium and piano have, however, generally to furnish the accompaniment, as not only is there usually a lack of sufficient professional aid for the formation of an orchestra, but the expense attendant on the employment of one would be greater than could easily be met in most cases. It is to the use of the harmonium in conjunction with, and in aid of, the piano that I wish to draw attention on the part of composers of the class of music I have alluded to. A part written specially for the harmonium, with such of the orchestral effects as can be introduced, would meet a want much felt by players of only moderate ability, who now have to pick out from the pianoforte score a part suited to the requirements of the music and the capabilities of the instrument. This, in the hands of a practised and skilled executant, is doubtless a comparatively easy task; but in the case of the ordinary amateur it is not so, as his attention is so engrossed in the manipulation of the music and in watching the conductor that he cannot at the same time select and arrange, mentally, for his instrument those particular portions of the music that would be allotted to the various instruments in the orchestra, but in the absence of which can, with much effect, be produced on the harmonium. It may be that this suggestion has been made before and acted upon, but I have never yet seen any harmonium part to the various oratorios and cantatas with which I am familiar.—I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

C. NEUMANN THOMAS,

Organist, St. George's Cathedral, Cape Town.

Cape Town, South Africa, February 27, 1884.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

* Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all Subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

J. HEWLETT.—The signature is that of E flat major, and is used for the tonic minor to save placing the three additional flats at the commencement. The custom is scarcely one to be commended, but is by no means uncommon.

BACH.—A detailed account of these works will be found in the recently published second volume of Spitta's "Life of J. S. Bach," extending from page 55 to 68. In addition to an interesting explanation of the titles "Inventionen und Sinfonien," there is much information, both as to the designation and order of these works, as shown by reference to three distinct autographs. There is a short analysis of each of the thirty movements. There is also a slight account of these works: "Fifteen two-part inventions" and "Fifteen three-part inventions" to be found in Forkel's "Life of Bach." London, 1820. pp. 92, 93.

A feature in the second part, which was miscellaneous, was the excellent pianoforte playing of Mr. Oliver King, who gave a Nocturne in D flat, by Chopin, and a Pasquinade, by Gottschalk, for the latter of which he received an encore, which could not be resisted. He also most ably accompanied the vocal and instrumental solos in the second part. The Concert was conducted by Herr Beyerlag with his usual ability.

BOLTON.—On Friday, the 4th ult., Dr. Bridge, Organist of Westminster Abbey, opened a new organ in the St. George's Road Congregational Chapel, in the presence of a large and influential congregation. Selections from some of the best-known composers were played Master Duddington (Peterborough Cathedral) sang the soprano part with much taste and feeling, and Lady Margaret Compton was equally effective in the contralto solos allotted to her. The tenor music was efficiently rendered by the Rev. Cole-Hamilton, vicar of the Church, and that for the bass was admirably given by Lord William Compton. The choruses were well-balanced and given with much precision. Mr. W. W. Starmer, the Organist of the Church, accompanied with skill and judgment.

CIRENCESTER.—The members of the Choral Society gave their usual Easter Concert at the Corn Hall, on Thursday evening, the 17th ult., the work selected for performance being Handel's Messiah. The solos were well rendered by Miss Julia Jones, Miss Lizzie Ellis, Mr. A. Kenningham, and Mr. T. Kempton. The choruses went with remarkable precision, and the band played exceedingly well. Mr. Brind conducted. Mr. K. Norris presided at the organ, and Miss Fisher at the pianoforte.

CROOK.—A very successful Concert was given in Dawson Street Chapel on the 1st ult., before a large and appreciative audience. The programme, for the most part sacred, consisted of solos, duets, and quartets by Handel, Mendelssohn, Sullivan, Lemmens, &c. The vocalists were Miss José Sherrington, Madame Poole, Messrs. D. S. The Drill Hall was fairly well filled.

DEVIZES.—A very good performance of Handel's Messiah was given in the Corn Exchange, on Tuesday evening, the 1st ult., under the Conductorship of Mr. C. Clarke. The solos were well sung by Miss E. Edwards, R.A.M.; Miss E. Shackell, R.A.M.; Mr. T. Hood, and Mr. F. Sharp. Mr. F. Watts led the band, Miss M. Welch presided at the American organ, and Mr. H. H. Baker at the harmonium.

Mr. Arnold presided at the organ. There was a large congregation.

GREENWICH.—The fortieth of the Free Concerts at the Lecture Hall, on March 29, was crowded by an attentive and appreciative audience. The young pianists, Misses Clara and Agnes Walker, who have already established their fame at these Concerts, played with marked success two duets—Raff's Tarantella in D minor and Lysberg's "La Bsladine"—eliciting warm applause and an unanimous recall. The vocalists were Miss Wilhelmina Percy, Miss Amy Webber, Madame Adeline Vaudrey, Miss Ward Poole, Miss Elliott, Mr. H. C. Betts, and Mr. G. Stanley Smith, all of whom were cordially received. An interesting address was delivered by the promoter of the Concerts, Mr. Sims, alluding to the sudden death of the Duke of Albany, in memory of whom two verses, written for the occasion by Mr. E. Foskett, were feelingly sung, as part of the National Anthem, by Miss Sims. Miss Clara Walker acted as accompanist throughout the evening.

HALIFAX.—The last of the series of Orchestral Concerts given by Messrs. Pohlmann and Son took place on Wednesday evening, March 26. There was an orchestra, formed almost entirely of local musicians, numbering fifty performers, and an excellent choir of fifty voices, under the Conductorship of Mr. W. H. Whitaker. The vocalist was Miss Emily Norton, who elicited enthusiastic applause; and Mr. Pycroft, in his violin solo, was also well received. The special features of the Concert were the march and chorus from Tannhäuser, the bridal chorus from Lohengrin, and a new composition, Gipsy Encampment, written by Henry Wm. Pohlmann for the pianoforte, and arranged for orchestra by Mr. Whitaker. The chorus singing was remarkably good.—The Northgate End Orchestral Society's Concert, at the Mechanics' Hall, on the 8th ult., was a decided success. The programme included Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Concerto in D minor, excellently played by Miss Davenport; a Quartet (A. Fesca)—pianoforte, Miss Davenport; violin, Mr. Sedgwick; viola, Mr. Priestley, and cello, Mr. Sagar—which was exceedingly well rendered, and a Violin Duet (Dancla) by Master J. Bridge and Mr. Sedgwick, the execution of which elicited warm applause. The vocalists were Miss Lena Forster and Mr. J. Bairstone. Some pieces were also effectively given by a band of upwards of fifty performers. Mr. J. Priestley was the Conductor.

HELSTON.—Mr. T. J. Thuell, of Redruth, gave a Concert in the Assembly Room, on the 17th ult., in aid of the Church Restoration Fund, assisted by his pupils and friends. Miss Bessie James and Miss Laura Roskinge were highly successful in their songs. Two trios were rendered by Mr. Mathers (violin), Mrs. Chanoweth (piano), and Mr. Thuell (violin); Mr. Mathers was also associated with Miss Oats in Weber's Sonata in C, for piano and violin. At the close of the Concert a vote of thanks (proposed by the Rector) was given to Mr. Thuell.

LIVERPOOL.—The members of the Philharmonic Society gave their twelfth, and final Concert for the season, on the 1st ult., before a large audience. The principal artists were Miss Anna Williams, Madame Billinie Porter, Madame Patey, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Santley. The work selected for performance was Mendelssohn's Elijah. The choral numbers were very creditably rendered. The members of the orchestra fully entered into the spirit of the work, and from first to last the performance was one of the finest and most accurate yet given by this Society. Mr. Best gave valuable assistance at the organ, and Mr. Charles Hallé conducted with the greatest care. The "Dead March" was played before the Oratorio commenced.

MERTHYR TYDFIL.—A Series of Lenten Services has been held at St. David's Church, under the direction of the Organist, Mr. Edward Lawrence, the selections at which have been of the highest interest. So creditable has been the rendering of the music, both vocal and instrumental, at each of the four Services, that they will be long remembered by those who were present; and Mr. Lawrence's skilful and untiring efforts cannot be too warmly praised.

MILTON-NEXT-GRAVESEND.—Gounod's Redemption was performed in Holy Trinity Church, at a special Service, on the 23rd ult. The solos were taken by Miss Carlotta Elliot, Miss J. Cravino, Mr. A. Kenningham, and Mr. T. Kempton. The choruses were sung by the members of the Gravesend and Milton Choral Association, and the work was given with full orchestral accompaniments. The performance generally was very satisfactory.

NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE.—Gounod's last, and, in the opinion of many, his greatest work, was performed for the first time in Newcastle, at the Town Hall, on March 25, before a very large and appreciative audience. It is hardly surprising that opinions should vary as to the merit and ultimate popularity of the Redemption, since it presents many features new to works of its class, and it is well known that all innovations meet with opposition and excite controversy. M. Gounod is known to be one of the greatest of modern masters of orchestration, but it is a question whether he has ever displayed his powers in this direction to so full an extent as in the present work. The fine choruses, which form so important a portion of the Oratorio, were remarkably well rendered by Mr. Rea's choir; and it is much to be regretted that the talented Conductor's illness prevented his directing the work. His place, however, was most ably supplied, at a short notice, by Mr. N. Kilburn, Mus. Bac., under whose conductorship the Redemption had been recently given at Middlesbrough. The orchestra, led by Mr. J. H. Beers, was thoroughly efficient, and Mr. Chambers rendered valuable aid at the organ. The solo parts were entrusted to Miss Helen D'Alton, Miss Farnol, Miss Marie Bellas, Mr. Lucas Williams, and Mr. Chillye.—A Concert was given in the Town Hall, on the 17th ult., by the Antigone Male-Voice Choir, led by Mr. Dick. The programme included the double chorus "Orb of Helios," "O Eros," and the "Ode to Bacchus," from Mendelssohn's Antigone; "Thou comest here to the Land," from the same composer's Edipus at Colonus, and Part-songs. The singing was admirable, evincing earnest and painstaking practice on the part of the Choir. The solo vocalist was Miss Ada Patterson, who was highly successful in all her songs. A feature of the evening was the violin playing of Mr. J. H. Beers. The organist and solo pianist was Mr. James Preston, and Miss Kate Liddell accompanied on the pianoforte.

NEW MALDEN.—A Concert was given at the Wesleyan Chapel, on Friday, the 4th ult., the proceeds of which were in aid of the funds. The principal items in the programme were Beethoven's Funeral March, played as a quintet by Miss Mary Harper and Miss F. C. Greatbatch at the pianoforte, Mr. H. T. Lawson (flute), Mr. Jennings (violin), and Mr. W. H. Pettit (violin); the two last movements of Beethoven's "Moonlight" Sonata, well rendered by Miss Harper; two violinello solos, excellently played by Mr. William H. Pettit (son of the late eminent professor of the violinello); a violin solo by Mr. Jennings; and vocal selections by Miss Lizzie Baker, Miss Jennings, Miss Bella Ward, Mr. Walter Phillips, and Mr. R. A. Scase. Miss Greatbatch was an able accompanist.

OCKLEY.—On Easter Sunday the new organ, built by Messrs. Beales and Co. of Croydon, for St. John's Church, was used for the first time at a Choral Celebration, when Tours's Service in F was sung. Mattins commenced in St. Margaret's Church at 11 o'clock with the hymn "Jesus Christ is risen to-day" as processional; Smart's Te Deum in F, Dykes's Benedictus, Tallis's Responses, and Elvey's Anthem "Christ is risen" being well rendered. Evensong was sung in St. John's Church at 6.30 p.m., fully choral, when the organ was again used. On the following Monday evening Mr. Charles G. Sadler gave an invitation Organ Recital to the subscribers. The programme was well chosen to display the beauties of the organ, which consists of two manuals CC to G, fifty-six notes and full compass. The Recital was listened to till the last note by a large congregation. Both churches were exquisitely decorated for the festival.

PONTEFRAC.—On Tuesday evening, the 8th ult., a Concert and Pianoforte Recital, promoted by Mr. Haydn Fisher, Organist of All Saints' Church, was given in the New Assembly Room. An excellent programme was well rendered by Miss Sellers and Mr. Charles Biagro, vocalists; Mr. Acomb, solo violinist; and Mr. Fisher, pianoforte. On the 15th ult. the members of the Choral Society, with Mr. J. W. Young, of Wakefield, as Conductor, and Mr. J. Gledhill as pianist, gave their second Concert of the present season in the Assembly Room. The first part of the programme comprised Sir W. Sterndale Bennett's Cantata The May Queen, the principal parts being sustained by Mrs. Brown, Miss Sutcliffe, Rev. T. W. Stephenson, and Dr. Schofield. The second part consisted of glees by the Society and songs by the members.

POBLOCK.—A special Musical Service was given on Sunday, the 20th ult. There was an efficient orchestra, and the latter part of Handel's Messiah was given as the anthem. Both singing and playing were excellent. The Church was crowded, many being unable to gain admittance. The hymns, accompanied by the orchestra, were sung with a heartiness equal to that of the North country, which is almost proverbial. As a concluding voluntary the orchestra played two movements of Mendelssohn's Third Symphony and Handel's Overture to Samson.

ROCHE, CORNWALL.—The organ erected in the Parish Church by Messrs. Brewer & Co., of Truro, was opened on Friday, March 25, when a Recital was given by Mr. C. E. Juleff (Organist of Holy Trinity Church, St. Austell) from the works of Handel, Bach, Mendelssohn, Wely, Batiste, and Beethoven. Vocal solos were contributed by Miss Pollie Hook, and Sterndale Bennett's Quartet, "God is a Spirit" was expressively rendered by Miss Hook, Master Julian, Mr. Mack, and the Rev. C. Bennett. The Recital was highly appreciated, and the new organ much admired.

SEVENOAKS.—The St. John's Choral Society gave a capital performance of Haydn's Spring at the fourth Concert, on Tuesday, the 22nd ult., under the able direction of the Conductor of the Society, Mr. George E. Blunden. The second part of the programme consisted of a miscellaneous selection. The choir has improved considerably in quality of tone. The vocal soloists were Miss Bessie Diamond, Miss Ethel Harraden, Mr. Tiliard, and Mr. Horscroft. Mention must be made of the admirable rendering of her own song "Love, we shall meet again," by Miss Ethel Harraden. Mr. Ernest Kiver rendered valuable assistance at the piano, and with Mr. Blunden contributed most effectively a selection from Moszkowski's "From foreign parts." The grand piano was again kindly lent by Messrs. Collard and Collard.

SHERBORNE.—The 78th Concert by the School Musical Society was given on Easter Monday, in the great Schoolroom. The programme, which opened with the Easter Hymn, included Mendelssohn's "Reformation Symphony," and the second part of Elijah. The solos in Elijah were well sung by some of the students, and Messrs. Whitehead, Hodgson, and R. S. Ainslie. The choruses were splendidly rendered throughout, and the playing of the band, which included some of the finest performers of the day, was excellent. Mr. L. N. Parker conducted.

SHREWSBURY.—A performance of Sacred Music was given on the 3rd ult. under the conductorship of the Rev. J. Hampton, Precentor of St. Michael's, Tenbury. The choir had been trained and the performance organised by Mr. Jeudwine, an amateur of Shrewsbury, and the programme, which was very successful in every respect, was listened to by a most appreciative audience. The selection included Mozart's Mass in F, No. 6 (advertised as the first public performance in England); Leo's eight-part Dixit Dominus in C, recently scored by C. Villiers Stanford from the MS. in the Fitzwilliam Museum; a selection of Anthems and Motets by Mozart, Cherubini, Goss, Stainer, S. S. Wesley, Farrant, and Spohr; a Salve Regina by Schubert, for soprano solo and strings; the Benedictus from Cherubini's Mass in D minor; the Overture to the Occasional Oratorio; Mendelssohn's Notturmo from the Midsummer Night's Dream music; and other works. The band and chorus numbered about seventy. Miss Probert, R.A.M., of Bristol, took the solos in the Mass and Dixit; and the oboe solo in the Overture to the Occasional Oratorio was played by Mr. Edgar, of Worcester. Mr. Theo Watkins, of Ironbridge, Salop, led the orchestra.

SOUTHPORT.—Mr. Bartle and Mr. Midale gave a Recital for two pianos at the Winter Gardens, on Wednesday afternoon, the 16th ult. The programme comprised Mozart's Concerto in E flat (with orchestral accompaniment); Duo Concertante (Op. 4), C. E. Stephens; Brilliant Variations on a Bohemian March (with orchestral accompaniment), Mendelssohn and Moscheles; and Variations on a Theme by Beethoven, Saint Saëns. The various numbers were excellently rendered, and the orchestra accompanied with great precision.

ST. ANDREW'S, N.B.—The Annual Concert of the St. Andrew's University Musical Association took place in the Town Hall, on the 1st ult., with much éclat. The chorus numbered between forty and fifty voices, and there was also a band of strings with oboe and flute, partly professional and partly amateur, several of the latter students from Edinburgh University. Sir Herbert Oakeley, who takes great interest in the St. Andrew's Society, conducted, Mr. R. Stiles acting as accompanist.

STRATFORD.—The members of the Congregational Choral Society gave a Sacred Concert in their Chapel, on the evening of Good Friday, when Handel's Oratorio, The Messiah, was performed by a band and chorus numbering over one hundred persons. Mr. J. W. Hale conducted, Mr. E. J. Scrine presided at the organ, and Miss Harris ably accompanied on the pianoforte. The principal artists were Miss Berrie Stephens, R.A.M., Miss Ada South, R.A.M., Mr. Henry Prenton, and Mr. Sinclair Dunn, all of whom were highly successful in their solos. The trumpet obbligato in "The trumpet shall sound" was well played by Mr. F. Lancaster.

SYDNEY.—Miss Eva Thompson, Associate of the Royal Academy of Music, London, gave a Concert at the Masonic Hall, on February 28, before a large audience. Both as a pianist and a vocalist the bénéficiaire elicited warm and well deserved applause; her pianoforte solos especially being highly appreciated. She was assisted by Madame Marius, Messrs. T. H. Rainford and H. Pier, vocalists; and Herr Franck played with much effect two violin solos. The Conductors were Messrs C. Huenerbein and H. R. Maclean.

TAUNTON.—The Passion Music from The Messiah was performed at the special Service held in the Temple Chapel, on Good Friday evening, at eight o'clock. The choir, augmented for the occasion by several boys from the Wesleyan College, rendered the choruses with precision and effect, the solos being taken by Masters Widgery and Williams, and Mr. A. Mitchell. Mr. Wiseman presided at the organ, and materially added to the effect of the service by his able and judicious accompaniment. The service began with the hymn "O come and mourn with me awhile," after which the Litany was read by the Rev. W. P. Slater. Then followed, in well-arranged succession, hymns, lesson, and The Messiah music. After the collection, the chorus "Worthy is the Lamb" was sung, followed by the "Amen" from Handel's Utrecht Jubilate. There was a large congregation.

TUNBRIDGE WELLS.—The members of the Vocal Association gave their Annual Concert, in the Great Hall, on Monday evening, March 31, when Handel's Samson was performed. The solo vocalists were Miss Anna Williams, Miss Josephine Cravino, Mr. Henry Guy, and Mr. Bridson. The instrumental numbers were well played by the band of the Royal Engineers, led by Mr. F. Burnett; Mr. C. E. Clarke presided at the harmonium, and Mr. N. E. Irons conducted. The Oratorio was excellently rendered. At the practice, on the previous Monday, Mr. Irons was presented with a very handsome ormolu clock and an illuminated address from the members of the Tunbridge Wells Vocal Association. A portrait of Mr. Irons was also presented to Mrs. Irons. The presentation was made by Mr. Bartram, president of the Society.—On the 13th ult. a new organ, containing 8 manuals and 30 stops, built by T. C. Lewis and Co. for St. Stephen's Church, was opened by the Organist, Dr. Lewis. A short Recital was given after Evensong.

WALSALL.—On Tuesday evening, the 15th ult., the Choral Society gave a Popular Concert in the Temperance Hall. The first part of the programme consisted of The Story of Elaine, and the second of miscellaneous selections. The Society was assisted by the following soloists—Miss Beattie Holt (R.A.M.), Miss Dewes, Mr. Frederick Caston, and Mr. T. Bott. Mr. Sandland and Mr. Hayward, jun., were the principal violinists, and Mr. A. Moss and Master W. Brown acted as accompanists. The Concert was under the Conductorship of Mr. H. W. Rogers, A. Mus., and the performance was highly successful.

WELLINGTON, N.Z.—Concerts of Chamber Music are now being given by members of the Orchestral Society, under the direction of Mr. Robert Parker. The third of the series took place on February 25, when an excellent programme was performed with much success before a highly appreciative audience. A String Quartet is played as the central feature of each Concert, that on the last occasion being No. 3 of Beethoven's first set (Op. 18). Mozart's Trio for pianoforte, clarinet, and viola, in E flat, and Ernst Pauer's Quintet (Op. 44) for piano and wind instruments were well rendered and warmly received. Two movements of Mendelssohn's Violoncello Sonata in D completed the instrumental music; the programme also including three vocal pieces by Mozart, Sterndale Bennett, and Maude Valerie White respectively.

WHITBY (GROSMONT).—On Wednesday evening, the 10th ult., the Brunswick Wesleyan Choir, under the direction of the Organist, Mr. Kennison, gave a highly successful Concert of Sacred Music in the Grosmont Chapel, to a large and appreciative audience, the Rev. Robert Amys presiding. The Choir was thoroughly efficient, and the programme most interesting.—On Monday, the 28th ult., the Choral Society gave a thoroughly successful Concert. The first part consisted of extracts from Romberg's Lay of the Bell, and the second part was miscellaneous. Mr. L. W. Greenwell played a solo on the cello with much taste, and Mr. F. Bevan was rapturously encored for his capital singing throughout the Concert. The Chorus was well balanced, and received deserved applause. Herr Padel rendered good service at the piano during the Cantata. Mrs. Alder and Mr. Ellison accompanied. Mr. H. Hallgate was the Conductor.

WOLVERHAMPTON.—The members of the Festival Choral Society gave their Fourth Subscription Concert of the present season, at the Agricultural Hall, on Friday evening, the 4th ult. The solo vocalists were Miss Anna Williams, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. Oswald, supported by a band and chorus of 300 performers, under the Conductorship of Dr. Swinerton Heap. The programme consisted of Barnby's anthem "The Lord is King" and Gade's Cantata Psyche. Both works were excellently rendered and highly appreciated.

WORKSOP.—On Wednesday, the 16th ult., an Amateur Concert, in aid of the Cricket Club, was given in the Criterion Hall, which was most successful, musically and financially. Mr. Bingley Shaw, of Southwell Minster, gave valuable assistance, his fine singing of "Honour and Arms" being a feature of the evening. Mr. Flavell, Organist of the Abbey Church, conducted.

YORK.—The first annual meeting of the City Orchestral Society was held on the 7th ult. Mr. J. C. Arundel presided and Mr. John Thorpe read the report, which showed that the Society was in every respect highly successful. Forty-five rehearsals had taken place during the year, which had been attended by forty-seven instrumentalists. A vote of thanks was passed to Mr. Arthur Hopkins, the Conductor, who was unanimously re-elected for the ensuing year.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. J. H. Marsh, Organist and Director of the Choir to St. Peter's, Vauxhall.—Mr. W. A. Griesbach, to Amwell Church, Ware, Herts.—Mr. W. G. Eveleigh, L. Mus. IMPORTANT to all TEACHERS of the PIANOFORTE.—The old method of teaching Music is now entirely superseded by a far more excellent method, which claims to be the only correct and reasonable method for teaching Pianoforte-playing. Mr. Felix Sommer, one of the most efficient music-masters in the neighbourhood of London, writes as follows concerning this NEW PIANOFORTE TUTOR. (For particulars see below.)

"Sutton Lane, Chiswick, October 30, 1883.
 "Dear Herr Hoering,—I am very much obliged to you for your pamphlets and specimen copy of 'Tutor.' I have only had time to look rapidly through the latter, but I have seen sufficient to show me that it contains everything you claim for it; and I shall cordially recommend it as far as it may be in my power. It is conscientious, and thoroughly musicianlike, and I feel quite sure that it will be much appreciated by the majority of the musical profession."

Now ready.
BOOKS I. and II. of A. HOERING'S NEW METHOD FOR THE PIANOFORTE, on an entirely new principle:—
 OPINIONS FROM PROFESSIONALS.

"I like it immensely."
 "An excellent method, and worthy of all teachers' notice."
 "I find your method excellent."
 "Infinitely superior to all I have tried before."
 "I think your system wonderfully good, and just the thing that was wanted."
 "Comparison only shows the merits of your system to greater advantage."

Agents are required in every Town. Apply to the Inventor and Patentee as below.

The Pedals and Patent Action supplied by the above well-known Inventor are giving a great impetus to the present generation of Organists and Students in the art of Pedalling, and, as it is well known that most, if not all, of our great Organ Players had the advantage of a Pianoforte with Pedals attached by the old and cumbersome roller-board system, it should be known that by this new invention the Pedals can be purchased and attached at a small cost with a Mahogany Action which is perfectly noiseless, and without any springs or intricate parts to get out of repair. Organ music can thus be enjoyed and practised without the usual trouble and expense of an Organ blower. This Invention is quite different to any other Patent Action, and, being the most recent, it is as great an improvement over others as the Steam Engine is over the old Stage Coach.

Send to the Inventor, as below, for the Drawings and Prices to the Profession and Trade.

DR. F. E. GLADSTONE says:—

"I have much pleasure in stating my opinion that Mr. Wm. Chincock Dyer's Patent Action for attaching Organ Pedals to a Pianoforte is likely to prove very valuable to Organists and Students of the Organ. It possesses several advantages over other actions which have come under my observation, and I shall have no hesitation in recommending the invention to my friends and pupils."

All is sent complete, with full printed "Directions for Attaching," and the Action, being placed under the keyboard of the instrument, is easily attached to any Pianoforte.

- Set of Straight and Concave Pedals (30 Notes, C to F), as recommended at the Organ Conference, with Patent Action, price ... .. 7 15

Those who already have a set of Pedals can be supplied with the PATENT ACTION only, price £4 4s.

ADDRESS—WM. CHINNOCK DYER, INVENTOR AND PATENTEE,
WESTON-SUPER-MARE.

CAUTION.—This being the latest Patent Pedal Action, intending purchasers should note that it is the most perfect and reliable, as it contains every improvement; and being manufactured solely of well-seasoned mahogany, carefully bushed with red cloth, will continue to give the very best Pedal practice to Organists and Students.

Kindly read the testimonial above. Before purchasing send to the Inventor for the drawings and prices of this the most recent Patent Pedal Action.

Organists should recommend these Pedals and Patent Action to their Pupils.

Pedal Attachment

JOSH. SHAW

Wishes respectfully to draw the attention of Organists, and all wish for this desirable boon, to his invention and patent on Retaining and Releasing Catch

"ESCAPEMENT PRINCIPLE."

This Attachment is allowed by all who have seen it to be the most perfect and unique yet in existence, far exceeding all direct actions which are entirely at the mercy of the feet, its chief features being that a perfectly crisp and uniform note is imparted by the pedal to the key of the piano, no matter whether the pedalling is legato or otherwise, the pedal not acting directly on the key; and, moreover, that a perfect immunity from any damage to the Piano.

Notice particularly that this is the only Attachment acting purely on the Retaining and Releasing Catch without which any scheme, however cheap, is altogether unsatisfactory and dangerous to the Piano.

PREFACE.—Chopin is a writer of such masterly originality, not only in his creations, but also in his manner of composing for the Pianoforte, in the structure of his accompaniments, in his treatment of scales, arpeggi, and combinations of all kinds, that a preliminary labour—with a view of acquiring a special technical power—is indispensable to the student of his works. With this view I have chosen a certain number of passages from the works of Chopin, remarkable either in their construction or in the difficulties to be surmounted in their execution; and I have written a study on each, developing the theme and its technical peculiarities.

It must of course be understood that these studies apply only to mechanical difficulties. The secret of Chopin's style and expression can be discovered only by an earnest study of his works.—STEPHEN HELLER, 1884.

NEW ITALIAN ORGAN MUSIC. Edited and arranged for English Organs by W. T. BEST:—

- TEN ORGAN PIECES, by C. A. GAMBINI. Op. 106 ... net 6 0
- OVERTURE in C major, by C. A. GAMBINI ... .. 2 6
- BELL-RONDO (Rondò de' Campanelli), by G. MORANDI ... .. 1 6

Organists will be pleased to find in Signor Gambini's Ten Pieces music of a highly appropriate cast for use during Church service, at once melodious and sedate in style, chiefly for the softer combinations of organ-tone. The Overture affords more legitimate opportunity for solo display, and will no doubt be welcomed by advanced players as a valuable addition to their repertoire of concert pieces. Morandi's Bell-Rondo, a characteristic and tuneful movement, has already achieved considerable popularity, which the present special arrangement for our English instruments will tend to increase.

THE HOLY CITY

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"The work is an honour to English Art, and has elevated its composer into a place of distinction amongst native musicians."—Queen.

"A good sound musical work is this 'Holy City.' I have no hesitation in saying that it creditably represents English art, and does honour not only to the skill but to the judgment and taste of Mr. Gaul."—Daily Telegraph.

"The reception was favourable in the extreme, and the Cantata must henceforth be classed among the successes which the Birmingham Musical Festivals have brought to light."—Standard.

"The 'Holy City' is evidently the work of a thoughtful as well as a clever composer, and should make its mark among thoroughly English productions of a sacred character."—Musical Times.

"We hope and believe that the reception given last night to Mr. Gaul and to his 'Holy City' Cantata will prove an earnest of its popularity and acceptance throughout the length and breadth of the land."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"A most interesting, tuneful, and scholarly work."—Manchester Courier.

"This fine work will considerably enhance Mr. Gaul's reputation as a musician."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

SIR MICHAEL COSTA.

BORN, FEBRUARY 4, 1810. DIED, APRIL 28, 1884.

THE records of the nineteenth century will be referred to in after time as rich in brilliant and remarkable human lives, among which the life of Michael Costa will certainly have a place. It is true that Costa did not command the applause of listening senates, or lead armies to victory. He made no discoveries in the walks of science, enriched no literature with deathless works, nor did anything calculated to affect the destinies of the human race. But a man may be called to achieve none of these things and yet show the very highest qualities. The personal measure of an individual should not be taken by reference to his position and opportunities, but by estimate of his absolute qualities. Tour de l'Auvergne, "first grenadier of France," was only a private soldier, yet, by Imperial decree, his name headed every muster-roll, and was called wherever the tricolour waved, to be answered by the noble words, "Dead on the field of honour." Michael Costa ranked above a private soldier, but what we desire to insist upon is that a man may distinguish himself relatively as much in a limited as in an extended sphere. Questions of personal greatness are not determined by the area over which greatness happens to be recognised.

We have only to look at Costa's beginning and then upon his end in order to be convinced that with him there must have been remarkable gifts of some kind or other. In the year 1829, when he was nineteen years of age, Costa figured amongst the students of the Neapolitan Royal Academy of Music, then under the care of the veteran Zingarelli. Concerning the nature and extent of his musical talent at that period we can say absolutely nothing definite. He had written a good deal—a mass, cantata, and three operas inter alia, but none of these things have come down to us. Probably they were no more than every student was expected to do, and we see no reason to suppose that they revealed the special endowment of genius for composition. On the other hand, we have very clear evidence that Costa exhibited remarkable talent of another kind, and that Zingarelli, with rare discrimination, perceived its full value. Everybody knows the story of Costa's coming to England, charged with the fortunes of his old master's sacred work, written for the Birmingham Festival in 1829. Zingarelli was then nearly eighty years of age. Always a precise and methodical man, his habits had, no doubt, strengthened themselves as years went on, and it is far from likely that he would have entrusted his music to a youth of nineteen unless he had been profoundly impressed by tried and proven ability. It should be remembered that Costa came to England not simply as the messenger of Zingarelli, but as his representative. The intention was that the young man should rehearse and conduct his master's cantata, and we want no more than this simple fact to prove that talent for the kind of work which afterwards made his fame and fortune then stood revealed in a conspicuous manner. That Costa did not conduct Zingarelli's piece was no fault of his. Grotto, Cramer, and the rest elbowed him off, and the committee did what they could in recompense by offering him an engagement as a solo vocalist.

It has often been stated, with regard to this memorable début, that Zingarelli's composition was a setting of the Psalm "By the waters of Babylon." The mistake should be corrected. On reference to the Harmonicon (Vol. vii., p. 274) it will be seen that the venerable musician took as his text the twelfth chapter (six verses) of Isaiah. According to the same authority, it was a poor work, but what other could have been expected from so aged a master, and one who lived so far back in the past as to expel Mercadante from the Academy for the heinous offence of transcribing a score of Mozart. The Harmonicon criticised the cantata in strong terms: "The 'Cantata Sacra,' composed for this Festival by Zingarelli, is one of the most tame, insipid things we were ever doomed to hear: a heap of common-place trash from the first to the last note. After twaddling in B flat for half-an-hour, he ventures for a few bars into F, then returns to B, and there is an end." Poor Zingarelli! How much it is to be regretted that some kind and judicious critic did not, at the end of the first page of his manuscript, insert for his edification the words which Haydn affixed to the fragment of his Eighty-third, his last, Quartet—

All my strength, alas! is gone,
Old and weak am I.

This is quite in the tomahawk style of the Edinburgh Review, as determined by the ferocity of Jeffrey, and so is the criticism upon Costa's singing, which we here reprint for the sake of contrast between the opening and closing of his English career:—

"Having spoken of so many new compositions, we must now say a word or two of the new singer, Signor Costa. The bills kept us quite in the dark concerning this gentleman; it was not even announced as his first appearance; it was not stated whence he was imported, or whether his voice was bass, soprano, or anything between. But this silence was well judged, for it certainly did not lead us to expect much. His voice proves to be a tenor, not very unlike Begrez's in quality, and we have been informed he came from Naples, recommended by Zingarelli, who would have acted with more discretion had he kept both his sacred song and profane singer for the benefit of his Neapolitan friends. As a singer he is far below mediocrity, and he does not compensate for his vocal deficiencies by his personal address, which is abundantly awkward. In the theatre, while singing the air 'Nel furor delle tempeste,' and accompanying himself, he had a narrow escape. The tempests proved contagious, and were beginning to manifest themselves in the galleries, and had he remained but a few moments longer on the stage, he would have witnessed a storm compared to which the roarings of his own Vesuvius would have seemed but a murmur."

This is obviously overdrawn, but we have no reason to believe it unjust in the main. Costa's appearance as a vocalist was an interpolation into his career, and that he himself so regarded it, the fact of his having at once devoted himself to another line of business quite clearly proves.

Costa did not return to Italy. With characteristic shrewdness he saw that an Italian musician in England held a place of advantage which only gross blundering could fail to improve. He gravitated at once towards the lyric theatre, as by an unerring instinct, and obtained from Laporte the post of maestro al piano—a lowly function with a grand name—at the "old house in the Haymarket." The Harmonicon makes no mention of the appointment, but for that matter it does not even inform us who succeeded Bochsa as musical director in the same year. We know, however, that Costa so impressed the authorities of the house by his talents that, in 1832, he became musical director himself. Between the date just named and 1846, the Neapolitan musician devoted himself to operatic work. In that period he composed three ballets—"Une heure à Naples" (1832); "Sir Huon" (1833); "Alma" (1842); and two operas—"Malek Adel" (1837); "Don Carlos" (1844). None of these survive; our only inheritance from the years in question being the well-known quartet "Ecco quel fiero istante" (1833). Of two distinct forms of labour carried on between 1832 and 1846 one certainly succeeded. That is to say, Costa built up such a reputation as a conductor, and made himself so conspicuous a figure, that he was ripe for further development on the same lines. With the fitness came the opportunity. The year 1846, like 1829, was a turning point in Costa's history, for then not only did he separate himself from Her Majesty's Theatre and its chief, Mr. Lumley, to begin a brilliant reign of twenty-three years at the Royal Italian Opera, but he accepted the post of conductor at the Philharmonic Concerts, and entered upon a career away from the footlights. Probably he had no idea of the importance of the step just referred to, or of the goal to which it would lead him. Events, however, soon made its significance clear. The new concert chief towered above the petty folk who were his rivals, and dignity after dignity was laid at his feet. In 1848 he became conductor of the Sacred Harmonic Society; and in 1849 he accepted the bâton of the Birmingham Festival. In 1853 he had charge of the Bradford Festival; in 1857 he presided over the first Handel Festival, at Sydenham; and, in 1874, started the Leeds Festival upon its successful course. With these acquisitions of responsibility and honour there were relinquishments. Costa left the Philharmonic Society in 1854, and let in Wagner for one stormy season. In 1869 he quitted Covent Garden, but two years later became chef-d'orchestre at Her Majesty's Theatre, retaining that position till 1879. He conducted no more than a single Festival at Leeds, but his last appearance at Birmingham was in 1882, and his last Handel Festival took place in 1880. Almost, therefore, he may be said to have died in harness.

Familiarity with Oratorio had the natural effect of leading Costa to try his hand at that form of composition; the inducement being the greater for the certainty of producing his works under the best possible conditions. Accordingly "Eli" was brought out in 1855 and "Naaman" in 1864"—both at Birmingham, and both amid enthusiastic applause. These works were frequently performed in England during the composer's life-time; Costa being always ready to preside over their execution. Upon the destiny that ultimately awaits them it would be idle to speculate. It would be equally without reason to deny that both Oratorios contain a good deal of well-designed, melodious, and effective music, written, alike for voices and orchestra, with consummate skill, and only wanting perhaps in a full measure of the indefinable quality known as genius. Certain it is that we look in vain among the successors of Mendelssohn for an Oratorio which more nearly approaches the standard of "Elijah" than "Eli." In this fact is an honour by no means small.

Costa's name being certain to reach posterity in his quality as a conductor, let us put on record some of the strong points which made his fame. Speaking in the palace of truth, we cannot hold him up to admiration as immaculate. He was a musician of limited sympathies, and with works which he disliked he never could be successful, though he honestly tried. He had the true Italian ardour both of love and hate, such ardour as frequently overcame the promptings of judgment. The music of his own country Costa passionately worshipped. He was never so happy as when conducting "Il Barbiere" or "Semiramide," and next to Italian operatic music he preferred that, no matter of what country, which presented broad and strong, not to say sensational, effects. He took pleasure in Handel for this reason; among German composers of a later period than Beethoven, Meyerbeer was a favourite; while the melodic grace and perfect form of Mendelssohn charmed him. Beethoven, on the other hand, was not to be found in Costa's "heart of hearts." He respected the great master, but could never understand him sufficiently to get on terms of confidence, otherwise he would not have altered the vocal parts in the Mass in D, nor tendered performances of the symphonies such as were little better than perfunctory. Bach's musical language was another "unknown tongue" to Costa. He conducted the Matthew "Passion" but once, and then, as none who were present can forget, he gave every note, that satiety might destroy appetite for ever, a result which, as far as concerned the Sacred Harmonic Society, he fully attained. Moreover, the deceased conductor often permitted himself to make in the scores of the masters alterations such as were quite indefensible. He had his own idea of how things should be done, and a resolute, imperious nature carried him to greater lengths than more cautious musicians could possibly approve. We have mentioned these matters of necessity, because silence with regard to them would convey a false impression. But when all is said about Costa's limited sympathies and unlimited daring, he remains the great conductor whom it is a duty to honour. He had, what all conductors should possess, the secret of command. This it was which enabled him at the outset to reduce an English orchestra to order and discipline. Yet he did not bluster. A few quiet words, and the matter in hand was settled without appeal. On one occasion he took charge, for the first time, of an orchestra in which was a performer famous for "larking" while at his desk. Costa knew this, and, before attempting any work, turned to the lively person in question, "Mr. —, I hear you are fond of jokes. Understand that your first joke with me will be your last." The farceur saw with whom he had to deal and wisely reserved himself for more appreciative society. Under Costa's rule, the orchestra became a model of punctuality and serious work; but the chief was rarely harsh, and would always stand up for his men in times of emergency. He insisted on duty being done. In that respect he was a Wellington; but outside the demands of duty he knew how to be kind, and even indulgent. That he was absolutely loved by the orchestra cannot, perhaps, be said. He inspired respect and esteem, but also the fear with which a warmer feeling can hardly exist.

Costa's power of command had much to do with his success in handling large masses of executants. A quiet, decisive manner gave confidence, while extraordinary readiness and tact in meeting emergencies sometimes snatched victory out of the very jaws of defeat. Those who have watched him often can recall many instances of Costa's wonderful resource and presence of mind. If an operatic singer made a mistake in an entry, or dropped a few bars, the conductor was never at fault; a few signs so quietly made that the bulk of the audience never noticed them, put the orchestra with the vocalist again, and the danger passed. Costa excelled also in the art of accompanying singers. Even he, so imperious by nature, recognised that in an aria the singer has a right to his own interpretation. Hence he never attempted to force his own will upon the artist, but followed with care and patience, supporting the voice, and allowing the vocal effect all necessary scope. It is doubtful whether in the matters just touched upon we shall see his like again.

As a man the deceased musician well supported the dignity of his profession. He was always the "gentleman," observant of social usage, and exacting for himself the respect he paid to others. Weaknesses he certainly had, not least among them being inability to forgive and forget. The strong feeling he showed against Sir Sterndale Bennett, even after that composer's death, will remain a blot upon an otherwise high personal character. But, as Costa was strong in dislike, he was generous in his affection, those whom he loved he loved indeed, remaining faithful to them under every change and circumstance. He was truly a remarkable person, and by his death we have lost one who played a great part in the history of English music during the last half-century. That this was felt to be the case on all hands the gathering at his funeral conclusively showed.

The last honours were paid to the deceased musician, at Kensal Green Cemetery, on the Tuesday following his death. The remains had been brought up from Brighton to Eccleston Square, whence a long procession of mourning and private carriages started, at noon, amid the bright sunshine and under the clear sky of a typical May day. Mr. Raphael Costa acted as chief mourner, accompanied by the Rev. Dr. Cox, the officiating clergyman, Mr. Husk, Mr. Heath, Mr. Perugini, and other intimate friends. The private carriages were mostly occupied by deputations from the societies and institutions with which the deceased had been connected. Among the bodies so represented were the late and present Sacred Harmonic Societies, Mr. Willing's Choir (of which Sir Michael was a vice-president), the Royal Academy of Music, the Royal Society of Musicians, the Birmingham Festival Committee, &c. Solemn official honour was thus paid to the departed conductor and composer—such honour as, in life, he would have valued above any other. As the hearse was an open one, the flower-decked coffin passed through the streets like a gleam of light. It was literally covered with wreaths and crosses, suspended from the sides, and piled high on the lid. These were sent by private friends and public institutions, while not a few were taken to the cemetery, and there added to the rest. Within the "necropolis" a large crowd gathered to pay their informal respect, and scores of well-known faces were seen on every hand. We cannot pretend to give a complete list of the musicians and amateurs present, but it was observed that the Italians came down in strong force to honour the memory of their countryman, while among the comparatively few Germans present were Mr. Ganz, Mr. Carl Rosa, and Mr. Hallé. English vocalists were represented by Miss Anna Williams, Madame Patey, Mr. Santley, and others; and the Royal Italian Opera, by the Brothers Gye and Signor Bevigiani. As the remains were deposited in the catacombs, there was no public ceremony; only invited persons entering the chapel, whence the coffin was lowered by hydraulic power into the vaults below. This appeared to be a sore disappointment to the waiting throng. Within the chapel the simple ceremony was also a solemn one. Dr. Cox read the service impressively, and the very gradual sinking of the coffin till it passed out of sight excited a good deal of emotion among those present. The mourners afterwards descended to the catacombs, and saw the body laid side by side with that of Sir Michael's father, who died in England many years ago. Thus, with all fitting honour, the great conductor was taken to his "long home." May he rest in peace!

Sir Michael Costa had resigned all his appointments before death removed, and it may be of interest to complete this record by stating who succeeded him. The bâton of the Birmingham Festival, as our readers are aware, is now in the hands of Herr Richter; Mr. Hallé acts as conductor of the new Sacred Harmonic Society which sprang from the ruins of the old Association; Sir Arthur Sullivan is the musical chief at Leeds, and Mr Manns on the orchestra of the Handel Festival; while Her Majesty's Opera has ceased to exist. So that instead of one naturalised Englishman we have three foreigners and an Englishman born.

ENGLISH MUSIC IN 1884.

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

It is unfashionable now to quote the poet Young, but, as I do not write for fashionable people, I will venture upon it here and run the risk of solecism. The poet Young, looking out upon the eternal arsis and thesis of creation—the everlasting swinging of the pendulum whose ticking registers eras—could understand it no better than the least of us. But, if he could not comprehend, he could describe, and subjoined are some lines which suit this present exordium:—

Look nature through, 'tis revolution all;
All change, no death: day follows night, and night
The dying day; stars rise and set, and rise;
Earth takes th' example. See, the summer gay,
With her green chaplet and ambrosial flowers,
Droops into pallid autumn; winter grey,
Horrid with frost and turbulent with storm,
Blows autumn and his golden fruits away,
Then melts into the spring: soft spring, with breath
Favonian, from warm chambers of the south,
Recalls the first; all, to re-flourish, fades,
As in a wheel, all sinks to re-ascend:
Emblems of man, who passes, not expires.

Intelligent readers, knowing that it is not my business to discuss the immortality of the soul, see at a glance why I have thus dipped into the "Night Thoughts." The phenomena of nature but put into gross and palpable forms the phenomena of mind, and the law of action and re-action, of advance and retreat, of growth and decay, is by no means confined to the region of physical forces. Students of history meet on countless pages with proofs of a fact which is as cheering in its way as the deduction drawn by Young from observation of the material world. Take any country conspicuous in the records of civilization and you will find its intellectual life chequered by alternate sunshine and shade, like a forest path. Now it is all splendour, and men look on in mingled envy and admiration; anon there is obscurity—the glory has departed to blaze elsewhere. Our own "island story" supplies illustrations. Mark how the Augustan age of Elizabeth followed hard upon the dark and terrible period which witnessed the old order of society change and give place to the new. "For, indeed," says Mr. Froude, in a magnificent passage, "a change was coming upon the world, the meaning and direction of which even is still hidden from us—a change from era to era. The paths trodden by the footsteps of ages were broken up; old things were passing away, and the faith and the life of ten centuries were dissolving like a dream. Chivalry was dying; the abbey and the castle were soon together to crumble into ruins; and all the forms, desires, beliefs, convictions of the old world were passing away never to return. . . The floor of heaven, inlaid with stars, had sunk back into an infinite abyss of immeasurable space; and the firm earth itself, unfixed from its foundations, was seen to be but a small atom in the awful vastness of the universe." From among the ruins made by this cataclysm sprang the glorious flowers of Elizabethan literature and poetry—aye, and of music; for then our country, always before as musical as the best, was itself the best, and could challenge Italy and the Netherlands, while as yet France was only creeping into the light, and Germany remained in the darkness of almost heathendom. By-and-by the splendour waned. There came a time of gloom, relieved only by the bright particular star of Milton's genius, this in turn giving way to the second Augustan age of Anne. Unhappily music did not revive. The most delicate and sensitive of the arts was smothered in the frippery and furbelows of the Restoration. Purcell died all too soon for music as for his fame; English talent—what there was of it—retired to the organ-loft, and the foreigner, with his ready adaptability and his elastic principles, swarmed in to take possession of the land. He is here now, but—this is the moral of my exordium—the sun of native art is once more rising, the pendulum is swinging back through its vast arc, and those who stand in its way must not complain of the consequences.

Some one may remind me of the American saying, "Never prophesy unless you know." That saying is more flippant than sage. It would laugh away prophecy altogether, and reduce the universal world to the position of Mr. Micawber, who, instead of anticipating events and getting ready to control them, waited for them to "turn up," and then they controlled him. Besides, it is the highest exercise of the human judgment to interpret the signs of the times; find out the direction in which they point, and decide whether movements thitherward are to be helped or retarded. For such an end a man may stake his reputation as a far-seer, and risk his perspicacity on the current of events. I shall do so here, at any rate, and say that the turn of musical England is at hand. All circumstances point thereto, notably the barrenness of other countries. In Italy there is only Verdi—an almost extinct volcano; for Boito and Ponchielli make no further mark as years go on, and are limited in the application of such powers as they possess. There are young musicians in France, but what they lack in solidity is made up not so much by brilliancy as by the eccentric and extravagant. As for Germany, a famous Teutonic chef d'orchestre said to me the other day, with a ring of sadness in his tones, "We have no one younger than Brahms!"

Most significant of all concurrent phenomena is the barrenness of Germany. It is as though Nature had exhausted herself by the productiveness of the two centuries that separate the birth of Bach and Handel from the time now present, and as though the land of Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven, of Weber, Mendelssohn, and Schumann, were now to lie fallow till after a process of recuperation. Such, indeed, must be the actual fact, if the actual fact accord with outward seeming and with the teachings of history. I cannot conceive that musical genius will vanish from the earth because Germany is, for the time being, played out. "The wind bloweth where it listeth," but it is always blowing somewhere. If there be a musical calm in one land, analogy teaches us that in another an artistic breath is so stirring as that those who listen hear a movement in the valley of dry bones. What nation, it may curiously be asked, will succeed to the pre-eminence of Germany? From the scope of this enquiry we may dismiss France and Italy. Each of these countries has an art suited to itself, but one which the world at large, so powerfully dominated by the various branches of the Teutonic stock, will never regard as other than a pleasing dialect of the universal language. The issue lies, I am disposed to think, with two races, the Slavonic and the Anglo-Saxon.

On many occasions I have pointed my readers to the interesting position now occupied by the Slavonian peoples. I have tried to awaken enquiry into, or rather speculation regarding, the influence which Slavonic music, distinct from all other in important respects as it is, must necessarily exercise upon the universal art, and the course of my present argument compels me again to touch upon the matter. Those of us who watch with intent and patient gaze the slow workings of a Providence in whose sight a thousand years are but as one day, have our eyes now rivetted upon a process supremely illustrative of the fact that history repeats itself. We watch the concentrating strength in the East and North of another wave of humanity, destined to flow westward, whither the march of empire ever sets. At the same time, we see the Celts rapidly leaving the western fringe of Europe, where they have tenaciously clung to a land once all their own. The Teutons likewise are going, to renew the ancient struggle across the Atlantic. There are at this moment parts of Germany where the native inhabitants have shrunk to a small fraction of their former strength. Under pressure of circumstances, which I need not stop to describe, Germany is flinging herself bodily across the ocean, and if the population of the country grows it is rather by the influx of strangers than through natural increase. With such vast movements of humanity contention must ever be vain. No Chinese wall can bar their progress; no decree of Canute or Bismarck can stay the tide. Meanwhile, all along the line where Teuton and Slavonian touch there is the chafing which precedes conflict. Here, however, I have not so much to do with the ethnographic, or the political aspect of the case just stated, as with the musical considerations involved. There are plentiful signs that Slavonian art will precede the race itself into Western Europe. Already Slavonian composers and executants have acquired influence far beyond the lands where their own people dwell. At the present moment, indeed, they outweigh their German rivals, and if their music be frequently marked by eccentricity or extravagance, this may be set down to the ill-regulated exuberance of artistic youth—a plea with which none can excuse the studied and painful boyishness of an artistic senility that tries to deceive the world and itself. I take the star of Anton Dvorák to be a luminary of meaning in the present musical firmament. It signifies the entrance into art of a fresh and vigorous race, emerged but yesterday from the twilight of semi-civilization and now looking about it for work upon which to exercise powers that may as yet be mostly rude but are certainly strong.

Among the Anglo-Saxons, as represented by the people of the Motherland, a very different state of things exists. With us no question of youth arises. But our musical position appears even more curious and interesting than that of the Slavonic race. It is with us as though an old man, accomplished otherwise, had yet to acquire some element of ordinary knowledge.

Our national history furnishes an explanation, and one which stands apart from the question whether we are naturally a musical people. I am not going to pretend that England has any special gift of music. It would be vain to do so in the light of actual observation; but I do say, in the light of incontrovertible facts, that at one time our nation was abreast of the foremost in cultivation and acquaintance with the art. No one will dispute this. Why, at a later period than the brilliant age of the Elizabethan madrigalians and church composers, did we drop behind till music fell into absolute disrepute, and its profession came to be regarded, like that of the actor, as the hallmark of vagabondage? The query deserves an answer at length, but I can only point here to the influence of Puritanism and of greed for material wealth. These things almost annihilated English art, such branches of it excepted as minister to the evidences of wealth and flatter the vanity of its possessors. Puritanism came first, with an anathema on all enjoyments and pleasurable pursuits. Far be it from me to under-value the good which the sturdy spirit of Puritanism has done for England. I should be false to the teaching of history were I to join in the railings often hurled at it by ignorance, or by those who merely repeat the shibboleths of society and flatter themselves on being, as they would say, comme il faut. But the tendency of all social, moral, and religious movements is to extremes, and Puritanism, in its zeal, failed to distinguish between things that differ. Music it crushed with the hand of iron that hurled Charles Stuart out of life and sent "Jezebel" back to her own country. Puritanism sang psalms—mostly through the nose, say its traducers—but it knocked organs into shapeless heaps of wood and metal, and branded all other musical instruments, all "light and galliardising airs," with the mark of the Beast. Seeing that Puritanism, at one time triumphant, has been influential in England ever since its rise, who can measure its effect in checking the development of music? To cite but one example, some men now living may remember that the retention of Psalmody in a large South-London chapel, was only secured by a compromise; those who conscientiously objected to the use of music being permitted to go outside while the exercise of praise went on within.

The extreme virulence of Puritanism had scarcely abated, when a new influence began to work against music. Over the whole country came the rage of empire, and that passion for wealth whence has sprung our enormous commercial development, with all its attendant circumstances, as, for example, the conquest of India. There was no time in those days for cultivating the gentler arts, and such knowledge as the people had gained of them in quieter years died out. We were filibustering over the globe; subduing Asiatics by fire and sword, and warring with every power that owned a colony, till the prize fell to the dauntless valour of an imperial race. In short, we were busy empire-making—a very absorbing pursuit. We went on, in a large national way, "adding house to house and land to land," till, as it seemed, the man who did not help the process by going into "business" or using a sword was a poor creature fit only to be looked down upon. Yesterday almost, the teaching of music in our schools was discouraged by public sentiment as taking up the time of boys with a lady-like "accomplishment." In all this I see nothing out of the usual order of things. The expanding, aggressive stage of a nation's life is not that wherein the arts flourish. Two things cannot be done at once: Duos qui sequitur lepores, neutrum capit. Hence the rule of history is to show that when a country has passed beyond the period just named it most fully expands all that is refining in its internal life. Often, indeed, artistic development takes place while the land is under the influence of political stagnation. "The study of art," said Guizot, "possesses this great and peculiar charm—that it is absolutely unconnected with the struggles and contests of ordinary life." When, therefore, those struggles and contests are no longer pressing, men turn to the study of art. They have, at such a time, the power to detach themselves from concerns of society and the nation that at other times hold them fast.

In dwelling upon the causes which, according to my view, operated for the decadence of English music, the purpose has not been altogether retrospective. I desire to connect them in the reader's mind with present facts of immense import and cheering character. These are two. First: The more intolerant and unreasonable spirit of Puritanism is passing away. I do not mean that England is becoming less religious. We are a religious people, and shall remain so, though dogmas change and "articles of faith" be less thought of than acts of faith. What I do mean is that even the classes of society wherein Puritan aversion to the graces and refined pleasures of life has lingered most obstinately are modifying their attitude. Look, for example, at the advance of the "organ movement" in Scotland—an advance made over the prejudices of a nation not given to change. This phenomenon—so, indeed, it may be described—I take as signifying a general break-up of old habits of thought on the matter in question. Turning to the second point, it is to be observed that our nation has apparently reached a crisis in its history. The British empire is made, and public opinion seems more and more averse from enterprises tending towards its further expansion. In point of fact, an idea prevails that our limit of development has been reached, and that the task of the future will be to hold our own against rivals who started later in the race. The very existence of such a sentiment has an important bearing upon national culture of the arts. It points to a new direction of some part, at least, of the national energies. What that direction will be, in a manner, determined by historical precedent; for only when Rome reached the zenith of her power did the arts move towards their highest development under the shadow of her eagles' wings.

Signs of the change just indicated are not wanting around us. We see on every hand a greater attention to music, the result of an altered estimate of its worth. The art is taught in our public schools, without apologies or shamefacedness. In elementary schools the money of the tax-payer is devoted to it, without raising a cry of indignation, while young men of a rank in life which opens to them a professional career show that they consider the profession of music honourable in the sight of all. These facts are significant, but more suggestive still is the abatement of the curious, though by no means mysterious, prejudice against English music and musicians which so long lay, a nightmare oppression, upon our national art. The prejudice still exists. A rooted thing of the kind is hard to tear up. But I believe that it is dying under the influence of fuller knowledge and a more enlightened view of music itself. Every stage of its decay will mark a stage in the advance of the art, and its end must naturally be hastened by the increase amongst us of talented composers and professors.

I should tax too heavily the patience which, perhaps, is already wearied were I to take up much space in proving that, as regards talented composers and professors, English music was never so fortunate as now. We have amongst us four composers whose good repute has recently conquered German prejudice against the art of what a young English renegade has just called the "barbarous land." Mr. Cowen's "Scandinavian" Symphony, Mr. Goring Thomas's "Esmeralda," Mr. Villiers Stanford's "Savonarola," and Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's "Colomba"—all have gained a footing in the country of Beethoven and Mozart. The consequences will, in the nature of things, extend far beyond themselves. The victory of these English compositions is "as the letting out of water." They have made a hole in the dyke, and the first few drops, unless fortune play us false, will be followed by a stream. At home the English composer is no longer looked at coldly by impressarii and Festival managers. He is run after and courted. As in the case of Mr. Mackenzie, if he cannot write an Oratorio for one Festival he is asked to promise for another three years later, while, as also in the case of the fortunate North British musician, we see him welcomed on the English lyric stage, and invited to show himself in Italian dress elsewhere. I cannot now undertake an examination of the personal claims made by each of our leading composers. That task may better be discharged in a separate paper. But I would impress upon them a sense of the very grave responsibility under which they are placed by circumstances. To a large extent they have the immediate future of English music in their hands, and can secure for it success or failure as they please. Every amateur, therefore, is concerned in what they do, and has reason to implore their careful action towards the development of our art on a sound basis, and not on modern and unproven theories. My own anxiety as to this is great. I urge—nay, implore—our composers to conserve everything distinctively English, so long as it is not adverse to true progress, and to develop their art, as far as may be, along English lines. This applies especially to lyric drama. Germany, France, Italy have a lyric drama of their own, and though in England we possess nothing very definite to work upon, our composers should take good heed of what there is, and so build upon the sure foundation of national taste. Above all, let them avoid mere theorising by way of remedying actual defects.

There's too much abstract willing, purposing,
In this poor world. We talk by aggregates
And think by systems, and, being used to face
Our evils in statistics, are inclined
To cap them with unreal remedies,
Drawn out in haste on the other side the slate.

By avoiding this—by amending the old rather than devising the new—our composers may build us up an English art, and make themselves an everlasting name.

HANDEL'S ORCHESTRATION.

By EBENEZER PROUT.

I AM at length approaching the termination of my labours; for though there still remain for notice a large number of the oratorios, it will be readily understood that many of the special orchestral effects to be found in them will have been already met with in earlier works. It is true that even towards the close of his life Handel continued to make fresh experiments in instrumentation, and such, of course, I shall point out as I proceed; but as a whole I shall be able to get through the rest of the series far more rapidly than has often been practicable in the works of which I have already spoken.

The first work to be dealt with in this article—the "Dettingen Te Deum" (1743)—illustrates what I have just said. It is richly scored, for strings, oboes, bassoons, three trumpets, drums, and organ, and abounds in contrasts of colour; but I find nothing in it which has not been spoken of in preceding articles. I therefore pass on to "Semele," also written in 1743. In this work it is only needful to notice the effective orchestration of the introduction to the third act, in which the sleep of Somnus in his cavern is depicted by the moving figure in quavers for two violoncellos doubled by two bassoons, and the treatment of the drums. In two choruses of the first act, "Avert these omens," and "Cease, cease your vows," Handel uses the drums without the trumpets to represent the rumbling of the thunder-storm; and in the third act Jupiter's oath to Semele, which brings about her destruction, is followed by a peal of thunder, imitated by a drum solo entirely unaccompanied. It is worth noting that in these cases Handel has nowhere used the roll of the drums, as might have been expected, but has given the instruments passages of semiquavers. Similarly, in "Fixed in His everlasting seat" ("Samson"), at the words "His thunder roars," the drums have a figure of six quavers in the bar instead of a roll, which Handel seldom employs.

"Joseph" (1743) presents no features for special remark; and there is only one thing to be noticed in "Hercules" (1744), but that one is extremely curious. In the chorus "Immortal fame" we see three times on the first violin line the indication "e tromba." It was evidently Handel's intention here that the trumpet should give out the theme of the fugue as a canto fermo; but nowhere else has he left the trumpet parts not fully written out. He gives no indication here as to where the instrument ceases; moreover, the key of the chorus is E flat, and it is by no means clear whether Handel intended the trumpets to be crooked in E flat or in B flat. I have not met with them in any other of Handel's scores in either of these two keys. The whole matter is involved in mystery which it appears impossible to clear up.

I pass over the score of "Belshazzar" (1744) with the remark that in "Destructive war" (p. 225) we find the only song in all the oratorios, except the well-known "Sound an alarm," in which trumpets and drums are used in the accompaniment; and I next come to a work full of interesting points of orchestration—"Judac Maccabæus" (1746). The first piece to notice here is the chorus "For Sion lamentation make." In the opening symphony the middle notes of the bassoons are held with great effect against short chords for the strings; and at the eighth and following bars we see quite a modern style of instrumentation in the holding chords for wind instruments against the detached harmonies for chorus and strings. Handel's moderation in the employment of his full orchestra is especially noticeable in this work. It might have been anticipated that the two martial choruses in the first part, "We come in bright array" and "Lead on," would have been accompanied by trumpets and drums; but in neither case are these instruments used. The composer is keeping them in reserve for a special purpose, and they make their appearance for the first time in the oratorio in the song "Sound an alarm," with an effect all the greater from their previous silence. Of course this effect is never heard in modern performances of the work, thanks to the senseless custom of vulgarising the music by the addition of a military band to the score. I have already shown in these articles that additional accompaniments are to a certain extent a necessity with Handel's works; but I hold it as a cardinal principle that such accompaniments should be as far as possible in Handel's spirit, and I take this opportunity of entering an earnest protest against the utterly un-Handelian additions only too frequently to be heard at performances of his works. As I have no wish to make a personal attack, I abstain from giving instances; musicians will have little difficulty in supplying them for themselves.

The beautiful song "Wise men flattering may deceive you" is one of the most richly scored numbers in all Handel's works; in addition to the strings it contains parts for two flutes, two oboes, two bassoons, and two horns. The wind instruments are charmingly treated, and the air abounds in contrasts of colour. The popular "See the conquering hero comes" contains in the full chorus at the end a direction which I have not found elsewhere in Handel—"Timpani ad libitum; tremolo per la seconda volta." The drums were apparently to play in the rhythm of the voice-parts for the first eight bars; the second strain of the chorus is marked "senza timpani," and the repetition of the first part was to be accompanied by the roll of the drums. In the little-known song, "With honour let desert be crowned" (now, I believe, always omitted in performance), will be found a very curious, and probably unique, trumpet obbligato. The key of the piece is A minor, and the trumpet in D is used. The seventh and eleventh harmonics of the tube, sounding C natural and G natural, both of which are perceptibly out of tune with the tempered scale, are frequently employed. On our modern instruments, with slides or valves, the faulty intonation could be corrected; but in Handel's time these improvements were unknown, and the composer probably trusted to what has been termed "the adjusting power of the ear" to accept the incorrect note in place of its true equivalent.

A point of special interest is mentioned by Dr. Chrysander in his preface to the score of "Judac." The music of the song "Pious orgies" was originally intended as a Dead March for Mattathias. Handel began the composition in this form; and the fragment found in the original manuscript is reprinted in the preface to the German Handel Society's edition. It is in the key of E flat, and is scored for strings, "Traversi e Flauti, 1, 2," bassoons and drums. The indication "Trav. e Flauti" occurs twice, showing that Handel intended the old "Flute-à-bec" to be used as well as the Flauto traverso—the last time, by the way, that we find it in the composer's works. We see here duet passages for the flutes accompanied by the strings pizzicato, and in one place a striking effect is obtained by the basses and drums entering contra tempo on the second quaver of each beat. It is also worth remarking that this sketch is the only instance I have found in Handel of the employment of the drums in E flat and B flat.

I must pass over the "Occasional Oratorio" (1746), because it is not yet published in the new edition; and I next come to "Alexander Balus" (1747). In the opening chorus of this almost forgotten but very fine work, "Flushed with conquest," we find several passages in which the horns and trumpets have separate parts. It is not very often that Handel uses both horns and trumpets in the same movement, though instances may be seen in "Deborah" and "Athalia"; but hitherto whenever he has done so the horns have doubled the trumpets in the octave. Here for the first time we find them independent; in "Solomon" the same thing will be met with. In the lovely song "Here amid the shady woods" will be seen a most effective use of the sordini for the violins and violas, while the violoncello part is marked pizzicato. The fact that, in spite of this direction, we find several slurred and tied notes shows clearly that the part was also to be played on the cembalo, though, as usual, that instrument is not indicated. But by far the most elaborately scored number of "Alexander Balus," and one of the most striking orchestral pages in Handel's works, is the song "Hark, hark! he strikes the golden lyre," which is accompanied by two violins, viola, two violoncellos, double-basses, doubled by the bassoons in the octave, two flutes, organ obbligato, harp, and mandolin.

I have mentioned in a previous article Handel's fondness for the combination of organ and flutes; in the present number nearly all the solo passages for the flutes are accompanied by the organ only. Contrasted and alternated with them are florid passages for the harp and mandolin—the latter instrument not having a separate part, but evidently playing the upper notes of the harp part—accompanied by three-part harmony of the strings, for two violoncellos and double-basses, all pizzicato. This brief description will give some idea of the general character of the scoring; but it would be impossible without copious quotations to do justice to the many charming and quite novel effects in which the song abounds.

In "Joshua" (1747) there is but little to mention. In the solo and chorus "Almighty Ruler of the skies," Handel exceptionally uses his horns, trumpets, and drums in D for a chorus in B minor. The close of the chorus "Behold the listening sun" furnishes an almost solitary instance in Handel's works of the pianissimo of trumpets and drums. It may be noted here that throughout this oratorio the trumpets and horns play in octaves—as in "Deborah" and "Athalia" just mentioned—excepting in a few solo passages. As an instance of the composer's judicious choice of colouring for dramatic purposes may be noted the use of the flutes, instead of the usual oboes, in the chorus "How soon our towering hopes are crossed."

"Solomon" (1748) is one of the most richly orchestrated of Handel's oratorios. In nearly all the choruses, and even in some of the songs, we find parts for two violas. At the commencement of the chorus "Your harps and cymbals sound" the following obscure indication is given—"Viola II. per violoncelli duoi ripieni." Dr. Chrysander gives no explanation of this in his preface; the only suggestion that occurs to me is that possibly the part may have been intended to be played by two ripieni violoncelli, in case there were not sufficient violas in the orchestra to divide them. If so, this may also explain the fact of the second viola part being written in the tenor instead of the alto clef. I mentioned in my last article that "Solomon" was one of the scores in which "con ripieni" and "senza ripieni" were indicated in the string parts throughout. In two choruses of this work we find separate parts for the ripieno strings. In "From the east," besides the principal first and second violins, which are mostly in unison, and the principal first and second violas, there are staves in the score for "Violino 1mo, ripieno," "Violino 2do, ripieno," "Viola 1mo, ripieno," "Viola 2do, ripieno," and "Basso ripieno." Consequently we find in some passages of this chorus—e.g., on p. 177 of the score—four distinct viola parts, and mostly three violin parts. This subdivision of the strings is a curious foreshadowing, at the distance of a century, of some of the effects of Berlioz and Wagner. In "Draw the tear" the ripieni are also distinct from the principal strings; but in this case the manner of their employment is somewhat different. The sustained harmonies for strings in five parts with which the chorus commences are marked "senza ripieni"; and at the tenth bar Handel writes "Qui entrano li Ripieni colle parte chi cantano"—i.e., Here the Ripieni enter with the voice parts; so that from this point to the end there are nine string parts in this chorus. Many of the numbers of "Solomon" contain important parts for the bassoons; and in some cases ripieni oboes are indicated. The opening symphony of "From the censer," for oboes and bassoons alone, is expressly marked on the oboe part "senza ripieni"; and in the long symphony which opens the third part we see, on p. 210, above the oboes "Qui entrano li Ripieni colle oboe"—Here the Ripieni enter with the oboes. In most of the choruses in which the full orchestra is employed the horns and trumpets have separate parts, four-part harmony for the brass being frequently met with, as in "From the censer" and "Praise the Lord." The beautiful song "Will the sun forget to streak" furnishes an example of the manner in which Handel's works were mutilated in the earlier editions. In Arnold's edition the upper line of the score is marked "Traverso"; in the German Handel Society's copy we find "Oboe solo, Traversieri tutti"—that is, the part was played by all the flutes and one oboe in unison. This combination of tone had been already met with in "La Resurrezione," with the difference that in the earlier work the oboe was marked "sordo"—some kind of mute being used to muffle the tone.

"Susanna" (1748) is, as regards its orchestration, one of Handel's least interesting works, which is the more curious as it followed so closely on an oratorio in which the composer had shown so much power and variety in the instrumentation. There is only one song, and that the shortest in the work, "Raise your voice to sounds of joy," which contains any wind parts at all, and these are of no great importance. The choruses also have little variety in their scoring. Trumpets are only used in two numbers, and drums nowhere in the oratorio.

In "Theodora" (1749) will be found much more colouring; but most of the effects have been already met with in earlier works. I need therefore now only mention the dramatic employment of the notes of the flutes in unison in the short symphony (p. 108) introducing the dungeon scene; and the beautiful effect of the obbligato bassoons in the duet "To thee, thou glorious son of worth" (p. 144).

Probably not one in a hundred of my readers has ever seen a note of the "Choice of Hercules" (1750), one of the most entirely forgotten of Handel's works. Yet this short score, of only ninety pages, contains some of its composer's finest songs, and in the instrumentation at least two new effects are to be found. In the air "There the brisk sparkling nectar drain" Handel employs the horns, not, according to his almost invariable custom, in melodic passages in their upper register, but with long sustained notes, pianissimo, in the middle of the harmony, in just the same manner in which they have been used by all modern composers from Haydn downwards. Handel was sixty-five years of age when he wrote this work; but he continued his efforts to enlarge the resources of his art down to the very close of his career. The other point I have noted in the "Choice of Hercules" is in the chorus "Arise, arise!" Here the composer uses four-part chords for two oboes and two trumpets antiphonally with the voices against a florid accompaniment for strings. The disposition of the chords for the wind is curious, the trumpets being sometimes above, sometimes below, and sometimes between the oboes. In estimating the effect, it must not be forgotten that the oboe parts were doubled, and that therefore the notes of the chord, however different in quality, were of approximately equal strength.

"Jephtha" (1751) I must leave unnoticed for the same reason as the "Occasional Oratorio"—that it is not yet published in the new edition—and come to Handel's last work, "The Triumph of Time and Truth" (1757). To a very large extent this is a compilation from earlier works—"Il Trionfo del Tempo," "Parnasso in Festa," "Athalia," "Susanna," Anthems, Operas—all furnish material for this oratorio. Its chief interest in relation to my subject arises from the fact that it contains a larger proportion of richly scored numbers than any other of Handel's works. Out of twenty-seven airs there are nine which have important parts for the wind; and the choruses are in a large number of cases also more fully instrumented than in the earlier works. Most of the effects, however, have been already spoken of; I need now only point to the accompaniment of the song "Guardian angels" as containing probably the most beautiful oboe obbligato to be found in Handel's works. The song is borrowed from the Italian "Trionfo del Tempo," but is retouched and much improved. In its original form the obbligato was for the violin instead of the oboe.

It remains to say a few words about Handel's instrumental works, though these will not require much notice. The "Twelve Grand Concertos," being for strings only, of course afford little opportunity for contrasts of colour; but in the collection of concertos published as Part 21 of the German Handel Society's edition, which include, among others, the six known as the "Oboe Concertos," some points of interest will be found. The second movement of the first concerto (p. 8) is scored for two flutes, one oboe, two bassoons in unison, strings and cembalo, and abounds in contrasts of colour. It commences with three-part harmony for the two flutes and bassoons, to which at the ninth bar the oboe is added, giving four-part chords for the wind, responded to by three-part harmony for the strings. Further on in the movement we have a duet for solo violin and oboe, accompanied by the first violoncello, first bassoon, and harpsichord; then again a passage for oboe and bassoon solo, contrasted with full harmony for two violins and two violas, the violins being doubled by the flutes in the octave above. The whole number is a study of orchestral colour, very remarkable for the time at which it was written.

It should be mentioned here that the "Oboe Concertos" are not concertos in the modern sense of the term at all; that is, they are not solos for the oboe with orchestral accompaniment. The word "Concerto" in Handel's time generally meant simply a piece for several instruments; and the oboe concertos were so called from their having prominent oboe parts, to distinguish them from the "Grand Concertos," which were for strings only. The volume now under notice does also contain a few concertos in the modern use of the word; there are two for oboe, one for violin, and a curious short movement (p. 98) which is like a double concerto for two horns. The only point requiring notice in these pieces is the fact that in several places the harmonies are marked to be filled up on the harpsichord, which, as we have frequently seen in the course of these articles, played a very important part in the orchestra of Handel's time.

The organ concertos, as a general rule, present few features beyond the alternation of the organ with the strings; but there are one or two exceptions. The sixth concerto of the first set is accompanied by first and second violins, con sordini, doubled by two flutes in unison, while violoncellos and double-basses, doubled in the upper octave by the violas, are fizzicati throughout the movement. The solo part of this concerto is for "Harpa o Organo." The indication "con sordini" is not contradicted in the second movement; but it is probable that this was considered superfluous. To judge from the music, it appears hardly likely that Handel intended the mutes to be employed throughout the whole concerto.

The opening adagio of the fourth concerto in the second set is interesting from the treatment of the strings in two masses. The movement begins with a long passage scored for two violoncellos, reinforced by bassoons, the "Contrabasso e Ripieno" with the organ tasto solo supplying the bass of the harmony. The "e ripieno" here shows doubtless that only the principal violoncellos played the upper parts. Later in the movement we see the two violins and violas answering the two violoncellos and double-basses; and five bars from the end the first and second violoncellos and bassoons double the first and second violins in the octave below. In contrast to the first movement, the remainder of this concerto is very thinly scored.

I have now arrived at the end of a very inadequately completed task. I use the epithet advisedly; for I have by no means exhausted my materials. I am not referring now to the fact that I have left several works altogether unnoticed, because of their not being yet issued in the new edition; but, as a matter of fact, I have passed over a great many points that I had noted, because I feared lest I should weary even my most patient readers. But for this, I could have easily extended these articles to nearly double their actual length, without any recourse to "padding." I trust, however, that I have amply established the propositions I laid down in commencing—that Handel's scores are by no means wanting in variety of colour, and that in them we find a foreshadowing of nearly all modern effects. Of course, nobody will maintain that a work of Handel's stands on the same level, as regards instrumentation, with one of Mozart or Beethoven; because instrumentation, as we understand it now, is a modern branch of the art; but it has been shown that Handel had what may be called a prophetic insight into the future possibilities of the orchestra; and in his scores he has more than once indicated, even if dimly, the direction of subsequent developments. I believe I have also proved, to absolute demonstration, the impossibility of reproducing Handel's works exactly as he gave them; and if once the necessity for some modification be admitted, the whole question of additional accompaniments resolves itself into one of not "Whether" but "How." Into this I do not propose to enter at present; on some future occasion, possibly, I may attempt an analysis of the chief scores of Handel which have been published with additional accompaniments—viz., the four by Mozart, and those more recently issued by Robert Franz, all of which suggest important questions of art, which would be well worthy of discussion. In concluding the present series of papers, I will only add that if the reading them prove half as interesting to musicians as the writing them has been to myself I shall be amply rewarded for the labour spent in their preparation.

THE GREAT COMPOSERS.

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

No. XIV.—MEYERBEER (concluded from page 253).

ACCORDING to the evidence of M. Blaze de Bury, there was undoubtedly an intention on the part of Meyerbeer to produce his "Jeunesse de Goethe" at the Odéon, but, unfortunately, the time which suited the composer did not fit in with the manager's arrangements. The matter is referred to at some length in a letter written by Meyerbeer to his literary colleague on January 28, 1861:—

"You tell me that as regards the month of April, when it would be convenient to me to give my work, M. de la Rounat has an engagement with Madame Ristori, and that, consequently, he proposes to bring out the piece in the Spring of 1862. At that time I shall certainly be free, musically speaking, and I see no difficulty so far; nevertheless, my dear friend, to take a definite engagement for a time so distant, and that will not be reached for fourteen months, is what, in my position, I cannot see my way to do. A head of a family, living out of France, and under the circumstances of these times—who knows, as regards a future so distant, what may happen to keep me at home? If we wait till October I next to sign an engagement for April, 1862, the date which M. de la Rounat proposes, he will be sure to have the work seven months in advance, while, on our side, the future will not be hampered to such a length of time. Now, let us talk a little about our piece. The scene for which I had most fear (that of the cathedral in 'Faust') is that which comes out best of all, and I hope you will not be dissatisfied with it. As regards the rest, I shall not ask you to make any further change. Musically speaking, only one number disquiets me, and about it I hesitate, and scarcely know what to do, I mean the 'Erl-King.' Schubert's music to that ballad has become so popular throughout the entire world that it seems to me impossible to make the public accept any other to the same words, while, for myself, I am so much under its influence that I do not see my way to compose anything which would give me satisfaction. I have an idea, therefore, to preserve Schubert's melodies, putting them underneath the choruses for the 'Erl-King's daughters,' and at the same time, as I need not say, scoring for orchestra what Schubert has written for the pianoforte only. However, there are two courses before me. One is to make the father and son speak in mélodrame, accompanied by Schubert's melodies in the orchestra, and allow only the Erl-King and his daughters to sing. The other is to make the parts of father and son singing parts. Be good enough to let me know which of these two plans you prefer. From a purely musical point of view it is advisable that all three should sing; but I will act according to your decision. Send me also, and at once, the 'Chorus of Students,' for I should better like to write it just now, when the impression of the rest of the music is warm in my imagination, than later, when other work has driven the matter from my mind."

Unhappily, "La Jeunesse de Goethe" was never produced, and M. Blaze de Bury tells us why. He says:—

"Kept at Berlin, as much by his court duties as by the state of his health, Meyerbeer seemed to the public as though he had forgotten the road to Paris. Nevertheless, the desire to possess the masterpiece increased in proportion to the obstacles. . . . Each year a place was kept for it—the best that could be secured in the arrangements of the repertory. At length, in the autumn of 1863, Meyerbeer arrived in Paris, settled down there, and deliberations were immediately resumed. This time the affair was complicated by the question of the 'Africaine,' which, just then on the cards, had possession of the public mind. Hence the production of the work 'La Jeunesse de Goethe' that winter could not be thought of, and another year's delay took place. . . . Meyerbeer's score exists complete, finished, authentic, and others beside myself have had it in their hands."

A natural question is: What has become of "La Jeunesse de Goethe"? We can find no trace of it in musical record since the composer's death, and are bound to infer that it still remains in manuscript, kept thus from a world which would be very glad to receive it.

During his stay in Paris Meyerbeer was constantly engaged, above all, with the "Africaine," which he had at last firmly resolved to bring out. He showed his usual excessive care for details in making the preparations, but these by no means monopolised his thoughts. He had time to spare for "La Jeunesse de Goethe," with the mise-en-scène of which he concerned himself greatly, while his mind ran much upon the composition of another opéra comique, and to this end he looked through scores of romances, hoping for a suitable story. M. Blaze de Bury tells us that at this period he was composing everywhere—in the streets, when driving, and when taking a walk outside the walls. Often he would stop, take out his pocket-book, and fix an idea that had occurred to his brooding mind. On such occasions thoughtless acquaintances would sometimes intrude their conversation upon him, to his great discomfiture and annoyance. "Is that you, dear master? How glad I am to see you. What about the 'Africaine'? What are you doing at this moment?" So pestered, the poor man often forgot his usual courtesy, and would sharply answer: "What am I doing at this moment! Can't you see? I am walking down the Champs Elysées." The same authority sketches for us the routine of Meyerbeer's daily life. "Like Lamartine, he began work every day at six o'clock, towards noon, after breakfast, he dressed, received or paid visits, always according to his programme of the week, for, in that regularly laborious existence, nothing was left to chance. About two o'clock he took a walk, returned at three, and resumed his work, continuing at it till nearly midnight, scarcely giving himself the time necessary for dinner." Meyerbeer continued this life of hard work to the end, for even till within a few weeks of his death his mind plunged into the future, big with projects of further achievement and more glory. He often talked of the great masters with half-sad reflections upon his own shortcomings. Mozart appears to have been his idol, and Blaze de Bury tells à propos a characteristic anecdote. Coming away from the Italians after a performance of "Don Giovanni," which the public had coldly received, de Bury asked Meyerbeer whether, in his opinion, the execution of the work was the cause of its non-success, adding that, for himself, he thought the chef d'œuvre did not satisfy the wants of the time. "Ah!" exclaimed the master, "and why does 'Don Giovanni' no longer satisfy?" "I don't know," replied his friend; "perhaps because I heard yesterday the fourth act of the 'Huguenots.'" "In that case," observed Meyerbeer, "allow me to say: So much the worse for the fourth act of the 'Huguenots.'" This story, as it seems to us, is capable of very wide application at the time now present.

Dreams of future achievement by a man seventy-two years old are of doubtful realisation, and Meyerbeer's visions were soon ended by death. All through the Winter of 1863-4 he busied himself with preparing the "Africaine" for a performance he was never to see. In October, 1863, that opera was supposed to be finished, but the exacting, never satisfied composer went on cutting and polishing, taking out a bit here, putting in a bit there, altering this page, rewriting that, and so on. Indeed, so much matter was finally rejected that it fills a volume containing twenty-two complete numbers, or fragments of numbers. Doubtless the anxiety and worry connected with the "Africaine" broke down the composer's always feeble health. The end came almost suddenly. Seized with mortal illness on April 23, 1864, Meyerbeer passed, on May 22, from the scene of his busy labours and great success. A year later (April 28, 1865) his cherished opera, which lay on his heart in the very article of death, had a triumphant reception on the illustrious stage to which he contributed his finest works. The coffin of the master was laden with tokens of honour. He was a Member of the Institute of France, of the Royal Academy of Belgium, of the Prussian Academy of Fine Arts, and of several other kindred institutions. Among his decorations were the Prussian Order of Merit, the Legion of Honour, the Leopold Order of Belgium, the Crown of Oak of Holland, the Sun of Brazil, and the Polar Star of Sweden. But better than all these was the universal sorrow that paid a noble tribute to departed genius.

THE BENEDICT TESTIMONIAL.

WHEN it first became known that the fiftieth anniversary of Sir Julius Benedict's Concerts would take place during the present year, it was natural that much interest would be excited, and that offers of assistance on all sides would be forthcoming. Considering Sir Julius's eminence as a composer, it might also be expected that his representative sacred work, the Oratorio "St. Peter," should be heard on the occasion; and as this could not be performed on the same morning as that of the miscellaneous Concert, it was decided that it should be given on the previous evening, with the assistance of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society, which, under the direction of Mr. Barnby, has now attained such efficiency as to make its co-operation in this cause a special attraction. In addition, however, to all these spontaneous offers of aid from his brothers and sisters in the profession which he has done so much to ennoble, it was also felt that some substantial testimonial should be offered to Sir Julius Benedict in consideration of his long services to art in this country, the only difficulty being as to the form such presentation should take so as to be most acceptable to the recipient. At the preliminary meeting of the Committee, held in the saloon of Her Majesty's Theatre, in February last, it was resolved that a sum of money should be raised by subscription, to be presented to Sir Julius, and this decision, once made publicly known, was, as might be expected, liberally responded to; but as there were lingering doubts in the minds of many as to whether this was the most graceful offering that could be devised, we are glad to be able to set this question at rest by reference to the proceedings at a meeting at the Mansion House, on the 26th ult. On this occasion Mr. Alderman de Keyser, who was in the chair, said it was unfortunately necessary for him to state that the testimonial should be a substantial one. "The money was wanted to make good losses which were not in any way attributable to extravagance, to thriftlessness, to neglect of prudential duties and obligations. It might be that Sir Julius Benedict, an artist, heart and soul, was like other artists in not being a very good man of business; but he had been no squanderer of his hard earnings. He had suffered reverses which no recklessness of expenditure had brought upon himself. He had been induced, no doubt by well-meaning friends, to invest his money, saved from the fruit of a life's toil, in undertakings which had failed. Hence it was that this testimonial differed totally in character from most other testimonials." Let it now therefore go forth to the public that, to provide for Sir Julius Benedict in the declining years of his active life, a solid and substantial sum must be raised, and we can scarcely doubt the result. The Committee announces that the subscription list will close on the 14th inst., so that no time should be lost in sending contributions either to Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co., 1, Berners Street, or to the office, 125, Strand. As an earnest of the kind feeling of the most eminent members of the profession, we may mention that at the performance of "St. Peter," at the Royal Albert Hall, on the evening of the 6th inst., Madame Albani, Madame Patey, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. William J. Winch, and Mr. Santley will be the solo vocalists, and Dr. Stainer will be at the organ; and at the fiftieth annual Concert, on the following afternoon, Madame Pauline Lucca, Madame Sembrich, Miss Gertrude Griswold, Madame Marie Roze, Madame Roche Hersee, Miss Beata Francis, Madame Scalchi, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Miss Henrietta Polak, Messrs. E. Lloyd, Barton McGuckin, and William J. Winch, Signor de Reszke, Signor Foli, Mr. Santley, Mr. F. King, Herr Franz Pischek, Messrs. Traherne and Cecil will appear; Mr. Wilson Barrett will give a dramatic Recital, Madame Arabella Goddard, Miss Agnes Zimmermann, Mrs. Baskcombe, Mrs. Chippingdale, Messrs. Li Calsi, Tito Mattei, Kuhe and Lindsay Sloper (pianoforte), Messrs. John Thomas, T. Wright, &c. (harp), will perform a piece arranged for eight players on four pianofortes and four harps; Madame Sembrich has consented, only for this occasion, to perform on the violin the Adagio and Rondo from De Beriot's Concerto in D; M. Hollman will contribute a violoncello solo; the band of the 2nd Life Guards will appear, and the Conductors will be—besides Sir Julius Benedict—Messrs. Bevigiani, A. Visetti, Bisaccia, Romili, Kuhe, and Ganz. Apart, then, from the strong public sympathy with the bénéficiaire, there can be little doubt that such a powerful musical attraction will fill the Royal Albert Hall to an overflow, and we counsel all who desire to be present to make an early application for seats.

A CORRESPONDENT has drawn our attention to an advertisement for a Music Master at a College (resident in Term) which we venture to say, considering the heaviness of the duties and the lightness of the salary, is unique. He must be a man of influence, communicant, and proved disciplinarian. In school-time he is to give special boys two lessons a week each on piano or violin; to train all the boys in Class-singing as required; to prepare capable boys for Local Musical Examinations, and to fill up time (if any) with Elementary non-musical work. Out of school time he will be required to train Chapel Choir twice a week; to play in Chapel on Sunday; to get up a School Concert each term; to take dancing practice one hour a week; to take house duty at the rate of not more (probably less) than two days a week; generally to help Head Master or school in musical matters as desired, and to regulate choice of acquaintance as Head Master may wish. He may be dismissed by the Head Master at any time without giving reason or notice; if with notice, such notice to be six weeks, if without notice, three weeks' stipend will be given as solatium. Candidates are to enclose photograph, stating age, height, details of experience, and what is their knowledge of, and interest in, school games. The payment for this work is £10 a Term, with 15s. for each pupil above twenty. As there are now twenty-nine pupils in the College, the whole details of this magnificent offer are before our musical readers; but we must add that (of course, during his leisure time) the Music Master will be permitted to take pupils in the College from outside, with a fee of £2, or more, less 10s. for hire of instruments. Applicants are particularly requested to say "what line of life they intend eventually to follow." Were we to put this question to one who has fulfilled the duties at this College for one Term, we feel confident that he would at once tell us what line of life he did not intend eventually to follow.

THE story which reached us from Germany a few years ago that some manuscript compositions of Sebastian Bach had been discovered by Robert Franz wrapped around some young trees in the garden of a mansion he was visiting, and which turned out to be a pure fabrication, makes us cautious in receiving as truth a recent statement that amongst the treasures of a Leipzig antiquarian two Cantatas of Beethoven have been found, written, it is presumed, when the composer was in his twentieth or twenty-first year. The person who lighted upon these valuable manuscripts is, we are told, Herr Armen Friedmann, a citizen of Vienna, and, in evidence of their genuineness, it is asserted that Dr. Eduard Hanslick, the well-known critic, has seen the Cantatas and pronounced them authentic, and that Herr Brahms has played them over, and said that, even if Beethoven's name had not been on the score, there would not have been the slightest doubt of their authorship. Now, with all deference for the opinion of both these judges, we can scarcely believe that so important a question as this can be decided off-hand even by the ablest artists. We are informed that one of the Cantatas was written on the occasion of the death of the German Emperor Joseph II., who died in 1790, and the other on the accession to the throne of his successor Leopold II., who reigned from 1790 to 1792. This we believe to be pure conjecture, as even Mr. Thayer, the great authority upon the events of Beethoven's life, who mentions the existence of one Cantata composed by Beethoven about this time, merely hazards a guess that its theme was the death of the German Emperor, and Dr. Wegeler, who also alludes to a Cantata by the young composer, does not mention the subject of it. As Brahms, however, has asserted that these compositions from their intrinsic worth would have been stamped in his mind as the work of Beethoven even had his name not appeared on the title-pages, they must be remarkable enough to make their way on their own merits; and should they at any future time be pronounced forgeries, it ought in no respect to affect our enjoyment of them, although it might depreciate their commercial value.

WE recollect once hearing of a man who doubly enjoyed the latter days of his existence in consequence of the certain knowledge of the quarrels which would be caused amongst those who called themselves his dearest friends by the unexpected manner in which he had left, by his will, the bulk of his fortune. Some such grim joke, we fancy, must lie at the root of all the eccentric directions respecting the management of funeral ceremonies, of which we so constantly read. A case of this kind, in which music plays a prominent part, took place some few months ago in Paris; and, strangely enough, at the funeral of one who does not appear to have shown either a fondness for, or an aversion to, the art during his lifetime. The deceased, M. Penguilly, a speculator, who held shares in most of the successful Paris papers, left strict injunctions that his remains should be borne to the grave preceded by an Italian playing, or rather "grinding," on his organ some of the most popular café concert airs; and also set aside £400 for a banquet to sixty well-known writers at the Hôtel Continental on the day of the funeral, expressing a hope that they would be as merry as they possibly could. All these desires were strictly carried out. The organ-player, however, was not allowed to perform while the funeral procession was inside the fortifications, but as soon as it entered the suburbs the music began, the women, children, and gamins forming a dancing escort. Now it may be said that M. Penguilly's only wish in issuing these extraordinary orders was that cheerful, rather than mournful, ideas should be called up on this occasion, but the fact of employing an organ-grinder to supply the music seems to show that something more was intended. May it not have been that he had suffered so much during his life from these privileged disturbers of the public peace that he was resolved to endeavour to abate the evil by exhibiting one of his persecutors, in all his savage fury, when he knew that he could no longer inflict annoyance upon himself?

APART from the letter from a correspondent on the subject of analytical programmes, which appeared in our April number, we are so constantly receiving complaints, not only of the price at which they are sold, but of the matter which they contain, that we cannot but believe there is a growing desire to dispense with them altogether, and to return to the simple programme of former times, which merely announced the names of the pieces to be performed. This we think a mistake, and should be glad therefore if some compromise could be effected, so that an annotated list of works selected for the Concert should be sold at so low a price as to ensure their being purchased by almost every one of the audience. We have often observed that the majority of those who possess themselves of one of these little essays almost invariably do one of two things: either they read straight through the music, listening only by fits and starts to what is going on in the orchestra, or despairingly fold up the programme and resolve to peruse it at their leisure at home. Now it appears to us that as the contents of these undoubtedly useful concert-guides should be explanatory rather than critical, they might with advantage be reduced to about one-half their usual size, which would at once admit of their being sold at a very much lower price. The fact is that, as a rule, those who go to listen to the music do not desire to read more than a description of what they are going to hear; and this need occupy but a very small space if written by an intelligent artist accustomed to condense his thoughts. Not a word can be said against the analytical programmes we are accustomed to at first-class Concerts. They contain the mature thoughts of mature musicians, and are in the highest degree interesting; but the question is whether, by limiting these remarks to the essential points, the programmes cannot be sold at a price which—as our correspondent says in the letter alluded to—"would not merely enable, but induce, each member of the audience to purchase one."

THAT the customs so long surrounding the presentation of Italian Opera before a fashionable audience should gradually fade away with the decadence of Italian Opera itself can scarcely be a matter of surprise; nor can we wonder that those who desire to uphold these customs should endeavour to exhibit them with some new and strikingly attractive features, which they imagine will thoroughly enlist the sympathies of the spectators. At the début of Mlle. Emma Nevada, as Lucia, at the Italiens, in Paris, a notable example of this occurred, the event being thus recorded at the time by the correspondent of the Daily News: "When she came on the stage a powdered footman advanced to present to her a magnificent gilded basket of flowers, which Miss Mackay had sent for the occasion from Rome. At the end of the mad scene two other valets in livery bore from the wings an immense floral trophy which had arrived from Cannes. The donor was Madame Mackay, who is staying there. Mlle. Nevada, when the flowers were set down before her, chose the finest of the roses, and, advancing to the orchestra, handed it to the flautist, whose skill in accompanying her had been invaluable. The graciousness and spontaneity of her manner brought down the whole house." Now the idea of a powdered footman presenting a basket of flowers on the stage to the prima donna on her entrance is certainly a novel one, because these tangible demonstrations of delight are usually reserved until the conclusion of some remarkable specimen of brilliant vocalisation; but this innovation upon established precedent is a trifle compared with the entrance of the "valets in livery," with a floral trophy at the end of the mad scene. It is true that the gift of the rose to the flautist might have interfered slightly with the continuous interest of the story; but this is nothing in Italian Opera; and if this incident "brought down the whole house," it is evident that the artistic taste of the audience had been accurately measured.

CHINESE music is doubtless especially intended for Chinese ears, and to fully appreciate its merits we may presume that it is necessary for those who listen to it either to have been born in the country, or trained in early life to the peculiar style characteristic of the native composers. China, however, has no mean opinion of the merit of those who represent the genius of the "Celestial Empire"; and we can imagine, therefore, that the following notice of a performance at a Chinese School of Music, written by the critic of the New York Herald, would be read with feelings more of pity than of anger, both by the artists and audience who assisted at the Concert. "The feature of the occasion," we are told, "was the Chinese band. The first piece was a war song. It began like a series of dynamite explosions, the detonations and shrieks of the wounded being vividly rendered by enormous cymbals and a shrill fife. The finale was like a boiler factory. The Chinese enjoyed the music greatly, the Christians got as far away from the cymbals as they could." Now, fully admitting that the "greatest happiness of the greatest number" should be consulted, and with all due deference for the taste of those who could admire this music, the Christians can scarcely be blamed for removing themselves as far as possible from the band; for it must be remembered that, although some novel instruments for the production of certain realistic effects have recently been heard in our concert rooms, "programme music," even of the most pronounced kind, outside China has not yet so closely resembled the noise of a "boiler factory" as to thoroughly prepare us for a Chinese Concert. What may be in store for us in the future we cannot, of course, say; but it is a satisfaction to think that, notwithstanding the varied styles of music now adopted, no composer has yet come forward as an avowed disciple of the "Chinese School."

It is always a pleasure to record the successes of our countrymen and countrywomen in foreign parts, and when under thoroughly impartial criticism. We are glad, therefore, to note that at a fully attended Students' Concert, given at the Gewandhaus, Leipzig, on the 1st ult., Miss Alice Menzies, of the Conservatoire (formerly a scholar of the National School of Music), gave such an excellent rendering of Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in C minor as to win for herself the compliment of being three times recalled to the platform. The personal congratulations of her teachers, Professors Reinecke and Zwintscher, and the press notices, were equally gratifying. At the National School of Music Miss Alice Menzies studied the pianoforte under Mr. J. F. Barnett, and harmony and counterpoint under Dr. Stainer and Dr. Bridge.

DRURY LANE THEATRE.

MR. VILLIERS STANFORD'S Opera "The Canterbury Pilgrims"—the one novelty of Mr. Carl Rosa's brief opera season—was produced on April 28, and with a success which adds one more to the many recent proofs of the talent existing amongst our native artists, and the readiness of English audiences to acknowledge it. Mr. Gilbert à Beckett, who is responsible for the libretto, has, by the title he has selected, at once directed our thoughts to the well-known tales of Chaucer; but, seeing that beyond this title and the fact of the first scene taking place before the Tabard Inn, there is nothing whatever to connect "The Canterbury Pilgrims" with either the characters or the incidents called up by our old English poet; we cannot but think that it would have been better if the author had allowed his agreeable and well constructed little story to stand entirely on its own merits, more especially as the pious feeling of those who really journey to the shrine seems but little regarded amidst the scenes enacted by the disguised apprentices, who join them for another object, the dialogue and music of which, indeed, are often more appropriate to opéra-bouffe than to what Mr. à Beckett tells us that he at first desired to call his work—a "Comedy-Opera." As we have said, the curtain rises upon the old Tabard Inn, Southwark, in front of which Hubert Lovel, a London apprentice, who is in love with Cicely, the host's daughter, arrives with a number of his companions, to serenade her on her birthday. Geoffrey, her father, however, who opposes Hubert's suit, determines to send her to a maiden aunt in Kent, with a band of pilgrims starting for Canterbury. Sir Christopher Syngé, a foolish old knight, being enamoured of Cicely, resolves to join the pilgrims, and, by the aid of Hal o' the Chepe, to carry off the girl from Sidenbourne, where the pilgrims rest for the night. Hubert overhears the plot, and enters into the scheme with Hal, secretly resolving to protect Cicely, with the help of his fellow-prentices. Dame Margery, Sir Christopher's wife, suspecting the sudden piety of her husband, and hearing that the pretty daughter of the host is to join the pilgrimage, disguises herself as a burgher matron, and offers to act as guardian to the girl. Her offer is accepted; but Geoffrey, suspecting mischief, determines at the last moment to follow his daughter and watch over her safety himself. The second Act takes place in Sidenbourne, where the pilgrims arrive after the toil of the day. Dame Margery and Cicely retire to their lodging, watched by Hubert, disguised as a monk. Geoffrey comes in, footsore and weary, and questions the monk as to where Cicely is, Hubert directing him to the other end of the town. When he has gone Cicely joins her lover, but Dame Margery interrupts the meeting, thinking to discover, in the disguised monk, her husband. She is, however, undeceived, and the true state of the case confided to her, when she at once promises to aid the young people in their flight. To teach Sir Christopher a lesson, he is brought blindfolded to his own wife, whom he supposes to be Cicely, and makes love to her, presenting her with a ring and a poem composed in honour of Cicely. At day-break the lovers take flight; but the town is aroused, a crowd of villagers rush in, and Geoffrey, infuriated at the loss of his daughter, calls forth vengeance on the person who has carried her off. The villagers, not clearly understanding Geoffrey's disjointed tale, seize upon Sir Christopher, but he assures them that the girl is safe in the adjoining house, and challenges them to bring her forth. Hal throws open the door, a lady comes forward, and flinging off her hood, reveals to the unhappy knight the face of his wife. In the last Act, two days are supposed to have elapsed, and the scene is changed to the Justice Hall in Sir Christopher's mansion, where Hubert is to be tried for running away with Cicely. Dame Margery, who has been informed of what has happened by Cicely, promises to befriend him. Hubert is brought in guarded, the trial begins, and Sir Christopher pronounces a heavy sentence, which is about to be carried into effect when Dame Margery appears leading in Cicely. The production of the poem and ring, and the stern command of his wife, forces Sir Christopher to reverse his judgment and release the prisoner. At the intercession of Dame Margery, Geoffrey consents to the betrothal of his daughter to Hubert, and the Opera concludes with the singing of the birthday madrigal. Mr. Villiers Stanford has already proclaimed himself a disciple of the "advanced school"—which we may presume to mean the school theoretically advocated and practically illustrated by Wagner—and the audience, on the first night of his Opera, evidently came prepared to prove that a work framed upon this model could be as successfully written by an Englishman as a German. Much as we may desire that our native composers should throw aside these set patterns, and write from themselves, we cannot deny that "The Canterbury Pilgrims" is as good a specimen of a Wagner Opera in the English language as could be anticipated from the most zealous advocate of the theories of the great reformer. Die Meistersinger has evidently been before Mr. Stanford throughout his task; but he has written music which, in many places, evidences his thorough independence of modern precedent, and reflects honour both upon himself and the country of his birth. An English school of operatic music is a matter of growth; and now that all our native artists who can gain a hearing are earnestly helping forward the cause, let us hope that their operas may be judged, not by their temporary success, but by their worth as contributions to the art-work of the future. We are glad to find that Mr. Stanford so far disregards the custom of the day as to preface his Opera with a fully developed and well written Overture, in which some of the principal themes of the work are introduced. In the opening Serenade good use is made of the old English melody "Summer is icumen in," which indeed runs as a Leitmotiv throughout the Opera. The Chant of the Pilgrims on their entrance has much character; and there is decided merit in the bustling and animated choral portions of the act—especially those which accompany the tricks of the apprentices; but the music is unequal, and, as we have already said, the comic element in places mars the effect of some really excellent pieces. We must, however, except a charming Sestet, which was warmly recognised as one of the best specimens of writing in this act. What we suspected during the exciting business of the first act is confirmed in Act II.—viz., that Mr. Stanford is more thoroughly at home in the humorous and spirited scenes than in those requiring intense passion and feeling. The varied comic incidents with which Mr. à Beckett has so plentifully supplied the composer are most sympathetically coloured, both by voices and orchestra; but the love-music is cold, and the instrumentation so over-rides the singers as to divide the attention of the listeners. A great effect, however, was gained in the song with which Cicely greets the rising sun, a genuine and spontaneous example of the composer's power which cannot be too much praised. The last Act, although containing some good and appropriately humorous music, is decidedly the weakest of the three. The chorus and dialogue of the trial scene somewhat weary the audience, not only from the want of interest in the proceedings, but because the Opera seems really to have ended with the second Act. Some reminiscences of the themes in the opening, however, are well introduced, and the curtain falls upon an effective tableau. Respecting the performance of the Opera, nothing but the most unqualified praise must be given to all concerned. Miss Clara Perry was an ideal Cicely, giving all the music—especially the fine song already alluded to—with admirable effect, and acting with much vivacity throughout. Dame Margery's music was carefully and artistically rendered by Miss Marian Burton; and Mr. B. Davies, as Hubert Lovel, considerably enhanced his reputation both as a singer and an actor. Mr. Snazelle's Geoffrey and Mr. Ludwig's Sir Christopher were perfect realisations of the conceptions of librettist and composer; and Mr. Barrington Foote bustled through the part of Hal o' the Chefe with much success. The scenery and stage arrangements fully sustained the high character of the establishment; and both orchestra and chorus were thoroughly efficient. Mr. Stanford, who conducted his work, was called on the stage after each act, and received quite an ovation at the final fall of the curtain. A record of the season would be scarcely complete were we not to award the utmost praise to the excellent manner in which Gounod's "Faust" has been placed upon the stage. Rarely, indeed, have we witnessed such perfect scenic effects or such admirable results of careful stage management as were presented throughout this Opera, the return of the victorious troops in the fourth Act indeed presenting as life-like a picture as can be imagined. Verdi's "Trovatore," with Madame Marie Roze and Mr. Maas in the principal parts, concluded the season on the 10th ult., the Opera on this occasion being conducted by Mr. Carl Rosa, who was called upon the stage with Mr. Augustus Harris at the conclusion and overwhelmed with applause by a most enthusiastic audience, Mr. Harris announcing that Mr. Rosa had that day signed an engagement to bring his company to the same establishment next season.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

MR. GYE's operatic season up to the time of our going to press calls for no critical remarks save upon the vocalists, the Operas being merely selected from the well-known répertoire of the establishment, to suit the requirements of the singers as they arrive. On the opening night, April 29, Ponchielli's "La Gioconda" was the work chosen, Madame Durand again appearing as the heroine, and Madame Laterner (a new comer, who, at first too nervous to do herself justice, gradually enlisted the sympathies of her audience) sustaining the part of Laura. "The Huguenots," with Madame Pauline Lucca as Valentina, and Madame Tremelli as Urbano, was most enthusiastically received, both these artists displaying to the utmost advantage their exceptionally fine qualities as singers and actresses. As Margherita di Valois, Mlle. Leria, a débutante, proved the possession of a light and agreeable soprano voice, but with scarcely sufficient power to enable her to take a high position on the operatic stage. The first appearance of Madame Albani in "La Traviata" drew an enormous audience, and her reception was most cordial throughout the evening. Madame Sembrich, although singing finely on the night of her return for the season in "Lucia," has been out of voice through severe cold and hoarseness, almost ever since, although she has done her best, in order to prevent disappointment in the parts for which she was cast. In "L'Etoile du Nord," however, she gave ample evidence of her power to sustain the arduous part of Catarina, in many portions of which she was extremely successful. The revival of Boito's Mefistofele was unfortunately shorn of one of its great attractions by the indisposition of Madame Albani, but her place was most ably supplied by Madame Durand, who, especially in the more impassioned parts of the Opera, was thoroughly successful. On the repetition of the work Madame Albani was enabled to appear, and fully sustained the reputation she has already acquired in this character, the parts of Maria and Pantalis being, as in the former representation of the Opera, excellently sung by Madame Tremelli. An audience filling every part of the theatre assembled on the production of Mozart's "Le Nozze di Figaro," with Madame Albani as the Countess, Madame Pauline Lucca as Cherubino, and Madame Sembrich as Susanna. The last-named lady was, however, still suffering from hoarseness, and a printed apology was circulated in the house on her behalf; but she sang her music throughout the Opera, although obviously at much personal inconvenience, and acted with such vivacity as to make us almost forget her indisposition. It is needless to say that Madame Albani was as perfect as ever in the character with which she has been so long identified; and that Madame Lucca's Cherubino was, both histrionically and vocally, an ideal representation of the part. In the male department of the company the want of a really capable tenor is sadly felt. Signor Marconi has a fine voice, but his style is hard and unsympathetic, and his singing in such parts as Faust, and Edgar, in "Lucia," cannot but recall impressions much to his disadvantage. In declamatory passages, Signor Mierzwinski occasionally produces good effects; but he is not the singer we should desire to hear in association with the excellent prime donne Mr. Gye has secured, and this truth cannot be too earnestly put forth. That excellent artist, Signor Cotogni, has really worked hard since the commencement of the season, and proved indeed a valuable member of the company. Signor De Reszke, too, must not be passed over without a word of warm commendation; and although the choruses have often been somewhat coarsely sung, the Choir has, we think, somewhat improved in accuracy both of time and tune. Signor Bevignani and M. Dupont have divided the duties of Conductor, and generally ensured a good rendering of the works under their direction.

On the 4th inst. the German Opera, under the conductorship of Herr Richter, will commence at this establishment, with Wagner's "Die Meistersinger"; and morning performances of this Opera and "Lohengrin" are already announced.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

THE fifth Concert took place on the 7th ult., commencing with the Dead March in "Saul," which, being played as a tribute to the memory of the late Sir Michael Costa, was received by the audience standing and in silence—a contrast indeed to the inappropriate applause with which Sullivan's "In Memoriam" Overture was greeted at the last Concert, a piece equally expressive of grief for a loss, and that for a member of the Royal family.

for whom nearly all the audience were in mourning. The only novelty in the programme was a "Scène Religieuse," by Mr. Goring Thomas, finely sung by Mr. Santley. The subject, from Racine's "Esther," and translated by Mr. Theo. Marzials, is well suited for musical setting, and Mr. Thomas's sympathetic colouring of the varied feeling of the words produced a marked effect upon the audience. The opening Recitative, the following melodious phrase, and the bright animated movement for the fourth verse, form excellent contrasts, the piece being materially aided by some really clever instrumentation. Raff's Pianoforte Concerto in C minor, played by Dr. Hans von Bülow, to whom it is dedicated, had only previously been heard, many years ago, at a Concert of the Wagner Society, and its reception on the present occasion was almost as much due to its exceptionally artistic performance as to its own intrinsic merits. The slow movement and Finale are unquestionably the best portions of the work, but the Concerto throughout bears the stamp of that individuality characterising all Raff's compositions, even of those remarkable for an over-elaboration and diffuseness which he evidently could not control. Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, the Overtures to "Genoveva" (Schumann) and "Die Meistersinger" (Wagner), and Liszt's "Rhapsodie Hongroise" (No. 1) received an almost perfect rendering under the bâton of Mr. Frederic H. Cowen, who seems destined to take a prominent position as a Conductor.

The sixth and last Concert of a curious but not remarkably profitable season took place on Wednesday last, the 28th ult., and was in one sense the most important of the series, as it brought to light a new Symphony by an English composer, whose reputation is not confined to his native country. Mr. F. H. Cowen's Scandinavian Symphony, first heard on December 18, 1880, has since gone the round of the civilised world, and has everywhere obtained recognition as a work of great beauty and originality. Its successor has, therefore, been awaited with eagerness, but the composer wisely allowed time for his ideas to mature, and the new Symphony in B flat minor cannot, therefore, be regarded as a crude and hastily considered work. The programme annotator, laudably anxious to describe its characteristics in as lucid a manner as possible, suggests that it may be termed the "Cambrian Symphony," though he is careful to add that it has not been so christened by the composer. In its structure Mr. Cowen has again followed orthodox models. The first movement, allegro vivace non troppo, 3-4 time, has its second subject in the relative major and its repeat. The second movement is a symmetrical lento tranquillo in E flat, 2-4 time. This is followed by a Scherzo in G, allegro molto vivace, 3-4 time, with a Trio, molto piu lento. The Finale, in B flat major, allegro con moto, 3-4 time, is in first movement form, including a repeat. So much by way of description. We must now speak of the merits of the work, though our remarks must be brief, and open to modification on a second hearing. As in the Scandinavian Symphony a gentle melancholy characterises the opening subject of the first movement, and the same feeling prevails throughout, though in a less marked degree, as though the composer desired to indicate the softer attributes of Welsh as compared with Norse scenery. We say this on the assumption that the annotator has authority for his suggestion as to the title that should be given to the work. The second theme is peculiarly winning; but it is used somewhat too frequently, the result being that its sweetness begins to cloy before the end of the movement is reached. Mr. Cowen may, without hyperbole, be compared to the father of an attractive child, who, being proud of his offspring, allows it to pursue its own course somewhat too freely. In the slow movement there is more terseness and self-repression. The principal subject, in its "linked sweetness long drawn out," may possibly remind the hearer of Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony, but the resemblance extends no further. It is a reverie-like movement, its placid course being interrupted twice by a passionate episode, which, however, is not extended. The Scherzo proper is a vivacious, bustling movement with which the quieter trio compares effectively. The most remarkable point in this section of the Symphony is the final cadence in which a peculiar use of the chord of the dominant ninth produces a wholly novel effect. The first theme of the finale may be Welsh, but it is strongly suggestive of Scotch music. In this movement there is again too much iteration of the leading phrases which are so clear and formal that they need no repetition to make them intelligible. In saying this we have indicated the only defect in the new Symphony. It is an eminently graceful, refined, and fanciful work, and if not superior to its immediate predecessor, at any rate worthy of having proceeded from the same source. In his use of the orchestra, Mr. Cowen has distinct characteristics—mannerisms, some might term them. The ensembles are somewhat thin, but he writes deliciously for the wood-wind, and it is refreshing to listen to a modern orchestral work in which the players are not kept at high pressure throughout. The frequent marking of the time by a pizzicato note on the lower strings, or a soft tap on the drum, is another feature that cannot escape attention. The work evidently delighted the audience, and the composer was twice recalled to the platform. The rest of the Concert must be dismissed in a few words. Madame Essipoff played Chopin's Concerto in E minor, and Signor Bottesini gave his own Contrabasso Concerto in F sharp minor in a style that proved his supremacy as a virtuoso on his ponderous instrument. The vocalists were Madame Valleria and Mr. Maas.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

THE first annual General Meeting of this Institution was held on Wednesday afternoon, the 28th ult., at the Albert Hall, his Grace the Archbishop of York presiding. The Report of the Council, read by Mr. Charles Morley, hon. Sec., stated that an examination of the scholars and paying students had been held by a Board consisting of Mr. Joseph Barnby, Mr. Manuel Garcia, Mr. Otto Goldschmidt, Herr Joachim, Sir Frederick Ouseley, and Dr. Stainer, and that these examiners spoke very highly of the tuition and the progress of the pupils. The Director's Report, read by Sir George Grove, stated that when the College was opened, on May 7, 1883, there were fifty scholars and forty two paying students, and that the former had been increased to fifty-three and the latter to 100 within the year. According to the financial statement, the total amount received and promised to the present time is upwards of £122,000, of which £100,525 is already invested in various securities. In the course of a long and eloquent speech, the Chairman ridiculed the idea of the Royal College being started in opposition to existing centres of musical education, the field of work of this kind being practically illimitable, the present exuberant prosperity of the Royal Academy and the Guildhall School being cited as evidence of this fact. The meeting was afterwards addressed by the Lord Mayor, Sir Thomas Gladstone, Mr. Samuel Morley, Sir Julius Benedict, and others.

RICHTER CONCERTS.

THOUGH hardly so well attended as usual, these Concerts have not, during the past month, been less successful, artistically, than in previous seasons. Herr Richter sustains his eminence as a Conductor, and the Wagnerian selections, which the patrons of his Concerts most desire, are played so often that it would be strange indeed were they not, in execution, as nearly perfect as possible. By the way, Herr Richter's special audience do not seem to care greatly for the eclectic scheme laid before them in the prospectus. At any rate, the programmes are now drawn from much more limited sources than the public were led to expect.

At the Concert of the 5th ult. only one Wagnerian piece was performed, in order to make room for certain novelties and unfamiliar works, such as Jules de Swert's Concerto for violoncello, and Brahms's "Gesang der Parzen." The solo in the first-named was played by the composer himself, who, while exhibiting the talent of a genuine virtuoso, failed to recommend the single movement dignified by the name of Concerto. M. de Swert can invent a pretty theme, and knows how to produce from the orchestra effects which are fresh as well as beautiful, but these powers do not suffice when the task is a long orchestral movement.

The piece created an unsatisfactory impression because the different parts did not hang well together. Brahms's "Song of the Fates" seems far from likely to become a favourite in this country. The poetical subject is unpleasing, and the music is throughout of a gloomy hue. It presents a study in sombre harmonies, all very clever and effective in their way, but wanting the essential element of charm. The end of art is to gratify the sense and stimulate the imagination to pleasant exercise. In this case, the art of Brahms does neither. It may, however, suit the pessimists, who, apparently, are desirous of turning our enjoyments into suffering. A different impression altogether was made by Mr. Mackenzie's masterly orchestral Ballad "La Belle Dame sans Merci." The composer here has had the good taste and no less good sense to reconcile the claims of musical form with the requirements of his "poetic basis," just as Sterndale Bennett did in his Overture "Paradise and the Peri." The result is that the piece can be heard either as pure or as applied music, according to the listener's inclination, giving in each case absolute pleasure. We know few orchestral movements of modern date more satisfactory than Mr. Mackenzie's Ballad. It grows in interest as it becomes more familiar. Schumann's "Rhenish" Symphony, long since well-known at the Crystal Palace, formed the second part of the Concert, and was ably played.

The programme of the 12th ult. was obviously intended as an appeal to a wide circle of amateurs. It contained a good deal of vocal music, drawn from Handel ("Love in her eyes") on the one hand and Wagner ("Probe-Lieder, &c.") on the other; putting these selections into the safe hands of Mr. Lloyd. It contained also the "Egmont" Overture of Beethoven; the Overture to "Oberon" and Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll"—all of them "taking" things and well known. With these—which need not detain us—was presented, for the first time in England, the new Symphony (No. 3) of Brahms. Here, of course, lay the attraction for connoisseurs, and the élite of musical London took care to be present at so important a première. We cannot undertake an analysis of such a work after one hearing, and with nothing better to guide us than an arrangement for two pianofortes. With the publication of the full score, it will be our duty and pleasure to examine the work at length in the columns devoted to such purposes. For the present we only offer impressions, which fuller knowledge and experience may cause us to modify. As now advised, we place the opening Allegro amongst the best things Brahms has done. The themes, striking in themselves, are happily contrasted, and worked out not only according to art, but in an interesting manner. There is, moreover, an absence of the mere verbiage which so disfigures modern music. The "argument" is concise, and it is complete—two cardinal virtues. As to the style of the movement, the word noble best describes it. Not once does the composer come down from the lofty height proper to a symphonist. The Andante is of less value. Its theme, repeated in the "song form" so often adopted by Haydn, falls on the ear "like a tale that is told," and only the ingenuity of an accomplished orchestral writer sustains the connoisseur's interest. But the public generally will take to this movement, despite a passage which has been greatly praised by amateurs who confound the uncommon with the beautiful. The Scherzo, if so we may call the third movement, will also be popular, thanks to its engaging and easily-appreciated qualities. We cannot but think, however, that both here and in the Andante Brahms gains the public voice at the expense of symphonic character. He affects "prettiness," which is all very well in its place. The Finale balances the opening Allegro, and lifts the work again to the highest level. It is a remarkable movement, very characteristic of the author, and elaborated in a masterly manner. The soft ending has a particularly happy effect. On the whole, the new Symphony deserves to rank with its predecessors, but its exact place, we repeat, must be decided later on. It was most admirably played and loudly applauded, the third movement having to be repeated.

In the programme of the 19th ult. were Beethoven's Seventh Symphony—a favourite "battle-horse" with Herr Richter, and Marschner's Overture to "Hans Heiling," which piece has not inaptly been called "Weber and water."

The rest was Wagner, as we have him in "The Nibelung's Ring," from that gigantic work the following selections being made: Siegfried's "Gang zu Brünnhilde's Fels," "Tagesgrauen," Siegfried's "Rheinfahrt," the "Trauer-Marsch," and "Der Ritt der Walküren." These fragments, though suffering much by separation from the drama, were heard with great interest, much applauded, and one of them—the "Walküren-Ritt"—encored. How they were performed there is no need to tell, seeing who made himself responsible for a good result.

In the programme of Monday last were Weber's Overture "Ruler of the Spirits," Beethoven's Violin Concerto (solo by Herr Heermann), several Wagnerian selections, and Brahms's new Symphony, repeated "by general desire."

THE BACH CHOIR.

THIS Choir brought its season to an end on Wednesday, the 14th ult., when its twenty-first Concert was given at St. James's Hall. The programme was severely and rigidly classical, and attraction for musicians only could be found in such items as selections from Bach's Cantata "A stronghold sure," Mozart's "Requiem," Brahms's "Song of the Fates," and the "Credo" from Cherubini's Solemn Mass in D. Unhappily we are bound to say that the performance was not of so high a character as the works performed, and that, while the quality of the chorus-voices was not above reproach, there was a lack of refinement and delicacy in delivery which might be looked upon as the natural consequence. Neither did Mr. Goldschmidt's reading of some parts of the "Requiem" meet with general approval. Thus the "Recordare" was too slow, and the Benedictus was too fast, albeit the Conductor showed he exercised good judgment in taking the opening and closing fugue less quickly than is the custom. The Choir has yet much to learn and to perfect, and will do well to tend earnestly towards improvement ere the advent of its next season.

HENRY LESLIE'S CHOIR.

THE second Subscription Concert of this Society took place in St. James's Hall, on Saturday afternoon, April 26. We have expressed our opinion that the performances of the Choir should constitute the principal attraction at these Concerts, and in this respect the present programme was satisfactory, though not wholly so, the large number of modern part-songs being only relieved by two simple examples of the madrigalian school—namely, Morley's "My bonny lass," and Festa's "Down in a flowery vale." It should be one of the aims of the Leslie Choir to keep the works of Wilbye, Weelkes, Gibbons, and other composers of the golden epoch of English music constantly before the public. The only novelty at this Concert was a part-song, "Who is Sylvia?" by Dr. Swinnerton Heap, in which Shakespeare's lines have received yet another tasteful and appropriate setting. The necessary element of variety was afforded by the singing of Mrs. Hutchinson and Signor Foli, and the playing of Madame Esaiopff. The pianist gave a rather free rendering of Beethoven's Sonata Pathétique, but was heard to more advantage in some minor items by Mendelssohn, Schubert, Chopin, and other composers. Mrs. Hutchinson's vocal selections deserve commendation and were well rendered. They included Purcell's "Nymphs and Shepherds," and "Sol-veig's Lied," by Grieg. The Choir appeared somewhat lessened in numbers, but most of the music was well rendered under Mr. Randegger's direction.

The next Concert, on Saturday afternoon, the 17th ult., included three items marked "first time." The first in the order of performance was a part-song, "Daybreak," by Mr. A. R. Gaul, in which Longfellow's familiar lines have been afforded very graceful and melodious illustration. The piece may be counted as one of the best we have had from Mr. Gaul's pen, and it should be popular with choral Societies. Of greater length and importance was an anthem, called, for concert purposes, a Motett, by Sir Herbert Oakeley. The composer has selected the first six verses of Isaiah lxxiii., commencing, "Who is this that cometh from Edom?" which have already been frequently utilised by church musicians, and notably by Kent and

Arnold. Sir Herbert Oakeley's setting is on a larger scale than either of these. It opens with a vigorous and solidly written five-part chorus in C minor, a fine and almost dramatic effect being produced at the close when the answering words "I that speak in righteousness" are repeated ff by the chorus in eight-part harmony. This is followed by a choral recitative, leading to a very effective movement for bass solo and chorus, "I have trodden the wine-press alone." It is worked up to a bold and impressive climax, and leads without break into an arrangement of the composer's hymn-tune "Edina" for quartet and chorus, first in A flat, and afterwards in G. The work ends with a very clearly written fugue in C major, not remarkable for elaborate contrapuntal devices, but musicianly and of sufficient length for its purpose. On the whole, Sir Herbert Oakeley's anthem must be pronounced an exceedingly good example of the legitimate English style of church music; and, notwithstanding its very cordial reception—the composer being called for and enthusiastically applauded—it would, we venture to think, be still more impressive if heard in a sacred building as part of the church service. The other new piece was a pleasing part-song, "'Tis twilight's holy hour," by Mr. J. Clippingdale, a member of the Choir. Among the other choral works in the programme were Schubert's lovely 23rd Psalm for female voices, and Mendelssohn's ever-welcome "Judge me, O God." On the whole, the singing throughout the afternoon was quite worthy of the Choir's distinguished reputation, and the addition of a few youthful voices to the ranks of the sopranos is alone required to render the ensemble perfect. Madame Néruda delighted her audience with her violin solos, as did Miss Fusselle in Sullivan's "Orpheus with his lute," and Mr. Lloyd in his favourite Prize song from "Die Meistersinger."

LONDON MUSICAL SOCIETY.

THE services that can be rendered to music by societies labouring solely in the interests of art are inestimable, and we were reminded of this fact by the programme of the London Musical Society's Concert, on April 26, at St. James's Hall. Not one of the items presented could be relied upon to draw the public, and yet every one was worthy of performance, the whole constituting a scheme extremely interesting to musicians. It will be advisable to speak of them in the order of performance, the first, a Cantata, "Oh! weep for those," being a setting of one of Byron's Hebrew melodies, by Dr. Ferdinand Hiller (Op. 46). It consists of a soprano solo (sung by Miss Amy Aylward) and chorus, which, if not remarkably original, shows musicianship of the highest class, and must be pronounced an effective composition. After Miss Zimmermann had given an artistic rendering of Schumann's Concertstück for Pianoforte (Op. 92), which we can scarcely agree "is but little known in England," Herr von Zur-Mühlen sang a somewhat wild but pleasing air from M. Delibes's Opera "Lakmé." The next item was of greater interest, namely, Brahms's four part-songs for three female voices, with accompaniment for harp and two horns. There is much charm in these trifles, especially in No. 2, a setting of Shakespeare's "Come away, Death," and No. 4, "Gesang aus Fingal." Conductors of ladies' choirs who do not know these part-songs should make their acquaintance without delay. Jensen's Cantata "The Feast of Adonis," for three female solo voices and chorus, is very elegantly written and melodious, but it rather serves to confirm the impression that the composer's talent was better employed in lieder than in works of larger scope. The last work was Schumann's Cantata "The King's Son," never before heard in London, and, perhaps, not likely to be often repeated. Towards the close of his active career Schumann was much occupied with the composition of choral music, the Cantatas "Pilgrimage of the Rose," "Des Sängers Fluch," and other settings of poems by Geibel and Uhland, dating from the years 1851-2. It was scarcely in the power of his subjective nature, however, to adapt itself completely to any given theme, and in addition to this, the clouds which eventually obscured his intellect had already commenced to gather at the period named. "The King's Son" is, therefore, on the whole, a laboured and unsatisfactory work, though it contains numerous passages of great beauty and true poetic feeling. Under the skilful direction of Mr. Barnby, the whole of the programme was adequately rendered, and the Choir showed no deterioration if there was but little evidence of advance, the tone being still rather poor for so large a body of singers. Beside the soloists already named, Miss Helen Weber, Miss Lena Little, and Mr. W. H. Breerton rendered acceptable assistance in the course of the evening.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

AN Orchestral Concert by the students of this Institution was given at St. James's Hall, on the 2nd ult., which was numerously attended. A selection from Mozart's "Idomeneo," including the Overture, was excellently rendered, the solo parts being efficiently sung by Miss Margaret Hoare, Miss Marie Etherington, Miss K. W. Payne, Mr. Hirwen Jones, and Mr. Lucas Williams; and the choruses being given with commendable precision and due attention to gradations of tone. Miss Esther Bull, in the Allegro affettuoso from Schumann's A minor Concerto; Miss Evelyn Green, in F. Hiller's Andante and Allegro from his Concerto in F sharp minor; and Mr. C. F. Reddie, in the Allegro con brio from Beethoven's Concerto in C minor, most satisfactorily evidenced the excellence of the teaching in the pianoforte department of the Institution; and Molique's Andante and Rondo from the Concerto for the violoncello (Op. 45) was well played by Mr. J. E. Hambleton. Mr. Tufnail, in an air from Hofmann's "Melusina"; Mrs. Wilson Osman and Miss Ada Iggulden, in the Duet "Like as a father," from Sir George Macfarren's "King David"; Miss Leonora Pople, in Handel's "Lascia ch' io pianga"; and Messrs. Vaughan Edwards and J. Barker, in "The Lord is a Man of war," were warmly and deservedly applauded; and a Gavotte by Miss Davenport pleased so much that the composer was called before the audience and cordially greeted. The Concert was most ably conducted by Mr. William Shakespeare.

GUILDHALL SCHOOL OF MUSIC.

THE astounding growth of this Institution since its establishment less than four years ago testifies to its widespread usefulness as a centre of musical education, and in due time it cannot fail to be fruitful in the production of capable executants in every branch of the art. At the present moment there are no less than 2,350 students in the School, and 150 are waiting for admission. These numbers will convey some idea of the magnitude of the work carried on under the supervision of Mr. Weist Hill. At the Concert given on Saturday afternoon, the 3rd ult., at the Guildhall, a number of highly promising vocal and instrumental pupils appeared, the amateur orchestra and choir connected with the Institution lending valuable assistance. The most important items in the programme were Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion" and Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony," both works being rendered in a manner that seemed to give unqualified satisfaction to the crowded audience. On the efforts of individual performers it would be in questionable taste to comment in detail, but we must congratulate Mr. Weist Hill on the high average efficiency of the students, and the Corporation on the extraordinary success which has attended their efforts in the cause of music. The next step will be to provide a suitable building for the School, the present accommodation being so grossly inadequate that it was the subject of justifiable caricature in one of the comic journals only a few weeks since.

DR. HANS VON BÜLOW'S RECITALS.

MUSICIANS will readily remember the excitement occasioned by the playing of Herr Hans von Bülow on his first visit to London, in 1873. At that time we had not been inundated with pianists of the sensational order, and his great executive powers and the novel readings he gave of familiar works came upon us as a surprise. Some were fascinated by the Doctor's immense energy and the extraordinary effects and contrasts he produced from his instrument, while others averred that he caricatured the masterpieces of the great composers, and that a pianist ought not to impress his own individuality on the music he interprets. During the decade which has since elapsed many remarkable executants have visited this country, and the tendency of criticism has been to become more liberal. It is now generally recognised that a great work may admit of varied readings, and that so long as a player does not willfully distort a composer's meaning or his text, individuality in interpretation is preferable to dulness and mediocrity. The recent performances of Herr von Bülow have, therefore, excited but little acrimony, nor, to say truth, has the public regarded him as a phenomenon. His Recitals were largely attended, but evidently there was less general interest than was awakened by M. de Pachmann a few months ago. The programmes were formed to a considerable extent of music outside the ordinary répertoire of pianists, and were, therefore, less attractive to the public than to musicians. At the first Recital, on April 29, the most important item was Brahms's Sonata in F minor (Op. 5), an early but very fine work, designed on a large scale and full of individual touches. The Scherzo so pleased the audience that an encore was demanded, and somewhat unwisely responded to. More remarkable was the demand for a repetition of Raff's Fugue in E minor (from the Suite, Op. 72), but the piece was played with such exquisite finish and clearness that the approval of the audience showed a true spirit of discrimination. Throughout the afternoon the Doctor was in admirable form, several other pieces by Raff and Rubinstein being given with great power and intellectuality of style. The programme also included Beethoven's rarely heard Variations on a Russian Dance, his Rondo a Capriccio in G, and the Bagatelle in B minor (Op. 126), termed a Bourrée, though on whose authority we know not. At the second Recital, on the 6th ult., Raff, Brahms, and Beethoven were again represented, while Rheinberger took the place of Rubinstein. The last named composer's Toccata (Op. 12), dedicated to the pianist, was encored, when he gave one of Rheinberger's pieces for the left hand, with almost equal effect. In Beethoven's last Sonatas (Op. 110 and 111), Dr. Hans von Bülow's special qualities were displayed at their best. These works require a broad masculine style of playing, and at the same time admit of variety of treatment in matters of detail. The rendering of the Sonata in C minor was particularly to be admired, the vigour displayed in the first movement being well contrasted with the beauty and delicacy of the wonderful Arietta, which so worthily concludes Beethoven's pianoforte compositions. Raff's Suite in D minor (Op. 91) contains much that is original and effective, though, on the whole, we prefer the earlier Suite in E minor. Some minor pieces by Brahms completed a scheme the only fault of which was its extreme length.

The third and last Recital took place on the 15th ult. We are unable to say that it was a worthy climax to the series, Herr von Bülow failing to give satisfaction in some items of the programme, while others were devoid of interest as music. We suppose there must be some merit in Liszt's so-called Legends, "St. Francis of Assisi preaching to the birds" and "St. Francis of Paula on the waves," as pianists are so fond of playing them, but to our unlightened vision the first appears to consist of a commonplace theme surrounded by meaningless trills and filagree passages on the highest notes of the instrument, and the other of a succession of chromatic progressions without melody, sense, or form. After this bathos, Sterndale Bennett's Sonata "The Maid of Orleans" was as sunshine following mist and storm, though the work was not improved by the player's exaggerated expression and an over-indulgence in the rubato style. Again, in Beethoven's Sonata in E flat, "Les Adieux," Dr. von Bülow over-exerted himself, the tone produced being consequently hard and unpleasant. The best performance of the afternoon was that of Brahms's fine Rhapsodies in B minor and G minor (Op. 79). The Recital was brought to a close by Brahms's variations on a theme by Haydn, which is familiar to musicians as an orchestral piece. The keyboard arrangement is for two pianofortes, Mr. Oscar Beringer being an able assistant on this occasion. By his recent performances Dr. Hans von Bülow has again proved himself a great, though very unequal, pianist. We trust that he has taken away a better impression of this country than he did on former visits; at any rate, he must acknowledge that we are a forgiving people, for, in spite of his diatribes against our climate and our manners, he was received with the utmost cordiality, and the respect due to one who, despite his eccentricities, is one of the most noteworthy artists of his time.

MADAME ESSIPOFF'S RECITALS.

It is a curious but indisputable fact that difference of sex causes no general distinction in the qualities which characterise respectively male and female pianists. For example, M. Vladimir de Pachmann's technique is more feminine than masculine in its attributes, and the converse may be said concerning that of Madame Essipoff. The former is heard to most advantage in music requiring tenderness and a delicate touch; the latter in works demanding vigour and the exercise of physical power. Two Recitals were given by Madame Essipoff at St. James's Hall during the past month. At the first, on Friday the 9th ult., she relied entirely on herself, and played selections from nine composers. The most important work, indeed the only one of length and classic dignity, was Beethoven's Sonata Appassionata, oddly enough called No. 57 instead of Op. 57. This she interpreted with great manipulative strength, though not with undeviating clearness in the phrasing. Four pieces by Chopin, two of Schumann, and one each of Mendelssohn, Handel, Rubinstein, and Silas were included in her programme. An arrangement of some of Schubert's waltzes by Liszt might well have been omitted, except as indicating to young pianists what to avoid. Three trifling pieces by Edward Schütt, a promising young Russian composer, completed the scheme. The second Recital, on Wednesday, the 21st ult., commenced with Schumann's Sonata in G minor (Op. 22). We are sorry to be unable to endorse the favourable opinions which Madame Essipoff's performance of this work have elicited elsewhere. There was not only an absence of poetical feeling, but many passages were blurred and the general style was coarse and unfinished, though there was plenty of vigour. Some pieces of smaller calibre were admirably played, notably a theme by Rameau, with variations, Liszt's Spinnerlied, and Leschetizsky's Valse Chromatique. Madame Essipoff was assisted by M. Brandoukoff, a violoncellist, presumably of the same nationality as herself. In two movements of Rubinstein's Duet Sonata in D (Op. 18), and in various solos by Godard, Davidoff, Tschaiikowsky, and Popper, he displayed a pleasant, if not very powerful, tone, and an extremely refined style of execution.

SEÑOR SARASATE'S CONCERTS.

It is not always easy to distinguish between an artist and a virtuoso, and the eminent Spanish violinist, Señor Sarasate, has some claims to the first and more honourable title, though on the whole, perhaps, the second would serve to indicate his idiosyncrasy more faithfully. His own compositions, written for the purpose of enabling him to display his phenomenal executive abilities, have no claim to higher consideration; but, on the other hand, he interprets the works of the best masters, and, unlike other instrumental performers, he engages a first-class orchestra for his Concerts. For thus maintaining the dignity of his art he is entitled to the thanks of musicians. The first of a series of four Concerts, at St. James's Hall, was given on Wednesday, April 30, before a large audience. Señor Sarasate's principal solo was Mendelssohn's Concerto, which appears to be a favourite with him, as indeed it is with most violinists. The exquisite purity of his tone and the unflinching accuracy of his intonation even in the most arduous passages impart a charm to his playing which it is impossible to resist. On the other hand, there is but little intellectual breadth of style, and the cheap effects gained by the adoption of a break-neck speed in the last movement serve to dissolve the spell, at any rate with cultured listeners. A Caprice by Ernest Guiraud, the French composer of comic operas, consisting of an Andante in C and an Allegro appassionata in A minor, may be commended as an elegant and tastefully written piece. The orchestra, under Mr. W. G. Cusins, gave a fair performance of Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony, Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture, and a Fantasia on two Russian airs by Glinka being also included in the programme. At the second Concert, on Saturday afternoon, the 10th ult., St. James's Hall was thronged in every part, and the greatest enthusiasm prevailed. Herr Max Bruch's First Concerto, in G minor, exhibits that ponderous German composer's ability in the most favourable light. The first movement is rather in the style of an improvisation, but the second and third are really beautiful, and suit Señor Sarasate's style to a nicety. The audience also found much to admire in his Fantasia on "Carmen" and the other show-pieces he played on this occasion; but, as music of this class has no art value, it does not call for criticism in this place. The orchestral works were Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, Weber's "Der Freischütz" Overture, and Liszt's grotesque "Mephisto Walzer." At the third Concert, on the 21st ult., the violinist essayed Beethoven's Concerto, the greatest work ever written for the instrument, and the most conclusive test of the powers of an executant. Herr Joachim's matchless interpretation of this masterpiece has rendered London audiences hypercritical, but justice to Señor Sarasate compels us to acknowledge that whatever deficiency there may have been in his rendering in regard to power, and that passionate expression which almost transforms the violin into a living thing, was partly atoned for by the luscious sweetness of the tone produced, especially in the upper octaves, and the marvellous technical perfection displayed throughout, but more particularly in an elaborate cadenza probably composed by the player. The other solos in the programme were chiefly designed for the exhibition of virtuosity, and included a Serenade Melancolique by Tschaiakowsky and a showy Rhapsodie Hongroise by M. Auer, the Russian violinist. The principal orchestral works were Schumann's Overture, Scherzo and Finale in E, sometimes called the Fifth Symphony, and Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" Overture, the playing being on the whole decidedly mediocre.

BOROUGH OF HACKNEY CHORAL ASSOCIATION.

UNTIL the last Concert this season, which was given on Monday, April 28, Oratorio had had no place in the work of this Society, at any rate for several years; partly in consequence of there being no organ in the Shoreditch Town Hall and partly because it pursued a course which gave it a distinct position among choral bodies. But the experiment made on the above occasion was so signally successful that it will not be surprising if Oratorio should be included in the schemes of future seasons. Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" attracted an overflowing audience, and the performance itself was of great excellence. The choruses offered no difficulty to a choir used to the most abstruse modern music, and they were sung with spirit and unswerving precision under Mr. Prout's direction. The principal vocalists were Miss Clara Leighton, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Bernard Lane, and Mr. W. H. Brereton, all of whom were highly efficient, though Mr. Lane was suffering from hoarseness.

HIGHBURY PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

THE last Concert of the present season of the Highbury Philharmonic Society took place on Monday, the 19th ult., at the Athenæum, Highbury New Park, under the conductorship of Dr. Bridge. The programme, a somewhat lengthy one, opened with Spohr's "God, Thou art great," the choruses of which were well sung by the choir of the Society, and we may add that Mr. Maas's fine voice was heard to great advantage in the melodious duet for contralto and tenor, "Children, pray this love to cherish." Of the two numbers announced (Andante and Finale) from Spohr's first Symphony, only the first was given, owing to the exigencies of time, since the second part of the programme was the more exacting of the two, consisting as it did of an exhaustive selection from Weber's opera "Euryanthe," a notable instance of noble music ruined by a weak libretto. Special praise must be given to the performance of the Finale to the first Act; but indeed, notwithstanding that towards the end the executants showed some signs of fatigue, the whole of the selection was rendered in a manner that reflected much credit both on the Society and their Conductor. We must not omit to state that, in addition to Mr. Maas, the soloists were Madame Marie Klauwell, Miss Ellen Atkins, Miss Evelyn Gibson, Miss Florence Monk, Mr. Frank Ward, and Mr. Bridson.

"THE REDEMPTION" IN WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

IF any lingering doubts existed as to the fitness of M. Gounod's sacred trilogy for performance in a sacred building, they must have been removed from the minds of those who heard the work on the afternoon of Ascension Day in Westminster Abbey. The public did not need pressing to attend, for the vast building was crowded in every part, and the spectacle, as viewed from the triforium, was wonderfully impressive. Every care had been taken by the authorities, and by Dr. Bridge, to secure a worthy interpretation of the music. The orchestra numbered about sixty, and the choir about 240 performers. With such a force the effect would have been imposing in a Concert-room, while in the Abbey it was at times overwhelming. We may single out for special mention the trumpet call announcing the Resurrection, and the Ascension chorus in which the celestial choir, trumpets, and harps were placed high above the altar. The effect intended by the composer was thus secured to perfection, and it will not readily be forgotten by those who heard it. It would be in questionable taste to criticise the efforts of individuals in what was really a religious service, but it may be said that due justice was rendered to the solo portions of the work, by Masters Roper and Baker, and Messrs. Couzens, Bell, Harper Kearton, and Hilton. The performance was given for the benefit of the Clergy Orphan Schools, which, we trust, benefited considerably, as the offertory amounted to £270.

LONDON GREGORIAN CHORAL ASSOCIATION.

THE London Gregorian Choral Association held its Annual Festival, after a lapse of one year, in St. Paul's Cathedral, on Thursday evening, the 15th ult. The immense body of voices, the leading feature of this Festival, seemed to be somewhat more manageable than on some previous occasions, and the unambitious character of the anthem, "Come Holy Ghost, Eternal God" (composed by Mr. A. H. Brown, of Brentwood), was doubtless the outcome of the practical experience of past years. This Festival is at least as interesting from an antiquarian as from a musical point of view; the service books are indeed models of research, but are hardly calculated, we should imagine, to popularise Gregorian music in the manner primarily desired by the promoters of the Association. Mr. C. Warwick Jordan presided most ably at the organ, and had the assistance of some eight or ten brass instruments; but notwithstanding the lapse of which we have already spoken, and the exceptional fineness of the weather, the congregation was considerably less than on previous occasions.

FESTIVAL OF THE SONS OF THE CLERGY.

THE Festival of the Sons of the Clergy, the 230th Anniversary of which was celebrated on the 14th ult. in St. Paul's Cathedral, was chiefly noticeable for an especially good rendering of Sullivan's Overture "In Memoriam," and a repetition—we might almost say a resuscitation—of the Dettingen Te Deum. The first-named work, the Overture, which seems eminently suited for such an occasion, has been heard at more than one preceding Festival, and our admiration of its unceasing beauties is second only to the inevitable feeling of regret that the same hand should give us so little in a similar, or an equally lofty, vein. It was played to perfection on the present occasion, but the same can scarcely be said of the accompaniments to the Te Deum, where in at least three instances the trumpets particularly were undesirably noticeable. The vocal portion of the Te Deum was, however, distinctly good, and, no doubt, the revival must have been highly gratifying to the worshippers of Handel's genius. The omission of the "Hallelujah" Chorus, usually sung after the sermon, could scarcely have been matter for regret even to the most devoted Handelian, considering the length at which the master had already been represented. For the Canticles Mr. Gadsby's somewhat secular setting in C (written for the Festival of 1875) was repeated, and the whole of the music of the Festival was conducted by Dr. Stainer, Dr. G. C. Martin presiding at the organ.

OPENING OF THE WESTMINSTER ABBEY ORGAN.

AFTER much expectation, much preparation, and, to say the truth, considerable apparent delay, the new organ for Westminster Abbey is, save as to its case, at length a fait accompli; for on Saturday, the 24th ult., in the presence of a large congregation, the ceremony of "opening" took place at the afternoon service; that is to say, the instrument was then for the first time (except for a short movement played on the previous day at the unveiling of the statue of Lord Stratford de Redcliffe) publicly used. We have in these columns very recently gone fully into the details of this instrument, and need, therefore, now merely speak of what actually took place at the opening. At the afternoon service the music was selected entirely from works of organists of the Abbey, the late Mr. Turle being represented by one of his double chants (the branch of composition in which we imagine his name to be pre-eminent), Dr. Bridge by his Magnificat in G, Dr. Benjamin Cooke by his Nunc dimittis in G (part of the Evening Service said to have been composed for the re-opening of the old organ when the pedals were added), Henry Purcell by "O sing unto the Lord," and Dr. Croft by "God is gone up." As the concluding Voluntary, Dr. Bridge gave an excellent rendering of Bach's Toccata in F. At the Recital which followed the Service, Dr. Bridge played Andante (from the E flat Symphony), Haydn; Concerto (No. 4, Set 2), Handel; Andante in G, Wesley; Toccata and Fugue in C, Bach; "Ave Maria," Arcadelt; Andante (First Symphony), Spohr; and Fantasia by Silas. It only remains now to congratulate the authorities of the Abbey on their having at length acquired an organ worthy of their church and its services, and to add that this fine instrument is as yet without a case, a want which public spirit ought not to allow to exist for any length of time.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

ALTHOUGH the regular Concert season virtually ended when May began, there has been no dearth of music here during the past month, the interval having been well filled with casual entertainments and a week of opera by the Carl Rosa Company. Perhaps the most interesting musical gossip from this centre, however, has reference to the arrangements for next year's Festival, the outline programme of which, though not yet confirmed by the Orchestral Committee, has already been published. It will be seen that commissions for no less than seven new works have been given—viz., to Gounod, Dvorák, Mackenzie, Stanford, Cowen, Prout, and Anderton, and that the last five are native composers—a fact which may well be set off against the much-debated appointment of a foreigner, in the person of Herr Richter, to the post of Conductor.

A new operetta of local origin, and slight but ingenious structure, was produced at the Bijou Theatre on the 7th ult., under the title of "Thorough Bass." The libretto, which is from the pen of Mr. T. Edgar Pemberton, author of "Gentle Gertrude" and other amusing trifles of the same order, is intended to satirise the sham musical dilettantism which is so prevalent at the present day. The musical pretenders in this case are an old bachelor named Bodfish and an enamoured swain called Handel Hopcraft. The former has been induced to feign a love, which he certainly does not feel, for classical music, in order to please his æsthetic niece Lennette, who has set her heart upon the conquest of Handel Hopcraft, a supposed musical enthusiast, and the latter plays the part of a musical fanatico, the better to recommend himself to the affections of the fair Lennette. The young lady and her suitor have become acquainted at the meetings of the "Infernal Tonic Sol-fa, four-string quartet catgut chamber music, concerted, conceited, classical accordion Society," which they have both joined with the object of meeting one another, and it ultimately turns out when the time for mutual explanations comes round, that the young lady is almost as much a musical pretender as her uncle and her suitor. All three agree that they like music "with a tune in it," but that classical music is beyond them, and inspires them with feelings of weariness and disgust. The dialogue is smart and pointed, and the music by Mr. Thomas Anderton has plenty of tune and go in it. Among the best numbers are a song for Bodfish—

I'll speak the truth and frankly say an amusing ditty for Hopcraft, ending with the refrain "Sing a song of semibreves and demisemiquavers"; a well-written trio, "When I'm alone and they're alone"; and a tender duet for the lovers, "I cannot keep up the deception." The performance, by amateurs, conducted by the composer, was a very satisfactory one, eliciting loud and hearty applause. The little work is now being scored for orchestra.

The annual Concert of the Edgbaston Amateur Musical Union, on the 7th, was of more than usual interest and merit, the selection comprising, in addition to minor items, Mendelssohn's early Symphony in C minor (Op. 11)—composed in 1824, but performed for the first time at a Philharmonic Concert in London, in 1829, when the Composer made his first appearance in this country; Beethoven's "Men of Prometheus" Overture; Sterndale Bennett's "Naiades" Overture; and a Concert Finale by Miss Oliveria Prescott. The playing of the band, which numbered some fifty amateurs, including half-a-dozen lady violinists, was on the whole very creditable, though the skill of the Conductor, Mr. Sutton, was occasionally severely taxed to keep all branches of the executive well together. Mr. Pidcock, a member of Mr. Hallé's orchestra, performed some phenomenal feats on the flute, and a couple of local vocalists contributed several pleasing songs.

The Carl Rosa Opera series, reduced on this occasion from the customary twelve nights to six, opened on the 19th with "Carmen," in which Madame Marie Roze resumed the rôle of the capricious heroine and Mr. Barton McGuckin that of the love-sick sergeant José. Both assumptions revealed some noteworthy improvements over the previous essays of the same artists in these parts, and the performance of the opera altogether was an exceedingly spirited and effective one. On the following evening Dr. Villiers Stanford's new Opera "The Canterbury Pilgrims" was produced here for the first time out of London, and with such success that it was repeated on the following Friday. As the cast was substantially the same, with one exception, as in London, there is no need to review the performance. The exception alluded to was the substitution of Mr. Leslie Crotty for Mr. Barrington Foote in the part of Hal o' the Chepe, an assumption which, without entering into invidious comparisons, was generally admitted to be a very able and effective performance. The opera was splendidly mounted, and though the performance evoked little enthusiasm, it produced a deep impression upon the more cultured section of the audience, who recognised in the score the evidences of an earnest and original thinker and a ripe musical scholar. Miss Clara Perry and Mr. B. Davies carried off the vocal honours of the evening, and considerably advanced their reputation here by the excellence of their singing and acting in the respective parts of Cicely and Hubert Lovel. On the following evening Donizetti's "La Favorita" was performed here for the first time in Birmingham, in any form, and met with a very cordial reception from a full house. Madame Marie Roze, as Leonora, produced a deep impression upon the audience, and in the part of Fernando Mr. McGuckin reaped fresh laurels. A new comer, Mr. Mills, in the part of the Monk Baldassare, revealed the possession of a powerful and well trained organ, but little stage experience.

On the 20th a Concert of high-class music was given at the Midland Institute for a local charity, the performers being Miss Santley, Miss Damian and the Hon. Spencer Lyttelton, vocalists; Mr. F. Ward, violin, Mr. J. Owen, violoncello, and Mr. J. A. Fuller-Maitland, pianoforte, in the instrumental department. Dvorák's Trio for pianoforte and strings in F minor (Op. 65) was heard here on this occasion for the first time, and excited much interest. The other instrumental items were Handel's Sonata in D for Miss Santley, who was in excellent voice, had to submit to an encore after her performance of Handel's song "O had I Jubal's lyre," and produced a marked impression by her refined singing of Miss Maude White's song "The sea hath its pearls." #### MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

So far as Leeds is concerned, the only musical performance calling for notice this month is that of the Armley and District Choral Society, which took place on April 28. The work selected was Mr. Mackenzie's "Jason," which selection speaks well for the energy of the Society. It is a Society, however, of which there is an excellent record so far, and there was at the outset of the performance some guarantee that the music was in good hands. Of the excellent spirit with which the music was reproduced on the part of chorus and principals alike, I can speak with satisfaction. As to the impression which the work conveyed, the result was equally gratifying, and doubtless Mr. Mackenzie's productions will next season receive more attention in Leeds now that the lead has been so successfully taken by this courageous little Society. The principals were Miss Hoyle, Mr. Newton Laycock, and Mr. Frank Lees. Mr. Alfred Broughton was the accompanist, and the Conductor was Mr. W. H. Harrison, whose great services to the Society demand special recognition.

The recent death of Mr. P. A. Strickland, the Organist of Pudsey Parish Church, was an event deeply regretted in the district where he laboured. Mr. Strickland's career was one of singular industry and great promise. Out of exceptionally slender means he built up the reputation of a thorough and accomplished musician, and although he had but attained his manhood a few years ago, he possessed the confidence of a wide circle of musicians, his seniors. As a composer he laboured assiduously and produced several works of considerable value. An ailment with which one of his arms was seized rendered the amputation of that limb a matter of necessity, and for that purpose he visited Guy's Hospital. The operation was accomplished, but he never rallied from the shock. Death thus terminated the career of one of the most promising of Yorkshire musicians. Mr. Strickland's funeral was attended by representatives of nearly all the local musical associations, and the Pudsey Choral Union, of which he was the Conductor, gave an "In memoriam" performance of the "Elijah," on the 19th ult. It is understood that, as the result of the Concert, some permanent remembrance of him will be raised by the Society.

MUSIC IN THE WEST.

"The last for this season" of the Monday Popular Concerts attracted an immense audience, on April 28, Colston Hall being crowded in every part. The programme was a very interesting one, comprising the Symphony to the Hymn of Praise, Beethoven's Concerto in D major, for violin and orchestra, and the Overtures "Zanetta" and "Rosamunde." The Symphony was very finely rendered, the trombones playing in a spirited manner, and the strings being extremely good in the allegro. The lovely Allegretto was given with delightful smoothness, and the Adagio was remarkable for good expression. As a whole, it was perhaps more perfectly performed than any other Symphony given this season. The Concerto at the beginning of Part II. was felt by many to be a little long for that position, and, though Mr. Carrington's excellent performance of the solo instrument was justly admired, it was perhaps rather to be regretted that he chose a work of such extreme difficulty, especially as he filled the arduous post of leader throughout the evening. Miss Eleanor Rees, who created a very favourable impression at a former Concert, and was most warmly welcomed, contributed three songs in admirable style, Mr. Riseley accompanying her on the organ in his usual artistic manner. We were pleased to notice that the list of subscribers was decidedly longer than in any former year, and we sincerely trust that these high-class Concerts may be successfully carried on under the new arrangements. Mr. Riseley, of whose ability as a Conductor it is needless to speak, is most heartily to be congratulated on the excellence of his band throughout the season, and we may hope that the time is not far distant when he may safely challenge any orchestra out of London. He is doing a most valuable work for his native city, and we trust he may be gratified by seeing it more universally recognised and appreciated.

On April 30 a Concert was given at Colston Hall, in aid of the Great Western Railway Widows' and Orphans' Benevolent Fund, which was well attended. The vocalists were Miss de Fonblanque, Miss Louise Phillips, Miss Ethel Winthrop, of London; Messrs. Jones, Morgan, Nash, and Thomas, of Bristol Cathedral; Accompanist, Mr. A. New; solo organist, Mr. G. Riseley; solo pianoforte, Miss Maud Bennett.

On Saturday, the 3rd ult., the twenty-fourth Concert, and the last for the present season, was given by the Bristol Musical Association, in the large Colston Hall, which was literally packed with auditors. Mozart's Twelfth Mass was the chief work performed, the principal vocalists being Miss Louie Phillips (soprano), Mr. Jones (alto), Mr. E. T. Morgan (tenor), and Mr. Thomas (bass). Mr. Frank Gardner led the band as usual. Mr. A. Robinson, of Birmingham (solo trumpet), was specially engaged, and Mr. George Riseley presided at the grand organ. Mr. Gordon conducted, and is certainly to be congratulated upon the work of his band and choir. The Mass was not, indeed, by any means perfectly rendered, but, taking into consideration the recent formation of this Association, the performance was a creditable one, and showed an advance, especially on the part of the chorus. The second part of the programme was miscellaneous, and everything was heartily applauded, the Concert being generally considered the most successful given this season.

Miss Farler gave her annual Ballad Concert, on Monday, the 12th ult., before a large audience, in Colston Hall. The performers were Miss Clara Samuell, Miss Ferrari, Miss Farler, Mr. Joseph Maas, Mr. Santley (vocalists); Miss Adelina Dinelli (solo violin), Signor Tito Mattei (solo pianoforte); Conductor, Mr. D. W. Rootham. The programme embraced many favourite English ballads, and the most hearty applause was awarded to the singers, numerous encores being demanded. The violin playing of Miss Dinelli was very much admired, and the lady will always be welcomed in Bristol.

Mr. Riseley gave Organ Recitals during the past month, the last for this season on Saturday, the 17th ult., when the programme was especially well selected, and the talented Organist seemed to infuse even more than his usual spirit and expression into his playing. It is much to be regretted that these delightful evenings are given up a month earlier than is generally the case, and that they will not be resumed till September.

The third of Miss Aylward's afternoon Chamber Concerts was given at Salisbury, on Tuesday, the 20th ult. The programme included Brahms's Quintet in F minor, Haydn's String Quartet in E flat, Rubinstein's Sonata in A minor, for piano and violin, and Boccherini's Sonata for violoncello and pianoforte. The performers were Miss Aylward, Messrs. Burnett, Moberley, Hill, and Whitehouse. The vocalist was Miss Ambler, who was most successful in songs by Spohr, Mendelssohn, and Liszt.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

On the evening of our Sacramental Fast Day, April 25, the Edinburgh Select Choir gave a performance of Handel's "Messiah," in presence of a large audience. The choruses were rendered with accuracy and taste, and on the whole with good general effect. The solos were sung by members of the choir. Mr. Hartley conducted. On the same night Dr. Stainer's "St. Mary Magdalen" was performed by the Edinburgh Choir, in the Literary Institute, the audience being fairly numerous. This was the first production of the Oratorio in Edinburgh. The singing was marked by precision and care, if defective in power. Mr. James Blaikie conducted, and Messrs. J. M. Sinclair and J. T. Haswell accompanied. Other musical entertainments of a more or less suitable nature took place on the same occasion, the Fast Day observances being now greatly changed from what they once were.

The Laurieston Parish Church Musical Association gave a Concert, on April 30, the Oratorio of "Judas Maccabæus" being largely drawn from. Mr. Sneddon was the Conductor, and Mr. Bridgman, the accompanist.

Dr. Hans von Bülow gave a pianoforte Recital in the Music Hall on the 10th ult. The audience was hardly as large as might have been expected from the fame of the Concert-giver, and from the comparative rarity of his visits. The programme, among other numbers, included Brahms's Third Grand Sonata (Op. 5), Beethoven's Variations on a Russian Dance, Raff's Prelude and Fugue (Op. 72), and Scherzo (A minor, Op. 74), Rubinstein's Prelude and Fugue (Op. 53, No. 3), Galop Brillant from "Le Bal." Dr. von Bülow played the entire selection from memory, and charmed and astonished his audience alike by his grace, power, and nonchalance of delivery. The instrument was, unfortunately, not a very good one.

We had a fortnight of English Opera, or rather of Opera in English—from April 28 to May 10—in the Theatre Royal. The troupe was that entitled The Royal English Opera Company, lately at Covent Garden, the chief artists being Mesdames Blanche Cole, Julia Gaylord, and Lucy Franklin, and Messrs. J. W. Turner and James Sauvage. The scheme included "Trovatore," "Lily of Killarney," "Maritana," "Marriage of Figaro," and other well-known operas; the only absolute novelty brought forward being Victor E. Nessler's "Piper of Hamelin." The ensemble of the performances was good on the whole, and an encouraging amount of support was accorded.

There will now be little or nothing doing in musical matters here till September or October next.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE Glasgow Choral Union, in conjunction with the Musical Festival Committee, had the pleasure, a few weeks ago, of again submitting a favourable balance sheet to the guarantors of the yearly Choral and Orchestral Concert Scheme. The income for the season 1883-84, it was stated, amounted to £10,242 2s. 1d., and the expenditure to £9,228 9s. 1½d., leaving a surplus of £1,013 12s. 11½d., and making, with the balance over from last year (after repayment to the guarantors of £1,863 5s. 7d. of old advances), a total surplus on hand of £2,197 16s. 2½d. With the hearty consent of the guarantors, it was resolved to reserve the whole of the present year's surplus to provide against possible contingencies in the future. If the prosperity of the scheme continues, as there is no reason to doubt it will, the Concerts will soon not only be self-supporting, but, besides paying back debts, will provide a good capital fund. At the same time, as the commercial outlook for next winter is, as far as can be judged, not of the brightest, the Committee have done wisely to keep a little in their hands.

The Glasgow Choral Union are studying the choruses in "Elijah" and "Israel in Egypt," and as they may probably have a Handel night or two next season on the occasion of the Bi-centenary of the birth of the great Saxon master (on February 23), a few of the choruses from his less familiar works are to be practised to help to make the celebration of the event as interesting as possible.

At Rutherglen, an ancient and independent royal burgh, though practically now part of Glasgow, there are one or two Musical Associations, in particular the "Choral Society," by which a good Concert was given on April 29, under the direction of Mr. W. Macintyre. The programme consisted chiefly of old English glees and modern part-songs. The Musical Association connected with Plantation Parish Church, in the extreme South-West of the city, gave on the same evening a Concert of sacred and secular selections, the former including Zingarelli's "Laudate." Mr. E. B. Conner conducted. In Newton Place U.P. Church, Partick, on the opposite side of the river, a "Rehearsal of Sacred Music" was given by the choir, ably led by Mr. J. D. Boyack. Several anthems by Stainer, Smart, Sullivan, and others were sung, and mention may specially be made of a Motett for solo voices and chorus "Answer me, burning stars of night," words by Mrs. Hemans, music by William Hume, excellently rendered.

The Glasgow Musical Union, conducted by Mr. William Moodie, gave a performance of Handel's Dettingen Te Deum, on the 1st ult. On the 2nd ult. the Choir of the Christian Institute Branch of the Glasgow Foundry Boys' Religious Society (a most important philanthropic institution, which in its operations accords a principal place to musical recreation) gave a Concert in the hall of the Institute, at which Gade's Cantata "The Erl-King's Daughter" was performed. The Choir, under the able guidance of Mr. Andrew Myles (President of the Glasgow Choral Union), rendered Gade's attractive music with dramatic point and expression. The solos were taken by Mrs. Williams, Miss Mainds, and Mr. Andrew Black. Mr. A. Macbeth and Mr. W. T. Hoeck gave their services as accompanists on the pianoforte and harmonium respectively.

A Recital of organ and sacred vocal music was given in Maxwell Parish Church, on the 5th ult., by Mr. James Pattinson, Mus. Bac., and the choir. The Choir of John Knox Street Baptist Church gave a "Service of praise," on the 6th ult., at which several very fine anthems were sung with good taste and expression. Mr. John Lamont presided.

The Choir recently formed in connection with the Glasgow Kyrie Society, numbering about a hundred voices, has been studying Barnett's "Paradise and the Peri," principally with the view of performing it at Free Concerts to be given a few months hence as part of the æsthetic scheme of the Association, and on the 6th ult. a private rehearsal of the Cantata was held in the presence of a number of friends. The Choir, which is under the conductorship of Mr. A. Macbeth, made a most promising appearance, the voices being of good quality, and, as a rule, cultivated. Miss Galbraith accompanied with ability on the piano, and Mr. W. T. Hoeck at the harmonium showed how much can be done with this instrument in bringing out certain important orchestral effects.

A musical entertainment, unique in its way, was given on the 9th ult., the annual Concert, to wit, by the Boys' Choir in connection with the Glasgow Academy, one of the principal educational institutions of the city. The Choir numbers, on an average, about eighty voices, and the music chiefly practised is that written for treble and alto voices, though general choral sacred or secular music is frequently sung, the tenor and bass parts being supplied by a contingent of old pupils of the school. The Choir is now in its sixth year, and under its enthusiastic trainer and Conductor, Mr. John Maclaren, Writing Master of the Academy, really excellent progress has been made. At the present Concert the principal item in the programme was Henry Smart's Cantata "The Fishermidens," which, both choruses and solos, could hardly have been better rendered. The accompaniments on the piano were played with verve and skill. So successful was the Concert generally, that it was repeated on the 20th ult., to a crowded house, for the benefit of local charities.

The Royal English Opera Company appeared here from the 12th to the 17th ult. The Company included Mesdames Blanche Cole, L. Franklin, Julia Gaylord, and Messrs. J. W. Turner, F. C. Packard, and J. Sauvage. The band and chorus were fairly good. Among the operas performed were "The Marriage of Figaro" and Benedict's "Lily of Killarney."

MUSIC IN AMERICA.

New York, May 6.

THE "wind-up" of the musical season is this year really brilliant. It is so, speaking strictly with regard to music, and considered from the point of view of what Mr. Carlyle loved to call the "Demon Newswriter" it is even more so. For we have had all sorts of popular convulsions attending the end of the two operas. Mr. Abbey's, indeed, was the more quiet. He has lost a great lot of money with his unmanageable new theatre over and above the free use of it and the 1,000 dollars a night subvention from the shareholders. However, he has had a benefit which brought him about 50,000 dollars (say £10,000 sterling), and for the rest he has paid the difference and sailed for your shore.

Mr. Mapleson has managed, suo modo, to fix public attention somewhat more firmly by the easy process of being sold out (as to his properties and sceneries) by the Sheriff for certain advances by a bank. The ins and outs of this business have been duly celebrated by the daily press, but they can hardly interest readers of another country.

Musically speaking, the end of Mr. Abbey's season in the new Opera House offered nothing worthy of comment. When he departed Mr. Mapleson returned, and in the brief term of his reign there was nothing worth mention beside the appearance of Madame Patti in the "Romeo è Giulietta" (which was rather hurriedly brought out) and the re-appearance for one performance of "Semiramide," with Madame Patti and Madame Scalchi again, who had just before his "krach" rejoined Mr. Mapleson.

There has been much talk of an amalgamation of the "two houses," which a single season has proved—what was well enough known before by the judicious—are one too many, but neither side is inclined to yield, and the owners of both theatres are rich enough to keep them open as mere playthings if they incline so to do.

The real advance of music, the opportunity of learning, the test of musical culture, and, as it also happens, the great turn-out of box-office returns, is to be found, not in the record of quondam "fashionable" opera, but in the Wagner representations, under the direction of Mr. Thomas, introducing in the great solo parts the famous Viennese singers, Madame Friedrich-Materna and Herren Winkelmann and Scaria.

Nothing can describe the enthusiasm which these Concerts elicited here, and nothing can adequately set forth the splendour of the performance. As for the former consideration, it is only possible to say that long before the beginning of the series every seat was engaged, and before the Concerts were done the box-office was besieged with applications for tickets for the May series (to begin to-morrow), so that for some weeks past every resource of private interest has been employed to gain allowance of subscriptions, as a matter of pure favour.

A significant change has almost suddenly been made in the scheme of the first Concert of this May series. Instead of the "Euryanthe" music, as originally designed, the programme will be as follows:—"Tannhäuser." Act I.—(a) Overture; (b) Scene I., Bacchanale, Chorus of Sirens; (c) Scene III., Tannhäuser, Shepherd and Pilgrims' Chorus; (d) Scene IV., Tannhäuser, Landgrave and Minstrel Knights. Act II.—(a) First, second, and third scenes; (b) March and Chorus. Act III. (complete)—(a) Introduction, Tannhäuser's pilgrimage (orchestra); (b) Scene I., Wolfram, Pilgrims, and Elizabeth's prayer; (c) Scene II., Wolfram's song to the Evening Star; (d) Scene III., Tannhäuser's narrative, Wolfram, Landgrave, and Minstrels, Chorus and Finale. The parts to be taken as under:—Landgrave Hermann, Herr Scaria; Tannhäuser, Herr Winkelmann; Wolfram von Eschenbach, Mr. Franz Remmert; Walter von der Vogelweide, Mr. Theo. J. Toedt; Biterolf, Mr. Max Treumann; Heinrich der Schreiber, Mr. J. Graff; Reinmar von Zweter, Dr. Carl Martin; A Young Shepherd, Miss Emma Juch; and Elizabeth, Frau Materna; German Liederkrantz, New York Chorus Society, and Brooklyn Philharmonic Chorus.

The Wagner artists, and the Wagner works, indeed, dominate the musical life of this country, and carry everything before them. After the first New York Concerts the singers proceeded to Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Richmond. Returning, they went to Portland (Maine), and again to Boston for two Concerts (yesterday). After this week they go West, spreading the light and life of the true musical gospel.

We find Madame Materna immensely improved, great as we fancied her (and justly) on her former visits. Herren Scaria and Winkelmann are greeted with profound admiration and regard. The former especially has offered us an example of musical declamation such as America has never known. He appeared at the last Concert of the Philharmonic Society of New York, singing the scena and aria "Wo berg ich mich," from "Euryanthe," and Pogner's Address, from "Die Meistersinger." The other numbers were Schubert's Ninth Symphony, the "Sakuntala" Overture of Goldmark, and the "Meistersinger" Overture.

The last Brooklyn Philharmonic Concert offered a purely Wagner programme, with the three Viennese artists. The numbers were the Overture to "Tannhäuser," with the succeeding Bacchanale and Chorus of Sirens, the finale of the first act, and the first, second, and third scenes of the second act; the Walküren-Ritt, and the whole concluding scene of the Opera, Wotan's "Abschied and Feuer-Zauber," and selections from the "Meistersinger," including the Choral beginning the third act, and the "Preislied."

The interest in the Wagner performances is already beginning to excite inquiry whether, if such representations are followed by such unusual demonstrations of popular approval, stage performances of the same works, with the music enforced by the picturesque scenic setting indicated by Wagner in his librettos, and the superb dramatic powers of artists like Materna, Winkelmann and Scaria, would not be welcomed with unheard-of enthusiasm.

Since the Wagner Concert at the last Music Festival no musical performances have attracted so much attention or made so deep an impression. Without the popular accessories of scenery, stage costume, and dramatic action, they have done what, during the season just passed, only "Lohengrin," "Don Giovanni" and the "Huguenots" with all these accessories have done—they have filled the Metropolitan Opera House with enthusiastic audiences.

The Musical Festival rage begins with the upward climb of the thermometer. One was in progress in Baltimore last week; another will open in Philadelphia to-day; the sixth May Festival at Cincinnati will begin on the 20th inst. and last five days; after it will come the Chicago and Buffalo Festivals, which, like that at Cincinnati, will be under the musical direction of Theodore Thomas. In all of these Festivals, except that at Philadelphia, the Wagnerian singers from the Imperial Opera at Vienna will take part.

At Philadelphia the choral performances will be varied with pianoforte solos by Madame Helen Hopekirk and Rafael Joseffy, and violin solos by Ovide Musin. The principal singers who will participate are Mesdames Gerster, Fursch-Madi, and Trebelli, Charles R. Adams and Max Heinrich. The musical direction of the Concerts, which will be eight in number, will be divided between W. W. Gilchrist and Charles M. Schmitz.

The choral forces number 540 voices, and the orchestral, 100 performers. The principal choral works to be performed are Whittier's "Centennial Hymn," composed by J. K. Paine (which will open the festival), Bach's Cantata "God's time is the best," Hiller's "A Song of Victory," Mendelssohn's "Elijah" (which will also be the chief number in the Buffalo scheme), Verdi's "Requiem," and Gade's "Crusaders."

The scheme in Cincinnati is of a much more dignified and imposing character, as was to have been expected from so well-established an institution as the biennial Festivals which have been held regularly since 1873. There the management of the Concerts is in the hands of an association which maintains a choir of 700 voices, and works continually for the advancement of the regularly recurring Festivals.

The only instrumental music played at these Festivals is symphonic, and this is always interpreted by an orchestra of 150 instruments or more. The principal singers engaged this year are Mdme. Nilsson, Mdme. Materna, Miss Emma Juch, Mrs. Hartdegen, Miss Winant, Herr Winkelmann, Mr. Toedt, Mr. Victor Lindau, Mr. Remmert, Mr. Heinrich, Herr Scaria and Mr. Herman J. Gerold. The large works to be given in the seven Concerts which make up the Festival are Gounod's "Redemption," Beethoven's C minor and D minor Symphonies, Handel's "Israel in Egypt," Brahms's "German Requiem," and fragments from Wagner's "Flying Dutchman," "Tannhäuser," "Lohengrin," "Tristan und Isolde," "Die Walküre," "Siegfried," "Götterdämmerung," and "Parsifal."

MR. A. C. MACKENZIE'S "COLOMBA" AT DARMSTADT.

WE extract the following from a Darmstadt paper—the Neue Hessische Volksblätter—respecting the first performance there of Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's Opera "Colomba," which took place on April 29, at the Hof Theater, in the presence of the Court and the majority of its numerous royal visitors, assembled there on the occasion of the marriage of the eldest daughter of the Grand Duke of Hesse. After some cursory remarks concerning the sterility, in a qualitative sense, of English composers during the present century, the journal referred to, with unqualified pleasure, hails the rise in the musical world of a "young England," as represented by such composers as Messrs. Goring Thomas, Villiers Stanford, and A. C. Mackenzie, in whose works it recognises the commencement of a new era for English music generally, and for the development of English national opera in particular. Having paid a passing tribute to the able author of the libretto, the writer in the Neue Hessische Volksblätter goes on to say: "Respecting the musical portion of the work, we have no hesitation in ranking it with the best productions of our modern operatic literature. Although rumour had pointed out Mr. Mackenzie as one of the adherents to the Wagnerian doctrines, there was nothing we could discover in this direction, except perhaps the use made by him of the Leitmotiv. Indeed, if the composer has at all allowed his imaginative faculties to be influenced, that influence would seem to be due rather to the modern French and Italian schools. However that may be, there is a noble striving for independent utterance pervading the whole work to the exclusion of all ordinary cheap effects, while, at the same time, the composer throughout fully avails himself of the opportunities offered him by the librettist. Nor should we omit to state the important fact that there is a steady enhancement of effects in the entire Opera, which, more especially in the third act and in the love-duet of the fourth, assumes what may be described as truly grand dimensions. The music is of a distinctly lyrical character, free from trivialities, and affording no scope to the would-be discoverer of reminiscences from the works of other composers. If indeed it falls short of that highest dramatic impulse which exercises an irresistible spell over the listener, it by no means lacks the dramatic colouring and characteristic individualising of the persons represented. Particularly effective and demonstrative, moreover, of the polyphonus resources of the composer are the ensembles and finales, the grandly conceived and admirably sustained elaboration of which cannot fail to create a corresponding impression. Finally, we must comment upon the masterly orchestration, which, without being overweighted, exhibits a rare splendour of local colouring revealing at once the practised master of the orchestra. Conspicuous in the first act are the pathetic 'Vocero' and Lydia's duet with Orso, 'Wohl denk ich Eurer sanften Worte noch' ('Ah! well I call to mind your gentle words'), which latter especially contains passages of exquisite beauty. In the second act we are fascinated by the graceful ballet music, in the third by the prelude, the charming old Corsican ballad of Chilina; the Corsican love-song of Orso, 'Wird vom Hügel sie nahn' ('Will she come from the hill, will she come from the valley'); and the finely conceived finale. The last act contains the pearl of the Opera, the love-duet between Orso and Lydia, which, from a dramatic point of view, too, cannot fail in producing a most powerful effect.

"We think that, without any illusion on our part, we can safely predict a permanent success to the new Opera, and there can be no doubt whatever of its sympathetic reception on other German stages. On the present occasion, the work having been produced as a gala-performance in the presence of the entire Court, demonstrations of applause on the part of the public were, in conformity with the rules of etiquette, entirely precluded—a circumstance which must have exercised a somewhat disheartening effect upon the composer himself, who was present. Future repetitions of the work, therefore, must be awaited before we can record the verdict of the public here. Meanwhile, we may remark that, thanks to our Hof-Capellmeister, De Haan, the difficult work had been most carefully rehearsed, and, according to the composer's own acknowledgment, most satisfactorily represented. The title-rôle was in the accomplished hands of Fräulein Finkelstein, Fräulein Roth having been most judiciously cast for the part of Lydia. The less important part of Chilina was admirably filled by Frau Mayr, while Herr Bär as Orso, though indisposed vocally, brought all his artistic powers to bear upon the realisation of the ideal he had formed of that character. Herren Eilers, as the bandit Savelli, and Fessler, as Giuseppe Barraçini, were equally characteristic and satisfactory in their respective impersonifications. The house was completely filled in every part."

THE BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL OF 1885.

HERR RICHTER'S appointment to the Conductorship of the next Birmingham Festival is by this time known in musical circles as an accomplished fact, and, therefore, there is no need to discuss the matter further than to give the choice of the Committee our hearty and unreserved approval. Possibly, and, indeed, probably, there may be some heartburning over the fact that a foreigner is to be entrusted with the reins on an occasion so essentially English, but those who cavil at the choice of Birmingham will do well to remember that art knows no frontiers, but is in itself a kingdom separate and removed. Moreover, they only see before them an example of the inexorable rule that provides for the survival of the fittest. Already the programme has been sketched out. So far as can at present be decided, the Festival will open on the Tuesday morning with the "Elijah," while in the evening Mr. F. H. Cowen's new Cantata "The Sleeping Beauty," Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony, and Schumann's "Des Sängers Fluch" will be performed. Gounod's new and specially-written work "Mors et Vita" will be given on Wednesday morning, and a new Cantata by Mr. Thomas Anderson, a new instrumental piece by Mr. E. Prout, a Scena by Massenet, Beethoven's Violin Concerto, and the finale to the first act of Wagner's "Parsifal" will follow in the evening. "The Messiah" will be restored to its rightful place on Thursday morning, and the evening's programme will include Mr. Villiers Stanford's new Cantata "The three holy children," a new Violin Concerto from the pen of Mr. A. C. Mackenzie, an excerpt from "Tristan und Isolde," and Liszt's first Hungarian Rhapsody. Friday morning will bring the performance of Herr A. Dvořák's new Cantata and of Beethoven's Choral Symphony, and in the evening the Festival will be brought to a fitting close by a repetition of Gounod's "Mors et Vita." In all the new works are seven in number, and as five of them are by native musicians, Birmingham, it will be thought, has amply atoned for going abroad in search of a Conductor.

OBITUARY.

FREDERIC SMETANA.—The death has recently been announced of this distinguished Bohemian composer, the precursor and teacher of Anton Dvořák. He was born, March 2, 1824, at Leitoměschel, a place between Olmütz and Prague, and, according to some authorities, early showed a striking talent for music. His father objected to the art as a profession for the lad, but ultimately gave way, and Smetana, in 1843, was placed under Proksch, then the leading teacher at Prague. He is also said to have studied under Liszt, and it is certain that he became a very able pianist. In 1848, Smetana married the pianist, Katherina Kolár, and jointly with her established a piano-forte school in the Bohemian capital. Thus he remained till 1856, having also instituted (1850) an annual series of Quartet Concerts. The year 1856 brought with it a great change. On the representation of Droyschok, Smetana accepted the post of Conductor of the Philharmonic Society at Gothenburg, in Sweden. There he remained till 1860, when he left on account of his wife, whose health could not endure the rigour of a northern winter. As it was he stayed too long, Madame Smetana dying at Dresden on her way back to Prague. Under these circumstances Smetana returned to the old university town and resumed his labours there, finally quitting Sweden in 1866 to act as Conductor at the Bohemian Opera House in Prague. In 1874, increasing deafness compelled him to resign the bâton. For some time before his death he suffered from a mental malady. Smetana wrote many Bohemian operas and several important orchestral pieces, of which two, "Mein Vaterland," a symphonic poem, and "Vyschrad," have been performed at the Crystal Palace, where they met with little favour. Otherwise, Smetana was not known in this country. It may be interesting to add that a Solemn March from his pen was performed in Prague at the Shakespeare tercentenary.

WILHELM VON LENZ.—The death has just been announced of this gentleman, a Russian Councillor of State, and an occasional writer on music in the Journal de St. Petersburg. Lenz's position amongst musical men was almost entirely due to the authorship of a work in two small volumes, published in French at St. Petersburg (1852) and entitled "Beethoven et ses Trois Styles." We may quote Fétis for a tolerably accurate idea concerning this production: "The argument of the book comes from the original edition of the 'Biographie Universelle des Musiciens,' where it is for the first time said that the style of the illustrious composer corresponded to three epochs in his life. But this observation, the truth of which has been generally conceded, becomes in Von Lenz's hands the occasion of a series of buffooneries and eccentricities. With him admiration became fanaticism, and reason is always absent from his criticisms." Nevertheless, no book on Beethoven has been more often quoted than Von Lenz's indiscriminate rhapsody. Between 1855 and 1860 Lenz prepared a German version of his work, with many changes and additions, in six volumes, entitled "Beethoven, Eine Kunststudie." He also published (Berlin, 1872) a collection of critical articles under the heading "Die grossen Pianoforte Virtuosen unserer Zeit."

On Monday, the 5th ult., the Annual Concert of the Haggerstone Hospital Society, was given in the Town Hall, Shoreditch, the Institution to be benefited on the occasion being the Dalston German Hospital. The artists were Miss Clara Samuelli, Miss Helen D'Alton, Miss Hilda Coward, Miss Sherrington, Mr. Joseph Maas, Mr. Egbert Roberts, and Mr. Santley, all of whom sang with their accustomed excellence, and generously responded to the enthusiastic demands for repetition. The Messrs. Coward sang the opening and closing quartets, and the instrumentalists were Miss Schumann (violin), Mr. Rawlins (cornet), Mr. Fountain Meen and Miss L. Schumann (pianoforte); Mr. F. M. Wenborn being, as usual, the musical director. It is expected that the net result to the charity will approach £200.

AN excellent Concert, organised by, and under the direction of, Mr. Willem Coenen, in aid of the Netherland Benevolent Fund, was given at St. James's Hall, on the 1st ult., before a numerous audience. The indisposition of Mr. Sims Reeves, and also of his son, Mr. Herbert Reeves, prevented the appearance of either of these artists; but as the songs set down for Mr. Sims Reeves were so exquisitely sung by Mr. W. H. Cummings—the first a pure specimen of religious music, "Come unto Me," accompanied by the composer, Mr. Coenen, and the second the well-known "Tom Bowling"—and Herr Georg Ritter gave four songs, in place of two in the programme, for Mr. Herbert Reeves, everything was done that could be under the circumstances, and the audience indeed appeared thoroughly of our opinion. Madame Albani's singing of Eckert's "Guillaume d'Orange," and of the Valse from Gounod's "Romeo et Juliette," "Nella calma," excited such enthusiasm that she was compelled to re-appear after each, and, to the great delight of a most exacting audience, gave "O luce di quest' anima" and a German lied with equal success. Madame Antoinette Sterling, too, in songs by Schubert and R. Franz, respectively, and in Sullivan's "Lost Chord," and Mr. Santley in Gounod's "Au bruit des lourds marteaux" were received with marked favour. A feature in the evening was the performance of Mr. Coenen's Capriccio Concertante, for eight pianofortes, which was played by sixteen of the composer's pupils, with a precision and artistic feeling reflecting the utmost credit upon his teaching, and revealing with remarkable clearness some exceedingly clever and effective writing. Mr. Coenen modestly contributed only two pianoforte pieces to the programme—an Etude by Henselt and Chopin's Polonaise (Op. 53)—the cordial reception of which might well have been accepted as an encore. Two violoncello solos by M. Hollman exhibited to the utmost advantage the exceptionally fine qualities of that eminent artist; and a violin Fantasia, "Souvenir de Haydn," played by Mdlle. Adelina Dinelli, in place of Mr. Buziau (who was incapacitated by an accident from appearing), gave this young performer a good opportunity of showing her command over many of the difficulties of her instrument, although we should have preferred to hear her in more legitimate music. Some part-music, sung by the London Vocal Union, included two Dutch National Anthems, during the singing of which the audience rose, the Concert, it must be mentioned, commencing—as a graceful compliment to the country in which the performance was given—with our own National Anthem. The accompanists were Mr. Sidney Naylor, Mr. Zerbin, and Signor Bisaccia; the London Vocal Union being, as usual, under the Conductorship of Mr. Fred. Walker.

MISS MARGARET GYDE, one of the many talented pianists who have received their education in the Royal Academy of Music, and a pupil of Mr. Walter Macfarren, gave a Pianoforte Recital at Steinway Hall, on the 7th ult., which was attended by a numerous and highly appreciative audience. The varied character of the programme may be imagined when we say that Beethoven's Grand Sonata in B flat (Op. 106), a Prelude and Fugue of Bach, and selections from the works of Schumann, Chopin, Thalberg, Mozart, and Walter Macfarren were included in it. That the technical difficulties of all these compositions were surmounted with the consummate ease of an accomplished player might be expected by many in the room who were acquainted with Miss Gyde's exceptional powers of execution; but her grasp of the real meaning of the passages under her fingers, and her clear rendering of the elaborate contrapuntal writing in Beethoven's great work, were qualities rarely evidenced in the performance of so young an artist, and the applause with which she was greeted was the more gratifying as it was fairly earned. The audience indeed seemed never tired of recalling her; and amongst the minor pieces in the selection we may especially mention Schumann's "Nachtstück" and "Traumeswirren," Chopin's Ballade in G minor, Thalberg's Study in A minor (the repeated notes in which were charmingly played), and the same composer's popular Fantasia on "Mosè in Egitto," all of which were most warmly received. The vocalist was Mr. William Shakespeare, who, by his refined singing, secured an enthusiastic encore. It must be added that Miss Gyde performed the entire programme from memory.

AN Evening Concert was given in the Drill Hall, Bromley, Kent, on Wednesday evening, the 21st ult., by the Bromley Choral and Bromley Orchestral Societies. The large room was completely filled in every part by an audience, who, by discriminating applause, showed their appreciation of the musical fare set before them. This being the first occasion that the two Societies had co-operated, anxiety may have been felt by some as to how the Orchestral Society (but lately founded) would come out of the trying ordeal of playing the accompaniments of a work. Gaul's Cantata, "The Holy City," was undoubtedly a judicious selection, being neither too ambitious nor too simple. Any doubts were, however, soon set at rest by the thoroughly efficient manner in which the band did its work, every number being characterised by smoothness and attention to detail. The soloists were Miss M. Hoare, Miss Janet Russell, Messrs. Selwyn Graham, and B. H. Latter, who all rendered good service. In the second part, Chopin's Introduction and Polonaise Brillante, for pianoforte and violoncello, was played by Messrs. F. Lewis Thomas and W. C. Hann in a manner which secured a vociferous recall, Mr. Hann's pure tone and masterly execution finding many admirers. Mr. F. Lewis Thomas conducted his forces with zealous care.

THE recent Stratford Musical Competitions, though local in character, deserve mention because they are capable of wide imitation. Messrs. W. H. Cummings, W. G. McNaught, and Ridley Prentice were the judges, and about 600 persons of all classes, resident in the districts of Stratford, Walthamstow, Leytonstone, Woodford, Plaistow, and Forest Gate, entered as competitors. The contests were held in public in the Stratford Town Hall, and attracted large audiences. The meetings are organised by Mr. J. S. Curwen, and are an attempt to naturalise the Welsh Eisteddfod in England. This is their second year, and not only has the number of competitors largely increased, but public interest in the undertaking has grown. The chief value of the gatherings is the stimulus they afford to the amateur students of music in the district. The regulations are published six months in advance, and pianists, singers, violinists, choral societies, church choirs, elementary schools, &c., are at once brought under the influence of this artistic competition, and made to study good music. The meetings also bring all classes together, the sons and daughters of clergymen, county magistrates, physicians and merchants competing with those of artizans and labourers.

THE Upton Choral Society gave its third and final Concert of the second season in the Stratford Town Hall, on Thursday, the 8th ult., before a large audience. The first part of the programme consisted of Bennett's "May Queen," which was excellently rendered throughout. The solo vocalists were Miss Carlotta Elliot, Mr. Robert Hilton, and Mr. Redfern Hollins. The second part of the Concert was miscellaneous, the choir distinguishing itself in its effective rendering of "Blow, gentle gales," and "The sea hath its pearls." Mr. Hollins was much applauded for his singing of "I'll sing thee songs of Araby" and "Loyal death," and Miss Elliot was warmly encored for "O Balkis reine du Matin" (Gounod). A duet from "Der Freischütz" was well played on the pianoforte and harmonium by Messrs. F. C. Kitson and G. B. Gilbert. Mr. Kitson accompanied throughout and Mr. J. Proudman conducted.

A SUCCESSFUL Concert was given, on the 7th ult., by the Horsfall Society for Portland Town, at the St. John's Wood Assembly Rooms. Songs were contributed by Miss Santley (whose rendering of "O had I Jubal's lyre" evoked great enthusiasm), Miss Ethel Harraden, Mr. Vernon Rigby, Mr. Richard Mackway, and Mr. J. T. Hutchinson, who, accompanied by Mr. Ernest Ford, gave a most artistic rendering of Schubert's "Erl-King." The instrumental numbers comprised two violin solos, excellently played by Miss Amy Hickling; Chopin's Ballade in F sharp, given with great taste by Miss Holbeck; and Duets (Miss Holbeck and the Conductor, Mr. Windeyer Clark) by Chopin and Schumann, for two pianofortes. Choruses were contributed by the choir of the Society, and by "Ye London Glee-men," under the direction of Mr. Richard Mackway.

A CONCERT, consisting of a performance of Dr. Stainer's "Daughter of Jairus," and a miscellaneous selection, was given, on the 7th ult., by the Wycliffe Chapel Choir, with full band and organ, under the direction of the choirmaster, Mr. George Merritt, G.T.S.C., in Wycliffe Chapel, Philpot Street. The solo vocalists were Miss Mary Beare, R.A.M., Mr. Edwin Leslie, and Mr. Charles Rowcliffe. Mr. H. Baynton led the band, and Mr. George Hedges presided at the organ. Dr. Stainer's Cantata was given with great delicacy and expression, the choruses "Awake, thou that sleepest," and "To Him who left His throne on high," being especially successful. In the second part Miss Mary Beare gained an encore for a fine rendering of Gounod's song "The Worker"; Mr. Leslie sang with great feeling "In native worth" ("Creation"); and Mr. Rowcliffe was highly effective in Mendelssohn's "Consume them all" ("St. Paul"). The choral works comprised a well written anthem by the Conductor, "Sing unto the Lord"; Handel's "See the conquering" ("Judas"); and Haydn's "The Heavens are telling" ("Creation"). The band played with much success the Adagio and Allegro from Haydn's Symphony, No. 7; and Mendelssohn's "War March of the Priests" ("Athalie").

THE second Concert for the season of the South Hampstead Musical Society was given at the Hampstead Vestry Hall, on the 21st ult., the first part of the programme being devoted to Sir Sterndale Bennett's sacred Cantata "The Woman of Samaria." The principal vocalists—Madame Grace Godolphin, Miss Madeline Hardy, Mr. Alfred Kenningham, and Mr. H. Horscroft—were highly efficient; and the choruses, especially "Therefore with joy," "Now we believe," and the final fugue, were admirably rendered. In the second part, which was miscellaneous, a Serenade, "My Lady sleeps," by Mr. Arthur J. Greenish, received an enthusiastic encore, the effect of the composition (finely sung by Mr. Kenningham) being materially aided by a violin obbligato, well played by Mr. Frank Arnold. A song by Paolo Tosti, "At Vespers," given by Miss Madeline Hardy, and a Fantasia on the violin by Mr. Frank Arnold, were also amongst the successes of the evening. Mr. Charles T. Corke at the pianoforte, and Mr. J. F. E. Dovaston at the harmonium, proved most able accompanists; and Mr. Arthur J. Greenish conducted with much skill and judgment.

MISS JOHANNA HESS gave a Matinée Musicale on Tuesday, April 29, at Portsdown Road, at which she appeared in the double capacity of pianist and vocalist, playing, in conjunction with her brother and Herr Otto Leu, a Trio of Rubinstein, and singing the well-known Aria "O mio Fernando" and Buck's "When the heart is young" with artistic taste and finish. A feature of the Concert was the appearance of the concert-giver's brother, Master Alfred Hess, a most promising young violinist of fourteen, who recently made his début at Munich with much success, and who on this occasion contributed the Adagio and Finale of Max Bruch's Concerto in G minor and two of Brahms's "Hungarian Dances." He further proved his musical ability in the Trio above referred to, which, as all violinists recognise, presents difficulties of no mean order. The remainder of the programme was rendered by Miss Eva Lynn, Mr. Fred Wood, Mr. Ed. Levetus, Mr. J. Lynde, Miss Cecile Hartog (pianoforte), and Herr Otto Leu (violoncello), to the manifest gratification of a numerous audience. Miss M. Hendriks acted as accompanist.

AT the Concert at Queen's College, Oxford, on the 23rd ult., an interesting programme was provided, the prominent items being Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, Schumann's "Luck of Edenhall," Mrs. Meadows White's "Song of the Little Baltung," a Serenade for strings by Dr. Iliffe, and a Quartet for men's voices by Mr. Whishaw, the two latter written expressly for the Concert. Some of the "Cologne Choir" part-songs were also included, and were rendered with much refinement and vigour. This was the first occasion that Mrs. White's work had been heard with orchestral accompaniment, and the natural genial music made a great impression, the composer being heartily cheered at the close. Messrs. Tuckwell and Wonnacott deserve recognition for their work as soloists, and both band and choir worked hard and successfully.

THE Chalcots Glee Club gave its first Invitation Concert on Monday, the 19th ult., at St. Peter's Lecture Hall, Belsize Square, South Hampstead. The pieces performed were "Come boys drink" (Marschner), "Lovely night" (F. X. Chwatal), "A Franklyn's dogge" (A. C. Mackenzie), "At Andernach in Rhineland" (Abt), "Night in the forest" (Schubert), "Summer Eve" and "All things love thee" (J. L. Hatton), "A vintage song" (Loreley), and "The long day closes" (Sullivan). Mr. T. H. Lloyd contributed two songs; Mr. F. Peachey, jun., played two pianoforte solos; a Trio for violin, violoncello, and pianoforte (Gurlitt) was performed by Messrs. Arnold, Dovaston, and Greenish; and Mr. Frank Arnold (R.A.M.) gave a violin solo. The Concert was under the direction of Mr. Arthur J. Greenish, F.C.O.

THE second Annual Service of the Bloomsbury Church Choral Union was held on the 15th ult., in the Church of St. George the Martyr, Queen Square, when full choral evensong was performed by the united choirs under the able direction of Mr. E. H. Turpin, an appropriate sermon being delivered by the Rev. Dacre Craven, Rector of the church. The service was Hopkins in F, and the anthem Mendelssohn's Psalm xcvi., for double chorus, "Sing to the Lord," which received a capital rendering, the broad effects of the two choirs being especially well brought out. Recitals, before and after service, were given on the newly-completed organ by Messrs. W. G. Wood, A.R.A.M., and Walmisley Little, Mus. Bac., Mr. A. W. Constantine, the Organist of the church, playing during the service.

THE St. George's Glee Union gave its 184th monthly Concert at the Pimlico Rooms on the 2nd ult. The chief feature of the selection was "The May Queen" (Sir S. Bennett), the soloists being Miss Maud Cameron, Miss Jeanie Rosse, Mr. Edward Dalzell, and Mr. Frederick Bevan. The first part of the programme included solos by the artists before mentioned, and some part-songs by the choir, among which were:—"Now is the month of Maying" (Morley, 1595), "The Beleaguered" (Sir A. Sullivan), and "The Vikings" (Eaton Fanning). The accompaniments were played by Mr. and Mrs. F. R. Kinkeel at the pianoforte, and Mr. A. Randolph Armdell at the harmonium. The Concert was a great success, and reflected much credit on Mr. Joseph Monday, who conducted.

In the autumn of last year the town of Haverhill was presented with a Public Hall by Mr. and Mrs. Gurteen, in commemoration of their golden wedding, and at the same time their son, Mr. D. Gurteen, jun., announced his intention of placing an Organ in the Hall. This promise was fulfilled on the 23rd ult., when the instrument was opened at the last Concert of the twenty-fourth season of the Haverhill Choral Union. "The Messiah" was performed, under the direction of Mr. D. Gurteen, jun., Mr. J. T. Frye (of Saffron Walden) presiding at the organ, which has been built by Mr. Hedgeland (of London), and is a fine instrument of three manuals. The Hall and Organ were received on behalf of the town by W. W. Boreham, Esq., J.P.

THE East Finchley Choral Society gave its third, and last Concert of the present series in the Lecture Hall, on Tuesday, April 29. The principal item in the programme was Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," the solos being taken by Miss Berrie Stephens, Miss Katie Cox, and Mr. Reginald Groome; Mr. Greenslade conducted. The choruses were carefully rendered by the members of the Society. Miss Janes presided at the pianoforte and Mr. Edwin Drewett, R.A.M., at the harmonium. In the second part Mr. Jeaves conducted. Mendelssohn's Andante and Finale, from the Trio in D minor, was performed in an admirable manner by Mrs. Birch (pianoforte), Signor L. Meo (violin), and Mr. J. F. Lovelock (violoncello).

Stark presided at the harmonium, and Mr. Hutchinson conducted. The choruses were well given and showed signs of good training.

The instrumental works were a Pianoforte Trio in G minor, by Mr. Charles A. Trew, played by Mrs. Trew, Miss Adeline Dinelli, and Mr. G. Dinelli; a Suite de Pieces for the piano by Mr. Walter Macfarren, played by Mr. Arthur Dace; and a Sonata in A flat, for piano and violoncello, by Dr. Gustav Wolff, played by Miss Madeline Cronin and M. Albert. The vocal music consisted of two songs, "Light" and "Love's Carol," by Mr. Felix Adler, sung by Mlle. Anfresi, and two winter songs, by Mr. H. C. Banister, interpreted by Miss De Fonblanque.

MR. JOHN FAUX BOARDMAN, Organist and Director of the Choir at St. Saviour's Church, Herne Hill Road, gave a very successful Concert at Brixton Hall, on Tuesday evening, the 6th ult. Under the conductorship of the bénéficiaire a selection of part-music was given in a very commendable manner by members of the church choir and St. Saviour's Choral Society. Special mention is due to the interpretation of Kinross's part-song "A Psalm of Life," and W. Macfarren's "You stole my love," the latter being encored. The soloists were Miss Maud Cameron, Miss Patten, Miss Mary Horton, Mr. J. Holliday, and Mr. Franklin Clive. Mr. John Harrison presided at the pianoforte.

AT the Annual Evening Concert of Mr. J. T. Hutchinson, on April 30, at the Holborn Town Hall, a highly successful performance of Sir G. A. Macfarren's Cantata "The Lady of the Lake" was given, the principal singers being Miss Margaret Cockburn, R.A.M., Miss Damian, Mr. Henry Taylor, Mr. Theodore Distin, and Mr. J. T. Hutchinson. All the solos were excellently rendered, and the choral portions were given with admirable effect by a choir of seventy voices, the decisive and intelligent conducting of Mr. Windeyer Clark being worthy of warm commendation. Mr. E. H. Turpin presided at the organ, and Mr. Turle Lee at the pianoforte.

ON Thursday, the 22nd ult., Sir George Macfarren's Oratorio "King David" was given at the Athenæum, Highbury New Park, by the Islington Presbyterian Church Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. J. Conyers Keyne. The solo parts were assigned to Miss Ellen Atkins, Miss Alice Gray, Mr. Edwin Bryant, and Mr. W. G. Forington, and were excellently rendered. The choral portions of the work were given with marked effect, it being evident that the members of the choir had been carefully trained by their able Conductor. The accompaniments were well played by Mr. Fountain Meen (pianoforte) and Mr. W. Tate (Mustel organ).

THE organ in the church of St. George the Martyr, Queen Square (where Thomas Attwood was, we believe, at one time the organist), was re-opened on Wednesday, April 23, after having been extensively enlarged and restored by Mr. C. Robson, of Duke's Road, from the designs and specification of the Organist, Mr. A. W. Constantine. The appropriate and effective anthem by Dr. Bridge, "It is a good thing to give thanks," was well rendered by the choir of the church; and an interesting selection of organ music by Bach, Handel, Mendelssohn, &c., was played by Mr. E. H. Turpin, most effectively showing the improved qualities of the instrument.

ON Monday, the 5th ult., Mr. Reginald Groome gave his fourth Annual Concert, at the Athenæum, Camden Road, to a crowded audience. He was assisted by Madame Adeline Paget, Miss Mary Willis, Messrs. Arthur Thomas, George Ba-set, and Franklin Clive; solo pianoforte, Madame Bertha Field; solo violin, Miss Adeline Dinelli; cello, Giuseppe Dinelli. Conductors, Messrs. Field, Sladdin and Samson. Where all did well it would be invidious to particularise, except perhaps in the case of the bénéficiaire, whose rendering of "The meeting of the waters" was artistic in the extreme.

AN Organ Recital was given on the 3rd ult., at St. Paul's Church, Charlton, by Dr. C. J. Frost, who played Bach's Fugue in D, Ouseley's Rondo from Sonata No. 2, and other pieces by Wély, Batiste, and Collin. Vocal solos were contributed by Mr. H. T. Cooper, Mr. S. East, and Master H. Emus.

Corke, A.R.A.M., performed Mendelssohn's Rondo in B minor in a masterly manner; and Mr. Higgs, Organist of St. Marks, conducted.

THE Daily News says: "Shortly before his death Sir Michael Costa presented the whole of his library of scores, &c. (except those manuscripts previously given to the Library at Naples), to Mr. Alfred Mapleson, who had for many years acted as his librarian and copyist. The library filled a large van, and included MS. scores of Rossini's operas with extra wind parts added by Costa for performance at her Majesty's and the Royal Italian Opera, several original MS. scores, other full and vocal scores, and lastly the metronome which the eminent Conductor had for many years used."

MR. GERARD F. COBB will read the second portion of a paper on the principles of musical composition at the Musical Association on Monday afternoon the 2nd inst. The author denies that the phenomena of harmonics, beats, &c., furnish an explanation of the scale and the harmony of modern music. Musical sensibility, he contends, is one of the hidden facts of the brain on which physiology has as yet no light to throw, nor is there any such correspondence between its operations and the external laws of sound as to justify us in assuming for them a physical source or determination.

DR. C. J. FROST, who has recently become Organist and Choirmaster at St. Peter's, Brockley, in succession to Mr. Henry Gadsby, gave his first Organ Recital in that Church on Tuesday Evening, the 20th ult. The programme consisted of selections from the works of E. H. Thorne, C. E. Stephens, Moscheles, Mendelssohn, Widor, Guilmant and Lemmens, in all of which Dr. Frost brought out the powers of the instrument with his accustomed ability. A Fund is being formed to repair and improve the organ and a collection was made in aid of this object.

We sincerely trust that Mr. Adams's efforts to promote a taste for high-class music may meet with such support as will enable him to carry his scheme to a successful issue.

THE prospectus of the Brisbane Musical Union, which has just reached us, announces for the season 188 Mendelssohn's "Elijah" and "Hymn of Praise," Spohr's "Last Judgment," Van Bree's "St. Cecilia's Day," Romberg's "Lay of the Bell," and Gounod's "Redemption." The production of Gounod's work, it is said, "promises to be a musical event in Brisbane, and is a bold step which the Committee believe will be fully justified by the result. The Conductor of the Society is Mr. R. T. Jefferies.

On April 30 the St. Thomas's Choral Society gave its second Concert, at the Cavendish Rooms, Mortimer Street. The programme included a selection from Haydn's Oratorio "The Creation," in which the solos were very creditably given by Miss May Moon, R.A.M., Mr. R. Bennetts, and Mr. Weldon Hydon. The choruses were all well rendered and a selection of part-songs gave evident satisfaction. Mr. A. Wood was an efficient accompanist, and Mr. Parker Callcott conducted.

THE annual Festival of the Army Guild of the Holy Standard will be held in St. Paul's Cathedral, on Thursday, the 5th instant, at 7 p.m. The choir (of 400 voices) will be formed by the London Gregorian Association, assisted by a full military band, and will be under the direction of Mr. C. Warwick Jordan.

DR. STAINER'S "Daughter of Jairus" was performed on the 8th ult. by the St. George's (Hanover Square) Musical Society. The second part of the Concert included many favourite songs, glees, &c. The principal singers were Mrs. L'Estrange, Miss McEwen, Mr. A. M. Shepherd, R.A.M., and Mr. Frank May (prize medalist), R.A.M., all of whom received well-deserved applause. The chorus singing gave evidence of careful training. Mr. W. Pinney, Mus. Bac., conducted.

On the 5th ult. the St. Saviour's Choral Society, Battersea, gave its Annual Concert before a large audience. The part-songs were well rendered, and the principal vocalists, Miss Matthews, Mrs. W. Harward, Miss Lambourne, Mr. F. E. Choveaux, Mr. Searle, and Mr. Charles Wilson, were thoroughly appreciated. Miss Flanagan presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. W. H. Field conducted.

THE members of The Grosvenor Choral Society held their 146th Monthly Concert at the Grosvenor Hall on Friday, the 16th ult. The programme consisted of a miscellaneous selection. The vocal soloists were Miss Ellen Chapman, R.A.M., Miss Lottie West, Miss Jeanie Rosse, Mr. Hirwen Jones, and Mr. J. B. Caldwell. Mr. Algernon Rose contributed two pianoforte solos. Mr. David Woodhouse conducted and Miss Florence Hartley accompanied.

MR. EDMUND ROGERS gave his annual Concert, in Steinway Hall, on the 16th ult., when his two new Cantatas, "The Pilgrim's Progress" and "John Gilpin," were performed. The rendering of both works was in every respect satisfactory. The solos were well sung by Miss Adela Vernon, Miss Hyem, Mr. Alfred Kenningham, and Mr. Fred. Penna. Mr. C. T. Corke presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. Rogers conducted.

OWING to severe illness, Mr. Bradley has been compelled to postpone his Organ Lectures on Bach, announced for May, until this month. By the advertisement in our present number it will be seen that the lectures are to be given on the evenings of the 10th and 24th inst., July 1st and 7th. Applications for admission are to be addressed to the Secretary, Trinity College, London.

THE Kyrle Choir, under the direction of Mr. Malcolm Lawson, have given performances of "The Messiah" at the Welsh Wesleyan Chapel, City Road, on the 7th ult.; at Christ Church, St. George's-in-the-East, on the 15th ult.; and in St. Bride's Church, Fleet Street, on the 21st ult. Mr. E. H. Turpin presided at the organ on the 7th and 21st, and Mr. W. Tate on the 15th.

ON Tuesday evening, the 6th ult., the St. John's, Hackney Musical Society repeated, by desire, J. G. Callcott's Cantata "The Golden Harvest." Mr. W. M. Wait (Organist and Choirmaster, All Saints, Clapton) conducted.

WE are informed that the young violinist, Miss Adelina Dinelli, has lately received a recognition of her distinguished ability by the gift of a Straduaris violin.

AT the Annual General Meeting of the Edinburgh Choral Union, held on the 7th ult., Mr. A. C. Mackenzie was unanimously elected an honorary Vice-President.

REVIEWS.

Studien zur Geschichte der Französischen Musik. Von H. M. Schletterer. Parts I., II. [Berlin: R. Dammköhler.]

THE name of Dr. Schletterer will probably be new to all of our readers excepting the small minority who interest themselves in current German musical literature. He is one of the numerous hard working German musicians who devote themselves to antiquarian and historic research with an energy and a patience of which the Teutonic race appears to enjoy a monopoly. He at present holds the appointment of director of the music at the Cathedral of Augsburg, in which city he is also at the head of a musical academy. Though not unknown as a composer, he has chiefly earned his reputation by his literary works, the most important of which are the "Uebersichtliche Darstellung der Geschichte der geistlichen Dichtung und kirchlichen Musik"—a general survey of the history of sacred poetry and church music—and "Zur Geschichte der dramatischen Musik und Poesie in Deutschland"—a history of dramatic music and poetry in Germany. His reputation is likely to be enhanced by the publication of his "History of French music," the first two parts of which we have now to notice. Of these the first is the history of the "Chapelle Royale" of the French kings, while the second treats of the history of the guild of "Ménétriers" and of the so-called "Rois des violons" in France.

Dr. Schletterer has chosen, in both these sections of his work, subjects the treatment of which involves special difficulties, because the author has to deal very largely with that earlier time when the art and science of music were in their infancy. The amount of labour necessarily involved in the compilation of the materials can hardly be imagined excepting by an examination of the book itself; and the very character of the investigations required would naturally have a tendency to induce a certain heaviness in the author's style. After long working among musty old tomes and dust-covered manuscripts, it would not have been surprising had Dr. Schletterer been infected by the dryness of his surroundings; but it is one of his chief merits that he has made his book thoroughly interesting throughout. We are of course not in a position to test for ourselves the accuracy of many of his statements; we are, nevertheless, from the internal evidence of the work and from the manifest thoroughness with which the author has gone into his subject, quite prepared to receive him as a trustworthy authority.

The word "Chapelle," which originally means a chapel, is applied both in France and Germany to the artists, both vocal and instrumental, who take part in musical performances, sacred or secular. This meaning of the term may be seen in the word "Capellmeister," the German name for a Conductor—literally the director of a "Capelle," i.e., a chorus and orchestra. Thus by the "Chapelle Royale," or "Hofcapelle" (to use Dr. Schletterer's own word), to the history of which the first section of his work is devoted, is meant the singers and players who performed in the royal chapel, and not the building itself. In his introduction our author gives the etymology of the word "chapelle," which is interesting enough to deserve quotation:—

"Among the relics especially revered by the kings of France, was that cloak of St. Martin, Bishop of Tours, (died about 400 A.D.) which he, as he possessed nothing else, cut in half, to cover with one half of it the nakedness of a poor beggar, retaining the other half for himself. When the Merovingian kings undertook a crusade they always with great ceremony took this relic with their own hands from the tomb of the pious man, entrusting it to the special care of a reliable brave and exalted officer. The chest in which this cloak (chape) was kept, was called chapelle."

"... The clergy entrusted with its care were called chapelains. In a legal record of the time of Childebert III. (710, A.D.) the name "chapelle" is already found transferred to the royal oratory in which this devoutly revered chest was guarded and preserved. Since this time the word indicated that building, originally intended for divine service, in which the distinctive arrangements of a church, the font and chancel, were wanting. As choral performances were frequently held in these buildings the name was at last applied to those who regularly took part in such performances. Consequently, as it was the custom at the courts of princes to appoint musicians whose art was chiefly used for secular purposes (court festivities, &c.), the word already in vogue was made to serve also for musical societies unconnected with the church. In the present day the word "Capelle" is used to signify any body of musicians regularly working together, whether in the church, concert-room, theatre, or army."

The quotation we have just given furnishes a good example of Dr. Schletterer's style. As he commences his history with the period of the Merovingian kings—from 481, A.D.—it is obvious that, from a purely musical point of view, there can be but little to say in a great part of his volume, because music, as we understand it, is hardly more than three hundred years old. By means of biographical sketches and anecdotes, our author enlivens his text; and the arid desert over which he passes is relieved by so many oases that the reader pursues his journey without a feeling of weariness. A capital story is told of Charlemagne at Amiens, and an incompetent chorister (p. 27), which its length unfortunately prevents our quoting. Excellent notices are given of Hucbald, and of Guido d'Arezzo, the inventor of the present system of musical notation. The Discant and Faux-Bourdon are described, the former being a counterpoint, sometimes very florid, placed above the canto-fermo, while the latter was a three-part song, the upper part a fourth above and the lowest a third below the canto-fermo. The freedom of counterpoint of the discant appears to have degenerated into licence, to judge from some protests against it quoted by our author. J. Cotto, in the thirteenth century, says, speaking of Discant, that he can only compare the singers to drunken men, who luckily find their way home, but have no idea by what road; and De Muris says on the same subject, "How can men have the face to discant who know nothing at all of concords? their voices wander round the tenor without rule; by mere chance they throw their notes about like a stone, which, hurled by an unskilful hand, scarcely hits once in a hundred times." In another work, the "Speculum Musicæ," the same writer attacks singers in the following strong language:

"O roughness! O beastliness! to mistake an ass for a man, a goat for a lion, a sheep for a fish! just so they confound consonances and dissonances, so that one cannot distinguish the one from the other. They are like a blind man trying to cudgel a dog!" (p. 65).

Interesting notices are given of Adam de la Halle, Okeghem, and Dufay; and our author then treats of the old "mysteries." Some of these must have been of most unconscionable length, as they sometimes occupied a week in performance. Dr. Schletterer tells us of one written in the fifteenth century by Simon Greban, which contained 80,000 verses, and employed 485 dramatis personæ!

In Josquin des Prés our author considers that "we meet for the first time a composer who makes on us the impression of genius"; though he adds that too much pedantic artifice, in accordance with the taste of the time, is to be met with in some of the musician's works. A good anecdote is told of Josquin and his royal patron, Louis XII. The king was particularly fond of a certain popular song, and desired Josquin to arrange it for several voices, and to include a part for himself (Louis). The last condition was rather a puzzle for the composer, as the king knew nothing of music, and had a very bad and unpliant voice; however, he set to work, wrote a canon on the melody for two boys' voices, added a part for the king which he marked "Vox Regis," consisting of only one constantly repeated note, and placed below a bass part which he took himself. Those who have read Devrient's "Recollections of Mendelssohn" will remember that the same thing is done in the "Son and Stranger," the small part of Schulz (written for the painter Hensel) being all on one note. For another capital story of Josquin, unfortunately too long for quotation, we must refer readers to pp. 117 and 118 of the volume.

Church music must have been in what to us appears almost a ludicrous state in the fifteenth century. It is well known that many masses were composed in which popular tunes were taken as canti fermi; and Dr. Schletterer believes, apparently with good reason, that these melodies were sung to their original text, while the other voices sang portions of the liturgy. Imagine the tenors singing such words as "My husband has defamed me" or "Kiss me, my love," while the rest of the choir intoned "Kyrie Eleison" or "Agnus Dei." But the words seem to have been matters of altogether secondary consideration, since we find even the great Josquin setting to music with the utmost seriousness the genealogy of Christ.

We reluctantly pass over the interesting notes on French music in the sixteenth century, as well as the accounts of Lulli and the celebrated "petits violons du roi," to come to a more modern period. When we reach the time of the First Empire familiar names crowd the pages. Paisiello, the formerly popular, though now almost forgotten, opera composer, was director of music to Napoleon when First Consul; he was succeeded by Lesueur, the precursor of Berlioz as a composer of programme-music, of whose life an excellent sketch is given. In Appendix C to the volume, the list of the members both of Napoleon's "Capelle"—

i.e., full choir and orchestra—and of his "Privatmusik" is given. The former, conducted by Lesueur, and with Piccinni as one of the accompanists, included names no less eminent than those of Madame Branchu, Nourrit, and Derivis in the vocal, and R. Kreutzer, Baillot, Tulou, and Vogt in the instrumental department; while Ferdinando Paër was Conductor of the Emperor's private music, and Crescentini was among the singers. After the restoration, the royal music appears in a state of even greater splendour. Under Charles X. the conductorship was shared by Lesueur and Cherubini. A full account is given of the coronation of the monarch, for which occasion Cherubini composed his celebrated mass in A; and it is interesting to learn that the chorus at the ceremonial consisted of twenty sopranos, twenty altos, twenty-eight tenors, and twenty-eight basses; while in the orchestra there were sixty-six strings, twenty-eight wind, and eight percussion instruments—a very different proportion, it will be observed, to that which usually prevails in this country.

We have designedly devoted the greater part of our notice to the first part of Dr. Schletterer's work, because it is of more general interest than the second, which treats of the Corporation of Minstrels. It must not be thence inferred that we consider this latter section inferior to the first; but it will attract the attention of specialists more than of the average reader. We have wholly failed in our purpose if we have not succeeded in showing that the author has produced a work not only of high historical value, but of an eminently readable character. To those who are acquainted with the German language we cordially recommend it.

Original Compositions for the Organ. No. 33. Sonata. By Oscar Wagner. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

In our last December number we noticed some "Miniatures" for the organ by this composer. The present is a far more important work, and one calculated to tax the executive capacity of skilled organists. It commences with a brief but stormy and restless allegro risoluto, in E minor ostensibly, but so full of chromatic passages in chords and arpeggios that the tonality is vague and the effect confused and unsatisfactory. Far more pleasing is the next movement, a flowing and melodious largo in C, as simple in outline as the allegro is wild and involved. The final allegro molto is a partial return to storm and stress, but relief is afforded by one melodious theme which appears twice in the course of the movement. The composer does not seem to have made up his mind whether the Italian or his native tongue is to be preferred for musical terms. It is rather confusing, for example, to read "sehr zart, pp.;" or "sehr breit, rallentando," and the like.

Rustic Coquette. Ballet for four voices. Poetry by Dibdin, junior. Music by F. Champneys.

Evening. Four-part Song. Poetry by the Rev. H. C. Shuttleworth. Music by George C. Martin.

O, too cruel fair (Crudelissima Donna). Madrigal for Five Voices. Music by W. S. Rockstro.

The Miller's Wooing. A Choral Ballad. Poetry by Julia Goddard. Music by Eaton Fanning.

When twilight dews. Poetry by Thomas Moore. Music by James L. Gregory, F.C.O.

The East Indian. Four-part Song. Poetry by Thomas Moore. Music by James L. Gregory, F.C.O.

When at Corinna's eyes I gaze. Madrigal for Five Voices. Written and composed by Charles H. Lloyd.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THESE songs are published in "Novello's Part-Song Book" (Second Series), and may be cordially commended to Choral Societies in search of novelty. Mr. Champneys' song, which stands first on our list, is well expressive of the quaint words selected by the composer, the change into the tonic minor, to illustrate the mournful result of the rustic's coquetry, being extremely happy. "Evening" is a placid melody, appropriately harmonised, easy to sing and certain to please. Mr. Rockstro's Madrigal, containing fragments of well-known plain chants, is a good specimen of genuine artistic workmanship. It is written throughout in the true Madrigal spirit, and deserves, as it will no doubt obtain, a widely-spread recognition of its merits.

Mr. Eaton Fanning will materially add to his rapidly increasing fame by "The Miller's Wooing," for which he has written orchestral parts, as well as a pianoforte accompaniment. It is a thoroughly descriptive little work, full of good dramatic points, and likely to obtain as much popularity as his "Song of the Vikings." Although no doubt the effect of the piece will be materially aided by the accompaniment of an orchestra, we may say that the pianoforte part is extremely well written. There is but little attempt to do more than colour Moore's words with a sympathetic melody in Mr. Gregory's "When twilight dews," and the same may be said of his "East Indian"; but there is much refinement in his treatment of both these songs, and the excellent manner in which they are harmonised entitles the composer to unqualified praise. Mr. Charles H. Lloyd is his own poet in the five-part Madrigal "When at Corinna's eyes I gaze," and we are bound to say that in both words and music he has proved himself a genuine artist. Apart from the melodious character of his work, the counterpoint throughout is of a very high order; and we earnestly draw the attention of Madrigal Societies to a composition of such exceptional excellence.

The Fays' Frolic. A Cantata for Female Voices.
Written by Edward Oxenford. Composed by Franz Abt.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THERE can be no question that Franz Abt has a special talent for composing Cantatas for female voices; and the many who have experienced much gratification from hearing such charming little drawing-room Operas as "The Water Fairies," "The Silver Cloud," "The Wishing Stone," &c., will be glad to find that the list has been recently enriched by the publication of the one before us. The argument of the "Fays' Frolic" states that in Fairyland it is the custom for all the Fairies, Fays, and Elves to gather together on a certain day in the Spring of each year, in order to do homage to the Fairy Queen, who, in return, graciously accedes to whatever reasonable requests her subjects may make for the ensuing year. The Queen dwells with her Court on a beautiful island in the Southern Seas, whither the fairies flock and indulge in songs and dances. After a brief introduction the vocal part begins with a melodious chorus, amongst the many beautiful points in which may be mentioned a change from E to C major, which is not only effective in itself, but thoroughly in sympathy with the words. A Recitative and Air for soprano, although appropriately unpretending, have sufficient interest to engage the attention of the audience; and the succeeding Duet, for soprano and mezzo-soprano, "Full often, when the world's at rest," preceded by a Choral Recitative, is a charming composition, which would assuredly take rank even apart from the work in which it appears. After a well-written Chorus, an excellent contralto solo, "Welcome, sisters, here to-day," occurs, the effect of which is much heightened by some extremely refined figures in the accompaniment. The following chorus, "O silv'ry moon, raise up the lamp," accompanied throughout in triplets, and the Trio, Chorus, and Finale, "Across the sea now hasten we," bring to a conclusion one of the most fascinating little Operettas for the family circle we have yet seen, and one the popular character of which must ensure for it an enduring appreciation.

The Hymn Te Deum Laudamus. By the Rev. Francis Pott.
[Rivingtons.]

THIS volume commences with an essay on the Te Deum considered in its historical and literary aspects, after which the other canticles are discussed in like manner but more briefly. The practical object in view is to bring about a more correct musical rendering of these portions of the liturgy, and especially of the Ambrosian Hymn, which has suffered not a little in the process of translation. Thus, as the Rev. Mr. Pott observes, "the pronoun Te, Tibi, Tu, which in the Latin stands so emphatically first in every verse where it occurs at all, has been deprived of its force by the translator, who, apparently not seeing the loss incurred thereby, has varied its position much more freely than the English idiom demanded." The writer inclines to the belief in a dual authorship of the Te Deum, not only from the difference in style of the last eight verses, but from the fact that ancient MSS. exist in which these verses are wanting. The remarks on the principles of true antiphonal singing are valuable and may be commended to the notice of the clergy and organists. The attention of church composers may also be directed to this little volume, which contains much that will be serviceable to them in the task of setting the canticles, and did space permit we might quote many points of interest, not because we agree with everything the author advances, but because he opens up questions the full discussion of which may be fruitful in results. The book is not so well put together as it might be. The superabundance of footnotes makes it tiresome reading, and there is no valid reason why the matter contained in most of them should not have been incorporated in the regular text.

A Festival March for the Organ. By E. C. Bentall.
[Conrad Herzog and Co.]

THE composer of this piece has apparently little regard for the dignity of style which should surely characterise music written for the "king of instruments." Festive Marches may be spirited and brilliant of course, but they need not be flippant and trivial, which Mr. Bentall's piece certainly is. At the same time, it is undeniably tuneful, and amateurs of a certain class would pronounce it "sweetly pretty." On page four, line four, the left hand part is erroneously given in the bass clef, the treble being obviously intended.

Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in E flat. By James Langran.

Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in F. By Thomas Adams.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

MR. LANGRAN'S setting of the evening canticles is intended for parish choirs, and is therefore designedly simple. It flows along in plain four-part harmony without so much as a double bar except at the "Gloria Patri." Mr. Adams's version is, on the contrary, divided into many sections, some of which are for solo voices. The Service cannot, however, be described as elaborate, contrapuntal writing being indulged in to a very limited extent, while the harmonies are, for the most part, diatonic.

Impromptu pour le Violon; avec accompagnement de Pianoforte ou d'Orchestra. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Romance, pour le Violon; avec accompagnement de Piano. [Augener and Co.]

Par Christian Ersfeld.

AMONGST the graceful and melodious trifles for drawing-room performance these pieces may be conscientiously recommended to amateur violinists, who are often at a loss for duets with the pianoforte which shall not seriously tax the powers of either performer. Of the two we prefer the Impromptu, in G minor and G major, which, as will be seen, has orchestral accompaniments; but the Romance has decided merit, and is a fair specimen of an unpretending sketch for unpretending players.

La Pluie de Perles. Pour Piano. Par G. A. Osborne.

The Harmonious Blacksmith. Composed by Handel.

Invitation à la Valse. Composed by C. M. von Weber.
[Frederick Pitman.]

WE have selected the above three pianoforte pieces from a large number of popular works lately issued in a collection called the "Paternoster Row Edition." As no notice of such well-known compositions can be expected, our attention is naturally directed to the examination of any new feature in this edition; and finding "Edited and Fingered by Arthur H. Brown" on the title-pages, we can only presume that they are forwarded to us for a review upon the method of fingering adopted. We have, of course, no desire to force any system of our own upon others, but when we see in "The Harmonious Blacksmith" legato passages broken by the fingering—as in bar 1, line 3, and in bar 2, line 4, of the first variation, where the fourth finger is taken off E and placed upon the A below it—we are bound to protest against it simply because the music cannot be played as the composer intended. We may say, however, that the pieces are carefully edited and excellently got up.

The Thistle. A Miscellany of Scottish Song. With Notes Critical and Historical. By Colin Brown. Instrumental Accompaniments and Harmonies by James Merry-lee, A.C.

[London and Glasgow: William Collins, Sons and Co., Limited.]

HAD this book no other claim upon our notice than the fact of its being an excellent collection of Scottish songs, appropriately harmonised and accompanied, it would certainly deserve an extensive sale. But it has also a powerful attraction in the "Introduction to Scottish Music," contributed by Mr. Colin Brown, Euing Lecturer on the Science, Theory, and History of Music at Anderson's College, Glasgow, who tells us in his Preface that "the principles and construction of Scottish music have been misunderstood, and its peculiar characteristics so strangely mistaken that much of the music has been misrepresented by erroneous notation, and also by an application of the laws of harmony out of keeping with the genius and structure of the melodies." Many practical proofs of the truth of this assertion are given in the course of the volume; and we are certain that all genuine lovers of these old tunes will peruse the book with the utmost interest. It is truly said that although the pentatonic form of the scale is used in Scottish melodies, it is almost as much so in the national music of other countries; and there are innumerable tunes of undoubted Scotch origin where the fourth and seventh are freely used. Mr. Brown, indeed, says that we find Scottish music constructed upon the seven modes, on the same principle as the ancient Greek modes and the Gregorian tones, three of these modes being major and four minor. Anxious enquirers into this matter must be referred to the book itself, where ample proofs will be found of the soundness of the Euing lecturer's investigations upon the subject.

Trois Petites Esquisses. No. 1, Promenade; No. 2, Polonia; No. 3, Petite Chaconne. Pour le Piano. Par G. Bachmann. [William Czerny.]

THESE three well-written and effective trifles may be commended to teachers who desire that the simple music which they supply to their pupils shall shadow forth the style and feeling of more elaborate compositions. No. 1 has a pleasing legato theme, appropriately harmonised; No. 2, although reminding us perhaps too much of Chopin, is sufficiently characteristic to justify its title; and No. 3 is not only flowing and melodious, but an excellent study for young players, who cannot be too early taught that the left hand should not be a mere attendant upon the right.

La Harpe Eolienne. Nocturne pour Piano. Par J. Leybach. [Joseph Williams.]

SUCH elegant trifles for the pianoforte as the composer of this piece has occasionally given us are worthy of favourable mention, although not calling for any detailed criticism. An original composition of any kind has always more claim to our attention than the so-called "Fantasia" upon well-known airs, in most of which some of the tenderly loved and unassuming friends of our early days are so mercilessly disfigured as to be scarcely recognisable. "La Harpe Eolienne," perhaps, may do as well as any other title for the sketch before us; but considering that it is merely built upon a graceful melody in 12-8 rhythm, and that—unless a chromatic scale is presumed to represent it—the "eolian" effect is nowhere observable, we should have preferred to accept the piece simply on its own merits as a "Nocturne." Like all Leybach's works, it is well written for the instrument, and not too difficult for moderately advanced players.

Lcs Cloches du Village. Pour Piano. Par G. Ferraris. [Forsyth Brothers.]

THIS characteristic and effective little piece, although bearing a somewhat conventional title, is deserving of warm commendation. The figure given out at the commencement is ingeniously preserved throughout the composition; and, though in the unusual key of F sharp major, it will not be found difficult either to read or to execute. Apart from its attractive musical qualities, we can conscientiously recommend the piece as an excellent study for touch in both hands.

Pitman's new Pianoforte Tutor. By Arthur H. Brown. [F. Pitman.]

As this Tutor has been recently published, it may unquestionably be termed "new"; but, on a close examination of the work, we fail to discover anything novel in its contents. The arrangement of the material, however, is extremely good, and the explanation of all that it is necessary for young pupils to become acquainted with is, with few exceptions, so clear, as to be easily understood. Let us, however, at once say that we do not think a child should be told that "B sharp is played on C," but that B sharp is played on the white key more frequently called C. Again, we cannot see what the author means by saying "the spaces of the treble staff collectively form the word Face"; so also do the three lines both above and below it." Assuredly, notes upon three lines cannot spell a word of four letters; and it is obvious, therefore, that Face can only be spelt by taking in one of the staff lines. The lessons throughout the book are not only well selected, but carefully arranged; and the occasional introduction of chants and hymn tunes is a feature deserving commendation. There is also a brief dictionary of Italian terms used in music, with an attempt to give the correct pronunciation by means of English letters, a task in which the author has, we think, been fairly successful. Descriptive words in other languages have, however, iatterly so crept into musical publications that many of these must also be included in Tutors which profess to keep pace with the time.

Collection of Celebrated Violin Duets. Selected, progressively arranged, and edited by J. T. Carrodus. [F. Pitman.]

STUDENTS of the violin will find this an excellent selection of works for practice. The eight books—containing pieces by F. Derckam, M. Gebauer, J. Pleyel, J. W. Kalliwoda, J. B. Viotti, and L. Spohr—are so carefully arranged in the order of difficulty as to lead the pupil slowly, but surely, onward; the talent and large practical experience of Mr. Carrodus affording a sufficient guarantee, not only of the merit of the duets chosen, but of the able manner in which they are edited.

Te Deum and Jubilate in G. By T. Creswell Dean. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS setting of the "Morning Canticles" would be known in Cathedral choirs as a full service, no solo voices being required. At the same time its distinctive features are neither brevity nor simplicity. Though the display of contrapuntal skill is extremely modest, the accompaniment is for the most part independent of the voice parts. The composer indulges freely in transitions of key, and repeats words and sentences at pleasure in order to secure the desired musical effect. In general the style is vigorous rather than melodic, and modern without being unchurch-like.

FOREIGN NOTES.

THE announcement which we are able to make of the discovery, at Leipzig, of two hitherto unknown compositions by Beethoven—viz., two complete Cantatas, one commemorative of the death of the Emperor Joseph II., and the other celebrating the accession to the vacated throne of Leopold II. of Austria—will be hailed with satisfaction and delight by every amateur. We refer our readers to the more detailed notice of the event given in another column.

We are glad to notice in German papers that it is proposed to erect a statue of Carl Maria von Weber at his native town of Eutin, in Holstein, to be inaugurated in connection with the centenary of his birth on December 18, 1886. There is abundant reason why Englishmen should take an active interest in the homage thus proposed to be offered to the genius of a composer whose "Der Freischütz" has been the most popular opera of foreign origin ever presented on the English stage, and whose "Oberon" was written, by the dying hand of the master, for England. Subscriptions for the purpose indicated will be received by the Honorary President, Freiherr von Liliencron, Schleswig, Germany.

We extract the following from the Allgemeine Deutsche Musikzeitung, of Berlin:—"On the occasion of the recent funeral of the actor La Roche, at Vienna, Herr Oberkirchenrath Witz-Stöber delivered an oration which has produced a deal of sensation on all sides, and which, moreover, contrasts strangely with the effusive strictures relative to art and religion, indulged in by a certain portion of the press at the time of the first performances of Wagner's 'Parsifal' 'Who would have credited,' the reverend speaker remarked inter alia, 'who would have credited some few decades since, when La Roche first commenced his most successful career, that a member of his profession would ever become the recipient of such marks of honourable distinction as were so justly conferred upon him? Times, however, have changed in this respect; and whom have we to thank for this change? Surely, in the first place, the great artists themselves, whose legitimate successor La Roche was. They have submitted their whole natures to the refining influence of true art, they have conquered their own position in society; they have compelled the world to recognise their just claims as fellow-labourers in the grand task of the moral education and elevation of human society.' . . . It is gratifying to meet with such language emanating from a high clerical quarter; gratifying to see, for once, the possibilities of the stage, as a morally ennobling agent, admitted into a co-relationship with the church on the part of one of its ministers, whose personal views are evidently not hampered by a want of courage to express them in public."

The project has been gaining ground lately of establishing, somewhere in Germany, a "Richard Wagner Museum," or national collection of mementos connected with the late reformer and his works, similar to those already established at Salzburg and at Frankfort, with reference respectively to Mozart and Goethe. The interesting scheme appears to have been initiated by Herr Oesterlein, of Vienna, in his recently published pamphlet entitled "Entwurf zu einem Richard Wagner Museum," while important offers have already been made on the part of distinguished collectors in support of the cause. Amongst the latter may be mentioned Herr Emerich Kastner (editor of the new music journal Parsifal), who has generously proffered his entire collection of Wagneriana, comprising some 6,000 numbers, in the event of the project being realised.

A monument, sufficient funds for which had been collected for some time past, is at last to be erected, at Darmstadt, to the Abbé Vogler, the profound, if somewhat erratic, theorist and composer; the revered master, moreover, of C. M. von Weber, and Meyerbeer, in which latter capacity he will doubtless be longest remembered in the annals of musical history. Meanwhile the people of Darmstadt will offer but a tardy tribute of gratitude in erecting a memorial to one whose personality and acquired fame have added not a little to the artistic influence once exercised by the small residential town under its first Grand Duke.

Three private representations of Wagner's "Parsifal" were given in the early part of last month at the Munich Hof-Theater, when the eccentric King Louis of Bavaria formed, as usual, the sole audience.

A new Oratorio by Friedrich Kiel was recently performed for the first time by the Berlin Academy of Arts, under the direction of Professor Joachim. The new work, which bears the title of "The Star of Bethlehem," created a profound impression, and, like some of its predecessors from the same pen, is said to be entitled to a foremost place among the sacred compositions of the present day.

The following was the interesting programme of leading performances in connection with the twenty-fifth annual meeting of the Allgemeine Deutsche Musik-Verein, held at Weimar during the five days from the 23rd and 27th of last month, viz.—Scenic representation (at the Hof-Theater) of Liszt's "St. Elizabeth," Berlioz's "Te Deum," Raff's Oratorio "Weltende," Symphonies (Draeseke, Lassen, and Glasuoff); violin concertos (Raff and St. Sâens); piano-forte Concertos (Brassin and D'Albert); Kaisermarch (Wagner); Chamber-works (Volkmann and Brahms); "Graner Featresse" (Liszt); concluding with (at the Hof-Theater) Felix Weingärtner's Opera "Sakuntala." Franz Liszt was expected to be present.

The twenty-fifth anniversary of the existence of the Male Choir Association of Bonn (the native town of Beethoven) will be celebrated on the 10th and 11th of August next. The festive proceedings are to include a competition, on a grand scale, of similar associations from all parts of the Fatherland; among the contributors of prizes being the Empress and the Crown Prince and Princess of Germany.

Victor E. Nessler's new three act Opera "Der Trompeter von Säckingen," was brought out at the Leipzig Stadt-Theater, on the 4th ult., and achieved a decided success, which has been confirmed by subsequent repetitions. The subject of the new work is borrowed from Scheffel's deservedly popular epic poem of the same title, and appeals thus à priori to the sympathies of German hearers; a circumstance which the writer of the libretto, Herr Rudolf Bunge, is said to have availed himself of with considerable skill. The music is generally admitted to be on a level with the same composer's "Piper of Hamelin," recently introduced to London audiences.

The "Zelter'sche Liedertafel" (Male Quartet Society) of Berlin celebrated in an appropriate manner the twenty-fifth anniversary of its formation last month. The Society is the oldest of its kind in Germany, having been founded by Zelter—the whilom Berlin professor, the friend of Goethe, and the early instructor of Mendelssohn—in the year 1809, and it originally fostered a distinctly patriotic tendency, which burst into full blossom during the wars of liberation of the Fatherland a few years later. The present Conductor of the "Liedertafel" is Herr Blummer.

It is stated that the number of existing Wagner Societies, both in Germany and elsewhere, is 300, comprising some 5,000 members—not a very overwhelming army, numerically, but constituting a sufficient phalanx for an active propaganda. According to arrangements recently concluded, special facilities will be accorded to members for the purpose of visiting the annually recurring representations of the "Festspiele" at Bayreuth.

The grand historical town of Aachen (Aix la Chapelle) is already busy with preliminary preparations for a music festival of exceptional proportions, to be held there next year, and intended to combine the celebration of the second centenary of the birth of Bach and Handel—the two great masters of polyphonus art having been born within a year of each other. According to the present scheme, two days of the Festival will be devoted to the works of the Centenarians, and a third to those of Liszt; an association the appropriateness of which some of the ardent admirers of the two first-named masters may feel inclined to question.

The inauguration of the Bach monument, at Eisenach, referred to in our last issue, has had to be postponed in consequence of a flaw in the cast of the statue. It will now take place on September 28 next, with the programme already indicated.

A conservatorium is to be founded in the coming autumn at Carlsruhe, under the special patronage of the Grand Duchess of Baden. Herr Vincenz Lachner, the well-known composer and chief Conductor at the Carlsruhe Hof-Theater, has been nominated director of the projected institution.

Theodor Wachtel, the veteran German tenor, whose extraordinary range of voice first astonished the world of amateurs some thirty years ago, is becoming equally phenomenal as regards the exceptional preservation of his vocal powers. Wachtel recently sang, for the gooth time, his favourite part of Chapelou, in the "Postillon de Lonjumeau," at the Walhalla Theatre of Berlin. It should be added, however, that the singer's répertoire has always been an exceedingly limited one.

Professor Wüllner, of Dresden, has been nominated successor to Dr. Ferdinand von Hiller as Principal of the Cologne Conservatorium, and Conductor of the Gürzenich Concerts.

M. Padeloup, the founder and Conductor of the Concerts Populaires at Paris, has decided to relinquish an undertaking with which his name has been for so many years associated. For twenty-three years M. Padeloup has wielded his bâton at these Concerts enthusiastically, yet discreetly, fighting, in more than one instance, like a gallant general, the battle of true art against either the prejudice or the perverted taste of his countrymen. In withdrawing now from the strife, M. Padeloup does so as a conqueror, leaving the field to those who have imitated his example—M. Colonne and M. Lamoureux—and who are likely to reap the substantial benefit of his exertions—a satisfaction which, it would seem, has been denied to him in the measure he deserved. A grand benefit Concert was announced to be given to the originator of the Populaires at the Paris Trocadéro, on the 31st ult., at the instigation of M. Colonne, the Conductor of the Châtelet Concerts. We shall be much mistaken if, in our next issue, we are not able to report the vast building in question to have been crowded in its every part on the occasion referred to, which indeed will be the case if only young musical France will pay its tribute of gratitude to one to whom, in the matter of true artistic progress and taste, it owes so much.

According to a statistical notice just published, the average receipts during the past season of the three leading orchestral Concert institutions of Paris have been for each performance as follows: Châtelet Concerts (Conductor, M. Colonne), 8,895 francs; Château d'Eau Concerts (Conductor, M. Lamoureux), 4,400 francs; Concerts Populaires (Conductor, M. Padeloup), 3,723 francs.

A new opera, by M. E. Diaz, entitled "Benvenuto Cellini," will, according to Le Ménestrel, be brought out next season at the Paris Theatre Italien. As Berlioz has written a fine opera of the same title, M. Diaz's venture must be considered a somewhat bold one.

It is stated on good authority that the new opera upon which Verdi has been for some time engaged will be founded upon Shakespeare's "Othello," following the lines of that drama pretty closely. Arrigo Boito, the composer of "Mefistofele," has furnished his veteran brother-artist with the libretto, which, amongst other matters of stage "business," introduces a comic element, in a Shakespearian sense, in the persons of Cassio and Rodrigo. Verdi is said to be taking especial pains in the elaboration of this composition, the idea for which he conceived long ago. An "Ave Maria," to be sung by the ill-fated Desdemona on the occasion of her final meeting with her equally hapless husband, will prove, it is asserted, the gem of the last act. Little enough has, however, so far transpired regarding the maestro's progress with the score of the new work, the title of which will probably be some other than "Othello" to avoid the appearance of rivalry with Rossini's opera of that name, and for which, it is said, Verdi himself entertains a special reverence.

On the occasion of the opening of the Turin Science and Art Exhibition, on April 26, a festive Cantata, composed by the Maestro Faccio, was performed in the Rotunda of the building, which, our correspondent assures us, is a perfect success both as regards artistic beauty and acoustically.

The Antique Art Commission in connection with the above exhibition have conceived the interesting idea of constructing a theatre at Turin on the model of that which existed in that town in the 16th century, and of representing there the "Adonis" of A. Poltlen, with a mise-en-scène entirely in conformity with that in vogue during the period in question. Poltlen died in the year 1494.

Signor Tamberlik, the Nestor among operatic tenors, has lately given two farewell Concerts at St. Petersburg to crowded and enthusiastic audiences; the substantial net result having been 13,000 rubles.

An interesting pamphlet concerning Wagner's last stay at La bella Venezia, with some characteristic remarks as to the personality of the poet-composer, has been published at Venice. The title is "Wagner a Venezia," and the author, Dr. G. Norlenghi.

Beethoven's "Fidelio"—if continental journals be rightly informed—will be produced for the first time at St. Petersburg during next season—i.e., some seventy years after the first production of this sublime masterpiece at Vienna. The announcement appears scarcely credible, and certainly does not reflect favourably upon the artistic life of one of the leading capitals of Europe, which, moreover, annually lavishes such enormous sums upon its favourite prime donne.

A musical Dictionary, the first of its kind in the Dutch language, has just been published at Amsterdam. The author is M. H. Viotta.

The death is announced, at St. Petersburg, on the 17th ult., of M. Louis Brassin, who during the last six years has been a leading professor at the Conservatoire of the Russian capital, and whose eminent and sympathetic qualities as a pianist will be well remembered by English concert-goers. M. Brassin, it appears, was expected to have taken an active share in the proceedings of the annual meeting of the Association of German Musicians, referred to in the Weimar paragraph of our present "Notes."

Friedrich Smetana, the gifted Bohemian composer, a pupil of Liszt (whom he emulated in a series of "Symphonic Poems" of considerable merit), and founder of a Conservatoire at Prague, died at that town last month, at the age of sixty.

FREE ORGAN RECITALS IN LONDON.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—I have read with interest your remarks as to "Free Organ Recitals in London."

I think it would be a waste of money for the Corporation to build an organ in the Guildhall while there are so many halls with organs in various parts of London, any of which could be hired and a duly qualified organist appointed.

Moreover, I don't think that those who know London well would consider the Guildhall its "Town Hall." The only building in London at all worthy of such a name is, surely, the Royal Albert Hall. Now, in this hall there is, as all Londoners know, a magnificent organ, on which, however, Recitals are hardly ever given, and I would suggest, if the Corporation can hire the hall from the Commissioners, that they appoint their organist, and that the Recitals be started forthwith. The gallery and balcony should be free, which would accommodate about 6,800, and a small charge might be made for the arena and other parts of the hall. Programmes should be free, of course.

The District Railway puts the Albert Hall in rapid and frequent communication with all parts of London, and, I think, considering the hall's great size, and fine organ, it is especially adapted for the object in view.

I shall be happy to contribute to any preliminary expenses that may be incurred, and I would suggest that if the Corporation won't move in the matter an influential committee be formed to carry out the above scheme, the cost of which, I feel sure, would be readily met by annual subscriptions from the musical public of London.

I am, Sir, your obedient Servant,

STANLEY A. BURRELL.

93, Bedford Road, Clapham.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—The reference in your editorial remarks in the April number of THE MUSICAL TIMES to the organless state of the Guildhall in London induces me to ask a question now which I had intended doing at a later period of the year. I should be very much obliged if you or some kind reader would tell me if any periodical Organ Recitals are given in London during the summer and early autumn months. No Concerts of a superior description are advertised in the daily papers, except those at the Crystal Palace on Saturday evenings, under the direction of Mr Manns, and these are seriously marred by the promenading and talking of many of the audience. I am but a recent peruser of your excellent periodical, and trust you will excuse my thus intruding on your correspondence columns. My own musical performances are nil, and my musical friends are mostly away from town, so that the periodical is inexpressibly dull to one whose principal recreation is high-class music.

L. S. POWELL.

THE ALTO VOICE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—May I crave a space in your valuable paper to protest against the gradual disuse of the "alto" voice by our leading Choral Societies? It is, I think, a very great mistake to do away with altos and substitute contraltos oratorio music, at all events. Curiously enough, at one of our most celebrated choirs this is being gradually done, as I am informed, through the Conductor holding the opinion of ladies' superiority, while he himself is an alto, and has had several relatives in the profession with that voice. Hoping my protest will avail to lessen this (as I conceive) injustice to a very useful and beautiful voice,

I remain, Sir, yours faithfully,

WILLIAM S. ANDERSON.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

ABERDEEN.—An excellent Concert was given by the members of the Choral Society, in the Music Hall, on Tuesday, April 29, under the conductorship of Mr. John Murray. Vocal solos were contributed with much success. Miss Hadden was an able accompanist.

ABINGDON.—The Musical Association's Concert, on the 19th ult., the last of the season, was, musically, a great success. Mendelssohn's As the hart pants, Hiller's Song of Victory, and a short miscellaneous selection formed the programme, and the performance bore evidence of careful study and practice on the part of the band and chorus. Miss Marianne Fenna, in both the above works, and in her song "Precious stones" (Moir), met with great and deserved applause. Herr Gustave Mirsch performed the Adagio from the Violin Concerto of Max Bruch, and Mrs. Slade Baker played, as a pianoforte solo, Rubinstein's Study in C major. Mr. R. Grice, who was evidently a favourite with the audience, sang two songs in capital style. Mr. Fred. K. Couldrey conducted as usual.

ABROATH.—At the Annual Social Meeting of the Amateur Orchestral Society, held on Friday, April 25, Mr. T. Booth, the Conductor, was presented with a handsome marble timepiece, in recognition of his valuable services; and was also the recipient of a present from the same Society for his services as leader.

ASHBOCKING, SUFFOLK.—On Sunday afternoon, the 11th ult., an Organ Recital was given, for the first time, in the Parish Church, by Mr. J. Marsh, Organist of the Parish Church, New Walsingham, Norfolk. On Wednesday, the 14th ult., a Concert of Sacred Music was given in the schoolroom. The programme included selections for the harmonium, and, between the parts, two violin solos, by Mr. J. Marsh, accompanied by Mrs. Cowell, the vicar's wife. There was an appreciative audience, and every detail was most satisfactory. The proceeds were given to the Ipswich and East Suffolk Hospital.

BEDFORD.—The Musical Society gave its second Concert of the season on the 13th ult., when Cowen's Rose Maiden was successfully performed and well received by the audience. The Wedding Chorus was encored, and many other numbers greatly applauded. The accompaniments were played with much taste and discretion by the band. Miss M. S. Eveleigh (a member of the Society) took the soprano solos in a very artistic manner, the other soloists being Madame Mudie Bolingbroke, Mr. Abercrombie, and Mr. Cecil Higgins. The second part included the Overture to Figaro, some songs and part-songs, and a harp solo by Mr. John Cheshire. Mr. P. H. Diemer conducted with much skill.

BISHOP'S STORTFORD.—The Choral Society gave its first Concert on Tuesday, April 29, in the Great Hall, before a large and attentive audience. The first part consisted of Dr. Stainer's St. Mary Magdalen, and the second part was miscellaneous. The soloists were Miss Cosford, Miss E. Thomas, Mr. A. W. H. Hagyard, and Mr. Frank Ward, all of whom were highly efficient. The chorus singing was, on the whole, very good. The piano and harmonium were played respectively by Mrs. P. Sharpe and Mr. F. R. Adams; Mr. P. Sharpe, A.Mus., T.C.L., conducting. The Concert, both artistically and financially, was very successful.

BOURNEMOUTH.—The members of the St. Michael's Choral Society gave an evening Concert at the Town Hall, on the 1st ult., under the conductorship of Mr. T. A. Aldridge. The principal vocalists were Miss Emily Paget (medalist of the Royal Academy of Music), Miss G. Atkin, Miss Maggie Reece, Mr. T. Harris, and Mr. G. Atkins. Mr. A. H. Cross presided at the pianoforte, and Miss Briant at the American organ. The first part of the programme comprised Spohr's Cantata God, Thou art great, and Mendelssohn's Motet Hear my prayer, both of which were given in a manner deserving of the highest commendation, Miss Paget being particularly successful in the last-named piece. The second part was miscellaneous.

BRECON.—The Philharmonic Society commenced its seventh season on Thursday, the 15th ult., when Haydn's Creation was performed with full band and chorus in the Priory Church before a large audience. The principal artists were Mrs. Hutchinson, Mr. A. Castings, and Mr. R. J. Tuckwell. Mr. R. T. Heins conducted. The performance was a great success, both musically and financially. In the evening a miscellaneous Concert was given in the Town Hall to a crowded audience.

BRIGHTON.—Recitals have been given with much success at the Organ Factory of Messrs. Harper Brothers, on one of their four-manual studio organs just completed, the qualities of the instrument being advantageously displayed in a series of programmes rendered by the following performers: Mr. Frank J. Sawyer, F.C.O., Mr. William Norman Roe, Mr. Alfred King, Mus. Bac., Oxon., F.C.O. (assisted by his pupil, Mr. Lihon), and Mr. J. Crapps, F.C.O.

BURNLEY.—An excellent miscellaneous Concert, under distinguished patronage, was given by the Vocal Society, on the 24th ult. Mendelssohn's Ninety-fifth Psalm formed the first part, and both chorus and orchestra entered fully into the spirit of the work, with the result that the performance was one of the finest that has been given under the direction of the able Conductor, Mr. W. A. C. Cruickshank. The second part of the programme was entirely a miscellaneous selection, the soloists being Miss K. Manners, Miss Horner, and Mr. Clough (vocal); Mr. Otto Bernhard and Mr. De Jong (instrumental). Of the part-songs, Cruickshank's "Waken, lords and ladies gay," deserves special mention, and was most effectively rendered.

BURY ST. EDMUNDS.—The Choral Society gave its final Concert of the season in the Corn Exchange, on the 5th ult., when Mendelssohn's Elijah was well rendered. The choruses, especially "Be not afraid," gave evidence of careful rehearsal. The solo vocalists were Miss Paterson, R.A.M., Miss Hipwell, Mr. J. Probert, and Mr. Poole. Mr. W. Pratt led the band, Mr. E. Iles presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. T. B. Richardson conducted.

CARDIFF.—An excellent performance of Mendelssohn's Elijah was given at the Drill Hall, by the Choral Society, on April 30. The solo vocalists were Miss José Sherrington, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Signor Foli. The choruses were finely rendered throughout, and Mr. D. C. Davies conducted with much skill and judgment.

CARNARVON.—The members of the Philharmonic Choral Society gave a successful Concert at the large Pavilion, on Thursday, the 1st ult. The May Queen (Sir W. Sterndale Bennett) was the work selected on this occasion, and its performance was a gratifying success, reflecting great credit both upon the Society and its able Conductor, Mr. J. H. Roberts, Mus. Bac., Cantab. The solo vocalists were Madame Lizzie Williams, R.A.M., Miss Gayney Griffiths, Miss Hope, Mr. Dyved Lewis, and Mr. D. Jones, all of whom were thoroughly efficient. The choral singing was unusually good. Miss A. J. Williams, R.A.M., Messrs. J. Williams and R. Prichard played the accompaniments. The second part was devoted to a tenor solo competition, when eight amateur vocalists came forward, each selecting his own song, the winner singing "How vain is man," from Judas Maccabaeus. The third part was miscellaneous, the Concert ending with the Choral Society's masterly rendering of the chorus from Tannhäuser (Wagner), "Hail, bright abode."

CHELMSFORD.—The members of the Musical Society gave an excellent performance of Mendelssohn's Elijah, at the Corn Exchange, on the 7th ult. The band and chorus numbered about 100 performers, the former comprising some professional gentlemen from London and Ipswich. The singing of the Society was thoroughly good and much appreciated. Miss Jessie Royd, Miss Eliza Thomas, Mr. Alfred Kenningham, and Mr. Thomas Kempton were the soloists, and their artistic efforts gave much satisfaction. Mr. Frye, F.C.O., conducted. At the rehearsal on the preceding evening the President of the Society (the Rev. H. F. Johnson, LL.B., Rector of Chelmsford), on behalf of the members, presented to Mr. Frye a handsome gold-mounted ivory bâton, as an expression of their appreciation of his skilful and patient training of the choir during the season.

CHELTHENHAM.—The Musical Society concluded its twenty-eighth season on the 14th ult., when a very interesting programme was provided. The Concert opened with J. Barnby's The Lord is King (Psalm 97), written especially for the Leeds Festival of last year. This was followed by Dr. Bridge's Motet Hymn to the Creator, and Hofmann's Cantata Melusina, formed the second part. These works were new to Cheltenham, and all of them were rendered in a manner exceedingly creditable both to band and chorus. The soloists were efficient, special mention being due to Miss Cookworthy, Miss Thirkill, Mrs. Ferguson, and Mr. Haines. Mr. Von Holst was at the harmonium, and the band, numbering twenty-seven, was led by Mr. Teague. Dr. A. E. Dyer conducted as usual.

CLIVEDON.—The annual Concert of the Choral Society was given in the Public Hall, on Wednesday evening, the 14th ult. The orchestra numbered forty, under the able conductorship of Mr. H. E. Marchant, Organist of the Parish Church. The first part of the programme comprised Gade's Crusaders, the principals in which were Miss E. Visger, Mr. C. Miller, and Mr. Morgan. The choruses were well rendered by the choir. A pleasing variety was afforded by an efficient string band, with Mr. Richardson (of Bristol) as first violin, who performed the Andante and Minuet from Mozart's Thirteenth Quartet. The programme concluded with Macfarren's May Day, in which Miss Kate Probert was a charming May Queen.

CORK.—The concluding Concert for the season of the Musical Society was given in the Assembly Rooms, on Tuesday, April 29. The first part consisted of selections from The Creation, and the second was miscellaneous. The solos in The Creation were taken by Miss L. A. Hackett, Messrs. R. M. Keating, R. H. Gill, and J. Sullivan. The choruses were excellently rendered.

DALKEITH.—The Philharmonic Society gave its annual Concert, in the Foresters' Hall, on Thursday evening, April 24, when Mendelssohn's Elijah was performed before a large audience. As a tribute to the memory of the late Duke of Buccleuch, the Oratorio was preceded by the Dead March in Saul. The soloists were Miss Mackenzie, Miss Spaven, Mr. T. E. Gledhill, and Mr. Glencorse. Mr. Damban led the band, Mr. Tait presided at the harmonium, Miss Barrie at the pianoforte, and Mr. Charles Guild conducted.

DORCHESTER.—On Tuesday, April 29, the Vocal Association gave a highly successful Concert in the Corn Exchange. The programme commenced with the first part of Elijah, which was rendered by a chorus of about 100 voices, and full band accompaniment. The principal vocalists were Madame Scorey (from the Brussels Conservatoire), Mrs. Stedman, Mr. John M. Hayden, and Mr. Bingley Shaw, assisted in the double quartet by local singers. All the solos were excellently sung, and the choruses were given with great precision, reflecting much credit upon the energetic Conductor, Mr. Boyton Smith. The second part consisted of a miscellaneous selection.

DOVER.—The Harmonic Society gave its second Concert of the season on Tuesday, the 20th ult., in the New Town Hall, before a large audience. The programme comprised two Cantatas, Gade's Crusaders and Cowen's Rose Maiden, with full orchestral accompaniments. The following artists were engaged for the occasion:—Madame Worrell, Miss Edith Ayers, Mr. Dyved Lewis and Mr. Frank May, R.A.M. The band and chorus numbered 160 performers. Conductor, Mr. J. W. Howells.

DUNSTER.—On Wednesday, April 23, the Philharmonic Society gave its last Concert of the season at the Assembly Rooms, before a crowded audience. The first portion of the programme consisted of the greater part of Handel's Samson, and the latter of a short secular selection, including Beethoven's Quintet for wind instruments (Op. 16) and a new song, "The old bridal dress," by the Conductor. The solo vocalists were Miss Fusselle and Messrs. Morgan and Nash, all of whom were highly successful. The choir (consisting of the Dunster, Washford, and Porlock branches of the Society) was very efficient, and there was an effective band of about twenty-two, led by Dr. Mackenzie, of Tiverton. The Conductor was Mr. J. Warriner, L. Mus., T.C.L., Organist of the Parish Church.

EASTBOURNE.—An Organ Recital was given in All Souls' Church, on the 21st ult., by Mr. Henry Baillie, Organist and Choirmaster. Selections were played from the works of Mendelssohn, Bach, Handel, Batiaste, Bennett, and Lemmens.

ENNISCORTHY, CO. WEXFORD.—On Wednesday evening, the 14th ult., the Choral Union gave its second Concert of the fifteenth season in the Church Institute. Mr. Thomas Yates, Organist and Choirmaster of St. Mary's Church, conducted. The selections from Bach and Handel, "With Jesus I will watch" (Passion, "St. Matthew"), "Lift up your heads," and "Worthy is the Lamb," were especially worthy of commendation, the solo in the first-named being expressively sung by Miss M. Wilkinson. Mr. McDermott gave a successful rendering of "But Thou didst not leave." The other solo vocalists were Mrs. Williamson, Mrs. Burchaell, Miss Chambers, and the Misses Preston. The second part of the programme was secular.

FOLKESTONE.—A very successful Musical Evening was given on the 13th ult., at the West Cliff Hotel, by Mr. Atherton Furlong, assisted by a number of pupils and Mrs. Bradshaw McKay, Mons. Hollman, Mr. Wilfred Bendall, and Mr. C. Hayden Coffin. The programme was miscellaneous and included Bendall's Cantata The Lady of Shalott, the solos and choruses in which were charmingly rendered. The Concert was under distinguished patronage.

GALASHIELS.—A Recital of Sacred Music was given in Ladhope Parish Church, on Friday evening, April 25, the programme being selected from the works of the great masters. The solo vocalists were Miss Hunter, Mrs. Callander, and Mr. William Johnston. The singing of "Angels, ever bright and fair," by Miss Hunter, and of "Why do the nations" and "The people that walked in darkness," by Mr. Johnstone, were special features in the programme. Mr. J. R. Brooke gave an excellent rendering of Wely's Offertoire in C (No. 3), "March of the Golden Cross," by W. L. Frost; and St. Ann's Fugue, by Bach.

GEORGETOWN, DEMERARA.—The second Concert of the Musical Society was given in the Philharmonic Hall, on Tuesday evening, April 15. The first part of the programme was miscellaneous, and the second consisted of Gilbert and Sullivan's operetta Trial by Jury, which was well rendered. Miss Thompson and Mr. Nusum accompanied, Mr. Miller led the band, and Mr. W. R. Colbeck conducted.

HALSTEAD.—The Musical Society gave an excellent Concert in the Town Hall, on the 8th ult., the programme consisting of Barnett's Ancient Mariner and a miscellaneous selection. The soloists were Madame Clara West, Miss Lottie West, Mr. C. J. Murton, and Mr. James Bayne, all of whom were highly successful. Mr. W. Pratt led the band, Miss Little presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. George Leake, A.C.O., conducted.

HAMILTON, CANADA.—Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise was performed by the Hamilton Choral Society, on April 29, the second part of the programme being miscellaneous. The chorus numbered 150 and the orchestra 40, under the direction of Mr. F. H. Torrington. The Society, though only in its second season, has accomplished satisfactory artistic results, having produced, in addition to the work named, The Messiah, Romberg's Lay of the Bell, and Elijah. The scheme for the coming season will probably include The Redemption, by Gounod, which Mr. Torrington, the highly efficient Conductor, had the honour of first introducing into Canada.

HEMSWORTH, YORKSHIRE.—The Choral Society gave its last performance for the season, on the 1st ult., in the Parish Church. After a short service, selections from Elijah, Hear my prayer, and Christ and His soldiers were rendered with great success, under the direction of Mr. J. H. Eyre, the Society's Conductor, who also sang the bass solos. Messrs. Nunn and Wadsworth, and Masters Bramham and Hardacre, of Leeds Parish Church, assisted; and Mr. W. Walker presided at the organ.

HERNE BAY.—An Organ Recital was given in the Parish Church, on the 16th ult., by the Organist, Mr. E. A. Crutenden. The selection comprised compositions by Handel, Spohr, Batiaste, Wely, and Smart, and two extempore pieces, in all of which the player was very successful. The vocal portion of the programme was contributed by Miss Gertrude Fairbairn, Mr. J. H. Asman, and Mr. G. Gardner Leader, all of whom pleased greatly in their rendering of solos from Elijah, St. Paul, Samson, &c.

HERTFORD.—The members of the Choral Class brought their second season to a close on Thursday, April 24, the programme consisting of Barnett's Cantata The Ancient Mariner and a miscellaneous selection. The soloists were Madame Worrell, Miss Mackenzie, Mr. Henry Guy, and Mr. F. Bevan, all of whom were highly successful; and the choruses were well rendered under the direction of Mr. Malcolm Heywood, A.R.A.M. Miss Crawley and Mr. James L. Gregory, F.C.O., presided respectively at the piano and harmonium.

HYDE, NEAR MANCHESTER.—A Concert, in aid of St. George's Church Alteration Fund, was given in the large schoolroom, on the 6th ult., by Miss Wagstaff, assisted by a number of her pupils, and several members of the Church Choir. Miss Wagstaff was highly successful in her pianoforte performances, and was loudly and deservedly applauded and recalled.

ILFRACOMBE.—The last Concert for the season of the Choral Society was given in the Oxford Hall, on the 1st ult. The programme consisted of Sir Sterndale Bennett's Pastoral The May Queen, and a miscellaneous selection. The solo vocalists were Miss Willis, Miss M. Chanter, Mr. Sidney Harper, and Mr. F. H. Colwill; solo pianist, Miss Helms. The band, chiefly composed of members of the Orchestral Society, was led by Mr. M. G. Rice, and Mr. Willis conducted. At the practice, on the previous evening, Mr. Colwill, on behalf of the members, presented Mr. Willis with a very handsome music-stand as a mark of their appreciation.

INVERNESS.—On April 29 the Philharmonic Society gave its second Chamber Concert in the Music Hall. The programme included Duo (piano and organ) from Concertante (Op. 6), Prout; Sonata (piano and violin), No. 1, in B flat (Op. 69), Dussek; Trio (piano, violin, and cello), No. 2 (Op. 22), Hummel; Quartet (violin, cello, piano, and organ), "Hymne de l'Opéra Médée de Cherubini," Gótemar; Sonata (violin and piano), No. 1, in D major (Op. 137), Schubert; Violoncello Solo, "Fantaisie Thème de Händel," Franchomme; and Trio, Rondo, Finale, presto (piano, violin, and cello), No. 3, in C major, Haydn. The executants were Mrs. Mackenzie (piano), Mr. W. D. Davis (violin), Mr. Carl Dreacher Hamilton (cello), and Mr. J. H. Gibbons Money (piano and organ), the Conductor of the Society. Miss Watt and Mr. Stevenson were the vocalists. The Concert was a decided success.—On the 13th ult. the same Society gave its thirteenth Choral Concert in the Music Hall with an excellent programme, amongst the most important items in which were Nicolai's Overture to The Merry Wives of Windsor, Gade's Cantata Spring's Message, Sterndale Bennett's choruses, "Wake with a smile" and "With a laugh," from The May Queen, and the solo and chorus, "As from the power," from Handel's Ode on St. Cecilia's Day. The choir and soloists were thoroughly successful; and the orchestra—almost entirely local performers—rendered excellent service. The Conductor was Mr. Gibbons Money (Organist of St. Andrew's Cathedral, Inverness), who directed with his customary skill and judgment.

KETERING.—On the 10th ult., the members of the Choral Society gave a performance of The Creation as its last Concert of the season. Miss Mary Davies, Mr. T. W. Hanson, and Mr. W. H. Brereton were the principal vocalists. The Society's band was enlarged for the occasion, the Messrs. Rowlett and Wykes, of Leicester, amongst others, again giving their important aid. The performance was enthusiastically received by an audience which crowded the Concert Hall in every part. Mr. H. G. Gotch conducted.

KIDDERMINSTER.—The third Concert of the Amateur Instrumental Society was given, in the Town Hall, on Thursday, the 8th ult., before an appreciative audience. Amongst the works presented were selections from Weber's Preciosa, the Organ Concerto (No. 1, in G minor) by Handel, Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony, Mendelssohn's Wedding March (Midsummer Night's Dream), Gavotte (Mignon) by Thomas, and a March ("The Turkish Patrol") by Michaelis, the whole of which were very ably interpreted. The vocal music, although, as a matter of course, in a Concert of this description, holding only a secondary position, was satisfactorily given by an efficient choir.

KNOTTINGLEY, YORKSHIRE.—The Choral Society ended its first season with a very successful Concert on April 29, the part-singing being a special feature. Gault's "The Better Land," Pearson's "Three doughtie men," and Bishop's "Now tramp," were rendered with great precision under the direction of Mr. J. H. Eyre, Conductor of the Society. Miss Lily Marshall-Ward assisted, and Mr. Schofield accompanied.

LANCASTER.—A performance of Barnett's Ancient Mariner was given by the Choral Society on the 21st ult. The principals were Miss Fanny Bristow, Miss Wakefield, Mr. Howson, and Mr. Tuke the latter gentleman in place of Mr. Harrison, of Lichfield Cathedral who was indisposed. The band was selected mainly from Mr. Hallé's Manchester orchestra, and was led by Mr. Otto Bernhardt. Mr. Deas conducted with his usual ability.

LARGS.—On Friday, the 2nd ult., the Choral Union brought its first session to a close with a Concert in the Artillery Hall. The first part consisted of selections from The Messiah, Judas Maccabæus, and St. Paul; and the second of Glee, Part-Songs, &c. The solo vocalist was Miss J. Wilson, Mr. R. Beck, and Mr. A. Adam. Miss Hunt created a very favourable impression by her rendering of two violin solos. The singing of the choir gave evidence of very careful training. Miss I. W. Paterson accompanied, and Mr. John McCallum conducted.

LEAMINGTON.—The appearance of Mr. Sims Reeves at the Concert organised by Messrs. Bezant, on April 29, at the Theatre Royal, has been for some time looked for, and in proof that he never disappoints the public from trivial causes, we may mention that, although singing under the disadvantage of severe indisposition, "of which the outward and visible sign was a badly swollen face," says a local newspaper, he gave the songs set down for him in his own unapproachable style.

winning the most enthusiastic applause for all, and especially for "Come into the garden, Maud," and the "Bay of Biscay." Miss De Fonblanque, Miss Faulkner, and Mr. Gilbert Campbell were the other vocalists, and Mr. Sidney Naylor an able accompanist.—The Musical Society's Third Orchestral Concert took place at the Theatre Royal, on Wednesday, the 21st ult. The band was complete in every detail. The programme comprised Beethoven's Symphony in C (No. 1), the Overtures to the Son and Stranger (Mendelssohn), Rosamund's Schubert, Il Barbiere (Rossini), the Hungarian March from Berlioz's Faust, Air de Ballet, "Sylvia," Pizzicato (Déliibes), and Mendelssohn's Piano-forte Concerto in D minor, the solo part being played by the Conductor of the Society, Mr. Frank Spinney. Miss Emilie Lloyd was the vocalist, who, amongst other songs, gave a most finished rendering of Gounod's "There is a green hill far away," with orchestral accompaniment.

LEYSBURN.—An excellent performance of Sullivan and Gilbert's Opera H.M.S. Pinafore was given (by permission of Mr. D'Oyley Carte) by the members of the Wensleydale Musical Society, and friends, in the Town Hall, on April 29 and 30, and Thursday, the 1st ult. Miss Fowler presided at the piano-forte and Mr. C. A. Harris at the harmonium.

LEYTONSTONE.—At a meeting of the members of the Choral Society, on the 12th ult., a handsome marble timepiece was presented to the Conductor, Mr. Ulyett, as a token of appreciation of his services in connection with the Society.

LIVERPOOL.—A performance of The Messiah was given in Chadwick Mount Congregational Church, on April 28, with a chorus of sixty voices. Madame Turner and Mr. T. C. Fargher were especially successful in their solos. Mr. Loikier, the choir-master, conducted, and Mr. S. Claude Ridley presided at the organ. On the following Monday Mr. Ridley gave an Organ Recital at the Chapel, when several pieces were enclosed.

LONDONDERRY.—The second Concert of the third season of the Musical Association took place in the Corporation Hall, on Tuesday evening, April 28, before a crowded audience. Rogers's Cantata Beauty and the Beast formed the first part of the programme, and the second was miscellaneous. The performance was highly successful. Miss Lillie Cunningham accompanied, Mr. E. Conaghan led the orchestra, and Mr. P. Mulholland conducted.

LUDLOW.—On Tuesday evening, April 29, the last Concert, for the present season, of the Amateur Choral Society, was given in the Assembly Rooms. The programme, which was well rendered, consisted of Sir G. A. Macfarren's May Day and a miscellaneous selection. Miss Beatie Holt was the principal vocalist. Mr. T. Watkis led the band, and Mr. Bartholomew conducted.

MARBY DRAYTON.—On April 28 the Musical Society gave a performance of the Rev. H. E. Hodson's Cantata The Golden Legend, before a large audience, and with marked success. The Concert, which was under the able conductorship of Mr. F. Evans, commenced with the Overture to William Tell, after which a duet for harp and clarinet (Mr. Cokerill and Mr. Pountney) was given, and much applauded. Longfellow's version of The Golden Legend is no stranger to the majority of the students of English literature, and we may say that the spirit of the poetry has been most effectively and sympathetically coloured by the composer. The work is melodious throughout, well harmonised, and written with an intimate knowledge of orchestral resources. To Madame Worrell, R.A.M., was entrusted the part of the forest maiden, Elsie. She seemed somewhat nervous when commencing, but sang the aria "My Redeemer and my Lord" with much pathos. The song "It is the sea" she also gave with true artistic appreciation, and was heard to great advantage in the recitative and duet "We are alone" and "Wilt thou as fond and faithful be." Miss Annie Collins, who took the parts of Max and The Angel of Good Deeds, sang with most commendable correctness. The dirge-like opening of the trio "Drink" she gave with fine effect, and also sang the solo "Rise up," which, well supported by the chorus, made this number one of the successes of the evening. The part of Bertha was taken by Mrs. Exham with good effect, but Miss Lamb's voice is scarcely of sufficient volume for the music of Ursula. Mr. Kenningham, in the part of Prince Henry, made a favourable impression in the aria "I cannot sleep," and was highly effective in the last duo with Madame Worrell. "Wilt thou as fond and faithful be," when her fine singing roused him to emulation, and gave us the opportunity of appreciating his great vocal powers at their proper worth. Mr. R. Morria's Forester was fairly good. The part of Lucifer had been allotted to Mr. Harrison, but, owing to Mr. Evans's indisposition, he also took that of Gottlieb. The whole of the choruses were excellently rendered, especially "O beauty of holiness," the unison chorus of the Male Pilgrims, and the "Chorus of angels." At the conclusion of the performance loud cries were raised for the Composer, who was seated in the room; and on his appearing upon the platform he received a perfect ovation.

MONTROSE.—The Harmonic Union, one of the oldest musical Societies in the country, concluded its thirtieth season by giving a Concert in the New Drill Hall, on April 22. The programme consisted of solos, part-songs, and choruses. Mr. C. B. Taylor conducted.

MORECAMBE.—The members of the Choral Society gave a very successful Concert in the Winter Gardens on April 25. The programme consisted of Acis and Galatea and a miscellaneous selection. Miss Byers (of Liverpool) and Messrs. Howson and Higginson (of Lancaster) filled the principal parts. Mr. Garnshaw, A.Mus., T.C.L., conducted.

NEWCASTLE.—The ninth and last private Concert held under the auspices of Mr. T. Albion Alderson took place at the Town Hall on the 6th ult., the occasion being made interesting by the performance for the first time in Newcastle of Mackenzie's Cantata Jason. This work was produced at the Bristol Festival of 1832, and certain of the arrangements at the entertainment were not favourable to its perfect presentation. Thus Jason did not create the impression that its undoubted merits entitled it to do, and although it has been heard in London and in a few provincial centres of musical taste, it has not taken the position of a stock piece with the choral Societies. Yet it is a truly remarkable composition, and it is difficult to mention a similar piece composed in this country within the last twenty years that can fairly bear comparison with it. The work is dramatic in form, and Mr. William Grit, the writer of the libretto, has divided the narrative into six scenes, namely, "The Building of the Ship," "The Invocation and Departure," "Medeia's Vision," "Welcome and Love," "The Conflict," and "The Triumph." The story is, of course, an episode of the successful voyage of the Argonauts. An efficient orchestra was conducted by Dr. Armes, and Mr. Alderson presided at the organ. The choir was heard at its best, and the grand choruses of the work were given with a precision that delighted the audience. The principals were Madame Wharfed (Medeia), Mr. John Nutton (Jason), and Mr. T. H. Armstrong (Orpheus). The Cantata was warmly received throughout, and will certainly take its proper place in public estimation. The second part of the Concert consisted of Mr. W. H. Cummings's Cantata, The Fairy Ring, a work totally different in style from Jason. Thoroughly English in character and treatment, the music of The Fairy Ring bids fair to be very popular, and the melodies enshrined in some of the airs and concerted pieces are so sweet and graceful as to be well suited to the drawing-room. The principal vocalists appearing in the Cantata were Miss Armitage, Miss Josephine Allen, Mr. John Nutton, and Mr. T. White.

NARWY.—The Choral Society gave the final Concert of its first season on the 6th ult., in the Assembly Rooms, before a crowded audience. Sir G. A. Macfarren's Cantata May Day formed the first part of the programme, and was performed with orchestral accompaniments by a small band, the chorus numbering fifty voices. Miss Nicholson, as the May Queen, gave a charming rendering of the recitative and song, and the choir was highly efficient. The second part was miscellaneous, the most noteworthy items being two violin solos, well played by the Rev. Henry Taylor, and an artistic rendering of Coenen's song "Lovely Spring" by Miss Rebecca Morgan. The other principal vocalists were Miss Cordner, Miss Wherry, Miss Hill, Miss Harriet Morgan, Mr. J. J. McCormack, Mr. Dempster, Mr. G. F. Alderice, and Mr. Kenneth Stewart. Mrs. Loughran and Miss M. Hill presided at the piano-forte and harmonium respectively, and Mr. Barry M. Gilholy, Organist of St. Mary's, conducted.

NORTHAMPTON.—The fourth and last of a series of Entertainments, given at College Street Chapel, in aid of the organ and musical fund, took place on the 13th ult. The programme comprised organ solos, excellently played by Mr. R. W. Strickland, Organist of the Chapel; and vocal solos by Miss Carter, Mr. Bailey, and Mr. Tarry.

PAISLEY.—An Organ Recital was given on the 14th ult., by Mr. William Agate, in St. James's Church, upon the fine instrument recently erected by Messrs. H. Willis and Sons. The programme consisted of selections from the works of Rheinberger, Gullmatt, Smart, &c. The Recital, whilst showing the talent of Mr. Agate as an Organist, fully demonstrated the excellence of the instrument on which he played. An Anthem, composed by Mr. Agate, and containing some clever writing, was sung by the Church Choir.

PERTH.—The Musical Society, which numbers about eighty voices and is under the Conductorship of Mr. S. C. Hirst, of Dundee, gave its last Concert for this season on Friday, April 25. The programme was a varied one, and included Haydn's First Mass in B flat and A. C. Mackenzie's Cantata The Bride. The production of the latter work was looked forward to with a good deal of interest, as it was the first opportunity a Perth audience had had of hearing any of our rising and talented countrymen's productions. The solo parts were taken by Miss Steel, of Dundee, and Mr. George Miller, one of the members of the Society, and the beautiful instrumentation was well brought out by a small but very efficient orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. Cole, of Glasgow. A violoncello solo by Mr. Walton, of Manchester, and a string quartet, led by Mr. Cole, which were played in a masterly manner, were well received, and contributed no little to the evening's enjoyment. Mr. Hirst again proved himself an able Conductor. Altogether the Concert was very successful, and augured well for the future of the Society.

PETERSFIELD.—The members of the Musical Association gave a Concert in the Corn Exchange, on Thursday, the 8th ult., under the Conductorship of Mr. G. E. Lake. The part-songs were extremely well sung; and solos were most successfully rendered by Miss Moore, Miss Maggie Chase, Messrs. Sharp, Ticehurst, and F. B. Nichols; the Revs. G. Sampson and F. W. R. Mason, and Dr. Leachman. A piano-forte duet was given by the Misses Baker, and a violin solo by Mr. Caffin, both of which were received with warm applause; Miss Cross was an able accompanist.

PLYMOUTH.—The third Subscription Concert of the Plymouth Vocal Association for the season 1883-4 was given in the Guildhall, Plymouth, on the 14th ult. Unusual interest attached to the performance from the fact that the Oratorio selected for the occasion, by request, was the chef d'œuvre of the late Sir Michael Costa, and it was the first performance of any of the composer's works which has been given in public since his decease. Etis by no means an easy work, but the performance of it was a gratifyingly successful one throughout, and did great credit to Mr. Lühr and his associates. The principal artists were Miss Fanny Moody, Miss Amy Foster, Mr. Harper Kearton, Mr. Lucas Williams, Mr. A. L. Wells, Mr. J. Pardew (leader), Mr. A. C. Faulk (honorary organist), Mr. F. N. Lühr (honorary Conductor). Band and chorus numbered about 220 performers. The soloists all rendered their parts in a most satisfactory manner, the band did excellently, and Mr. Faulk's organ part was played with great taste and good judgment.

RETFORD.—Mr. Hamilton White, for many years Organist of the Parish Church, gave a Concert in the Town Hall, on Monday, April 28. The programme, which was miscellaneous, was well rendered by Mr. White and his pupils. The solo vocalists were Miss Howett and Mr. Greaves, and Miss Denman and Miss Clark contributed piano-forte solos.

ST. JOHN'S, NEWFOUNDLAND.—The Eleventh Concert of the St. John's Choral Society was given in the Athenæum Hall, on Thursday, April 17. The programme consisted of Handel's Samson.

The solo singers were all amateurs (members of the Society), with the exception of Miss Clara Fisher. Conductor, Mr. George James Rowe; pianoforte, Miss Rowe. The choruses were well rendered, and Miss Fisher's fine singing of "Ye men of Gaza," "May ev'ry hero," and "Let the bright Seraphim," was highly appreciated.

SALISBURY.—The Vocal Union gave its second Concert of the season in the Hamilton Hall, on Monday, the 5th ult. The first part of the programme was devoted to a selection from The Messiah, and the second part was miscellaneous. The soloists were Madame Eva Storey, Miss Eliza Thomas, and Messrs. Marr, Hayden, Acolt, Crick, and Kelsey, of the Cathedral Choir. A feature in the second part was a new song, "Waiting," words and music by William Marr, and sung by Mr. J. M. Hayden. Miss Winifred Harwood presided at the pianoforte, Mr. Alfred Foley at the organ, and Mr. John M. Hayden conducted. There was a very large audience, and the Concert was most successful.

SANDHURST.—Two vocal and instrumental Concerts were given in the Gymnasium of the Royal Military College, in aid of the College Compassionate Fund, on the 8th ult., by the members of the Choral Society. The professional solo vocalists were Miss Rowe and Signor de Monaco; pianist, Signor Carlo Ducci; organ, Mr. W. H. Strickland; violin, Mr. J. Conway Brown; and violoncello, Mr. T. Brown. The string band of the College gave valuable aid, and Mr. G. Miller, bandmaster, conducted. The Concerts were well attended, and very successful.

SARATOGA SPRINGS, NEW YORK.—The eighty-sixth Recital of the Music Department of Temple Grove Seminary was given on April 8. The Director, Mr. W. C. Richardson, lectured on Sacred Music, and an excellent programme, in illustration, was most efficiently rendered.

STAFFORD.—On Thursday, April 24, a large audience assembled in St. Mary's Church, on the occasion of an Organ Recital by the Organist, Dr. E. W. Taylor, whose interpretation of an excellent programme was thoroughly appreciated. The vocalist was Miss Annie Lea.

STANSTEAD.—The first Concert by the members of the Choral Society was given on Thursday, April 24, in the Central Hall. The singing of the Choir was highly creditable to their Conductor, Mr. A. Hodges, Organist of the Parish Church. The principal vocalists were Mrs. Booth, Miss A. Farren, R.A.M., and Mr. H. Day. Pianoforte solos and duets were contributed by the Misses Haynes, Luard, and A. Luard. Mr. T. Harrison accompanied.

STROUD.—The concluding Concert for the season of the Choral Class was given in the Subscription Rooms, on the 1st ult., when Mendelssohn's Elijah was excellently rendered. The principal vocalists were Miss Adela Vernon, Miss Eleanor Rees, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. Brandon. Miss Vernon was highly successful in the Widow's solo and in "Hear ye, Israel"; and Miss Rees made a highly favourable impression in "O rest in the Lord" and "Woe unto them," her excellent singing evoking the sympathies of her audience. The Trio "Lift thine eyes," admirably rendered by Misses Vernon, Rees, and Hurcombe, was encored. Mr. Kearton and Mr. Brandon sang in a most efficient manner throughout the Oratorio. Mr. Chew led the band, and Mr. J. Hunt conducted.

SUNBURY-ON-THAMES.—The final Concert of the present season was given by the Choral Society on the 1st ult., at the Institute, before a large and appreciative audience. The soloists were Miss Evelyn Bawtree, Miss Wykes, Mr. Chas. D. Waite, and Mr. Frank Ward. The accompanists were Miss Dennis (pianoforte) and Mr. Wykes (harmonium), and Mr. W. Robert Dennis conducted. The second part consisted of songs by Miss Turpin, Miss Wykes, and Mr. Charles H. Lane; The Pilgrims (Leslie) and Mendelssohn's Forty-third Psalm, "Judge me, O God," well sung by the Society.

TIVERTON.—Although the Concert of the Musical Society, on the 1st ult., was but poorly attended, the performance was, artistically, a great success. The first part of the programme was devoted to Henry Smart's Cantata The Bride of Dunkerton, the principal vocalists in which—Miss Julia Jonea, R.A.M., Mr. Hayden, and Mr. Roper—were thoroughly efficient. The choruses, too, were rendered with much precision and effect. In the second part of the programme, which was miscellaneous, Miss Jones created a marked effect by her excellent singing of "The Soldier tired," and several other items were much applauded. Mr. T. Russe, A.C.O., conducted with care and precision.

VICTORIA, VANCOUVER ISLAND.—The St. John's Annual Choral Festival was held in St. John's Episcopal Church on the evening of April 29. Special psalms were sung. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were given to Ebdon's setting in E flat. The anthems were Birbeck's "Christ is risen" and Goss's "This is the day." The solos and choruses were well rendered, under the conductorship of T. Wilson, Esq., and the sermon was preached by the Rev. P. Jenks, the Rector. The church, which was prettily decorated, was crowded. Mr. Arthur Hookway, the Organist of the church (formerly of St. Dunstan's, Canterbury, England), presided at the organ.

WARE.—The Musical Society, under the conductorship of Mr. J. L. Gregory, F.C.O., gave its fourth annual Concert, in the Town Hall, on Thursday, the 1st ult., before a large and appreciative audience. The first part of the programme consisted of Gade's Cantata The Erl King's Daughter, the soloists being Mrs. Daglish, who was very efficient, and the Rev. S. W. P. Webb, a member of the Society. The choruses were rendered excellently throughout. The accompaniments were well played on the pianoforte and harmonium respectively, by Mr. Malcolm Heywood, A.R.A.M., and Mr. George H. Gregory, Mus. B. The second part of the programme was miscellaneous, and included a couple of part-songs written expressly for the Society by its Conductor, and sung, for the first time, with marked success.

WATFORD.—On Thursday, the 1st ult., the Church Oratorio Society sang Parts I. and II. of Haydn's Creation, at Oxhey Church. The solos were admirably rendered by Mrs. Wilson Osman, Mr. John Probert and Mr. Buels. The Choir, numbering about fifty, was conducted by Mr. James Turpin. The choruses, especially the "Heaven is telling," were well sung. Mr. E. H. Turpin accompanied on the organ in a masterly manner. The service was intoned by the Rev. H. Goodwin, and the lesson read by the Vicar, the Rev. N. Price. It is especially laid down in the rules of the Society, "there shall always be a service in connection with the Oratorio; that no charge shall be made for admission, and that adequate accommodation shall be provided for the poor."

WEM, SALOP.—The Choral Society gave its annual Concert on Wednesday, the 22nd ult., under the able conductorship of Mr. Fred. Gast. The chief feature in the programme was the cantata, Lu Story of Elaine (with orchestral accompaniment), by Hutchison, which proved very effective. Mozart's Overture to Figaro was also performed. The principal vocalists were Miss Ida Bellairs and Mr. Walter Jones.

WEYBRIDGE.—The members of the Amateur Musical Society gave a very successful Concert, on the 6th ult., in the Village Hall. The vocalists were Miss Warburton, R.A.M., Miss Moore, Mr. Dan Ritson, and Mr. Stanley Smith. The solos were effectively rendered, and the chorus-singing especially good. Herr Borschtzky led the band, and Mr. G. E. Lake was solo pianist and Conductor.

WORCESTER.—The second and concluding Concert of the Philharmonic Society, for this season, was given at the Public Hall, on Thursday evening, the 1st ult. The programme, as is the rule in these Concerts, presented several features of interest, the first part being occupied by an excellent performance of Haydn's Saisons, "Spring" and "Autumn." The solo singers were Miss Margaret Hoare (Jane), Mr. Abercrombie (Lucas), and Mr. Montagu Workitt (Simon), who acquitted themselves to the complete satisfaction of the audience. Mr. Worlock's fine voice and artistic singing were displayed to the utmost advantage in the sporting song "Behold, along the dewy grass," and the whole scene went with much spirit, Mr. Dore's choir more than sustaining its great reputation. The high A's in "Hark the mountains resound" were perfectly in tune, and the difficult entry piano to the words "Spring her lovely charms unfolding" was refreshing to hear. This is especially gratifying with the Festival in view, the Philharmonic Society forming, as is well-known, the nucleus of the Festival chorus. The band, too, played with more attention to nuances than we often hear at Concerts when rehearsals are necessarily so limited. The second part of the programme consisted of a miscellaneous selection, the principal item in which was an orchestral sketch by Mr. Edward Elgar, called Sevillana. The Spanish colouring, indicated by its title, was very marked, several quaint effects being assigned to various instruments, amongst which the tambourine and castanets figured conspicuously. The piece, conducted by the Composer, was most warmly received. The rest of the music was in the able hands of Mr. Done.

WORKSOP.—On Wednesday evening, the 12th ult., a Concert was given, in the Town Hall, by Mr. Hamilton White, and the members of his vocal class. A miscellaneous programme, including several part-songs, was well rendered. The solo vocalists were Miss Hovett, Miss Turvey, Mr. Mackie, Mr. Shellard, and Mr. H. Graves. Pianoforte solos were contributed by Miss Clark, and the violin solos of Mr. John Peck were features of the evening.

Price; pianist, Dr. Sawyer; Conductor, Mr. F. D. Carnell, Mus. Bac.—An excellent performance of Mendelssohn's St. Paul was given by the Sacred Harmonic Society, at the New Assembly Rooms, on the 14th ult. The principal vocalists—Miss Bertha Moore, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Redfern Hollins, and Mr. John Bridson—sang the solos with much success; and the choir, which had evidently been trained with the utmost care, gave the whole of the many fine choruses in the work with true artistic feeling, and commendable precision. The band, ably led by Mr. Val Nicholson, was thoroughly efficient; and Mr. Everard Hulton, Mus. Bac., occupied a reliable Conductor. At the termination of the first part the Dead March in Saul was played, as a tribute to the late Sir Michael Costa.

IMPORTANT to all TEACHERS of the PIANO-FORTE.—The old method of teaching Music is now entirely superseded by a far more excellent method, which claims to be the only correct and reasonable method for teaching Pianoforte-playing. Mr. Felix Sommer, one of the most efficient music-masters in the neighbourhood of London, writes as follows concerning this NEW PIANO-FORTE TUTOR. (For particulars see below.)

"Sutton Lane, Chiswick, October 30, 1883.

"Dear Herr Hoering,—I am very much obliged to you for your pamphlets and specimen copy of 'Tutor.' I have only had time to look rapidly through the latter, but I have seen sufficient to show me that it contains everything you claim for it; and I shall cordially recommend it as far as it may be in my power. It is conscientious, and thoroughly musicianlike, and I feel quite sure that it will be much appreciated by the majority of the musical profession."

21 Etudes spéciales pour préparer à l'exécution s. d. des ouvrages de FR. CHOPIN. Op. 154 ... 10 6

The same work in Three Books ... each 5 0

PREFACE.—Chopin is a writer of such masterly originality, not only in his creations, but also in his manner of composing for the Pianoforte, in the structure of his accompaniments, in his treatment of scales, arpeggi, and combinations of all kinds, that a preliminary labour—with a view of acquiring a special technical power—is indispensable to the student of his works. With this view I have chosen a certain number of passages from the works of Chopin, remarkable either in their construction or in the difficulties to be surmounted in their execution; and I have written a study on each, developing the theme and its technical peculiarities.

It must of course be understood that these studies apply only to mechanical difficulties. The secret of Chopin's style and expression can be discovered only by an earnest study of his works.—STEPHEN HELLER, 1884.

TIMES.

"Without wishing to make a comparison between these different renderings, all in their way excellent, we may say that Herr Richter emphasised the declamatory force of each of them with a distinctness equalled only by the exquisite tenderness with which the more lyrical portions of the melodic design were given. The subtle effects of Mr. Mackenzie's skilful instrumentation also received full justice by a rendering so well balanced that the brass instruments were never allowed to drown the strings, nor the strings to mar the gentle tones of the wood-wind. Under such circumstances, the applause which followed at the end of the work and twice summoned the composer to the platform was not a matter for surprise."

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"This true 'symphonic poem' continues to improve upon acquaintance. It is masterly all round, and the audience were more than justified in calling the composer to the platform amid loud and unanimous applause."

STANDARD.

"This fine musical poem is full of genuine emotion, of true dramatic expression; and it was received with such enthusiasm by the audience that twice the composer had to appear on the platform in recognition of the prolonged applause."

MORNING POST.

"His work is genuine, and Englishmen should be proud that some of their own countrymen's names can be successfully placed side by side with the great German musicians."

ATHENÆUM.

"It speaks well for the composition that increased familiarity with it only heightens our opinion of its remarkable merits. Not only is it full of original thoughts, but its construction is masterly in all respects. . . . We consider it one of the finest things its composer has yet produced."

This Work consists of a Series of Hymns and Songs with music, which are intended to be to the Church of England what the songs of the Salvation Army and Messrs. Moody and Sankey are to their respective adherents, combining, it is hoped, their popularity and tunefulness without any trace of vulgarity or irreverence.

The Songs are intended for HOME MISSION and SPECIAL SERVICES, whether in Church, Mission Room, or Open Air Meeting; there are some specially adapted for Processions, Services of Praise, Working Men, Children, and large mixed congregations; also a Children's Choral March; some are to be sung by the Choir and People combined, others have hearty refrains to be joined in by the Congregation in chorus; and a few may be sung by the Choir alone, as are Carols, &c.

"A good sound musical work is this 'Holy City.' I have no hesitation in saying that it creditably represents English art, and does honour not only to the skill but to the judgment and taste of Mr. Gaul."—Daily Telegraph.

"The reception was favourable in the extreme, and the Cantata must henceforth be classed among the successes which the Birmingham Musical Festivals have brought to light."—Standard.

"The 'Holy City' is evidently the work of a thoughtful as well as a clever composer, and should make its mark among thoroughly English productions of a sacred character."—Musical Times.

"We hope and believe that the reception given last night to Mr. Gaul and to his 'Holy City' Cantata will prove an earnest of its popularity and acceptance throughout the length and breadth of the land."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

“THE LEGEND OF SAINT ELIZABETH.”

AN ORATORIO BY FRANZ LISZT.

A WRITER in the Times, discussing the production of Gounod's Oratorio “The Redemption” at the Birmingham Musical Festival, of 1882, categorised the leading schools of sacred music in the following terms:—“The two distinct currents in which sacred music runs may be identified with the two great divisions of the Christian Faith. One of these flows from the traditions of the Gregorian chant through the powerful mind of the divine Palestrina and the later Italians to Mozart, Beethoven, Cherubini, and, in our own day, to Liszt. Its home was, and is, in Italy and the Catholic South of Germany. The other development, equally characteristic of its origin, is based upon the Lutheran Choral, and has found its climax in Bach, to whom Mendelssohn stands in the relation of a disciple, less profound, but more humanly approachable.”*

The inclusion of Liszt among the few representative composers of sacred music here specified must have astonished many, considering how seldom an opportunity of judging of his powers in this direction has been publicly accorded in England. As it has been claimed for Liszt that he has founded a new “school” of sacred music, it seems well, before speaking of his Oratorio “The Legend of St. Elizabeth” in detail, to examine the grounds on which this claim has been made. In contradistinction to the mode of procedure followed by Bach, Haydn, and Mozart, whose sacred and secular music are almost identical in style, it has been asserted that Liszt in his sacred works has combined the ecclesiastical style of a period anterior to these masters—viz., that of Palestrina and the early Italian church composers—with modern tonality. Such an assertion in its fullest extent is hardly to be admitted, when we call to mind that Beethoven, in his Mass in D and elsewhere, as well as Berlioz in his “Requiem,” have done the same thing, though not, perhaps, to so great an extent. Further, Liszt's sacred music is said to be characterised by the manner in which he has made use of the Hungarian style. But upon this fact no great stress is to be laid, for it is chiefly observable in those of his works in which it has been adopted with a set purpose—e.g., the Mass composed for the opening of the Cathedral at Gran (in Hungary), the Coronation Mass composed in honour of the King of Hungary, and “The Legend of St. Elizabeth.” In his Oratorio “Christus,” and in many other of his sacred works, the Hungarian element is hardly to be traced at all.

Holding aloof from the oratorio style of Bach and Handel, which resulted from the Reformation, and deriving its subject-matter from the Bible, conformed itself to the requirements of the reformed religion, Liszt has reverted to the tradition of the Catholicism of the middle ages, to the liturgy and legends of the Roman Catholic Church. For the chorals of the Lutheran Church he has substituted the naive Gregorian chants of the Primitive Church. Keeping in view the old Italian masters—Palestrina, Marcello, Vittoria, &c.—he has replaced the majestic grandeur, but coldness, of pure Gothic art and German rationalism by the sincerity, glow and fancy of Roman art. Thus, the influences at work upon him may be defined as Roman, German, and Hungarian; and thus, Catholic mysticism, Protestant realism, and National feeling stand side by side. Such a characterisation of Liszt as a composer of sacred music, it will be found, eminently applies to his “Legend of St. Elizabeth.”

In illustration of this point, it seems well at once to state that in a note appended to the full score Liszt has acknowledged his indebtedness to certain Hungarian friends, who furnished him with the antiphons, graduals, and hymns, &c., preserved in breviaries and choral books of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, as appointed by the Church, “In festo sanctæ Elizabeth”—i.e., for use on St. Elizabeth's Day (November 13). From this liturgical treasure he has borrowed two themes. The first and most important, which, treated with the utmost variety and ingenuity, appears whenever Elizabeth is the most prominent of the characters represented, or where allusion to her is made, stands thus in its original form:—

Whenever mention is made of Hungary, the following Hungarian national tune, or fragments of it, are introduced—

symbolical of the Cross, and as forming the keynote to its intent, appropriately forms the basis of the Crusaders' March and Chorus. The Trio, as it may be regarded, which occurs twice in the Crusaders' March, and again in the sixth scene, is derived from an old Pilgrims' Song, supposed to date from the time of the Crusaders—

The theme of the Chorus of Beggars, which occurs in the fifth and sixth scenes, is taken from an old Hungarian “Kirchenlied zur heiligen Elizabeth,”

* This quotation from the Times should not be allowed to pass without a protest against the injustice of entirely ignoring the existence of the English School of Church Music. If, in the far distant past, England may be said to have had a “school,” it is pre-eminently that of the Cathedral writers of the Reformation period that we may lay claim to. Though little difference can be traced between the sacred and the secular style of that period, the former, as Dr. Jebb has maintained, was at least national and peculiar to this country. Further, the Church of England was not indebted to Palestrina: a statement which the same authority supports by urging the similarity of the style of Byrde and Tallis to that of Robert White, who was anterior to the great Italian master.

found in an old devotional book, entitled "Lyra Cœlestis." It stands there as follows:—

Szent Ör sé - bet asz-szony é - le - ti - rül, Em le kez-zünk
 sok, jó, té - te - lé - rül: Mis - is - ő - tet ko - ves-sük a zon le gyünk; a' mit be ne di - csi - ruk, cse - le - ked gyük.

The "Legend of St. Elizabeth" was composed, at the instigation of the Grand Duke of Weimar, for a Festival held at the Wartburg, on the 28th of August, 1867, in commemoration of the eighth centenary of the founding, and in honour of the restoration, then just completed, of that remarkable and historically interesting relic of the middle ages. For such a purpose a more appropriate subject than that of the life of St. Elizabeth could hardly have been chosen. The Wartburg is rich in its historical associations; for it was here that Luther found an asylum from May, 1521, to March, 1522; here the Minnesingers held their contests of song, which Wagner has immortalised in "Tannhäuser"; and here, in the ancient abode of the Landgraves of Thuringia, the pious St. Elizabeth of Hungary lived and laboured in behalf of the poor around her. The choice of subject was doubtless dictated by the wish which Liszt entertained for one in which religious feeling could be combined with Thuringian and Hungarian national associations. It was directly suggested by Moriz Schwind's exquisite frescoes of scenes from the life of St. Elizabeth, which adorn the walls of the chapel of the Wartburg. The libretto, by Otto Roquette, is divided into six scenes, which are identical in subject and order with Schwind's frescoes, each being complete in itself. A libretto more thoroughly dramatic, more poetically beautiful, or more admirably laid out for musical treatment could hardly be desired. The story of the life of St. Elizabeth, with which the late Canon Kingsley—following Dietrich of Appold, her contemporary and first biographer—was the first to familiarise English readers by his dramatic poem "The Saint's Tragedy," is no imaginary one, though in the lapse of time it has come to be mixed up with legendary matter, or what would be regarded as such by those who neither believe in the existence of the occultism of the past nor in its revival at the present. Be this as it may, from the very moment of her birth St. Elizabeth's life was surrounded with a halo of mystery; for, it is related by the chroniclers that the astrologer Klingsohr, sitting one night in the court of his lodging, in Eisenach, was observed to be intently gazing upon the stars, and on being asked if he had discovered any secrets, replied: "Know that this night is born to the King of Hungary a daughter, who shall be called Elizabeth, and will be given to wife to the son of the Landgrave Hermann. She will be a saint, and in the fame of her sanctity all the earth shall exalt and be exalted." On this prophecy of Klingsohr's being told to the Landgrave, an embassy was at once sent to the court of King Andreas, of Hungary, and the betrothal of his newly-born daughter with the Landgrave's son was duly arranged.

Though Liszt's music to "The Legend of St. Elizabeth" was primarily conceived and published as an oratorio, of late years it has more than once been presented upon the stage as a musical drama, notably and most recently at Weimar, where in this form it is said to have achieved a signal success: one critic, at least, having spoken of it as "a precious jewel in a living setting," and as gaining greatly in effect by its transference from the concert-room to the theatre. As hinted above, so thoroughly dramatic is it in its intent and conception, that it is easy to believe this to have been the case. We may now proceed to describe it, scene by scene.

Passing over the orchestral introduction, which may be spoken of hereafter in connection with an analysis of the music generally, we come to the first scene of the drama, which depicts the arrival of Elizabeth at the Wartburg, whither, as a child of four years old, she has been brought from Hungary as the betrothed of Ludwig, son of the Landgrave Hermann. A short orchestral prelude, suggestive of bustle and expectation, introduces a chorus of "Welcome," the burden of which, as well as the accompaniment, is charmingly tuneful and animated. It is interrupted by the Landgrave's reception of his future daughter-in-law, whom he affectionately kisses on promising to be to her a father; and by a speech from the Hungarian Magnate, who has headed her escort, on confiding her to his care. Towards the close of the Magnate's speech the Hungarian tune (quoted above) is introduced and taken up in reply by the chorus to the words:—

Long may she reign and dwell in honour,
 This pledge of proud Hungarian land!

In Schwind's picture the youthful Ludwig is seen climbing up upon the wheel of Elizabeth's chariot in his eagerness to greet his baby bride. Exquisitely natural and pathetic are the childlike words of welcome with which he greets her, simply telling her that all she sees will one day be his and hers. And equally so are her expressions of astonishment at the unwonted glee which pervades the house, and the greeting which she lovingly sends to her mother at home. A chorus of children, descriptive of their games and the pleasures which await her, as appropriately simple as it is takingly tuneful, now leads to a resumption of the chorus of "Welcome," which rounds off this first scene of the drama in a thorough musicianly and effective manner.

The second scene brings us to a later date. Landgrave Hermann is dead; his son Ludwig and Elizabeth have become husband and wife, and have succeeded to the inheritance of the Wartburg. Ludwig devotes himself to knight-errantry and Elizabeth to good works among the poor. During one of his campaigns Thuringia is visited by a famine, which so impoverishes her dependants that Elizabeth is forced to sell some of her landed possessions in order to maintain them. So annoyed at this are her husband and mother-in-law that they strictly forbid her to continue her ministrations among the poor; but preferring duty to obedience she goes her own way, and declines to be guided by their wishes. At the commencement of this second scene Ludwig is seen wending his way home from one of his campaigns. He is evidently in a musing mood, and leisurely riding along on his charger apostrophises his hunting-horn and the home to which he is returning. The song he now sings is wonderfully true to nature, for it partakes far more of the character of one which a person in a like situation would improvise and hum to himself than of one to be sung before an audience. Scarcely has he finished his song, when suddenly he espies Elizabeth in his path, her approach, of course, being heralded by the "Elizabeth" motive in the orchestra. Suspicious at meeting her alone, and observing her blushes, he rudely asks what she is carrying. After bidding him restrain his curiosity, she excuses herself by saying that she has been gathering flowers, the beauty of which had tempted her away from her attendants. Mistrusting her, he seizes hold of the basket she is carrying, when, lo! after confession of the falsehood she has told him, roses fall out—the bread and wine which she was taking to some poor people having been converted by a miracle into roses. Both look on in astonishment, and each begs forgiveness of the other. Elizabeth asks, "Is it a dream?" Angelic voices respond "A miracle hath the Lord performed!" The two then, in a duet of praise and prayer, address themselves to Him who helpeth those who wander in darkness; and the scene closes with a chorus of angels, blessing them and confirming their faith.

The action of the third scene takes place in the courtyard of a mediæval castle, presumably at Schmalkalden, on the borders of Thuringia, for it was here that Ludwig took leave of his wife and children on being summoned to join the new Crusade proclaimed by Pope Gregory IX., in 1227. Troops of soldiers, on the eve of their departure to join the army of the Emperor Frederick II., and the friends who have come to bid them adieu, fill the courtyard. Ludwig is received by a chorus of Crusaders, calling upon him to take the command, and, as Defender of the Faith, lead them to the Holy War. The music of this chorus and of the march which follows strikingly contrasts with that which has gone before. At one and the same time it assumes both a martial and a religious character, the latter quality being due to the fact that both chorus and march are for the most part based upon the Gregorian intonation already alluded to, and to the introduction (as trio) of the aforesaid Hungarian Pilgrims' Song. On the close of the first section of the chorus Ludwig calls upon his faithful vassals to swear allegiance to him, and to stand by Elizabeth in weal and woe during his absence. To this they readily assent. A long duet, in which Ludwig bids farewell to his wife and children, follows. Interrupted from time to time by the "call to arms," it is as sad and affecting as Ludwig's words of leave-taking are affectionate. The culminating point of grief is reached by the expression of the presentiment which Elizabeth feels that she will never see her husband again. As the troops march off the choral march is resumed.

The expulsion of Elizabeth and her children from the Wartburg forms the subject of the fourth of Schwind's pictures. At the commencement of this fourth scene news is brought of Ludwig's death of a fever, on his way to the Holy Land. In a duet with the Seneschal of the Wartburg, the Dowager Landgravine Sophie laments the death of her son, and, claiming the Wartburg as her inheritance, gives orders for the expulsion of Elizabeth and her children, a threat which, deaf to Elizabeth's entreaties and pleadings for mercy, she ruthlessly carries out. This concerted scene, in which Sophie's arrogance and lust for power, Elizabeth's grief, and the Seneschal's wavering between pity for Elizabeth and duty to his mistress, are forcibly expressed, is a truly heart-rending one. At its close, after apostrophising the Wartburg in her thankfulness for the happy home it has afforded her, and calling her children around her, Elizabeth is seen slowly wending her way from its portals in the midst of a terrific storm. "Appeased is my ambition; mine the power!" exclaims the Dowager Landgravine; but her rejoicing is suddenly cut short by the Seneschal rushing in and telling her that the wrath of heaven has descended upon the Wartburg; the lightning has struck it, and the castle is on fire. A short orchestral interlude, descriptive of the storm and of Elizabeth's feelings on this night of dire despair, leads to the following scene.

On being driven out from the Wartburg, Elizabeth took refuge in a small hospice which she had founded in her prosperity. Here, at the commencement of the fifth scene, she is found still exercising her charity among the poor in the neighbourhood. It opens with a prayerful soliloquy, in the course of which she blesses God for the grief which has come upon her as well as for her past happiness, and prays that her children may be worthy of their sire, and for a blessing upon the beloved home of her childhood and her fatherland. In reference to Elizabeth's charitable work among the poor during this time of her affliction a Chorus of Beggars—the poetic material of which was doubtless suggested by Schwind's medallions of the "Seven Works of Mercy," which complement his six "Scenes from the Life of St. Elizabeth"—is here opportunely introduced. Strikingly simple, but wonderfully true to nature, it is one of the most effective and most characteristic in the whole work. As the Beggars leave her, Elizabeth, retiring to her hospice, feels that her last hour is come. Both by poet and composer the manner in which in the face of death she commends her soul to her Saviour is very beautifully expressed. A Chorus of Angels, who are waiting to receive her soul as it rises undying to realms of everlasting light, concludes the scene.

In 1235, just five years after her death, Elizabeth was canonised as a Saint by command of Pope Gregory IX. The solemn ceremonial which accompanied her re-interment at Marburg forms the subject of the sixth and last scene. It is introduced by an orchestral interlude, which, consisting, as it does, of a recapitulation of the leading motives already employed, may be defined as a kind of meditation upon Elizabeth's life on earth. The ceremony takes place in the Cathedral, in the presence of a vast array of German and Hungarian Bishops, Princes, Crusaders, Priests, and People, headed by the Emperor, Frederick II., who delivers her funeral oration. A long succession of choruses, in which all assembled in turn take part, and which afford ample testimony of Liszt's powers as a composer of Church-music, brings the work to a most effective termination.

While thus attempting a description of "The Legend of St. Elizabeth," with a view to aiding those who listen to the work for the first time, I cannot help recalling the inestimable privilege I enjoyed of being present at its first performance at the Wartburg, in 1867. The occasion was surrounded by romance; not only was the performance conducted by Liszt himself, but it took place in the immediate vicinity of St. Elizabeth's labours, in the Hall of the Knights where the far-famed Battle of the Bards was fought, and within view of the Venusberg. I should add that, after subsequently studying the work, especially on the occasion of its being brought to a hearing by Mr. Walter Bache, in 1876, and after again recurring to it now, I see no reason for modifying the highly favourable opinion which, seventeen years ago, I expressed in the Guardian on the occasion of its first performance. ## SPOHR'S OPERAS.

By F. CORDER.

LOUIS SPOHR has been so completely pushed out of the field of late years in order to make room for more vigorous composers that we do not think we exaggerate when we assert that the general English public of the present day knows only about half-a-dozen of his works. His three oratorios are certainly pretty popular, but for some inexplicable reason the finest of these, "Calvary," is by far the least often performed—indeed, it is only through the enterprise of Messrs. Novello that the full score has at last been printed. Very little of his chamber-music is ever played;

the E flat Trio is almost the only specimen, while the lovely Nonet, the String Quartets, and the Harp and Violin Sonatas are wholly neglected. We hear his Dramatic Violin Concerto, but never any of the others, save at a Royal Academy Students' Concert. His Symphony "Die Weihe der Töne" is sometimes played, that very fine one in D minor not more than once in five years, while others, the Historical, the Seasons, the C major, and the splendid Double Symphony, have not been performed within living memory. There are the Clarinet Concertos, too, and numbers of interesting songs, all unknown to English ears. But his operas have suffered the most unaccountable neglect, considering that they contain much of his best music and that the librettos are by no means despicable; and, as an endeavour to show people what rich and unknown treasures are within their grasp, we intend here to review the text and music of all Spohr's dramatic compositions. English people have heard vaguely of "Faust" and "Jessonda" having been unsuccessfully produced in the Pyne and Harrison time, over twenty-five years ago—the overture to the latter opera is, indeed, sometimes played in our concert-rooms—but many will be surprised to see the following list of operas, each one of which is almost as good as the other, for there is no more equal writer than Spohr; if he does not rise to great heights he is never uninteresting—in fact, his principal fault is that he is too much the same. His musical dramas, of which the first two are unpublished, are ten in number, as follows:—

"Die Prüfung" ("The Trial"), one act, written in 1806.

"Alruna, die Eulenkönigin" ("The Owl-Queen"), three acts; 1808.

"Der Zweikampf mit der Geliebten" ("The Lovers' Duel"), three acts; 1811.

"Faust," two acts; 1813.

"Zemire und Azor" ("Beauty and the Beast"), two acts; 1818.

"Jessonda," three acts; 1822.

"Der Berggeist" ("The Mountain Spirit"), three acts; 1825.

"Pietro von Abano," three acts; 1827.

"Der Alchymist," three acts; 1829.

"Die Kreuzfahrer" ("The Crusaders"), three acts; 1843.

The librettos of these operas are all based on romantic subjects involving gallant knights, persecuted maidens, demons and magicians, such as Weber, Marschner, and other composers of this epoch were so fond of. It is true that they smack to our modern taste somewhat too much of the "Castle Spectre" style of melodrama, but, after all, they are fairly dramatic, and couched in tolerably sensible verse.

In Spohr's charmingly naïve autobiography we find it was at a peculiarly interesting period that he first sought to try his hand at opera. It was towards the end of his first year of married life, and, besides this, Gotha, his dwelling place, was swarming with Prussian troops, who were assembled for the impending war between Prussia and France. Not wishing to be away from home, Spohr, therefore, desired to attempt some work which would absorb his whole mind. His maternal uncle, Edward Henke, and he arranged the plan of "Die Prüfung" together, and the former wrote the lyrics. During the confusion of domestic affairs and alarms of war, Spohr calmly began and completed his labour, but though the result was considered highly satisfactory when rendered at a Court Concert, the conscientious musician, on mature consideration, deemed it better to lay aside this work. He says, "But with this feeling of dissatisfaction with my work I was truly unhappy; for I now thought to perceive that I had no talent for operatic compositions. There were, however, two things which I had forgotten duly to consider: first, that I had assumed much too elevated a style—for I had put my opera upon a par with those of Mozart—and, secondly, that I was wholly wanting in the practice and experience necessary for this kind of composition." The imitation of Mozart was a defect which Spohr never completely overcame.

His second attempt was not much more successful, though it advanced him a step or two. In 1808 a young poet offered him a libretto—"Alruna; or, the Owl-Queen"—founded on a local tradition. He composed it, and then tried to get it produced at Weimar, through the influence of the prima donna, who was all-powerful there as elsewhere. It was at length accepted, but during the inevitable disagreements and requests for alterations, Spohr got out of conceit with his work and withdrew it. The overture he preserved, and often played—indeed, it was published by André in Offenbach—but the remainder he destroyed. He considered, however, that it showed great progress.

His third attempt brought success at last. In 1810 the new director of the Hamburg theatre having four librettos sent him, distributed them to four distinguished composers—Winter, Romberg, Clasing, and Spohr. Our friend, though not much pleased with his prize, obtained leave to alter anything he had a mind to, and completed the score by the spring of 1811, as agreed. But new difficulties arose. Madame Becker, the prima donna, discovered that she should only look ridiculous as the heroine, Isabella, who is dressed in male attire throughout, and, armed cap-à-pied, fights with her lover. The manager, besides, was so annoyed at two out of the four operas having already turned out failures that he wanted to pay Spohr for his work and lay it by unperformed; but the composer was so hurt at this treatment that they managed to get other singers and put the piece in rehearsal. Contrary to all expectation, "The Lovers' Duel" turned out a brilliant success, though the worthy composer tells us that before its production he had grown quite dissatisfied with it. It has all the wealth of suave Mozartian melody, which is Spohr's principal characteristic, especially in his earlier works, and one or two numbers are real gems. The story is certainly not dramatic or exciting; it is a sort of comedieta of the eighteenth century style. The libretto is no longer extant, but the general gist of the action can be pretty well made out from the vocal score. A young Spanish cavalier, Enrignes, has quarrelled with his lady-love, Isabella, who thereupon disguises herself in male attire, pretends to be a young knight, and seeks service with the Princess Mathilde. This device of a lady disguising herself as a man is one of which the dramatists of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries never seemed to tire. The result here is that the two quondam lovers become rivals; the princess having dropped her handkerchief, they both start to pick it up, and quarrel for the honour. This leads to a duel, when the sex of Isabella is discovered, a reconciliation takes place, and all ends happily. On this slight structure, and with the aid of three more characters—Gaston, another lover of the princess, and Decio and Laurette, two of the usual conventional comic servants of melodrama, who sing arch duets à la Papageno and Papagena—a tolerably lively little piece is built up.

The overture is bustling, but very short, and calls for no special notice, but with the first number, a scene opening with an air for Enrignes:—

begins an unceasing flow of Spohrish beauties. Enrigues is about to set off on a journey, to soothe his disturbed mind, when his frightened servant announces that robbers have stolen their horses. Presently four robbers enter to seek more plunder. It is certainly rather ludicrous than imposing to hear these ruffians always sing a four-part fugato on this phrase:—

This incident is only introduced in order to give an effective entrance for the disguised Isabella, who valiantly assists to scare away the thieves. She is accompanied by the princess; and, after some conversation, there ensues one of the most charming trios Spohr has ever written. The simple theme—is taken up by each in turn, the others adding florid counterpoint in demisemi-quavers, forming a most difficult but effective canon, which could never fail to elicit an encore. Then there is a scene for the comic servants, with a pretty duet in waltz rhythm, very sportive and Mozartian. Then we have the necessary soprano scena for the princess, and this, in common with all Spohr's scenas, involves so many difficult roulades and chromatic scale-passages as to present serious obstacles to performance nowadays. It is well worth the trouble of singing, however, and we commend it to the notice of our few Sembrichs and Patis. The scene which follows this contains the handkerchief episode. The princess tries to reconcile the opponents, and, believing she has succeeded, invites all to return to the palace for her ball that evening, and the act accordingly ends with a gay sestet in dance style.

It would only be tedious to criticise each number of this opera in detail. There is a second aria for Mathilde of equal brilliancy with the first, while in the third act Isabella has a florid scena of exactly similar style. At the end of the second act the duel is about to come off, but is frustrated through the officiousness of the servants, who alarm the watch. This act ends with a finely-written septet, the chorus in this opera never making an appearance until the last scene. When the duel seems really on the point of taking place, Isabella of course declares herself, and all ends happily to a good vigorous chorus, of which the first eight bars run thus:—

Each eight bars is sung first tutti and then by the soli.

Spohr does not attempt in his operas any grand construction in the music, but where a scene of any length is set to music it is broken up into a series of short movements with quite distinct themes. There is no suggestion of a Leitmotiv anywhere.

It was at the beginning of the spring of 1813 that Spohr received an offer from Count Palfy, the proprietor of the Vienna Theatre, An der Wien, to become leader and director of the orchestra there. Besides a large salary, the tempting hint was given him that he would there find good opportunity of pushing himself as an operatic composer. But this promise was not destined to bear fruit. The poet Körner was to have been Spohr's next librettist, and had offered the subject of Rübezahl, but his joining the army was followed by his untimely death, and that hope failed. One Herr Bernhard offered a very strange libretto on the subject of "Faust," which Spohr accepted and set to music between May and September, 1813. It is surprising that he should not have preferred Goethe's poem to Bernhard's extravagant piece of nonsense, especially as he was by no means devoid of literary taste himself. He relates in his autobiography how he showed the opera to Meyerbeer, who played it from the score while the composer sang and whistled the voice parts. Meyerbeer liked the work so much that he afterwards produced it at Berlin. It has always been considered Spohr's most successful operatic effort, but is now rarely performed.

On finishing his work Spohr offered it to the An der Wien, but it was refused on account of the tenor Wild considering the part of Hugo too florid for him. Tenors were then, as now, the fruitful cause of trouble to composers. Not till 1818 was "Faust" produced first at Frankfort. We will give a short analysis of the work, as the only English edition of the vocal score (Boosey and Co.) has had but a small circulation.

The Opera of "Faust" is in two acts, but there are no less than ten changes of scene. In addition to the recitatives, there is a great deal of spoken dialogue, the English translation of which is, for the most part, exquisitely absurd. The original text, however, is sadly conventional and bombastic. The overture is a bustling affair, not particularly in character with the drama, and mainly founded on a phrase from Faust's second scena:—

It is far inferior to the overtures of "Jessonda," "Pietro von Abano," and "Alchemist." The opening of the opera is original and pretty. The scene represents an open square in Strasburg by night. The stage is empty, but from a lit-up mansion come sounds of revelry. The band behind the scenes plays what is called in the score a Minuet, though the accompaniment gives more the character of a Polonaise:—

during which Faust, richly dressed, emerges from the house, and in recitative, accompanied by the usual chords in the orchestra, expresses his disgust at his present "life of sensual leisure." It seems he has high aspirations, and has sold himself to the devil to gratify them; but the wily one turns all his virtuous strivings into sin. Mephistopheles now advances, and, after a metaphysical conversation of some length with his victim, joins him in a duet of no particular interest save that both baritone and bass indulge in breakneck roudades and scale passages. Sending Mephisto in search of Rosa (the Marguerite of the opera), Faust has a very fine scena, consisting of a Larghetto with an Allegro in the middle. The concluding cadenza we must quote as a specimen of Spohr's florid vocal style, which, however, he abandoned in his later works:—

is one of Spohr's boldest melodies. These gentlemen kindly retire to make way for Faust, who brings on Rosa, apparently for the sole purpose of singing a duet. The proceeding is, however, justified by the extreme beauty of the piece in question, which ought to be more frequently introduced into the concert-room. It begins thus:—

and is, as regards form and construction, the exact counterpart of every other duet that Spohr has written. After a strain of eight bars for each voice, the two combine in phrases of imitation, ending with a cadence in thirds and sixths. It is this terrible squareness of design which makes the operas of this epoch seem so poor in comparison with the modern school. Spohr, especially in his earlier operas, adheres with slavish tenacity to strict form, and for this reason at least ought to command the unreserved admiration of the Wagner haters.

Mephistopheles enters at the conclusion of the duet, and we learn that an armed crowd is coming to seize Faust, in the belief that he has killed Rosa's mother in order to possess the girl. Mephisto is ordered to carry Rosa out of reach, and a concerted piece follows, during which the people, led by Franz (Rosa's rejected lover), enter and vainly search the house for her. On their attempting to arrest Faust he collects his four companions—who do not seem of any particular use—and, spreading out his mantle, the five rise through the air on it and fly away, while the chorus remark, according to the English poet:—

Flying from here,
Upward they steer!
Oh horror, oh fear!

We are next introduced to a lady named Cunegunda, whom a certain Sir Gulf has carried off and imprisoned in his castle. She has a long and elaborate scena in stereotyped form. This piece used to be frequently sung in the concert-room, for no obvious reason. It is not nearly so interesting or showy as many others of Spohr's. An absurd melodramatic scene in dialogue then takes place between Sir Gulf and his scornful and virtuous captive, and the wicked knight being "foiled again" we have another scene and character presented to us. In a forest we find Count Hugo, Cunegunda's lover, with all his train of knights, preparing for an attack on Sir Gulf's castle. The Count has a very effective martial air with chorus, but it is written so high as to be exceedingly exhausting, without counting the difficulties of the bravura passages. After a meaningless scene following this, wherein Rosa, who is hastening to Faust in company with Franz, is again carried off by Mephistopheles, the fifth scene shows us the exterior of Sir Gulf's castle. There is a long dialogue between Count Hugo and Faust, who wishes to assist the cause of virtue. The chief part of this scene is then embodied in the form of a long concerted piece, a kind of thing which Spohr was very fond of writing, but in which he never showed to advantage. Sir Gulf threatens to hurl Cunegunda from the ramparts if the allies attack his castle. Faust orders Mephisto to save the lady, and deal a fitting punishment to Sir Gulf. Accordingly, a thunderstorm arises, and the castle is set on fire by lightning. The half-burnt drawbridge falls, Cunegunda and the inmates of the castle escape across it, while demons appear and drag Sir Gulf back into the blazing ruins. During these thrilling events, on which the curtain descends, Faust has had time to behold and fall in love with Cunegunda. He secretly resolves to win her for himself, at which the watchful Mephistopheles remarks:—

How a woman's charms kick over
All his good and wondrous plan!
Let the idiot soon discover Hell too much a match for man!

and the chorus, to whom the demons are supposed invisible, watch the fate of Sir Gulf and sing:—

Terrific! Oh horrible ending!
He rushed through the fiery flood,
Thus Heaven awards his offending
Doom wrought by his o'erheated blood.

The second Act opens with a witches' revel in the Hartz mountains, very picturesquely imagined by the librettist, but rather weakly illustrated by the composer. Spohr had not Weber's genius for the weird and ghostly, though he delighted in trying his hand at such subjects. Faust and Mephisto break in upon the witches' sabbath, in order to conjure up the witch Sycorax, from whom they obtain a potion which is to confer upon Faust mighty but undefined powers. The witches crowd around Faust, seeking his love much as the Flower-maidens do to Parsifal, and are similarly repulsed by the wizard, who only now thinks of winning Cunegunda.

Next we are shown the square in front of the Cathedral of Aix-la-Chapelle. The marriage of Hugo and Cunegunda is taking place within, and a hymn is heard behind the scenes, accompanied by wind instruments. During this the deserted Rosa wanders on and sings a very pathetic little air in 3-bar rhythm, after which there is much uninteresting dialogue with Franz, who sticks faithfully to his love, and the four unnecessary friends of Faust. The wedding train emerges from the cathedral to a charming intermezzo written for two bass-horns and two bassoons. It begins:—

Rosa presents herself to Faust, but he is very cold to her and sends her off in charge of the four unnecessary, in order that he may have the whole street to himself while he sings a rather incoherent but very brilliant and difficult scena, to the effect that he could be happy with either were t'other dear charmer away, but the two are too much for him. One speech preceding this is really worth quoting:—

Faust (as he looks after the receding form of Cunegunda):—Ne'er hath the world beheld her compeer! The memory of her fills up all my nature!—were I the Cæsar over empires, they would prove but false coin wherewith to purchase her possession: Ha! in my soul there burns a fire she must quell; and shall I pit my copper penny 'gainst this gold? yon boy is he her match? it must not, shall not be!

Scene 3 shows us the banquetting-hall in the palace of Count Hugo. The wedding breakfast is on hand, and the guests sing a bold chorus of a martial character:—

while Hugo and Cunegunda have a little love-duet. Among the guests are Faust and his unnecessarys, besides Mephisto, Franz, and Rosa, for no obvious reason disguised as a boy, so the invitations must have been sent out rather recklessly. During the wedding dance which follows, a graceful Polonaise, Faust makes violent love to the bride, who, subdued by his magic powers, offers but faint resistance. The wizard becomes so demonstrative that Hugo, warned by Mephisto, sees what is going on, and Rosa too. There is a quarrel. Hugo and Faust fight, while the four minions keep in check all the guests who seek to interfere; Cunegunda runs away; Faust brutally repulses Rosa, who is in despair; and Hugo falls beneath his opponent's sword, during a wild chorus of dismay.

From this thrilling scene we are taken to the Hartz Mountains again, a scene apparently introduced for the sake of Mephistopheles, who has had but little, as yet, to do. He sings an Aria, gloating over Faust's ruin, in which the voice part is so persistently kept to the bass or middle of the harmony—according to the old custom—that it has little or no interest. The witches then come on, and renew their dance and chorus, which was not worth repeating.

The last scene is in Faust's house. Cunegunda is in despair, consequently she dresses in black, lets her hair down, and sings a most exhausting scena. To her enters Rosa, and the two quarrel. Faust now finds himself in difficulties. Rosa rushes off and commits suicide, Cunegunda tries to stab him, his minions inform him that justice is on his track for the murder of Hugo, and finally Mephistopheles declares that his time is up. On hearing of his true position, all flee in terror from him; the room becomes a yawning gulf of flame, into which the sinner is dragged by a chorus of demons, while Mephisto exults. The long concerted piece which composes this scene is of small musical interest, though the conclusion has some power.

It is really astonishing how Spohr can have accepted such a mass of absurdity as this libretto. It is a chaotic heap of totally unconnected melodramatic incidents, no part of which "yearns for musical expression"; on the contrary, the musical numbers seem, one and all, dragged in by the heels. If "Euryanthe" and "Genoveva" have failed because of their bad librettos, it is inconceivable that "Faust," however charming some of the music, should have survived its first performance. And we cannot consider it Spohr's best work either, his next effort, "Zemire und Azor" is far superior in merit, having really not a weak number in it, a thing which no one dare assert of "Faust."

THE GREAT COMPOSERS

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

No. XV.—GLUCK.*

All hail to thee, immortal Gluck! whose fame
Admiring nations swell with one acclaim;
Whose genius, mocking death, shall soar sublime,
Till the last period of recording time.
Matchless composer! whose sweet strains disclose
Alceste's suffering—Iphigenia's woes—
Fair Helen's sorrows—and the griefs that melt O'er the sad tale of all fond Orpheus felt:
Whose wondrous genius, by all ranks adored,
The golden age of music has restored.
Oh! while the world shall harmony revere
Thy name to music's votaries shall be dear;
Long shall her sons thy bust with laurels crown,
Adore thy memory, cherish thy renown;
And while all low-born jealousies they spurn,
Worship the myrtles that o'ershade thy urn.

YRIARTE.

THE time and place of Gluck's birth, and even his name, were for a long period as much a matter of dispute as the identity of the city which had the proud right of calling Homer son. Down to the year 1832 the master's biographers were nearly correct in their facts and figures. Forkel's Lexicon states that Gluck was born in 1714, in the Palatinate, on the frontiers of Bohemia; but Lipowsky, in his work on the musicians of Bavaria, while agreeing as to the Palatinate, gives the date as February 14, 1712. A Bohemian priest, Father Dlabacz, who published a book of statistics concerning his native country, came nearer the truth than either. He gives the place of birth as Weidenwang, in the Palatinate, and the year as 1714, adding that the father of Christoph Gluck was a head-keeper in the employ of Prince Lobkowitz. The same Dlabacz, who seems to have been a painstaking author, makes a fuller statement in his "Allgemeines historisches Künstler-Lexikon für Böhmen"; asserting that the famous musician had a second Christian name, Willibald; and that he was born on July 4, 1714; his father's name being Alexander and his mother's Walburga. With this the world was satisfied till, in 1832, the priest of Neustadt, a village on the Bohemian frontier, discovered in the parish register an entry relating to the baptism of Christoph Gluck under date 1700. The record ran thus:—

"25 martii anno 1700 baptizatus est a me M. Andrea Dozler, co-operator, Joannes Christophorus, Joannis Adami Gluck, venatorii aulici, et Annæ Catherinæ filius legitimus, tenante prænobili Domino Joanne Christophoro Pfreimbder de Bruckenthurn et Alstensteinreith."

The good father, jealous for the honour of his village, lost no time in making his discovery known. For a while it obtained credence, and, as late as 1836, Lewald, in his journal, Euroopa, referred to it in terms of perfect faith. The new date, however, involved some difficulties; amongst others that the master was eighty-two years old when he brought out his last opera. But it is useless to argue on such grounds against a parish register, and Neustadt might have gone on enjoying an honour due elsewhere had not Alois Fuchs, a singer in the Imperial Chapel at Vienna, collected some documents very germane to the issue, and had not Anton Schmid (in his "Christoph Willibald Ritter von Gluck. Dessen Leben und tonkünstlerisches Werken" Leipzig, 1854) proved the actual facts to demonstration. Schmid puts in evidence five documents: first, a baptismal register, discovered at Weidenwang in 1842, bearing date July 4, 1714; second, the certificate of Gluck's marriage with Marianne Pergin (September 15, 1750);

* Under the original idea of this series the few extant letters of Gluck were considered in a single article (MUSICAL TIMES, December, 1880). The more extensive plan subsequently adopted enables us now to deal with the master's interesting career from beginning to end.—J. B.

third, a "certificate of existence" delivered to the master in 1785 by the Marquis de Noailles, French Ambassador at Vienna; fourth, the register of Gluck's death (November 15, 1787), and, last, his genealogical tree, compiled with infinite care and research. The "certificate of existence," which was required in order that Gluck might receive some money coming to him from the French King, ran as follows:—

"We, Emmanuel-Louis, Marquis de Noailles, . . . certify to all whom it may concern that Christophe Gluck, born July 2, 1714, composer and director of his Imperial Majesty's music, residing in this city, Carinthia Street, St. Stephen's parish, is actually living, for he has presented himself to-day before us, in order to obtain the present certificate of existence, which he has signed with us. In faith of which, &c. Done at Vienna, in our hotel, October 8, 1785."

The baptismal entry, now to be seen in the register of Weidenwang parish, runs thus:—

Baptizans, Simon Pabst, July 4, 1714. Baptizatus, Christophorus Willibaldus. Parentes, Alexander Glück, uxor Walburga venat. Levantes Christoph. Fleischmann hospes in Weidenwang."

Thus was the whole disputed matter cleared up, and taken out of the list in which the birthplace of Homer still remains.

Gluck's father, Alexander, had, as befitted his name, carried arms and served in the wars; fighting against the French under Prince Eugene of Savoy, and also, mayhap, under John Churchill, Duke of Marlborough. He was probably one of the "free lances" not even then quite extinct in Germany, and sold his sword to the highest bidder. In time Alexander Gluck, having had enough of fighting, retired from the army and married his Walburga, who bore him two sons—Christoph and Anton. Christoph was only three years old when the family settled at Neuschloss, in the north of Bohemia, Alexander Gluck there obtaining employment on the estate of Prince Kaunitz. The ex-soldier was a rough man. Inured to hardship himself, he brought up his boys with almost savage rigour, making the poor little fellows accompany him barefoot through the woods in the depth of winter. Scanty fare and hard treatment did no harm, as it chanced, and, perhaps, helped to bestow upon Christoph the robust health, indomitable energy, and independent spirit which afterwards carried him in so many a fashion through life. The lad soon showed that Music had marked him for her own. He had access to a violin and violoncello, though it does not appear that rough Alexander was accustomed to woo the muse upon those instruments. Probably they abounded in the village, as in all Bohemian places, but, be this as it may, Christoph Gluck spent all the time he could spare in learning to play upon them. Fortune favoured him. For some reason or other, Alexander left Neuschloss and took service under the Prince Lobkowitz at Eisenberg.

Near the new home of the Glucks stood the little town of Kommotau, where the Jesuits had a college, and thither Christoph was sent in 1726, being then twelve years of age. It does not appear that Prince Lobkowitz had any part in this arrangement, nor, indeed, that the boy had attracted particular attention for any reason of precocity. It may have struck his sturdy father that there was something in him more fitted for development at school than in the forests, and it would seem that the Glucks were by this time tolerably well to do, or they would hardly have kept their son at Kommotau till he had reached the age of eighteen. All that time there was no question of a musical career for Christoph. The lad's energies were chiefly devoted to the acquire-ment of general knowledge, music being in some sort a relaxation, or, at most, a second study. He was taught the violin, clavier, and organ, and sang regularly in the choir at the church of St. Ignatius. Beyond this, little or nothing is known regarding the six years at Kommotau. Probably, if all could be ascertained, it would not amount to much, for the precocity of the "wonder-child" was withheld from young Gluck. Instead of exhausting his life ere he had hardly begun to live, he quietly gathered in a store of knowledge, and built up the strong and healthy frame which endured beyond the Psalmist's three-score years and ten.

From Kommotau, the youth Christoph went to Prague as a sort of "beggar student." His father could send him very little money, and it became necessary to do something besides study in order to keep body and soul together. The situation is perfectly well understood at German universities, and not unknown in those of Scotland. Public opinion regards it as no disgrace, nor does it demand from the person most interested a sacrifice of self-respect. Gluck, therefore, began to turn to account his musical knowledge. He gave lessons in singing and on the violoncello when he could find pupils, and himself both sang and played in the churches of the Bohemian capital when he could get an engagement. In this manner he came under the notice of Czernohorsky, Organist of St. James's Church, and a musician of some note at the period, both as instrumentalist and composer. Czernohorsky at once took an interest in young Gluck, and not only gave him lessons on the violoncello and organ, but helped him to procure such small engagements as he could command. Probably the friendship of this eminent professor determined Christoph to adopt music as a means of livelihood, but even if this were not the case, circumstances more and more proved to him his dependence upon the art. During the vacations the young man had to live literally from hand to mouth, and at such times, taking his violin, he would ramble from village to village, playing dance-music to the peasants, and sleeping where he could find a place to lay his head, if only under a hay-stack or in a barn. For his services at village revels no money was given. His patrons had little of the article in question, and it was much too precious to bestow upon itinerant fiddlers. But they had plenty of eggs, a fragile and perishable commodity provided by the domestic fowl without regard for the distance of the markets. In eggs, therefore, Gluck was paid, and these he exchanged, as opportunity offered, for various articles, or used them as food.

In time Gluck touched money. Greatly daring, he took his fiddle into the towns and began playing better things than dance tunes. He even organised little Concerts of his own, while his undoubted talent and happy disposition gave him favour in the eyes of many who could befriend him. After four years of this life, the young artist, then twenty-two, believed himself qualified to dare more than ever. Accordingly, he descended upon Vienna, then the rival of Paris as arbiter of all things musical. The imperial capital at that time contained one inhabitant who had a natural interest in his fortunes—none other than Prince Lobkowitz, his father's master. The Prince opened his house to the young musician, thus securing for him the entrée into society, and putting him on terms with many eminent artists who had made Vienna their home. Caldara, Fux, the Brothers Conti, and Porsile admitted Gluck to their society, with what advantage to a youth raw from the provinces it is easy to imagine. But more important than acquaintance with these personages was the interest he inspired in a certain Count Melzi, an Italian nobleman who has immortalised himself by an act of discernment for which the whole world of music should be eternally grateful. Melzi was so struck by Gluck's natural ability that he attached him to his household, and took him to Italy for the purpose of placing him under Sammartini as a student of harmony and composition.

Sammartini was at that time still a young man, going through life in an easy fashion, writing prodigiously but carelessly, and pouring out the treasures of his imagination without much regard for the manner of their utterance. This would scarcely commend him as a teacher, but he was an immense favourite and had the ear of the public, which we can readily believe if it be true that his style in instrumental music curiously anticipated that of Haydn. Sammartini's fame extended to England, where six of his Trios were published in 1767, where also his elder brother, Joseph, flourished many years as first oboist at the opera, and died (1740) in the service of the Prince of Wales. Sammartini (or San Martini) was still living in 1770, when Dr. Burney visited Milan. "Signor Battista San Martini," writes the Doctor, "is Organist of two or three churches here: I had a letter to him from Signor Giardini, which procured me a very agreeable reception. He is brother to the famous Martini of London, who so long delighted us with his performance on the hautbois, as well as by his compositions. The music of Signor Battista San Martini, of Milan, is well known in England." In another place † Burney says: "The second Mass which I heard to-day was composed by Battista San Martini, and performed under his direction at the church of the Carmini; the symphonies were very ingenious, and full of the spirit and fire peculiar to that author. The instrumental parts in his compositions are well written; he lets none of the performers be long idle, and the violins, especially, are never suffered to sleep. It might, however, sometimes be wished that he would ride his Pegasus with a curb-bridle, for he seems absolutely to run away with him. Without metaphor, his music would please more if there were fewer notes and fewer Allegros in it; but the impetuosity of his genius impels him, in his vocal compositions, to run on in a succession of rapid movements, which in the end fatigue both the performers and the hearers."

Under Burney's impetuous musician, Gluck spent four years (1736-40) to such purpose that he was asked to write a one-act opera for the Court Theatre. In connection with this engagement, the remarkable independence of character which subsequently distinguished Gluck was foreshadowed. A pupil generally consults his master under the circumstances in question, but the young German did nothing of the kind. Selecting a poem from Metastasio, he wrote the music, distributed the parts, and began the rehearsals without taking the advice of anybody whatever. To all appearance no easy task lay before him. He was a German, and the very word had become an abomination throughout the length and breadth of the land. Moreover, those persons who attended the rehearsals made no secret of their hostility to the Tedesco. Gluck, however, remained calm. He trusted in the good faith of the public, and was not deceived. Italian passion for art overcame Italian national prejudice, and "Artaserce" proved a success—a fact the more remarkable because, though Gluck had written in the manner of the country, the qualities of German music were easily to be distinguished.

The good fortune of Gluck's premier essay put his foot on the lowest round of the ladder of fame, and then the erst-while village fiddler began rapidly to climb. Opera followed opera in quick succession, after "Artaserce" (1741) coming "Ipermestre" (1742), "Demetrio" (1742), "Demofonte" (1742), "Artamene" (1743), "Siface" (1743), "Alessandro nel Indée" (1744), and "Fedra" (1744). Of these, two were written for Venice, three for Milan, one for Cremona, and one for Turin. It does not appear that any of the works just named were printed. Then, as in the early days of Rossini, Italian composers wrote for a special theatre and a special purpose. These served, the operas produced were laid aside as having had their day. We may add that the manuscripts of all the operas written by Gluck for Milan fell a prey to fire.

An immediate result of Gluck's Italian successes was to bring him within the scope of English enterprise. At that time the circumstances of Italian opera in London were, as, indeed, they have ever been, somewhat peculiar. Handel abandoned his Covent Garden enterprise in 1741, convinced, after a long and arduous struggle, that the English people did not care for the imported entertainment. But the nobility would not readily give up what they had made exclusive and fashionable, and Lord Middlesex, having installed himself as impresario, opened the opposition house in the Haymarket—October 31, 1741—in a somewhat aggressive manner. "The opera," says Horace Walpole, "begins the day after the King's birthday. The singers are not permitted to sing till on the stage, so no one has heard them. The opera is to be in the French system of dancers, scenes, and dresses. The directors have already laid out great sums. They talk of a mob to silence the operas as they did the French players; but it will be more difficult, for here half the young noblemen in town are engaged, and they will not be easily persuaded to humour the taste of the mobility. In short, they have already retained several eminent lawyers (boxers) from the Bear Gardens to plead their defence." Schœlcher declares* that the enterprise of Lord Middlesex failed in 1744, but was resumed in 1747, and finally abandoned in 1748. On the other hand, Gluck's biographers agree that he became connected with the noble lord in 1745. This confusion as to facts and dates we cannot here attempt to set right, but, following the biographers aforesaid, it appears that, on hearing reports of the new composer's brilliant début in Italy, Lord Middlesex engaged him to come to London and produce two operas. Towards the close of 1745, Gluck, accompanied, according to some authorities, by Prince Lobkowitz, started for the English capital, traversing on his way the city (Paris) which, twenty-nine years later, he electrified with "Iphigénie in Aulide." The moment of his visit to London could not be called opportune. Handel was the popular hero, and no one cared to hear any music save his; owing to the just extinguished rebellion of Charles Edward, strangers and foreigners were regarded with suspicion, and the opera-house had been closed by order of the Lord Chamberlain. Happily, Gluck had brought over a new work, "La Caduta de' Giganti," which was capable of application to the events of the day, and, on the strength of this, Lord Middlesex obtained permission to re-open his doors, though the mob cried out against the place as a resort of foreigners and papists. The first performance of "La Caduta de' Giganti" took place, Jan. 7, 1746, in presence of "Butcher" Cumberland, who was then figuring largely about London in his cheaply earned capacity as a "hero." Burney describes the piece as irreproachable in all its parts, but the public were so indifferent that after five representations "La Caduta" disappeared from the bills. Handel, as a matter of course, went to hear the music of his countryman, and, according to report, came away saying, "He knows no more of counterpoint than my cook!" Whether the two masters met in London may be considered doubtful, but Reichard narrates an anecdote to the effect that, after the cold reception of "La Caduta," Gluck took the score to Handel and laid it before him for an opinion. "You have taken too much pains with your opera," said the giant, "it is in the wrong place here. If you would write for the English you must produce something tumultuous, and imitate the noise of drums." The story is no doubt a fabrication, and, besides being contrary to Handel's own experience, rests on no authority whatever.

* "The Present State of Music in France and Italy." Vol. I., p. 9.

• Life of Handel, p. 237.

On better grounds, Gluck is said to have become acquainted with another eminent musician then resident in London—Thomas Augustus Arne. One of Arne's works was performed during the German master's stay in England, and we are told that Gluck was struck by the "truth, simplicity, and frank gaiety" of the music—qualities of another order than those he had observed in Handel. We may assume, therefore, that he was attracted to Arne by artistic sympathy. There exists, however, no record of their acquaintance, as far as we are aware, beyond the bare fact that the two men were brought into contact.

Gluck's second opera in London was "Artamene"—already noticed as having been first produced at Cremona in 1743. Handel heard this work also, and stigmatised it as "detestable." So, probably, it was, regarded from the point of view the great Saxon no doubt took up. He himself lies open to the charge of having written vocal music more with reference to musical effect than truth of expression. But whenever Handel was at liberty to consult his own tastes nothing of the charlatan attached to him. He composed as he was moved by the inlying genius that could only be true and great. Criticising the work of Gluck he, no doubt, did so as an artist, not as a purveyor of "pot-boiling" airs, and found in his young countryman one who had adopted all the vices of Italian opera, especially that of sacrificing dramatic considerations to the ear-tickling of pretty and showy melodies. The word "detestable," therefore, is only Handel's expression, more suo, of a sentiment which the really artistic critic could not help feeling. All the same, "Artamene" was played ten times, and one air in it, "Rasserena il mesto ciglio," became a great favourite. It was this air which Gluck sang to Dr. Burney when, many years later, that musical pilgrim "interviewed" him in Vienna. One other work was produced by the master during his residence in the British metropolis, and this, while of no value in itself, had momentous consequences alike for the composer and his art.

Fétis tells us that Gluck ran over to Paris in an interval of London labour for the purpose of hearing an opera by Rameau, who was just then doing a large share towards establishing the fine school of musical declamation that constitutes one of the glories of French art. The historian adds that the first ideas of the reform afterwards worked out by Gluck were thus suggested. It is certain, however, that the necessity for reform came home to the master through a better channel—that of his own practical experience. The work above referred to as coming after "Artamene" in London was a pasticcio on the subject of Pyramus and Thisbe. Few readers need to be informed that a pasticcio opera is one made up, as to its music, of extracts selected from other works.

Handel produced several on this eminently inartistic system, among them "Lucio Vero" and "Alessandra Severo"; while many living amateurs remember a pasticcio Oratorio, "Judah," compiled by the late Mr. Gardiner, of Leicester. In order to secure success for his concoction, Gluck adopted only pieces which had met with public favour. With these he felt safe, yet, strange to say, they utterly failed, and music that in its original place had received applause, was heard, in its new connection, with indifference or dislike. The phenomenon set Gluck a-thinking. "Did it arise," he queried, "from the association of music with words arbitrarily imposed?" That he reasoned out an affirmative reply his whole subsequent career went to prove. Gluck was ever after grateful for the lesson taught him by the people of London. He told Burney that he set himself to study the English taste, noticing carefully what moved them most, and found that naturalness and simplicity were always powerful. Thenceforth he sought less to please lovers of scientific combinations and admirers of showy vocal effects than to write for the voice in a manner naturally expressive of human feeling. Burney adds that most of the airs in "Orphée" are as simple and naïve as English ballads.

It is hardly too much to say that Gluck left England a new man. At any rate, he had a new artistic method and a fresh aim, judging that "operatic music ought to be the expression proper to a situation," and that if it have not this merit all others, however splendid, are vain.

ADDISON ON ITALIAN OPERA IN ENGLAND.

IN the article, "English Music in 1884," which appeared in our last number, it was truly remarked that at the death of Purcell what was left of English music "retired to the organ-loft, and the foreigner, with his ready adaptability and his elastic principles, swarmed in to take possession of the land." That the decadence of musical art in this country may be dated from this time can scarcely be doubted; but we propose to show in the present paper that, although these successful invaders were welcomed with open arms by those whose position and power should have been used to protect our native artists, one at least of the most accomplished writers of the day boldly and eloquently defended the good cause, not only as a champion of the inherent rights of his countrymen, but as an intelligent guide and counsellor for those who were too much swayed by the tyrant Fashion to think for themselves. It may perhaps appear strange to quote Addison as an authority upon the subject of music; but it must be remembered that his active mind prevented the possibility of his viewing with apathy any innovation upon the art forms which he had learned to reverence; and the introduction of Italian Opera into England urged him to put forward a few plain facts upon the subject which cannot but be read at the present time with the deepest interest; for, apart from the manner in which they forcibly set forth the abstract absurdity of displacing works of home growth written in the language of the country, by those of foreign origin, composed to words which were not understood by the majority, they are so decisively applicable to the views held by the advanced thinkers of the day that we can scarcely believe them to have been penned before the experience of years had fully demonstrated their truth. In the extracts which we shall now make from the "Spectator," we of course retain the language of Addison unaltered: "It is my Design," he says in an article dated March 21, 1711, "in this Paper to deliver down to Posterity a faithful account of the Italian Opera, and of the gradual progress which it has made upon the English stage: For there is no Question but our great Grand-children will be very curious to know the Reason why their Forefathers used to sit together like an Audience of Foreigners in their own Country, and to hear whole Plays acted before them in a Tongue which they did not understand.

"Arsinoe was the first Opera that gave us a Taste of Italian Musick. The great Success this Opera met with produced some attempts of forming Pieces upon Italian Plans, which should give a more natural and reasonable Entertainment than what can be met with in the elaborate Trifles of that Nation. This alarm'd the Poetasters and Fidlers of the Town, who were used to deal in a more ordinary Kind of Ware; and therefore laid down an establish'd Rule, which is receiv'd as such to this Day, That nothing is capable of being well set to Musick, that is not Nonsense.

"This Maxim was no sooner receiv'd, but we immediately fell to translating the Italian Operas; and as there was no great Danger of hurting the Sense of those extraordinary Pieces, our Authors would often make Words of their own, which were entirely foreign to the Meaning of the Passages they pretended to translate; their chief Care being to make the Numbers of the English Verse answer to those of the Italian, that both of them might go to the same Tune. Thus the famous Song in Camilla—

Barbara si t'intendo, &c.

Barbarous Woman, yes, I know your Meaning.

which expresses the Resentments of an angry Lover, was translated into this English lamentation—

Frail are a Lover's Hopes, &c.

And it was pleasant enough to see the most refined Persons of the British Nation dying away and languishing to Notes that were filled with a Spirit of Rage and Indignation. It happen'd also very frequently, where the Sense was rightly translated, the necessary Transposition of Words which were drawn out of the Phrase of one Tongue into that of another, made the Musick appear very absurd in one Tongue that was very natural in the other. I remember an Italian verse that ran thus, Word for Word—

And turn'd my Rage into Pity; which the English for Rhime sake translated—

And into Pity turn'd my Rage.

By this Means the soft Notes that were adapted to Pity in the Italian fell upon the word Rage in the English; and the angry Sounds that were turn'd to Rage in the Original, were made to express Pity in the Translation. It oftentimes happen'd likewise that the finest Notes in the Air fell upon the most insignificant Words in the Sentence. I have known the Word And pursu'd through the whole Gamut, have been entertained with many a melodious The, and have heard the most beautiful Graces, Quavers, and Divisions bestowed upon Then, For, and From; to the eternal Honour of our English Particles.

"The next Step to our Refinement was the introducing of Italian Actors into our Opera, who sang their parts in their own Language, at the same Time that our Countrymen perform'd theirs in our native Tongue. The King or Hero of the Play generally spoke in Italian, and his Slaves answered him in English: The Lover frequently made his Court and gained the Heart of his Princess in a Language which she did not understand. One would have thought it very difficult to have carry'd on Dialogues after this Manner, without an Interpreter between the Persons that convers'd together; but this was the State of the English Stage for about three Years.

"At length the Audience grew tir'd of understanding Half the Opera, and therefore to ease themselves Entirely of the Fatigue of Thinking, have so order'd it at present that the whole Opera is performed in an unknown Tongue. We no longer understand the Language of our own Stage, insomuch that I have often been afraid when I have seen our Italian Performers chattering in the Vehemence of Action, that they have been calling us Names, and abusing us among themselves; but I hope, since we do put such entire Confidence in them, they will not talk against us before our Faces, though they may do it with the same Safety as if it were behind our Backs. In the mean Time, I cannot forbear thinking how naturally an Historian, who writes Two or Three hundred Years hence, and does not know the Taste of his wise Fore-fathers, will make the following Reflection: In the Beginning of the Eighteenth Century the Italian Tongue was so well understood in England that Operas were acted on the public Stage in that Language."

When Addison said that the Great-grandchildren of his own generation would be curious to know why their forefathers used to sit together "like an Audience of Foreigners in their own Country," there can be little doubt that he never imagined the possibility of so absurd a custom continuing more than a few years, and therefore confidently pictured to himself the speedy return of that wholesome patronage of native talent which had been temporarily suspended by the invasion of the foreigner. But when once a novelty becomes a "fashion" it is hopeless to attempt to weaken its power either by temperately discussing its worth or by casting ridicule upon those who adopt it. "Opera" in England speedily became "Italian Opera"; and no person was supposed to have any talent either for creating or executing music of the lyric stage whose name had not an Italian termination. In aristocratic Concert-rooms, even, the English artist was banished, the florid music of the Italian Opera, sung by the favourite vocalists, being all that the public cared to hear, and programmes were therefore almost exclusively composed of the most popular pieces of the suffering or revengeful heroine, the love-sick tenor, and the ponderous bass. The article from which we have already extracted is mainly confined to a history of the rise and progress of Italian Opera in England, and we now follow it by a quotation from another paper by Addison, in the same work, bearing date April 3, 1711, especially treating of the sympathy which should exist, in the composition of an Opera, between the poet and the musician.

"There is Nothing that has more startled our English Audience than the Italian Recitativo at its first entrance upon the stage. People were wonderfully surprised to hear Generals singing the Word of Command, and Ladies delivering Messages in Musick. Our Country-men could not forbear laughing when they heard a Lover chanting out a Billet-doux, and even the superscription of a Letter set to a Tune. The Famous Blunder in an old Play of Enter a King and two Fiddlers, Solus, was now no longer an Absurdity, when it was impossible for a Hero in a Desert, or a Princess in her Closet, to speak anything unaccompanied with musical instruments.

"But however this Italian method of acting in Recitativo might appear at first hearing, I cannot but think it much more just than that which prevailed in our English Opera before this innovation. The Transition from an Air to Recitative Musick being more natural than the passing from a Song to plain and ordinary Speaking, which was the common method in Purcell's Operas.

"The only Fault I find in our present Practice is the making use of Italian Recitativo with English Words.

"To go to the Bottom of this Matter, I must observe that the Tone, or (as the French call it) the Accent of every Nation in their ordinary Speech is altogether different from that of every other People, as we may see even in the Welsh and Scotch, who border so near upon us. By the Tone or Accent, I do not mean the Pronunciation of each particular Word, but the Sound of the whole Sentence. Thus it is very common for an English Gentleman, when he hears a French Tragedy, to complain that the Actors all of them speak in a Tone; and therefore he very wisely prefers his own Country-men, not considering that a Foreigner complains of the same Tone in an English Actor.

"For this Reason, the Recitative Musick in every Language should be as different as the Tone or Accent of each Language; for otherwise what may properly express a Passion in one Language, will not do it in another. Every one who has been long in Italy knows very well that the Cadences in the Recitativo bear a remote Affinity to the Tone of their Voices in ordinary Conversation, or to speak more properly, are only the Accents of their Language made more Musical and Tuneful.

"Thus the Notes of Interrogation, or Admiration, in the Italian Musick (if one may so call them) which resemble their Accents in Discourse on such Occasions, are not unlike the ordinary Tones of an English Voice when we are angry; insomuch that I have often seen our Audiences extremely mistaken as to what has been doing upon the Stage, and expecting to see the Hero knock down his Messenger, when he has been asking him a Question, or fancying that he quarrels with his Friend when he only bids him Good-morrow.

"For this Reason the Italian Artists cannot agree with our English Musicians in admiring Purcell's compositions, and thinking his Tunes so wonderfully adapted to his Words, because both Nations do not always express the same Passions by the same Sounds.

"I am therefore humbly of Opinion that an English Composer should not follow the Italian Recitative too servilely, but make use of many gentle Deviations from it, in Compliance with his own Native Language. He may Copy out of it all the lulling Softness and Dying Falls (as Shakespear calls them), but should still remember that he ought to accommodate himself to an English Audience, and by humouring the Tone of our Voices in ordinary Conversation, have the same Regard to the Accent of his own Language, as those Persons had to theirs whom he professes to imitate. It is observed that several of the singing Birds of our own Country learn to sweeten their Voices, and mellow the Harshness of their natural Notes, by practising under those that come from warmer Climates. In the same manner I would allow the Italian Opera to lend our English Musick as much as may grace and soften it, but never entirely to annihilate and destroy it. Let the Infusion be as strong as you please, but still let the Subject Matter of it be English.

"A Composer should fit his Musick to the Genius of the People, and consider that the Delicacy of Hearing, and Taste of Harmony, has been formed upon those Sounds which every Country abounds with: In short, that Musick is of a Relative Nature, and what is Harmony to one Ear, may be Dissonance to another.

"The same Observations which I have made upon the Recitative part of Musick may be applied to all our Songs and Airs in general."

Although written in the early part of the last century, these remarks express a truth which cannot be too much taken to heart by those who in the present day are hopeful of founding a National School of Music. Doubtless the Italian fever which has prevailed in this country for so many years is now rapidly dying out; but it has taught us a lesson, and if in the models with which our operatic stage has been inundated we see but little to copy, we at least see what to avoid. Addison's assertion that "nothing is capable of being set to Musick that is not nonsense" has too much truth in it to be accepted as a mere piece of hyperbole, for very many of the Italian Operas were really only vehicles for the display of the vocalists; and as commonplaces uttered in a foreign tongue sounded sufficiently like poetry for the flimsy music to which they were set, audiences sat patiently to listen to words which they would scarcely have endured in their native language. The change which has latterly taken place in public opinion is known to all. Music—especially operatic music—is now in a transition state, for although we have discarded the old forms, we have not yet arrived at the new. There can be no doubt that the prospects of the art have brightened year by year, and that we are no longer either slaves to a foreign school which has been nursed into life by aristocratic patronage, or satisfied with those pretty and tuneful, but feeble, works which were esteemed beyond their real worth because they were composed by our countrymen for the people during the tyrannous reign of Italian Opera. In looking to the future we have no right to hope or expect that our native composers should take a higher place in public opinion than is fairly due to their talents, but they have unquestionably a right to a hearing; and the barriers which excluded them being once removed, a fair and impartial trial of their powers may triumphantly prove to the world that England can create, as well as patronise, musical art.

H. C. L.

STAR worship, in spite of the very wholesome precepts administered to the operatic world in general by Richard Wagner, still continues to flourish, even among the reformer's own countrymen. The tenor Wachtel, as our readers are aware, recently aroused the enthusiasm of a Berlin audience by singing for the nine hundredth time his favourite rôle in Adam's "Postillon de Lonjumeau." Wachtel, as every one knows to his credit, was in his younger days a hackney coachman at Hamburg. Herr Pollini, the Hamburg impresario, was fortunate enough to discover, some three years ago, a gentleman presiding over a conveyance of a similar description and endowed with similarly "phenomenal" vocal powers, the fact having been at the time duly announced in our "Foreign Notes." The present writer, who has repeatedly availed himself of a recent opportunity to hear the newly created operatic tenor, Herr Bötel, at the Hamburg Stadt-Theater, is constrained to describe the impression produced upon his mind on these occasions as one of profound wonder at the mysterious designs of nature in lavishing, with an apparently reckless hand, her vocal endowments upon an individual whose general "physique" and previous training would seem to point to any other calling rather than to the pursuit of musico-histrionic art. A truly magnificent voice, to be sure, is a most precious gift, but it is after all but a portion of the material out of which true artists are formed. Herr Bötel, with continued application, may in time become a second Wachtel, with half-a-dozen or so chevaux de bataille to make good his raison d'être upon the operatic stage, but we question whether he will ever become an artist. Meanwhile, in justification of our opening assertion, and as a reminder that our continental neighbours have still as much to learn or to unlearn in the matter of star worship as ourselves, we would just record the "almost unparalleled enthusiasm, scarcely equalled by that aroused by Adelina Patti or Gerster," displayed by the audience of the Kroll'sche Theater, at Berlin, on the recent appearance there of Herr Bötzel, the new "phenomenal" German tenor, exhibited by Herr Pollini, the Hamburg impresario.

WE often hear it asserted that many of the wrongs men are compelled to endure are much mitigated by the fact of their being "used to it." A poor conductor of an omnibus, for example, sometimes gets soaked to the skin, and sometimes baked with the sun's rays; or an art-lover, in a higher class of life, is almost suffocated from the pressure of the crowd, and has his coat half torn from his back in attempting to gain an "unreserved seat" when a favourite opera is performed. Of course a cover could be placed over the conductor to protect him from the weather, and only numbered places might be issued at an Opera House, to prevent a crush at the doors; but then the victims are tacitly supposed not to think themselves much aggrieved because they are "used to it." So it may be said that authors and composers have been so long accustomed to see their works, published in one country, re-produced in another, without the slightest remuneration, that they can have but little right to complain. But as certain courtesies are usually observed when a man's ideas are thus appropriated, we cannot but think that we are justified in entering a protest against the editor of an American journal who recently extracted an entire article from a volume of Sketches published in England, without any indication of the source from which it was obtained. Certainly three letters are placed at the end of it, and these are the initials of the real author; but for fear any person might think that the article was not written by a contributor to the paper in question, an unmistakable American colour is given to it by speaking of "dollars" instead of "pounds" every time a sum of money is mentioned, and by some few other minor alterations. Now, as this system is entirely new, we call attention to it in case the example should be followed by other journals. We demur not to acknowledged quotations, even of entire articles; but when they are altered (as Sheridan says, in a similar case, that gipsies disfigure stolen children to make them pass for their own) some slight remonstrance from the authors may certainly be anticipated—at least until they get "used to it."

SOME time ago we commented upon the advertisements constantly appearing from musical professors, who offer, for a consideration, to look over, correct, and arrange for publication the crude manuscripts of any person who fancies that he has a "turn" for composition, so that he may delude his friends into the belief that he employs his leisure time in throwing off songs and pianoforte pieces by the dozen without the trouble of going through the usual process of studying. But, after all, like the tailor who issues the announcement "Ladies' and gentlemen's own materials made up," the real worker is provided with something to employ his talents upon; and however well the article may be cut and put together, the purchaser must of course expect that its quality will be precisely what he has himself supplied. But the following, cut from a daily London paper, proves that the reputation of a composer may be built upon much easier terms: "Composition of Music for Amateurs and Private Gentlemen. A well-known German Composer is willing to Compose Music. The buyer will have the right to publish them in his own name and acquire all ownership. Strict discretion is assured, and must be mutual. Address, stating nature of music required, to——" If the German composer who issues this advertisement is, as he states, "well-known," it seems a pity that he should not attempt to become better known by publishing music in his own name; for, apart from the artistic falsehoods which will be perpetuated by the system he proposes, we much question whether a sufficient number of persons will lend themselves to such a deception to make it a very lucrative calling. As nothing is said about terms, we may reasonably conclude that there is a sliding scale of charges, especially as the "nature of music required" is to be stated. No doubt classical pieces will be somewhat dear; but to be a composer without composing should be an expensive luxury, and a man who engages in this "confidence trick" has no right to complain of being fleeced.

THE custom of singing what is understood to be a comic song "in character" has long been recognised by a certain section of the public, the kind of costumes worn on such occasions being displayed in coloured illustrations at music-shops devoted to compositions of the humorous class in our principal thoroughfares. We had always imagined, however, that this method of identifying yourself with a part was entirely confined to music halls; but there is a danger, it appears, of its intruding into classical Concert-rooms, if we can credit the following information: "A German Conductor," we are told, "in order that the public may be more deeply impressed with the feeling of grief intended to be produced by the Funeral March in Beethoven's 'Eroica Symphony,' wears black gloves while conducting this movement, after having worn white gloves during the preceding part of the Symphony." Presuming that the fashion set by this sympathetic Conductor were to be extensively followed, several difficulties should be foreseen and provided for. In the first place, as the programme of a Concert usually contains music representative of varied feelings, the costume must be constantly changed, and this would often necessitate long pauses between the pieces. Then, probably, the face would have occasionally to be "made up," unless indeed an artist can be procured who has the power of assuming any expression suited to the occasion. But the great obstacle to the satisfactory development of this idea would be that the dress must be altered not only for every composition, but often for each movement of a Symphony, and the time occupied in thus preparing might possibly detract from the effect of the work. No doubt, however, these slight objections to the general adoption of costumes for conductors will be shortly overcome, and we may expect to see one dressed as a Highlander for Mendelssohn's "Scotch Symphony," as a soldier for the "Military Symphony" of Haydn, and as a sailor for Beethoven's "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage."

A SOMEWHAT ludicrous instance of what we will describe as a misunderstanding between author and editor has been lately furnished by the Paris Le Ménestrel. That journal in two of its recent numbers, under the heading of "La Musique et Les Musiciens," has commenced the publication of a series of extracts from Wagner's writings concerning various composers, to which, with every appearance of seriousness of purpose, it appended the remark that they were being "translated for the first time into French by M. Camille Benoit." Nor were the selections injudiciously made or the translation rendered in any other spirit than that of loyal adherence to the original. It so happened that in the number containing the second instalment of the intended series of tit-bits, introducing the author Wagner to French readers, the reformer's literary contributions to the art were incidentally referred to as "le pathos insupportable de Wagner" in another article. This expression M. Benoit, instead of simply ignoring, has forthwith protested against in a long and, indeed, very able letter to the editor, describing the treatment accorded to Wagner in France as unfair and unworthy of the nation, and re-opening thereby the whole question of anti-Wagnerism in a journal otherwise disposed to let it go by. The sequel to the incident supplies us with the humour of it. The journal referred to, while making due allowance for the "able defence of Wagner" made by its contributor, M. Benoit, professes itself to be utterly surprised at the translator's seeming seriousness in furnishing the extracts in question, since they were only suffered by the editor to find their way into the paper as a species of literary "curiosities" too utterly preposterous to be received in sober earnest by Frenchmen. We doubt whether M. Camille Benoit will continue to furnish the curiosity column of Le Ménestrel with his Wagner excerpts for some time to come.

THE rapid spread of Choral Societies, and the consequent performance of important standard works, has undoubtedly done much towards diminishing the number of miscellaneous Concerts, which used to form an important portion of the fashionable London season. Those who watch the changes which take place in the varied musical attractions of the metropolis will, however, see that they have within the last year or two much increased, but with a modification which, in the interest of healthy musical progress, we can scarcely regard with satisfaction. We see no diminution in the high character of the programmes—on the contrary, the classical nature of the vocal and instrumental selections is more marked than ever—but the new feature which has latterly grown up in our Concert-rooms is the admission of dramatic recitations, sometimes serious, and sometimes comic, by eminent actors, which, however excellent in themselves, scarcely fit in with the musical works by which they are surrounded. Regarded merely in a pecuniary sense, such interpolations may prove extremely profitable; but we speak on the subject artistically, and not commercially. Within our own experience we have found that intending purchasers of tickets have passed over an excellent Concert—limited, as a Concert should be, to music—in favour of a slightly inferior one in which a favourite actor was announced to take part. As it is possible that the success of this innovation may in time lead to the introduction of other attractions—even less in sympathy with musical art—it is well that at least the matter should be ventilated. Music has quite sufficient power in itself to draw an appreciative audience, and, in common with all true art-lovers, we should be extremely sorry to see a Concert degenerate into what is popularly known as a "Variety Entertainment."

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

THE revival of Gounod's Opera "Roméo et Juliette," of course in the Italian version, gave Madame Albani an opportunity of adding one more to her many successes, both as a vocalist and an actress; for not only did she sing the whole of the music with exquisite refinement, but in the many opportunities afforded her for the exhibition of dramatic power she created a marked effect. Mlle. Reggiani, who sang the Page's song in the third act, must also be mentioned as a highly promising mezzo-soprano; and although Signor Marconi by no means realised the ideal either of Shakespeare or Gounod as Roméo, he was throughout both earnest and careful. Signor De Reszke, however, was an admirable Friar Laurence, and Signor Cotogni a very fair Mercutio. The first appearance this season of Madame Adelina Patti drew an enormous audience; and as she chose the part of Violetta, in "La Traviata," it need scarcely be said that she excited an enthusiasm which we would wish to see reserved for a better cause. She has since appeared in "Aida," the exacting music of which she sang more finely than ever, and was rewarded with the usual number of bouquets, according to the long recognised custom of fashionable Italian Opera. We are glad to say that Mozart's "Le Nozze di Figaro," with the excellent cast mentioned in our last notice, has been one of the most powerful attractions; but the revivals have included "Il Barbiere," "Lucrezia Borgia," with that painstaking artist, Madame Durand, in the part of the heroine, and also Gounod's "Faust" for the début of Miss Griswold as Marguerite, an ill-advised essay, however, of a really clever vocalist, who sang well enough to make us wish to hear her in a character more suited to her capabilities. It is understood that she was to have appeared in Mr. Mackenzie's "Colomba," but that admirable work, although announced in the prospectus of the season, could not, unfortunately, be given. It is, however, again promised for next season.

RICHTER CONCERTS.

THE first Monday in June being Whit-Monday, the order of these Concerts was changed, and a performance took place on the Thursday following. It brought some disappointment to the audience, who expected to hear the music of the Supper Scene in Wagner's "Parsifal," and were regaled instead with the well-worn Vorspiel and Liebestod from "Tristan und Isolde." Indignation has been expressed in some quarters because no notice was given of the change. We cannot call the feeling unreasonable, since, if there was time to prepare the book of words according to the actual programme, there must also have been time to announce the withdrawal of the "Parsifal" music. It is always wise in concert-givers to keep perfect good faith with the public. Policy like that adopted on the occasion referred to may secure a few pounds more for the treasury, but gold may be bought too dear. The programme, even with the selection from Wagner's last work taken away, was not devoid of novelty; Liszt's third Hungarian Rhapsody (never before heard in this country, we are told) remaining to delight the lovers of characteristic national melodies, apart from which the work has simply no value at all. The Rhapsody contains four airs, embellished in the usual manner of the great virtuoso, who employs in his orchestra a dulcimer, or Hungarian "czimbalon." The instrument was, we believe, played by a member of one of the Hungarian bands now in this country. Berlioz's Symphonic Fantastique, "Episode de la vie d'un Artist," formed another conspicuous feature in the programme, and was heard with great attention, if not enthusiastic approval of every part. What music may eventually come to none of us can tell, but connoisseurs must devoutly hope that such painfully realistic work as is found in the closing sections of the Frenchman's Symphony will never pass as classic art, or as more than the just permissible freak of a gifted and erratic man. The earlier movements, on the other hand can always be heard with pleasure, quite apart from the "programme" they help to illustrate. Herr Richter seemed to have taken great pains with the preparation of the work, and its performance, though not free from mishap was one to be remembered by all present. With the important things above noticed were given the "Leonora Overture, an aria by Mozart and one by Weber, the vocalist being Frau Schuch-Proska.

At the Concert of the 11th ult. the attendance was not very good, owing, no doubt, to the absence from the programme of very special attractions other than Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, which, perhaps, is too familiar not to serve of itself as a magnet. Méhul's interesting Overture to "La Chasse du Jeune Henri"—a bright, simple and exhilarating piece, once very popular in this country—opened the Concert in the cheeriest manner. It had not been played in London, we believe, since Mr. Barnby produced it at the Albert Hall in 1873. Herr Richter should unearth more such buried treasures, unworthily neglected by the world because they do not bear some illustrious German name. Méhul is especially worth attention, some Symphonies from his pen being certain to repay the trouble of producing them. Mr. Hubert Parry's MS. Concerto in F sharp, for piano and orchestra, followed the Overture, Herr Dannreuther taking the solo instrument and acquitting himself therewith with his usual intelligence and skill. The Concerto has already engaged attention in our columns, and we do not mean to disturb the verdict given after the first hearing. Mr. Parry's music is of a sort adapted to provoke controversy, and in this case we leave it to the judgment of the future, which in every such instance has the final and decisive word. The vocal part in Wotan's Abschied from "Die Walküre" was taken by Herr Reichmann of the German Opera.

The season ended on the 16th ult. with a programme that certainly contained enough to satisfy the largest musical appetite. In it there was one new feature—an Overture to "Romeo and Juliet," by the late Joachim Raff. It is difficult to resist an idea that this owes its name to sportive chance, since not a phrase or bar has any obvious connection with the beautiful and passionate story of the Italian lovers. There is neither warmth of feeling nor beauty of utterance. The work is heavy, laboured, and lugubrious; smells terribly of the lamp, and forms altogether a musical enigma the key to which Raff has taken with him. We marvel why Herr Richter produced it, but still more why the composer's executors did not allow it to remain in harmless manuscript. The Overture received a painstaking performance, but the public condemned it out of hand, only a few timid applause sounds following the last bar. Brahms's "Schicksalslied" made amends for Raff's mistake. The noble music, capitably given, sank deep into the minds and hearts of the audience, and made the impression frequently before remarked in connection with a work fit to be associated with the composer's masterpiece, the "German Requiem." After this the "Tannhäuser" Overture certainly afforded variety. It was splendidly played and applauded to the echo. Then followed the usual finale of the Richter season—Beethoven's Choral Symphony. Accepting the Conductor's reading of the orchestral movements in this work, it is difficult to find fault with the manner of their performance, which, indeed, gave the highest pleasure. As soon as the voices entered another state of things prevailed. The chorus struggled bravely, but without avail, against the difficulties of their task, and the German artists—Frau Proska, Fräulein Schaernack, Herr Oberländer, and Herr Wiegand—engaged for the solo passages—were far inferior to the English singers usually employed on these occasions. As a matter of fact, their performance gave considerable umbrage to a large section of the audience, and threw a shadow over what might have been an event of uniform brightness. At the close, Herr Richter was enthusiastically applauded.

SIR JULIUS BENEDICT'S JUBILEE.

ALTHOUGH the public patronage accorded to the Jubilee Concerts given by Sir Julius Benedict at the Albert Hall, on the 6th and 7th ult., was less than might have been anticipated or than would have been bestowed in more favourable times, it was sufficient to mark the respect due to a musician who has laboured honourably in our midst for half a century. Not only is the length of service rendered by Sir Julius Benedict phenomenal, but the infinite variety of his labours and the success he has won in many diverse branches of our art entitle him to a foremost place among musicians of the present century. His compositions embrace examples of every style of writing, from the opera and the oratorio to the humble ballad and the drawing-room pianoforte piece. As a conductor, a teacher, and an executant, his name has ever been prominently before the public, and his services have been sought for with extraordinary avidity, as if the very mention of his name were considered beneficial in promoting the success of divers enterprises. Such was the artist who, in the 80th year of his own age and the 50th from the date of his first appearance in a London Concert-room, stood up, on the first of the dates above mentioned, to conduct the most important sacred work that has proceeded from his pen; and we repeat that only the general dulness of the season—perhaps also the circumstance that the ordinary prices of admission were doubled—could account for the fact that so many seats were tenanted. "St. Peter," it will be remembered, was produced at the Birmingham Festival of 1870, and was not only then acclaimed as a work of genius, but was afterwards performed more than once in London with much applause. Our oratorio societies, however, did not take the work into their confidence and it fell into comparative neglect, for reasons easily to be understood though worthy of regret. "St. Peter" has, unfortunately, a somewhat unsatisfactory libretto, but little attempt being made to illustrate any of the incidents in the life of the apostle in a straightforward and dramatic style, the constant intrusion of reflective and didactic matter hampering the composer to such an extent that, with all his skill, he has been unable wholly to overcome the obstacles placed in his path. As first presented to him, the book was found to be impracticable, and some may remember the angry protests made by the compiler, Mr. H. F. Chorley, because it became absolutely necessary to make certain alterations with a view of increasing the chances of musical effect. Even as it is, the chief character is a shadowy personage, and the frequent sermonising may possibly give rise to a sense of weariness in a performance of the whole Oratorio. On the other hand, the beauty of individual numbers is so excessive that conductors of choral societies who might shrink from performing "St. Peter" in its entirety, would be certain to please their audiences by giving judicious selections from the work. Most of the airs are highly expressive and melodious, and some of them are veritable gems. Only a composer of rare natural ability could have penned "O thou afflicted" (contralto), "The Lord is very pitiful" (tenor), and "I mourn as a dove" (soprano); while "The Lord hath His way" and "Gird up thy loins" are amongst the most effective bravura pieces of modern times. The choruses are marked by consummate musicianship, and the contrast between the tender beauty of "The Lord be a lamp," the contrapuntal skill of "Praise ye the Lord" and "Sing unto the Lord," which conclude the first and second parts respectively, and the dramatic vigour of "Thou that destroyest the Temple," show that the composer only needed opportunity to prove himself a master of this form of art. It only remains to call attention to the orchestral skill exhibited in the overture, the prayer and rising of the storm, and the marches in the second part. We are sorry to be unable to speak favourably of the performance as a whole, though the rendering of the solos left absolutely nothing to desire. Madame Albani has rarely been heard to greater advantage than in the soprano music, and both Madame Patey and Mr. Santley sang their best, being doubtless animated by a desire to render the utmost honour to the occasion. Mr. Sims Reeves sang the first tenor air and then retired in favour of Mr. Winch, who interpreted the rest of the tenor music with singular artistic perception of its requirements. The ensemble in the beautiful quartet "O come let us sing" was perfect, and the hearty encore of the piece testified to the delight of the audience. Here, unfortunately, praise must end. The orchestra was obviously too small to secure the requisite breadth of effect, and the playing was generally coarse and not unfrequently slipshod. The positive defects may have been due to want of rehearsal, and the same cause probably led to the disgraceful singing of the choir. We have used a harsh expression, but it cannot be withheld, for the Albert Hall Choir occupies such a distinguished position among Choral Societies—thanks to its magnificent performances of the masterpieces of Oratorio—that its gross imperfections on the present occasion came as a painful surprise. If the choristers had been reading the music for the first time the mistakes could scarcely have been more numerous, nor the efforts of Dr. Stainer to maintain accuracy of time and intonation by means of the organ more necessary.

The miscellaneous Concert, on the following Saturday afternoon, was one of those monster entertainments occasionally given by public caterers to attract audiences by the mere mass of material provided. Concerts of this kind do not as a rule require more than formal notice, but the present instance was quite exceptional, and we shall be expected to refer, at any rate briefly, to what was done, though it is neither possible nor desirable to mention many of the thirty items in the programme. Sir Julius Benedict's name was attached to nine pieces, of which the most curious was an arrangement of the Tarantella from the Cantata "Graziella," for eight pianists and four harpists, and the most important his own solo piece, a familiar pianoforte transcription of Irish airs. There are obvious reasons why the Concert-giver did not attempt a standard pianoforte work, and the Irish fantasia answered the purpose for which it was selected, that of enabling the audience to pay an enthusiastic personal tribute to the veteran musician. In response, Sir Julius Benedict addressed the assemblage in a few well chosen words, thanking the English public for their hearty appreciation of his fifty years' labours in the field of musical art. Next to this significant and touching episode, the most interesting feature of the Concert was the appearance of the celebrated operatic prima donna, Madame Sembrich, as a violinist. We are informed that this lady is also an accomplished pianist, though of that we cannot speak from direct knowledge. Her skill on the most difficult of all instruments is considerable, the two movements from De Beriot's Concerto in D being no mean test of executive power, and the hearty applause that followed her performance was something more than a mere compliment. The rest of the Concert must needs be passed over in silence, a long list of eminent vocalists and instrumentalists appearing in selections calculated to display their various talents to the utmost advantage. There can be little doubt therefore that the audience left the hall thoroughly satisfied with the menu set before them.

SEÑOR SARASATE'S CONCERTS.

THE last of the four Concerts originally announced took place in St. James's Hall, on Saturday afternoon, May 31. On this occasion the Spanish virtuoso selected, as his principal executive display, a thoroughly appropriate work—namely, the so-called "Symphonie Espagnole" of Edward Lalo. Grove's "Dictionary" is silent as to this composer, but from M. Pougin's supplement to Fétis we gather that he has written a large number of instrumental works, among which is an earlier Violin Concerto, composed expressly for Señor Sarasate. The "Symphonie Espagnole" is an extremely clever and, on the whole, effective work. If not characterised by the highest order of genius it is far from commonplace, the ideas being generally fresh and unconventional. The solo part was superbly played, and another great success was won in Raff's Suite in G minor, a melodious and agreeable work. The violinist's other solos were mere claptrap, and need no criticism in this place. The orchestral works at this Concert were Mozart's Symphony in G minor, the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," and the Overture to "Ruy Blas."

The public interest in these performances not being exhausted, an extra Concert was given on Monday afternoon, the 9th ult. The number of good modern violin concertos being few, and the classical school not being suited to Señor Sarasate's style, he may be excused for bringing forward Max Bruch's "Concerto Ecossois," which he performed last season at the Philharmonic Concerts. It was said at that time that the composer had originally styled his work a fantasia, and that the title of concerto was bestowed on it in order to bring it within the rules of the Philharmonic Society. However this may be, it is a very weak effusion, the Scotch tunes introduced being deprived of their distinctiveness, while there is nothing approaching musical development save in the final movement. Still, the work enabled Señor Sarasate to evince his marvellous technical skill, which was further exemplified in a Barcarole and Rondo Capriccioso, by Saint-Saëns, and the violinist's own Fantasia on Gounod's "Faust." Mr. Cusins's orchestra gave a perfunctory rendering of Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, two movements of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, and the Conductor's overture, "Love's Labour Lost."

MUSIC IN OXFORD.

CHANGES in examinations are tending to change the centre of Oxford gaieties from Commemoration to the week of the boat-races, and the old city was never, perhaps, fuller than from May 15 to 26 this year. Musically, the chief Concert was that given in the Sheldonian Theatre by the Choral Society, on the 21st, for on that occasion "Prometheus Unbound" was performed, and the new Choragus of the University, Dr. C. H. H. Parry, made his first appearance as a public character in Oxford. The performance was exceedingly good all round—soloists, band, and chorus—and was listened to with earnest attention. The pieces that made most impression were the finales to each part, and the tenor and soprano solis in the second part. At the close, Dr. Parry was very warmly applauded. "The May Queen" formed the second part of the programme, but towards the end everybody perceptibly tired, and sundry mistakes occurred. The performance of "Prometheus" was really a grand instance of difficulties surmounted.

College Concerts gain in importance yearly, and four took place in the same week. Exeter and Queen's gave their Concerts on the same night, Friday, the 23rd. Not being able to be in two places at once, we must content ourselves with recording that Macfarren's "May Day" was given at Exeter. At Queen's the programme was of exceptional interest, having only one blot, a paltry drawing-room song in the second part, which seemed strangely out of keeping with its surroundings. The "Surprise" Symphony has not been heard here for so long that it was practically a novelty, and the same may be said of Schumann's "Luck of Edenhall." The rest of the programme was almost wholly new. Some of the Cologne Choir part-songs were given with a refinement and vigour which recalled that celebrated body of choristers. Two compositions had been written for the Concert, a Serenade for Strings, by Dr. Iliffe, and a Quartet for men's voices by Mr. Whishaw. The former struck us as over simple, and the latter as over elaborated. Both, however, had sterling merit and were well received. The interest of the evening centred in the rendering of Mrs. Meadows White's Cantata "The Little Baltung." Barring one slip, the performance was good, and the natural, genial music made a great impression. At the close Mrs. White was heartily cheered. Messrs. Tuckwell and Wonnacott deserve a word of praise for their excellent work as soloists, and band and chorus worked hard and successfully, for the music was of the kind that provokes and rewards enthusiasm in executants.

Only second in point of interest were the Concerts at Worcester (21st) and Merton (20th), at both of which, after a growing custom, ladies appeared in the chorus. At Merton, Barnett's "Paradise and the Peri" was well performed, except for some errors in the clarinets, and the omission of the opening of one chorus. At Worcester Gade's "Comala" was very fairly rendered, though the bass solos were entrusted to a gentleman whose want of compass compelled him to alter almost every other bar. If a competent singer is not at hand, it is surely better to engage a professional soloist, as at Merton, than to tamper with the music. In the second part the songs were of the feeblest character, and the slightest applause from a knot of undergraduates at the end of the Hall was the signal for an encore. Out of nine pieces in the second part five were encored! The wise musician will keep away from Worcester till things are better managed.

The College Concerts at Commemoration were, on the whole, of less musical importance. The well-worn "Ancient Mariner" was given at New College, on the 16th ult., and at Magdalen Madrigals again reigned supreme. Concerts were also given by Keble (on the 11th) and Pembroke (on the 13th). At the former Gade's "Psyche" was produced for the first time in Oxford. A sensible prudence was shown in securing a professional singer (Miss Amy Aylward) for the principal part. The band consisted only of string and, therefore, many of the best effects in the score were lost. In the second part Miss Price sang well. Pembroke Concert proved better than the cognoscenti had predicted, but was not very strong after all. Mr. Lloyd's part-song "A wet sheet and a flowing sea" was the best item in the programme.

On June 16 the Philharmonic Society gave the chief Concert of the week in the Sheldonian Theatre. The programme consisted of "Athalie" and "Preciosa." It was, in our opinion, a very serious error in judgment to give two works that properly belong to the stage in the same Concert, nor were matters mended by the entire omission of the spoken melodrama, presumably from motives of economy. "Preciosa," in particular, was thus reduced to a farrago of nonsense. When we add that neither band nor chorus seemed to be quite sure of what they were doing, we have said enough to show that the general effect produced by the Concert was that it was very dull. To our thinking the pleasantest features of the whole were two pieces thrown in to make up the second part—"Che faro," sung by Madame Patey, and Eaton Fanning's "Daybreak," well rendered by the chorus.

MUSIC IN THE WEST.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THERE have been no Concerts of importance in Bristol during the past month, and music seems to have come to an end for this season.

In Exeter things have been more lively. The Concert of the Exeter Oratorio Society was given at the Victoria Hall, on May 27, when an excellent rendering of "The Holy City," by Gaul, was the chief feature. The work was performed under the direction of the composer, who was invited by the Conductor of the Society, Mr. G. W. Lyon, and it was well received and much applauded. The second part of the Concert consisted of Sir Sterndale Bennett's "May Queen," and was conducted by Mr. Lyon. The Exeter Madrigal Society gave its first Concert for this year at the Public Rooms, on Wednesday, May 29. The programme was as follows:—"O who will o'er the downs," Pearsall; "In pride of May," Weelkes; "A Spring Song," Pinsuti; "Thyrsis, sleepest thou?" Benet; "The Shepherd's farewell," Smart; "Who is Sylvia?" Macfarren; "Stay, limpid stream," Marenzio; "Sir Knight, Sir Knight," Macrone; "Ye singers all," Waelrant; "The Three Fishers," Macfarren; "Dost thou idly ask to hear," Hake; "Oh, hush thee, my babe," Sullivan; "Pretty warbler," Webbe; "Great God of Love," Pearsall; "The wreath," Benedict; "Gentle as a Zephyr," Wass. The music was, on the whole, well performed, though a little want of precision was at times observable. This was the farewell Concert of the hon. Conductor, Mr. W. Bayly, R.A.M., whose resignation is much regretted, he having occupied the post with much ability and success for twenty-five years, during which time he has earned the esteem and respect of all connected with the Society. He is succeeded by Mr. R. B. Moore, F.C.O., Organist of St. Mary Major.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE inhabitants of the West Riding just now take their music al fresco, and with beautiful weather such as that with which we have been favoured, the change from the concert-room to the promenade is very pleasant. The Promenade Concerts at the Spa Grounds, Harrogate, have once more commenced. Mr. Burton is again the Conductor, and, as might be expected from so experienced a musician, the music provided is of a high-class, and produced on a somewhat elaborate scale. The orchestra is not quite so large as it might be, but its members are excellent musicians, and play confidently. At the opening Concert, Mr. Burton, with the aid of the Harrogate Choral Union and other ladies and gentlemen, produced the "Walpurgis Night." The performance was an admirable one, considering that the force of vocalists and instrumentalists was rather small. The miscellaneous portion of the Concert included violin solos by Mr. Edgar Haddock, who always plays well and artistically. The Concert was followed, a few days later, by a performance of the "Lobgesang."

At the Choir anniversary of the Wesleyan Chapel, Greenside, Wortley, on the 15th ult., Gaul's Cantata "The Holy City" was performed, with the assistance of several local soloists—namely, Mrs. Kennedy, Miss Kennedy, Mrs. Ewing, Mr. Kennedy, and Mr. Pickard. Mr. H. H. Pickard presided at the organ.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE only music which one can hear in the Metropolis at the present time, and for the next two months, is that by the military and police bands, which play in the Waverley Market and West Princes Street Gardens in the afternoons and evenings during summer; a considerable number of performances having been arranged for through the public-spiritedness of the Town Council. The selections of music are of the usual type, and the execution is respectable. Edinburgh is splendidly situated, as many of your readers will know, for out-of-door entertainments of the kind, and during the months of July and August English visitors to the Metropolis of the North are generally very numerous.

On May 28 the annual Concert of Mr. Waddel's Choir took place in the Freemasons' Hall, before a crowded audience. The Choir numbered nearly seventy voices, and had the support of a small but select string band. The principal work produced was Cherubini's Mass in D minor, No. 2. The choral numbers in this noble work were rendered with great success, and the solos were not less effectively given. Brahms's "Song of Destiny," considering its difficulty, received very fair justice. One good point in regard to Mr. Waddel's Choir is that no music is ever brought forward in haste, or without every possible preparation, an example being set in this respect which other Societies would do well to follow. A common mistake with choirs is to produce some exacting work midway in the season, and another at the end of the season, neither being, as a rule, well rehearsed.

The Greyfriars Choral Society gave its forty-fifth annual Recital, on the 6th ult., the event being somehow associated with the yearly meeting of the General Assembly of the Established Church. Mr. P. Glencorse conducted on the present occasion, and Mr. A. Scott Jupp acted as Organist. A small instrumental party lent its services.

The annual Festival of the Edinburgh Diocesan Choral Union was held in St. Mary's Cathedral, on Saturday afternoon, the 21st ult. The choir, drawn from the various Episcopal churches in Edinburgh, Dalkeith, &c., numbered 300 voices, and was conducted by Mr. T. H. Collinson, Organist of St. Mary's, Mr. Garth presiding at the organ. The anthems were "Stand up and bless the Lord," by Sir John Goss, and the "Hallelujah" Chorus, from Handel's "Messiah," while the Processional and Retrospective Hymns were sung to tunes by Dykes and Oakeley. A sermon was preached by Dean Montgomery on the subject of praise. There was a very large attendance of the public.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THERE were several musical meetings during the past month on the part of the School Board children of Glasgow. Generally speaking, the programmes were of a simple character, the pieces being in two and three part arrangements for equal voices, and, as a rule, the performances testified to the rapidly rising growth of musical taste and knowledge in the youthful portion of the community. One of the Concerts was much more ambitious than the rest. It consisted of a performance of the greater portion of Handel's "Messiah," the treble and alto parts of the choruses being taken by children from the Board Schools, selected voices, in all about 200, the tenors and basses being from the various local choral societies. The solos were undertaken by local singers. Mr. W. M. Miller conducted, and had much credit by the performance, as far, at least, as the children were concerned, their singing being remarkably sweet, steady, and tuneful. The oratorio was accompanied on the organ by Mr. H. A. Lambeth.

Organ Recitals were given in the Cathedral on two or three Monday afternoons of June by Dr. A. L. Peace. The programme of the 23rd ult. may suffice for an example:—Organ Sonata, No. 5, Mendelssohn, with finale from the Sixth Sonata of the same composer; Rondo in A and March in D, Schubert; Prelude and Fugue in G, Bach; "Let the bright Seraphim" and "Let their celestial concerts all unite," Handel; Overture in D, Kuhlau. This was the last Recital of the season.

The Choral Union marked the close of its labours for the season by indulging in a trip, on the 14th ult., to Arrochar, at the head of Loch Long and near to Loch Lomond. A large party left the Broomielaw Quay at two o'clock in the afternoon, and after a very pleasant sail, with an hour or so on shore, got home again about eleven in the evening. A cleverly written poetical programme of the proceedings was distributed, containing imitations (the words, not the music) of lyrics and choruses in well known musical works—for example, "Acis and Galatea," "Walpurgis Nacht," "Ruins of Athens," "Cenerentola," "Moïse," "The Choral Fantasia," &c. There was not much singing on board—perhaps the members considered they had had enough of it during the past season—but dancing was lavishly indulged in, and, as the faintest possible reminiscence of the orchestral element in the season lately ended, a musical trifle, "The Sleigh Ride," was performed with considerable éclat.

On the afternoon of Saturday, the 7th ult., the Tannahill Choir gave a Concert on the "The Braes o' Gleniffer," a romantic hill-side two or three miles south from Paisley. The Choir was instituted for the purpose of aiding the funds for raising a monument to Robert Tannahill, the poet, and annual performances have been given in the same place for some eight or ten years past with the result of raising a very considerable sum for the object aimed at. The statue to Tannahill has been erected, but the Choir, determined still to be useful, has decided to devote its energies in the direction of a contemplated statue to Robert Burns in the same town, and so great was the response to their appeal on the present occasion that, though the price of admission to the grounds was almost nominal, it is quite expected a hundred pounds, at least, will be raised for the fund referred to. The musical performance was not by any means of the highest order, however, and for the credit of the place something better should be aimed at. Paisley is hardly in Glasgow, though it is very nearly within measurable distance of being so, and is humorously called "The Suburb" in anticipation of its ultimate absorption in our great city. This must be my excuse for incorporating a notice of the Tannahill Choir Concert in my letter.

MUSIC IN AMERICA.

New York, June 6.

IMMEDIATELY after the date of my last letter the second series of the Wagner Concerts for New York occurred, in the Metropolitan Opera House, according to the scheme which was fully reported to THE MUSICAL TIMES, and the performances realised every promise of artistic interest, value, and popular success. The appearance of Madame Nilsson, jointly with Madame Materna, certainly contributed a full share toward the accomplishment of these ends, for her personal friends in America are many and strongly attached, while rivalry with the Viennese singer compelled the fullest exertion of her powers. The audiences, though very large, were not overwhelming, especially on the first night.

The Wagner Concerts ended our season in town so far as serious and important musical events are concerned, and it is the Provinces which are now enjoying the succession of Festivals, the plan of which has already appeared in your columns. Madame Nilsson continues with Mr. Thomas. The Cincinnati (Sixth Biennial) and Chicago (Second Biennial) Festivals, the latter last week and the former a week earlier, are the most important of the series.

They were in every way most successful, and excited widespread attention, to the point of compelling the presence of critics from the metropolitan journals; but they are of little value to readers abroad, beyond the general consideration of the spread of musical taste and knowledge which makes them possible, and prompts shrewd managers like Mr. Locke to undertake such enterprises as those which he extends even over our "magnificent distances" as a sure means of mere money-making.

There is no definite news concerning the operatic management of the next season. Movements have been made toward a merging of the interests of the two operahouses, but nothing has been settled. Mr. Maurice Strakosch has gone abroad, and, it is rumoured, with operatic intent; but this is very unlikely. There are many signs to a close observer of a desire for English opera, and this without even a rumour of any present design. All that can be said is that things are tending that way—that the idea is "in the air."

A few days since occurred one of the most interesting musical events of our year, in the annual performances of the Church Choral Union of New York, an institution which has for its sole aim the sound instruction of the unlearned in music to a point which fits them for singing with accuracy and propriety, from notes, in the choirs and congregations of our churches. Perhaps the only qualification required in persons desiring to join the Union is need of instruction. The crudest material is not merely accepted, but chosen, and the progress which is made in the course of a single season is something extraordinary. The pupils are gathered into many different "centres" and are trained thus in different bodies by sub-conductors. In the late spring public performances are given, which, as I have remarked, are, to the thoughtful, among the most encouraging and inspiring of the year, though absolutely of course not of the finest quality, either in the music presented or in the manner of rendering. But to reflect that, as was said on the recent programmes, scarcely any of the singers "knew the A B C of music a few months before," and had learned nothing by rote, and to note the precision, and, in some cases, even the delicate beauty of the chorus-singing, some of it at sight from MS. copies of music, composed for the occasion, excites feelings compounded equally of surprise and satisfaction. Very interesting, too, is the "chord practice," when the chorus, starting from a given note, sings at word of command from the Conductor all imaginable intervals, above or below, and then chords founded on the intervals called promiscuously, here and there, as the Conductor's momentary fancy dictates.

This year the chorus of the Union is so large (more than 4,000) that a series of performances (instead of a single one) was given in the Academy of Music. There were five of the Concerts, each with a different chorus of about 800 voices. The chief director is Dr. H. R. Palmer, of whom I know nothing more than that he organised and carries on this most excellent work, giving a vast amount of innocent pleasure with useful knowledge to his pupils, doing much for the improvement of church music, and furnishing a training-school from which our great choral bodies may draw recruits fit to be employed in singing the masterpieces of music.

In the first week of July the Music Teachers' National Association of America will meet in annual convention in the City of Cleveland, Ohio. The Association is endeavouring to arrange a plan by which diplomas and degrees may be conferred upon such teachers and musicians as can pass a proper examination; forming a permanent organisation into a National College of Teachers. At these meetings there is always a good amount of essay-work and musical discussion, much of which is printed in the musical and other journals. Pianoforte and organ Recitals are also given. On this occasion the Recital of Mr. Calixa Lavallée, of Boston, will consist entirely of the compositions of American writers. Mr. Lavallée says he expects the Recital to do much toward removing the prejudice now existing against American composers.

There is nothing musical to note in New York at this moment, excepting the great success of "Falka" at the Casino.

THE RHENISH MUSICAL FESTIVAL OF 1884.

Düsseldorf, June 5.

THIS annual Whitsuntide Festival, triennially occurring, as in the case of our "Three Choir" meetings, at one of three towns, represented in the Lower Rhineland by Düsseldorf, Aix-la-Chapelle, or Cologne, was held this year at the first-mentioned city.

Here there is always special interest, both in the artistic place itself and in its associations with such lights as Spohr, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Rietz, Hiller, &c., who have been music directors or conductors at Düsseldorf. In 1836 Mendelssohn here produced his "St. Paul," and in 1842 conducted his "Lobgesang," and in 1853 Schumann's D minor Symphony and Pianoforte Concerto were here composed and performed. And for one of these Festivals in the district in which Beethoven was born—"In den mir ewig lieben schönen Rheingedenden"—he lent the MS. score of his Ninth Symphony, then only once heard in Vienna, sending it to Ries in 1825, with the interesting letter in which the above allusion to the Rhineland occurs.

The excellent programme and the presence for the first time of Brahms, together with perfect weather for celebrating "das liebliche Frühlingsfest" in all its freshness and brilliancy, attracted great interest not only in the town itself, where it was extremely difficult to find rooms, but in all its neighbourhood.

On this occasion the orchestra was for the most part professionally engaged, and comprised distinguished Kapellmeisters, Musik Directors, Hofmusiker, Kammer virtuosos, &c., from various parts of the Fatherland, thus classified:—22 first, 22 second violins, 18 violas, 16 cellos, 12 double-basses, and doubled wind—total 121. The chorus consisted of 237 sopranos, 211 altos, 111 tenors, and 145 basses—704. The local music director, Herr Tausch, was, according to usual custom, Conductor, excepting of the music by Brahms, which was directed by the composer. The soloists were—sopranos, Madame Bossenberger (Royal Opera, Hanover), and Mdlle. Schauseil (daughter of the Düsseldorf director and organist); contralto, Madame Joachim (Berlin); tenor, Herr L. Riese (Dresden), and bass, Herr Betz (Berlin Opera).

Thus the whole of the performers, with one exception, were natives, and the works performed were by national composers. The exception was the solo pianist, of English and French extraction—Eugene D'Albert, as he was known before carried off by Richter to Vienna, but who now desires to be known as "Herr Eugen D'Albert." The talent displayed by this youth before he left London to complete his musical education abroad, is well known to your readers; and that on the first occasion of his public appearance there, at the Concert given by the National Training College, he showed great promise as composer as well as pianist. It is not the place here to comment on his indiscreet letter, showing no gratitude to those who first put him in the right path, and disclaiming the somewhat narrow title of "English" pianist, but rather to attest to the extraordinary progress he has made at Vienna and at Weimar, and to describe his performance on the occasion under notice in referring to the third or "Artists' Concert on Whit-Tuesday.

On the first day, Whit-Sunday, Handel's "Messiah" was the selection, and was throughout admirably given, although the German translation of the original text, especially in the Recitatives, causes some modifications of the music which cannot fail to strike an English listener. In the Düsseldorf chorus the brightness of the sopranos and tenors and the rich sonority of altos and basses, added to smooth vocalisation, free of all shouting, and evincing thorough and systematic training—every member singing like a finished soloist, combine to produce an exceptional result. The difficult choruses "His yoke is easy" and "Let us break their bonds asunder" gained in accuracy and in clearness by being taken at a slower tempo than that to which we are now accustomed, the wonderfully close stretto in both subjects of the latter descriptive chorus being so much more effective by being less hurried as to justify an impression that here, as in other instances which might be mentioned, our time of some of Handel's choruses has been gradually accelerated. On the other hand, some of the solos, especially by tenor, were quicker, and considerably less effective than in England, the only solo efforts beyond criticism being those by Madame Joachim, who in "O thou that tellest" and "He was despised," elicited a well-merited ovation. The composers represented on the second day, Whit-Monday, were Bach, Schumann, Brahms, and Rheinberger. The "Overture, Scherzo, and Finale," by Schumann, which headed the programme, and is one of that master's greater creations, was composed in the same year of productivity, 1841, as that of his B flat and D minor Symphonies, though, like the last-mentioned, the "Finale" of the work under notice was considerably improved some years later. Had a slow movement been added to this Opus it might have almost ranked as a fifth Symphony by Schumann. Rheinberger's fine Cantata "Christoforus," Op. 120, which followed, shows that the fount of pure melody is not yet exhausted, and that effective scoring is still compatible with beauty of thought and classical form. The latter at once asserts itself in the Overture in C minor, which (commencing with a family likeness to the opening of Mozart's G minor Symphony, and to Gounod's "Leitmotiv" in "Redemption"), contains an excellent fugue, a form which now-a-days is seldom attempted by our orchestral writers. The well written opening number, which is interwoven like a golden thread throughout the woof of the work, four times reappearing in the shape of a melodious choral—to different text and in different keys, is alone likely to make "Christoforus" popular. Other choral features are a fugal duet, or rather canon at the octave for tenors and basses, at "Brave Knight" (recalling something of the same kind in Meyerbeer's "Robert"), and especially the magnificent concluding chorus "Blessed of rivers." The solos, if less interesting, give scope for artistic and dramatic ability, of which full advantage was taken by Madame Joachim, and by Mdlle. Schauseil to whom was assigned the solo part in the exquisite "Liebeslied," "Who is the sovereign lord of the heart," with the very striking choral answer, "Love, but love," a study of vocal colouring and the gem of the work; and her sotto voce, in the call of the "Christkind" to be borne over the river, at "Bear over," earned much well-deserved applause. The part of St. Christopher or Der Riese (the Giant), fitting the name though not the voice of the Dresden tenor, Riese, was taken by the Berlin bass, Betz. This Cantata is recommended with confidence to the notice of our Choral Societies as both good and novel, and as containing an excellent English translation by Mr. Seymour Egerton.

After the "pause," of an hour, the second part of the programme commenced with Brahms's last Symphony, No. 3, conducted by the composer. As in London, the first and last movements commended themselves most to musicians, and the two intervening movements took most with the public. The designation of "Scherzo" for the third movement may be in itself a joke, as nothing in the composition justifies that title. As when first played by Richter, it was encored. But each movement was warmly received, and at the conclusion the composer was enthusiastically cheered. As he had very carefully superintended the rehearsals, the performance was consummate, and the perfection of the horn players, specially engaged from Meiningen, tended in no small degree to secure that result. The great "Magnificat" (D major version), by Bach, first given at these Festivals twenty years ago at Aix-la-Chapelle, and at Düsseldorf in 1869—on both occasions under the direction of Rietz—was placed at the wrong end of a long programme, and consequently suffered, although the sublimity of the choral portion towered above other selections on Whit-Monday. The Whitsuntide Cantata in which the popular solo "My heart ever faithful" occurs would be a suitable choice at these Festivals.

On Whit-Tuesday, Wagner's Prelude to "Parsifal," with the ecclesiastical réfrains, was splendidly played, but excited less attention than in London, and, as a composition, evoked some unfavourable comment. After a fair rendering, by Herr Betz, of Handel's bass air "Shall I in Mamre's fertile plain," the appearance at a Rhenish Festival of the youthful D'Albert, as exponent of the great Pianoforte Concerto of Beethoven, excited much curiosity. But it was at once apparent that neither the reputation of the pianist had been exaggerated, nor that his engagement on so great an occasion was unjustified. Taking his seat at a very fine "Bechstein" Grand, which was so placed that the player could not see the conductor and only a very small section of the band, and had therefore to rely on his own accurate memory, D'Albert seemed to inspire and to lead band and conductor, playing with accuracy, brilliancy, and passion, and eliciting at the end of the first movement a storm of applause, which was renewed at the conclusion of the Concerto. Later in the programme he played the Berceuse in D flat and the great Polonaise in A flat, Chopin; a Capriccio in B minor by Brahms; and a marvellous Etude in C by Rubinstein (Op. 23), in which rapidity, tour de force, and suppleness of wrist, were displayed to the utmost advantage, and evoked the plaudits of the audience to such an extent as to make it scarcely a matter of wonder if the head of the young artist is a little "turned" by such early success.

The other soloists were Madame Joachim, who in three songs by Brahms, accompanied by the composer, obtained the vocal triumph of the evening; Mdlle. Schauseil, who sang an adaptation of a well-known Notturmo, by Chopin, in E major, transposed to A flat, and with Italian words, "La notte tranquilla," very effectively, but on so important an occasion scarcely legitimate, and songs by Brahms and Mendelssohn; Madame Bossenberger, whose brilliant execution in one of those difficult high soprano songs by Mozart, "No, no, che non sei capace," in which E in alt was taken staccato, earned its reward; and Herr L. Riese, who sang Haydn's "In native worth." Of more importance were the choral and orchestral selections, notably, the angelic motett "Ave verum," composed by Mozart at the Austrian Baden only six months before his early death in 1791, and Brahms's "Gesang der Parzen," conducted by the composer, was the least satisfactory performance, the chorus singing some of the difficult intervals out of tune; and, as one of the critics said, at "So sangen die Parzen," "So sanken die Parzen"—nearly a semitone. Last, but not least, must be recorded one of those performances of a Symphony by Beethoven, which on these occasions is never forgotten. No. 6, which was first given here under the direction of Mendelssohn in 1833, the ever-fresh Pastorale, and still the greatest of "Tone-pictures," was played as if the interpreters of their great countryman's work knew his music by heart. There was indeed a "run away" at starting, owing to the unusual speed taken by Tausch, which for a moment threatened a houlversement, and the time of the second movement was rather slow—conveying an idea of the Heiligenstadt "Brook" as it now is—nearly dried up—rather than as it was when Beethoven immortalised its murmurings and windings in his matchless score, "whilst," as he said to Schindler, "the birds composed with me." But the "Dance" and the "Storm" movements were played with unsurpassed, perhaps unequalled, effect, and, as in the Concerto, the composer was represented in all his might and majesty by the splendid orchestra assembled. An echo—not to die away—of the music given on the first day was heard, according to custom, in the final chorus—on this occasion Handel's "Hallelujah," to which inspiration chorus, band, and soloists lent all possible effect, and thus the sixty-first highly interesting Rhenish Musical Festival right worthily concluded.

"THE REDEMPTION" AT PARIS.

As was to have been expected, the first production at the French capital (in April last) of M. Gounod's sacred chef d'œuvre has been quickly followed by a repetition of the noble work, which took place on the 6th ult., at the salle des fêtes of the Paris Trocadéro, in connection with a "Festival" in aid of the Society for the employment of the Indigent Blind. The profound impression again produced by the Trilogy on this occasion upon an audience, the vast majority of which consisted of the composer's own countrymen, leaves no room for a doubt that M. Gounod's Oratorio will ere long have made its tour throughout the French provinces, while it fully endorses the opinion expressed by Le Ménestrel in regard to the previous performance. "La Rédemption," the leading journal in question predicted, "having thus scored a grand success, will certainly confirm it on a second hearing." Every effort, it is true, had been made to place this second hearing on a par with the standard achieved on the former occasion; M. Gounod himself wielding the bâton de mesure with his accustomed vigour, while M. Saint-Saëns, whose mastery over the organ is undisputed, presided at that instrument. The solo vocalists were the same as before—with the exception of Madame Albani, who was very efficiently replaced in the principal soprano part by Madame Fidès Devriès—viz., M. Ketten (tenor), Mdlle. Rosine Bloch (contralto), and M. Faure (bass). With respect to the performance itself, we may quote once more the independent contemporary journal already referred to. "Charles Gounod's Oratorio," Le Ménestrel remarks, "has again profoundly touched the sensibilities of an enormous audience. The austere ideality which pervades the work as a whole, as well as in its every detail, fascinates the listener by the simple beauty of its general outlines, and the intensity of its orchestral colouring. Once more a perfect ovation has been accorded to the master and his music. On the other hand, orchestra, organist, chorists, and soloists . . . one and all, combined to realise an ensemble of rare uniformity and general excellence. Amongst the solo performers the palm should be given to M. Faure, whose grand and powerful phrasing and unapproachable style frequently elicited most enthusiastic applause. All this no doubt contributed to the full measure of homage bestowed upon the composer on this occasion."

THE Norwich Musical Festival will commence on Tuesday evening, October 14, with Mendelssohn's "Elijah." On Wednesday morning Gounod's "Redemption" will be given; and in the evening an Elegiac Ode, composed expressly for the Festival, and conducted by Dr. Villiers Stanford. Thursday morning will be devoted to Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's dramatic Oratorio "The Rose of Sharon," also written for the Festival, and conducted by the composer. On Thursday evening Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Nacht," and Cowen's Scandinavian Symphony, conducted by the composer, will be given; and on Friday morning the "Messiah." On Friday evening there will be a symphonic and operatic Concert, including an Overture by Mr. T. Wingham, a new March, and the Finale of "St. Cecilia," by Sir Julius Benedict (conducted by the composer); Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony, and other works of interest. The artists engaged are Miss Emma Nevada, Miss Anna Williams, Miss Damian, Madame Patey, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. Maas, Mr. Herbert E. Thorndike, and Mr. Santley. Chorus Master, Dr. Horace Hill; Organist, Dr. Bunnett; Conductor, Signor Randegger.

THE Society of Arts' Practical Examinations in Music for London, just concluded, were conducted at the House of the Society by Mr. W. Alexander Barrett, Mus. Bac., Oxon., and occupied five days. The numbers showed a considerable increase over former years. 198 candidates presented themselves, many of them taking the vocal as well as the instrumental portion of the examination. Of these 179 passed, and 19 failed. The number of practical examinations was 226, resulting in the award of 41 first class and 160 second class certificates, with 25 failures. Of these entries 176 were for the piano, 10 for the organ, 2 for the violin, 1 for the harmonium, and 37 for singing. In addition to these, there were three examinations for Honour, two second class certificates being awarded in this division. Two provincial examinations were also held by the Society in May—one in Glasgow (75 candidates) and the other at Liverpool (29 candidates).

THE members of the St. Luke's Choral Society gave their first Concert on Wednesday, the 4th ult., in the Girls' Schoolroom, Nutford Place. The principal soloists were Madame Jarratt, Miss E. Thomas, Miss Winter, Miss Barratt, and Messrs. Horn, Weitzell, Beckett, and H. Winter, all of whom acquitted themselves admirably. Madame Jarratt and Miss Thomas receiving an encore for their songs. A special feature of the evening was the performance by Mr. Frank Lowden of a pianoforte and an oboe solo, the latter being encored. The part-songs were rendered with precision and expression under the conductorship of Mr. W. J. Winter, A.C.O.

THE voices now being raised from different quarters of Germany, in favour of modern English music, are evidently multiplying. In our last number we had occasion to refer to the favourable reception accorded to Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's opera "Colomba" at Darmstadt, and to the laudatory observations made by a leading local press organ in respect to that work. We now notice in two recent numbers of Die Tonkunst (published in Northern Germany) an article devoted to the same opera, from the pen of Herr Louis Schlösser, fully recognising the merits of the work itself, and warmly appreciating the talent of its composer. The article in question, too lengthy to be here quoted in extenso, contains the following interesting passages:—"Mr. Mackenzie," says the critic referred to, "has concentrated in 'Colomba' the noble and original ideas stirring within him; he has, moreover, fulfilled in a worthy manner the essential conditions for successfully undertaking a dramatic work of similar pretensions—viz., independence of procedure, appropriateness of utterance, and complete identification with the current of feeling pervading the drama. . . . 'Colomba' is eminently a very serious opera. In it the different characters, distinctly marked as they appear musically from the outset, retain their individual colouring throughout the progress of the drama by means of highly characteristic harmonic, and rhythmical progressions peculiar to each. There is evidence of creative power in the elaboration both of the expression of the melancholy reminiscences of a cloudlessly spent childhood, and of the blissful self-oblivion on the part of the lovers in the enjoyment of the hour; similar evidence, again, in the composer's masterly dealing with the solo and choral portions of the work, such as they had been placed before him by the author of the poem. . . . Mackenzie's individuality appears most pronounced in his lyrico-declamatory style, and in the national element pervading his art-perception, which at once establishes a rapport between the creative artist, and his unbiassed and receptive listener, as soon as the latter has become more closely acquainted with both poem and music. Whether Mr. Mackenzie's talent will enable him eventually to soar upon the ideal heights of his art, whether there is enough in him of the requisite fire of enthusiasm to make him a chosen interpreter of the varied and conflicting feelings which animate the human breast, is a question which only future works of the gifted young composer can finally decide." Let us hope that the sympathetic critic's apparently favourable anticipations in this direction will be verified.

MR. GEORGE WATTS must be numbered among those concert-givers whose policy is to offer quantity as well as quality in their programmes, so that by tempting all classes of music lovers they may, at all events, secure some. Thus, in the midst of an admittedly bad season, he managed to attract a considerable audience to the Albert Hall, on the 25th ult., when a lengthy menu was provided, and, judging by the applause, heartily enjoyed. A few items in the programme were rather above the average of what is usually done in entertainments of this description. M. Gounod's "Gallia" is not so often heard in London as its merits deserve, for it must certainly be numbered among its composer's finest efforts in the domain of sacred music. Conceived at the time when his country's fortunes were at their lowest ebb, M. Gounod evidently wrote "Gallia," so to speak, with his heart's blood, and those who were present at the Albert Hall at its first performance, in 1871, will remember the remarkable effect it created. Though given last Wednesday without orchestra, yet with an excellent organ accompaniment and with Madame Albani as the soloist, it made a profound impression. Another successful choral item was a bass solo and chorus, "Jerusalem," by Mr. H. Parker, with piano, harps, and organ accompaniment. The piece is extremely spirited and melodious, and it was loudly encored. Signor Foli rendered full justice to the solo. In these and other numbers of the programme the South London Choral Association of 400 voices, under the direction of Mr. L. C. Venables, appeared to great advantage. Among the artists who appeared in the course of the evening were Mdlle. Marimon, Madame Tremelli, Madame Sterling, Mr. Maas, Signor De Reszke, and M. Hollman, the admirable violoncellist.

THE members and friends of the London Branch of the United Richard Wagner Society of Germany met on the 9th ult., at the house of the President, the Earl of Dysart, to hear a lecture by Mr. Ferdinand Praeger, entitled "Personal Reminiscences of Richard Wagner." In well-chosen words this close and life-long friend of the master testified to his modesty, generosity, and solicitude for the feelings of others. Much was adduced to show that in the composition of his works Wagner was driven forward by an unconscious necessity rather than by a determination to put into practice any preconceived artistic theories. Indeed, with certain portions of his music-dramas he was never able afterwards to remember distinctly whether the poetry or the music had first evolved themselves from his inner consciousness. They would appear to have revealed themselves simultaneously. His friendship with Roedel was next touched upon. The extraordinary persuasive powers of this man in converting a political opponent into a coadjutor were the indirect cause of Wagner's enforced exile after the revolution in 1848. The relationship between the Bayreuth reformer and Berlioz, his high capabilities as an orchestral Conductor, his innocent love of rich surroundings, and his fondness for animals (which Mr. Praeger attributed to his study of Hindoo religions) were also referred to. Once, upon entering the room, Wagner was discovered standing upon his head on the sofa, and in answer to the astonished enquiries of his visitor, Wagner, with childlike glee, replied, "I am sixty-four years of age to-day, and I can stand upon my head!" With the great master's conclusion that Beethoven's Ninth Symphony had struck the last note of music in its separate condition, Mr. Praeger was unable to agree. The lecture was of a unique and very interesting nature.

THE annual Festival of the Army Guild of the Holy Standard took place on Thursday, the 5th ult., and consisted of two services—namely, a choral celebration of the Holy Eucharist in the forenoon, and Solemn Evensong, in St. Paul's Cathedral. At the former service, which was held in the Royal Military Chapel at the Wellington Barracks, the music, under the direction of Mr. R. Lemaire, consisted of Hoyte's well-known and deservedly popular Service in D, effectively scored for a wind band by the Rev. J. Baden Powell; and at the latter service, under the direction of Mr. C. Warwick Jordan, the Service Book published some few years since by the Guild was used in its integrity, an appropriate sermon being preached by the Rev. Prebendary Hole. The musical arrangements were in the hands of the London Gregorian Choral Association, the anthem being Farrant's "Lord, for Thy tender mercies' sake." In addition to the organ, a small band of sixteen wood and brass wind instruments and drums were employed with good effect.

THE competition for the "Brinsmead" prize of £10 10s. took place on Monday, the 23rd ult., at the Guildhall School of Music, when the prize was divided between Miss Kate Eadie and Mr. W. J. Barton. The work performed was Beethoven's Sonata in A major (Op. 101). The judges were Sir Julius Benedict, Messrs. E. Prout, Brinley Richards, Ridley Prentice, and the Principal. The "Lady Jenkinson" prize of £5 was competed for on Tuesday, the 24th ult., the prize being divided between the Misses Florence Morse and Lily von Kornatzki. The work performed was Beethoven's Concerto for Pianoforte, in E flat. The Judges were Messrs. J. Baptiste Calkin, Henry F. Frost, Thomas Pettit, Thomas Wingham, and the Principal. The Lady Mayoress has given a prize of £5 5s. for composition.

THE members of the Stratford Congregational Church Choral Society gave a very successful performance of Mendelssohn's "Athalie," with full band and chorus of 100 performers, on the 11th ult. Miss Lydia Lawrence, T.C.L., Miss Amy Rockliff, and Miss L. Brimson rendered the solo music in a very effective manner. Mr. James Blackney was an efficient reader. The second part of the programme was miscellaneous, and included a bassoon solo by Mr. Mendelssohn Hargreaves, and a cornet solo by Mr. F. Lancaster, both of which were admirably played and much appreciated. The Concert was ably conducted by Mr. J. W. Hale, Miss Harris presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. E. J. Scrine at the harmonium.

MRS. A. J. LAYTON, F.C.O., gave her third Annual Concert on Thursday, the 19th ult., at the Grosvenor Hall, Pimlico, assisted by several well-known artists, and a very efficient chorus and orchestra, numbering nearly a hundred. Among the most interesting items in the programme were Mendelssohn's unfinished Opera "Loreley" and "Serenade and Allegro Giojoso" for piano and orchestra; the "Ballet Music" ("Faust"—Gounod) and a March for Chorus and Orchestra "The Black Prince," by Churchill Sibley, written expressly for this Concert. Mrs. Layton was the solo pianist, and for her brilliant playing of the "Serenade" was twice recalled. Miss Beata Francis sang the soprano solos in "Loreley" with much dramatic power, and Mdlle. Alice Roselli, Miss Annie Layton, Messrs. Traherne, Ernest Cecil, Gilbert Campbell and Alfred J. Layton were very successful in their songs, duets, &c. Mr. H. Dacres Smith recited "The Diver" (Schiller), and Mr. Henry A. Evans, Mr. Charles E. Clemens, and Mr. Churchill Sibley acted as Conductors.

SIGNOR RIA gave a Morning Concert at Collard and Collard's Rooms, Grosvenor Street, on May 30, before a numerous audience. The bénéficiaire is well known as an excellent tenor, and on this occasion he was highly successful in all the songs selected, especially in the Romance "Alla Stella Confidente," in which he was assisted by M. De Munck, who played the violoncello obbligato with admirable effect. Madame Carlotta Patti sang with much success two solos, and the second being encored, she gave a Laughing Song, by Auber, which was most warmly applauded. The other vocalists were Madame Hirleman, Madame Sanderini, Messrs. Walter Clifford, Joseph Lynde, Traherne and Ernest Cecil, Signor Isidore de Lara, and Signor Zoboli. The instrumentalists were M. De Munck, who in a violoncello solo by Piatti displayed a good tone and cultivated style, and Signor Tito Mattei (pianoforte). The Conductors were Signor Li Calsi and Signor Romili.

Two Services in connection with the Annual Festival of the Girls' Friendly Society have been held during the past month, the one on Thursday morning, the 19th ult., and the other on Saturday afternoon, the 21st ult., both at St. Paul's Cathedral. At the former of these a fully choral celebration of the Holy Communion, the music, rendered by the choir of St. Peter's Church Eaton Square, included Dr. Stainer's Service in A; Wesley's anthem "Blessed be the God and Father"; and Attwood's "Come, Holy Ghost," all of which were creditably sung. Mr. W. de M. Sergison presided at the organ. The other Service, Evensong at six p.m., was rendered by the choir of the Lay Helpers' Association, under the direction of Dr. G. C. Martin; the anthem being "To Thee, Cherubin and Seraphin," from the Dettingen "Te Deum."

In aid of the Choir Fund of St. George's Church, Borough, a special Choral Service was given in the presence of a crowded congregation on Monday evening, the 9th ult. The music performed comprised the Magnificat to Turle in D, and a lengthy selection from Handel's "Messiah," the choir of the church being augmented for the occasion by the Special Service Choir of Westminster Abbey and the boys of Lincoln's Inn Chapel. The choruses were well sung throughout, and the solos efficiently rendered by Master Smith, Miss H. Heath, Mr. G. T. Carter, and Mr. E. J. Bell respectively. Mr. Theodore Distin conducted, and the organ was played by Mr. G. F. Smith in the selection, and by Mr. Duffield during the remainder of the service. The sermon was preached by the rector, the Rev. Burman Cassin, M.A., upon the "Music of the Bible."

A PEDAL keyboard has been invented by Mr. Fred. Rummel, of Antwerp, which can be adapted to all cottage pianofortes, and will be found most valuable to those who wish to play the compositions of the great masters written with an independent pedal part. Unlike most contrivances of this kind, which are only attached to the keys of the pianoforte keyboard, this invention has its own independent action, and takes up no room, as it can be turned up into the instrument and disappear entirely when the pianoforte is to be used alone. The pedalier may be seen at the Blüthner Depot, 7, Wigmore Street.

THE Association of Lay Helpers for the Diocese of London held its annual Festival Service in Westminster Abbey, on Tuesday, the 17th ult. The choir of the Association, under the able guidance of its Conductor, Dr. G. C. Martin, sang well throughout, and the anthem (Handel's well-known chorus "To Thee, Cherubin and Seraphin"), in which the voices had the assistance of two trumpets and two trombones, in addition to the organ accompaniment, was particularly commendable. For the Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis was sung the setting in D, composed some years ago for the Sion College Choral Union by Dr. Bridge, who presided at the organ throughout the Service, this being the first occasion on which the new organ has been used for a Festival in the nave of the Abbey.

MISS MEREDITH BROWN gave a Concert at the Prince's Hall, on the 13th ult., before a highly appreciative audience. The bénéficiaire sang Meyerbeer's "Nobil Signor," Cowen's "The reaper and the flowers" (for which she received an encore), Randegger's "Ben e ridicolo," and—in association with Miss Carlotta Elliot, Mr. W. H. Cummings, and Signor Foli—in Verdi's Quartet, "Un di se ben," from "Rigoletto." Solos were given with decided success by the vocalists already named and Miss Ella Lemmens; and the instrumentalists were Herr Oberthür (Harp) and Miss Agnes Zimmermann (Pianoforte). The Conductors were Miss Grace Sherrington, Mr. Wilfred Bendall, and Mr. Kube.

THE St. George's Glee Union, under the direction of Mr. Joseph Monday, gave a very successful miscellaneous Concert, at the Pimlico Rooms, on the 6th ult. The soloists were Madame Berta Foresta, Miss Clara Myers, Mr. Arthur Weston, Mr. W. H. Webb, and Mr. George Adams. The part-singing by the Choir was excellent, the most noteworthy items being: "Sir Knight" (Macirone), "Break on thy cold grey stones, O sea" (G. A. Macfarren), and "My true love hath my heart" (Henry Smart). The accompaniments were played by Mr. Edwin Shute and Mr. R. R. Arndell, who also contributed a pianoforte solo.

THE Monthly Organ Recital at St. John's, Waterloo Road, was given on Tuesday evening, the 10th ult., by Mr. C. E. Miller, Organist of St. Augustine and St. Faith, Watling Street. The programme included Prelude and Fugue in E major (Bach), Overture to the "Daughter of Jairus" (Stainer), Pastorale from "The Light of the World" (Sullivan), and the Andante and Finale from Schumann's 4th Symphony. Mr. Miller's playing was characterised by much point and neatness of phrasing especially in the adaptations from orchestral works. Miss Florentia Bernani contributed two vocal solos.

By papers forwarded to us from Brooklyn, New York we find that the services at Emanuel Church, under the direction of Mr. S. Lasar, the Choirmaster, have been for the last two years of the utmost interest. Amongst these may be mentioned Smart's Service in F, Calkin's in B flat and G, Barnby's Ascension Anthem, besides several compositions of Handel, Goss, Mendelssohn, Berthold Tours, &c. This work has been accomplished by a supplied choir of about thirty (twenty boys and ten men), who have laboured in the cause with much earnestness at enthusiasm.

DR. C. J. FROST gave an Organ Recital at the Rectory Place Congregational Church, Woolwich, on Thursday evening, May 29. The programme included pieces by Krebs, Freyer, Westbrook, Smart, Volckman, Wely, Sain Saëns, Guilman, Chauvet, and Morandi, the rendering of which was attentively listened to by a large congregation. Madame Adeline Paget and Mr. Alfred Rudla sang several solos from the oratorios during the course of the Recital.

THE members of the Grosvenor Choral Society held their 148th Monthly Concert, at the Grosvenor Hall, on 12th ult., when Prout's Cantata "Hereward" was successfully performed. The solo vocalists were Mada Worrell, Miss Louise Bond, Mr. Alfred Kenningham, Frederick Bevan, Mr. A. J. Reynolds, and Mr. A. Roa. Miss Florence Hartley presided at the pianoforte, and George Winny at the harmonium, and Mr. David Wo house conducted.

MISS AMY SARGENT gave a Concert at the Athenæum, Camden Road, on May 27, when she was assisted by Madame Grace Godolphin, Miss Edith Stow, Miss Amy Johnson, Mr. Arthur Thompson, and Mr. Frank May; Mrs. Stow and Mr. C. Lawrence (pianoforte), and Miss Kate Chaplin (violin). Miss Sargent—who possesses a well trained mezzo-soprano voice—was very successful in her selections, and the programme generally was much appreciated.

MISS MAUD VERNON gave an Evening Concert at the Lyric Hall, Ealing, on Saturday, May 31, assisted by Miss L. Bertie, Madame Liebe Konss-Baylis, Messrs. C. Chilley, B. Young, and M. Baylis (vocalists); Mr. Szczepanowski (violin), and Mr. A. L'Estrange (pianoforte). A miscellaneous programme was well rendered, and Miss Vernon was very successful in all her songs. The Conductors were Madame M. Young, Miss Champion, and Mr. Albert Visetti.

AN Organ Recital was given in the afternoon of the 25th ult., at St. John the Evangelist's, Waterloo Road, by Mr. Henry J. B. Dart, Organist of the Church. The programme included the Grand Prelude and Fugue in E flat (Bach), Choral Song and Fugue (Wesley), and other pieces selected from the works of Smart, Hopkins, Sterndale Bennett, and Salomé. Two songs—"Creation's Hymn" (Beethoven) and "I dreamt I was in Heaven" (Costa)—were very effectively sung by Miss Agnes Mary Everist.

MR. EDWARD HALL gave his annual Concert on Thursday, May 29, at the Holloway Hall. A miscellaneous programme was well rendered. Mr. Hall was assisted by Madame Florence Winn, Misses E. Winn, M. Hallam, N. McEwen, M. Kirton, Messrs. H. Pyatt and E. Grime (vocalists), Miss Alice Ivimy (solo violin), and Mr. H. W. Brown (solo pianoforte). The Conductors were Messrs. Fred. Walker, A. Dorey, and G. Sampson.

WE have much pleasure in announcing that the Grand Duke of Hesse has recently conferred the Gold Medal for Art and Science upon Mr. A. C. Mackenzie, the composer of the Opera "Colomba." Heartily as we congratulate the recipient of this honour, the recognition of an English artist's claim to such a distinction from the representative of a foreign country cannot but make us feel an additional sense of gratification at the event.

ON Thursday, the 5th ult., an Organ Recital was given at St. Matthew's, Brixton, by Mr. George Shinn, Mus. Bac., Organist of the church. The choir, which was augmented by the Brixton Vocal Union, sang selections from the Cantata "Judah's Captivity and Restoration," composed by Mr. Shinn. The solos were taken by Madame Jarratt, R.A.M., Miss Heath, and Mr. Gunston. Mr. Morell conducted.

A VERY successful Organ Recital was given in the Rev. Baldwin Brown's Church, Brixton, on Thursday, May 29, by Mr. Alfred Rhodes, the Organist of the church. The programme comprised works by Mendelssohn, Haydn, Spohr, Beethoven, &c., all being given with much ability and expression. The Brixton Vocal Union, Madame Worrell, and Miss K. A. James, R.A.M., added variety to the Recital by some excellent vocal selections.

AN excellent Concert, consisting of selections from Handel's "Messiah," was given in Devonshire Square Baptist Church, Stoke Newington, by the North-East London Choral Society, on Wednesday evening, the 18th ult. The solo vocalists were Madame Clara West, Miss Lottie West, and Mr. Charles Prickett; Organist, Mr. L. B. Prout, R.A.M.; Pianist, Mr. C. E. Smith; Conductor, Mr. John E. West, R.A.M., F.C.O.

AN Organ Recital was given by Mr. George F. Grover (Organist of St. Peter-le-Poer, E.C.) at St. John's, Cubitt Town, on Tuesday, the 10th ult. The programme contained selections from Mendelssohn, Rossini, Handel, and Mozart. Mr. George Coventry was the vocalist.

A FESTIVAL will be held at St. Peter's Church, Eaton Square, on Thursday afternoon, the 3rd inst., commencing at five o'clock, at which the greater part of Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" will be sung with full orchestral accompaniment.

THE annual Choral Festival of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel took place in Westminster Abbey, on Thursday, the 19th ult. The music, which was entrusted to the choir of the Abbey, assisted by the Special Sunday Evening Choir, consisted of Dr. Bridge's Evening Service in G, Sir John Goss's anthem "Lift up thine eyes," and the Hallelujah Chorus.

THE Kyrie Choir, under the direction of Mr. Malcolm Lawson, have given performances of "St. Paul," in St. Clement's Church, Notting Hill, on May 28; and of Rossini's "Stabat Mater" and Mendelssohn's "Athalie" in the Church of St. John the Evangelist, Grove Street, E., on the 18th ult. The soloists were Miss Clara Hoschke, Miss Emily Lawson, Miss Dora Percival, Miss M. Thomas, Mr. John Probert, Mr. Reginald Groome, and Mr. Albert Orme. Mr. E. H. Turpin presided at the organ.

AN excellent selection of classical music was performed by Mr. Edwin Barnes, Organist of Holy Trinity Church, Paddington, on the new organ, built by August Gern, at St. Matthew's, Ealing Common, on the 14th ult. There was a large congregation, and the performance was highly appreciated.

A FESTIVAL Service was held at Christ Church, Woburn Square, on Friday evening, the 20th ult., in commemoration of the Queen's Accession. The music, under the direction of Dr. H. T. Pringuer, included Handel's "Zadok, the priest," and was well rendered. Mr. H. D. Wetton, Organist of the church, presided at the organ.

MR. CHARLES GARDNER gave a Matinée at the Prince's Hall, on the 9th ult. The chief items in the programme were Mendelssohn's Trio in D minor and Dvorák's Sonata (Op. 57), for piano and violin.

THE Promenade Concerts at Covent Garden Theatre are announced to commence on August 9.

REVIEWS.

Harmonics of Tones and Colours developed by Evolution. By F. J. Hughes. [London: Marcus Ward and Co. 1883.]

EXTERNALLY this is a gorgeous folio bound in red with a border of blue and yellow, thus representing the three so-called primitive colours. The paper and type are of the best, and the astronomical-looking diagrams are neatly coloured and well executed. The author of the work is a cousin of the late Charles Darwin, who, we are told, in answer to the question, "Did you gain your views on evolution by your wonderfully acute observations, ignorant of your grandfather's ideas?" replied that "he had done so entirely from his own observations." The author of the "Harmonics of Tones and Colours," in endeavouring to show that the development of the musical gamut and the colours of the rainbow is regulated by the same laws, says: "I wish it to be clearly understood that I have gained the evolutions from the mysterious type of Life—a golden thread running through the Scriptures from the first chapter of Genesis to the last of Revelation. . . . It is my firm belief that if a powerful intellect takes up the radical idea contained in the following pages, it will be found to be the directing force or general key-note which will gradually disentangle intricacies in all the natural sciences, and link by the same mode of physical evolution the past, the present, and the future." The "radical idea" seems to be expressed in the following quotation from page 21: "As knowledge increases, may not the beginning of every physical science be traced first as a trinity springing from a trinity in unity, followed by a second partaking of the nature of the first, so as to unite with it in complementary pairs as here described in tones and colours, trinity in unity being the germ of never-ending developments? The inequality of the equinoctial points is a well-known fact. It will be seen how apparent this is in the development of harmonies. From the moment that trinities depart from unity the balance is unequal, and the repeated endeavours after closer union cause a perpetual restlessness. May not this want of equilibrium be the life or motive power of the entire universe with its continuous struggle after concord even to oneness?"

This law of imperfection as the condition of progress—perfection implying a stationary state—is a familiar subject of speculation. Our present business is to follow the author as well as we can and show how the law is illustrated in music. We say advisedly “in music,” because the colours are a question of the paint brush. There is no attempt in this book to add to our scientific knowledge on the subject; nor do the colours corresponding to the notes of the gamut differ materially from those already given by previous searchers after the fascinating analogies that certainly appear to exist between light and sound, and colours and musical tones.

What we have to attend to is firstly the isolated sound—F, for example—that rises we are told “from the fountain”; a mystical expression we take to be a periphrasis for an assumed sound; the only fountain we know of is one vibration. Secondly, we have to look for the pair represented by the interval known in music as a fifth—as F, C; and finally the trinities, or the triads proper to the second and third sounds of a tetrachord, that with the isolated sound makes a melodic trine—as, F, g, a, or C, d, e; and in the minor scale, D, e, f, or A, b, c.

Putting the trines or the complete tetrachords one under the other, and with their appropriate colours, we get an inkling of the author's design in this way:—

Major System.			Minor System.
Red.	Orange.	Yellow.	Violet.	Ultra-Violet.	Red.
C	d	e	A	b	c
⋮	⋮	⋮	⋮	⋮	⋮
F	g	a	D	e	f	(g)
Green.	Blue.	Violet.	Ultra-Violet.	Orange.	Yellow.	Green.
						Blue.

We must observe that this colorific scale differs from that usually given in respect to the sixth of the scale, which is here called violet instead of indigo or purple; and the seventh of the scale, generally christened violet, is here called ultra-violet; because the author does not wish to represent the historic si as a distinct colour. The scale is thus in some sense hexachordal; and were there anything in the theory, the fact itself would be a new feature in the historical development of the analogies sought.

It will be seen that each pair, or fifth, represents colours complementary to each other. In the author's diagrams, which we cannot conveniently reproduce, these colours appear in a series of concentric circles, as opposites, a term applied to them in optics. The diagrams resemble the well-known scheme dedicated to Sir Joshua Reynolds, and consisting of twenty concentric circles which, with radiating divisions, give 360 tints, varying from the prismatic colours to all shades of olives, browns, and slates. The diagrams in the work we are reviewing consist usually of five concentric circles, representing circular musical staves with their signatures; and contain a diatonic scale of seven sounds and a chromatic scale nominally of twelve sounds, the thirteenth being the octave which is attained in a series of fifths in the common way, by changing F sharp into G flat. So that C and C sharp are red, but C sharp is more orange than C; and D and D flat are orange, but D flat is redder than D. This is the method employed by Chevreul, but independently of the musical analogy. The author wisely quotes Professor Barrett to show that if there be a certain correspondence between the ratios of the diatonic scale and the ratios of luminous wave-lengths in the order of the colours given in the spectrum, there is no similar correspondence between the musical and colorific chromatic scales. Moreover, it must be carefully noted that although the pairs represent harmonic intervals as fifths, the system of the author is purely melodic; and although the fifths may represent complementary colours, we must remind the author that they do not in the least represent complementary sounds or intervals in music. This is the fundamental difficulty, not only in the system we are noticing, but in all systems we have seen of the kind. In colours, to obtain a complementary, we require at least three factors—white light, with the colour and the complementary, which together make up the numerical value of white light. In the pair, or fifth, there are only two factors—the colour and its opposite, or the sound and its fundamental; a third relation is wanting. In harmony, the prime in a complex sound might supply the required relation, thus identifying colour with quality of tone. In melody the relation might be referred to a tonic—not necessarily the initial note of a scale. At present, however, the analogue of white light in music has not been ascertained. He who either discovers it or proves that it cannot exist will do much to solve the whole question.

In the diagram we have given, and for which the author is not responsible, although we think it faithfully represents the elements of the system, it will be seen that in the major system yellow and violet are complementaries—or, as they would usually be given, yellow and purple or indigo—and in the minor system, violet and orange and ultra-violet and yellow appear as complementaries. There is evidently a hitch here; but it would be of small importance did it not expose what to our minds is another fundamental difficulty, if not a fundamental error.

If the colorific scale is to be limited to one octave, and even to less, to an extreme seventh, there can be no strict analogy between colours and music, although certain analogies may still exist between light and sound. The modern musician specially rejoices in the expanded system of keys, as well as in ninths and elevenths and thirteenths. In tracing a doctrine of evolution as manifested either in the Scriptures or in facts of observation, it is not politic to follow, as our author seems to have done, the mere devices of musicians—such as absolute pitch, a fixed doh notation, and within a little, equal temperament; as the minute differences of shade in one colour cannot represent the striking effects in music of disintonation. Music, like the theory of complementary colours, is a question of proportion, but it is also a question of relationship. Where there is no distinct relativity there may be sound, but there is no music. Musicians themselves are absolute enough in their notions; but, although they speak of A flat, meaning a minor sixth of C, as a standard of pitch, they forget the key of C when they transpose their music to the key of A flat. In the first case, as a question of system of notation, the point is the relation of A flat to a normal standard of pitch, C. In the second case it is the relation of C, or any other note, to A flat as a tonic, in regard to which their chords are numbered or classified on the principle of the movable doh. There may be certain differences in quality of tone by mere change of pitch in the same instrument, but there is more difference by merely changing the instrument and retaining the same pitch or key. So that practically and theoretically a triad major or minor is the same fact wherever it may be in regard to absolute pitch. Hence, according to our own present impressions in regard to analogy with colour, any chord or any interval must be represented by the same colours in whatever key it may be employed; because all sounds, as representing colours, must be reduced to one octave; and the more important question occurs, must they not be all referred to one common fundamental? In harmonic analogies, at all events, we cannot well say that red and yellow or red and blue are intervals, because to compare them we have to refer all to their common origin. They are not like separate musical intervals, each of which can have its own origin. White and red, or white and blue, are intervals. Red and blue, or any two colours, have been called melodic contrasts; the term not necessarily meaning close or consecutive juxtapositions. The question, we may almost say the error, of adopting absolute pitch and the fixed doh notation in searching for analogies between colour and sound, is obvious in consulting the mere sentiment of colour or of sound; and it is the sentiment, not the sense of colour or sound, which determines the artistic use of either. A major or minor triad has a distinct æsthetical effect. How can one or the other be represented in such varied colorific contrasts as:—

Major.			Minor.
f	a	c	Green.	Violet.	Red.	Yellow.
c	e	g	Red.	Yellow.	Blue.	Ultra-Violet.
g	b	d	Blue.	Ultra-Violet.	Orange.	Green + Blue.

Can anything be less like a minor third, for instance, than a brilliant and blatant red or a “noisy blue”?

The author's theologico-musical, or biologico-musical, idea is, that given a new-born tonic C from the root F, which has risen from the fountain of life, situated somewhere in the "chasm" between E and F in the scale, the component sounds of the emanating "trinities," d, a, f, and e, g, b, in moving "to and fro" in quest of union—and, we ought to say, concord—will seek their "pairs."

The trinities are shown in this way:—

MAJOR SYSTEM.

Red, green, violet, orange, blue, yellow, ultra-violet.

MINOR SYSTEM.

Violet, orange, green, ultra-violet, yellow, red, blue.

The key notes are here shown "developing their trinities from within themselves," and "veering round." The process of "veering round" can only be explained by reference to the circular staves in the diagrams.

The examples below the "trinities," that are distinguished by being written as quavers, show "the order in which the pairs meet, avoiding consecutive fifths." The key note and its trinities are, of course, transposable into all keys, and assuming their appropriate tints, modulate from one to the other. "How exquisite would they be," says the author, "if they could be represented in their natural coloured tones! as, for instance, the chord of the scale of C, in red, yellow, and blue, with the six coloured tones rising from each and harmoniously blended into each other."

We do not profess to thoroughly explain the author's theory, diagrams, or examples, although we have given them more than ordinary attention, accompanied by a special desire to understand and appreciate a work that is the result of "the leisure of fifty years." The subject is interesting, and as it is treated in the book we are reviewing with so much earnestness and reverence, there may easily be much more in the system than is dreamt of in the philosophy of any of us. The author has had the advantage of the late Dr. Gauntlett's advice, and an appendix is devoted to quotations from his letters and sayings. Amongst other things, the doctor says—"your theory of the illimitable nature of tones, the limits of six as a one complete and perfect view, and the simplicity of the three pairs, dwell much on my mind. I believe it to be quite new, and, in one way or the other, quite true."

The "three pairs," we presume, are practically f—c, g—d, and a—e; or theoretically to show the "fountain," e—b, f—c, and g—d. In either case we see the result in Diagrams v. and xii., where the major scale of C appears as the mode of F, and the relative minor as the mode of D. And in the key of A minor we have the scales of F and G, with the final of course A; that is to say, the Dorian and Phrygian modes of the key of A. The author has been led into this partial retrogression by the old land marks, the tritonic sounds F sharp and G flat, or D sharp and E flat, very properly called "poles." The "polarisation" of music has long since been made the subject of a treatise by a German writer. The "poles" being simply the resuscitated disjunct tetrachords direct or inverted. From other remarks quoted, Dr. Gauntlett seems to have had a suspicion that the author was drifting towards ancient methods. If so, the tendency has been lost in the colouring of the modern system of keys with their relative minors, which would perhaps have been better transposed in one octave as in the modern minor key. The author does not seem to be much versed in musical theories; and the phraseology employed is not always technical or even intelligible to the musician. Those matters are however poor trifles. The true and higher object of the "Harmonies of Tones and Colours" is made manifest in the following quotation from Milton, and the author's added observations in the last chapter of the book:—

Speak ye who best can tell, ye sons of light,
Angels, for ye behold Him, and with songs
And choral symphonies day without night,
Circle His throne rejoicing; ye in heaven,
On earth, join all ye creatures to extol
Him first, Him last, Him midst and without end.

"If we examine the line last quoted," says the author, "by the laws of life which regulate the foregoing scheme, we may compare it with the fundamental threefold chord of the scale of C and its relative colours.

C E G
Red. Yellow. Blue.

C red rises from the fountain key note, which contains in itself all tones. 'Him the first,' the Son of God proceeding from the Almighty and yet in Himself the Trinity in Unity. E yellow or light. E is the root of B, ultra-indigo or black. 'Him midst,' the Almighty Father, the Fountain of life, light gradually rising and dispelling darkness. G blue, 'Him last,' the Holy Spirit proceeding from the Father and the Son, Trinity in Unity. The Son of God and the Holy Spirit are the complementary working pair throughout the universe; each containing the 'seven spirits of life.' Red and blue contain all colours in each. C and G are a complementary pair, C rising from the fountain key note which contains in itself all tones, and C and G contain all tones in each."

We acknowledge ourselves completely defeated, but have very great pleasure in drawing the notice of more fortunate readers to the author's attempted solution of an interesting problem, which in our limited space could not in any case receive full justice.

Aus dem Böhmer-Walde. Charakter-stücke für Clavier zu vier Händen. Von Anton Dvorák. [Berlin: Simrock.]

ANYTHING from the pen of Anton Dvorák, be it a "Stabat Mater" or a Sketch for the pianoforte, now receives the welcome which forms the highest testimony to public favour. Dvorák has gained the ear of the world, and has only to offer in order to find instant acceptance. How great the change from the weary forty years passed in constant and unnoticed struggle against an adverse fate! But the completeness of the transformation is not in excess of justice. This composer produces nothing that fails in illustrating his high merit, or in helping to show that his sudden elevation is no mere freak of fortune. To the rule just stated the pieces before us present no exception. They are welcome and valuable additions to the repertory of the most popular of instruments. "Aus dem Böhmer-Walde" consists of two books, each containing three works; those in the first book being entitled respectively, "In den Spinnstuben," "Am schwarzen See" and "Walpurgisnacht." Of these, No. 1—an Allegro molto in D—has little of the distinctiveness that generally marks Dvorák's music. A kind of Trio in G minor offers somewhat of the master's special flavour, but elsewhere the movement, though bright and pretty, reminds us of Dvorák only by an occasional clashing of simultaneous and not similar rhythms. No. 2—"Am schwarzen See," is another thing altogether, and aims at being as much a tone-picture as the simple "black and white" of the pianoforte will allow. It opens with a Lento in F sharp minor, of a very broken and rugged character, full of cross accents, and passing hither and thither amongst the tonalities with the freedom this composer generally allows himself. It is a powerful bit of writing, almost orchestral in its breadth of design and effect. The Lento leads to a "molto tranquillo," in F sharp major, which may fairly be described as fantastic. Some lovely themes of a vocal character present themselves in its course, accompanied richly and with striking ingenuity of "figure"; but amongst these are interspersed passages—several of them suggesting the Lento—as erratic as the greatest lover of that quality could wish. The movement is by no means easy, and will put amateurs on their mettle, while perhaps it excites their wonder. The "Walpurgis nacht" is a straightforward, bustling "Molto vivace," in B flat, which domestic pianists will take delight in playing. Some of its episodes show Dvorák in his most engaging mood, while others are such as can hardly be mistaken for the work of any other man. It is as though the name Dvorák were "writ large" upon the page. We should add that the movement is developed at considerable length, and its descriptiveness well maintained. The three pieces in the second book begin with an "Allegro commodo," in F, entitled "Auf dem Anstand." Here again the character of a Fantasia is maintained, with frequent changes of time, key, and rhythm. The composer however, welds the whole together, as it were, by frequently recurring to his main theme. He thus avoids the effect of a mere string of episodes, and attains something of the unity of the Rondo. As usual, he modulates very freely, and is prodigal of rhythmic varieties. The movement cannot be called the most pleasing of the set. Many amateurs will regard the next movement—"Waldesruhe," a "Lento e molto cantabile," in D flat—as among the finest numbers of the set. It is in great part of a meditative character, somewhat discursive as to style, and marked occasionally by the polyphony in which Dvorák delights. Of actual descriptiveness there is none save a single cor de chasse passage, and of definite suggestiveness there is little. The music aims to be a reflection of feeling while delighting the ear with ingenious "figuration" and harmonic richness. The last number—"Aus stürmischen Zeiten," an Allegro con fuoco in A minor—is a most animated and vigorous piece, more simple in structure than usual and, therefore, not very strong in Dvorák's special characteristics. Largely developed, and carried out from beginning to end with sustained power, this movement cannot fail to find favour in the eyes of amateurs, quite apart from the question whether or no it justifies the name under which it stands. We end as we began by saying that the repertory of the pianoforte, à quatre mains, receives a valuable addition by the issue of these singularly fresh and unconventional pieces.

Music and the Piano. By Madame Viard-Louis. Translated from the French by Mrs. Warington Smyth. [Griffith and Farran.]

THE authoress of this work tells us in her Introduction that she places her observations before the musical public because she considers it the duty of all true artists to be as lamps to the traveller to point out the perils of his road. "I have long observed," she says, "among the greater number of those persons who occupy themselves with music, the astonishing indifference they manifest for what I may call the vital principle of this art. I mean for the thought by which the great composers were inspired. For my part I, who believe in music as a language, cannot understand this neglect; and yet it is too true, and we see it every day, that a vast number of people play upon some instrument or other absolutely as if the producing a noise which is accepted as a pleasant one were all that is desired—whilst probably they are following also a lucrative career." Now we can perfectly recollect the time when these observations would have embodied a truth which was painfully apparent to all lovers of real musical art; yet we cannot but think that Madame Louis must have been somewhat unfortunate in her experience of latter-day pianists if she still cling to this opinion, for assuredly the "pleasant noise" which was so generally accepted as music has long ago ceased to be cultivated, and the striving after the true "reading" of the works of classical composers has really become almost one of the evils of the day. What may be termed the "oratorical" part of music is unquestionably an important study, for certainly those whom Beethoven delighted to call "passage players" have in fact no right to be termed artists. In taking up a work, therefore, which professes to teach, we want to know whether the author has anything new to tell those who crave such information; for, to pursue the simile already referred to, we cannot be made to believe that the "lamps" which point out the road to the traveller can be of any service to those who do not travel the road at all. We can scarcely go so far as to say that the work contains many thoughts which have not often been expressed before; but the earnestness and intelligence of the writer amply compensate for this, and musical students will find much material for reflection in the observations upon the pianoforte works of the great composers. The book is divided into three parts:—1. General History of the Art of Music; 2. Personal History of the Principal Composers for the Piano; and 3. Advice on Style and Execution. The first part, although necessarily somewhat sketchy, gives the mere tyro a very clear idea of the manner in which the art gradually emancipated itself from its early surroundings. A short extract from this portion of the work will show that the authoress cannot part with the friends of her childhood without a pang of regret. "There came always," she says, "a moment of prayer in all the aspirations of those who are already called the 'old masters,' but whom we should do better, I think, to call 'the immortals.' They remembered that around the altars of the ancients music's earliest strains were heard; now all is reversed. Modern music prays no longer. I do not know whether this is progress, but Art now has become sensualistic, and appeals particularly to the nerves." In the course of the chapters devoted to the history of music, some very good illustrations of the style of the various composers are given in music type. Full justice, as far as the limited space will allow, is done to those who have brought the art to its present state of perfection. Beethoven, as might be expected, receives much attention, and many extracts are made from his works; but we should like to know what is the authority for saying, in speaking of the so-called "Moonlight Sonata," that at one of the ré-unions of the Countess Guicciardi the composer, "oppressed by an unspeakable sorrow, went down into the garden, and upon a stone table there, and by the moonlight, he wrote down the 'Adagio Sostenuto,' which begins the work, and which breathes throughout so exactly the dejected calm of a complete despair." By many the title is said to have been derived from a remark made by Rellstab, the critic, that the first movement reminded him of a boat wandering by moonlight on the Lake of Lucerne, and the Countess herself says "Beethoven gave me the Rondo in G, but, wanting to dedicate something to the Princess Lichnowsky, he took the Rondo away and gave me the Sonata in C sharp minor instead." In the part on "Style" there are some excellent remarks upon the method of performing the works of the various composers, and especial stress is laid upon the absolute necessity of having a good teacher at first; but the observation that "to become the artist interpreter you should be endowed by heaven with special gifts," proves that the authoress agrees with us as to the impossibility of guiding those to the right path who, either from inclination or the want of natural talent, prefer the wrong one. Madame Louis is herself a well-known pianist; and coming, as she does, so prominently before the public it is well that we should conclude our notice with an extract which may be said at once to declare her artistic creed, especially as what we have already quoted seems to show that she has an instinctive aversion to what is now known as the "advanced school." After saying that her criticism upon this class of music may be deemed severe, she continues thus:—"I think it is now generally considered that the human mind is at present passing through a sort of crisis, in which all beliefs, all traditions, all laws, everything that has been believed in or accepted are called in question and give rise to active controversy. This century, whether it prove to be the setting of a decaying society or the dawn of a renewed society, this present century is deeply, even passionately, interesting to all minds. But, whatever may be the result, the cry of humanity, as it traverses the ages, is a mighty voice which thrills the heart, and I hear it reproduced so clearly, so unmistakably in music, that I apply all the powers of my soul to endeavour to comprehend it; and it is with a deep and sympathising respect that I greet it on its way, whether it reveals itself in a short leaflet, without any perceptible meaning, or whether it compresses all the marvels of the lyrical drama into three evenings of representation."

Opfern-Handbuch. Von Dr. Hugo Riemann. [Leipzig: C. A. Koch, 1884.]

THE compilation of a book of reference concerning the more important operas, operettas, ballets, and melodramas ever produced, is an undertaking the more meritorious since it involves an amount of patient labour, and even, in some cases at least, of original research, which raises it far above the level of ordinary book-making. It is partly for these reasons, perhaps, that no work of a similar scope has hitherto been attempted in any language, and thus, in the publication of the above "Opfern-Handbuch," Dr. Riemann is rendering a real service to all interested, either professionally or otherwise, in musico-dramatic art. There exists, indeed, in our own language a somewhat analogous work, entitled, "The Companion to the Playhouse" (London, 1764), which teems with curious and interesting information respecting dramatic works (including operas and melodramas) produced in the United Kingdom; but apart from the fact of its sphere of utility being thus limited to a particular country, the work itself has been long since out of date. Hence our present author—who has already proved himself a most competent compiler in the issue of his "Musik Lexikon," commented on in these columns some time ago—cannot be charged with exaggeration in characterising his new handbook as "a necessary supplement to every musical dictionary." The existing musical dictionaries, in fact, either contain no alphabetical reference whatever to individual music-dramas or, like Grove's "Dictionary of Music and Musicians," necessarily confine themselves to the comparatively few which have obtained some special historical significance. It is, of course, obvious that a first attempt at supplying a long-felt want in this direction, however praiseworthy, cannot be otherwise than incomplete, and that, therefore, many an operatic production dear to the musical specialist of one epoch of the art or the other will be missing in the present "Handbuch." It will only be by the active co-operation on the part of all those specially interested in the subject that anything like completeness will be attained in future editions of the work thus courageously undertaken by Dr. Riemann, who, moreover, distinctly solicits the aid of his readers with that view. In the two parts of the entire volume which have so far appeared (and which will be succeeded by six further instalments in completion of the work) the author has already managed to convey a good deal of interesting information to the inquiring student. The final part is intended to comprise any additions or corrections which may have been suggested during the progress of the publication. Having regard to this, and to the general plan adopted by the compiler in his Handbook, we can see no reason why such works as "Arsace," an Italian opera by Paoli Rolli, successfully performed at the King's Theatre, in the Haymarket, in 1721, or the same composer's "Astartus," produced at the same theatre in 1720, should not be enumerated in Dr. Riemann's "Handbuch." Nor do we think that our own Thomas Clayton's opera "Arsinoe, Queen of Cyprus," performed at Drury Lane Theatre in 1707, should have been omitted from that register. We may also point out an anachronism on page 76, attributing a setting to music of Goethe's "Claudine von Villa Bella" to Gottfried Weber in 1783, when that renowned theorist and composer was only four years of age; and indeed we doubt whether such a composition has ever emanated from his pen at all. It is, however, with no spirit of fault-finding that we venture upon these few random suggestions, and we feel sure that, by the time it is completed, Dr. Riemann's "Handbuch" will be hailed by professional musicians and amateurs alike as a very valuable addition to the existing books of reference in matters musical.

Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in E flat. By Frederic G. Cole. [Novello, Ewer & Co.]

We have no hesitation in pronouncing this setting of the evening canticles one of the best of those recently published. The composer is not only an excellent musician, but he is evidently familiar with the sound English school of church music, the breadth and dignity and the earnest devotional feeling, which are its most precious attributes, being reproduced in his service with just the right proportion of modern feeling. If we may hazard a suggestion, Mr. Cole is a hearty admirer of Sir John Goss, the style of this composer being more distinctly reflected than that of any other of the first rank. One or two false accents may be noted, such as "And His mercy is on them," and, in the Gloria to the Nunc dimittis, "World without end." But these are trifling defects, and can easily be rectified in performance. The service is full throughout save one verse in the Magnificat, and is quite within the means of ordinary choirs.

Soft Voluntaries for the Organ. Book V. Composed by George Calkin. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE present issue of this publication consists of six pieces in various styles though all fairly realising their description as soft voluntaries. There is some similarity of manner between the first, Larghetto in F, 12-8 time; the third, Lento in E flat, 12-8 time; the fourth, Andante in F, 6-8 time; and the fifth, Larghetto in F minor, 6-8 time. Mr. Calkin has an obvious fondness for what is generally known as compound common measure, and he writes therein with ease and a flow of genial and refined melody. The second piece in the book is a ballad-like and taking Allegretto in G, 3-4 time, and the last is a Moderato in B flat, common time, somewhat more bold and vigorous than his companions. The distinguishing quality of Mr. Calkin's pieces is tunefulness, but at the same time the dignity proper to music for the organ is kept in view and therefore no qualifying remark need be employed in recommending them to organists.

FOREIGN NOTES.

THE Jubilee meeting of the Allgemeine Deutsche Musik Verein, held from the 23rd to the 28th of May last at Weimar, to which we briefly referred in our last number, presented some features of more than ordinary interest to music lovers generally. The Association, as some of our readers may not be aware, was founded in 1859, at Leipzig, by a few zealous artists in opposition to the rest-and-be-thankful spirit then pervading the musical fraternity in Germany, who considered that with the death of Mendelssohn the chapter of progress in the art had been finally closed. The promoters of the new association, however, thought otherwise, foremost among them being Louis Köhler, the now veteran pianist-composer, and sterling critical author, and Franz Brendel, the editorial successor of Schumann at the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik and fiery exponent of the art principles represented by that composer and profound musical thinker during his all too brief earthly career. Soon the representatives of what was then "young Germany" in matters musical—Richard Wagner, Franz Liszt, Hans von Bülow, R. Pohl, H. von Bronsart, and many others—gathered round the nucleus of a compact party of progress thus formed, and assumed prominent positions in the management thereof. Such is the origin of a society which during the twenty-five years of its existence has assumed a truly representative character in Germany, and which, it must be added to its entire credit, has during that time upheld its progressive principles with a due and unprejudiced regard to the cosmopolitan claims of the art, admitting into its programmes, by the side of the latest productions of Wagner, Brahms, Volkmann, Raff, Liszt, and others, those of Berlioz, Saint-Saëns, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Tchaikowski, Grieg, and Svendsen, most of them new aspirants to musical fame, and some of them—Berlioz amongst their number—still all but ignored at the time in their own country. All honour, then, to an institution which, during its comparatively brief existence, has done so much in affording, if only once a year, a hearing before a critically qualified assembly to talented young artists, without regard to their nationality or artistic creed! In turning now to the programme of the Jubilee meeting itself, we may allude to the most prominent items the more briefly since our opening remarks have, we hope, in a great measure explained the interest attaching to them from the point of view of the chronicler of contemporary musical history. The meeting was inaugurated by a scenic representation, at the Weimar Hof-Theater, of Liszt's "St. Elizabeth," preceded by a poetic tribute to the composer delivered on the stage, and due to him as the oldest surviving promoter of the Association, irrespective of his numerous other claims of recognition at a gathering of this description. "St. Elizabeth" is admitted on all sides to have greatly gained upon the appreciation of the audience in its present dramatised form. Among other compositions of the veteran maestro, whose personal presence at the gathering considerably added to its representative character, we may mention the Fantasia-Sonata (played, on the second day, by Herr Friedheim) in B minor, dedicated to Schumann. The performance (likewise on the second day) of a Te Deum by Hector Berlioz, originally written by the composer as forming part of a grand apotheosis of Napoleon the first, and only once performed at Paris, in 1855, under Berlioz's own direction, is a case in point in reference to our previous remarks. The work produced a profound impression upon the Weimar audience. The Te Deum was followed by Raff's Oratorio, "Weltende," which the competent critical reporter of the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik regards as, although one of the latest, by no means the ripest or most original of that gifted composer's works, and we regret our inability to quote in full his very able strictures in this respect. Mr. Eugene D'Albert's pianoforte playing, in one of the Concerts, was a distinct feature, and his Concerto in B minor, selected for the occasion, is described in one of the leading journals as "a most remarkable work; not merely on account of the youthfulness of its composer, but simply on its own merits." A symphony by a young Russian musician, Herr A. Glasunoff, also attracted considerable attention on account of its originality. Among numerous other works performed in connection with this memorable meeting, we may instance compositions by E. Lassen, F. Dräseke, Saint-Saëns, Bülow, &c.; the proceedings concluding with a performance at the Hof-Theater of Weingartner's Opera, "Sakuntala," the production of an artist who is only twenty-one years of age, and who is looked upon by some as the rising dramatic composer of Germany.

A more than ordinary interest attaches to the first performance of Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde," on May 21 last, at Dresden, the scene of the poet-composer's former artistic and official activity. It is nineteen years since this remarkable work—the most representative, perhaps, of Wagner's uncompromising later period—was first produced on any stage (at Munich), and since then it has been successively placed upon the répertoire of all the more important operatic establishments of Germany, that of Dresden alone excepted. In rendering tardy justice now to one of her most gifted musik-directors, the capital of Saxony seems, however, to have atoned for past neglect by a representation of the work in question which it is admitted on all hands has been irreproachable, and which elicited an almost unheard of enthusiasm on the part of a critically disposed audience. Contrary to the hitherto established custom, there had been no cuttings on this occasion. Fräulein Malten and Herr Gudehus are said to have admirably impersonated the respective titel-rôles. Herr Schuch conducted the orchestra; that gentleman, in his capacity of first Capellmeister at the Dresden opera, having been most untiring in his efforts to "organise the victory" thus achieved by a music-drama peculiarly liable to failure in case of the slightest disregard of apparently minor details. Repeated performances have taken place at Dresden since the occasion above recorded.

One thousand tickets for the forthcoming annual performances of "Parsifal," at Bayreuth, have been subscribed for by an anonymous admirer of Wagner, to be distributed by the "Wagner Verein" among friends and adherents of the reformer who would otherwise be unable to attend the representation of the "Festspiel." The performances in question will commence this year on the 21st inst., and will be continued, with one day intervening between every performance, until August 8. Special arrangements at reduced fares have been made with the railway companies for intending visitors to Bayreuth, starting from Berlin, Munich, Vienna, Mannheim, Carlsruhe, &c.

Herr Pollini, the director of the Hamburg Stadt-Theater, according to the positive statement of the Allgemeine Deutsche Musik Zeitung, has acquired the right for Germany of producing the entire music of "Parsifal" as a concert performance. The active impresario will, it is thought, commence these performances in the coming autumn; first at Hamburg, and afterwards at Berlin and other German musical centres, unless a dispute pending between him and the representative of the heirs of Wagner should interfere with these arrangements.

Nessler's new opera, "Der Trompeter von Säkkingen," the success of which, at Leipzig, we recently reported, has been accepted for performance during next season at Berlin.

Herr Adolf Henselt, the well-known composer and one of the foremost living interpreters of Weber's pianoforte works, residing at St. Petersburg, has contributed the handsome sum of one thousand marks to the projected monument to be erected to Carl Maria von Weber, at his native town, in 1886.

Herr Felix Weingartner, the young poet-composer of the remarkable new opera, "Sakuntala," has been appointed second Capellmeister of the opera, at Königsberg.

A "Method of Singing," which we are informed will shortly be published in the Peters' Edition, from the pen of that most eminent of German baritones, Herr Julius Stockhausen, cannot prove otherwise than a most valuable addition to the existing treatises on the subject, and will be looked forward to with eager interest by all students of vocal art.

The programme of this year's Middle Rhenish Music Festival, to be held at Mayence from the 6th to the 8th of this month, includes performances of the "Messiah," Brahms's "Song of Triumph," and a Cantata, "Coriolan," by Herr Lux.

Herr Philipp Spitta, the author of the valuable Bach-Biography, is engaged upon writing a life of Marschner, to which a number of hitherto unpublished letters of that composer have furnished part of the material.

The Town Library of Hamburg has lately acquired an interesting portrait of Handel, painted in London by Hudson, in 1745, and presented by the composer to a relative in his native Halle.

Among the novelties announced for performance during the coming season at the Vienna Opera are the following works:—Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini," Rubinstein's "Nero," Léo Délibes's "Lakmé," Grammann's "Andreas-fest," and Mackenzie's "Colomba."

The executive committee for the erection of a monument to Mozart, at Vienna, has opened a competition for the projected undertaking, the actual cost of which has been liberally estimated at £9,000. More than one-half of this sum has already been raised by private subscription, and the remainder will, it is thought, be obtained without difficulty by an appeal to the public generally.

M. Padeloup's benefit Concert at the Paris Trocadéro has been a splendid success. Musical Paris, as we ventured to predict in our last number, crowded into every available space in the hall, and the amount realised has been close upon 100,000 francs. Among the artists personally engaged in carrying out the miscellaneous programme may be instanced MM. Gounod, Saint-Saëns, Massenet, Délibes, and Reyer, all of whom conducted compositions of their own. M. Gounod, towards the close of the proceedings, presented a wreath of honour to the beneficiaire, whose retirement from his post as Conductor of the Concerts Populaires is universally regretted.

M. Charles Lefebvre has just completed the score of a new opera in four acts, entitled "Zaire," the libretto of which, from the pen of M. Paul Collin, is founded upon Voltaire's tragedy of the same name.

M. Ernest David, the author of a biographical volume on Johann Sebastian Bach, has added a pendant to this work, under the title of "G. F. Händel, sa vie, ses travaux, et son temps," published by Calmann Levy, of Paris. Our contemporary, Le Ménestrel, in announcing the publication of the present work adds: "We have not, up till now, had in France, even in the form of an abridgment, a work which would have made us acquainted with the life of the great Saxon master." If this be so, the fact only furnishes one more instance of the indifference prevailing in France concerning the productions of sacred art, from Bach and Handel down to Mendelssohn, an indifference which, however, a native masterpiece like M. Gounod's "Redemption" is likely to convert into an active interest to be taken by French amateurs in the works of the standard masters of oratorio generally.

A French translation has just been published, at Paris, of Richard Wagner's autobiography, entitled "Meines Lebens Wirken und Beruf" (My life's work and calling).

A sale took place last month, in Paris, of a very interesting collection of autographs, exclusively of musicians, including letters by Berlioz, Paganini, Grétry, Meyerbeer, and many others; also musical specimens by Bach, Beethoven, Mozart, and Gluck. The prices realised did not exceed those established by previous retail sales.

M. Ernest Reyer, the well-known French composer, has been nominated Government Inspector of Musical Instruction in France.

The idea of holding a Music-festival this year at Lausanne having been abandoned, it has been decided to give instead two separate performances there of Liszt's "Saint Elizabeth," during the present month, under the direction of Herr Herfurth.

By way of reaction against the ultra-conservative tendencies of M. Verhulst, the director of the leading musical institution of Amsterdam, a series of twenty Philharmonic Concerts will be inaugurated at the Dutch capital in the coming autumn, under the direction of M. W. Kes, the chief object of which will be the introduction to Amsterdam audiences of what is still called, in some quarters, "the music of the future." M. Verhulst, although the musical leader of the Society, "tot Bevordering (progress) der Toonkunst," is said to shudder at the very name of Wagner being mentioned in his presence.

Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" is to be produced in the French language at Brussels, during the coming autumn. M. Victor Wilder, of Paris, has been entrusted with the difficult task of translating the book.

The new Verdi-Theatre was opened at Padua, on the 7th ult., the veteran Maëstro whose name it bears, in a letter addressed to the managing director of the young institution, declining, however, to grace the inauguration ceremonies with his presence on the plea of his advancing age, and general disinclination to make an exhibition of himself.

The Town Council of Rome has again granted a subvention of 100,000 francs to the Apollo-Theatre of that capital in recognition of its claims as a representative institution of Italy.

Signor Tamberlik's "farewell" Concerts at St. Petersburg, alluded to in our last number, having yielded such substantial results in silver roubles, the veteran tenor has repented him of his leave-taking attitude, and his receding figure will shortly re-appear in the Russian capital at the head of a Vocal Academy to be established there under his auspices.

Herr Wilhelm Gericke has been engaged in the room of Herr Henschel as director of the Boston Philharmonic Concerts, for a period of five years.

The death is announced at Berlin of F. Grabau, for many years an esteemed member of the staff of professors at the Berlin Hochschule. Herr Grabau was only forty-three years of age.

At Madrid died, at the early age of thirty-six, Theobaldo Power, an excellent pianoforte player, and professor of that instrument at the Madrid Conservatorio. He was born at Santa Cruz, of English parents, in 1848.

The death is announced, at Westerwick, of Carl Fröberg, a composer and theoretical author, much esteemed by Scandinavian musicians. He was born in 1812, at Stockholm.

We have also to record the death at the mature age of eighty-one, at Liegnitz, of Leberecht Jacob, the worthy Cantor of Conradsdorf, in Silesia, distinguished by his valuable researches in connection with the German "Volkslied," and by the issue, jointly with E. Richter, of the justly-esteemed work entitled "Reformatorisches Choralbuch."

THE LATE JOHN ALCOCK, MUS. DOC.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Will you, or any one of your numerous readers and correspondents, be so kind as to answer whether the late Dr. Alcock composed an Anthem on Psalm cxxxiii.—"Behold, how good and joyful a thing it is," &c.—and where the same can be had or seen?

EFFECT OF GAS ON CHURCH ORGANS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—There are general complaints of Church organs being put out of tune with the change of temperature caused by the gas during evensong. Can any of your correspondents inform me if wire gauze covering the whole front of the instrument would prevent the hot air getting into the pipes? Or, if not, perhaps some one may suggest a remedy.—Yours truly,

J. M. F.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

ADDISCOMBE.—The fifth Concert of the season, of the Philharmonic Society, was given at the Addiscombe Hall, on Friday evening, May 30. The first part of the programme consisted of Sir W. S. Bennett's May Queen, the solos being sung by Miss A. Wood, Mrs. Moore, and Mr. A. Wilmot. The second part was miscellaneous, and included a flute solo, by Mr. H. D. Hibberdine. The programme was well rendered, orchestra, choir, and soloists being very efficient. Mr. L. Declercq conducted.

AYSGARTH.—The annual Festival of the Wensleydale Choral Union took place on the afternoon of Thursday, the 12th ult. The service was Tours in F, and the anthem, Calkin's "I will always give thanks." The choir, numbering about 200 voices, sang admirably throughout, the chanting being especially good. Mr. C. Harris conducted, and Mr. Maurice J. Davies, of Aysgarth School, accompanied throughout the service, and in the evening gave an Organ Recital, selected from the works of Bach, Handel, Mendelssohn, Smart, Wély, Scotsman Clark and A. E. Dyer. Mr. Davies was assisted in the vocal department by A. M. Wilkinson, Esq., Mrs. Moore and Miss Pollock.

BANBURY.—The twentieth Festival of the Deanery of Deddington Choral Association was held in the Parish Church, on May 27. The choir marched in procession to the church, singing the hymn "Blessed City, heavenly Salem," as they walked up the aisle. Mr. Harper (of Adderbury) ably officiated as Conductor, and Mr. Monk presided at the organ. So eloquent a sermon was preached on the occasion by the Rev. E. Husband, of Folkestone, that we are tempted to extract that portion relating to the power of music. Quoting the text "Chains of pure gold," he said:—"And in this development of the chain of pure gold, science and art have their place. We pulpit preachers are not the only preachers for God in the world. The art of the sculptor preaches for God. Many a beautiful canvas picture preaches sometimes far more eloquently than the pulpit. Many a church or cathedral, by its grand, sublime architecture, preaches for God in the world; so does many a stately window, with its rich and solemn painted glass. And in a pre-eminent degree, dear brethren, does music declare God in the world. If you ask me to name some of the greatest preachers of God's truth which the world has seen, I would lay my finger, amongst many other names, upon such men as Handel, and Beethoven, and Mendelssohn. What commentator has given us a richer, fuller, or more sublime history of the life of our Saviour than Handel has done in his Messiah? What preacher has ever excelled Mendelssohn in his description of Elijah or of St. Paul? What preacher has ever written for you meditations more helpful, more soul inspiring, than Beethoven in his Sonatas or Mozart in his Symphonies? Yet music, like other developments of the great, one Truth, is as a chain, progressing by degrees, adding link to link, till the chain becomes perfect in the divine harmony of Heaven. There was the crude, rough, untutored music of early times, when Jubal played upon his lyre and David played upon his harp. There was the Gregorian era—no very great advance, perhaps, upon the music of David's day. Then came the rapid stride when the world gave birth to Handel, and Beethoven, and Mendelssohn, and other giants in musical lore. So the chain is being added to, link by link. Little by little, step by step, the progress is being marked, not without its failures and its eccentricities, its imperfections and abuses, but still moving on in the right direction, preparing itself, robbed of its extravagancies, for the eternal minstrelsy of Heaven, and for the song that never tires and the harmony that is for ever perfect. May I add one last word, in all humility, to you who have so ably, so zealously, so carefully rendered the beautiful Service of to-day. You have, if I may so express it, taken your part in the refiner's work, for by your study and performance of this music you are helping to spread the love of pure music and to develop this most noble art. I am sure, by the pure tone of your voices, and the ability you have displayed, that you have well rehearsed this afternoon's Service before coming here. If you had lacked good voices, and had known very little about music, you would not have asked for much practice beforehand of the music. I think that the experience of most choirmasters has been this, that the less proficient a man is in the art of music, or the less ability he has to sing, the less does he think that he requires much practice. I have always noticed that the more a man knows of music, and the better singer he is, the more eager is he for practice, without which the best choir, so far as voices are concerned, will be useless and inefficient. I think there is no art in which the old saying is more strikingly exemplified than in music, 'A little knowledge is a dangerous thing.'

BIRMINGHAM.—The members of the South Birmingham Choral Society gave their inaugural Concert at the Moseley and Balsall Heath Institute on Wednesday, May 28. The Society has been very recently started, under the conductorship of Mr. Douglas Redman, R.A.M., Organist of the Church of St. Alban the Martyr. The programme consisted of Spohr's Cantata God, Thou art great, the noticeable features being the duet "Children pray," beautifully given by Miss Atkins and Mr. Gervas Cooper, and the concluding fugal chorus; Mendelssohn's My prayer, the solo in which was well sung by Mrs. Hemming, and Van Bree's St. Cecilia's Day, Mrs. Hemming winning an encore in "Give way now to pleasure." The choir gave evidence of the careful preparation which the choral music had undergone, and Mr. J. Redman, in the small part allotted him, sang effectively. Mr. F. N. Cook presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. R. Shore at the American organ.

BOSTON.—The members of the Choral Society gave their last musical evening of the season in Shodfriars Hall on Wednesday evening, the 4th ult. An interesting programme was well rendered, the members being materially assisted by Mrs. Daglish and Miss R. Elvidge as solo vocalists. Miss Simonds presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. Gregory conducted. At the end of the Concert the Rev. Canon Blenkins, M.A., vicar of Boston, presented Mr. Gregory, in the name of the members of the Choral Society, with a handsome gold watch and chain and an illuminated list of subscribers.

BROXBURN.—The members of Mr. A. Greenslade's Choir gave a performance of some choruses on Monday evening, the 16th ult. The solo vocalists were Miss M. Hay, Miss J. Hogg, and Mr. H. Scott. Miss Hay was highly successful in her rendering of the solo, "As pants the hart" (Spohr). Mr. Greenslade conducted and accompanied.

CAMBRIDGE.—Mr. R. Hayne Ingram gave his 120th Subscription Concert of Classical Music in the Guildhall, on Tuesday evening, the 3rd ult., before a large and appreciative audience. The programme was well selected, and included songs well sung by Miss C. Poock. Mr. Ingram's violin solos were features of the evening, and Mr. Farmer was very successful in his pianoforte solo.

CANTERBURY.—An International Fête took place on Monday, May 26, when the Société Philharmonique and the Société Orphéon, of St. Pierre-les-Calais, and the Musical Societies of Canterbury united in a Festival for the benefit of the Medical Charities of the city. A cordial welcome was given to the visitors on their arrival; and at the Concert in the evening, at the Pavilion, an enormous audience assembled. The programme was of the highest interest, and the brilliancy of tone and admirable execution of the French orchestra were exhibited to the utmost advantage in Weber's Overture to Der Freischütz, and other instrumental selections; the St. Lawrence Band, under the direction of Mr. Tench White, also performing with decided success. The choral music, sung by the Société Orphéon, produced a marked effect, and instrumental solos were excellently rendered both by French and English executants. The only solo vocalist was Mdlle. Austin, who elicited the most enthusiastic applause. Dr. Longhurst conducted the part-music given by the Canterbury Philharmonic Society and the Cathedral and Auxiliary Choir. In every respect the Concert was highly successful.

CHELMSFORD.—The annual Festival of the Choral Association was held on the 18th ult., at the Parish Church. Seventeen choirs in the neighbourhood are connected with the Association, the total number of voices being 370. The visiting Choirmaster—Mr. Richard Lemaire, of Erith—has by his energetic teaching produced most satisfactory results, the service this year being very good. The music consisted of well-known hymns and chants, Dr. Stainer's arrangements of the Parisian tones for the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, the same composer's anthem "What are these arrayed in white," and Offertory Sentences by Dr. Martin. Two cornets and a trombone supported the voices in the processional and recessional hymns and at other portions of the service. The Rev. T. J. Hearne, of Roxwell, was the Precentor. Mr. F. R. Frye, F.C.O., Organist of the Parish Church, accompanied at the organ, and before and after the service performed a selection of pieces.

CHORLEY.—On Sunday, the 1st ult., Mr. W. Greenhalgh, of Bolton presided at the re-opening of the large and handsome organ in St. Peter's Church. In the morning the musical portion of the Service consisted of selections from the works of Haydn and Mozart; in the afternoon from Handel, Meyerbeer, and Sterndale Bennett; and in the evening the special voluntaries were Andante, by Silas, and Grand March in D, by Boyton Smith.

COLNBROOK, NEAR WINDSOR.—On Wednesday evening, the 11th ult., the members of the Colnbrook Eisteddfod Choir presented to their Conductor, Mr. Richard Ratcliffe, a brass music stand and case, and an ebony bâton bearing his name.

CORNWOOD.—The ninth annual meeting of the Plympton Deaneory Choral Union was held in the Church of St. Michael and All Angels, on Wednesday, the 18th ult. The choirs present were Avonwick, Cornwood, Modbury, Newton Ferrars, Plympton, Plympton St. Mary, Sparkwell, Salcombe, and Ugborough, numbering in all about 200 voices. At the Choral Celebration Garrett's Service in F was sung. At Evensong the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were sung to tones arranged by the Conductor, Mr. T. Roylands-Smith. The anthem "It came even to pass," by Ouseley, was very creditably rendered. The organ, being a small one, was assisted by a string band. An eloquent sermon was preached by the Rev. G. Mercer Cox, Vicar of Plympton St. Mary, and Mr. Davis, of Modbury, presided at the organ. Great praise is due to Mr. Roylands-Smith for the admirable manner in which the choirs had been trained.

DARLINGTON.—On Sunday afternoon, the 22nd ult., at North Road Chapel, the choir, assisted by friends, under the leadership of their Organist, Mr. J. W. Lockety, gave a performance of a Cantata entitled Jesus of Nazareth, arranged by Hopkins. Mr. C. Stephenson (Organist of St. John's Church) presided at the organ.

DUNHAM MASSEY, CHESHIRE.—On Saturday, May 24, the members of the choir and the Churchwardens of St. Mark's met at the Vicarage for the purpose of making a presentation to Mr. D. Colley, the Organist and Choirmaster, upon the occasion of his marriage. The Vicar, the Rev. A. Anderson, in making the presentation, spoke in very warm terms of Mr. Colley's merits and attainments, and in the course of his remarks commented upon the excellence of the musical arrangements in the church, and on the very harmonious manner in which all connected had worked together during the three and a half years Mr. Colley had been with them. Mr. Colley returned thanks in a few well-chosen remarks.

DURHAM.—The members of Mr. T. Albion Alderson's Choir gave their first Concert on Thursday evening, the 12th ult., in the Town Hall, the programme consisting of Cherubini's Requiem Mass in C minor and The Fairy Ring (Cummings). The solos in the Cantata were taken by Mrs. S. E. Clark, Miss E. Ridley, Mr. T. H. Armstrong and Mr. Goodhead. Both works were well rendered. The Rev. Dr. Rogers, president of the choir, conducted, and Mr. Alderson presided at the pianoforte.

EASTBOURNE.—On Wednesday evening, the 4th ult., Dr. Sangster gave an Organ Recital on the fine instrument in St. Saviour's Church. The programme was highly interesting, and was listened to by a large audience with the utmost attention.—The second Organ Recital of the season was given at All Souls' Church, on the 18th ult., by Mr. Henry Bailie, Organist and Choirmaster. The programme included "The Storm" (Lemmens) and selections from the works of Bach, Beethoven, Collins, Batiaste, and Thorne.—Mr. H. W. Hardy's Choir gave a successful Concert at the Pavilion, Devonshire Park, on the 5th ult. The first part consisted of Cowen's Rose Maiden, the solos in which were sustained by Miss Carlisle, Miss Covell, Mr. T. P. Tomes, and Mr. John Easter. The choir and band were both satisfactory. The second part was miscellaneous.

FOLKESTONE.—A Sacred Concert was given in the Wesleyan Chapel, on Tuesday evening, the 10th ult., by the Amateur Orchestra, assisted by Miss Phillips and Mr. H. Clements, vocalists, and Mr. H. S. Roberts, Organist. Mr. J. R. C. Roberts led the band, and also contributed a violin solo. The various items were well rendered, and the Concert was in every respect successful.

GLOUCESTER.—The Annual Musical Festival in connection with the Gloucester and Bristol Choral Union took place in the Cathedral on the 10th ult. The immense congregation which filled all available space, and numbered over three thousand persons, is the best answer for the success of the undertaking, and the eloquent rector of Upton Magna, who did not hesitate to point out that it was possible to go to church for other motives than prayer and praise, must have felt that the charge had no application to the people he was addressing. While the choirs were forming into procession, Mr. C. L. Williams, Mus. Bac., Organist of the Cathedral, played with much artistic finish an Andante in F, from one of Beethoven's Symphonies, and shortly after Master Mills, Mr. Williams's deputy, gave out the tune of the processional hymn, which is taken from the "Children's Hymn Book," as composed by Mr. C. Harford Lloyd, the air being sustained throughout by four cornets, Messrs. Austin, Gaze, Hinton, and Callaghan. The choirs were conducted by Mr. Williams, Mr. Cooke, and Mr. Hunt. The Rev. C. H. Murphy intoned the first part of the service, the Rev. Precentor Foster read the prayers, and the Choirs gave an effective rendering of Tallis's responses. Psalm cvii. was sung to a bright setting of Mr. C. L. Williams, and the last psalm ("The Lord is my Shepherd") was given to a tune by Battishill, the trumpets breaking into melody on the final words of the Gloria Patri. A setting of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis by Langdon Colborne, Organist of Hereford Cathedral, was capably rendered by the choristers, the cornets piping in all the passages marked forte. The first anthem was by Barbauld, "The Grace of God that bringeth salvation." The soprano solo given by two or three trebles with clearness, precision, and expression, and the more difficult chorus "Hosannah in the Highest" was attained with vigour, and sung throughout most effectively. The anthem before the sermon was, "Thou shalt keep him in perfect peace," a written composition by Mr. Williams, sung unaccompanied after opening bar. It was exceedingly well rendered, and formed the feature of the Festival. During the collection in aid of the funds of the Festival, which amounted to £21, or some £7 less than that collected last year, two hymns were sung, "Christ is our corner-stone" by Rev. J. B. Dykes, and the slow and stately German and congregational tune set to the hymn "Rejoice to-day with one accord." The Choirs left the Cathedral singing Sir G. Elvey's tune to favourite hymn "At the name of Jesus." At the conclusion of the service the congregation was played out by Master Mills to the brated "St. Anne's Fugue" of John Sebastian Bach.

LEE.—The annual Choir Festival in connection with St. Mildred's Church was held on Monday evening, May 26, the Choir being conducted by that of St. Philip's, Battersea, with Master Creighton, Mr. H. Schartau, Mr. Edmund Dalzell, Mr. Robert Hilton, and members of the Westminster Abbey Choir. Mr. Howard E. Morgan, Organist of St. Mildred's, presided at the organ, Mr. George V. at the pianoforte, and Mr. Edwin Lister, precentor of St. Mildred's, conducted. The congregation was very large. An appropriate service was preached by the Hon. and Rev. Canon Legge, Vicar of Lewin. Dr. Stainer's Daughter of Jairus was finely rendered, showing care with which the Choirs had been trained.

LEEDS.—Dr. Spark's Organ Recital at the Town Hall on Saturday evening, the 21st ult., consisted of arrangements from the operas of Rossini, the principal items being Overture (La Gazza Ladra), selection from Guillaume Tell, "Non piu mesta" (Cenerentola), and "Dal tuo stelo" (Mosè in Egitto).

LLANDUDNO.—The Musical Festival was held in the new Pavilion, on the 12th ult., and was completely successful. Morning Concert Haydn's Creation was finely given, the soloists being Miss Mary Davies, Mr. Seymour Jackson, and Mr. Whitaker. Evening a crowded audience listened with the greatest delight capital rendering of the May Queen (Bennett), when the above-named vocalists, together with Madame Patey, took part in the performance. The second part was miscellaneous. Madame Patey was vociferously encoired in "Oh rest in the Lord" (Elijah), and Miss Mary Davies received warm applause for her refined rendering of the solo "With a laugh as we go round" and the song "Swinging" (Watson). Mr. Seymour Jackson fully sustained the favourable impression he has made at former Concerts. The Band and Chorus numbered 120 performers. Mr. G. H. Pugh conducted. In consequence of the unqualified success attending the Festival it will now become annual, and it is intended to increase the choir.

MANCHESTER.—The Concert given by Mr. Seymour Jackson in the Free Trade Hall, on the 14th ult., drew together an audience numerous enough to prove that the bénéficiaire has a large body of friends who take a real interest in his career. Mr. Jackson's exceptionally fine tenor voice has long placed him in the foremost rank of our local vocalists; and now that he has resolved to pursue his studies in Italy, every good wish for his ultimate success will attend him on his journey, and his re-appearance will be anxiously awaited by his many admirers. On the occasion of this, his farewell, Concert he was in excellent voice, and all his solos were warmly and most deservedly applauded. The violinist, Mons. S. Spielman, made a good impression; and Mr. A. Avison was highly successful in his violoncello solos, songs being contributed with much effect by Miss Fanny Bristowe, Miss Howard Dutton, and Mr. Fred. Gordon. Mr. Herbert Walker accompanied the vocal music, and played two pianoforte pieces.

MELBOURNE.—The Philharmonic Society gave its second performance of the most famous Oratorio of modern times, The Redemption by Charles Gounod, in the Town Hall, on April 11, before a crowded audience. Very little variation was made in distributing the principal vocal parts, the only difference in this respect from the first performance being that Mr. Gordon Gooch was substituted for Herr Eimblad, and Mr. Armes Beaumont for Mr. Walshe. On a second hearing the music, having no longer the attraction of absolute novelty, can be listened to with more attention to its method of construction, and a better appreciation of its artistic value than could be attained on a first acquaintance. The same general impression of the composer's earnest religious feeling in musically illustrating his text makes itself felt, and also the variety and fulness of his treatment of the orchestra in contrast-distinction to the vocal portion, which is frequently simple to a degree. The Oratorio abounds with beautiful melodic phrases, is in places intensely dramatic, contains some massive choral writing, and, above all, the masterly and exquisite use made of the orchestra compels the warmest admiration. Among the most impressive numbers were the dramatically conceived "March to Calvary," with its touching solo for the Saviour, "Ye daughters of Israel," and its chorus of holy women singing the Vexilla Regis; the beautiful soprano air "From Thy love as a Father;" the quartet, "O, come to me," and the grand chorus, "Unfold ye portals everlasting." Madame Simonsen sang the soprano music with much artistic finish, but Miss Holland was only fairly successful. Mr. Beaumont has evidently made a careful study of the tenor narrator's music, which he sang with much dramatic power and expression. As the bass narrator, Mr. Gordon Gooch was careful and correct, and Mr. Bergin's sympathetic voice was heard to advantage in the baritone music. The choral singing was, generally speaking, good, and showed considerable improvement, both in accuracy and attention to detail. Mr. Plaisted presided at the organ, and Mr. David Lee conducted with his usual ability.—Sir Arthur Sullivan's sacred musical drama, The Martyr of Antioch, was produced by the Australian Musical Union, at the Exhibition Building, on April 11. The orchestral and choral parts were scarcely so ably rendered as those for the solo vocalists. Too much praise cannot be bestowed upon Miss Alice Rees, who sang the soprano music. Her appearance on the platform was the signal for a burst of long-continued and hearty applause. This was Miss Rees's first appearance since her recent severe illness, and the power of her rich fresh voice has not been detracted from in any way, excepting perhaps in the upper register, where weakness is apparent. Her farewell of Olybius, short though it is, conveyed a word of passion; and as she replied to the question of Olybius, "Now, whither goest thou," her answer, "To my prison, sir," so completely electrified the audience from its great dramatic effect that the succeeding vivace movement was lost, and the house rang with applause. Mrs. Cutter, Mr. J. Kendal, Mr. S. Lamble, and Mr. H. Rofe were fairly efficient in the contralto, tenor, bass, and baritone solos. Mr. Julius Herz conducted, Mrs. Lupton presided at the harp, Miss King at the pianoforte, and Mr. Otto Vogt at the grand organ, the orchestra being led by Mr. G. Weston.

RAMSGATE.—A performance of Mendelssohn's Elijah was given at the Granville Hall, on Wednesday, the 11th ult., before a large and appreciative audience. The choruses were sung with precision and power. Mr. George N. Prior, Organist of the Parish Church, conducted. The solos were well rendered by Miss C. Penna, Mrs. Cope, Mr. W. H. Cummings, and Mr. Frank May, ably assisted in the double quartet by Mrs. Lord, Mrs. Abram, Dr. Prior, and the Rev. G. Bruce Rhind. There was a very efficient orchestra, led by Mr. S. Dean Grimson; Dr. Prior presided at the harmonium, and Mr. H. Rose and Miss S. Rose at the pianoforte.

ST. ASAPH.—On Tuesday, the 3rd ult., Mr. R. A. Atkins, Organist of the Cathedral, was presented with an illuminated address by the Succentor, the Assistant Organists, and the Lay Clerks of St. Asaph Cathedral, on the attainment of the fiftieth anniversary of his appointment as Organist. The address has been beautifully and tastefully written in red, black, and gold by Mr. Henry Jones, National Schoolmaster. At the top are placed three Chants composed by Mr. Atkins, under which appear excellent photographs of himself and St. Asaph Cathedral. The address reads as follows:—"St. Asaph, March 1st, 1834.—To R. A. Atkins, Esq.—Dear Sir, This being the fiftieth anniversary of your appointment as Organist of this Cathedral, we cannot let the opportunity pass without offering to you our united best wishes and congratulations on the occasion. It is not given to every man to occupy such an important position as you have done for half a century, and to have retained during the whole of that time the respect and esteem of all those with whom you have associated. In conclusion, we, your friends, still pray that each succeeding year which may be added to your life will bring with it a large portion of health, comfort, and happiness."

SURBITON.—An excellent Concert was given in the Lecture Hall, on Tuesday, May 27, by Mdlle. Luzeau-Coudrais, an artist of Parisian celebrity. Her selections included two songs by Signor Denza "Si tu' m'aimais" and "Serenata" (both encoired) in which she was accompanied by the composer. The other artists were Mdlle. Spontini, Miss Rose Carleton, Mdlle. de Bono, Miss Cécile Hartog, Signori Riva, Vallence and Curozzi (vocalists), Herr Henke (Zither), and Mr. F. Rivenhall ("Connoisseur" Orchestral Organ).

TOOTING.—A Sacred Concert of much interest was given at the Lower Tooting and Merton Congregational Baptist Church, on May 29, the programme containing selections from some of the principal oratorios and sacred compositions, under the direction of Mr. James H. Weager. The choir included some voices from Mr. Prout's Borough of Hackney Choral Association, and the solo vocalists were Miss Clara Marni, Miss Rose Dafforne (both from the Royal Academy of Music), Mr. James H. Weager and Mr. David Clarke. The Concert was highly successful, Miss Marni eliciting enthusiastic applause for her rendering of "Hear ye, Israel" (Elijah), and Miss Dafforne displaying a fine voice and highly cultivated style in Gounod's "There is a green hill." The choral music was also extremely well rendered.

TOTTENHAM.—A good performance of Farmer's Christ and His Soldiers was given in the High Cross Congregational Church, on May 29, by the Choral Class and friends. The soloists were Madame Clara West, Miss Alice Woodruffe, Mr. Arthur Weston, and Mr. Fred S. Oram. Mr. H. J. Harrison conducted. Mr. C. J. Wood presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. E. Wood at the organ.

WELLINGTON, N.Z.—Mendelssohn's Lobgesang was given for the first time in this city, on April 24, at a Concert in aid of the General Church Fund of the Diocese. The performers, numbering 100, included the Wellington Orchestral Society, the Harmonic Club, and members of local choirs. The work had been carefully prepared under the direction of Mr. Robert Parker, and went admirably throughout, some of the choruses (particularly "The night is departing") being given with much effect. The band was very complete, and performed the symphony movements with a precision and delicacy not often excelled by amateurs. The tenor song "The sorrows of death" was well sung and admirably accompanied. So successful was the performance that it was repeated on the following evening with even better results. Mendelssohn's work was preceded by a short and interesting selection from the compositions of Handel, in which the "Occasional Overture," finely played by the band, was a prominent feature.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. G. F. H. Parnum, Organist and Choirmaster to Langton Green Church.—Mr. J. F. M. Collins, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Anne's Church, Birkenhead.—Mr. Edward Bromell, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Mark's, Victoria Park, E.—Mr. Walter J. IMPORTANT to all TEACHERS of the PIANO-FORTE.—The old method of teaching Music is now entirely superseded by a far more excellent method, which claims to be the only correct and reasonable method for teaching Pianoforte-playing.
 Mr. Felix Sommer, one of the most efficient music-masters in the neighbourhood of London, writes as follows concerning this NEW PIANOFORTE TUTOR. (For particulars see below.)

"Sutton Lane, Chiswick, October 30, 1883.

"Dear Herr Hoering,—I am very much obliged to you for your pamphlets and specimen copy of 'Tutor.' I have only had time to look rapidly through the latter, but I have seen sufficient to show me that it contains everything you claim for it; and I shall cordially recommend it as far as it may be in my power. It is conscientious, and thoroughly musicianlike, and I feel quite sure that it will be much appreciated by the majority of the musical profession."

Now ready.

 wanted."
 "Comparison only shows the merits of your system to greater advantage."

RUTH

Words by EDWARD OXENFORD

MUSIC BY ALFRED R. GAUL.

"Ruth' is a work of sterling power; its musical form is that of perfect tunefulness combined with simplicity and strength. There is nothing involved about it, nor the least straining after unattainable effects.
 The composer has grasped his theme in a thoroughly sympathetic manner, and has produced a work which is worthy of the subject. . . .
 One of the sweetest numbers in the cantata is Ruth's solo, 'Entreat me not to leave thee,' which is instinct with pathetic expression. . . .
 Boaz's solo, 'Go not from hence, my daughter,' is another effective number. . . . A chorale, 'Nightfall,' is an exquisitely beautiful conception; and the intermezzo, 'Daybreak,' and the jubilant Wedding Chorus which follows, are full of spirit and vivacity, rushing forward with a joyous bound that carries the audience completely away. An enthusiastic encore was given to the intermezzo and chorus."—Bradford Observer.

"That the idyllic story of Ruth is one admirably adapted for artistic illustration is unquestionable, and poets, painters, and musicians have over and over again made it a subject for the exercise of their talents, and we have no hesitation in saying that in its poetical and musical treatment by Mr. Oxenford and our townsman, it has been invested with increased interest. . . . Pieces such as Mr. Gaul's Opus 34 are much wanted, and we believe that when the 'Ruth' Cantata is heard in our Town Hall it will be at once accepted as a valuable addition to our stock of music suitable for performance by fairly advanced and ad-

"Bright, tuneful, fresh, and musicianly—this work will be a great favourite, and will add to Mr. Gaul's reputation. The second part will be liked better than the first; it opens in the harvest-field, and here the real idyll begins, and with it the charm and grace and freshness of Mr.
 Gaul's inspiration. The maiden's chorus, bright as the morning it greets, and the men's robust and vigorous reply, well introduce the fresh and melodious joy-breathing music of Ruth, the chastened yet hopeful address of Naomi, and the hearty generous welcome of Boaz.
 . . . The work closes with a short but spirited chorus, 'Rejoice, for blessings round us fall,' which will bear comparison with anything Mr.
 Gaul has written. An effective fugal passage carefully worked out, but not overdone, is inserted between strains of joyful acclamation of considerable freshness and vigour."—Birmingham Weekly Dart.

"Ruth' has been set to music by several composers; none, however, has become so worthily popular as the Cantata under notice.
 Although somewhat simple in parts it contains some charming music, and is highly characteristic of the story it so vividly illustrates."— South Wales Express.

PROSPECTUS.

Some years have passed since Mr. Joseph Bennett began, in the Musical Times, a series of biographical notices which are still far from ended. The original purpose was a limited one—namely, to throw light upon the personality of famous musicians by means of extracts selected and arranged from their letters and other writings. Hence the series had for first title "The Great Composers, sketched by themselves."

Consequent upon the remarkable favour with which the notices were received, it was determined to extend their scope, and, while making prominent the Masters' own testimony, to deal with each subject in a complete biographical form, as far as allowed by the limits necessarily imposed. The words "sketched by themselves" were therefore dropped from the title.

It was further resolved to make additions in the case of the composers dealt with under the original idea, and to issue the notices separately as "Primers of Musical Biography."

The intention of "Novello's Primers of Musical Biography" is to convey, as clearly as the limits of an elementary work will allow, a just idea of each composer's personality, and to record the principal events of his life. Knowledge of what a man is helps the understanding of what he does. These little books may serve, therefore, as a first step towards acquaintance with the genius and compositions of the masters to whom they are devoted.

For the copious extracts made from letters, &c., throughout the series, no apology is offered. They are the best material upon which to base an estimate of character.

THE LONDON MUSICAL SEASON.

BY HENRY C. LUNN.

It must be freely admitted that although the power of Italian opera in this country is now fast declining, it has had a long and glorious reign. But a few years ago the commencement of the musical season was dated from the opening of the "Opera," as it was termed; and when the vocalists engaged at this establishment had arrived in the metropolis the only musical questions which agitated the fashionable world were what parts the favourite prime donne would be likely to appear in, and what would be the "off" evenings upon which, as no petted vocalist would sing, the holders of boxes and stalls might absent themselves from their usual after-dinner lounge. The change has certainly been very gradual; but assuredly it is utterly wrong to assert that the large sums paid to the principal vocalists is the reason why Italian opera is no longer remunerative. The fact is that the taste for the feeble music of this school of writing began to decline when better music became more generally known, and the power of the prima donna only became despotic when the composer had ceased to retain his hold upon public sympathy. How long the institution may exist supported by so slender a prop it is difficult to say. Conscious of her importance to the cause, we can scarcely wonder at the enormous terms demanded by a first soprano, although we may wonder that a lessee can be found to pay them; but signs are not wanting that a system so destructive of true art must come to an end, and few real music-lovers will, we believe, regret it. Meanwhile, however, English and German opera, at first timidly submitted to a British audience, have so grown in public estimation as to be anticipated yearly with the keenest interest, and Italian opera must now be content to take its place as one only of the many musical attractions of the London season.

This year Mr. Gye has done but little at the Royal Italian Opera to attract any save those who are still abject subjects of the "Queens of Song." Mesdames Albani, Adelina Patti, Pauline Lucca, Sembrich, Durand, and Fursch-Madi, however, have proved a tower of strength, and had they been adequately supported by tenors the season might have been thoroughly worthy of this time-honoured establishment. The only novelty presented has been Reyer's "Sigurd," the production of Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's "Colomba" being, we understand, deferred until next season. The new-comers have been noticed in THE MUSICAL TIMES as they appeared; but although most of them were favourably received, we doubt whether any one—with the exception of M. Jourdain, the tenor, and perhaps of Madame Laterner—will be included in the company next year.

The German opera has been a friendly rival during the season, Madame Albani having materially added to the strength of some of the Wagner operas by singing in German the music of the principal character. Now that vocalists of all nations are engaged in the rendering of Italian opera, there can be no possible reason why companies should not amalgamate, and we may eventually have works performed in the language they were composed in, by singers whose principal claim to public recognition is that they can sing. Mr. Villiers Stanford's Opera "Savonarola," produced for one night almost at the conclusion of the season, certainly redeems a promise in the prospectus; but we could wish that a work which has received the stamp of approval in Germany had been treated with more respect. There has been much earnestness displayed by every member of the company, under Herr Richter's direction; but as mere vocalists we cannot by any means award them unqualified praise. "Tristan und Isolde" was perhaps better rendered than any other opera during the season; but, on the whole, the artists engaged could scarcely be said to have sustained the prestige of a country to which we are now taught to look for the highest development of operatic art.

Mr. Carl Rosa's season of English opera at Drury Lane Theatre, although of short duration, decisively proved how much he had strengthened his hold upon the British public since, many years ago, he commenced his enterprise. Perseverance in the cause he had at heart—the establishment of a home for the works of native artists, and for those of foreign composers translated into the language of the country—has been at last amply rewarded, crowded houses, and a warm response to the announcement on the closing night that he would prolong his stay next season, fully attesting his decisive success. Mr. Villiers Stanford's new Opera, "The Canterbury Pilgrims," has, artistically, fully realised all that was expected from this rising young composer; but this work (with the two successes of last season, Mr. Mackenzie's "Colomba" and Mr. Goring Thomas's "Esmeralda") has been strangely mixed up with those old-world specimens of English workmanship which still attract paying audiences. It is no doubt an expensive luxury to educate the people to an appreciation of higher works in art than they have been accustomed to; and we must not blame Mr. Carl Rosa if he pursues this labour of love somewhat cautiously; but there can be no question of the reaction that has commenced, and we look forward with much hopefulness to next season, when, with more time at his command, the lessee may be enabled to plan his programmes so that he can lead, as well as be led by, the public taste.

The "Royal English Opera Company" also gave a few weeks' season, at Covent Garden Theatre, in the early part of the year, when Nessler's "Piper of Hamelin," and "Victorian," by Mr. Julian Edwards, were produced, neither, however, creating much effect. Many late members of Mr. Carl Rosa's company took part in this enterprise, which was only moderately successful.

One more has been this year added to the list of comic operas by Messrs. Gilbert and Sullivan; and although it can scarcely perhaps be said that "Princess Ida" is fully equal to some of its predecessors, it may be recorded as a distinct success. Unless the public become weary of this form of entertainment, there can be no reason why the specimens, which are now accumulating to a somewhat formidable extent, should not be multiplied as long as these two artists remain in partnership. Whatever may be said as to their effect upon art, both in a literary and musical point of view, there can be no question that they have hit the popular taste; and although the types of almost all the characters in the "Sorcerer" have been reproduced in the many operas which have followed it, so large an amount of skill and cleverness has been exercised in disguising this fact that few persons have ever thought of identifying their old friends under new names, or even cared to do more than laugh at the good-humoured satire of the author and the quaint music of the composer. We have indeed a right to treat with respect works which can draw nightly such large and intelligent audiences, and have little doubt that next year

"Princess Ida" will be replaced by a production equally creditable, in an artistic sense, to its authors, and equally satisfactory, in a pecuniary sense, to the management.

The Philharmonic Society has been enabled not only to give its annual series of Concerts without any call upon its Guarantee Fund, but to recover that position in public estimation which had become endangered by too conservative a management. During the past season much activity has been shown; and we may mention, in proof of a desire to follow in the footsteps of those who directed the Society in its best days, that Herr Dvorák was invited to produce and conduct a work of his own composition entirely new to this country. Other interesting novelties have also been occasionally included in the programmes, all of which have been commented upon by us at the time; and although, perhaps, too many of the Concerts have comprised none but familiar works, they have always been such as must ever be cordially welcomed. But we cannot too forcibly express our regret that when the resignation of Mr. Cousins left the Directors free to seek for the best Conductor they could find they should throw away the chance, and divide the office amongst a number of artists, so that the members of the band, in the absence of a permanent ruling mind, should occasionally be tempted to rule themselves. It is true that all the Conductors chosen had special qualifications for the task; but orchestral performers will not implicitly obey directions at one Concert which may be contradicted at the next; and we earnestly hope that the experience of the season will cause the Directors to reconsider their resolution, and appoint one thoroughly competent Conductor for the next series of Concerts.

The Richter Concerts, which now seem to be firmly established in this country, have been at least artistically successful during the season, although the audiences have not always been as numerous as could be desired. The truth is that Herr Richter is associated in our minds with the music of the modern German school, and at first some disappointment was felt when it was found that too few of such compositions were contained in his programmes. As a ruling power over the rendering of the great standard orchestral pieces Herr Richter is thoroughly appreciated, although we may not always agree with his readings; but he directs best the works with which he sympathises most; and true art-lovers, therefore, attend his Concerts not so much to enjoy the compositions they already know as to learn something of those which represent what should only be termed music of the "future," as long as no Conductor of the "present" possesses the faculty of realising their beauties. Much of Wagner's music, however, was given at the later Concerts; and we have to thank Herr Richter for including Brahms's new Symphony in his selections, and also for recognising the worth of English composers by a performance of Mr. Mackenzie's orchestral ballad "La Belle Dame sans Merci."

The Directors of the Sacred Harmonic Society, in addition to engaging Mr. Charles Hallé as Conductor, very wisely secured the services of Mr. W. H. Cummings as Director of the choruses and occasional Conductor; and the Concerts of the season have been thoroughly satisfactory. Gounod's "Redemption," one of the great successes of the Society's Concerts last year, again proved a powerful attraction; and Bach's "Christmas Oratorio" (conducted by Mr. Cummings) and Sir G. A. Macfarren's Oratorio "King David" (under the conductorship of Sir Arthur Sullivan) were also highly interesting performances. We have every hope that the Society is now fairly established, and that it will continue to maintain the fame which it so legitimately earned at a time when sacred music of the highest class was but little known to the general public.

We are sorry to find that in spite of the most praiseworthy efforts of Signor Randegger to carry on the Association so long known as "Mr. Henry Leslie's Choir," it has been resolved to abandon the undertaking after the present season and dissolve the Choir. We care not to enquire into the reasons which led to this resolution, but it is asserted that the attendance at the practices was by no means regular, and that consequently the prestige so long attached to this body of vocalists could not be worthily maintained. During the season the usual Concerts have been given, and with a fair amount of success; but we all know how much more difficult it is to keep life in a resuscitated Society than to found a new one, and have therefore only to express our regret at parting with an old friend, and to thank Mr. Leslie for giving that spur to the practice of delicate choral singing in this country the good effect of which will never be effaced.

The Bach Choir has given two Concerts, under the direction of the founder, Mr. Otto Goldschmidt, the programmes of which were interesting, although perhaps somewhat severely classical. The singing has scarcely been beyond reproach, especially at the second Concert; and it would be unkind to pass over this fact in recording the work of a Society which should be as earnest in retaining its high reputation as it was in earning it.

The Monday and Saturday Popular Concerts have continued their successful career during the season, an especial feature being the performances of Madame Schumann, who was welcomed with a warmth which must have convinced her how highly her exceptional gifts are appreciated by all true art-lovers in this country. Apart from her exquisite rendering of all the great classical pianoforte works, Madame Schumann as an exponent of the compositions of her late husband stands quite alone; and at each visit she reads us a lesson which will not be forgotten. It says much for the concert-going English public that whenever she has played the room has been crowded in every part; and it may with confidence be asserted that as long as she holds the power to exercise the art her attraction will in no respect diminish.

Although the Crystal Palace Concerts have been thoroughly satisfactory to those who journey to Sydenham for the purpose of listening to good compositions well played, but little interesting novelty has been given, except the two orchestral works of our great artistic visitor, Herr Dvorák, which, conducted by the composer, created a marked effect, his two "Gipsy songs," admirably sung by Mr. Winch, the American tenor (who has in a few months legitimately earned the highest place as a vocalist), also eliciting a storm of applause. Mr. Manns still rules over the admirable band he has so long directed, and which we sincerely hope will remain intact.

The prominent position taken by the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society, under the able direction of Mr. Barnby, has been fully maintained, if not increased, during the past season, the performance of Beethoven's Mass in D, indeed, reflecting the highest credit both upon the Conductor and the members of the choir. We may also mention the magnificent rendering of Berlioz's "Faust," which, although previously given in London, made so great an effect when first performed by this Society that it seems annually looked for with unabated interest. This admirably trained choir, too, enabled Herr Dvorák during his stay in England to present us with a finished rendering of his "Stabat Mater," the performance of which, at the Royal Albert Hall, was one of the most prominent events of the season.

The London Musical Society, as performing compositions entirely new or but little known in England, claims the attention of all interested in musical progress; and, indeed, had it done nothing more than present for the first time in this country a work so remarkable as Dvorák's "Stabat Mater," it would have earned the most cordial acknowledgments of all musicians. The production, this season, of Schumann's Cantata "The King's Son," and of Astorga's "Stabat Mater," fully sustained its character for the selection of novelty in its programmes, although Schumann's work by no means represented the composer at his best. The choir, under the direction of Mr. Barnby, if not very powerful, is remarkable for accuracy and precision of attack.

The testimonial presented to Sir Julius Benedict was a thoroughly spontaneous expression of the national feeling towards one who has spent the best years of his life in this country, and given his valuable services whenever and wherever they could be of benefit to the cause of music. His Oratorio "St. Peter" was fittingly chosen for the first of the two Concerts in his honour at the Royal Albert Hall; and the numerous offers of assistance by the most eminent members of the profession enabled him not only to place his own work before the public with a strong array of solo vocalists, but to give a miscellaneous performance on the next day, with a combination of talent unexampled, even at the well-known annual Concerts of which this was the fiftieth anniversary.

Amongst the many high-class Concerts given during the season may be mentioned those of M. de Pachmann, Señor Sarasate, Dr. Hans von Bülow, Mr. Charles Hallé, Madame Essipoff, Miss Agnes Zimmermann, Madame Sophie Menter, and Mr. Walter Bache, the attendances at which have decisively shown that classical music has now most powerful attractions for the general public; the last-mentioned artist, however, by almost limiting his programmes to the works of Liszt, somewhat narrowing the sympathy of those who would be glad to support the Concert-giver's undoubted claims as a pianist.

Concerts furnishing evidence of good teaching in our educational establishments have been given during the season by the Royal Academy of Music, the Guildhall School of Music, the London Academy of Music, the Normal College for the Blind, and numerous other institutions, several of the pupils developing remarkable powers in the various branches of the art. All these performances have attracted large audiences, including not only the friends of the students, but many amateurs and others interested in musical progress.

The numerous Choral Societies of the metropolis show ample signs of a desire to move with the times, the Borough of Hackney Choral Association (under Mr. Ebenezer Prout), for example, having given an excellent rendering of Mr. Mackenzie's Cantata "Jason," and the Bow and Bromley Institute performing Dr. Stainer's Cantata "St. Mary Magdalen" (under the conductorship of the composer), both for the first time in London. Praise must also be given to the Highbury Philharmonic Society (under Dr. Bridge), to the Hampstead Choral Society (under Mr. Willem Coenen), to the Tufnell Park Choral Society (under Mr. W. H. Thomas), and to many others which, did our space permit, we should be glad to do ample justice to. Mr. Willing's Choir, and the Kyrle Choir (under Mr. Malcolm Lawson), must however not be omitted from special mention, as they have much advanced in public estimation during the season.

The growing popularity of the bands in the parks, and at the Health Exhibition, sufficiently attests the love of the people for music in the open air. These al fresco entertainments, indeed—the only true "Promenade Concerts"—have now become a national institution; and it rests with the promoters of the movement, by rigid attention to the preservation of order during the music, and the selection of good and suitable compositions for performance, to make these meetings not only pecuniarily successful, but artistically interesting.

The Royal Victoria Coffee Hall, in an appeal in favour of the "People's Concerts" issued by the managers, says that "it is no longer an experiment, but a proved success, as shown by the attendance of upwards of 200,000 people last year." The immense outlay, however, necessitated by providing excellent entertainment at a very moderate rate of admission, can only be repaid by a large increase in the subscription list. Ordinary Music Halls, of course, pay their way by the sale of drink; but as this Association aims at a higher method of re-imbursing itself, we sincerely hope that support will be freely given by all who desire that good music shall be placed within the reach of the masses.

The performance of Oratorios and other musical works as a portion of the service of the Church has grown up, as we anticipated, into so important an element of devotion that many of the standard sacred compositions are now to be heard amidst the surroundings with which they are so sympathetically associated. Bach's "Passion Music," Spohr's "Last Judgment," and Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" have for some time been given on the days sanctified by the events which they musically glorify, and often with full orchestral accompaniments. In Gounod's "Redemption"—the latest addition to these musical sermons—we have a work now universally admitted as one of the most appropriate, as well as one of the most eloquent, contributions to the cause; and in many churches selections from it have constantly been given. But the rendering of the composition in its entirety at Westminster Abbey, on Ascension Day, produced an effect which will long live in the memory of all who were present; and there can be no doubt that it will henceforth occupy a permanent place amongst the recognised musical aids to religious worship.

Our obituary this year unfortunately includes a distinguished musician, whose labours in the cause of art in this country will long be remembered. Sir Michael Costa was so identified with music in England, if not with English music, that it is difficult to avoid associating his name with the Institutions over which he so long presided; the Italian Opera, the Sacred Harmonic Society, and the Handel and Birmingham Festivals, indeed, having been for so many years under his powerful guidance that for some time, however great may be the artists engaged to direct these performances, we shall feel that there is a stranger at the Conductor's desk. Although naturalised as an Englishman, Sir Michael Costa's sympathies were scarcely with the works of our native composers; but it must be recollected that his early connection with the Italian Opera coloured the whole of his after career, a fact sufficiently evidenced by even his best compositions; and we firmly believe that, in spite of his constantly conducting works of other schools, he died in the faith of his youth.

Another able and industrious worker in the cause, Mr. J. P. Hullah, has passed away during the year. In the latter part of his life his name came prominently before us as an Inspector of Music in Training Colleges, under the Committee of Council on Education; but it must not be forgotten that, in addition to the establishing of classes for singing based on the system of Wilhem, he was the means of introducing several vocalists to the London public during his Concerts at St. Martin's Hall, amongst whom may be mentioned Madame Lemmens-Sherrington and Mr. Santley. His "History of Modern Music," and "Transitional Period of Musical History," contain much information which will prove extremely useful to musical students, and some few compositions of his have also become popular.

We have likewise to record the decease of Signor Francesco Schira, an artist well known in this country as a composer, conductor, and teacher; of Signor Mario, the once justly celebrated tenor; of Dr. Corfe, for many years Choragus of the University at Oxford; of Mr. Edwin Aspa, a composer of several Cantatas; of Miss Orridge, a young and highly promising contralto vocalist, and, at New York, Madame Anna Bishop, for many years a popular singer, both in England and America.

The season has certainly not been remarkable for the production of novelty; but indications of a more cultivated taste are apparent, even in those very circles where only a few years ago frivolity reigned supreme. Music is no longer regarded either as a mere amusement or a showy accomplishment; and works of art are beginning to be judged upon their own merits, apart from the nationality of their composers. Native artists, therefore, have no right to complain of a want of recognition of their claims; and in our next resumé of the season we trust to be able to speak even more hopefully of the healthy increase of works of English growth. Meantime it must be a matter of congratulation that the best compositions of modern writers of all countries are now as much before us as those of a past generation; and, with a full conviction that no national school of art can be formed by imitating that of another nation, we may confidently hope that the future of English music shall be distinctly the growth of the requirements of the English people.

SPOHR'S OPERAS.

By F. CORDER.

In 1818 Spohr had the original legend of "Der Freischütz" submitted to him, but fortunately for us he relinquished it to Weber. It was after the famous tour in Italy, where he had heard for the first time a great deal of Rossini's music, which he amusingly criticises in his autobiography. Poor Spohr's critical powers were not by any means of the first rank. It is curious that he should have now been influenced to imitate in some measure the very style which he so strongly condemns, though to this he was certainly urged by his friends. He took up the libretto of an old opera of Grétry's, which Ihlée had modernized and made into a pretty but naïve piece. It is simply the old fairy tale of "Beauty and the Beast" dramatised in detail, so the description of the plot need not detain us. The music is, in our opinion, Spohr's very best effort; but, though at one time generally so esteemed, it was afterwards, strange to say, deemed inferior to "Faust." It contains a large number of unusually good melodies, although Spohr's mannerisms are as prominent here as elsewhere.

The orchestral introduction begins with a placid 6-8 Larghetto, followed by a tempestuous Allegro which forms part of the opening chorus of invisible spirits of the tempest. The merchant Sander and his comic servant Ali are driven by the storm to take refuge in the Beast's garden where invisible spirits, taking up the first 6-8, bid them welcome. Sander sings a fine Aria describing his manful struggles against misfortune, and, on the invisible spirits supplying them with refreshments, Ali sings a lively little ditty of so Mozartian a style that it seems like an echo of Papageno :—

When Sander plucks the fatal rose a terrible denunciatory chorus of spirits follows, in which a fugue on this subject—produces excellent effect. As this dies away Prince Azor enters, and after some semi-recitative there comes a really splendid Trio and Chorus, in which the difficult task of contrasting the three men's voices with a full choir is admirably solved. Another Trio, without chorus, is the next number, and this is even more interesting, having this fine melody treated in canon: unfortunately it lies rather low for the two tenors—

After sending home the merchant and his servant, Azor has a Scena, consisting of Recitative and a Rondo, which is singularly exacting, even for Spohr, though it nowhere goes above G.

The scene then changes to Sander's house, where his three daughters, awaiting his return, sing a delicious Trio, containing an almost unaccompanied Adagio— and an Allegro, in which the three voices are equally well displayed—

This charming piece is not altogether unknown to English concert-goers and the reason of its rare performance is probably also the reason of the Opera's abandonment, the difficulty of finding three florid sopranos of equal powers, without which it can hardly be attempted. Zemira's famous song "Rose, softly blooming" is the next number, Spohr's brightest inspiration, and the only one which has achieved general and lasting popularity. This is too well known to need comment and we may pass to the next number, really a gem of almost equal value in its way. It is a quintet, or, rather, scene for five voices, finishing the act, and contains a duet between Zemira and Ali on this theme—then, after some concerted matter containing Sander's narration and Zemira's resolution to save her father, there is a short Adagio for the five voices without accompaniment, and a final brilliant Allegro, beginning—during which Zemira indulges in running passages over the melody sung by the others, and all have scales in contrary motion to add to the general brilliancy. The coda of this is in long notes, appearing like an Adagio, as Zemira takes a pathetic farewell of her father and sister, and so ends the first Act.

The prelude to the second Act is of no particular interest in itself, but serves to usher in the opening chorus of spirits welcoming Zemira to Azor's palace. The Beast introduces himself and has the inevitable love-duet with Beauty. This is another pearl which Spohr has rarely excelled. The melody is too extended for quotation, but the general style is somewhat like the first duet in "Faust." Then there is a concerted piece, where Zemira looks in the magic mirror and sees her father mourning for her. She coaxes Azor to let her return on a visit, and we again have Sander's house. Ali relates a dream he has had concerning Zemira in a song of rather peculiar character, and the next number is a duet for the two sisters, who steal Zemira's magic ring without which she cannot return to her lover. This duet, consisting almost entirely of bravura passages in thirds, is extremely brilliant and difficult. Returning to Azor's palace we find the Prince in despair at Zemira having apparently forsaken him. He naturally seeks comfort in a long Aria of even greater difficulty than his first. He goes off with the intention of dying, and Zemira, transported hither by some unknown power, despite the loss of her ring, in her turn sings a scena, admirably effective but bristling with difficulties. One cadenza we feel bound to quote, recommending it as a study to ambitious sopranos—

This is unquestionably a climax and therefore the proper time for a fairy to step in and set things right. Azor and his people are disenchanted, the lovers united, and so, with a bright and lively concluding Sestet and Chorus, ends this delightful work, in which there has really not been a dull page from beginning to end. If it were not for the certain fact that there is not a single English singer capable of doing justice to any one of the parts we should earnestly recommend it to Mr. Carl Rosa when he is in want of a really lively novelty, but its demands upon the vocalizing powers of the artists are so great that we fear it will never again be adequately rendered. We have noticed it occasionally, but rarely of late years, in the programmes of one or two German houses, but, as a singing master once remarked, "We don't make that kind of voice now."

We now have to examine Spohr's most satisfactory operatic effort, that is to say, the opera which presents the fewest drawbacks of any kind. The "Lover's Duel" is too slight, "Faust" too ridiculous, and "Zemire und Azor" too difficult for general popularity; but "Jessonda," written during Spohr's best time, has a very fair libretto, and, though difficult to sing, is not too exacting. It is still played now and then in the principal German cities.

Towards the close of 1821, while living in Dresden, Spohr felt the spirit move him to write another opera. Being kept in the house one wet day he asked his landlady to lend him a book to read; she routed out an old romance, "La veuve de Malabar," in which Spohr found story enough for his purpose. He sketched out a skeleton of the libretto, and found among his friends one Edmund Gehe, who consented to write it. The affair, however, stood over owing to Spohr's appointment as Conductor to the new Court Theatre of Cassel. The first new work performed at this theatre was "Zemire und Azor," which had decided success and so pleased the composer, who, hearing it after an interval, deemed himself better able to criticise it, that he declared it to be his very best work. In December, 1822, "Jessonda" was finished, the good libretto having inspired the composer to do his very best with it. It was produced on July 28, 1823, the Elector's birthday, and was received with general acclamation; but a still greater success attended its subsequent performance at Leipzig in 1824, when the composer was invited to superintend the production in person. Every separate number was vehemently applauded, the overture and four other pieces being redemanded. After the charming duet between Nador and Amazili, in the second Act, an excited enthusiast in the boxes rose and made a speech, demanding three times three cheers for the true "master of German art," which were duly given, with deafening flourishes of drums and trumpets, forming a scene which has only once since (at Bayreuth in 1876) seen its parallel. After this the Opera ran all over Germany with unabated success. In the days of English opera at Covent Garden it was produced, as well as its two predecessors, with the usual lack of success which attended all new works at that time in London.

"Jessonda," "Der Berggeist," and "Die Kreuzfahrer" are the only operas in which Spohr abandoned the use of spoken dialogue; in the former he used the old-fashioned, wearisome style of recitative, accompanied by simple chords from the strings, as in oratorio, but in the other two he pursued a more enlightened course. The overture to "Jessonda" is so well-known that we need hardly describe it. The opening slow movement, so effectively scored, is the first theme of the long and elaborate chorus (or rather series of choruses) of Brahmins with which the Opera commences. A certain Rajah—name not given—is just dead, and the priests make a great to-do over his body and propose to make a suttee of his widow to appease the restless spirit. There are seven separate movements in this opening chorus, of which the second, a Chorus of Bayaderes—and the last, a pompous tutti, rather unlike Spohr, for a wonder—

are the most striking. The high priest Dandau then summons a young man named Nadori, who, against his will, has been brought up in entire seclusion to be trained for some branch of the priesthood, which demands, above all, absolute purity. He is commanded to mix, for the first time, with human beings, and to go and bear the death tidings to the widow Jessonda. Dandau and Nadori have a very long duet, in which Spohr's absurd love of "strict form" proves a decided mistake, as both the Larghetto and Allegro are thus practically sung twice over. It may be noticed, as a curious musical coincidence, that the opening phrase—is all but identical with Pogner's first line in Wagner's "Meistersinger." The phrase in Wagner is a mere passing one, so it is not likely that he has committed even an unconscious plagiarism, but the coincidence of thought is worth noting.

An officer now brings Dandau the information that an army of strangers (Portuguese) which has been encamped near is now in threatening commotion, on account of the arrival of a great warrior (Tristan d'Acunha), its leader. Dandau then sings a very fine prayer to Brahma, with a unison chorus. The scene then apparently (for there are no stage directions in the scores of any of these operas) changes to the house where the fair widow, who, by the way, never wastes a thought on her dead husband, is awaiting the tidings of doom and comforting her weeping sister Amazili. Jessonda, it appears, was in love with some young man from whom her father cruelly separated her, and took her with him to India, where he married her to an aged Rajah, for gold. She is now free, therefore, and indulges in regrets for the lover she can never wed. The scena which naturally occurs here is one of Spohr's mild attempts at innovation, the Allegro coming first and the Larghetto (a beautiful melody) last. Jessonda's attendants announce—fancy your servant opening the door and announcing—"The messenger of death!" The widow says, "Ask him to step this way," and further tells the servants that "according to old custom" he should be ushered in by wildly dancing groups of Bayaderes. She probably means the old operatic custom of dragging in a dance wherever possible. Accordingly we have a short and rather melancholy dance, and Nadori enters. The Trio which follows is decidedly the best number in the Opera. Nadori of course falls wildly in love with Amazili and is in a great state of mind on realizing his condition. Amazili implores him to save her sister and he resolves to try. With this not particularly dramatic situation ends the first Act.

The second Act opens in the Portuguese camp with a soldiers' chorus of rather peculiar character, being like a polonaise or bolero, perhaps with the intention of conveying a Portuguese flavour. A Recitative for Tristan and his officer Lopes informs us that war is declared between the Indians and Portuguese and also that the arrival of Tristan is to be celebrated by festivities. Some kind of ballet with choruses then takes place, the music to which is very pretty, especially the Waffentanz— with its well-contrasted Trio. Further conversation between Lopes and Tristan informs us that the latter is inconsolable for the loss of a lady whom he loves and who has been suddenly taken away from him. He bewails his sorrows in a lively Aria alla polacca, which, being in strict rondo form, has its interest considerably spoilt by excessive length, like most old-fashioned Arias. The two heroines are then introduced by a rather clumsy device. Tristan explains that some Indian ladies are coming to perform religious rites at the sacred stream, just where the Portuguese are encamped, and that he has promised them safe conduct. The gentlemen therefore retire and leave the stage clear for Jessonda and Amazili, who sing a duet about nothing in particular, though it is very melodious, and after this Jessonda would seem to retire (as we before remarked, there are no stage directions) in order to give Amazili an opportunity. Nadori now enters and explains to the audience that, failing all other means of rescue, he has determined to seek the Portuguese general, whom he has heard to be a worthy man, and beg his assistance for Jessonda. He then proceeds to sing an extremely difficult Rondo beginning thus—

Amazili judiciously waits till he has done practising sol-feggi, and then advances; whereupon, as a matter of course, follows a love-duet. This is the piece which so excited the enthusiasm of the Leipzig audience in 1824, but, though it is undeniably charming, we venture to think that Spohr has written many as good, and one or two decidedly more beautiful. After this Nadori retires, to allow Amazili to have her turn. She sings an Aria, which is perhaps the least interesting thing in the opera, consisting as it does of little more than Spohr's most hackneyed phrases and modulations. Now comes a long finale. Jessonda returns from the bath with her attendants, and the same time Nadori brings Tristan to the spot. Jessonda at once recognises him as her long-lost lover. Despite the warnings of the Bayaderes, the lovers embrace and indulge in the usual raptures, which are cut short by the unaccountable appearance of Dandau with his Brahmins. Both Portuguese and Indians are eager for a fight, but Dandau reminds them that the armistice is not yet expired, and claims from Tristan fulfilment of his promise to let the ladies return unmolested. This is an effective situation, and the music, in which the solo quartet and the two choruses are made to effectively alternate, is thoroughly worthy of it, bringing the Act to an impressive conclusion.

At the opening of the third Act, Tristan and Lopes are found wandering about in despair, beholding in the distant Indian citadel the funeral pyre erected for Jessonda. Nadori steals out to them, and divulges that Dandau himself has broken the armistice by sending two slaves to set fire to the Portuguese ships. He further offers to lead Tristan and his men by a secret subway into the Indian fortress. The three men sing a warlike measure—which afterwards forms the finale, and go off to arrange the attack.

The scene then changes to the inside of the Indian citadel, where the Brahmins and Bayaderes are praying and chorusing to a great extent. Spohr even attempts to make two different choruses go together here, but abandons the idea after a few bars only. On questioning the oracle as to the issue of the impending conflict, the response is unfavourable—with a thunder peal the sacred image falls down. Dandau considers that the best way to gain the goodwill of the god is to sacrifice Jessonda without delay—indeed, there seems no clear reason why they have not done so long ago. They bring her on, and being so weak as to allow her to sing a very long scena before she goes to the stake, find themselves attacked by the enemy before they can complete the sacrifice. The Portuguese attack in front and also in the rear, by means of the secret passage. Finding all lost, Dandau furiously tries to stab Jessonda, but of course is prevented by Tristan, who arrives in the nick of time. The lovers being all united, there is no use in making a long finale which would be inaudible through the bustle of a departing audience and the banging of box doors, so Spohr sensibly gives us a bright quick finish formed from the Trio mentioned above.

There is one curious feature about the music of "Jessonda," and that is the preponderance of triple measure. Just the reverse is the case with Wagner's "Lohengrin," nearly the entire Opera being in common time. There is only one piece, the prayer in Act I., which is in triple time. But it takes more than this to make music monotonous.

Great as is the sameness, and equal as is the technical merit of Spohr's works, there is one decided difference between his earlier and later efforts. Most composers produce their most striking melodies in the earlier part of their career, and as advancing years bring riper development of style, pure inspiration is apt to become rarer. All Spohr's best ideas are to be found in his first four operas and his other contemporary compositions. In his last four dramatic works the melodies are decidedly lacking in freshness; on the other hand, there is more freedom of form, there is even a striving towards that more intimate blending of drama and music which the modern school aims at, but Spohr could not be an innovator, often though he tried. "Der Berggeist;" or, "The Mountain Spirit" is an excellent piece of work, though the musical ideas are not so striking as in its predecessors. Perhaps we might admire it more had we not first made the acquaintance of these others. Yet only a couple of years elapsed between the production of "Jessonda" and the new work. It was in 1824 that the composer was invited to write an opera, to be performed on the occasion of the wedding of the Elector's daughter Marie with the Duke of Saxe Meiningen, in 1825. Perhaps the sense of writing to order exercised its usual influence upon him. He applied to Edmund Gehe, and suggested the subject of "Rübezahl," but as Spohr did not supply a clear sketch of his design the poet produced a libretto which was considered unsatisfactory. In this strait the composer suddenly bethought him of one Georg Döring, who played the kettledrums in the opera at Frankfort; he had written several successful novels, perhaps he would do. To make the task easier Spohr suggested that, "being a grand opera there was no absolute necessity for the libretto being written in rhymed verse!" Accordingly the libretto of "The Mountain Spirit" was written in prose, a proceeding which was not universally approved, nor indeed is it wholly satisfactory, as the want of measure in the lines breaks up that smooth rhythmical flow which is an almost vital characteristic of Spohr's music. The production of this opera was very brilliant and apparently successful, but the general opinion afterwards, in which the composer concurred, was that it was by no means equal to "Jessonda." It has now fallen quite out of the repertory of German opera-houses.

The overture is not very striking. It begins with a Maestoso introduction, a sort of Spohrish march, followed by an Allegro, the theme of which is merely a series of chromatic scales. The opera itself opens, like that very similar work of Marschner's, "Hans Heiling," under ground among the earth gnomes, who are seen digging for treasure, this being popularly supposed to be their perpetual employment; though what good they get by it no one knows. The principal gnome, who is called Troll (as if this were a proper name), deprecates their lot, and remarks that "Ein Geisterleben bleibt immer nur ein geistig Leben," a feeble and untranslatable pun which might be paralleled in English if he said that "even the highest of spirits were subject to low spirits." He sings a short solo in praise of mortal life. The gnomes enquire wherein the superior merits of that life consist, to which he replies that mortals have one supreme gift, which is denied to spirits—the gift of love. This idea has been a good deal used by poets and dramatists of all periods, Mr. Gilbert's "Wicked World" being a prominent example. "Ha! what magic word rouses me from gloomy dreams?" says the Berggeist, starting up. A recitative dialogue on the subject between him and Troll ends in their determining to ascend to earth and try the experiment of kidnapping a mortal woman.

The scene then changes, presumably to the exterior of a castle amid the mountains. There is a wedding on hand, and the servants have a pretty chorus in waltz rhythm—

Ludmilla, the bride's attendant, warns her fellow servants not to go near a certain spot, where, according to tradition, the mountain gnomes are said to have power, but the others only laugh at her superstitious fears. The bride, Alma, comes out and tells us that she is expecting her lover, Oscar, who, sure enough, presently appears, and the orthodox love duet takes place, the chorus judiciously retiring meanwhile to "talk about the weather," like the young ladies in "The Pirates of Penzance." Alma's father, who rejoices in the peculiar name of Demoslav, then enters, and instead of rebuking the young people for their breach of propriety, joins them in a Trio, for the most part unaccompanied. This is a kind of thing in which Spohr is always successful, owing to his custom of harmonising every note of his melodies, and consequently making always good part-writing. It being necessary for the plot that Alma should be left alone, she now begs that the rest will proceed to the church, whither she will follow after she has taken a last farewell of the spot where she has spent such a happy childhood! Her father and lover appear to think this quite natural and proper, and comply with her request. She accordingly begins her necessary scena. The Larghetto of this is not particularly good, the melody being too much broken up, the Allegro, in E flat minor and major, is better, and works up with some power as the chorus of approaching gnomes joins in with increasing force from below. Presently the Berggeist himself appears. He is dragging off the terrified young lady when Oscar, alarmed at the non-appearance of his bride, returns and flies to her rescue. In vain! The Berggeist fixes him where he stands, frightens all the people with a storm (which is seemingly only dragged in to increase the confusion and terror of the scene), and disappears with his prize. The music here is the same as the Allegro of the overture.

Act II. takes place in the bowels of the earth again. The captured bride is disconsolate, and refuses to be comforted. To gratify her the Berggeist sends up to earth for some flowers, which he gives her, telling her that if she throws one into the mist, which hides the back of the scene, she may summon the ghost of any of her former friends. She is pleased at this, but on consideration deems it desecration to play such tricks with either her father or lover, so summons first Ludmilla, and then all her female chorus of attendants, who are commanded to frolic and raise their mistress's spirits. In order to supply the light comedy, which is necessary by way of contrast, Troll flirts with the ghost of Ludmilla, who, however, behaves very oddly, declaring that she is only a flower and has no heart; she cannot love, only dance. Their duet begins thus, in three-bar rhythm—

The enamoured Troll determines to make an expedition to earth on his own account and capture the real Ludmilla.

Scene 2. Oscar is roaming about in the mountains, seeking a road to Alma. He has a rather poor Aria. Demoslav comes to tell him that Ludmilla has now also been carried off, and implores him to leave this dangerous place. Duet. This scene is dramatically and musically weak and unnecessary.

Scene 3. Again down below. The Berggeist summons all the spirits of the four elements to do him homage and dance at his wedding, and good use is made of the sopranos, altos, tenors, and basses as four separate choirs. The ballet music is graceful, but does not call for especial notice. It comes to an unexpected end; the flower-ghosts raised by Alma fade and die, causing her great alarm, and breaking up the party in confusion. This is the scarcely satisfactory end of the second Act.

The third Act opens with a grand scena for Alma. Troll brings the real Ludmilla to her, and the waiting-maid, with the shrewdness of her kind, plots a way of escape for herself and mistress. The Berggeist is kept out of harm's way by being requested to raise a crop of real earthly flowers, to which he devotes his energies. Ludmilla then promises Troll to be his if he will conduct herself and her mistress above ground. The weak-minded gnome consents. They set the Berggeist to the hopeless task of counting the flowers he has just raised and take flight. The scene then changes to the exterior of the castle, as in Act I., and just as the fugitives deem themselves in safety, they are pursued and overtaken by the Berggeist. A long parley ensues, and finally the spirit recognises the fact—which he knew all along and told us at the beginning—that love is not for the likes of him. He unites the lovers, blesses them, and returns to his native soil with Troll, bringing the Opera, which has many strong scenes, to a rather feeble conclusion. Treated in a less commonplace fashion this story might have been made really interesting, but in those days, even if any one ever looked for poetry in an opera libretto, they never found it.

THE GREAT COMPOSERS

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

No. XV.—GLUCK (continued from page 392).

ON leaving London, towards the close of the year 1746, Gluck went to Germany and entered upon a period of his career which has for us comparatively little interest. We shall pass over it lightly.

The master appears first to have settled at Dresden in some capacity connected with the Electoral Chapel, but he remained there only a little while. His father, the old soldier-forester on the borders of Bohemia, died at this period, leaving Gluck a small patrimony, by the aid of which he was enabled to establish himself in Vienna, after an absence of eleven years. There he soon found work to do. He composed an opera, "Semiramide riconosciuta," to the words of Metastasio, for the fête of Maria Teresa, obtained a marked success, and found himself at once a favourite in the "great world." According to the best authorities Gluck was at this time a presentable man, and not as afterwards described by Dr. Burney. He had expressive features, while his manner was full of vivacity and frank gaiety. It naturally followed that he became entangled in an affair of the heart, but his love ran at first in a troubled current, owing to the obduracy of a father, who, though he liked Gluck very much as an artist, rejected him as a son-in-law. Herr Josef Pergin, having made money by trade, entertained the usual contempt for people who possessed none and were followers of art to boot. His wife, on the other hand, favoured Gluck's claim to the hand of their elder daughter, Marianne. She possessed a woman's sympathy with true affection, but unfortunately the power of deciding its fate was in the hands of her unsentimental husband, and he said "No" in a tone so positive that Gluck fled despairing from the Imperial city, scarcely permitting himself to halt till he reached Copenhagen. The little Danish capital was at this time en fêta, consequent upon the birth of a Crown Prince, and the royal family were glad to welcome a distinguished musician into their midst. Gluck even had apartments in the Palace. On March 12 (1749) he gave an evening Concert of Italian music; on April 9 took place a gala performance of his two-act piece "Tetide," and ten days later he finished up with a "benefit," at which the master performed a solo upon musical glasses. There can be no doubt concerning this fact, since extant copies of the Pest-Rytter contain the following advertisement: "Saturday, April 19, the Chapellmaster Gluck will give a Concert at the Italian Theatre, Charlottenbourg, composed of vocal and instrumental music—a Concert brilliant and most remarkable (worthy of plaudits) in which he will introduce, to the great satisfaction of his audience, an instrument of glass hitherto unknown." Gluck, we have reason to believe, did not make his first appearance on this occasion in connection with the musical glasses. An advertisement in a London paper shows that he performed upon them in the British metropolis, also having, it is surmised, taken lessons in the art from an Irishman named Puckeridge, who was an acknowledged master.

From Copenhagen the composer proceeded to Rome, produced there his Opera "Telemaco," and would probably have made a long stay had not news of Josef Pergin's death come from Vienna. Gluck at once started for the Kaiserstadt, received a glad welcome from the widow, and, on September 15, 1750, was united to his Marianne. The marriage proved a happy one. Throughout a period of thirty-seven years Madame Gluck was her husband's good friend and companion; accompanying him wherever he went, and enveloping him in an atmosphere of domestic peace. In the beginning of 1751 we find Gluck at Naples, writing and producing an Opera, "La Clemenza di Tito," poem by Metastasio. Here the master had his first conflict with the insufferable pride of pampered vocal artists. Gluck also had pride, of a different kind and with more reason; wherefore he absolutely refused to go cap in hand to any singer whatsoever, even to Cafarelli, then at the height of his power, and living in a palace over the gates of which he had inscribed, "Amphion Thebas, ego domum." Cafarelli expected always to be waited upon by the composer whose music he condescended to sing. Imagine his surprise and disgust when Gluck firmly declined any such recognition of supremacy. The Italian showed no resentment, however, but, much to his credit, accepted the situation, and paid Gluck the first visit. As a natural consequence, each found reason to respect the other, and they soon became the best of friends. Presently, the opera was produced, with Cafarelli in the cast, and then Gluck found himself face to face with a bevy of Neapolitan composers, enraged by a certain passage in the work which, according to them, proved either Gluck's ignorance of or contempt for musical laws. The matter was eventually referred to the arbitration of Durante, before whom all bowed. Durante looked at the score and said: "I cannot decide whether this passage is, in every respect, according to the laws of composition, but I will venture to declare that all of us, beginning with myself, would be proud to have conceived and written it." Away went the Neapolitan composers rebuked and ashamed, leaving Gluck undisputed master of the field.

Gluck returned to Vienna towards the close of the same year and did not again leave the Imperial city till 1754, having, meanwhile, been appointed Kapellmeister der Oper by Count Durazzo, the Imperial-Royal Intendant, about whom, in due course, we shall have much to say. In the discharge of his duties Gluck worked hard at pieces for the Court, which were essentially pièces d'occasion, and need not now have even their names revived. The year last mentioned brought relief from a somewhat unworthy task. Going to Rome, the master there produced two Operas—"Il Trionfo di Camillo" and "Antigone." Once more he had to contend with Italian rivalry and intrigue, but Cardinal Albani standing as his firm friend all enemies were vanquished, while from the highest quarter came recognition in the form of a Papal decree nominating him Chevalier of the Golden Spur, an honour bestowed fifteen years later upon the boy Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart. From this date till 1762 nothing of special importance in the career of Gluck calls for detailed notice. The master spent part of his time in Vienna, composing music suited to the taste of the Court—mostly works of the opéra-comique class—and the other part in Italy, producing lyric dramas essentially Italian in character, and differing only in greater fulness of orchestration from the ordinary type.

Coming down to 1762, we find Gluck travelling to Bologna for the purpose of opening a new theatre. As it chanced, everything concerning that event is known, the master having as companion a Boswell in the person of Karl von Dittersdorff, violinist and composer, whose graceful and clever works for the chamber are amongst the things by which Fortune has dealt unjustly. Dittersdorff informs us* how his companionship with Gluck came about:—

"One day Gluck told me that he had been called to Bologna to compose an opera. He asked me, at the same time, if I wished to go to Italy with him, on condition, however, of bearing half the expenses. As for leave of absence, he would obtain that from Count Durazzo. 'Oh! with infinite pleasure,' I answered, full of enthusiasm, adding sadly, 'I have not got the money.' 'In that case,' coldly replied Gluck, turning his back upon me, 'nothing can be done.'"

Dittersdorff finally obtained a loan from some friends, and the two men started in high spirits, having as travelling companions a particularly vivacious young singer, Signora Marina and her worthy mamma, who were bound for Venice, their native city. Concerning the adventures of the quartet on the road, Dittersdorff is very precise, and not a little amusing. Here, however, we must pass them by. Gluck stayed some days in Venice, and heard an orchestra of females, who, according to Boswell-Dittersdorff, played very badly. Going on to Bologna, Dittersdorff was represented as Gluck's pupil, not as a violin virtuoso, it seeming wise to keep his real profession secret till he knew what the Bolognese players could do, since among them were Luchini and Spagnoletti. "Both of them play very well," remarked Dittersdorff, after making their acquaintance, adding slyly, "only each has his method." Gluck made the acquaintance of some famous people in Bologna—of Farinelli, for example, who was then living in great magnificence hard by, and of Padre Martini, the illustrious contrapuntist—but he had little leisure for paying and receiving visits, owing to the demands of the new Opera, "Il Trionfo di Clelia," under his hands. The case was otherwise with Dittersdorff, who, having taken the measure of Luchini and Spagnoletti, had bloomed into a virtuoso and received much honour. In his gossiping book he gives so minute and curious a picture of the then position and character of music as connected with the church in Italy that we cannot pass it by:—

"Between the Psalms [at the church of St. Paul] Spagnoletti played a concerto by Tartini which I had studied some years before. The church was full of connoisseurs and amateurs, and it was easy to see that the artist had won general approbation. Gluck said to me, 'Nevertheless, you can reckon with certainty upon the applause of your auditors; your composition and your playing are infinitely more modern.' Already it had been spread abroad that on the morrow a German virtuoso would perform on the violin. When we came out of the church we heard one man say to another, 'After the marvellous Spagnoletti, I am much afraid that he will be hissed.' However, on the morrow I played a concerto of my own composition, and no one laughed at me, as the gentleman had feared. Gluck, Bevilagua, and Mansoli congratulated me upon the universal applause I had obtained. Gluck said that he had designedly placed himself near the two critics of the previous day to overhear their opinion, and that one of them cried, 'By heaven, the young man plays like an angel!' the other adding, 'How can a German turtle possibly arrive at such perfection!' Upon this Gluck made bold to say, 'With your permission, sir, I also am a German turtle, but none the less have I the honour to write the new opera for the reconstructed theatre.' One of the gentlemen then retracted, declaring that he had entirely changed his opinion with regard to the German nation. After Gluck had told me this, the prior of the convent appeared with two of his monks and thanked me for what I had done, adding that, having heard from his stall the applause I had received, he ventured to ask for another concerto at vespers. I refused point-blank. But my good prior was not to be put off. Moreover, Count Bevilagua assured me that the request was a distinction that had never fallen to a virtuoso since he had been in Bologna, and that my refusal would cause much talk in the town. On this I yielded. In the evening the church was crowded, many persons having to go away. I played, but if I did well in the morning I excelled myself on that occasion. After vespers Gluck, myself, Mazzoni, and the two castrati, Potenza and Nicolini, who had sung that day, took supper in the convent. It was truly a supper worthy of Sardanapalus, for all that Italy could produce in the way of delicacies was on the table. We kept the game alive till midnight, and reached our lodgings very musical indeed."

What followed was a good joke in the way of hypocrisy. Dittersdorff must be allowed to tell it:—

"On the morrow, my host announced to me that a deputation from St. Paul's desired to be presented. I was about to receive, he said, a present for which I ought to give the bearer a scudo by way of pour boire. The deputation having entered, its leader made a speech that lasted over a quarter of an hour, and contained nothing but thanks on the part of the prior and the whole convent, and hopes that, considering their extreme poverty (of which I had no doubt after the supper), I would be satisfied with a small present composed of more than twenty pounds of the most magnificent confections, twelve pairs of Neapolitan stockings, six of white silk, six of black, six Milan foulards in doubled silk, and a dozen more or less large relics set in silver filagree. I assured the prior and all the convent of my satisfaction, and gave a scudo to my Demosthenes, upon which the deputation retired with a shower of compliments and obeisances."

From this entertaining illustration of Italian life a hundred and twenty years ago, let us now turn again to Gluck. After seventeen rehearsals "Il Trionfo di Clelia" was brought out in an unsatisfactory manner, but with fair success, and the master had in contemplation an extended Italian tour, when Count Durazzo peremptorily summoned him home for the coronation of the Emperor Joseph, at Frankfurt. Upon this Gluck and Dittersdorff hastened back to find, with much annoyance, that the imperial solemnity had been postponed for a year.

We now enter upon the most important part of Gluck's extended and invaluable life-work. The question is no longer of ballet-music, divertissements, and opéras-comiques.

All through what may be called his Italian period—at any rate, ever since his experience in London—Gluck had been preparing himself to put in practice the reforms his thoughtful mind had conceived. In the first place, he made a study of languages, and especially of their idioms, thus mastering Latin and French; devoting to the living tongue, as by prevision of the future, an extra amount of care. But when, in this and other ways, he had sufficiently armed himself for the task, the question was to discover a poet able and willing to work with him on the lines laid down. With the hour generally comes the man. What we call an accident placed Gluck in contact with the imperial councillor, Raniero di Calzabigi, who had brought out an elegant critical edition of Metastasio, in which the true idea of a dramatic poem was set forth. The first fruits of the artistic union between Gluck and Calzabigi was "Orfeo ed Euridice." Calzabigi appears to have had some doubts respecting the fate of an opera distinguished, both as to words and music, by a classic severity of style, and destitute of any ornament save the beauty springing from a just alliance of the arts. Moreover, he feared the adverse influence of Metastasio, who had theretofore given the law in all matters of the kind. So much importance did Gluck's librettist attach to Metastasio's goodwill that he placed the poem of "Orfeo" before him. The famous poet read it politely, but made no better than evasive comments, and it was with anxious hearts that the two authors introduced their work to the Viennese public on October 5, 1762. Gluck knew how much depended upon an initial success, to secure which he laboured without regard to anybody's convenience. He called rehearsal after rehearsal, wearied the performers beyond endurance, and played the despot with such explosions of wrath that more than once the artists were on the point of open revolt. Rebellion would, indeed, have broken out but for the genial Emperor, who was wont to say to the disgusted performers, "My children, you know what he is. At heart he is a good fellow." The first rendering of the work thus stormily prepared made a deep impression. Amateurs did not wholly understand the new thing that had come amongst them, but they felt the influence of a masterpiece true alike to nature and to art. It followed that as "Orfeo ed Euridice" became better known the public liked it more, and the fifth representation was received with unanimous applause. Gluck had conquered, and the cause of operatic reform scored an opening victory.

Proud of his composer's success, Count Durazzo desired to spread Gluck's fame over the frontiers of the Empire, and to that end enlisted the aid of the dramatist Favart, who, being under many obligations to Durazzo, undertook the negotiation of a French edition. Upon this a copy of the score was sent to Paris, and Favart laid it before Mondonville, who, seeing its clerical errors, declared that the cost of publication could not be less than eight hundred livres. Another French musician, Duni, declined to make the necessary corrections under five hundred livres; but, happily, Philidor was so struck by "Orfeo" that he offered to see it through the press as a labour of love, and, indeed, supervised the engraving throughout. In order that blame should not unjustly fall upon the Viennese copyist, we will here quote from an article, written by Berlioz, à propos to the revival of "Alceste" at the Grand Opéra.

"Gluck's scores were all written with incredible carelessness. When they came to be engraved the engraver added his errors to those of the manuscript, and it does not appear that the author ever troubled himself to correct proofs. Sometimes the first violin part was written on the lines proper to the second violins; sometimes the violas, moving with the basses, found themselves, in consequence of a col basso negligently thrown in at two octaves' distance, and playing above the melody; here the author forgot to indicate the key of his horns; there he omitted to show what wind instrument should execute a prominent phrase. Should it be a flute, an oboe, or a clarinet? Who could tell? Sometimes he would write on the double-bass line some important notes for the bassoons, and trouble himself no more about them, so that no one could discover what afterwards became of them. . . . In one of his letters Gluck says: 'My presence is as indispensable at the rehearsals of my works as is the sun to the creation.' I believe it, but the fact would have been less apparent had he taken the trouble to write with more care, and not left the performers to divine so many intentions and correct so many errors."

Gluck having declared his intention to visit Paris and look after the French edition himself, Favart gave him a most courteous offer of hospitality, as the subjoined extract from a letter shows:—

"I have not the honour to know you personally, but I have always desired that advantage. May I flatter myself that you will respond to my desires? Yes, I dare to hope, by the respect that I have always had for your talent. For that reason I assure myself that you will accept no other hospitality than mine. I can offer you in my house furnished apartments; you will find there a good clavecin, other instruments, a small garden, and perfect liberty—that is to say, you will be as though at home, and need not see anybody unless you choose. Although in the most noisy part of Paris, our house, between court and garden, is a kind of solitude where one can work as undisturbed as in the country."

Gluck put off his visit, and meanwhile the French edition of "Orfeo" was ready, having been engraved and printed at a cost of 2,000 livres. But the publication did not take place till after the composer's arrival in the French capital, where, however, he made but a short stay, Court duties requiring his presence at Vienna. The particular duty in question was to compose music to Metastasio's "Il Pariaoso confuso," performed in honour of the Archduke Joseph's marriage, January 25, 1765. Never, perhaps, had musician more illustrious interpreters than on this occasion, Apollo being played by the Archduchess Marianne, and the Graces by the Archduchesses Marie-Elizabeth, Marie-Josèphe, and Marie-Caroline, while the Archduke Leopold accompanied on the clavecin. So successful was this illustrious performance that Gluck received orders to prepare another work for the Emperor's fête. But man proposes and God disposes. The Emperor died, and "La Carona" was never produced.

In 1766, four years after the startling apparition of "Orfeo ed Euridice," Gluck and Calzabigi brought out "Alceste," of course on the same lines as the previous work, if not, as some contend, in accordance with a model even more severe. For the sake of rehearsal, the theatre was closed during an entire week; but this precaution did not save "Alceste" from harsh criticism. One said, "It is edifying certainly to be deprived of the theatre for nine days in order, on the tenth, to assist at a funeral mass!" Another pointed out that he expected to shed tears of sympathy, not of weariness; another demanded his money back; and yet another asked what pleasure could be got out of an idiot who died for her husband? But nothing worse than such mere verbal skirmishing took place. The public were soon conquered by the simple beauty and pathos of the music, which granted nothing for the sake of mere display, but remained throughout true to the situation and the text. The first edition of "Alceste," published in 1769, contained the famous dedication to the Grand Duke of Tuscany, which remains for all time an exposition of its writer's artistic principles—a genuine confession of faith. We must reserve that important document, and the considerations it suggests, for another chapter.

THE COSTA BEQUEST.

THOSE who stood round the open grave of Sir Michael Costa barely three months ago, and heard the solemn and suggestive words, "We brought nothing into this world, and it is certain we can carry nothing out," may have called to mind another sentence, associated with Handel's beautiful music, and surely applicable to the great musician—"His body is buried in peace, but his name liveth evermore." The name of Costa would, in any case, be a familiar watchword for generations to come, wherever our art is cultivated and its history studied; but there are ways by which men anxious for lasting fame can retain it when the memory of what they achieve during life has faded and become indistinct. If they cannot carry out of the world the accumulated earnings of their honest industry, they can dispose of them in such a manner as to yield substantial benefit to others, and thus for all time cause their names to be uttered with respect and veneration. It may be said that a thrill of gratification passed through the hearts of musicians when the contents of Sir Michael Costa's will were made public. While he was yet alive unpleasant rumours filled the air with respect to monetary matters, owing chiefly to the action of a few well-intentioned but fussy and ill-judging persons. Into this matter it is, fortunately, needless to enter further. The death of the eminent Conductor removed a painful sense of embarrassment, and the publication of his will was a practical contradiction of reports concerning his means which should never have been uttered. Since Handel's legacy to the Royal Society of Musicians, no bequest has been made in the interests of music in this country of equal significance with that of Sir Michael Costa. At the death of his nearest surviving relative, who very properly is to enjoy his brother's fortune during life, the whole of his property is to be realised and devoted to the formation of scholarships in the Royal Academy of Music. It has been termed "a loyal bequest," and so it is. The great musician has chosen the most practical and most graceful method of evincing his gratitude to the country in which he lived, and in which his labours met with such unstinted recognition and reward. Some surprise has been expressed that the Tenterden Street Institution alone should have been selected to receive the benefit of this laudable intent. Costa was highly in favour at Court, and it has been suggested that the Royal College of Music should have shared in his liberality. If, however, the friends of the College and the public generally glance at the facts they will see that by the course adopted no want of confidence in the South Kensington undertaking is expressed, much less any slight on the Royal family. The will is dated April 13, 1877, at which time the Royal College was not in existence, nor had any steps been taken before the public for its formation. The National Training School was a temporary affair, and no sane individual cares to bequeath money to an institution which at the time of his death may already be numbered among the things that have been. When the Royal College was at length in-augured Costa was stretched on a bed of sickness, from which he never rose, and he cannot be blamed at such a time for not disturbing an arrangement calculated after all to yield a full meed of beneficent result. There can be no pretence for asserting that the Royal Academy is unable to render justice to the trust committed into its hands, and it only remains to speak briefly as to the nature of the trust, and the benefit likely to accrue therefrom.

The most important part of the bequest is that which relates to the formation of the Sir Michael Costa Scholarship of £120 per annum. It is to be bestowed upon "such young English-born male student of the said Academy as shall manifest the greatest ability for composition, especially as respects the faculty of inventing melody, for the purpose of pursuing his studies upon the continent of Europe, and particularly in Germany, such scholarship to be tenable for five years. . . . And such scholarship is to be held on condition that the scholar is not, during his tenure of the scholarship, to publish any composition, and if this condition be broken the scholarship is to be forfeited." We have italicised certain portions of the testator's words as they appear of special importance. That "the faculty of inventing melody" is to be a qualification for the scholarship is easy to appreciate if we remember that Costa was an Italian by birth; and no thoughtful musician is likely to quarrel with the condition in these days when, among a certain class, melody is contemned as a sign of weakness. Further, in mentioning Germany as the country to be preferred for the student's foreign study, we have proof that Sir Michael Costa recognised the drift of musical thought, and, to a reasonable extent, was prepared to follow its course. Most valuable is the clause forbidding the publication of compositions during the period of study. The world of music is oppressed by the number of crude and immature efforts now being put forward, and any attempt to stem the tide should be welcomed. To the student himself the advantage of being compelled to postpone public utterance until his period of probation has ended will be inestimable. The will next provides for two more scholarships of the annual value of £40 each, to be tenable for five years, the holders being prohibited from accepting any engagements to perform in public. Here again the testator has shown wisdom and forethought. The residue of the estate is to be allowed to accumulate for the formation of similar £40 scholarships, to be held on like conditions. Trustees are appointed to carry out the provisions of the will, and in the event of the dissolution of the Royal Academy they are to apply the funds "in providing such scholarships of the like nature in all respects to those before mentioned in such of the then existing musical educational institutions in England as they may judge the best." We fail to note what is to be done in the emergency of the holders of the scholarships failing to give satisfaction during their tenure, but, in the absence of any special provision on this point, the trustees and the authorities of the Academy will doubtless agree as to the proper course to be pursued. On the whole, the matter is one on which English musicians generally may congratulate themselves, and though a keen sense of regret must be felt at the loss of one who dedicated his commanding ability to the interests of art in this country, there is satisfaction in the thought that he will be added to the roll of those worthies who, being dead, yet speak.

MILITARY BANDS.

THE large use made of military bands at the Health Exhibition has naturally drawn more than common regard to those organisations with which, till lately, English people were too little acquainted. For years past an occasional grumble has been heard to proceed out of the mouth of the travelled Briton who compares the use made of military bands on the Continent with that which even now obtains amongst ourselves. In France, or Germany, or Austria, the soldier-musicians have an important place in the social system. They are a source of pleasure to the entire community, whose claim upon their services is ungrudgingly recognised. The band plays, as a matter of course, in the public places of the city where it may be stationed, and practically exists more for general delectation than for any other purpose. In England almost the reverse is the case. Our regimental bands, when not engaged on military duty, are rarely heard by the public save on payment, and a proposal to use them in the parks, or, say, in the gardens of the Thames Embankment, would be treated by the authorities as absurd. Something can undoubtedly be said in explanation of this fact. The Continental military band is, as a rule, supported by the State; whereas the English band is to a large extent kept up by the private subscriptions of officers. In the latter case the Government allows a certain number of men, to whom it gives the usual soldier's pay; all expenses beyond this narrow margin coming out of pockets which, in very many instances, can ill afford the outlay. That the State finds this system economical we do not in the least doubt, but it is hard on the officers, and on the public who are deprived of much musical enjoyment, and cannot properly protest against any manner in which those who support the band choose to exercise the right of doing as they please with their own. We are not sanguine enough to expect any immediate change in the present system, but the prominence of military music at South Kensington may direct public attention to the subject and lead, eventually, to reform.

The ordinary regimental band in England—except here the picked musicians of the household troops—is fairly good, considering its numbers and composition, the influence of the training carried on at Kneller Hall having, of late years, become conspicuous. Nothing special, however, is attempted outside the "crack" regiments, and even with them, excellent as their music undoubtedly is, we find nothing to equal the splendid organisations of the Continent. Once upon a time the band of the Royal Artillery approached these both in dimensions and character, but, if we are rightly informed, it has been, from motives of economy, either broken up or much reduced. The Guards bands are now our foremost representatives, and against the merit of their playing it would be unjust to say a word. Still, as recent experience shows, we are behind the leading nations of the Continent, which can bring into competition with us an overwhelming number and variety of instruments. The Health Exhibition, by importing bands from abroad, has made contrast easy in this respect, and though we may be proud of our own as far as they go, we must admit that the foreigners go a great deal farther.

Since the Exhibition opened three Continental bands have been heard at South Kensington—those of the Belgian Guides, the Magdeburg Cuirassiers, and the Versailles Engineers. Each of these bears a fairly representative character and may be taken as an example of what its country can do in the way of military music. As to the German band, however, an important limitation should be pointed out. This has proved the least successful of the three; at times the dissatisfaction of its auditors being audibly expressed. The critics, it would seem, quite forgot that they were hearing the band of a cavalry regiment, with its inevitable monotony of colour—nothing but shades of scarlet, so to speak—and its strident, brassy effects. A "trumpet band" must be allowed the imperfections which belong to its very nature. To upbraid it for these is about as reasonable as would be censure of a fish because it cannot, like an ox, grow fat in a meadow. That the Germans were excellent in their way no one can justly deny. They played with admirable precision, as was to be expected from representatives of an army which regards precision, whether in strategy, tactics, or drill, as a sine quâ non. Their entrain was at times quite exciting. It had the dash of the cuirassiers' death-ride at Thionville; and there was in it not only a world of energy, but a suggestion of "reserve force," as though the strong-lunged players could do yet more if they tried. We need scarcely say that comparison between the "trumpet band" and those from Belgium and France would be absurd. Just as reasonably might we look to see carried out Prince Bismarck's idea of a fight between a whale and an elephant. The Belgian Guides sent over a large body of excellent players upon "brass and wood," but their warmest admirers will, we fancy, adjudge the palm for all round merit to the eighty-three French performers, who may now be heard daily at South Kensington. The distinguishing characteristic of this band is variety of timbre, to obtain which it has even gone altogether outside the province of wind instruments and annexed three double-basses, whose deep mellow tones have a charming effect in passages of soft accompaniment. "Wind" cannot possibly give the equivalent of this kind of "sixteen feet" tone. The contra-fagotto is too characteristic for more than occasional use, and the deep brass instruments are too harsh, to say nothing of their uncertain intonation in the depths of the scale. Apart from the double-basses, everything that ingenuity has devised for the production of orchestral variety seems to be represented amongst the Versailles Engineers; and even practised ears are sometimes puzzled to determine by what means certain effects are produced. With such ample resources at command, it may be supposed that much of the charm of a complete orchestra is produced. The music comes forth clothed in ever-changing hues, and when one imagines that all possible combinations are exhausted, a fresh development adds surprise to pleasure. The band contains many excellent solo performers, the first Concert being conspicuous for purity of tone and expressive power; the attack is brilliant and capacity for climax immense. In short, these French players show what great results are attainable where the State liberally encourages and supports military music. It is not too much to say that the band of the Versailles Engineers is a powerful refining and educating agent, or that we in England shall be fortunate when, if ever, our own regiments, or some of them, are equally well provided.

THE honours paid to living composers, instances of which are now recorded in almost every number of our journal, afford convincing proof of the growing appreciation of art and artists throughout the civilised world. But it would indeed be strange if this desire to pay a tribute to the genius of the representative creative musicians who are still amongst us were not to be extended to the memory of those who are passed away. Pilgrims to the graves of deceased composers have indeed been surprised at finding that many of those artists who have raised music to its present high standard are buried with only the commonest inscription to mark the place, and we all know that Mozart's remains were interred in a pauper's grave, the exact site of which was forgotten when the monument by Hans Gasser was erected to the composer's memory on the anniversary of his death in 1859. By a telegram from Vienna, published in the Daily Telegraph, we are glad to find that the municipality of that city has at length resolved to show its respect to two, at least, of the greatest musical heroes of Germany. The communication, which is dated July 25, says: "The remains of Beethoven and Schubert are to be transferred from the burial-ground of Waehring, one of the suburbs of Vienna, to the Central Friedhof, a large new cemetery just outside the town, where ground has been specially reserved for the interment of great men. The old graveyard of Waehring has been closed for the last seven years, and as I saw it this morning it looked dirty and neglected beyond description. The tomb of Beethoven was erected four years ago; until then his remains had been left where they were deposited after his death, a common stone slab alone indicating the spot where they lay. This slab has been replaced by something better, and when the change was made his ashes were put into a metal coffin. The grave is now surrounded by a low iron railing, and at the foot stands a stone slab, pyramid-shaped, bearing for all inscription the name of Beethoven in large gilt letters. It is, however, still of modest appearance, and no stranger would think of looking there for the burial-place of Ludwig Van Beethoven. The tomb of Schubert is more pretentious, but, if possible, less imposing, and altogether unworthy of the great genius whose remains lie beneath. A bronze bust, reproducing the features of the immortal tone-poet, is placed at the upper extremity; but though we know Schubert was not of prepossessing appearance, yet the metallic work of art I saw this morning lacks that expression so admirably rendered in a portrait taken from life, which hangs, if I mistake not, in the reception hall of the Vienna Conservatoire. On the stone pediment behind the bust is the following inscription, 'Musical art has buried here a rich possession, but still brighter hopes.' Surely the memory of Franz Schubert might have inspired a nobler epitaph than that. When the transfer to the Central Friedhof shall have been effected, a monument will be provided for the tomb of Beethoven by the Society of the Conservatoire, and another for that of Schubert by the Vienna Maennergesangverein, or Men's Choral Union." All art-lovers must, we are certain, be deeply interested in this news, and will heartily agree with the suggestion of the writer of the telegram, that the ceremony which will accompany these proceedings should include a great musical Festival.

READERS OF THE MUSICAL TIMES have frequent opportunities of becoming acquainted with the principal musical events occurring even at the antipodes, and must be gratified to find what rapid strides the art is making in our distant colonies. Of the progress of sacred music, however, as shown in the Cathedral services in the capitals of South Australia, New Zealand, Tasmania, New South Wales, and Victoria we were but imperfectly acquainted until perusing, in our contemporary The Globe, an article from a visitor to Australia, who evidently takes the deepest interest in the subject. He informs us that in Adelaide the Cathedral organ is an exceptionally fine one, and that the organist and choirmaster, Mr. Boulton, a talented amateur, has during the last few years raised the musical portion of the service to a state of great perfection, "fairly placing it in the front rank with some of our most noted Cathedrals at home." There is of course much difficulty in securing the services of professional vocalists of great merit; but Mr. Boulton has managed to infuse into each member of the choir some of his own enthusiasm, and the result is in the highest degree satisfactory. Every detail of light and shade is observed in the chanting and intoning, and the anthems and services are magnificently sung, the rendering of Mendelssohn's "Christus" and Haydn's "Passion" being especially praised. A boy gifted with a sweet treble voice is particularly spoken of, and persons flock from all parts to hear him. At Christchurch, New Zealand, the music at the Cathedral, an unfinished building, is also extremely good, the effect of the quiet and finished singing of the choir being thoroughly in sympathy with the sacred text. Hobart, the capital of Tasmania, Sydney, and Melbourne are dismissed by the writer somewhat summarily, although he seems of opinion that at Hobart Cathedral, with a little of the care exercised at Adelaide, the choir might be educated to a fair point of efficiency. At Sydney there is a mixed choir of male and female voices; and at Melbourne, where there is at present only a pro-cathedral, as some persons in authority object to sacred music save of the feeblest kind the service is slovenly and uninteresting. We sincerely hope that the observations of so keen a critic as the writer of this paper will have the effect of calling the attention of Australian music-lovers to the important matter treated of.

"I WISH I could become a good player without the trouble of practising," said an enthusiastic, but somewhat idle, little pianist to her teacher, "for it would not only be a comfort to myself, but to everybody in the house." She might have gone further, and said that it would be a great comfort to others in the houses surrounding her; for pianoforte practice in what are termed "quiet neighbourhoods" has often been known to drive the residents even into more noisy streets, where, as Charles Lamb says, in his "Chapter on Ears," they can listen to sounds which they are not compelled to follow, and "get rid of the distracting torment of endless, fruitless, barren attention." All persons who are interested in the progress of a pupil will of course generously bear with any little annoyance caused by the excessive monotony of listening, in spite of themselves, to wearisome technical Exercises and dislocated pianoforte compositions; but that people will not cheerfully grant this same indulgence to strangers is proved by the news which has recently reached us from a very musical country. It appears that at Berlin petitions, very numerous signed, have been circulated throughout the city, praying that Government will restrict the time of pianoforte playing and practising to the hours between 11 a.m. and 12 noon, and between 8 and 11 p.m. Now, although such an ordinance, if it take effect, may not crush the hopes of unambitious amateurs, we can scarcely imagine that earnest students who desire to make a name before the public in the future will be content to confine their practice to the hours named. Presuming that it should have the effect of driving a number of pianists from Berlin to congregate together in some adjacent town, we wish the inhabitants joy, for assuredly there can be but small hope of any hours of peace and quiet. If, then, only for the sake of an equal distribution of what should be looked upon as an essential infliction, let us still hope that Berlin may relent.

In our June number we alluded to the subject of analytical programmes, and especially with reference to the desirability of issuing them at a price which would induce each member of the audience to purchase one. We can scarcely believe that the interesting little volumes which have just reached us from America can be published with any such intention, but certainly they fully merit the warmest praise. Analytical programmes they certainly are, but the information contained in them can hardly be expected to be mastered during the progress of a Concert. The "Wagner Handbook" for the Festival Concerts given during the present year, under the direction of Theodore Thomas, in addition to an analysis of the music, includes English texts of the works performed, biographical and critical essays, and magnificent illustrations of scenes from the Operas. The volume is printed on the finest paper, and in every respect got up with the most scrupulous care and attention. The book containing the programmes of the second Biennial Musical Festival at Chicago, in May last, although not illustrated, is constructed on the same principle as the last mentioned work, and has short biographical notices of the artists who appeared at the Festival. The idea of issuing a work like the "Wagner Handbook" is, we believe, entirely new; but it is one which might be acted upon with advantage, at least occasionally, in this country. As a record, for example, of so important a gathering as the Birmingham Musical Festival it would be extremely interesting, and certainly might occupy a place in the library of many musical amateurs. The ordinary analytical programmes should of course also be published, but there are several who would gladly avail themselves of such a book as we have described. At all events, should the notion be entertained, it would be impossible to follow a better model than the "Wagner Handbook."

MUSICAL toys have doubtless especial charms for children, although it cannot be asserted that they give an equal amount of gratification to those who have the charge of them. To say nothing of nursery trumpets, drums, and whistles, everything that can be made to emit a musical sound is increased thereby in value. Young people are taught to envy the time-honoured old lady who rode "on a white horse," not so much because of her equestrian powers, as for the fact of her having "music wherever she goes"; and even those trifling rhymes, which would convey but little pleasure to children if put into plain prose, are repeated by them with delight for many years. When we grow up music accompanies us in our daily life; but we are presumed to get rid of our toys, and substitute instruments which can speak to us in that eloquent language which we have heard but the crudest attempts to articulate in our childhood. If a man were to be seen drawing along a musical cart or blowing into a penny trumpet to solace his leisure hours, there would probably be very shortly an enquiry into the state of his mind, and his relatives would be warned to "take care of him." That this truth is not universally admitted, however, may be proved by the fact of a patent having been recently taken out in Germany for a "musical cigar." We are not told whether this novel instrument is constructed to play a plaintive air, in order to increase the sedative effect upon the smoker; or whether one note only will be produced, so that, like the "Russian Horn Band," which we recollect many years ago in this country, a party must be assembled before any composition can be attempted. However this may be, as the cigar is for men and not for boys, we scarcely think that it can be extensively patronised; nor can we imagine that a number of sane people would meet together for the purpose of taking part in such an utterly ridiculous "smoking concert."

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

A REVIVAL of "Semiramide," with Madame Patti as Semiramide and Madame Scalchi as Arsace, attracted an enormous audience, and thoroughly proved that Italian music so excellently sung will still exercise a powerful charm over a sufficient number of persons to prevent Rossini's work from dying out, feeble as it is in a purely dramatic point of view. Another noteworthy performance has been Mozart's "Don Giovanni," Madame Patti's Zerlina being, of course, the central point of interest; although the Donna Anna of Madame Fursch-Madi and the Donna Elvira of Madame Laterner were fairly satisfactory to those who cannot remember the great singers of former days in these characters. The principal event of the season has, however, been the production, on the 15th ult., of M. Reyer's "Sigurd." The composer of this work, who succeeded Hector Berlioz as musical critic of the Journal des Débats, has already had much experience of the lyric stage; but only one of his operas, "La Statue," is at all known. We are told that "Sigurd" was composed before the production of Wagner's "Der Ring des Niebelungen," and this may account for the same subject having been chosen by the two composers. Sigurd is, of course, Siegfried; but the authors of the libretto, MM. du Locke and Blau, have been less ambitious than Wagner by using only that portion of the legend which forms the final division of the tetralogy, and the manner in which this has been done will be seen by the following brief sketch of the plot: Hilda, sister of Gunther, King of the Burgundians, is in love with Sigurd and reveals her secret to Uta, her fostermother. The King enters the great hall of his castle, at Worms, to receive the ambassadors sent by the King of the Huns to solicit the hand of Hilda, when a Bard sings the legend of Brunhilda, a beautiful Valkyrie, banished from Heaven for disobedience, and condemned to lie sleeping in a palace at Iceland surrounded by barriers of fire until awakened by a warrior capable of encountering the demons and fairies that guard her. Gunther resolves to undertake this task, but Sigurd declares that he will take possession of Gunther's throne and kingdom rather than allow him to liberate Brunhilda. Gunther offers to share with him the kingdom of Burgundy, and they swear eternal brotherhood. Sigurd drinks a love philtre, prepared by Uta, and at once becomes enchanted with Hilda. In the second Act, the scene of which is in Iceland, the priests of Odin are assembled in a sacred grove on the seashore. Sigurd, Gunther, and Hagen arrive, and are told what fearful ordeals they must go through to set Brunhilda free. Sigurd declares that should he win her he will resign her to Gunther, with whom he exchanges helmets. After contests with Valküres, Kobolds, and Phantoms, with his face concealed, he enters the enchanted chamber, awakens Brunhilda, and the two are borne away by the Norns, who have assumed the form of swans. In the third Act Sigurd resigns his lovely prize to Gunther, who assures Brunhilda that it was he who set her free, on which she consents to become his bride. Sigurd then demands the hand of Hilda, which is at once accorded. In the last Act Brunhilda deplures her fate in being compelled to marry Gunther instead of Sigurd. Hilda, in a fit of jealousy, shows Brunhilda the girdle given to her by Sigurd, and boasts that it was out of love for her that he rescued the Valkyrie. Brunhilda accuses her of being a sorceress, and when Gunther arrives denounces his baseness, and hurls her crown at his feet. She then frees Sigurd from Uta's spell, and they vow eternal faith. The Opera concludes with Sigurd being brought in, slain by Gunther; the Valkyrie dies at the same moment, and they ascend together to Paradise.

It will thus be seen that the French adapters have not touched that part of the legend which relates to the "Ring"; and that, in consequence, we have more human interest in the Opera than could be admitted into the libretto prepared by the German composer.

In considering M. Reyer's music, it must be remembered that it was composed many years ago, when perhaps those who resolved to diverge from the beaten track, and yet were not strong enough to found a style of their own, were more likely to be influenced by the compositions of Berlioz than by those of any other writer of the time. Even the best friends of Wagner must acknowledge that he but followed to the very highest stage of development a theory which had been shadowed forth by others. Reyer, on the contrary, was a timid reformer, and catching something from the salient characteristics of the many operatic styles around him, whilst retaining his natural love of melody and form, has given us a work which, with all its undoubted merits, must inevitably suffer by comparison with those written in a definite style and with a defined purpose. We are now, for example, getting so accustomed to listen to rich orchestral details as most important, if not primary elements of operatic works, that we feel a sense of incongruity when in "Sigurd" the attention is arrested by continuous vocal movements—notably two really fine dramatic duets—after lengthened scenes of accompanied Recitative, Wagnerian only in design. It appears to us that the first Act is the worst and the last the best of the Opera, for in the former the composer tries to be somebody else and in the latter he is himself. His model has evidently been Berlioz, but in the course of his work many others have intruded upon his thoughts, and reminiscences of Meyerbeer, more especially, occur too frequently to escape notice. The Overture, which was omitted in the first performance of the Opera, contains some effective, if not scholastic, instrumentation, and the movements, which seem to follow without a well-considered plan, have in themselves much to attract even unmusical listeners. In the first Act we have but little to awaken interest save Uta's long solo and the Chorus of Women; but in the second and third Acts, although reminding us of similar situations in Wagner's work on the same theme, to the manifest disadvantage of M. Reyer, there are many excellent points which call for warm commendation. Amongst these may be mentioned, in the second Act, the chorus for priests and people, a well-written trio for Gunther, Sigurd, and Hagen, and Brunhilda's solo on awaking, which, however, suffers, as we have said, from unavoidable comparisons. In the third Act a duet between Brunhilda and Gunther deserves favourable mention; but the final Act, which contains the two duets to which we have already referred—the first between Brunhilda and Hilda, and the second between Brunhilda and Sigurd—exhibits the composer at his best, and seems to prove that, yielding to the fashion of the day, his real strength has been only partially shown in what should have been his representative opera. Whether the work may retain the stage it is almost impossible to say, for we are now in an age of transition, and the probability is that it may be accepted as merely an experimental contribution to the cause of operatic regeneration. Whatever its fate, however, there can be no doubt that it contains some really excellent music, and its reception, although not very enthusiastic, sufficiently proved that, apart from what might be thought of its real place in art, both the subscribers and the public were willing to accord a welcome to so earnest and thoughtful a production.

In the part of Brunhilda Madame Albani was, as might, indeed, have been expected, excellent throughout the many arduous scenes in which she was the prominent character. Her singing in the scena upon awakening, and in the duets especially mentioned, was fully worthy of her high reputation, and she may indeed congratulate herself upon having added one more to the numerous successful parts which she has now almost made her own. The tenor, M. Jourdain, displayed a fine voice and much real dramatic feeling as Sigurd, in many portions of the Opera, indeed, rousing the somewhat apathetic audience to a certain amount of real energy; and we can only regret that so accomplished a singer should have appeared too late in the season to be of service in what continues to be the weakest department of the company. As Hilda, Madame Fursch-Madi evidenced the possession of unexaggerated dramatic powers, and sang with much effect; Mlle. Reggiani being also entitled to a word of commendation for her rendering of the somewhat trying music of Uta. The part of Hagen was well suited for Signor de Reszke, who delivered the declamatory passages with appropriate vigour; and M. Devoyod, as Gunther, and M. Soulacroix, as the High Priest of Odin, were thoroughly satisfactory. The orchestra was extremely good, and all the choral music was rendered with much decision and accuracy. The stage arrangements had been evidently carefully studied. Some of the scenes were exquisitely painted, and the flames of fire—borrowed from the Bayreuth idea—would no doubt produce the requisite sensational effect were the steam more plentifully supplied and the crimson which shines upon it somewhat more intense. Much praise, in conclusion, must be awarded to M. Dupont, who conducted the Opera, and who must have worked hard, both with band and chorus, to achieve so excellent a result. The Opera has been twice performed since its production, with an equal amount of success; and on the 26th ult. the establishment closed, after the usual amount of "gala" nights in honour of the prime donne of the season.

THE GERMAN OPERA SEASON.

THE concurrent performances of German and Italian Opera at Covent Garden Theatre may be regarded as the most significant feature of the recent London musical season. Those who champion revolutionary doctrines profess to see in the Teutonic invasion the proximate downfall of Italian Opera, while the extremists of the other side have been quick to recognise the weak places in the armour of the newcomers. The artistic quarrel is a very pretty one as it stands. We have no intention of taking sides in the matter, and the sole aim of the subjoined remarks is to render a fair account of what was done by the German company, and to gather up the lessons afforded by the good and bad points in the managerial policy. It is generally agreed that with one or two exceptions the members of the troupe were very indifferent vocalists, but it would be unjust to regard them as fairly representative of the standard of the best German lyric theatres at the present time. The London season was arranged hurriedly, and the majority of the leading artists had already accepted engagements elsewhere. Others demanded exorbitant terms, it being generally believed abroad that England is a sort of Tom Tiddler's ground for musicians. We pay liberally, it is true, but we demand the best available talent in return for our money, and it must be admitted that for the prices charged at Covent Garden some of the recent performances were less meritorious than the audiences had a right to expect.

Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" opened the season on Wednesday, June 4, and a better selection could not have been made, as the work was so remarkably successful when it was first produced here two years ago. There was a good attendance on this occasion, but afterwards the Opera failed to attract, and thus early was it apparent that the public was dissatisfied with the quality of the performances. Herr Gudehus, who played the part of Walter von Stolzing, was alone superior to his predecessor, the rest of the cast consisting of mediocrities. Frau Schuch-Proska was far from being an ideal Eva. Her light soprano voice has probably deteriorated owing to overexertion, and its quality is now wiry and unpleasant. Again, Herr Moedlinger could not compare with Herr Ehrke as Beckmesser. As portrayed by Wagner, the Town Clerk of Nuremberg was an egoistic, pedantic, and, at any rate in small matters, an unscrupulous personage; but he was not a buffoon, as Herr Moedlinger made him appear. Herr Fischer's conception of Hans Sachs was ponderous, not to say lugubrious, and the only impersonation without flaw was that of David, by Herr Schrödter, a light tenor, whose voice had evidently received some amount of training. The chorus, collected principally from Cologne and Schwerin, was inferior to that of 1882, though it showed the results of careful rehearsal under Mr. Armbruster, and the orchestra was by no means unexceptionable. Under less intelligent guidance than that of Herr Richter it would probably have left much to desire. At subsequent performances an improvement was made by the substitution of Herr Reichmann for Herr Fischer as Hans Sachs; but neither Herr Oberländer, a tenor with a hard, unmusical voice, nor Herr Stritt, whose robust organ is much worn, was satisfactory as Walter. The attendance fell off, and after performances on the 11th and 18th, and a matinée on the 21st, Wagner's humorous Opera was heard no more. At the same time, there cannot be any fear for the lasting popularity of "Die Meistersinger." It is too full of masterly strokes of genius and delightful melody ever to fall into neglect.

Mingled praise and blame must also be accorded to the performance of "Der Freischütz" on June 6. On the whole, Herr Gudehus was admirable as Max, Herr Wiegand was powerful and impressive as Caspar, and Frau Schuch-Proska was heard to greater advantage as Aennchen than she had been as Eva on the previous Wednesday. On the other hand, we have seldom heard less justice rendered to the beautiful music of Agathe than was given by Mdlle. Biro de Marion, a member of the Royal Italian Opera Company; and the stage arrangements in the Incantation Scene excited the risibility of the audience. The original dialogue was restored, the abandonment of Berlioz's tedious recitatives greatly improving the general effect of the Opera.

On Wednesday, June 11, "Lohengrin" was performed with Madame Albani as Elsa, and there was an enormous audience, hundreds of people being refused admission. Indeed, it was reported that the demand for seats was greater than had been known at Covent Garden since the first night of Verdi's "Aida," in 1876. If this be true it is highly instructive. It proves that the public is more ready to hear a masterpiece than the worn out operas of the Italian repertory even with Madame Patti, provided there is a probability of an adequate performance. Let the opponents of German Opera, and also those who have the interests of this form of art at heart, bear this in mind. Impressed very likely by the splendid audience, Madame Albani threw herself thoroughly into the rôle, and has never played it with greater charm in the earlier scenes, nor with so much dramatic force in the third Act. Herr Stritt was fairly acceptable as Lohengrin, Frau Luger created a favourable impression as Ortrud, and the Telramund of Herr Reichmann and the Herald of Herr Scheidemantel left nothing to desire.

Three performances of "Tannhäuser" were given, of which the first took place on Saturday morning, June 14, with an indifferent cast. Mdlle. Biro de Marion did her best as Elisabeth, but she was far from being an interesting or sympathetic exponent of the character. Herr Stritt, as Tannhäuser, can only be commended for the energy he threw into the part, but Herr Scheidemantel as Wolfram sang admirably, and proved himself one of the few vocalists of the company. At the second rendering, on the 27th, Herr Reichmann replaced the last named artist, the others remaining as before. Herr Gudehus took the leading rôle on the 4th ult., and rendered it ample justice both in a musical and dramatic sense.

The valuable co-operation of Madame Albani was again secured in the performance of "Der Fliegende Holländer," on June 20. The embodiment of Senta by the Canadian artist is too well known to need description, but it may be said that her physical efforts in the part would render it unwise for her to repeat it at frequent intervals. Artistic absorption in a rôle is an excellent quality, but in the case of Wagner's heroines the strain on the voice and the nervous system must necessarily be exhausting. Herr Reichmann gave a praiseworthy impersonation of the Dutchman, his acting being impressive and dignified without being too lugubrious. The other members of the cast did fairly well, but the scenic arrangements were not of the best.

A large audience attended the only performance of "Fidelio," on June 25, proving that Beethoven's Opera is a power with the musical public even without the attraction of a celebrated prima donna as Leonora. Frau Luger gave an earnest, conscientious, and highly intelligent reading of the character, fully satisfying all reasonable requirements, though she could not compare with Marianne Brandt, the finest Leonora we have witnessed in London of late years. Fraulein Kalmann, as Marzelline, and Herr Schrödter as Jacquin were efficient, and Herr Oberländer as Florestan was tolerable, but Herr Reichmann as Pizarro disappointed expectations. Contrary to usual custom, only one Overture was played—namely, the greatest of the four, known as Leonora No. 3.

After several indifferent performances the rendering of "Tristan und Isolde," on the 2nd ult., came as a pleasant surprise, and, on the whole, it may be pronounced superior to that at Drury Lane two years ago. Fraulein Lilli Lehmann had been specially engaged for the rôle of Isolde, and she interpreted it in a manner that would be difficult to surpass. Looking the part to perfection, she also proved thoroughly equal to the arduous music, while her acting was marked by mingled grace and dramatic force. She was ably seconded by Herr Gudenus, whose Tristan was decidedly superior to his previous assumptions. Another admirable embodiment was that of Brangaene, by Frau Luger, though a quieter style of singing would have rendered it a more effective contrast to the proud and impulsive Princess. Herr Scheidemann, as Kurwenal, and Herr Wiegand, as King Marke, left nothing to be desired, and the greatest praise is due to Herr Richter for the excellence of the general performance. The work seemed to create a remarkable effect on the large audience. Complete silence reigned in the house from the beginning to the end of each Act, and no one stirred until the final fall of the curtain. This behaviour contrasted forcibly with that of ordinary operatic audiences, and testified to the power of genius as exemplified in this marvellous score. Beyond all question, "Tristan und Isolde" is Wagner's most stupendous effort, and, though familiarity is necessary in order fully to comprehend and appreciate it, an attentive listener can scarcely fail to be impressed by the immense dramatic force of the first Act, the surpassing beauty of the love duet, or the subtlety and pathos of the scene between the wounded Tristan and the faithful Kurwenal. The work was repeated at a matinée on the 10th ult.

We now come to the most important, but, unfortunately, the least satisfactory feature of the season—namely, the production of Dr. Villiers Stanford's tragic opera "Savonarola." The stars in their courses seem to fight against the cause of English opera. Mr. Mackenzie's "Colomba" has suffered this year, both at home and abroad, from a series of unfortunate circumstances, and the same unkind fate is pursuing another work equally representative, at any rate in design and scope. "Savonarola" was produced at Hamburg, on April 18, and appears to have met with considerable favour. There was reason for regret in the fact that the Opera was to be first heard in London in a foreign translation, but musicians probably said to themselves, "Better in German than not at all." Then came a crowd of adverse influences, against which war was sedulously waged, though, as the event proved, it would have been wiser to capitulate at discretion. Into the merits of the litigation between the publishers and the management it is not our purpose to enter. We have only to take note of the artistic results, which were disastrous enough. But the primary difficulty was the selection of a performer for the leading soprano part. It was first undertaken by Fräulein Boers, of Hanover, who was prevented by "indisposition" from coming to London. Next it was offered to Frau Waldmann-Leideritz, who failed to master it in the prescribed time. At last it was taken in hand by Fräulein Schaernack, a mezzo-soprano, who had rendered useful service in subsidiary parts during the season. Whether the dread of legal pains and penalties had anything to do with the unwillingness of the lady artists to appear in the Opera, or with the unwonted slowness of the entire company—band, chorus, and principals—in mastering their parts, cannot be said. But the performance was postponed again and again, and at last took place on the penultimate night of the season, Wednesday, the 9th ult. It is necessary to offer some remarks on the work itself, but they will be less comprehensive than would be the case were it possible to form a definite judgment on the merits of Dr. Stanford's score. Not only was there no opportunity of studying the music beforehand, but the audience could not obtain the English libretto, a state of things happily unprecedented. The author of the book is Mr. Gilbert A'Becket, whose literary ability and knowledge of stage effect has stood him in good stead, though he has not been sufficiently mindful of the advantages of contrast. In the Prologue there is an agonising farewell between two devoted lovers, and a dispute between two desperate rivals; in the first Act swords are drawn freely by the respective partisans of the great ecclesiastic and the Medici; in the second all is storm and stress throughout; and in the third the hero is led to the stake and the heroine dies of a broken heart. In this sombre book there are some fine situations, and the artistic feeling which no doubt prevented Mr. A'Becket from introducing incongruous matter with the view of lightening the action, is commendable in itself. But the fact remains that in an Opera variety is a necessity, even if the genius of the composer be of the highest order. Dr. Stanford is one of those eager earnest workers to whom we owe what may be termed the renaissance of English music outside the Church. He is obviously of opinion—if his method in "The Canterbury Pilgrims" and in "Savonarola" may be accepted as evidence—that the English opera of the future must, to a large extent, exemplify the principles laid down in the Wagnerian music-drama. To a certain extent we are disposed to agree with him; but unfortunately he gives prominence to that which is least agreeable in the modern doctrines, while he refuses, or perhaps is unable, to avail himself of the methods whereby Wagner secured the requisite relief and contrast even in his most advanced works. As in "The Canterbury Pilgrims" there is a constant sense of striving and unrest even in the sentimental episodes, so in "Savonarola" we are weighed down by the unrelieved gloom of the subject and its musical illustration. It is necessary to speak with caution because our impressions are derived merely from one very indifferent performance. We are quite certain that with adequate exponents of the principal characters the love-duets in the Prologue and the second Act, the finely imagined close of the Prologue, and the climax of the Opera would be far more effective than they were at Covent Garden. The composer's use of a mediæval church melody to typify the great ecclesiastic is very skilful, and the religious music well written and impressive. Indeed, the musicianship throughout is of the highest order, but Dr. Stanford never rises to a striking peroration. Frequently he commences to scale a height, and then, like Alberich in "The Niebelungs Ring," he slips and slides back to the realms of dullness just when the glowing summit appears within reach. For the present we shall say no more concerning "Savonarola." If wise counsels had prevailed it would not have been produced under the existing conditions, for the performance was calculated to seriously injure the chances of the work being ultimately accepted by the English public. To enter into details is happily unnecessary. A more depressing evening has seldom been passed in an opera house, and we desire to blot it from memory as soon as possible. A repetition of "Lohengrin" brought the season to an end on the 11th ult., the house being again crowded in every part. Impartial discerners cannot fail to regret the errors which seriously injured the success of the undertaking and caused the enemies of German opera to blaspheme. In the interests of art it will be well for the experiment to be repeated, for, notwithstanding all shortcomings, it was pleasant to note the zeal and self-abnegation of the performers and the unwonted intelligence of the audiences. If Italian and German Opera be permitted to flourish side by side for a time, amateurs will recognise what is good in each and the result cannot fail to be beneficial even if it does not pave the way, as we think it would, for the establishment of lyric drama in the native tongue.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

AN Orchestral Concert was given by the students of this Institution, on the afternoon of the 4th ult., at St. James's Hall, before a large audience. The most important of the students' compositions was a dramatic Scene, "Saved from the Waters," by Mr. F. Kilvington Hattersley, the solos in which were effectively rendered by Miss Marie Etherington and Mr. Musgrove Tufnail. There is much good writing in this piece both for voices and instruments, the great merit being that the ambition of the young composer never overrides his discretion. An orchestral Serenade, by Mr. C. L. Macpherson (Balfé Scholar), and a Bolero for violin, with orchestral accompaniment, by Mr. J. E. German, also evidenced not only the possession of decided talent on the part of their writers, but the result of good teaching on the part of their professors, and both works were warmly and most deservedly applauded. In the last-named piece the composer was also the solo executant. Amongst the instrumentalists we must award especial praise to Miss Winifred Robinson for her performance of the "Andante" and "Allegro Molto Vivace," from Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, the Andante, indeed, being exquisitely played. Miss Eleanor Rix in two movements from Schumann's Concertstück in G; Mr. E. H. Lemare in Walter Macfarren's Concertstück in E; and Mr. Gilbert R. Betjemann, in Reinecke's Concertstück in G minor, fully sustained the prestige of the Academy for high-class pianoforte playing, and Miss Augusta Arnold, Miss Kate Winifred Payne, and Mr. John Henry contributed vocal solos with much success, the Recitative "Be comforted" and Air "The Lord worketh wonders," from Handel's "Judas Maccabæus," by Mr. Henry, being remarkably well sung. The Concert was conducted by Mr. William Shakespeare with his usual care and intelligence.

MADAME SAINTON-DOLBY'S VOCAL ACADEMY.

THE second afternoon Concert of the pupils of Madame Sainton-Dolby's Vocal Academy was held at Steinway Hall, on the 3rd ult. On an occasion of this description the curiously disposed visitor does not feel called upon to criticise this or that shortcoming of style or execution on the part of individual performers—shortcomings which, doubtless, would have been previously recognised by the able leader of the Academy we speak of. His object probably would be, and at any rate it was ours, to obtain a general impression as to the effect of the training bestowed upon its pupils. Judging from the array of her disciples brought before our notice in the present Concert, we can only say that the system employed by Madame Dolby—though leaning, perhaps, too one-sidedly to the Italian school—must be an exceedingly good one. There were some few (very few) solos with English words included in the programme, the delivery of which suffered to some extent from indistinct diction. This remark, however, in no way applies to the choral portions of the selection, which, indeed, were most admirably rendered throughout, both as regards the enunciation of the words and the delicate shading of the tone. We refer more especially to the "Ave Maria" of Brahms and the charming choral trifles for female voices by A. C. Mackenzie, "Distant bells" and "Come, sisters, come," which elicited, most deservedly, the unanimous applause of the audience. M. Sainton ably conducted the choir.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

MOST of the music to be heard in Yorkshire just now is of an al fresco description. There is this month, however, one important exception—namely, the fourth annual Festival of the North-East Cathedral Choirs Association, which took place in the noble Minster at York, on the 10th ult. It was an event which attracted considerable attention among members of church choirs not only in the musical West Riding, but in North Yorkshire and Durham, from all which divisions came representative voices. Leaving out last year, in which the Festival was held at Ripon Cathedral, when some 350 only could be squeezed into the places assigned to the choir, there has been at no previous assembly anything like the number of singers who attended on this occasion. When Dr. Armes first produced his "St. John the Evangelist" at York, at the Festival of 1881, the choir numbered nearly 700; in the following year Dr. Bridge's "Mount Moriah" was sung by 620 voices, and Dr. Naylor's "Jeremiah," the work which formed the principal musical item of the service this year, was performed by more than 800 vocalists. This number included members of the Cathedral choirs of York, Durham, and Ripon, and of Church choirs at Scarborough, Hull, Dunnington, Selby, York, Leeds, Wakeford, Bradford, Dewsbury, Halifax, Houghton-le-Spring, Silksworth, Alnwick, and Barnard Castle. The choir was made up of 51 sopranos and 25 contraltos—all of whom were ladies who had volunteered their services; Cathedral and other trebles, 357; altos (boys and men), 86; tenors, 113; basses, 140; Cathedral song men, 29. The public interest which is taken in this comparatively new feature of music in the North was shown by the attendance of nearly 3,000 persons, all of whom found ample accommodation in the spacious Minster. The music of the shortened form of service was as follows:—Processional hymn, "Hail, Festal day," Dr. P. Armes; Preces (throughout), Tallis; Psalm 150, Chant in D, Dr. Crow; Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in G minor, Purcell; Anthem (Cantata "Jeremiah"), Dr. Naylor. The Voluntaries selected by the Organist, Dr. Naylor, were an Interlude (one of the earliest productions of that very accomplished young composer, Mr. Algernon Ashton) and a well-known Theme, in A major, by Mr. F. W. Hird, the excellent Organist of All Souls' Church, Leeds. After the Benediction, Dr. Naylor played Handel's Fourth Concerto. That portion of the Festival to which, of course, those present looked forward with most interest was the new Cantata of the Organist of York Minster. In style "Jeremiah" is strictly ecclesiastical, and will probably (even if its composer had intended it should) never find its way into the concert-room. Dr. Naylor has written the Cantata exclusively for Cathedral or church use, and doubtless it will, in these quarters, be cordially welcomed. The book is the work of the Rev. John Ellerton, whose name will be familiar to most people who know anything about church hymns. The author divides the life of the Prophet into three parts—namely, "The call and return," "The relapse," and "The judgment and release." The subject is treated in twenty-six numbers, and there is an instrumental introduction to the first and second parts. It may be stated that the accompaniment is written solely for the organ, which is treated independently of the voices, and is prominent and effective. The music of Jeremiah's part is allotted to the bass, for which voice there are no less than ten numbers. Conspicuous among these are the solos "O that mine head," remarkable for its depth of emotional character and the ability with which it has been accompanied, and "Refrain thy voice from weeping," which serves to introduce the final chorus, "Sing with gladness." Beyond taking part in a duet, the tenor voice has no place in the solos which the work contains. On the other hand, the soprano and contralto parts are treated liberally and have allotted to them several of the finest numbers in the Cantata. One of the best examples is the contralto air "Be not afraid," a composition in three-four time, full of spirit, and contrasting strongly with the plaintive, even gloomy, character of many of the numbers. The choruses are invariably well written and broadly treated. The concluding chorus is a notable instance of the skill of Dr. Naylor, in the form of a fugue which is highly effective. The work generally is thoughtful and serious and reflects great credit on its composer. The Rev. Canon Hudson, successor of the Minster, was the conductor. The solos were distributed amongst the members of the three Cathedral Choirs. The Festival was a highly successful one.

MUSIC IN THE WEST.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

A LARGE and influential meeting of the Monday Popular Concerts Society was held in Bristol on the 2nd ult., when the musical affairs of the past and coming seasons were discussed at length. The state of the finances was shown to be not entirely satisfactory, for in spite of the large attendances at almost every Concert, the reserve fund has had to be drawn upon to the amount of about £30 to meet the expenses of the six Concerts that were given this year. Considering that the reserve fund amounts to more than £700, this may not appear very serious; still, it is a balance on the wrong side, and we hope that the citizens of Bristol will come forward in larger numbers as subscribers to the Society. The failure to meet expenses is no doubt due to the difficulty in finding efficient local musicians and the being obliged to engage several of the "points" from a distance. This obstacle can only be removed by the Concerts being steadily continued on a firm basis, and gradually many of the musical residents in the place, both professional and amateur, would anxiously seek to qualify themselves for an honourable position in their own orchestra. It has been decided to give nine Concerts during the coming season, and that for five of these, to take place before Christmas, the numbers in the band should be augmented, which arrangement will be continued for the remaining four, should the receipts justify the necessarily increased expenditure.

The annual meeting of the Bristol Musical Association was held in the Lesser Colston Hall, on the 15th ult., when an address was given by Mr. George Riseley on "Music in Bristol." After expressing his sincere thanks to the president—The Rev. J. M. Wilson, head master of Clifton College—for his kind interest in, and hearty support of, music in this city, he proceeded to deprecate the fact of having so continually to go out of Bristol for leading vocalists and instrumentalists to take part in their Concerts, and said surely there must be something wrong when in a city like this, with a quarter of a million inhabitants, they could count the number of solo vocalists upon the fingers of one hand. In the past ten years at least 600 voices had annually received some sort of training in the different musical societies of this city. Yet not one single vocalist had come forward from that large number to take a prominent position as a soloist available for concert work. The reason of failure he took to be this—that the means of education in music in this city had not advanced with the same strides with which the taste itself had advanced. It was the non-professional, or listening, element that was strong, and the professional, or performing, element that was weak. It was greatly to be deplored that in this city we had no system of education which gave a fair chance to native talent. The remedy seemed to lie in the establishment of a local school for music, where the art could be pursued as a serious study. He would suggest the formation of a complete local conservatoire, where every branch of the art could be taught. If carried out with spirit and energy it would command the respect and support of the West of England. After advocating this scheme warmly and at some length, Mr. Riseley concluded by hoping that the few suggestions he had made might be productive of some beneficial result to the cause of music in Bristol.

MUSIC AT THE TURIN EXHIBITION.

THREE years ago, at the National Exhibition held in Milan, it may be said that practically music was completely neglected. There was, it is true, a poor collection of instruments of our own make exhibited, but no thought was given either to operatic or concert music, nor was there any performance of new compositions. This year at Turin, not only is the splendid national exhibition a perfect success in all industrial departments, but to music has been assigned the post and importance to which it has a right in such an assembly of all the forces of the country. A special committee was appointed which has attended to the most important point of providing performances of musical compositions, for which the municipality of Turin subscribed an important sum. At Milan there was a gallery for the display of instruments but no hall for performances, and the Orchestral Society of La Scala, which gave a few Concerts at its own risk, had shortly to abandon them as the receipts did not cover the expenses. The Turin committee began by building a circular hall, which for elegance, architectural grace, richness of ornamentation and fittings, is one of the finest and is also one of the most frequented parts of the Exhibition. A commission was then formed to organise all musical entertainments, the principal being the performance of opera at the Teatro Regio, and orchestral Concerts in the hall of the Exhibition. The operatic season was divided into two periods—one for the opening and the other for the closing of the Exhibition. The first lasted through the month of May with two operas of the old style—"Favorita" and "Puritani"—by artists of high repute, an excellent orchestra led by Faccio, and a fine mise en scène. The singers are mostly known in London—Gayarre, tenor; Pasqua and Repeto Trisolini, prime donne; Battistini, baritone, and Silvestri, bass. These distinguished vocalists performed Donizetti's and Bellini's music in a remarkable manner, especially "I Puritani," in which I first heard Madame Repeto, whose lovely, sympathetic voice, united to an excellent method of singing, render her worthy of the name of "Diva," so often adopted by others of inferior merit. The second season, which will take place during September and October, will be a more important one than the first, as there will be ballet besides the opera, and the great attraction of a new Opera,

"Isaura di Provenza," composed expressly by Luigi Mancinelli, the celebrated leader of the orchestra and director of the Liceo Musicale of Bologna, and one of the most ardent apostles of Richard Wagner in Italy. For this Opera the services of the most eminent singers have been secured, amongst whom are the two leading stars—Tamagno and Pantaleoni. Theatrical music once perfectly organised at the Turin Exhibition, Concerts had to be thought of, and their success surpassed all hopes, splendid performances having been already given by the orchestras of Turin, Milan, Naples, and Bologna, to be followed by that of Rome. A noble competition and exemplary zeal on the part of the different directors in forming programmes of serious music, really classical and symphonic, met with constant patronage from a large number of people, who seemed to understand the beauties of music which had remained too long unknown or neglected, and even calumniated in Italy as being too obscure, difficult, and ineffably wearisome. The Turin orchestra, performing every Thursday in the large hall of the Exhibition, is the same that plays at the theatre, and Faccio has been engaged expressly to lead it during the whole time of the Exhibition, that is, from April to November. The other celebrated Italian orchestras went expressly to Turin to prove their merit, and therefore presented themselves with chosen and well studied programmes. The first to appear was the orchestra of La Scala at Milan, led by Faccio. It gave three splendid Concerts with immense success. It numbers 130 players. The best are the strings, remarkable for their precision, and more yet for a certain communicative fire which exercises on the Italian public an irresistible charm. This quality, however, interferes with the true style of interpretation, and in the choice of music too great a share is allotted to effect. For this reason the orchestra of La Scala has never yet performed an entire Symphony by Beethoven, but only the most effective numbers; for instance, the Scherzo of the Ninth, marvellously executed by it owned.

A truly serious, classical, elevated orchestra is that brought from Naples by Giuseppe Martucci. The complete and clamorous success it obtained was quite a revelation. Martucci is an extraordinary artist, who possesses to an eminent degree the three qualities of pianist, composer, and leader, excelling in all. He created the Neapolitan orchestra, and in a very few years brought it to a perfection that places it on a rank with the best foreign ones. In Germany, where some of his compositions have been published, Martucci is in high repute. When leading the orchestra he is most happy in the interpretation of classical authors, but more particularly in the works of Mozart, Beethoven, and of symphonic fragments by Wagner. At Turin he excited the greatest admiration by his perfect rendering of Mozart's Symphony in G minor, of that in C minor by Beethoven, and created decided enthusiasm with the marvellous "Waldweben," in Wagner's "Siegfried." Martucci was obliged to repeat this last piece in each of the three Concerts he gave. I heard the "Niebelungen" at Bayreuth, and I can certify that Martucci in this piece is in no way inferior to Hans Richter, who had the advantage of directing it under the immediate inspiration of its author. To give an idea of the serious way in which are made out the programmes of the Neapolitan orchestra, here is that of the last Concert given at Turin:—1. Schumann, Overture "Genoveva"; 2. Beethoven, Pastoral Symphony; 3. Boccherini, "Siciliana"; 4. Scarlatti, Allegro from the First Sonata; 5. Haydn, Minuetto; 6. Berlioz, "Danse des Sylphes" and Marche Hongroise; 7. Wagner, Overture "Tannhäuser." This programme contains a fine variety of styles, and Martucci found means to make Italian music shine in it, without the help of dance music or noisy overture. Scarlatti's Allegro is a true gem, in its primitive instrumental simplicity, so quaintly contrasting with Wagner's polyphony. In a second letter I will treat of the Bologna Orchestra, and of the exhibition of instruments, not a great credit to our national industry.

GOUNOD'S "REDEMPTION" AT TORONTO.

AT the second of the series of Semi-Centennial Celebration Concerts, given on the 3rd ult. by the Philharmonic Society, in the pavilion of the Horticultural Gardens,

Gounod's Trilogv was performed before an exceptionally large audience. "The work has been given," says the Toronto Evening News, "on two former occasions in this city by the Philharmonic Society, but never before in the Dominion has there been such a rendering of this, or perhaps any other Oratorio." Under the excellent conductorship of Mr. F. H. Torrington, both band and choir—the latter consisting of nearly five hundred voices—went with remarkable precision; and the solo singers—Miss Fanny Kellogg, Mrs. Petley, Miss Smith, Miss Berryman, Messrs. W. H. Courtney, Ivan E. Morawski, and Schuch—were thoroughly successful, the singing of Miss Kellogg in the solo "Ye Mountains" producing a thrilling effect. The Toronto Mail says: "The striking and colossal chorus 'Unfold ye portals everlasting' naturally elicited the greatest amount of applause, and Mr. Torrington had to refuse two or three demands for its repetition, but other of the choruses indicated just as much merit in the execution. The orchestra, which included the Mendelssohn Quintet Club and the pick of the professional talent of this city, Hamilton, and Montreal, was the most effective one that has yet sat in front of the Philharmonic chorus. The efficiency of the string section was proved in the fulness and beauty of its tone in the sustained and singing passages, its power in the fortes, and its brilliancy and precision in the descriptive music illustrating certain portions of the text."

At the conclusion of the performance Mr. Torrington was the recipient of a well-earned and enthusiastic demonstration of approval and congratulation from the chorus and orchestra.

OBITUARY.

IN Victor Massé, whose death, on the 5th ult., at Paris, we briefly record in our "Foreign Notes" to-day, French musical art has lost one of its most highly-gifted and sympathetic modern representatives. If retiring habits, and a singular modesty of character, not unmixed with conscious pride, have to some extent contributed in keeping his name less prominently before the public than might otherwise have been the case; his merit as a dramatic and specifically French composer is none the less great, and, moreover, is likely to endure for some generations to come. Indeed, we shall probably hear more about Massé's works now that he has passed away from amongst the living than ever we did during his lifetime. Although confined to his house, in the Avenue Frochot, for the last six years by a painful malady, the master continued to the last to work at his art; a Comic Opera, "La nuit de Cléopâtre," which he had but recently completed, bearing witness to this fact. Its contemplated production during the coming season at Paris will doubtless give the signal for a general revival of the numerous preceding works from the same gifted and original pen. Victor Massé was born on March 7, 1822, at Lorient. He entered the Paris Conservatoire in 1834, and soon became a distinguished pupil of that institution. Ten years later, in 1844, he was the successful competitor for the much-coveted Grand Prix de Rome. Since then Massé has written a number of lyrical stage works, the merits of some of which, at least, will suffice to hand down his name to posterity as worthy to be classed with those of a similar genre by Auber, Hérold, and Halévy. They may as well be enumerated in their complete chronological order—viz., "La Chanteuse voilée" (1850), "Galatée" (1852), "Les Noces de Jeannette" (1853), "La Fiancée du Diable" (1854), "Miss Fauvette" (1855), "Les Saisons" (1855), "La Reine Topaze" (1856), "Le Cousin de Méruvaux" (1857), "Les Chaises à porteurs" (1858), "La Fée Carabosse" (1859), "La Mule de Pedro" (1863), "Fior d'Aliza" (1866), "Le Fils du Brigadier" (1867), "Paul et Virginie" (1876), and the posthumous work already referred to, "La nuit de Cléopâtre" (1884). Massé was the successor of Auber in the musical section of the Académie des Beaux Arts, and was also a Knight of the Legion of Honour. In the latter capacity military honours were paid him at the grave, but in other respects, and in accordance with the explicit desire of the deceased composer, the funeral ceremonies, as such, were of the simplest kind, the modest master preferring to live, if so it might be, in the works he left behind, rather than to be talked about for a short season in connection with the public honours which, but for his veto, would certainly have been bestowed upon that part of him which was perishable.

THE annual distribution of prizes to the students of the Royal Academy of Music—in consequence of the insufficient accommodation in the institution for the enormous number of persons interested in the proceedings—took place at St. James's Hall, on the 26th ult., Madame Sainton-Dolby presenting the awards, in place of the Countess of Dudley, who, through a domestic bereavement, was unable to attend. After an exceptionally fine rendering of Schubert's Serenade "Lightly creeping," by the female choir (the solo well sung by Miss Eleanor Rees), conducted by Mr. William Shakespeare, the Principal, Sir George Macfarren, in an eloquent introductory speech, dwelt especially upon the continued and rapidly increasing prosperity of the Academy, and exhorted those pupils who had not been fortunate enough to secure prizes to remember that earnest and willing work must eventually reward them for any little disappointments they may experience during their course of study. The following were the Memorial prizes: The Charles Lucas Silver Medal—Charles Stewart Macpherson. The Parepa-Rosa Gold Medal—Margaret Hoare. The Sterndale Bennett Prize (purse of ten guineas)—Dora Robinson. The Llewellyn Thomas Gold Medal—Marie Etherington. The Evill Prize (purse of ten guineas)—Walter Mackway. For languages, books were awarded to Miss Haldane (French) and Miss Richardson (Italian); for violist playing, a violin bow was presented to Mr. Hann; and commendations were given to a large number of students in both departments.

WE regret to record the death of Mr. H. Edmond Holt Organist and Choirmaster of St. Mary's Wesleyan Chapel Truro, which took place on the 5th ult. Mr. Holt was music-master of the Wesleyan College, and his masterly performances on the Concert Hall organ will be long remembered. His funeral was attended by a large number of the Wesleyan body and the organists of several chapel in the city.

OWING to the exertions of the authorities of Beverley Minister, and to the liberality of a private gentleman (a native and non-resident of Beverley), this noble Church will shortly possess an organ which will favourably compare with the magnificent instruments just built by Messrs. Hill for Westminster Abbey and Lichfield Cathedral. As regards mechanism, sound-boards, bellows, &c., the organ will be entirely new, but will contain the original pipes of Snetzler's existing work (A.D. 1761), carefully preserved and augmented by numerous new stops of importance. The additions consist chiefly of a new solo manual, comprising, among other registers, two tubas of sixteen feet and eight feet pitch, a grand swell of seventeen stops, and a pedal of large resources. The solo, swell, and pedal organs being placed at the southern extremity of the screen, beneath the Choir arches, will have a tubular pneumatic connection with the Organist, who will sit at his console on the screen. The great and choir organs will be also on the screen, though kept very low, in deference to those who wish to preserve the "vista" unimpaired. Every stop in the organ is "throughout" except the Vox Angelica, which can extend only to tenor C. All the three stopped diapasons (by Snetzler) are of metal, and of beautiful tone. The organ will be erected and ready for use before the autumn. Subjoined is the specification:—

The wind is supplied by means of a gas-engine. Every stop in the pedal organ is of the largest scale, and runs throughout, the grand posauene, sixteen feet (length), being heavily winded. Nos. 7 and 8, and 38 and 39 are also heavily winded. The swell is a remarkably fine one. There are numerous composition-pedals.

ON Thursday, the 17th ult., Miss Gertrude Griswold, of the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, gave a Morning Concert, at 29, Chesham Place, Belgrave Square, the residence of Sir Sydney and Lady Waterlow. Miss Griswold was supported by Miss Lena Little (contralto), Miss Amina Goodwin (pianist), and Herr Kornfeld (violinist). The conductors were Sir Julius Benedict, Mr. W. Ganz, and Signor Tosti. Miss Griswold sang with great effect a recitative and air from "Mireille," by Gounod; and amongst several other songs gave "Mondnacht," by Schumann, and "Ungeduld," by Schubert. In two English songs, by Mr. Cowen, she was accompanied by the composer. The room was quite full, and the Concert was a complete success. Amongst the audience were many ladies and gentlemen from the United States. Sir Arthur Sullivan was present, with several other persons distinguished in the literary and musical world in London.

SIR JULIUS BENEDICT gave a Lecture on "Pianoforte Playing" to the pupils of the Norwood, Streatham and Dulwich School of Music in the Institute, Knight's Hill, on the 22nd ult., after the Examination, conducted by him. The lecturer, who was introduced by Dr. Sloman, Principal of the school, after speaking in high terms of the talent exhibited during the Examination, said:—"Never had there been such visible and gratifying progress in the art of playing on the pianoforte as during the last fifty years. When he (Sir Julius) first came into the musical world, the music which was practised and performed in the drawing-rooms of society was of the fimsiest and most unsatisfactory kind. There were arrangements put together just to allow some little Miss, who had had very little instruction, to shine at evening parties, and the moment the pianoforte was opened was the signal for general conversation. The progress since then had been astonishing, and in the classes and institutes that had sprung up in the outskirts of London there was to be found a teaching which gave promise of great future excellence. He was delighted to find that in Dr. Sloman they had a very able and experienced guide, who was ready to seize on anything which should raise the art he practised so well. On that occasion he might perhaps make a few remarks on what he considered the most difficult art of all—the art of music. Music had always been considered a kind of pastime not intended to have any serious hours sacrificed to it. It was considered much inferior to drawing and painting. But music, in his opinion, was one of the most Divine and lovable of all the arts, and quite worthy of the studious care and attention which it was thought necessary to devote to other things. They would not any of them wish a large assembly to hear them in their practice on the pianoforte, their hurrying over the pieces, and their reckless rushing over the keys. Let them say to themselves—'Let me play as if I had an auditory of twenty or thirty people, and do my very best.' What was the secret of practice? It was that they were not to go too fast, they were not to attempt masterly efforts that they could not deal with effectually; but they were to have patience to learn and to investigate. They should read their music honestly through, and understand all its features, before they attempted to play it. Go over the same ground again and again until they gradually reached perfection. The secret of all the successes achieved by our great musical notables, living or dead, was the hard, might we say, unforgetting study they gave to their practice, which nothing was allowed to interfere with, and the admiration they had for the great masters, which they wished to increase in the minds of the public by their perfect performance of their productions." After the lecture the students of the school gave with much ability a short selection of vocal and instrumental pieces.

MR. JOSEPH SIMS WARNER, who, thirty years ago (as churchwarden and honorary choir-master of St. Phillip's Church), established the Choral Service and the first surpliced choir in the town of Sheffield, died very suddenly on the 8th ultimo, at Stamford, where he had been staying during the previous week. The late Mr. Warner was well known in most of our English Cathedrals owing to the great interest which he invariably took in all matters affecting Church Music. It is said that nothing so much pleased him as to be the means of helping on in the profession any young person in whom he recognised the possession of a talent for music, and many a musician whose name is now well known in the world owes his success in life to the introduction and personal influence of the deceased gentleman.

THE second Annual Report of the Insurance Musical Society of London announces that, in consequence of the unsatisfactory attendance at the practices, it has been found impossible to form an orchestra. Six Concerts, however, were given by the Society last season, the instrumental performances in which were limited to solos and concerted pieces; and the Committee expresses a hope that the same number may take place during the season 1884-5. The report pays a well-merited tribute to Mr. J. W. Case, the Musical Director, for his valuable services, and also to the Hon. Secretary, Mr. George C. Morant.

Two lectures, by Mr. Moncure D. Conway, M.A., and Mr. Charles Dowdeswell respectively, and a dramatic reading by Miss Alma Murray, have been given during the month on behalf of the London branch of the United Richard Wagner Society of Germany at the town residence of the President, the Earl of Dysart. The first lecture, which took place on the 1st ult., was entitled "Wagner and the Supernaturalism of Art." Mr. Conway passed in rapid review the whole of the Wagnerian music dramas, and pointed out the inner significances abounding in each work. Wagnerism was born of the new spiritual life which distinguishes our age, and if all the faults of hypercriticism were admitted, the question would still remain, Was Wagner's aim a right aim, his intention one related to a higher order of things? Wagner had invented an organ able to combine high poetry with high music into an artistic expression, which neither alone had attained or could possibly attain. The supernaturalism in Wagner's dramas was attained by the aid of the music, which made weird things significant, and carried the gods, gnomes, and heroes of myth beyond the criticism of realism and science, and gave them perfect freedom of creation in their own sphere. One fault common to both music and poetry was found, and that was, they were too tragical. Nature being so full of tragedies, Art, for that very reason, ought not to be. Wagner's libretti, said Mr. Conway, are great European poems, themes not surpassed by the greatest selected by Shakespeare and Goethe. They stand in relation to Europe as Alcestis, Agamemnon, &c., did to Greece, and they have been treated with a genius of interpretation worthy of them. Mr. Dowdeswell's lecture upon "Lohengrin" and "Tristan und Isolde," took place on the 7th ult., and was illustrated with vocal and instrumental excerpts from the above-named works by amateur members of the Society, and Professor Jeffery, U.S.A. There was a numerous attendance. The lecturer entered into an elaborate definition of the music-drama, contrasting it, from all its points of view, with the older forms of opera. The raison d'être of the Leitmotiv and the Melos were explained, and the reasons of Wagner's conviction that myth was the ideal subject-matter for the poet were elucidated by the quotation of passages from his letters. The plots of each of the two dramas above named were briefly sketched, and when speaking of "Tristan und Isolde," Mr. Dowdeswell expressed his belief as to its supreme importance and beauty. Miss Alma Murray's Reading, on the 21st ult., was interspersed with pianoforte music by Professor Jeffery. The Readings comprised extracts from the plays of Shakespeare, and Wagner's "Walkure," "Götterdämmerung," and "Tristan," from Mr. Alfred Forman's translations. The music was taken exclusively from Wagner's works.

AN interesting sale of presentation rings, ivory bâtons, and other pieces of bijouterie, the property of the late Sir Michael Costa, took place on the 23rd ult., at the Rooms of Messrs. Christie, Manson, and Woods, the following being the most noticeable items:—An ivory bâton, carved with dragons and flowers, with chased gold top, inscribed "From Sims Reeves to Michl. Costa, Esq., in remembrance of the Birmingham Festival, September, 1852," £8; another ivory bâton, with chased gold top set with turquoises, £4; a gold snake ring, with a brilliant, inscribed "Augustus Frederick, March 11, 1832," £6 ros.; a massive gold ring, with chased shoulders, enamelled in colours, engraved with the Royal Albert Hall, presented by Her Majesty's Commissioners, £9; portrait of Handel, a miniature case with gold shield and inscription, "Presented by the Sacred Harmonic Society, 1852," £7 5s.; three bronze medals, Crystal Palace, 1854, in morocco case, 19s.; and gold medal of the Emperor of Germany, inscribed "Prinz von Preussen," 1858, £3 17s. 6d.

ALL who desire that the Philharmonic Society should maintain its character for recognising the claims of the representative composers of the world will be glad to hear that Herr Anton Dvorák has been elected an Honorary Member of the Society. As it was in response to an invitation from this time-honoured institution that he visited England, we are certain that Herr Dvorák will accept this compliment not only as a tribute to his genius as an artist, but to his urbane and kindly nature as a man.

A SPECIAL Service of Praise (to quote from the papers distributed throughout the church) was held at St. Peter's Church, Eaton Square, on Thursday afternoon, the 3rd ult., one of the days falling within the octave of the Feast of Peter. The service consisted of the shortened form of evensong (without processions), the Church choir being augmented for the occasion and receiving the assistance not only of the organ but of a good orchestra of about fifty performers; this augmentation, however, being confined to the adult (i.e., the alto, tenor, and bass) parts, resulted in the trebles, although highly commendable in themselves, appearing at times to be somewhat overweighted. For the Magnificat, Dr. Martin's setting in A was selected, and in this less success was achieved than in the anthem, of which we have to speak hereafter; the slower movements were marred by being taken decidedly too quickly, whilst, in the somewhat frequent changes of time, neither band, choir, nor conductor seemed altogether in perfect accord. It is only fair, however, to add that these blemishes were rendered decidedly more noticeable by the distinct success which attended the performance of the Anthem, a comprehensive selection from Mendelssohn's St. Paul, the numbers of the oratorio actually given being the Overture, No. 3, Nos. 12 to 22, and 34 to the end. Of this portion of the Festival we can say nothing better than that, with one exception, it was really good and satisfactory in all ways; the solos were taken by Master Fidge (treble), Mr. Lewis (tenor), both members of the choir of the church, and Mr. Pownall (bass), but when all did well it would be an invidious task to particularise. We cannot, however, pass without protest the omission of all but the last page of the chorus "O great is the depth." Had the very short space of time saved thereby been an absolute necessity, it would have been equally well effected by omitting the whole of some subsequent number, say the Gentile chorus; but such a course as that adopted partakes less of the character of selection than of that of mutilation, and should not be imitated, nor passed without protest. Apart from this, much credit is due to Mr. Sergison, the Organist of the church, who conducted, and to Dr. Bridge for his judicious organ accompaniments. Considering the evident amount of pains which had been bestowed on the Festival, we were sorry to see so small a congregation; but at least this absence of the unappreciative conduced all the more to the greater comfort of those who were present.

ON the last day of the Floral Fête, given at the Duke of Wellington's Riding School, at Knightsbridge, on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd ult., the programme was entirely devoted to music, the opening ceremony being under the direction of Sir Julius Benedict. At two o'clock the Prince's Band, under the able direction of Mr. Edward Terry, Organist of St. James's Church, Camberwell, played a capital selection of music, after which a Chamber Concert was given, conducted by Mr. Sidney Naylor. The artists were Madame Frickenhaus, Herren Josef Ludwig and George Ritter. This was followed at 4.30 by a grand Concert, under the direction of Signor Romili and Mr. Osborne Williams. Among the artists who gave their services at this Concert were Lady Benedict, Mdle. Bertha Brousil, Miss Beata Francis, Miss Annie Marriott, M. J. Adolphe Brousil, Mr. Walter Clifford, Mr. Dalgetty Henderson, and many others. At 6.30 there were musical sketches by Mr. Eric Lewis (Savoy Theatre), assisted by Mdle. Adelina Dinelli, the talented violinist; this latter artist also taking part in the Ballad Concert at 7.30, conducted by Mr. Edward Terry, at which the following artists assisted:—Mrs. Lindsay Browne, Misses Edith Phillips, Kitty Berger, Emily Dones, Messrs. Harpe Kearton, Stanley Smith, and an excellent vocal quartet.

THE members of the Grosvenor Choral Society held their 149th Monthly Concert at the Grosvenor Hall, on Friday, the 18th ult. Cowen's "Rose Maiden" was performed in the first part, the solos being taken by Mrs. Luff, Miss Florence Hartley, Mr. T. P. Frame, and Mr. Frederick Williams; Mr. Marcellus Higgs presided at the pianoforte. The second part consisted of a miscellaneous selection; solos were contributed by Miss Madeline Kelly and Mr. Atherton Furlong. The part music was well rendered. Miss Florence Hartley accompanied, and Mr. David Woodhouse conducted.

THE Annual Prize Festival of the Royal Normal College and Academy of Music for the Blind was held at the Crystal Palace, on the 19th ult. The proceedings commenced with a Concert, given in the Opera Theatre, by the blind students in combination with the Crystal Palace orchestra. The programme included Schumann's Concerto in A, admirably played by Mr. A. Hollins, and well accompanied by the orchestra. A great success was achieved by Mr. F. Turner and Mr. T. Perks in the performance of "Variations on a Beethoven Theme," composed by Saint-Saëns for two pianofortes, the ensemble of the pianists being perfect. The vocal music included several unaccompanied madrigals and part-songs, in which the students, as on previous occasions, showed that their training enabled them to distance all competitors in this branch of music. Solos were contributed by Miss Campbell, Miss M. Reece, Mr. White, Mr. Atkinson, and Mr. Moncur, all with excellent taste and style. After the Concert a gymnastic display in the central transept, by the blind pupils, excited admiration and astonishment. Few of the spectators were prepared to expect such emphatic evidence of careful physical development. The prizes were distributed by the Right Hon. A. J. Mundella, M.P., who passed a well deserved eulogium on the pupils and professors of the College, and expressed a hope that before long it would be ten times larger than at present.

We have been requested to publish the following:— "To H. Lawrence Harris, Esq., Secretary of the Music Publishers' Association: June 30, 1884. Sir,—I desire to express my great regret for having imported from America and sold in this country, without the licence of the owners of the copyright, various musical compositions, including the following: 'What are the wild waves saying,' 'First love waltz,' 'Torpedo and the whale,' 'Soon the bride,' 'Sunshine of life,' 'The virtuous gardener,' 'All on account of Eliza,' 'Self-made knight,' 'Love, love, love,' 'Charity girls' chorus,' Giroflé-Girofla waltzes. Being ignorant of the law of copyright I was not aware that I was doing wrong in selling the music which was arranged for the Banjo. I undertake to discontinue the sale of any such copyright works, and wish to express my thanks to the proprietors of the copyright therein for accepting a contribution of £5 towards the funds of the Music Publishers' Association instead of taking legal proceedings against me.—Yours sincerely, J. E. BREWSTER, The American Banjo Studio, 20, Oxford Street, W."

THE annual General Meeting of the Kensington Orchestral and Choral Society was held at the Kensington School of Music, Cromwell Road, on Friday evening, the 18th ult., Major Flower taking the chair in the unavoidable absence of Mr. Alfred Sacré, one of the vice-presidents. The hon. secretary, Mr. Granville D. Gordon, read the annual Report, which showed that during the past season a series of musical evenings had been given, and three very successful public Concerts at the Kensington Town Hall, when the following works were performed:—Mr. Gaul's "The Holy City," Mr. Caldicott's Cantata "The Widow of Nain," and "The Creation." In the course of the Report several important changes in the constitution of the Society, suggested by the committee, were put to the vote and unanimously adopted. The Chairman proposed a vote of thanks to Mr. Buels, the Conductor of the Society, remarking that the members could not fail to appreciate the ability and patience displayed by him at the practices and Concerts. This was carried, and Mr. Buels made a suitable reply.

THE Association called the "Greenwich Choral and Orchestral Union," recently established for the advancement of musical education and the improvement of singing in places of worship in the district, gave a Members' Concert, in the St. Alphege Mission Room, on Thursday evening, the 3rd ult. The programme, which was miscellaneous, was well rendered. The solo vocalists were Mrs. J. E. Batchelor, Mrs. G. S. Criswick, Miss A. Earle, Mr. A. Bunker, Mr. Blenkhorn, and Mr. Smart; solo violin, Mr. Turner. Mr. J. E. Batchelor presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. Ducker conducted. The Concert was under the presidency of the Vicar of Greenwich, the Rev. Brooke Lambert, M.A., B.C.L.

THE second examination for the degree of Bachelor in Music at the University of Oxford will commence on Tuesday, October 14, at 10 a.m., in the schools. In addition to the usual subjects there will be required a critical knowledge of the full scores of Handel's Oratorio "Judas Maccabæus" and Mendelssohn's "Otetto." Candidates are required to bring the scores with them. The examination for the degree of Doctor in Music will commence at the same time and place as the above. Each of the above examinations will occupy at least two days. Candidates whose exercises have been approved, and who propose to offer themselves for either of these examinations, are required to give in their names to Mr. George Parker, the clerk of the schools, on or before October 1, to pay the statutable fee of £2, and to exhibit their "Testamur" of having passed the previous examination.

THE Midsummer examinations of the College of Organists were held on the 8th, 9th, and 10th ult., the examiners being Dr. Bridge, Dr. C. J. Frost, Dr. F. E. Gladstone, Dr. G. C. Martin, Mr. J. Higgs, Mus. Bac., and Mr. Thomas Wingham. The following gentlemen satisfied the examiners for the A.C.O. diploma: A. Boyse, Brighton; G. C. Dawson, Aberdeen; E. DREWETT, Clapton; T. J. DUDENEY, Taunton; F. L. DUNKLEY, Wandsworth; W. E. ELLEN, Taunton; J. FIRTH, Shirley; J. F. FRICKER, Swansea; G. H. MORETON, Devonport; W. F. SCHWIER, Barnet; E. H. SMITH, Faversham; E. THORNLEY, Mottram; R. J. VOSPER, Clifton; J. WALSH, Uxbridge; and B. V. WESTBROOK, Lewisham; and the following for the F.C.O. diploma: R. BRYANT, Kennington; F. BUTLER, jun., Brighton; A. H. COLLIER, Mus. Bac., Elgin; C. E. MELVILLE, Leeds; A. W. PARSONS, Leicester; and R. F. TYLER, Tunbridge Wells.

ON St. John the Baptist's Day a special Choir Festival was held at St. John's Church, Angell Town, Brixton, on which occasion the Choir of the Church was considerably augmented. The music included Dr. Stainer's Evening Service in A, "Great is our Lord" (Sterndale Bennett), and "Sing a song of praise" (Stainer). The Rev. J. F. Green, of St. Mary's, Westminster, intoned the service, and the Rev. F. Relton, of St. Luke's, Chelsea, preached an eloquent and appropriate Sermon from the text "Let everything that hath breath, praise the Lord." Mr. W. J. Winbolt, Organist and Choirmaster of the Church, who had the entire management of the Festival, presided at the organ, and played as a concluding voluntary Salome's Grand Chœur in A.

It has been felt by many members of the musical profession that the services of Mr. James Peck, who, for more than forty years acted as chief clerk to the late Sacred Harmonic Society, should not be allowed to pass by unnoticed. An influential Committee, with Mr. Santley as Chairman and Mr. Lewis Thomas as Secretary, has therefore been formed for the purpose of raising a fund to be applied to Mr. Peck's benefit, and from the fact of his advanced age rendering it very difficult for him to engage in a new sphere of duties, and considering the valuable aid he rendered towards the success of the late Society's performances, it is hoped that a substantial sum may be forthcoming as the result of this appeal. Subscriptions may be sent to the Treasurer, Mr. Henry Littleton, 1, Berners Street, W., or to any member of the Committee.

THE Society of Science, Letters, and Art of London held its last meeting this season at Addison House, Kensington, on Tuesday evening, the 15th ult., Sir Henry V. Gould presiding. After the reading of a paper, and the admission of new members, music and elocution followed, the artists being Miss Margaret Gleizal, Miss Rhoda Rebstein, Signor Monari Rocca, Signor Falcioni, Mr. Edward Grime, Mr. William Buels, and Mr. W. T. Davies. Mr. Edmund Leathes gave an admirable recitation, and Professor Albert Lowe, L.Mus., contributed to the instrumental music, besides acting as conductor.

THE Kyrle Choir, under the direction of Mr. Albert Orme, gave a performance of "St. Paul," in St. Mark's Church, Walworth, on the 2nd ult. The soloists were Miss Aylward, Miss Kiero Noakes, Mr. Reginald Groome, and Mr. James Blackney. Mr. William Tate presided at the organ.

AN Organ Recital, in aid of the Hopkins Testimonial Fund, was given at St. John's the Evangelist, Waterloo Road, on the 15th ult., by Mr. Henry J. B. Dart. The programme consisted of Mendelssohn's Three Preludes and Fugues, and an interesting selection from the original organ works of Mr. E. J. Hopkins, including the Andante Grazioso composed for the opening of the Albert Hall organ. Mr. Dart, who displayed throughout a thorough command of his instrument, was especially happy in his rendering of Mr. Hopkins's refined and graceful music. Two vocal solos, "O House of Jacob" (Benedict) and "Be thou faithful" (Mendelssohn), were also very expressively sung by Mr. Charles James.

We have much pleasure in announcing that her Imperial Highness the Crown Princess of Germany has notified to Mr. A. C. Mackenzie her willing acceptance of the dedication of his Oratorio "The Rose of Sharon," written for, and to be performed at, the approaching Norwich Musical Festival. This appreciative recognition of the composer's talent is made still more graceful by her Highness's expression of a hope that she may some day hear the work either in England or on the Continent, a wish which we sincerely trust may be gratified.

THE Balloon Society of Great Britain gave its Annual Concert on Friday evening, the 27th June, at the Imperial Theatre, Westminster. There was a fashionable audience, and the varied programme was well rendered by the students and professors of the London Conservatoire of Music, under the direction of Mr. Lansdowne Cottell. The indefatigable president of the Society, Mr. W. H. Le Fevre, at the conclusion of the Concert, thanked all those who had so readily come forward to assist. Mr. J. W. Wilkinson acted as manager.

THE Dedication Festival of the Parish Church of St. Mary, Balham, took place on the 2nd ult., and on the following Sunday special sermons were preached, the service being sung to Bunnett in F on both occasions. Wesley's "Blessed be the God and Father" was the anthem, and the Hallelujah Chorus from the "Messiah" was sung during the offertory. Mr. H. W. Weston, Organist and Choirmaster, presided at the organ, and rendered valuable aid to the choir, which was augmented for the Festival.

THE Archbishop of Canterbury entertained the stewards of the recent Festival of the Sons of the Clergy a short time since, at Lambeth Palace. The service in the beautiful private chapel of the Palace preceded the dinner. On the feast of St. John the Baptist the Archbishop consecrated two new Bishops in the ancient Parish Church of Lambeth. The musical portion of both services was under the direction of Mr. Ernest Slater, F.C.O., R.A.M., who presided at the organ on each occasion.

THE prospectus of the Stockport Musical Society announces three Concerts, under the direction of Mr. Joseph Bradley, Mus. Bac., for the season 1884-5. At the first the programme will consist chiefly of orchestral works, and include several important compositions by Berlioz and Wagner; the second will be a Ballad Concert; and at the third Handel's Oratorio "Judas Maccabæus" will be performed, with orchestra, military band, and augmented chorus. The season commences in October next.

THE monthly Organ Recital at St. John's, Waterloo Road, was given on Tuesday evening, the 8th ult., by Mr. H. Walsley Little, Mus. Bac., Oxon., his programme including works by Berens, Merkel, Bach, Mendelssohn, Freyer, and Guilmant. The attendance was unfortunately not large. Mr. Frederick Winton contributed two bass solos with much success. Mr. Henry J. B. Dart was accompanist.

By the Italian papers we find that Mr. O. S. Marshall, Organist and Choirmaster, St. Paul's, Rome, has obtained the Diploma of Associate of Merit from the Royal Academy of S. Cecilia, Rome, which confers upon him the title of Professor. This diploma, which has never before been won by an Englishman, was obtained after a severe examination before eight special commissioners.

At a meeting of the Committee of the Costa Testimonial Fund, held at St. James's Hall, on the 28th ult., it was decided that the subscriptions should be returned.

AN Organ Recital was given at Christ Church, Somers Town, on Thursday evening, the 10th ult., by Mr. A. F. Grainger, Organist of St. Peter's Church, Dulwich, assisted by Mr. L. J. Langmead, vocalist, and Mr. A. Dove, violin. The programme was selected from the works of Handel, Wély, Hime, Gounod, Collin, Bach, Mendelssohn, and Clark.

THE Annual Examinations at the Blackheath Conservatoire of Music took place on June 28, July 1 and 5. The following candidates obtained scholarships: Singing, Miss S. G. Rollins, Miss Ada Pate, and Miss May Bath; Piano forte, Miss E. S. Gillespie and Miss A. Marten; Harmony, Miss H. Henderson. Examiners: Messrs. W. G. Cusins, Albert Visetti, and C. Warwick Jordan.

At SS. Peter and Paul's Roman Catholic Church, Upper Rosoman Street, Clerkenwell, on Sunday, June 29, the choir sang Haydn's First Mass in B flat, Zingarelli's "Laudate," and Handel's "Hallelujah," accompanied by full orchestra. Signor Santo Arrigoni conducted, and Mr. B. B. Barrett presided at the organ.

REVIEWS.

Novello's Primers of Musical Biography.
Frederic Chopin.—Hector Berlioz. By Joseph Bennett.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE idea of including biographies of eminent musical composers amongst the "Primers" issued by Messrs. Novello is an exceedingly happy one; for, as it tells us in the Prospectus of the Series, "Knowledge of what a man is, helps the understanding of what he does." It is also good that the execution of this task has been entrusted to Mr. Joseph Bennett, not only because he is eminently fitted for it, both in a literary and artistic sense, but because he is not likely to allow the biographies, even of his favourite composers, to degenerate into mere specimens of rhapsodical hero-worship. Perhaps no man has been more subject to this treatment than Frederic Chopin, his "Life" by Liszt being, as Mr. Bennett truly observes, an attempt to put the composer before us "as a psychological phenomenon." There was certainly very much in the poetical and sensitive temperament of Chopin to favour this idea; but facts are stubborn things, and unfortunately many of Liszt's assertions in support of his theory are directly contradicted by Karasowski in his well-known Biography of this artist, a book frequently quoted from in the work before us. No music ever more perfectly reflected the individuality of its composer than that of Chopin, and we can imagine that all real lovers of his works will like to become acquainted with his inner character. Mr. Bennett's book effectually supplies this want. It is certainly not a Rhapsody; but in proof that the author deeply sympathises with his subject we may quote his concluding words. "Chopin," he says, "was no Beethoven, to scale the highest height, and sound the deepest depth of music. He laboured within a small field, but he showed what infinite loveliness and charm may be found in the minute things of art as well as of nature."

Hector Berlioz is a name now familiar to us all, and yet only a few years ago his compositions were comparatively unknown. We had all heard something of a mad composer who wrote orchestral music which could not be understood, and there were not many who cared to inquire whether this was really true; but we have lately unearthed these treasures, and now begin to wonder how they could have so long remained buried. As a real exponent of the "music of the future" he should retain an exalted position in the history of the art, despite the more modern disciples of the school; and in Mr. Bennett's biography of this remarkable, but eccentric, artist, readers will plainly see a foreshadowing of that indomitable spirit which seemed to culminate in the person of the great musical reformer, Wagner. Unlike him, however, he did not live to see his theories seized upon by the writers of the time, nor even to find his own compositions accepted as representative works in art; and those who read the interesting and graphic description of his life-long struggle with fate, both artistically and socially, in the excellent work before us must indeed wonder that under such adverse circumstances he could produce so much. In conclusion, we sincerely hope that these "Primers of Musical Biography" will be continued at frequent intervals, so that the public may become as intimately acquainted with the lives of the great creative artists of the world as they are rapidly becoming with their works.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

MR. DANNREUTHER is well known and esteemed as a pianist, and the active part he took in the initial effort to obtain recognition for the genius of Richard Wagner—an effort crowned with complete success—will be in the memory of amateurs. But it cannot be said that he has afforded much opportunity for estimating his powers as a composer, and these volumes will be received with interest as proceeding from a musician whose sympathies are known to belong to the modern or advanced school. For his choice of subjects Mr. Dannreuther cannot fail to be highly commended. Some of the finest poetry may be quite unsuitable for musical illustration, but a composer who makes an unwise selection from an author of the highest rank is less to be blamed than he who degrades his art by associating it with doggerel. With regard to the present volumes, there is not likely to be serious disagreement as to the fitness of the lyrics for musical setting, but opinions may differ as to the abstract excellence of the music, in accordance with the liberal or conservative views of critics. Mr. Dannreuther has allowed himself considerable freedom in the arrangement of the words, crowding many syllables into one bar and allowing only two or three for another in the same composition. This frequently gives an effect of quasi-recitative which will probably offend those who prefer squareness and formality in the structure of a song; but it is quite in accordance with the spirit of modern verse, which differs as much from that of Byron or Moore as a Handelian air does from a Lied of Schumann or Brahms. Looking at the matter in a broad spirit, we find very much to praise in Mr. Dannreuther's songs. Of course they differ greatly in merit, according as the subject has inspired him or not. In the first named volume the most successful are "Two Red Roses across the Moon," a quaint setting in C minor, 6-8 time, of lines not remarkable for clearness of expression; and a most appropriate arrangement of the exquisite stanzas "Dawn talks to Day." This last is a fine song, suitable for tenor voice. In "Golden Guendolen" the constant changes of time produce an uneasy effect, and we fail to see how they help the stress and accent of the poetry. The first and second of the Rossetti songs, "Love-Lily" and "Plighted Promise," are both in the author's most sensuous and glowing manner, but the musical settings are unequal. In the former Mr. Dannreuther has adopted a simple and natural style and has written a very spirited song, slightly suggestive of Schumann perhaps, but none the worse for that. The other is laboured both in the voice part and accompaniment, but the words are difficult and scarcely suitable for public performance. Of the rest—four in number—we prefer "My Father's Close," a charming little ditty in the Schubertian vein. The rest are more ambitious and less successful, but one and all bear the impress of thought and fine musicianly feeling. The words of the "Two-part Songs" are selected from Shakespeare, Beaumont and Fletcher, and Morris. They are marked by the same qualities as the compositions for a single voice—namely, freedom in the phrasing, boldness in the transitions of key, and independence in the accompaniments. We cannot give the preference to any one of the five unless it be to the piquant duet from the Elizabethan dramatists. In loftiness of motive and execution these volumes are far removed from the ordinary stream of vocal effusions with which the market is flooded, and we may commend them to the attention of artists who do not fritter away their talents on royalty ballads. Concerts in London are suspended for a while, but at some of the classical entertainments next season a selection of Mr. Dannreuther's songs would unquestionably be a welcome feature.

A Concise Dictionary of Musical Terms. To which is prefixed an Introduction to the Elements of Music. By Frederick Niecks. [Augener and Co.]

It is not often that a Dictionary of Musical Terms includes an Exposition of the Rudiments of Music, yet not only is this supplied in the work before us, but rarely indeed have we met with a clearer explanation of the elements of the art in so limited a compass. Notes, Rests, Time, Accent, Concord and Discords, and even Form, are treated of; and in illustration of the last-named subject, the first movement of Mozart's well-known Sonata in C minor is given and analysed bar by bar. We could wish that the modern method of considering the relation of the major and minor scales had been insisted upon, so that the student may be taught to recognise the essential difference between their construction by commencing upon the same tonic, instead of upon that of what is still termed the relative minor. In thinking of the harmonies of the two scales we cannot be interested in knowing that "the original of the minor scale is the Æolian Church mode, as the Ionic, or Iastian, is that of the major," although, of course, it is necessary to be acquainted with this as a matter of history. Indeed, even to say that a major key and its relative minor have the same signature is not true; for, as our author himself shows on page 14, the major 7th of the minor scale might as well be at the signature, its occasional alteration to a minor 7th being the real accidental. We must award unqualified praise to the explanation of musical terms in the Dictionary, many, indeed, being brief articles upon the words, as, for example, "Organ," "Horn," "Trombone," and many others, which but for want of space we should be glad to quote. Some, however, we should like to see a little more extended, although this would of course involve an addition to the size of the book. As it stands, however, we may cordially commend the work as containing a vast amount of highly valuable information, and it will doubtless receive, as it deserves, a cordial recognition.

Album Leaves. Twenty Pianoforte Pieces. Composed by Robert Schumann (Op. 124). Edited and Fingered by Agnes Zimmermann. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THAT the small works of a great man are infinitely superior to the great works of a small man is amply proved in the little volume before us. Every composition in the selection is a mere trifle, and yet we cannot name one which is not a veritable gem. Schumann had evidently a special talent for throwing off Sketches sufficiently suggestive to receive some fanciful title; and although he has had many imitators, we can scarcely say that he has had any equals. From these "Album Leaves" we should find it extremely difficult to select one for praise beyond its companions; but we may mention that the lovely "Cradle Song" (Wiegenliedchen) (a perfect study for juvenile players who wish to acquire the art of singing a melody, accompanied with arpeggios for the same hand), and the well-known "Slumber-Song" (Schlummerlied) are contained in the book. Besides these, however, we have some less familiar, but no less charming, pieces, amongst which the "Presage of Sorrow" (Leides Ahnung), the "Flight of Fancy" (Phantasietanz), "Grief without End," (Leid ohne Ende), "A Message" (Botschaft), and the slow Canon, at the conclusion, will no doubt become great favourites with young pianists. The collection has been carefully edited by Miss Zimmermann; and we need scarcely say that her excellent fingering will prove of inestimable value to amateurs, especially in the "Cradle Song" and "Slumber Song," both of which pieces require the utmost caution in practice, although they are too often scampered through by ambitious but thoughtless little players.

Festive March in D and March in G. Composed by Henry Smart. Transcribed for the Pianoforte by Berthold Tours. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

GOOD Marches are not only always acceptable to a mixed audience, but they are excellent practice—if as carefully transcribed as the two before us—for young pianists. As they bear the name of Henry Smart, it need scarcely be said that they fulfil both the merits we have named, and are also intrinsically most attractive. The Festive March will no doubt be an especial favourite, the bright and joyous subject with which it opens being well contrasted with subordinate themes, which are always melodious and in excellent sympathy with the character of the composition. The March in G is more bold and martial, the second subject in the subdominant giving just the repose necessary before the re-introduction of the original theme. Both these compositions will doubtless speedily become as popular as they deserve to be; and those in search of novelty will, we are certain, thank us for drawing attention to their publication for our household instrument.

Church Music in the Metropolis. By Charles Box.
[W. Reeves.]

It is not altogether easy to grasp the purpose of the author in giving this volume to the world. He says that he desires "to correct the many absurd misstatements respecting the real condition of music in our churches now"; but he does not tell us what are the misstatements to which he refers. We believe it is generally admitted that a vast improvement has taken place in the musical rendering of the Church of England services in the Metropolis and elsewhere within the last few years. Apparently Mr. Box does not wish to disprove this, but after carefully reading his book we cannot say that it tells us anything but what was perfectly well known before to all interested in the subject. The opening chapters on Church music generally are loosely put together, and contain very little information with a great deal of verbiage. The most interesting section is that on the City churches, all of which Mr. Box has visited, and the services of which he describes and criticises. In some cases we do not think his remarks are calculated to afford lively satisfaction to those interested in the maintenance of these fabrics. Excluding the padding, however, there is little but what is conveyed more clearly in Mackeson's Guide.

Sechs Liebeslieder von Heine. (English translation by Charles Hervey.) Componirt von Arthur Hervey.
Der Erste Kuss. Song. Poetry by Von Redwitz. Music by Arthur Hervey.
Parted. Song, with Violin accompaniment. Words by Mrs. Hume Webster. Music by Arthur Hervey.
Chanson d'Etoiles. Song. Poetry by Armand Silvestre. Music by Arthur Hervey.
[Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.]

THE composer of the above works is one of the most thoughtful and refined of those among our native musicians who devote themselves to songs. A glance serves to show that his method is largely influenced by contemporary German writers, but he adheres to the greater simplicity of the typical English song in a measure sufficient for a happy blending of excellencies, such as cannot fail to meet with wide approval. The six love-songs from Heine show Mr. Hervey at his best, with the exception, perhaps, of No. 1, "Die Trostlosen," the music of which is more ambitious in aim than successful in expression. For this "Winter Abend" makes ample amend, as do "Liebeserkentniss" and "Warum"—examples of artistic taste and musicianly skill complete within the narrow limits imposed by the nature of the work. We do not hesitate to recommend the "Sechs Liebeslieder" as songs eminently satisfying where something out of and above the common order is desired. Mr. Charles Hervey has fairly succeeded in the delicate task of rendering Heine into poetical English, though here and there the accent of verse and music are not in just accord. "Der Erste Kuss" is quite German in spirit and method, and a very good specimen to boot, the accompaniment not being over-loaded with detail, while sufficiently characteristic and suggestive. In "Parted" the composer has adopted a model more approximately English, and has written in graceful fashion for the violin as well as the voice. Obviously he tries hard to avoid common-place, sometimes going dangerously near the limit beyond which the searcher after novelty may not safely pass. For the most part, however, Mr. Hervey avoids solecism and eccentricity. The "Chanson d'Etoiles" strikes us as less effective than its companions, but here also we must recognise the author as one who writes with thought and a more than ordinary purpose.

Pictures of Youth. Twelve Progressive and Melodious Pieces for the Pianoforte. By Heinrich Lichner.
[Edwin Ashdown.]

ONE of the most healthy signs of the times is the abolition of the conventional "Instruction Book" for juvenile students of the pianoforte and the substitution of well-written Primers, in which the elementary principles of music are explained, and pianists are gradually led to easy pieces, in place of those arrangements of common-place airs which in former days children were kept at even for years. There can be no possible reason why simple and original music should not be written for young players, so that they may be made to feel that composers take a real interest in their progress; and since the pattern of these trifles has been set by Schumann and other German writers, there can be little doubt that the supply will always keep pace with the demand. The twelve little Sketches before us are excellent examples of such pieces, and we cordially commend them to the notice of teachers. They are all good, but we feel pretty certain that the following will be the especial favourites:—No. 1, "A Morning Prayer" (we give the English titles); No. 3, "March"; No. 4, "In the Playground," a joyous piece, admirably suggestive of holiday moments; No. 7, "Minuet," which contains an effective change of key; No. 10, "Joy and happiness," a flowing and graceful melody, simply harmonised; and No. 12, "Nocturne," a really attractive specimen of a style of writing which has obtained much favour in the present day, although it would be difficult to say what is really meant by the title. In the whole of the compositions under notice care is taken that the hand of the performer shall be neither unduly extended nor cramped. Effect is gained by simple means, and if well played the pieces cannot fail to give pleasure to all listeners.

Prize Day. A Cantata for Ladies' voices. Written by Jessie Moir. Composed by Charles Marshall.
[Robert Cocks & Co.]

"In accordance with an annual custom," we are told in a prefatory note to this composition, "the Kaiser's Prize is to be competed for. Ida and Dorothea, chosen as the most advanced from a number of students, are so equally successful that each obtains a prize, and is duly crowned with flowers, according to an old Greek tradition which has become identified with this ceremony." It may readily be imagined that the music to colour so simple a subject would be appropriately unpretentious; yet we cannot but think that Mr. Marshall has scarcely shown sufficient artistic workmanship either in the voice parts or accompaniments, to raise his Cantata beyond the ordinary level. The instrumental introduction is extremely feeble; and the opening chorus, although containing one or two figures in the pianoforte part, is accompanied chiefly with the conventional arpeggios. The Chorus, "Joyful news," and Duet, "Come, sister, come," are about the best numbers in the Cantata; but the contralto solo, "Farewell to summer," were it not for the eccentric symphony at the commencement, is also deserving of praise. The voice parts are generally well written and easy to sing; and were the composition to be got up in a drawing-room, we have little doubt that the critics who judge it would scarcely endorse our opinion upon its merits; for where a good effect can be gained with but little expenditure of trouble the end is generally considered to justify the means.

Primrose Lane. Song. Words by Mary L. Campbell.
The Ev'ning Rest. Song. Words by Edith Ramage.
What care I for the weather. Song. Words by M. A. Baines.

Composed by James J. Monk.
[J. B. Cramer and Co.]

WE have selected three from a group of seven songs by this prolific composer, because they very fairly represent both the style and merit of his contribution to the store of modern vocal music. We presume that the wave of musical education now rapidly spreading over England has still left a sufficient number of young ladies untouched to purchase such harmless effusions as "Primrose Lane" and "The Ev'ning Rest," and we can, therefore, cast no blame upon publishers for issuing them. The last song on our list, however, seems to show that Mr. Monk has something to learn when he passes from the tonic and dominant harmonies of related keys and wanders into more dangerous regions. We, at least, cannot reconcile ourselves to the effect of such consecutive keys as occur on pages four and five of the last-mentioned song, nor to the two fifths between bars four and five, page three (melody and bass).

Sonata, in G. For the Pianoforte. By Domenico Scarlatti. Marked and fingered by Florence May. [Lamborn Cock—Hutchings and Romer.]

EDITORS are conferring a real benefit upon musical art when they enter a protest against the inanities of the day by resuscitating such music as this for the use of young musical students. The Sonatina, of only one movement, looks like a child's lesson upon opening it; but the smallest works of the great writers for the pianoforte are composed for two trained hands; and when we consider the rarity of finding even one hand of a juvenile player duly prepared for what may be termed "contrapuntal" works, it is almost needless to affirm that there are few children who will call this Sonatina "easy." Let us say, however, that we cordially recommend it to the attention both of teachers and pupils.

When daylight sets. Song. The words by Thomas Moore. Music by Greg Lonasil. [Boosey and Co.]

THE pianoforte portion of this song shows an ambition on the part of the composer which perhaps the vocalist may somewhat regret. We can understand an independent obbligato for the instrument; but when, as a rule, the pianist meekly maintains his place as an accompanist, and then suddenly rushes away with a brilliant passage or two on his own account, the effect is somewhat incongruous. With a sympathetic player, however, a good singer may perhaps make the composition please.

Gavotte, in C major, by Geminiani. Arranged for the Piano by Charles Hallé. [Forsyth Brothers.]

THE demand for Gavottes, both of the past and present day, seems rather to increase than diminish; and we are glad, therefore, to find that the best specimens of the old school are placed before the public, either as they were originally written, or transcribed by competent hands. Geminiani's spirited Gavotte is issued in a form so attractive by Mr. Charles Hallé as to ensure it a cordial welcome; and we earnestly recommend it to the attention of pianists and teachers.

Two Pictures. Drawn, musically painted, and dedicated to Miss Tiny White, by Percy G. Mocatta. [W. Morley and Co.]

ONLY one of these "Pictures" has reached us; but we presume that, both in design and execution, the other closely resembles its companion. The affectation of the title-page is carried throughout the music of the song, which, with its restless tonality, is irritating to a musical ear. Much feeling for the expression of words, however, is shown in the composition, and we shall be glad again to welcome Mr. Mocatta when he ceases to "paint" and begins to compose.

Hosanna! Anthem. By W. Spark, Mus. Doc. Hear my Prayer, Praise ye the Lord, Come unto Me, and Though your sins be as scarlet.

Anthems. By Rowland Briant. [London Music Publishing Company.]

DR. SPARK'S anthem is evidently intended for amateur choirs of modest acquirements. The part-writing is simplicity itself and the harmonies diatonic to a fault. The style is that of the latter part of the eighteenth century. Mr. Briant's examples are for voices in unison, but the composer has preserved a dignified and church-like manner, and he writes with considerable musicianly feeling.

The Lebanon March. Composed by W. Smallwood. Arranged for the Organ by Dr. Westbrook. [Robert Cocks and Co.]

THIS is a transcription, presumably of a pianoforte piece, the composer being favourably known by reason of his simple and pleasing elementary music for the instrument of the household. The present piece is bright and melodious without being flippant or vulgar, and it is therefore well suited to the organ. The significance of the title, however, is hard to decipher.

FOREIGN NOTES.

THE Allgemeine Deutsche Musik Zeitung suggests that, with the double commemoration of the bi-centenaries of Bach and Handel, to be celebrated next year, a third might justly be combined—viz., that of the ter-centenary of the birth of Heinrich Schütz, who was born at Kostritz (Saxony) in the year 1585. The idea of the journal referred to appears to us a very happy one. Schütz has abundant claims to be thus associated, by an historical coincidence, with the two great German masters of the past century to whose memory it is proposed to render signal homage. Heinrich Schütz was, in a measure, the precursor both of Handel and of Bach. The fact of his having been the first to compose a German opera (or rather an opera to German words, written in the Italian style of the period, and produced in 1627) connects him, if somewhat loosely, with Handel's earlier operatic (Hamburg) career, while there can be no question as to the influence exercised upon the oratorios of Johann Sebastian Bach by similar works of his predecessor, Schütz. The opportunities thus offered of placing in juxtaposition the most mature works of the three German masters, under the auspices of festive gatherings, will, unless we are much mistaken, not be neglected by our German neighbours; and with a judiciously selected programme the coming celebrations should prove unusually attractive from a musico-historical point of view.

On the first of last month a hundred years had elapsed since the death of Wilhelm Friedemann Bach, the eldest and, perhaps, most gifted of the eleven sons of the great Leipzig cantor. Wilhelm Friedemann was a masterly organist, and his compositions, both sacred and secular, bear witness to his having inherited a full share of the stupendous musical gifts possessed by the father. But, unlike some of his more successful younger brothers, he was an unhappy man, leading an irregular life, and he died in poverty at Berlin, on July 1, 1784.

This year's "Parsifal" performances at Bayreuth, which commenced on the 21st ult., under the presidency of the veteran, Franz Liszt, the staunch supporter of Wagner at a time when that redoubtable reformer appeared to have the entire musical world against him, are likely to yield very satisfactory results, both artistically and financially. Among the chief interpreters of the noble work we may mention Frau Materna, Fräulein Malten, Herren Scaria, Gudehus, and Winkelmann. In the part of Klingsor a new representative, Herr Blank, of Mannheim, will alternate with Herr Fuchs, whose interpretation of the rôle of the magician is already known from previous performances. The applications for tickets for the "Festspiel," which will be continued this year until the 8th inst., have been very numerous.

It is said that an offer of over one million francs has lately been made to the heirs of Richard Wagner for the right of performance, in any part of the United States of America, of the master's last music-drama, "Parsifal," and that this tempting offer has been refused on the part of the representative of the Wagner family. "Parsifal," as an entire stage-performance, is to be reserved, in accordance with the original intentions of its author, to the annual representations at Bayreuth.

A copyright treaty is about to be concluded between Germany and Holland; no such arrangement having hitherto existed between the two countries. It is obvious that this curiously anomalous state of things has greatly tended to the advantage of the Dutch publishers and theatrical managers, not a few of whom have been in the habit of making a very free and hitherto unchecked use of the literary and artistic productions of their German neighbours.

The Royal Opera House of Berlin closed its doors for the summer vacation some weeks ago, but will resume its activity on the 15th of the present month. As regards the past season, it is interesting to refer to the répertoire of a leading operatic institution like the one in question, a resumé of which is furnished in the Allgemeine Deutsche Musik Zeitung, of Berlin. According to this reliable journal, the only novelties produced by the Royal Opera of the German capital have been Lortzing's "Undine," Bronsart's "Jery und Bätely," and Wagner's "Walküre," all three, as will be seen, novelties only at the particular institution in question. On the other hand the catholic, and to some extent commendable impartiality, characteristic of the German Hof-Theater generally, has been maintained at Berlin, in the production of a variety of operatic works, irrespective of nationality, such as Bizet's "Carmen" (sixteen times), Gounod's "Faust" and "Romeo and Juliet," Thomas's "Mignon," Verdi's "Aida"; together with a multitude of other works of various styles and ages which, however interesting and instructive to the musical student, would seem to be altogether beyond the reach of, say, a London impresario. Thus Wagner was represented by forty-six performances, Mozart by thirty-one, Lortzing by twenty-nine, Bizet by sixteen, Meyerbeer by fifteen, Weber by thirteen, Verdi by twelve, Gounod and Auber by eleven, Beethoven (with his one opera) by eight, Gluck by seven, and so on. There is some complaint being made as regards the administration of this particular state-subventioned institution in Germany, but, at any rate, no fault can be found with it in respect to the cosmopolitan character of its répertoire.

The first novelty to be produced during next season at the Berlin Opera will be an operatic work entitled "Hero," by Herr Ernst Frank, a composer who has already acquired some reputation by his able completion of the score of Hermann Goetz's posthumous Opera "Francesca da Rimini."

The project of establishing a second permanent Opera-house at Berlin is gaining ground in musical circles at that capital. The contemplated institution is to be called the "Lortzing-Theater" and, as the name implies, is to be devoted to comic opera of national origin, or "Volk-soper," whereof, by straining a point or two, Lortzing may perhaps be considered the chief representative. We shall be very glad if this project be successfully realised, persuaded as we are that the development of the modern music-drama, in any form whatsoever, can only be hoped for by the active sympathy therewith and the intelligent appreciation thereof on the part of the people, so called, as distinguished from our fashionable opera-goers.

A new oratorio by Philipp Scharwenka, entitled "Sakuntala," is to be performed for the first time at Berlin in October next.

An example worthy of imitation in the matter of encouraging executive musical art has lately been afforded by the proprietors of the eminent pianoforte manufacturing firms of E. Kaps, of Dresden, and J. Blüthner, of Leipzig, each of whom have instituted an annual prize of a grand pianoforte of their manufacture to be awarded by the professors of the local Conservatoires to their most deserving pupils. Fräulein Mansch, a native of Dresden, has gained the substantial distinction for the present year at Dresden, and the Leipzig prize was awarded to Herr Lorenz. "Pianoforte manufacturers please copy."

Johannes Brahms has accepted an invitation on the part of the Società del Quartetto, of Milan, to participate in a series of Concerts, to be given by that institution in April next, in his capacity of composer, conductor, and pianist. Brahms is said, during his recent stay at the Villa Carlotta, by the Lake of Como, to have completed the sketches for his forthcoming Fourth Symphony.

The municipal authorities of Cologne have granted an annual pension of 3,000 marks to Dr. Ferdinand Hiller upon his retirement from his public posts, as a mark of their appreciation of the veteran musician's eminent services in the cause of the art cultivation of their town.

Herr Eugen Gura, one of the most justly appreciated artists of the German Opera Company at Drury Lane, two years ago, has been definitely engaged as a member of the Munich Hof-Theater. Herr Gura's personation of Hans Sachs, in Wagner's "Die Meistersinger," will not be easily forgotten by the admirers of Wagnerian art in this country.

Joachim Raff, the prolific and meritorious German composer, and late Director of the Hoch'sche Conservatorium at Frankfurt, is to have his statue erected in that town during the current year.

The Imperial Opera at Vienna re-opened its doors on the 16th ult. with Gounod's "Faust," which was to be succeeded by Meyerbeer's "Les Huguenots" and Verdi's "Aida."

A long forgotten Opera by Halévy, "Le Guittarero," brought out by the Opéra Comique de Paris in 1841, and laid aside, after a successful run of some sixty performances, has been revived at the Hof-Theater of Brunswick, where it met with a good reception.

On the 14th ult., the national fête day in France, gratuitous performances were given, in accordance with the annual custom, by the Paris theatres, which were, as usual on such occasions, closely filled by audiences consisting chiefly of the humbler and humblest classes. At the Grand Opéra "La Favorita" was the Opera selected for the day, followed (at the special request, it is said, of the municipal authorities) by a ballet, that of "Coppélia." This was the first time a ballet had been introduced at these fête performances, and the innovation does not appear to have been much appreciated by le peuple. Two very old favourites, "Le Postillon de Lonjumeau" and "La Fille du Régiment," formed the entertainment provided by the Opéra Comique. Both works were greatly relished by the holiday-making assemblage, having evidently lost, as yet, none of their former popularity in certain quarters. At each house the singing of the "Marseillaise" was introduced during the performance; more happily and appropriately, as far as stage effect was concerned, in "La Fille du Régiment," at the Comique, where the national hymn—sung by M. Mouliérat—was "frantically" redemanded.

A one-act operetta by M. Georges Pfeiffer, entitled "l'Enclume," (the libretto by M. Pierre Barbier) was recently brought out by the Paris Opéra Comique and was very favourable received, both on the part of the public and the press, the operatic critic of Le Ménestrel referring to it as a "charmante production." This unqualified success should encourage M. Pfeiffer to undertake a work of more ambitious proportions.

It is said that the famous Concerts Populaires, from the leadership of which M. Pasdeloup, their originator, has recently retired, will be carried on under the auspices of M. B. Godard, the well-known Paris musician.

Hector Berlioz, who was accorded little substantial encouragement, and less outward appreciation of his works at the hands of his countrymen during his lifetime, is to have a statue erected to his memory in the Vintimille Square, at Paris, near his former residence. M. Alfred Leloir, a young artist, has been entrusted with the execution of the work.

Under the title of "L'Œuvre Dramatique d'Héctor Berlioz," a critical essay on the works of the composer of "La Damnation de Faust" has just been issued by Calman-Lévy, of Paris, from the pen of M. Alfred Ernst, a name as yet unknown in musical literature.

The centenary of the death of Giambattista Martini, known to musical history as the Padre Martini, is to be festively commemorated on October 4 next, at Bologna, where likewise the second congress of Italian musicians will be held at the same time. Martini, the famous Franciscan friar, and founder of a celebrated music school, died at Bologna, his native town, on October 4, 1784.

The municipality of Bari, in Italy, has, according to the Gazetta Musicale di Milano, unanimously voted the necessary funds for erecting a monument to Nicolo Piccini, the famous rival of Gluck at Paris, and the head of a faction representing art principles which, however, did not prove victorious. Piccini was born at Bari in 1728, and died, poverty-stricken, at Passy (near Paris) in the year 1800.

A curious instance of the occasional difference between the proverbial vox populi and the verdict of a select few has been lately furnished at Milan. The well-known music-publisher, Sonzogno, of that town had generously placed at the disposal of an appointed jury the sum of 2,000 lire to be awarded to the most meritorious operatic work submitted to them. The decision was given in favour of an Opera "Anna e Gualberto," by Luigi Mapelli, while a second prize (likewise provided for by Sonzogno) was awarded to A. Zuelli for his Opera "La fata del Nord," both works having been previously produced at the Theatre Manzoni. At the same theatre, however, one of the rejected operas, entitled "Willis," by Giacomo Puccini, was, by means of private influence, subsequently produced, and obtained a measure of success genuine enough to place the two works approved of by the jury entirely in the shade. The composer of this popularly-favoured new opera is at present still a pupil of the Milan conservatorio, and his style is, to some extent, influenced ("sicklied o'er," as some would call it) by the works of Richard Wagner, the scenes of the legendary subject of his opera being, moreover, laid in the Black Forest of Germany.

We extract the following from the Daily Telegraph of the 23rd ult.:—"Our Paris correspondent informs us that the grandson of the celebrated composer, Bellini, has just committed suicide at Nice. He threw himself out of a window on the fourth storey of the Hospital St. Roch, where he was a patient. The unfortunate man had suffered severe reverses of fortune. In his youth he was destined for the bar, and had actually made some progress with his legal studies when the poverty of his family obliged him to give up all hope of entering the profession he had chosen. He afterwards became a shoemaker."

At Paris died on the 5th ult. Victor Massé, the well-known French composer, aged sixty-two. See also our "Obituary" column in the present number.

Le Ménestrel announces the death last month, at Saint-Germain-en-Laye, of Madame Halévy, the widow of the composer of "La Juive" and "L'Eclair." The deceased lady possessed a considerable talent for sculpture, and the bust of her husband, placed in the foyer of the Paris Opéra Comique, is her work. Her youngest daughter, Geneviève, is the widow of the composer of "Carmen," Georges Bizet.

CORRESPONDENCE.

RIEMANN'S "OPERN-HANDBUCH."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—When you remark in your notice of Riemann's "Opern-Handbuch" (p. 414) that "no work of a similar scope has hitherto been attempted in any language" you have apparently forgotten F. Clément's very comprehensive "Dictionnaire Lyrique," 1870, with four supplements. It contains, however, many errors. Clément does not name Paolo Rolli, nor indeed do I find "Arsace" in the list of operas by that composer, given by Hawkins (ed. 1853, II. 869). "Astartus" is in this list, but is not noticed by Clément, who, however, quotes an "Astarte" (words by Zeno, music by Buononcini) as produced in London in 1720. Clément records Clayton's "Arsinoe," but erroneously dates it "vers 1685." Your date, 1707, is, I presume, copied from Hawkins, but Hogarth, in his "History of the Opera," gives the date of first performance as January 16, 1705, which is probably old style, or 1706 according to present reckoning. The anachronism in the case of "Claudine" occurs also in Clément, so that either Riemann merely copied the "Dictionnaire Lyrique," or the error in both has a common origin. If the latter be the case, the mistake may have arisen from attributing to Gottfried the work of some other Weber, but it is strange that Dr. Riemann should not have noticed that the theorist of Darmstadt could not have been the composer of an opera produced in 1783. I may add that Clément quotes seven other settings of "Claudine de Villa-bella."

July 22, 1884. G. A. C.

[Although, as our correspondent points out, allusion might certainly have been made to the existing Dictionnaire Lyrique, the "scope" of Dr. Riemann's "Handbuch" is at once a wider and a narrower one than that of the compilation of the industrious Félix Clément. The latter is encumbered by an incongruous mass of critical observations, suited to the author's taste (vide the space devoted to "Fidelio"—one column; and to, for instance, "Rigoletto"—four columns), a temptation which, with a few trifling exceptions, Riemann altogether resists. The

"Handbuch," on the other hand, includes melodramas, vaudevilles, ballets, and "masques," which, unquestionably, form a very formidable item in its "scope," and which, with a few prominent exceptions, are entirely excluded from the plan upon which M. Clément's work is constructed. Whether Dr. Riemann's "Handbuch" (whereof only two parts have as yet appeared) will, in the result, justify our anticipations is, of course, quite another matter.—The writer of the Review.]

EFFECT OF GAS ON CHURCH ORGANS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—In the Musical Standard of December, 1881, I proposed to screen off the whole interior of the organ with thin calico, or anything that would prevent access of hot air to the pipes. Of course, the bellows must draw from a cellar or from the outer air or the flue pipes will run up beyond the reeds. I do not see how wire gauze could keep the hot air out, and even calico could not be put outside the show pipes. The only way of keeping the air in the front pipes cool would seem to be by allowing a small flow of cold air through each pipe, and this would be very clumsy and might cause whistling.

Yours faithfully,

JAMES SWINBURNE.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

CHELMSFORD.—An Organ Recital was given by Mr. F. R. Frye, F.C.O., at St. Mary's Church, on Wednesday evening, the 16th ult. A large congregation was present, and much appreciated the programme, which was excellently selected and admirably performed.

DUBLIN.—The performance of Mr. Frank Bates's "Acts," for the degree of Doctor in Music, took place on June 21, in the Examination Hall of Trinity College, when portions of his Oratorio Samuel were performed, with a full band, under the direction of the candidate. The degree of Mus. Doc. was conferred upon Mr. Bates on the 26th ult.

—The Carysfort Choral Society gave a miscellaneous Concert in the Town Hall, Blackrock, on Monday, the 17th ult., which was highly successful. The first part was sacred, the vocalists being Mr. Crutchett, Mr. Isaac Varian, and Mr. Alex. Varian. In the second part the pianoforte solo of Miss Williams deserved the encore it obtained, as did also Mrs. Krall's rendering of Berthold Tours's song "The Angel at the window," the last part of which was repeated. The violin playing of Mr. Scott-Byrne was a feature of the evening, and Mr. Dickinson's fine voice was heard to advantage in "The Diver." Madame Flavell's solos were also warmly applauded and encored. The part-music, accompanied by Miss Patterson, consisted of two sacred and two secular pieces, Mendelssohn's "But the Lord is mindful" (arranged by Lohr), "O give thanks" (Jackson), Sir A. Sullivan's "Evening," and "A spring song" (Pinsuti), all of which were effectively given, and well received. Mr. Charles Krall, under whose direction the Society was formed, was the Conductor, and is to be congratulated on the result of the Concert.

DUNGANNON.—The Twelfth Annual Festival of the South Tyrone Church Choral Union was held in the Parish Church of Drumglass, on June 24. Several choirs took part in the rendering of the music, and there was a number of the clergy present. The anthem was "Ye shall dwell in the land" (Dr. Stainer). The whole of the music was excellently given, much credit being due to the Rev. T. M. Benson for his efficient conducting, and to Miss Kate Moon for the able manner in which she presided at the organ. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. Chadwick.

EASTBOURNE.—An Organ Recital was given by Dr. Sangster, at St. Saviour's Church, on Wednesday, the 16th ult. The programme, which was selected from the works of the great masters, was excellently rendered, and much appreciated. The Recital was given with the special object of assisting in the removal of the debt in connection with the new organ.

HERNE BAY.—Mr. E. A. Cruttenden, Organist of the Parish Church, gave a successful Concert in the Town Hall on Thursday, the 17th ult. The artists were Miss Alice Parry, Miss Jeanie Rosse, Mr. G. Gardner Leader, Mr. Claude Cecil Wilton, Miss Helen Rees (violin), Miss Nellie Hollands, Miss Emily Foreman, Miss M. Gray, and Mr. Cruttenden (pianoforte). All the vocalists were highly successful, several being even twice recalled. Especial praise must be awarded to Miss Foreman for her excellent playing of Chopin's Valse in A flat, which was encored. Mr. Cruttenden's praiseworthy efforts to advance the cause of music in Herne Bay do not always meet with the success they deserve, but on this occasion his audience was both numerous and appreciative.

HOLSWORTHY.—On Thursday, the 3rd ult., the organ at the Parish Church was opened, after having been enlarged and improved by Messrs. Hele and Co., Plymouth. There were two short services at 3 and 7.30 p.m., after each of which Mr. W. H. Richmond, Organist of St. Michael and All Angels', Exeter, gave a Recital, the programmes of which were highly interesting. The organ has three complete manuals and forty-one stops, five of which are on the pedal organ.

LANCASTER.—A very successful Organ Recital was given in the Independent Chapel, on Thursday, the 10th ult., by Mr. William Stuart, Organist and Choirmaster. The selection comprised compositions by Batiata, Smart, Hermann, Suppé, Field, Marks and Dr. Brown. The vocal portion of the programme was contributed by Miss Smith, Miss Towers, and Mr. Meadowcroft.

LANERCOST.—The triennial Festival of the Choirs of the parishes of Brampton Deanery was held, on June 27, at Lanercost Abbey. The choir was conducted by Mr. Willey, Organist of Brampton Church and Precursor of the Association, who had worked hard and most successfully in training the voices for the Festival. The service was commenced as soon as the clergymen had reached the chancel, the seats on each side of which they filled, the vicar of Lanercost giving out the Hymn, as a preliminary, "The roseate hues of early dawn," which the choir sang with excellent effect. Mr. Willey keeping the voices well together. After this hymn had been sung the service was proceeded with. The first part of it was intoned by the Rev. T. H. Irving and the second part was read by the Rev. James Lamb. The music sung by the choir included the Chant by P. Humphreys to the 10th Psalm, which was well rendered, and in addition to the Magnificat and the Nunc dimittis, the Anthem from the first verses of the 122nd Psalm, the music being that of Sir George Elvey, which was given in an effective manner. The Hymn, "Come unto me, ye weary," having been sung, the Dean of Manchester preached an appropriate Sermon from the 23rd verse of the 50th Psalm, after which the concluding Hymn was sung—"The strain uprising of joy and praise." As the people left the church Mr. Rooks played the concluding movement of the first Sonata of Mendelssohn. The Dean of Manchester, who had taken part in the singing, personally congratulated Mr. Willey upon the success of the Festival, and upon the efficient manner in which the choir had sung the music selected for the occasion.

LAPFORD.—An interesting Choral Evensong Service was held in the Parish Church, on the 14th ult., before a large and devout congregation. The services were rendered by a special choir consisting of several of the Vicars-Choral from Exeter Cathedral, assisted by the choir-boys of St. Michael and All Angels' Church, Exeter. The soloists were Mr. E. Northway, Mr. J. B. Browning, and Mr. F. Dixon; precursor, the Rev. H. D. Acland. Mr. W. H. Richmond, Organist of St. Michael and All Angels', presided at the organ and played as the opening voluntary "Andante Religioso and Allegretto" from the Fourth Organ Sonata by Mendelssohn. The choir then marched in procession, singing "Onward, Christian Soldiers," and the setting of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in F, by Tours, was capitally rendered by the choir. The first anthem, "Ascribe unto the Lord" (Travers), was sung with marked precision and expression. Before the sermon the hymn "All people that on earth do dwell," was sung, and during the offertory Mr. Richmond played the Austrian National Anthem (Haydn) with variations. After the sermon the solo "O rest in the Lord" (Mendelssohn) and the chorus "I will lay me down in peace" (W. H. Richmond) were given, the solo being sung by Mr. Northway with great delicacy and expression. The concluding voluntaries were "Triumphal March in C" (W. H. Richmond) and "Carillon de Dunkerque" (Thomas Carter).

SHERBORNE.—The fine organ in the Schoolroom—erected by subscription amongst the Governors and Masters of the School, the past and present members of the School Musical Society and their friends—was opened on Wednesday evening, June 25, by Mr. Thomas Wingham, R.A.M., who displayed the salient qualities of the instrument to the utmost advantage. A Concert, under the direction of Mr. Louis N. Parker was also given, the programme of which was excellently chosen and well performed throughout.

SPALDING.—A new organ, erected by P. Conacher and Co., Huddersfield, at a cost of nearly £400, was opened on Wednesday, the 23rd ult., at the Free Methodist Chapel. In the evening a Recital was given by Mr. James Price, Organist of St. Margaret's Church, Ipswich. The organ contains two manuals and a pedal organ, and has over 1,000 pipes. The great organ has eight stops, the swell nine stops, and the pedal two.

STAFFORD.—The organ, which has been subscribed for as a memorial to the late Dr. Hewson, Medical Superintendent of the Cotton Hill Institution, was opened by the Organist, Mr. W. A. Marson, at the morning service on Sunday, June 29. The service, which was full choral, commenced with the dedicatory prayers used at the Festival Services at Lichfield Cathedral, on the occasion of the dedication of the new organ and west front. The Antiphon, composed by Mr. J. B. Lott, Mus. Bac., Organist of Lichfield Cathedral, was then sung with much expression by the members of the chapel choir. The special Psalms were taken as follows:—98th, to Crouch in C; 149th to Norris in G; 150th, the Grand Chant in C. Special Lessons were used on this occasion. The Te Deum Laudamus was sung to the well known and popular Chant of Shaergol in B flat, with the change of W. A. Marson in E flat; and the tubilate to Hand in G. The Responses were Tallia's. The first Hymn was 4th, and was followed by the Communion Service. The Kyrie was Goss in G, and the Zoology W. A. Marson in F. The Hymn, "The strain uprising of joy and praise," was then sung; and at the conclusion of the service Mr. Marson played as a voluntary "The Marvelous Work" from The Creation, and also a selection of pieces, concluding with "The Hallelujah Chorus." The choir, mainly composed of attendants of the Cotton Hill staff, under the able conductorship of Mrs. Hewson, is deserving of the highest praise. On the following day the opening ceremony was continued, when the powers of the new instrument, which reflects the utmost credit on the builders—Messrs. Nicholson and Lord, of Walsall—were effectively displayed by Mr. E. W. Taylor, Mus. Doc., Oxon., Organist of St. Mary's.

TULLAMORE.—The fourth Annual Festival of the Meath Diocesan Choral Union was held in St. Catherine's Church, on Wednesday, June 25. About twelve choirs took part in the service, the voices numbering more than 200. The service was opened by the singing of the hymn "Praise my soul the King of heaven," as the procession of clergy walked up the aisle. The musical portion of the service, including Dykes's Te Deum and Benedictus, and the chorus "Lift up your heads" from the Messiah, was rendered in a manner reflecting the greatest credit on Mr. Arthur Smith, Organist of St. Catherine's Church, to whom the training of the choirs was entrusted. Mr. Smith also presided at the organ, and during the offertory played Batiata's Grande Offertoire in D minor, and, as a concluding voluntary, Rial's Postlude in A flat.

TUNBRIDGE WELLS.—The District Festival of the Canterbury Diocesan Choral Union took place at St. James's Church on the 23rd ult. The choir present numbered 300 voices, and the music, which was excellently rendered, included Dr. Bunnett's setting of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, and Sir Frederick Onseley's Anthem "O praise the Lord with me." The Rev. F. H. Hichens conducted. Mr. F. C. Hunnibell presided at the organ, and also played several voluntaries of his own composition, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. Canon Burrows. The church was crowded.

WARWICK.—The members of the Musical Society gave a Concert at the Court House, on June 26, when Stainer's Daughter of Jairus and Haydn's Spring were performed. The solo vocalists were Miss Hefftemann, Mr. Rayner, and the Rev. Thurston Rivington; Conductor, Mr. Frank Spinney; leader of the band, Mr. Heden. A feature in the programme was the finished rendering of Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Trio in D minor by Messrs. Spinney, Heden, and Mander.

YORK.—A Pianoforte Recital, interspersed with explanatory remarks, was given at the Fine Art Exhibition, on the 1st ult., by Herr Padel. The programme included Haydn's Andante and Variations in F minor, Beethoven's Sonata in A flat, with the Funeral March, Mendelssohn's Prelude and Fugue in E minor, and a selection from Chopin's works, all of which were listened to with much interest by a larger audience than any assembled at the previous Recitals by the same artist.

PROSPECTUS.

Some years have passed since Mr. Joseph Bennett began, in the Musical Times, a series of biographical notices which are still far from ended. The original purpose was a limited one—namely, to throw light upon the personality of famous musicians by means of extracts selected and arranged from their letters and other writings. Hence the series had for first title "The Great Composers, sketched by themselves."

Consequent upon the remarkable favour with which the notices were received, it was determined to extend their scope, and, while making prominent the Masters' own testimony, to deal with each subject in a complete biographical form, as far as allowed by the limits necessarily imposed. The words "sketched by themselves" were therefore dropped from the title.

It was further resolved to make additions in the case of the composers dealt with under the original idea, and to issue the notices separately as "Primers of Musical Biography."

The intention of "Novello's Primers of Musical Biography" is to convey, as clearly as the limits of an elementary work will allow, a just idea of each composer's personality, and to record the principal events of his life. Knowledge of what a man is helps the understanding of what he does. These little books may serve, therefore, as a first step towards acquaintance with the genius and compositions of the masters to whom they are devoted.

For the copious extracts made from letters, &c., throughout the series, no apology is offered. They are the best material upon which to base an estimate of character.

PREFACE BY SIR GEORGE GROVE, D.C.L.

THE TIMES.

"Mr. Grove, in his brief and able preface, calls the publication in an English dress of Otto Jahn's famous biography of Mozart 'an event in our musical history,' and his statement cannot be considered an exaggeration. . . . The English public is to be congratulated upon a translation of his monumental effort which may without exaggeration be called excellent. Miss Townsend has done her work with skill and conscientiousness, and we doubt whether a much more careful comparison with the original than we have thought it necessary to undertake would discover many, or any, serious blunders."

DAILY NEWS.

"He (Jahn) has made admirable use of Nissen, with his laborious compilation, and of all other authorities, and he has succeeded in producing a work which is complete without being confusing through excess of detail, and in which the interest of the narrative is not broken by undue reference to other writers who, treating of the same points, have treated them differently and often incorrectly. . . . The work has been well translated, and it is prefaced by a brief but interesting introduction from the pen of Mr. George Grove."

THE ATHENÆUM.

"It is with great pleasure that we are able to speak in terms of the highest praise of the manner in which Miss Townsend has acquitted herself of the by no means easy task of translation. In so voluminous a work as the present it is almost inevitable that a few slips should be found; but those that we have noted are not only extremely rare, but mostly of slight importance. . . . We have done inadequate justice in this review to one of the most important works in the whole domain of musical literature; our excuse must be the absolute impossibility of dealing fully with it within reasonable bounds. We conclude by most cordially recommending it to all who are interested in music, and need only add that the printing and general appearance of the volumes are worthy alike of their contents and of the reputation of the firm which publishes them."

PREFACE.

This work is here given in its complete form, namely, in Three Parts: Part I.—For Little Players. Part II.—For more Advanced Players. Part III.—For more Matured Players.

The last part, though composed some years later than the others, was designed by Schumann as a sequel to them, and is therefore necessary to complete the series, which is one of progressive difficulty intended to promote the development of the mental and technical powers of the Student.

Some misunderstanding as to the form and extent of the "Album for the Young" has arisen through former English Editions which have omitted the Third Part, substituting the "Scenes of Childhood" (Kinderscenen), Op. 15. This is, however, an entirely distinct work, and is therefore now issued in another Vol., which also contains a set of short detached pieces entitled "Album Leaves," Op. 124.

A source of great inconvenience to students and players is the want of uniformity in the signs used to express fingering. In England the thumb is represented by +, whereas, on the Continent and in America it is marked 1; thus the figures 1, 2, 3, 4 have a different meaning in an English edition from that which they have in a foreign one, a discrepancy which cannot but cause embarrassment, especially in reading new music. The advantage of having only one set of figures in general use is obvious, and as it cannot be expected that the mode recognised by a majority of countries will be altered to that which is used in England alone, it seems inevitable that what is called "foreign fingering" should ultimately prevail.

Messrs. Novello, Ewer & Co. have therefore decided on the important step of adopting this mode (that is, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 instead of +, 1, 2, 3, 4) in their future publications, and it is accordingly introduced in this edition.

London, July, 1883.

EIGHT HARVEST HYMNS. Words by Rev. S. CHILDS CLARKE; Music by Dr. DYKES, DEAN ALFORD, Mr. LANGRAN, and the editor, Mr. A. H. BROWN. Price 2d.; words only, 2s. per 100.

"The hymns, which include a fine Processional, are excellently written, and as suitably set; and if music is ever to win its way, will assuredly become great favourites at harvest festivals. They vary considerably in metre; but gladness and thanksgiving are the twin keystones of all."—Western Morning News.

"A very excellent set of hymns, and most suitable for country parishes."—Church Times.

"The tunes are much in the current vein of thought, pleasant, tuneful, and having a part-song flavour. Nos. 1 and 3, by the editor, are fresh and effective, and No. 5, by the same composer, is elegant in its melody, and smooth in its harmony. No. 6, by that man of many accomplishments, Dean Alford, has a not unpleasant flavour of mixed antique and modern thought. Mr. Langran's (No. 4), a plain note against note tune, will be found to sing well. Dr. Dykes's (No. 2) is elegant and melodious, and set in the quasi-ecclesiastical measure, six-four, a time borrowed by the church from an early period of modern dramatic music. The tunes will not fail to please modern choirs."—Musical Standard.

"We would specially draw attention to the unusually good common metre tune 'St. Angelus,' No. 5, which might well pass for a composition of 250 years ago."—Church Herald.

 "Sutton Lane, Chiswick, October 30, 1883.

"Dear Herr Hoering,—I am very much obliged to you for your pamphlet and specimen copy of 'Tutor.' I have only had time to look rapidly through the latter, but I have seen sufficient to show me that it contains everything you claim for it; and I shall cordially recommend it as far as it may be in my power. THE HOLY CITY
A SACRED CANTATA
BY
ALFRED R. GAUL.

"The work is an honour to English Art, and has elevated its composer into a place of distinction amongst native musicians."—Queen.

"A good sound musical work is this 'Holy City.' I have no hesitation in saying that it creditably represents English art, and does honour not only to the skill but to the judgment and taste of Mr. Gaul." Daily Telegraph.

"The reception was favourable in the extreme, and the Cantata must henceforth be classed among the successes which the Birmingham Musical Festivals have brought to light."—Standard.

"The 'Holy City' is evidently the work of a thoughtful as well as a clever composer, and should make its mark among thoroughly English productions of a sacred character."—Musical Times.

"We hope and believe that the reception given last night to Mr. Gaul and to his 'Holy City' Cantata will prove an earnest of its popularity and acceptance throughout the length and breadth of the land."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"A most interesting, tuneful, and scholarly work."—Manchester Courier.

"This fine work will considerably enhance Mr. Gaul's reputation as a musician."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

Vocal Score, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; Ditto, paper boards, 3s.; Ditto, scarlet cloth, 4s.; Voice parts, for the use of Choral Societies, each 1s. A selection of Soprano and Contralto Movements for School Use, 1s. 3d. Band Parts on Loan. Tonic Sol-fa Edition, 1s.

RUTH
Words by EDWARD OXFENFORD

MUSIC BY ALFRED R. GAUL.

"Ruth' is a work of sterling power; its musical form is that of perfect tunefulness combined with simplicity and strength. There is nothing involved about it, nor the least straining after unattainable effects. The composer has grasped his theme in a thoroughly sympathetic manner, and has produced a work which is worthy of the subject. . . . One of the sweetest numbers in the cantata is Ruth's solo, 'Entreat me not to leave thee, which is instinct with pathetic expression. Boaz's solo, 'Go not from hence, my daughter,' is another effective number. . . . A chorale, 'Nightfall,' is an exquisitely beautiful conception; and the intermezzo, 'Daybreak,' and the jubilant Wedding Chorus which follows, are full of spirit and vivacity, rushing forward with a joyous bound that carries the audience completely away. An enthusiastic encore was given to the intermezzo and chorus."—Bradford Observer.

"That the idyllic story of Ruth is one admirably adapted for artistic illustration is unquestionable, and poets, painters, and musicians have over and over again made it a subject for the exercise of their talents, and we have no hesitation in saying that in its poetical and musical treatment by Mr. Oxenford and our townsman, it has been invested with increased interest. . . . Pieces such as Mr. Gaul's Opus 34 are much wanted, and we believe that when the 'Ruth' Cantata is heard in our Town Hall it will be at once accepted as a valuable addition to our stock of music suitable for performance by fairly advanced and advancing societies."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"Bright, tuneful, fresh, and musically—this work will be a great favourite, and will add to Mr. Gaul's reputation. The second part will be liked better than the first; it opens in the harvest-field, and here the real idyll begins, and with it the charm and grace and freshness of Mr. Gaul's inspiration. The maidens' chorus, bright as the morning it greets, and the men's robust and vigorous reply, well introduce the fresh and melodious joy-breathing music of Ruth, the chastened yet hopeful address of Naomi, and the hearty generous welcome of Boaz. . . . The work closes with a short but spirited chorus, 'Rejoice, for blessings round us fall,' which will bear comparison with anything Mr. Gaul has written. An effective fugal passage carefully worked out, but not overdone, is inserted between strains of joyful acclamation of considerable freshness and vigour."—Birmingham Weekly Dart.

"Ruth' has been set to music by several composers; none, however, has become so worthily popular as the Cantata under notice. Although somewhat simple in parts it contains some charming music, and is highly characteristic of the story it so vividly illustrates."—South Wilts Express.

ANDANTE AND VARIATIONS for the PIANOFORTE.
"The variations, apart from their musicianlike treatment, are extremely elegant, and appear to have been inspired by a higher feeling than that of showing off either the composer or performer. We are particularly pleased with Nos. 3, 4, and 7, the last-named leading by an effective pedal point to the spirited Finale. Judging from this specimen of his powers Mr. Addison, who appropriately dedicates his piece to Sir George Macfarren, his master, may, we think, confidently rely upon a successful future."—Musical Times.

BERLIOZ AND HIS BOOKS

By MRS. WALTER CARR.

It seems strange that Berlioz should have been so much before the public during the last two or three years as a composer, and yet that so little should be known of him as a writer. Opinions may, do, and we might add must differ as to the abstract merits of his music; but about the quality of his literary works there can be no doubt whatever. They are light, amusing, instructive, crammed full of jokes, puns, criticisms, often singularly discriminating, often hasty and unjust, but always interesting, while above all there is a charm of style which carries one on and is a source of perpetual surprise and delight.

It is doubtless this very perfection of style which has for so long hindered their translation, for those who love the books most feel a dread of translating language whose aroma is so delicate that it can but escape in the process. Two of these books, however, have been lately done, and a third is promised.

The most important and the most interesting is the "Mémoires," which now includes the "Voyages Musicaux," or, as he would have written it, "Musicaux," for one of his peculiarities was making use of the latter form of plural on occasions when other people used the former. He says in the preface, and repeats it elsewhere, that he does not pretend to describe his whole life, that he is not writing confessions, and will only tell what he chooses about himself, and this must be borne in mind in reading the autobiographical part. The reader must also be on his guard against adopting all Berlioz's statements, which were often distorted by prejudice and passion, as in the case of Carvalho, who made great sacrifices to insure the success of the "Troyens," and yet whom Berlioz accused of incapacity and half-heartedness, if not of absolute treachery, during the annoying business of the production.

The autobiographical part of the book is the least interesting, and as his life has been so ably treated already in these pages we pass on to the other features of his works. The musician will find here a mine of wealth, for Berlioz possesses a gift of utterance very rare in composers of high rank, who are usually dumb both with tongue and pen. How few are even the remarks on music in Beethoven's letters; indeed, the one to Czerny about the best method of teaching music to his loved, but unloving, nephew is almost a solitary example. Schubert spoke only through his music; and Mendelssohn, charming as his private letters are, refused to write so much as a paragraph for the press. Schumann, of course, was a literary man, though absolutely dumb in society, and Wagner one might call loquacious in print; but the crabbed style of Schumann and the personal concentration of Wagner prevent their works appealing to anything like the number who could find interest in Berlioz's writings.

This is the more curious as he professes to hate literary work. Over and over again he tells us how he has sat for days together with the paper before him without being able to hammer out a line, beyond the title of the work he had to criticise. He who, from his own account, pushed plain-speaking to an extreme among his acquaintances, must have found it very difficult to write to order on any topic, and especially on music, where his convictions were very sincere, and where he specially detested platitudes. He seems to have invented a method of escaping from saying anything at all on certain operas, at least if we may assume that there was some foundation for the two very absurd chapters in the "Soirées de l'Orchestre," where the characters accuse him of never mentioning about the works he is expected to criticise, and quote two articles, one of which is a long account of a conversation between the little boys who are bumping up a sheet of canvas with their heads to represent a tempestuous sea at the Opéra, and the other an imaginary scene with a little peasant-girl in a country churchyard.

Not that he could not criticise, and criticise well, too. Each special work he judged on its own merits, unbiassed by any prejudice for or against its composer. As an instance, may be cited his remarks on Marcello's "Icieli immensi narrano," which he pronounces not fit for a drinking song, and publishes in the "Grotesques de la Musique," with words of his own, supposed to be sung by a jolly cattle-dealer returning from market, an irreverent parody which he says expressly in nowise detracts from his admiration for Marcello's really fine works. He could also admire a good work by a composer without fame, or perhaps special attractions for himself, as when he says he has heard "une délicieuse romance" from "Il Torneo," an opera by Lord Westmoreland, the English Ambassador in Berlin, whose music Mendelssohn and his sisters found so trying. His admiration for Gluck, Mozart, Beethoven, Weber, and Spontini amounted to a passion, and his critiques on Beethoven's Symphonies, "Fidelio," and other works; on Gluck's "Orphée" and "Alceste," on Weber's "Freischütz" and "Oberon," which constitute the greater part of his "A Travers Chants," are well worth reading.

The one thing he could not stand was any mutilation of his favourite authors. From the days when he used to frequent the Opéra, and shout out from the pit such remarks as "There are no cymbals there, who has dared to correct Gluck"? and, "the trombones did not play! This is unbearable"! to the time when he was driven nearly frantic by the production of "Robin des Bois," he was perfectly consistent in this respect. It is touching to read how his love and admiration for Liszt were tried on one occasion by the great artist playing the adagio of Beethoven's Sonata in C sharp minor, in the manner he had then adopted to gain the applause of the fashionable world. "I suffered cruelly," he says ("A Travers Chants," p. 63), "more than I have ever suffered in hearing our wretched cantatrices embroider the grand air in 'Der Freischütz'; for to this torture was added my distress at seeing an artist of his stamp falling into the snare, which as a rule only besets mediocrities. But what was to be done? Liszt was then like a child who, when he tumbles, likes to have no notice taken, but picks himself up without a word, and cries if anybody holds him out a hand. He has picked himself up splendidly." He then goes on to relate how, at a party,* while Liszt was playing, the lamp went out, and "then in the darkness, after a moment's pause, rose in its sublime simplicity the noble elegy he had once so strangely disfigured; not a note, not an accent, was added to the notes and the accents of the author. It was the shade of Beethoven, conjured up by the virtuoso, to whose voice we were listening. We all trembled in silence, and when the last chord had sounded no one spoke—we were in tears."

* At M. Légouvé's.

The mention of Liszt leads us on naturally to consider Berlioz's relations with his brother artists, and here again the man is characteristic. Often unjust, often jealous, perhaps not without cause, but as often ready to acknowledge the merits of men with whom he did not agree, and passionately devoted to those with whom he did. The jealousy and injustice come out most strongly with regard to Cherubini, Habeneck, and Girard; the opposite qualities with regard to Mendelssohn. C'est un grandissime maître, he writes from Leipzig to his friend Joseph Ortigue ("Correspondance inédite," p. 133), and more than once he speaks of the ravissante score of the "Midsummer Night's Dream," and of the "delicate musical web, diapered in rich colours, which he calls the 'Overture to Fingal's Cave.'" He arrived at Leipzig in the middle of a rehearsal of the "Walpurgis Nacht," and writes, "The score is clearness itself, in spite of its complexity; the voices and instruments cross each other in every possible way, contradict each other, clash, in an apparent disorder which is the culminating point of art. These generous words are the more valuable because the two men can scarcely be said to have hit it off in their private relations. When they were together in Rome, Berlioz evidently thought Mendelssohn griggish. "He is a regular porcupine on the subject of music," he says, "one never knows where to touch him without getting pricked," and Mendelssohn cannot have had much pleasure in the society of a companion who, from his own account, was always laying traps for him musically, and uttering profanities on the mere mention of anything approaching to a religious sentiment. We can well understand Mendelssohn's "feeling sometimes as if he should like to eat him," bitterly as Berlioz resented this phrase in his published letters. On the other hand, Mendelssohn was considerably astonished and amused to find the full particulars of Berlioz's visit to Leipzig published in the Journal des Débats. He wrote to his sister Rebecca how his wife had laughed over it, and how they quite wondered that he had not mentioned their two servants, so many confidential particulars had he entered into.

There is no subject on which we should have more curiosity to hear Berlioz's opinion than on the "music of the future," and here again he does not say at all what might have been expected of him. A musician to whom a fugue was an abomination, who could not understand—we had almost said endure—Bach, Haydn, and Handel, who kicked against all conventionalisms, and claimed the right, with Gluck, to "sacrifice any and every rule for the sake of effect," might have been expected to adopt the new ideas heart and soul. But it was not so. The concerts of Wagner's music, held at the Opéra to prepare the public for the production of "Tannhäuser," gave him an opportunity of making his profession of faith on the subject in the article which is republished in the "A Travers Chants." After saying how far he agrees with the new school, he goes on: "But if it says one must go exactly contrary to rule; people are weary of melody, of airs, duets, trios, pieces in which the theme is regularly developed, of consonances, of simple dissonances prepared and resolved, of natural modulations treated with skill; . . . the idea alone is to be considered; . . . the ear is to be despised, to be treated roughly till it is broken in; . . . it must learn to get accustomed to everything—to sequences of diminished sevenths, ascending or descending, like a nest of serpents hissing and writhing as they tear each other in pieces; to triple dissonances, unprepared and unresolved; to inner parts forced to keep company, though they agree neither in harmony nor rhythm; to atrocious modulations which introduce one key in one corner of the orchestra while the rest is playing another; . . . if nothing is to be considered in an opera but the declamation, no matter how unvocal, absurd, or ugly the intervals may be; . . . if singers are to be expected to take as much trouble in studying a part as in learning by heart a page of Sanscrit, or in swallowing a handful of nutshells; . . . if the witches in 'Macbeth' are right and the horrible is the beautiful, and the beautiful the horrible—if this is the new religion, it never was mine, it is not mine, it never shall be mine. I lift up my hand and swear non credo. . . It is true that to please the ear is not the whole object of music, but a thousand times less is its object to displease, to torture, to murder the ear." These are strong words even for Berlioz, but we must not forget that he finds much to praise in Wagner's music, and that he says of himself "he possesses a rare intensity of feeling, an ardour, a power of will, and a faith which subdue, move, and enchant;" adding, however, "These qualities would have more effect if they were joined to greater power of invention, less effort, and a juster appreciation of certain constituent elements of art."

Much as we like to hear one artist's opinion of another, especially if it appear to be a candid opinion, still greater interest attaches to Berlioz's remarks on little practical-points seldom touched by a musician of his eminence. Many of these have to do with his experiences as a conductor, which were certainly of a varied nature. His very first experiment of the kind was conducting his own first Mass at St. Eustache, shortly after which he was asked to become conductor of a society of amateurs. With some misgivings he consented, thinking it might be good practice, and that it was as well to experiment in anima vili. The work first attempted was a symphony in D, by Gyrowitz, "full of platitudes such as he could not have conceived to have been imagined by any tinker, hare-skin man, Roman grocer, or Neapolitan barber." We give the rest in his own words: "I resign myself and we begin. I hear a frightful discordance produced by the clarinets. I interrupt the orchestra, and say to them, 'Gentlemen, you have taken the wrong piece; we are in D, and you are playing in F.' 'No, sir, we have the right symphony.' 'Let us begin again then.' Again the same discordant notes, and again I stop. 'But this is impossible, show me your parts.' The parts are passed up. 'Parbleu! the cacophony is explained. Your part is written in F, but the clarinets are in A, so that your F would be unison with the D. You have taken the wrong instruments.' 'But we only have clarinets in C.' 'Well then play a third lower.' 'But we don't know how to transpose.' 'Then, for goodness' sake don't play at all.' 'Par exemple! We are members of the Society, and have a right to play as well as the rest.'"

This being in the "Grotesques de la Musique" is not perhaps intended to be taken literally, but from other scenes described seriously there seems to have been some foundation for it.

Even in good orchestras he often seems to have found great difficulties with the instruments. Ophicleides were not to be had at Weimar, Leipzig, Dresden, or Brunswick, the cor Anglais was generally wanting, and though there was one at Leipzig played by an excellent musician, it was in such a dilapidated condition, and so out of tune, that the part had to be given to the first clarinet. The cymbals in general use were cracked, and drummers as a rule had only one pair of wooden sticks. All these difficulties, arising largely from the fact that his scores included instruments which the older masters, generally played in Germany, never used, Berlioz had to meet and surmount, sometimes by assigning the part to some other instrument, sometimes by providing substitutes from his own resources. For instance, he always carried with him a pair of sponge-headed drumsticks. The case of the harp, however, was almost hopeless, as there seem to have been neither instruments nor players in Germany. At Berlin he found the large bass trombone in E flat, which was not used in Paris, and which he did not particularly admire, thinking it drowned the other three. At his own Concerts he reduced the sound by making the musician playing it sit down, so that the bell came against his desk, while the tenor and alto stood up. With regard to the trombones, a curious difficulty occurred both in Paris and Berlin with a passage in the "Tuba Mirum." The time is very slow, and the four instruments play in succession the chord of G, B, D, G, on the four beats of the bar. Nothing can be more easy to look at, and yet no amount of practice availed to get this simple bar played on these two occasions. It is a matter of common everyday experience that a chorus which will surmount real difficulties will sometimes drive a conductor almost to desperation over some simple passage, but this is an unusually curious instance. Talking of choruses, Berlioz strongly recommends that there should always be three rooms for practice, and that their parts should first be learnt separately by the tenors and basses each in their own room, while the soprani and contralti might practise together. He also comments on the bad effect of a chorus constantly getting up and down, particularly in such works as Bach's "Passion," where two choirs are kept singing alternately, and says that if the fatigue of standing throughout be too great he should prefer their being seated altogether. As he says, a passage may be intended as a surprise, but if the audience see one side rising they know exactly what they are going to hear. Other sounds which annoyed him were the rustling caused by turning over the leaves of the singers' music, and still worse, the tapping of his bâton on the desk by the conductor, a sound which, as he observes, will penetrate through any tutti of orchestra and chorus.

Like most composers, he speaks of his growing preference for instrumental musicians over singers. The latter seem to have occasionally nearly driven him out of his mind with their perpetual high notes, which he compares to the howl of a King Charles spaniel when its foot has been trodden on, their shakes—an ornament he detested, except as the musical imitation of a laugh—and their propensity to embroider fine works with idiotic vocalises. In the chapter called "Small troubles at grand concerts," in the "Grotesques de la Musique," he gives a specimen of the exertions necessary, on the part of the conductor, to secure the unembellished performance of an air by Mozart. The singer has originally proposed it, then thinks better of it, and suggests "Bel raggio"; but the parts not having been procured, reverts to Mozart. At rehearsal the conductor gives out the air by Mozart, and all is ready. "The singer comes forward, and says with her well-known irresistible grace, 'I have an idea! I will sing the air from the "Domino Noir.'" 'Oh! Ah! pch! krrr! . . . Capellmeister, have you the opera Madame mentions at your theatre?' 'No, sir.' 'Then what are we to do?' 'Then I suppose I must resign myself to the air by Mozart.' 'I think you had better.' At last we begin; the cantatrice resigns herself to the chef-d'œuvre. She covers it with embroideries as one might have expected. The conductor hears somewhere within himself the former eloquent exclamation, 'Krrr!' and turning to the Diva, says, in his softest voice, and with a smile wholly unconstrained, 'If you sing it in that way you will have enemies among the audience, I warn you.' 'Do you think so?' 'I am sure of it.' 'Dear, dear! but . . . I ask your advice. . . . Perhaps it might be as well to sing Mozart exactly as it is written. I forgot we were in Germany. . . . Well, I am ready for anything!' 'That is right, courage; risk the adventure; sing Mozart with simplicity. There were at one time airs intended for singers to embellish, but as a rule these were written by flunkeys, and Mozart was a master; indeed, some think him a great master, not deficient in taste.' We begin again. The singer having made up her mind to drink the cup to the dregs, sings simply this miracle of expression, sentiment, passion, and style, only changing two bars, just for the honour of the calling. She has scarcely finished, when five or six people rush up to her, exclaiming, 'A thousand thanks, Madame; with what simplicity and purity you sing! That is the true style in which to interpret the great masters; it is delicious, admirable! Ah, you understand Mozart!' The conductor, apart, 'Krrrrr!' What a touch that is, the two bars she is obliged to change, pour l'honneur du corps!

Nobody was, however, more susceptible to the charm of the human voice than Berlioz. Witness his enthusiasm about the Festival of the Charity Children at St Paul's, of which he gives an account in the "Soirées de l'Orchestre." So struck was he with the effect produced by these fresh, pure little voices, without any regular musical training, that he wished to see something of the same kind in Paris. "With its own resources only, such a fête would be possible in ten years. Paris has only to will it. In the meantime, with nothing beyond the first rudiments of music, England wills and does it. A great people, with an instinct for great things. Shakespeare's spirit dwells within them still."

One of the most curious of Berlioz's theories was that, "in order to act musically on the human organisation, sound must be within a certain distance of the auditor." It is not enough, he says, to be able to hear perfectly well—one must vibrate to the music, and this vibration, which is the cause of the emotion produced by music, will not carry beyond a certain point. He instances a small gathering listening to Beethoven's Trio in B flat, and says that he has seen, under similar circumstances, people not only shed tears, but cry vehemently and uncontrollably. Place the same artists playing the same piece in a large concert-hall, and the sensitive hearer will at once grow calm; he still hears, but no longer vibrates to the music. Berlioz adds innumerable cases to the same effect, and draws the conclusion that modern opera-houses and modern concert-halls are much too big. It is perfectly true that a work will have tenfold effect if played before a small sympathetic audience; but we have always thought the reason was because the audience were sympathetic, and that their appreciation stimulated the player or singer as no mixed body, including many uninterested hearers, could ever do. There may, however, be something in Berlioz's theory, and it emphasises our regret for the loss of the Hanover Square Rooms, where the atmosphere was thick with musical associations, and where every work of any value sounded so well.

One word more on the subject of style. For clearness and brilliancy the "Mémoires" can scarcely be surpassed, and that this was not entirely the effect of labour may be seen from several of the letters in the "Correspondance Inédite," especially those addressed to ladies. The "art of saying nothing prettily" could scarcely be carried further than in the letters to Madame Massart, often written under great bodily suffering. Even the letters to his son, which are generally more full of advice and reproof than tenderness, sometimes contain very touching and beautiful passages such as this from one written barely a year before the young man's death: "Ah! my poor Louis, what should I do without you! Think how I have loved you, even when you were quite little, and I find it so hard to love little children."

We may finish with a saying of Heine's (one of those true words spoken in jest), who called to him from the bed on which he had already lain for six years of torture, "Eh, Berlioz! is that you! Come in. So you have not deserted me. Always original!"

SPOHR'S OPERAS

By F. CORDER.

In 1826 the composer Curschmann persuaded his friend Ch. Pfeiffer, a rising young poet, to work up a novel of Tieck's, "Pietro von Albano," into an opera libretto, but before the task was half done the composer repented of undertaking so great a matter as an opera and abandoned it. Spohr took a fancy to the libretto and arranged to have it transferred to himself. He wrote the music between February and August, 1827, returning to the old form of "romantic opera," i.e., with spoken dialogue. He tells us that he had some misgivings about the libretto, which afterwards proved to be not unfounded; for instance, the contrast between the funeral of Cecilia and the students revelling at the same time, seemed rather too forcible; the character of a bishop, too, who has nothing to sing, was another drawback. However, the opera was produced at Cassel on October 13, 1827, with great success, though afterwards many theatres rejected it on account of religious scruples, of which a perusal of the vocal score affords no explanation. A notice of this work by Meyerbeer is not without interest. In a letter to Spohr dated March 4, 1828, he says, "I cannot conclude without thanking you for the pleasure which the perusal of your masterpiece, "Pietro von Albano," which Herr Schlesinger lent me, has afforded me, and I am happy to be able to say that in particular the Finale of the first Act (though only two characters are furnished by the poet), the scene between Antonio and the half lifeless Cecilia in the second Act, and the ingenious manner in which the stringed instruments, half con sordine and half senza sordine, shadow forth the dialogue between the living Antonio and the spirit-like Cecilia, the imposing Finale of the second Act, and besides these, numerous other features of splendid dramatic intention, excellent declamation, novel and picturesque instrumentation and harmony have truly charmed me and excited in me the most ardent desire to be present at a performance of your masterpiece."

In the absence of the spoken dialogue and stage directions, we can only gather an imperfect idea of the story from the vocal score, but it is decidedly interesting. The Overture is a very fine vigorous piece of work. After a misterioso introduction in allusion to Pietro's incantation of the first Act, the Allegro has this principal subject:— which is worked out with unflagging energy; the second subject, however, is rather too subordinate in interest.

The opening situation of the opera appears to be this. A certain Podesta of Padua and his wife Eudoxia were blessed with twin daughters, Cecilia and Rosa. (They are both called Cecilia in the score, which is very confusing, but probably only intended to indicate that the two parts are sung by one and the same person.) Rosa has been carried off by robbers—for what reason does not appear—and has long been mourned as dead. Cecilia, on the point of being married to a young man named Antonio, suddenly dies—malady not stated. To begin an opera with both the heroines dead is rather startling, but wait a bit! We open with a Recitative and Aria for Antonio, who has just returned to Padua to claim his bride. The first few bars faintly suggest "Tannhäuser" (Act 2), "Beloved halls, I give you greeting!" but his Aria is full of tender grace and Spohrish beauty. It is interrupted at the conclusion, to use an Hibernicism, by the solemn funeral dirge of Cecilia, a unison chorus for male voices, priests, a second chorus (of people) uttering mournful ejaculations between the phrases. The Podesta and Eudoxia meet Antonio and break the sorrowful news to him, striving in vain to moderate his terrible anguish. This mournful situation is broken in upon by the ill-timed merriment of a band of students hailing their learned teacher, the sage Pietro von Albano, who is said to have practised the black art—that is, who knew a few chemical conjuring tricks—in 1316, the period of our opera—

Then the sage himself appears; he apologises for the unseemly rejoicing of his scholars, and endeavours to comfort the mourners, starting a melodious Trio and Chorus with this theme—

At the conclusion of this finely-written number the dirge is re-introduced, again giving way to the students' chorus.

Spoken dialogue fills up the hiatus between these matters and the next number, which is a fine Recitative and Aria for the living Cecilia—that is, Rosa—the scene having apparently changed to the robbers' retreat in a forest. This scena is of the usual form, but a good deal less florid than those in previous operas. Antonio, who appears to be distractedly roaming about in the forest, meets Rosa and at first believes her to be Cecilia. They have an explanatory duet very agitated and vigorous in character, though entirely composed of well-worn Spohrish phrases; at the end of it the robbers return, and, on Antonio endeavouring to cut his way through them, he is overpowered and left for dead.

Scene 3 is very gruesome. It is the Finale so much praised by Meyerbeer. We are in the dwelling of the magician Pietro who, assisted by his servant Beresinthe and a chorus of invisible spirits, is busy over an incantation, the object of which is to bring from her grave to factitious life the hapless Cecilia, who in the flesh had refused the proffered love of the magician. There is a good deal of recitative, and the music of the scene, exclusive of a gloomy and not very interesting Aria for Pietro, is all built upon the few bars of introduction to the Overture. After the usual thunderstorm and orchestral terrors in the shape of tremolos and chords of diminished sevenths, the charm is declared to have worked, and Cecilia, to the accompaniment of a few bars of mysterious music, seemingly for the harp, makes her appearance. She murmurs—

Cecilia. Who wakens me from gentle slumber and tender dreams? I saw the hosts of heaven, and rose to join the angels.—Ah!

[She perceives Pietro and sinks to the ground.

Pietro. Quit dreams and slumber. Awaken in my arms!

This is a most original situation, and we cannot help thinking that it might have been made much more of, both by poet and musician. It is more suitable to treatment in the modern, emotional style than in the formality of Spohr's period.

The second Act opens with an Air for Eudoxia, which does not call for notice; after which the Podesta comes on, and tells his wife in recitative how Antonio has found Rosa, and nearly paid for the discovery with his life; how he now lies wounded in a hut, tended by the good and wise Pietro. The Podesta announces his intention of going with a troop of soldiers to apprehend the robbers and rescue his long-lost daughter. A joyous duet follows—

As this ends the scene changes to Pietro's house, and a grand Aria for the magician joins straight on; this is probably very effective in performance, but musically it is not remarkable. Pietro is supposed to be watching the still slumbering resurrectionised Cecilia. The following scene should have offered a grand opportunity for the composer, but it was quite beyond Spohr to deal with. Antonio, who is in Pietro's house—we don't know how he came there—loses his way in its "labyrinth of halls" and comes upon Cecilia. She wakes, and there is a weirdly conceived situation. She relates to Antonio how her soul was suddenly hindered from soaring to heaven, and she was forced to linger thus between death and life by the accursed art of Pietro. Antonio selfishly begins to prate about his love for her, but she tells him sadly that her only life and love are of the other world, and begs him to restore her to death. A formal duet here seems terribly out of place, though it is very charming. Having accomplished this necessary formality, the scene, which Spohr has set for the rest in bold recitative, continues. Pietro being too dangerous to be openly attacked, Cecilia begs her lover to convey her back to the Cathedral. Once kneeling at the altar, and listening to the priest's benediction, her soul will be released from its present thralldom. The sorrowing Antonio promises to comply with her demand, though sorely against his will, but Cecilia having relapsed into unconsciousness, he seizes the opportunity to sing an unnecessary Aria.

Scene 2 is apparently in the Podesta's house. Eudoxia, anxiously expecting her newly found daughter, sings a nice Aria, and then the expected ones arrive with, of course, a crowd of people singing a chorus of welcome—

Immediately upon this comes a Quartet and Chorus, which, contrary to what we might expect from Spohr, is by no means a success. It is followed by a reprise of the chorus of welcome. The next number, however, atones for this temporary weakness, being another beautiful duet (the third) for Antonio and the duplex heroine. Antonio feels that Cecilia speaks to him from heaven, and bids him let Rosa supply her place in his affections. There is no difficulty in his obeying this command as the two young ladies are so alike as to be undistinguishable. A pretty idea here is the reminiscence of the duet in the previous scene. After this duet Antonio is reminded by the striking of the clock (a pardonable anachronism) of his promise to Cecilia, and hastens off to fulfil it.

The last scene would seem to take place in or about the Cathedral. There is a chorus of "Hail to our master" (Pietro) on the part of the populace, and then comes the Finale, commencing with the death of Cecilia, the harp music which attended her resurrection being effectively re-introduced. The people are alarmed at seeing the dead alive, and Antonio avenges her by proclaiming the truth. The people believe his wild story, and with almost ludicrous promptness change their salutations of Pietro into clamours for his destruction. What becomes of him is uncertain, but there is a rather tedious chorus of menace, consisting of three verses, with solos for all the principal characters, and the opera finishes with an all too short prayer, a Trio and Chorus of great beauty.

The central motive of this drama possesses a weird originality that might have been turned to good account had it been more skilfully dealt with by both librettist and composer. In the music, though Spohr has not exactly employed the Leitmotiv, he has given reminiscences of his themes on the recurrence of the ideas suggesting them, and this forms a refreshing innovation to the strict "absolute music" which he so rigidly adheres to.

We are compelled to give a rather scanty notice of the next opera, "The Alchemist," for two reasons. Neither in Spohr's Autobiography nor elsewhere can we find any particulars of its composition or production, and besides this, the story cannot very clearly be made out in the absence of the libretto. It is said to be founded on a Spanish tale by Washington Irving, but beyond this and the facts that it was composed between October, 1829, and April, 1830, and first performed at Cassel on July 28, 1830, for the birthday of the Elector, nothing is known of it. It is, however, a very sound and interesting work, with a decided attempt at local colour, which the mannerisms of the composer of course override and destroy.

The Overture is very brilliant. It commences with a short Adagio, and the Allegro is a Bolero in C minor. The opening scene represents a ruined Moorish castle near Granada. A band of gipsies sing an unaccompanied five-part chorus behind the scenes, approaching; while between the lines the orchestra plays snatches of the Bolero in the Overture. Having entered and encamped, one of their number, Paola, sings an Aria, from which it appears that her lover is false, and she is therefore jealous and vindictive, thereby proclaiming herself to be the second soprano and female villain of the piece. Then the heroine, Ines, sings a little song at her window, for she inhabits these ruins with her old father, the Alchemist Vasquez. Her lover is named Alonzo, as is only natural, and on his coming to court Ines clandestinely he sings a very charming Aria. But Ines has another suitor, one Ramiro, who, from the fact of his being a villain of the deepest dye, and moreover owning a palace, we conjecture to be a person of title—say a Count. This person hires the gipsies to sing a Bolero under the window, but Ines takes no notice and flings out no coppers, wherefore the wicked Count vows vengeance. He will wait till the father is out of the way, and will then carry off the maiden. Next the Alchemist, imprudently experimenting with nitroglycerine or something, blows himself up and sets the house on fire. This is Alonzo's opportunity, and he dashes into the flames and rescues the old man, thereby winning his esteem. A Trio of considerable power for Ines, Vasquez, and Alonzo ends the Act.

Act II. opens in Paola's house. Ramiro is her fickle lover, and she upbraids him with his designs on Ines, which she has discovered. A duet here is very effective, but is made of such unusual difficulty by a sequence of brilliant chromatic scale passages for Paola that the composer gives an alternative version. An Aria for Paola which follows (the scene having apparently changed to the abode of Ines) is very fresh and attractive—

It then seems that Ines goes out for a walk, and meeting (accidentally, of course) with Alonzo, does the usual Spohrish and graceful love-duet with passages in imitation, &c., after which, coming upon the gipsy encampment, the pair are cajoled into resting there and patronising an entertainment got up for their benefit. In vain Paola tries to warn them by a mysterious ballad which she sings, after a very pretty, almost Weberish, gipsy dance—the lovers are made prisoners by the gipsies who are in the pay of Ramiro, and when the old Alchemist totters out in search of his daughter he is pounced upon by the officers of the Inquisition, also egged on by the wicked Count.

Act III. shows us Vasquez in prison. He sings a Vision and an Aria of the usual type of operatic bass songs, but this does not advance the action of the piece. The scene changes to the Count's palace, where a ball is being given to cheer up the captive Ines. There is some good ballet music here, especially a Fandango with vocal accompaniment—

Paola contrives to give Ines a note, telling her of her father's capture. She accordingly upbraids Ramiro until, exhausted by a very long duet, he promises to get the old man released, just to pacify her.

The scene changes again to a street or square. Vasquez is being led to execution. Alonzo turns up, having escaped from somewhere, and says that there is yet time; he will go to the judges and prove his innocence. How he can manage this is an unexplained mystery, but perhaps the Inquisitors considered it a proper thing for old gentlemen to experiment with dynamite. Ines now comes on, having also escaped. She vainly tries to pass through the lines of soldiers; just as they are inclined to let her in, Ramiro pursues her and announces that she is his sister and is mad. The credulous people accept this absurd statement, and Ines in despair tries to kill herself. The ever ready Alonzo, however, appears in the nick of time, announces the pardon of Vasquez, and fights with the bold, bad Count, felling him to the earth. This puts Paola into a great state of remorseful anguish, and she anathematises a good deal; but finding that Ramiro is not dead, she takes him off to repent or marry her, or both, while the other characters join in a Spanish Finale to express their happiness.

As a whole, we should reckon the music of this opera to be on a level with that of the two preceding, perhaps a little brighter, the subject being less gloomy than either "Pietro" or "The Bergeist." It would be well worth revival, and does not present unusual difficulties for the singers.

"The Crusaders," while it is in one respect the most remarkable of Spohr's operas, is otherwise one of his weakest works, really hardly possessing a single attractive number. What gives it a special interest to the critic, however, is the form. With a sudden renunciation of the strait-laced, pedantic formality which had hitherto been essential to Spohr, he boldly attempted to realise the music drama at which Wagner was then commencing to labour. To this end he became his own librettist, and with the aid of his wife (this was in 1832, not long before her death) extracted from a novel of Kotzebue's a very fair set of words. Mistrusting his poetic powers, perhaps, he has made but sparing use of verse and rhyme, the bulk of the book being in mere prose, but the diction is sensible and the action coherent and in places very dramatic. The principle attempted is to abolish those long formal vocal pieces which only delay the action, but what is given us in their stead? Nothing, or almost nothing. A considerable portion of the mere dialogue is set to the usual recitative and the remainder to a nondescript kind of arioso recitative, in which the orchestra works away diligently at matter of no importance and pretends to be working out nothing symphonically, while the voice comes in where it can. This style of thing is less like a feeble shadow of Wagnerian melos than those scenes in Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew," where rhythmical movement in the orchestra is used to accompany arioso recitative in the voices, and this has never proved a successful device in anyone's hands, as the hearer knows not where to seek the interest—in point of fact, there never is much. Added to this Spohr's marked and rather monotonous rhythms, which are especially stubborn in his last works, invest this accompanied recitative with a ponderous march most wearisome to the ear. Every bar seems to contain either four well-marked crotchets or triplets of quavers throughout. In fact, Spohr trying to write a Music-Drama is as much out of his element as Wagner would have been had he tried to write a Pianoforte Concerto.

Though the book of "Die Kreuzfahrer" was written in 1832, the opera itself was not completed and produced till New-Year's Day, 1845. It had a brilliant success, which, however, proved only a succès d'estime. Spohr wrote concerning it to his friend Hesse, "That my opera should have made a deep and lasting impression upon the public, the lesser number only of which consisted of musically educated persons, I ascribe to the truthful character of my music, which aims only at representing the situation perfectly, and discards all the flimsy parade of modern opera music, such as florid instrumental solos and noisy effects." But, alas! Spohr was no critic, even of his own compositions. Let us now give a short analysis of the work.

Like a true music-drama, the opera has no set overture, only a short instrumental introduction of no particular character, and leading into the opening chorus. We are in the Crusaders' camp before Nicœa, in Palestine, and the soldiers are singing what Spohr calls an Altdeutsches Soldatenlied—a very dismal affair—

Trust one who saith, no bet-ter death can there be found, this world a-round, as to be slain on bat-tle plain.

The camp is aroused by news of the return of the hero, Sir Baldwin, who has been long mourned as dead, now escaped from captivity of the Saracens by aid of his friend Bishop Adhemar, who was not above bribing the gaolers. Sir Baldwin's first question, after replying to the congratulations of his friends, is about his betrothed, the Lady Emma von Falkenstein. She is reported to him as being probably married or dead, to his great distress. The knights are here all drawn away by the news that one of them—Bohemund—has captured an Emir's daughter. Baldwin and Adhemar only remain behind to sing a short duet, saying that they are disgusted with the naughty ways of this new set of crusaders, so different from the old, and that they will return home to Germany.

Scene 2 is the courtyard of a conveniently adjoining convent, established mainly as a hospital for the wounded crusaders. Emma, disguised as a young pilgrim, and attended by her faithful servant Walter, has roamed through Palestine in search of Baldwin, and hearing in the camp that he is dead she resolves not to return home but to bury herself in this cloister. In vain the portress and Walter warn her not to act rashly; she persists in summoning the Abbess Celestina, who admits her, after reminding her distinctly of all she undertakes. The sisters are obliged to see men, as their principal duty is to tend the wounded, but they must remain closely veiled and mute in presence of the other sex; a word or a look subjects the frail one to a terrible death—living entombment. Emma is undismayed, and only stays behind the Abbess and portress to enliven us, after this long scene of recitative, by a parting duet with Walter and a short Aria on her own account.

Scene 3 is a chamber in the convent. From a scene between the Abbess and the portress, her confidential servant, we learn that Celestina took the veil on account of a disappointment in love, the gentleman being Count Falkenstein, Emma's father. She consequently nourishes the most unchristian hatred against Emma, which the portress, after much talk, succeeds in calming for a time. Emma, on her urgent request, is allowed to take the veil at once, without any novitiate, being now encouraged in her desire by Celestina.

The scene then returns to the camp. It would have been better to have joined this part on with Scene 1. Fatima, the Emir's daughter, is flying from the insulting attempts of Bohemund and others, who strive to take off her veil. Baldwin interferes, bidding them respect religious customs; but he is not listened to. Just then the Emir himself, who has obtained admission to the camp, comes to try and ransom his daughter. Bohemund refuses to release her unless the Emir will turn Christian. This being refused, he offers to fight for the girl. Baldwin takes the part of the feeble old man, and accepts the challenge for him. The two knights fight and Baldwin is victorious, though severely wounded. Gratitude of the Emir. The Saracens depart in joy. End of Act 1.

Act II., Scene 1. Open country before the convent. Scene between the Emir and his daughter, who has fallen hopelessly in love with the gallant Baldwin. Renewed gratitude on the part of the Emir, who gives the young man a ring as a talisman, telling him to rely upon his aid if he should ever be in need. Baldwin takes a friendly farewell of them, and goes into the convent to have his wound attended to.

Scene 2. Room in the convent. Emma is now one of the sisters and is being instructed in her duties. Baldwin's esquire comes to ask aid for his master. He is bidden to introduce the patient, and Emma is commanded to undertake her first service. Meeting of the lovers. The recognition. Emma faints in her lover's arms and at his call for assistance the Abbess, portress, and nuns flock in to behold the new sister, not only unveiled, but in the embrace of a man. They tear the lovers apart and Baldwin, unable to resist, is turned out of the room. The Abbess wisely sends for military protection against future attempts for rescue on the part of Baldwin, and then has a long interview with Emma. The hapless girl pleads in vain her betrothal vow. Celestina is cruel and inexorable. She is a nun and must remain so. To Emma, left alone in her despair, comes the good-natured portress with an offer of help. There is a subterranean passage leading from this chamber out to the highway; she will get the key, bring it here and Baldwin also, taking advantage of the Abbess's momentary absence, and the lovers can then flee together. It is done. Rapturous meeting of Baldwin and Emma, who of course, instead of instantly flying, stop to sing the usual and inevitably fatal love-duet—a very poor one, too, which makes the case worse. They have hardly entered the passage when the Abbess and her nuns return, discover their flight and pursue them. They are also caught in a trap, for they meet in the passage the castellan Bruno and soldiers whom Celestina had sent for. Being captured Emma is dragged off to a cell to await her terrible fate and Baldwin is expelled from the place, the revengeful Abbess in her triumph scorning his threats of vengeance.

Act 3. Baldwin wanders in despair around the convent walls and sings an immoderately long Aria to console himself. He waits for Bruno, who is patrolling with his men, and implores his help, reminding him of past services unpaid for, but the castellan is not to be seduced. Again alone, Baldwin is still more maddened by hearing the nuns chanting a funeral hymn over Emma. This gives place to the march of the Saracens who approach from a distance and cross the stage. The Emir finds the unconscious form of Baldwin in his road, revives him and hears what is the matter. Instantly he offers his aid. No Christians can venture to break into a convent, defying the wrath of the church, but the Saracens are the very men he wants. Exultant chorus, "Up to the assault!"

Scene 2. Interior of the convent church. All preparations are made for walling the wretched Emma up in a niche. Grand funeral procession. Emma is allowed to sing a last prayer before death, and the nuns also sing hymns to organ accompaniment (though we don't think organs of much account were built so early as 1097). The lay brothers then proceed to do their duty, building up a wall with stones and mortar—very effective stage business. Happily ere the work is completed trumpets and other sounds announce the assault of the Saracens; the sounds approach, Bruno and his men are overpowered and the besiegers rush in. Emma is torn from her living grave, and Baldwin triumphs, but Celestina curses them in the name of the Church. At this juncture the legate Adhemar, the bosom friend of Baldwin, comes forward, and enquiring into the case declares that Emma's betrothal vow holds good, and she is consequently no nun. Celestina retires in confusion, and all ends happily with a mild chorus of joy.

If we have seemed to treat Spohr's librettos with occasional flippant disrespect in giving the account of their plots, it is but because they deal with events and ideas which, however impressive in former days, appeal as little to the sympathies of the present day as the romances of James or Ainsworth. Tempora mutantur. We seek for realism everywhere now, even in an opera. "Der Freischütz" and "Die Zauberflöte" are laughed at for their supernatural scenes, and thus two of the finest works ever penned are discarded in favour of more human, or inhuman, operas, with heroines of unpleasant, not to say tigerish characters. Perhaps the next change of taste will bring us back to the gentle and soothing style of Spohr, whose operas are to those of the present day what the flavour of cream is to that of pickles.

THE GREAT COMPOSERS

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

No. XV.—GLUCK (continued from page 451).

FOUR years after the production of "Orfeo," Gluck was ready with "Alceste"—an opera even more representative of the principles which the composer had set himself to advocate. Quinault and Lulli, it will be remembered, had dealt with the same classic story, but Calzabigi and Gluck proposed to handle it in a very different spirit. Their idea was to reproduce, as far as possible, the severe outline of Greek drama, and take no note of modern taste for the florid designs of art. The story of Alceste suited them exactly in this regard. It is a tale of feeling rather than of action, and rests nearly to the end upon a single situation. This suited well the ancient Greeks, on whose stage, it has been truly said, "simplicity was not a fault." But precisely in the measure of its conformity to the Hellenic tradition was the boldness of the master who elected to lay it before an eighteenth century audience. In the same measure, too, was the virulence of the attacks it called forth from public criticism and private enmity. The 16th of December, 1766, saw the flood gates of musical vituperation opened in Vienna, the more completely because the Opera had been closed for a week in order to allow time for sufficient rehearsal. "A pretty state of things," said Gluck's critics, "when we are deprived of the lyric stage for nine days and then called to assist at a funeral on the tenth." Others declared that they attended the performance to shed tears of emotion not those of weariness. Others, again, demanded their money back, while cynics asked what pleasure could be found in the jeremiads of an idiot who dies for her husband.

But the mass of the public entertained a different opinion. Doubtful at first, they soon yielded to the truth and simplicity of the art set before them. They recognised the voice of nature and, for a long time, would hear nothing else.

"Alceste" was published in 1769, and then Gluck, who theretofore had allowed his music to speak for itself, made a formal exposition of principles, in the shape of a dedicatory letter to the Grand Duke of Tuscany. This document has often been translated, and must be familiar to English readers. Nevertheless, we cannot omit it here:—

"When I undertook to set music to the opera of 'Alceste,' I purposed to avoid all the abuses that the ignorant vanity of singers and the excessive complaisance of composers had introduced into Italian opera, which, from the most beautiful and imposing of all spectacles, had been made the most wearisome and ridiculous. I sought to limit music to its real function—that of assisting the poetry by strengthening the expression of feeling and the interest of situation, without interrupting action or encumbering it with superfluous ornaments. I believed that music should do for poetry what is done to a well-drawn sketch by brightness of colour and a happy combination of light and shade.

"I am, therefore, careful not to interrupt an actor in the excitement of dialogue to make him wait for the end of a tiresome ritornella, and not to stop him in the middle of a phrase upon a favourable vowel, whether it be to show, in a long passage, the agility of his beautiful voice, or for the orchestra to give him opportunity for taking breath, that he may make a point d'orgue.

"I have not thought it a duty to pass rapidly from the second part of an air, even when that second part is the most passionate and important, and regularly to repeat the words of the first four times, finishing the air where the sense does not conclude, in order that the singer may show that he can vary a passage in several ways at his pleasure.

"In fine, I have wished to renounce all the abuses against which, for a long time past, good sense and good taste have cried out in vain.

"I have assumed that the overture ought to suggest to the spectators the character of the action about to be set before them, and also indicate the subject; that the instruments should be used in proportion to the degree of interest and feeling, and that it is necessary above all to avoid too marked an incongruity between air and recitative, so as not to mutilate the sense of the period, or interrupt mal à propos the movement and warmth of the scene.

"I believed, further, that the chief part of my task was to seek a beautiful simplicity, and I have avoided a parade of difficulties at the expense of clearness; I have not attached any value to the discovery of novelty, save that which naturally belongs to the situation, or is allied to the expression; and, lastly, there is no rule which I have not believed it my duty to sacrifice with a good grace in favour of effect.

"These are my principles. Happily, the poem lent itself marvelously well to my plan; the celebrated author of 'Alceste,' having conceived a new order of lyric drama, had substituted for flowery descriptions, useless similes, and cold and sententious moralisings, strong passion, interesting situations, the language of the heart, and varied spectacle. Success has justified our ideas, and the universal approbation of an enlightened city has shown me that simplicity and truth are the grand principles of the beautiful, no matter in what form of art."

With no word of this famous document, written, not by Gluck, but for him by the Abbé Coltellini, will the modern musical conservative quarrel. Rather does he desire that the principles set forth in it may again be applied to Italian opera, which stands very much in need of them. At the same time, good ideas are capable of abuse by being pushed to the point of exaggeration. Gluck stopped at the right place, but the reformer of our own day, working on the same lines, went far beyond, and achieved a lyric drama which in many respects is more artificial and offensive to good taste than the discarded model.

Gluck's calm and academic exposition of principles did not save him from fierce criticism, which he endured with scarcely a good grace. He knew himself to be in the right, and was impatient of those who, contradicting him, were necessarily in the wrong. This temper came out in the letter which dedicated his next opera, "Paride ed Elena," to the Duke of Braganza.

"I resolved to publish the music of 'Alceste' only in hope of finding imitators. I dared to flatter myself that in following the route which I had opened they would be compelled to destroy the abuses which have introduced themselves into and dishonoured Italian opera. I avow with sorrow that I have waited for this in vain. The demi-savans—the doctors of taste, a species unhappily too numerous, and always a thousand times more harmful to the fine arts than the ignorant—have arrayed themselves against my method, which, were it established, would deny their pretensions.

"Some have thought themselves entitled to judge 'Alceste' after informal rehearsals, badly conducted and worse executed; they have measured in a room the effect which the opera would produce in a theatre, with as much sagacity as in a Grecian city men might have estimated, at a few feet distance, the effect of statues intended to be placed upon lofty columns. One of these delicate amateurs, having his soul in his ears, may have found an air too severe, a passage too strongly expressed, or badly led up to, without thinking that, under the circumstances, the passage was sublime in expression and presented the happiest contrast. A pedantic harmonist may have remarked an ingenious negligence, or a fault of feeling, and been moved to denounce both as unpardonable sins against the mysteries of harmony, soon raising a crowd of voices all one in condemning the music as wild, barbarous, and extravagant.

"It is true that the other arts are not more happily situated, and are judged with no more justice and no more intelligence. Your Highness easily divines the reason. The more one seeks perfection and truth, the more precision and exactitude become necessary—of this I desire no better example than my air in 'Orfeo,' 'Che farò senza Euridice?' Make the smallest change in it, either in the movement or turn of expression, and the air becomes one for marionettes. In a work of that kind, a note more or less sustained, a strengthened tone, or a negligent bar, an appoggiatura out of place, a shake, a roulade, can destroy the effect of an entire scene. Moreover, when it is a question of performing music composed on the principles established by me, the presence of the composer is, so to speak, as essential as the sun to the operations of nature. He is the life and the soul of it; without him confusion and chaos reign, but one must wait to encounter obstacles inseparable from a world of men who, because they have eyes and ears, no matter of what kind, believe they have a right to judge in matters of fine art."

The tone of the foregoing remarks cannot possibly be mistaken. It shows that the iron of criticism had entered into Gluck's soul, and made him very sore. He would have done better, perhaps, had he kept silence. Under all circumstances the militant artist is a mistake. If his art be true—if false, he cannot be an artist—it will fight for its own hand more effectually than the tongue and pen of controversy.

"Paride ed Elena" had but little success with the Viennese, and Gluck allowed five years to pass before again challenging public opinion. He remained all the time in Vienna, one of the Kaiserstadt's most honoured citizens. As to the manner of his life we are, happily, not ignorant, since, in 1772, Dr. Burney visited the Austrian capital, and was admitted to the composer's friendship. Burney, as a matter of course, put his observations of Gluck in print, and they are to be found in "The present state of Music in Germany, the Netherlands, and United Provinces," published a year later. The Doctor thus describes his first visit to the illustrious composer:—

"At five o'clock Lord Stormont's coach carried Madame Thun, his lordship, and myself to the house of the Chevalier Gluck, in the Fauxbourg St. Mark. He is very well housed there, has a pretty garden, and a great number of neat and elegantly furnished rooms. He has no children. Madame Gluck and his niece, who lives with him, came to receive us at the door, as well as the veteran composer himself. He is much pitted with the small-pox, and very coarse in figure and look; but was soon got into good humour, and he talked, sang, and played, Madame Thun observed, more than ever she knew him at any one time. . . . With as little voice as possible he contrived to entertain, and even delight, the company in a very high degree; for, with the richness of accompaniment, the energy and vehemence of his manner in the Allegros, and his judicious expression in the slow movements, he so well compensated for the want of voice that it was a defect which was soon entirely forgotten. He was so good-humoured as to perform almost his whole opera of 'Alceste,' many admirable things in a still later opera of his, 'Paride ed Elena,' and in a French opera from Racine's 'Iphigénie,' which he has just composed. This last, though he has not yet committed a note of it to paper, was so well digested in his head, and his retention is so wonderful, that he sang it nearly from the beginning to the end with as much readiness as if he had had a fair score before him. His invention is, I believe, unequalled by any other composer who now lives or has ever existed, particularly in dramatic painting and theatrical effects. He studies a poem a long time before he thinks of setting it. He considers well the relation which each part bears to the whole, the general cast of each character, and aspires more at satisfying the mind than flattering the ear. This is not only being a friend to poetry, but a poet himself; and if he had language sufficient of any other kind than that of sound in which to express his ideas, I am certain he would be a great poet; as it is, music in his hands is a most copious, nervous, elegant, and expressive language. It seldom happens that a single air of his operas can be taken out of its niche and sung singly with much effect.* The whole is a chain of which a detached single link is but of small importance."

Doctor Burney goes on to record words of Gluck which establish and confirm the connection between his operatic reforms and experience of English taste:

"He told me that he owed entirely to England the study of nature in his dramatic compositions. . . . He then studied the English taste; remarked particularly what the audience seemed most to feel; and, finding that plainness and simplicity had the greatest effect upon them, he has, ever since that time, endeavoured to write for the voice more in the natural tones of the human affections and passions than to flatter the lovers of deep science or difficult execution."

A biographer of Gluck—M. Desnoiresterres—takes care to correct Burney's assertion that at the time of his visit—September, 1772—not a note of "Iphigenia" had been written, pointing out that on August 1 the Bailli du Roulet wrote to Dauvergne, one of the directors of the Paris Opéra, stating that the music had neither to be invented nor committed to paper. Should anyone question the authority of Du Roulet, let it be noted that he wrote the book of the work in question. This person had an important and even determining influence upon the career of Gluck, since it was chiefly through him that the master turned towards Paris as the place where his labours would be crowned. But there seems also to have been another agent in this matter. A M. de Sevelinge, who dined in Gluck's company in 1767, heard him praise the noble simplicity and dramatic intentions of Lulli, and at once undertook to further the master's interests in the French capital. Whatever De Sevelinge may have done, Du Roulet did more. The last-named had made Gluck's acquaintance in Rome, was a devoted amateur of his music, and thought himself fortunate when the chances of the French diplomatic service placed him near the master in Vienna as an attaché of the Embassy. Du Roulet and Gluck together laid out the plan of "Iphigénie en Aulide," and the already mentioned letter of the diplomat to Dauvergne was an attempt to enlist the sympathy of the French director for the new work. Nothing could have been more artful than the contents of the epistle in question. On this point, however, the reader shall judge for himself. Said M. du Roulet:—

"This great man, after having written more than forty Italian operas, and had the greatest success in all the theatres where that language is admitted, is now convinced, by study and profound reflection upon the art, that the Italians have departed from the true way in their theatrical compositions; that the French method is the veritable dramatic musical method, and that, if it is not yet brought to perfection, the fault lies, not in the talent of French musicians, which is truly estimable, but with the poets, who, not understanding the exigencies of musical art, have preferred, in their compositions, dash to sentiment, gallantry to passion, and sweetness and colour of verse to pathos of style and situation. After these observations, M. Gluck is indignant with the rash statements of those of our famous writers who have dared to calumniate the French language, holding that it does not lend itself to grand musical composition. On this matter no one can be a more competent judge than M. Gluck; he is master of both languages, and though he speaks French with difficulty he knows it thoroughly, he has made a special study of it; in short, the finesse of the language has been acquired by him, above all prosody, of which he is a most scrupulous observer."

After this appeal to French vanity, Du Roulet made a frank bid for the production of "Iphigénie" in Paris, adding, by way of postscript, "I forgot to say that M. Glouch (sic), naturally disinterested, does not ask for his work more than the direction usually pays for a novelty." The bait so skillfully laid took at once, for M. Dauvergne sent the letter to Le Mercure de France, where it appeared in all the glory of print. Gluck followed up the "cast" with one of his own, also in the shape of a letter, as cunning as that of his friend. Here is an extract from it:—

"Although I have never been obliged to offer my services to any theatre, I cannot be angry with the author of the letter to one of the directors, proposing my 'Iphigénie' for your Académie de Musique. I confess that I should produce it with pleasure in Paris, because by its effect and with the aid of the famous M. Rousseau, of Geneva, whom I propose to consult, we should together, perhaps, in seeking noble, expressive, and natural melody, with declamation exact according to the prosody of each language and the character of each people, be able to determine the means which I contemplate to produce a music proper to all nations, and to abolish the ridiculous distinction of national music."

Meanwhile the first act of "Iphigénie" had been sent to M. Dauvergne, who returned it, saying: "If the Chevalier Gluck will engage to write six similar works for the Académie de Musique, good, otherwise this one cannot be produced: such an opera is made to kill all the old lyric dramas of France." The remark was more by way of compliment than satisfaction; and the negotiations so dragged along that the master, losing patience, wrote to beg the influence of his old pupil, Marie Antoinette, then the wife of the Dauphin. Her reply was prompt: "You have only to come." Gluck obeyed, reaching Paris in the autumn of 1773, and at once enjoyed Marie Antoinette's patronage and friendship. Thus did a great era in the life of the composer close and another open.

Gluck entered upon a difficult task in Paris, notwithstanding the powerful Court influence secured beforehand. His sympathies naturally drew him towards the supporters of classic French opera, but these were rather alarmed at the apparition of a man who brought them something new. As to the partisans of Italian opera, they were in arms ready to resist the German heresiarch to the bitter end. Gluck went to work prudently, seeking, in the first instance, to conciliate Rousseau, to whom he was introduced by the printer Corancez as a special favour. The philosopher, at that time, was hard of approach, and affected somewhat the manner of a misanthrope. Nevertheless, he took kindly to Gluck, and even engaged to look through "Alceste" for the purpose of giving an opinion upon it. The complaisance of the musician was scarcely equal to that of the man whose friendship he desired. For some reason or other Gluck took away the copy in a fashion which can only be characterised as rude. "I had begun this labour," wrote Rousseau to Dr. Burney, "when he recalled his opera, without asking for my remarks." It is not to be wondered at that, soon after, all intercourse between the two came to an end.

"Iphigénie" was soon put in rehearsal at the Opéra, and Gluck then discovered the immensity of the labour he had undertaken. Principals, orchestra, and chorus were alike bad, and the whole establishment lay under the influence of traditions utterly at variance with even the elements of dramatic propriety. Were we to give details upon this head, we should run a serious risk of exciting the reader's incredulity and losing his confidence. Suffice it that Gluck struggled bravely against incompetence on the one hand, and absurd regulations on the other, till, at last, the new opera was announced for April 13. But it was not played till April 19. A prominent artist had fallen ill, and Gluck would not proceed without him, thereby astonishing the directors and the public to the last degree. Such a thing was never known when the Court had promised to attend. What though the opera suffered by employing a substitute! Better that than disappoint royalty. Gluck had a different opinion—better disappoint royalty than damage his opera, and he stuck to it with inflexible resolution. So the Court carriages were countermanded at Versailles, and an impatient public had perforce to wait till the sick artist recovered, which he did by the date last named. The Opéra was crowded on the night of representation with all the rank and fashion of Paris, Marie Antoinette at their head, but the success of the work was little more than one of estime. A unanimous vote encored the overture; for the rest the public remained cold and calm, but not hostile. They were simply puzzled by a work foreign to their ideas and experience. Happily for Gluck, he had a splendid chef de clique in Madame la Dauphine, who beat her hands together at every opportunity, compelling Court and fashion to do the same. So there was plenty of formal applause, and the Princess went back to Versailles with her dull husband in a state of high delight. What she really thought of the whole matter appears in a letter written, some days later, to her sister in Vienna:—

"At last, my dear Christine, a great triumph. On the 19th took place the first performance of Gluck's 'Iphigénie.' I was transported with it; one can talk of nothing else; there reigns in all heads an excitement about this event as extraordinary as you can possibly imagine. It is incredible. People are divided and attack each other as though the matter were one of religion. At Court, although I publicly pronounced in favour of this work of genius, there are parties and discussions of singular vivacity. It is, I believe, worse in the city. I saw M. Gluck before the representation, and he himself expounded the nature of his ideas, which are intended to determine what he calls the true character of theatrical music, and restore to it naturalness. To judge by the effect upon myself, he has succeeded beyond his desires. M. le Dauphin came out of his calm, and found much to applaud; but, as I expected, if there were at the representation pieces which carried one away, the public in general hesitated. They do not know what to make of this new system after being used to one so different. To-day everybody desires to hear the piece, which is a good sign, and Gluck seems quite satisfied. I am sure you will be as happy as I am about this event."

To what further extent the unfortunate daughter of Marie Theresa championed her old music-master must be told at another time.

MY PUPIL.

SHE was about fifteen years old, the time when an English girl is at her worst in every respect. Formless, mannerless, apparently brainless and talentless, the only feeling she could excite was that of commiseration. I will call her Miss Smith, partly because that is not her real name and partly because, as the American humorist observes, it is a name full of poetry and wild unearthly music. (Her own music was wild and unearthly enough, goodness knows, especially when she attempted to play Schumann's Slumber Song with the right hand in E natural and the left in E flat and made the quavers and semi-quavers all the same length.) She had just joined the school and I at first believed her to be suffering an agony of shyness which prevented her answering the simplest question rationally and gave her that vacuous expression of countenance with which I am now, alas! only too painfully familiar. But it was worse than shyness—it was that utter shrivelling up of the intellect which afflicts young persons, especially of the female sex, the moment you try to make them clearly realise what they have previously known vaguely.

Worthy Mrs. — having given me elaborate and minute information as to my pupil's family history (which did not interest me in the least), there crept into the room, staggering under the load of a shabby and full-to-bursting portfolio, this awkward and unpromising specimen of girlhood in which I had some trouble in recognising an animated figure of which I had caught a glimpse through the playroom window as I entered the house, the figure of one seated on a table and elaborately "showing off" to the admiring circle of her new companions. Hastening to relieve her of the overgrown portfolio, I examined its contents. First (I probably began at the wrong end) came copies of Beethoven's Moonlight and Funeral March Sonatas, then a cheap edition of Mendelssohn's "Songs without Words," Chopin's Valse in A flat, and Schumann's Slumber Song. The rest was a mass of the feeblest drawing-room music. "Reminiscences of," "Fantasias on," "Transcriptions brillantes de" (this title, for some occult reason, is never Anglicised), and other distortions of threadbare melodies by men who could neither compose nor write for the instrument. Recommending my pupil to burn all this trash, I took the reduced repertory and endeavoured to gauge her abilities thereby. I have already mentioned her idea of the Schumann piece; the opening passages of the Chopin Valse were performed in such a manner as to make me enquire why she didn't use her pocket-handkerchief if she must dust the keys before playing. Needless to say that this question was received with the same apathy as all my other remarks. I had been assured that my pupil was exceedingly musical, but I should not have made this discovery myself, for she seemed to neither know nor care whether she played right or wrong, in time or out of time. The third and fourth fingers were so weak as to be practically useless, she had neither tone nor touch, moved no joint but the elbow, and used the pedal like the "swell" of an organ. After hearing her play several things in a smeary way and vainly correcting some of the worst faults, I pursued my investigations as to her technique. My enquiry for studies was received with languid surprise and at last a book of short characteristic pieces after the style of Heller was produced. The cover and several of the first pages were missing, and on asking my interesting pupil the title and composer's name of the book, I found that she had never thought of ascertaining. I remarked that it must give quite a romantic interest to one's studies not to know what one is learning.

"But have you no technical studies or finger exercises? Cramer? Czerny?"

"I think my sister has Czerny's studies." (All her replies were given in a timid whisper.)

"Do you ever play your scales?"

"Yes" (doubtfully), "sometimes."

"Try one now. Say, D major."

A bewildered pause of a few minutes. Then, after cautiously feeling the keys, which I assured her she would not find too hot, she climbed up and down the required scale, leaving out all the C sharps, and getting fearfully entangled in the fingering.

"That is quite an elegant scale. You use different fingers every time. I couldn't do that myself if I tried ever so."

"I haven't practised the flats—only the sharps."

"I see—that accounts for it. But I always prefer the scale of D to be played with two sharps. How many flats do you think there are in it?" (After a mighty pause)—"Five—no, three."

"Oh! And which are they?"

(Another long pause)—"F sharp, G sharp, and A sharp."

I felt as if mind was giving way; but summoning all my patience I explained, as clearly as I could, this complicated matter. I might as well have spoken in Greek or Chinese.

"Now play me the scale of D minor."

She instantly began the scale of B minor. Fresh explanation as to the difference between tonic minor and relative minor. More hopeless than ever. Having given her a book of scales and finger exercises I took an easy piece, and tried to make her read it at sight. This was a woful business; every note had to be sought out separately, and although she knew pretty well that one note, for instance, was C, she had not the faintest notion in what part of the piano that particular C resided. The way in which she gave the notes any duration she chose (of course, ignoring rests entirely) obliged me to enquire further into her technical knowledge. I then learnt for the first time (and promised to communicate the information to THE MUSICAL TIMES) that notes are called crotchets, quavers, minims, semiquavers, and semibreves, major and minor, that semiquavers are the longest, and either quavers or crotchets (she was uncertain which) the shortest. But it appeared upon enquiry that a semibreve was equal to two semiquavers, and a crotchet equal to three minims, so this seemed hardly right. She did not know what a dot after a note meant, but thought it either made it longer or shorter. Did not know the meaning of 8-va and a dotted line, of a slur or a tie, or any of the signs for grace-notes. Had always omitted all shakes and appoggiaturas, being incapable of making them. I felt inclined to tell her that if she made the acquirement of ignorance the business of her life she could never graduate with higher honours than at the present moment; but I was too exhausted for irony. The lesson came to an end, and I went and took a Turkish bath.

Weeks and months passed on, and the leaden dullness of my pupil was unchanged. By sheer force I got her to play a few simple pieces correctly, but I felt inclined to beg her not to practise at all, for it only implanted firmly in her the very faults I was striving to eradicate. In vain I played to her, told her interesting anecdotes, used flattery, scolding, praise, irony, and ridicule; I might as well have tried to interest the Wellington monument. Her eyes gave no sign of intelligence, not a muscle of her face moved; she remained as impassive as a bishop's butler. At the end of a year I looked back, and the review was most disheartening, as far as progress was concerned. Then came the Midsummer holidays again, and Miss Smith did not return to school till late in the autumn. Those three months had worked a marvellous change; I hardly knew my pupil again. Certainly she had gone from what are known as short things into long dresses, but that was not all. With her sudden stride towards womanhood she had made a wonderful progress in manner and bearing. She no longer crept into the room, but entered with a bow and a smile, and seemed no more afraid of the sound of her own voice. Still greater marvel—she began to develop a mind, and no longer made idiotic mistakes in her playing. She could sometimes remember that if there was an accidental it would apply to repetitions of the same note in the same bar. Though her fingers were still and have ever remained weak for lack of proper and systematic exercise-practice, they began now to lose their stiffness, at the same time that the hands assumed a more shapely appearance. Mind and body alike began to improve with strange rapidity, and at the end of the next twelvemonths Miss Smith, without possessing real talent for music, had become a fairly respectable player. The compliments I received on her account never gratified my vanity, for, if her progress was due to my exertions, how was it that the first year was completely barren of results? Of course, the next thing that happened was that she left school—just when she was beginning really to play. Two years afterwards I met her in society. She was just married, and a nicer, brighter young woman I never knew. She confessed to me, however, that she had never touched a piano since the day she left school. Do you recognise the original of this portrait, my brother professional? Her name is not Miss Smith, it is Legion. She is, in fact, the typical school girl whom we all teach in hundreds, and when I think of the enormous amount of time, trouble, labour, and worry thus absolutely wasted everywhere and everywhere I can only sigh and wish that I had been born a scavenger, or some such really useful artist, instead of a teacher of school girls. The scavenger and the chimneysweep, humble though their callings, earn the gratitude of the world by removing from it what is objectionable, while we musicians, who begin our career with lofty aims and aspirations, only inflict on the world what it would much rather be without—our compositions and our pupils.

F. C.

ALTHOUGH we hold the faith that genius will eventually make its way, there can be little doubt that many instances have occurred in which either a lucky chance or a sympathetic helping hand has very materially hastened this result. Of the first of these aids to popular recognition the following paragraph furnishes an instance: "About thirty years ago a poor little musical composer, very modest, and almost unknown, tried to sell the partition of an opera which had just lately been produced in Paris to some publisher, but nobody wanted it. Perhaps one of the music houses would have accepted the partition had it not been for the illustrious Berlioz, who advised him not to touch it at the price demanded—that is to say, a sum equal to 600 dollars. When the publisher had declined the music the young composer carried his manuscript to another house, but it was refused, simply because the first had done so. Strolling along the boulevard, the disappointed artist met a young gentleman named Choudens, a clerk in the Department of State. To him he related his troubles, whereupon Choudens said, 'Ma foi, but it is lucky we met. I am going to marry in a few days the daughter of a man who engraves music, and when we are married we shall start a music warehouse. I cannot afford to pay you 3,000 francs for your work, but I will give you 1,500 for it, if you will trust me for the year.' The composer accepted these terms and the work was printed. The name of the opera is 'Faust,' and that of the composer, Charles Gounod." This, if true, may indeed be termed the "lucky chance" which at once brightened the prospects of one who, entirely unknown, sought only the world's attention to achieve a fame which has gained in strength to the present day. But it must not be forgotten that there was also a "helping hand," and that this came not from France, but from England. In the columns of the Athenæum Mr. H. F. Chorley, then musical critic of the journal, not only drew public attention to the exceptional powers of M. Gounod, but from his own knowledge spoke in such glowing terms of his "Faust" that a widely-spread desire to hear the work was aroused, and it was mainly through his writings that the opera was produced in this country. This deserves to be recorded; and we are glad that the quotation of the above paragraph gives us the opportunity of mentioning one of the many instances of Mr. Chorley's intelligent and thoroughly impartial criticism.

THE magnificent new organ recently erected in the Public Hall at Worcester, the expense of which has been defrayed chiefly by subscription, leads us to direct the attention of all music-lovers to the instrument at Canterbury Cathedral, which dates back to 1661, was rebuilt in 1753, and again in 1784; seven pedal pipes were added by James Longhurst in 1825, and the organ was finally rebuilt by Hill in 1841, who, however, left the swell organ at tenor C, and the pedal organ with only one octave. Being, of course, wholly unfit for the performance of much of the music which the improved services of the Cathedral demand, a movement for the purchase of a new instrument, originating with Dr. Longhurst, the Organist of the Cathedral, was commenced as far back as the year 1875, and subscriptions began to be collected for the purpose. After reaching the sum of £434 5s. 6d., however, the matter seemed to be at a standstill, when the enthronement of a new Archbishop—an opportunity, happily, of rare occurrence—resuscitated the idea, which was taken up principally by the Laity, including the two county members, and other influential gentlemen, notably the Mayor and several members of the Corporation of Canterbury. It has been determined that, the necessary funds being secured, a new organ by the eminent builders, Henry Willis and Son, shall be built for the Cathedral, at an estimated cost of £3,150, exclusive of case; but unfortunately, in spite of the most unwearied exertions, only £1,204 have been promised. The Secretary of the College of Organists, Mr. E. H. Turpin, says of the instrument now in the Cathedral, "It is the worst organ of any of our Cathedral organs, its defects being only veiled by the great skill of the organist"; the Dean, in a letter dated March 13, speaks of it as "not merely small, but of such a kind as to render it impossible to introduce into the Cathedral service some of the finest sacred music"; and, on comparing it with the organs in other Cathedrals, it is found to be far smaller than the smallest; while, as compared with Ripon, Hereford, Lichfield, Winchester, Worcester, Durham, Chester, St. Paul's, Salisbury, and York, it is in each case less by one half, or more. It is difficult to believe that so noble a religious structure as Canterbury Cathedral shall be allowed any longer to possess an instrument totally inadequate to its requirements; and we earnestly hope, therefore, that the appeal of those deeply interested in the cause will be heartily and liberally responded to.

UNDER the heading, "A Piano and Organ Market in the Fiji Islands," we read in an American paper the following, communicated by the United States Consul, A. Van Camp, of Levuka, to the State Department: "Pianos and organs have long been the resources of our resident families as means of evening entertainment. Few makers of any note, whether English, French, German, or American, are not represented by their workmanship here. Unfortunately for the possessors of much of it, and perhaps equally unfortunate for the supplies, it has not withstood for any time the shrinking, warping effects of climate. Disabled, broken-down pianos and harmoniums are truly legion in these islands. The maker who will send us instruments capable of defying our climate may command the market, which is an ever expanding one." Now the American journals are teeming with advertisements of pianofortes and organs, each maker declaring that his instruments are vastly superior to any others, either in the States or elsewhere; one tells us that he will give a premium of a thousand dollars to any person who will produce a piano strung either with strings or wires which will prove, on trial, equal to the "Electro Gold String Piano"; another—manufacturer of the "Sterling Organ"—that his "popular American instruments" are "specially designed to resist all changes of climate"; and we need scarcely enlarge upon the merits of the world-renowned instruments made in other countries. How then is it that the Fiji Islands are left with "disabled, broken-down pianos and harmoniums"? Presuming that the United States Consul has not slightly overdrawn the picture, we can only imagine that the principal manufacturers are unaware of the state of music in this locality; if so, let them read the following extract from the same letter: "Singing and playing enter into the education of all the white and many of the half-caste of the youth of Fiji; and there are here skilful teachers and instrumentalists of high merit." Who, then, can deny that there is really a "Piano and Organ Market in the Fiji Islands"?

THAT part of the year popularly known by the name of the "silly season" is, undoubtedly, the time for continuing our specimens of "silly criticisms," and as, thanks to our correspondents, our stock is always well supplied, we at once proceed to give a few choice extracts. Our first is from the notice of a miscellaneous Concert, which it says "opened with a brilliant rendering, as an overture, of the instrumental performance, 'Caliph of Bagdad.'" In a Cantata which followed, a solo is said to have been "most artistically and appropriately accompanied with the distant and eventually crescendo beating of the drums, at the excellent manipulation of Mr. —"; a funny song "brought down the feet of the laughter-waving audience"; a cornet solo, "Barber of Seville," was well played and "pianofortely accompanied" by the performer's daughter; and a four-part chorus was "most appositely rendered." Another critique, on a performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah," tells us that "the chorus in 'Yet doth the Lord' acquitted themselves of the rather trying task with a skill that elicited a just succession with the music and the meaning, and perpetuated the moving sentiment of the oratorio with keenly sensible perception"; the solo "O Man of God" was sung "with an accentuated expression and purity of tone that made it almost uniquely enjoyable"; and the singer of the air "Hear ye Israel" gave to it "a sterling energy that well rang out the great behest which the music was designed to mark." In the following chorus, "Be not afraid," there was "a declension of the accentuation that was needed from the former, yet with a fuller volume, that typified well the motive idea." No doubt all this fine writing means something; but, as drowning men are said to catch at a straw, would it not be better for critics of this kind to cling to the bare facts, in order to save themselves from being overwhelmed in such a sea of words?

TRUSTWORTHY reports from Worcester state that the prospects of the forthcoming Festival of the Three Choirs are exceptionally good. The tickets are selling well, those for the "Redemption" best of all; the number as yet disposed of for Gounod's work far exceeding the issue for the "Messiah." This, of course, implies no comparison between the "Sacred Trilogy" and the "Sacred Oratorio," nor should it be taken as indicating deliberate public preference. The "Messiah" is known by heart, but the "Redemption" is to some an absolute, and to the best-informed a comparative, novelty. What the matter to which we now draw attention does show is this—that the "Redemption" has excited the deep and wide-spread interest which foreruns abiding popularity, and that its hold on the public strengthens with lapse of time. These points have been sufficiently tested since the Birmingham Festival of 1882. At every great Festival—that of Leeds excepted—held during the last two years, Gounod's religious masterpiece has been performed; in some cases, as at Gloucester twelve months ago, carrying off the honours of the occasion. From such evidence there can only be one conclusion even in the minds of those who may object that two years are not a sufficient period of trial. All circumstances go to show that the "Redemption" has taken its place with the "Messiah" and "Elijah" as a work the public expect to hear whenever Festival performances are given. In that position it will certainly embarrass Festival managers, who can hardly be expected to accept a stereotyped programme for three mornings. One of the three "indispensables" will have to retire, and the chances are that we shall presently see the "Messiah" and the "Redemption" amicably taking turn and turn before the public, presenting a noble contrast and showing how high and pure art can reach its goal by various ways.

THE BAYREUTH FESTIVAL.

THE "Parsifal Festival," as we may term it, closed on Friday, the 8th ult., after a series of ten brilliant performances on alternate days, commencing on July 21. The caste was in most respects the same as at the first performances given in 1882, under Wagner's own direction; the rôle of Kundry alternating between Frau Materna, of Vienna, and Fräulein Malthen, of Dresden (with both of whom the London public is now acquainted); that of Parsifal being taken by Herr Gudehus and Winkelmann, the former of whom, as also Herr Reichmann, was lately playing in London; the part of Gurnemanz alternated between Herr Scaria and Siehr; and that of Amfortas was taken by Herr Reichmann, except on the last occasion, when he, almost at the final moment, broke his engagement, and went off to fulfil one elsewhere. We mention this in order to give due acknowledgment to Herr Fuchs, who at the last supplied Reichmann's place, and played the part of the sick king without rehearsal, although he had only once, the previous year, taken that rôle. Too high praise therefore cannot be given for the admirable manner in which he rendered the difficult character of Amfortas, for, though to our thinking less effective as regards personal appearance, he was infinitely more so as regards voice. We have to regret the absence of Herr Hill, who in 1882 sustained the part of Klingsor; his place was this year taken by Herr Plank.

It is perhaps scarcely necessary to recall here the whole story of "Parsifal," which is now, we hope, becoming sufficiently familiar to all those who care for Wagner's works, but it may be well perhaps just to repeat the main points. They tell us how the knights of the Holy Grail on Monsalvat are waiting sadly and anxiously for the restitution of the sacred spear (supposed to be that which pierced the Saviour's side), which has been wrested from their king, Amfortas, by Klingsor, a magician; how in doing this Amfortas received a wound, from which he can never be healed until the spear is restored to its rightful owners; how none but a being perfectly pure and innocent will be able to recover it; how at length Parsifal appears, and how, after many and great temptations, out of which he emerges pure and unscathed, he obtains the spear which Klingsor aimed at him with intent to kill him; and how he then returns to the holy mountain of the Grail, and, curing Amfortas by touching his side with the spear, then takes his place as king and head, and thenceforth administers the sacrament, which it had previously been Amfortas's office to fulfil.

It will be seen at once that this is, in part at least, a religious representation, which can only be placed by the side of the Miracle Plays of old times and the Ammergau Passion Play. Let none, then, confuse it in their minds with the word "Opera." People talk indiscriminately of the "Wagner Operas," but however they may classify "Lohengrin" and "Tannhäuser," &c., let it be remembered that in "Parsifal" we are on other ground; and we cannot forbear to repeat here the words we took for a motto in a previous sketch of "Parsifal"—"Lasciate ogni pregiudizio, voi ch' entrate qui."* Thus, then, the character of Parsifal is intended, allegorically, to represent that of Christ, and in the last Act, where he is divested of his armour and appears in a flowing white robe, with flaxen hair and beard, we behold a living image of the Saviour as He is familiar to us in many of the most celebrated pictures. In the same scene Kundry represents the repentant Magdalen, and kneeling at Parsifal's feet she washes and anoints them and wipes them with her hair. Parsifal anoints her head, and blessing her, redeems her from her sin. In the first Act, in like manner, we have a representation of the Holy Supper, which is administered by Amfortas to the Knights of the Grail. The second Act is entirely secular in character, and portrays the temptations to which Parsifal is subjected when his steps have by chance led him to the domain of Klingsor—allegorically, the paths of sin. Here he is first allured by a troop of smiling and dancing maidens, arrayed as flowers, and while he is about to join in their games a voice arrests his attention, calling on his name. Kundry, who has been commanded by Klingsor to tempt Parsifal to linger with her in the magic garden, forgetful of all better purpose and higher aim, appears in the form and array of a beautiful woman; and after arousing his deepest emotion by telling him of his mother's death, she endeavours to awaken in his now susceptible heart the first feeling of love; but as she imprints a kiss on his lips he starts up with an expression of agony, and calls loudly upon Amfortas, of whose sufferings he had been a silent witness when, in the first Act, Amfortas had to administer the sacrament. Recollection is borne down upon Parsifal, and he feels in his own body the suffering of Amfortas's wound—again a Biblical idea. He spurns Kundry from him, and when she finds that earthly love can have no influence upon him she repents of her own evil ways and implores for salvation with and through him. This he promises her if she will show him the way to Amfortas, but in a frenzy of disappointed rage and despair she calls upon Klingsor to bar Parsifal's way; the spear is hurled at him, as already described, but instead of harming him it hovers miraculously over his head. Parsifal seizes it, and, making the sign of the cross, Klingsor's power is at an end, and he and his castle sink into the earth.

Reverting once more to Act I., we would especially single out as one of the most striking portions of the whole work the scene where Parsifal is conducted by Gurnemanz into the sacred hall of the Grail. We have seen them just previously in the green woods near the Grail mountain, and we now follow their windings up the steep and rocky path, where the scenery moves gradually before us to the grand and solemn, while strangely yearning and never-resting, music to which Wagner has wedded it. We pass great caverns and hollow rocky depths, into which, with a gradually diminishing light, the eye can hardly penetrate, until at length the music assumes a more restful character; the sound of deep-toned bells is borne upon our ears, and in the dimness we are conscious of a vast hall or temple, while solemn strains, as of a march, mingle with the bells; and returning daylight, and an ever-increasing volume of sound in the orchestra, work up to a climax, just as Gurnemanz and Parsifal enter the temple by a side door, and the Knights of the Grail, attired as Knights Templars (only with a white dove instead of a red cross on their cloaks), march in, and forming into procession take their place at a table on either side of the altar.

Another remarkable point is in the last Act, where again the Knights enter the temple in the same manner, but divided into two sections, the one bearing the pall-covered coffin containing the remains of the dead king Titirel, the other carrying the litter on which his son, Amfortas, lies; and as the two processions enter from opposite sides they chant in turn, the one section chanting an inquiry and the other a reply, in imitation of the Greek chorus of old; this is most effective and impressive.

Most notable, too, are the introductions to each of the three Acts. In the first we have the motives of the Grail, the "Pure or Guileless Fool," &c., &c., and the grand music of the temple introduced to us; in the second, a wild and restless music indicative of Klingsor's stormy reign; and in the last Act, a kind of resumé of previous motives, together with the unsatisfied and ever-striving motive that portrays Parsifal's wanderings before he succeeds in finding again the holy place. To speak in one general term of the whole music, we must say the impression left on the mind after many hearings is one of an intense, unsatisfied longing, as of one who is ever seeking after, yet never quite attaining, the ideal of his highest aims and desires. It is a haunting music, and for days and days after the performances are over the different portions keep coursing through one's brain, and, waking or sleeping, the "Parsifal Festspiel" seems to have taken complete possession of our being. Nor is there wanting a feeling of rest and peace, in contradistinction to the unrest described above. In the Grail motive, the motive of the "Reiner Thor," and the now celebrated "Good Friday music," strains at once hopeful and consoling, inspiring and holy, seem to calm the fever of life's unrest and to bid all tumult cease.

To compare "Parsifal" with Wagner's other works is, to our thinking, a mistake. It stands alone, both in its character of a sacred work and in its entire conception and carrying out. The effect on one's whole mind and soul is such as no other work has yet made upon us, and, as one of Wagner's deep admirers and interpreters has lately written—

Thou only so hast dealt with me that I Can be no more as if thou hadst not been.

One earnest protest must be entered here against the idea of bringing "Parsifal" away from the home of its birth. There are enterprising managers now offering enormous sums for the sole right of producing it elsewhere—this one in America, that one in Germany. But we believe we speak the wishes of all those who truly admire and appreciate the great Tone-poet when we say we earnestly hope that the "Weihfestspiel-Parsifal" may be consecrated to Bayreuth alone. We also trust that Wagner's wishes will continue to be faithfully carried out in respect to many minor details, where, it is to be deeply regretted, there are already signs that the master-spirit is no longer present. Surely in the very place where he gave this imperishable work to the world, in the very place where he himself is laid to rest, men will be conscientious enough still to carry out his last wishes, and not, even in matters of applause and demonstrations, and such like things, to pander to a vitiated taste and fashion!

An interesting reception took place at "Wahnfried" (Wagner's house), on the evening before the final performance of "Parsifal," when the guests were received by the daughters of the house, in the absence of Madame Wagner, who naturally could not go through such a trying ordeal. Once again, in the master's house, his own incomparable strains re-echoed through the large hall and rooms around, not a hundred yards from the leafy alcove where his earthly remains rest. One may take pleasure in thinking that something of his spirit descended upon the singers present, for never was Frau Materna heard to display her powers more magnificently than in the farewell song of Brünnhilde (the closing scene of "Götterdämmerung"), in which she was splendidly accompanied by Herr Joseph Rubinstein.

Wagner, the younger master, is gone; but there was still present one who bears his eighty years lightly, and o'er whom the events of a long, stirring, and celebrated life have shed a halo of veneration: Franz Liszt, though visibly aged since the last time we saw him, has still the mental vigour and faculties of many a man ten and twenty years his junior, and with memory unimpaired and intellect and affections undiminished, he moves about among us all, distributing here a kindly word, there a smile and mark of recognition, and here a friendly joke. He feels much interest in the forthcoming English edition of his "St. Elizabeth," the proofs of which he was at that moment correcting. It is wonderful to see him, at his advanced age, attending all the performances of "Parsifal," a reception here and there at Wahnfried, receiving callers by the dozen, and then, the very day after the Bayreuth performances are over, setting forth on a long hot journey to his Weimar home, and prepared to start thence again, a short couple of weeks later, for the performances of the "Ring des Nibelungen" in Munich!

However much the outer world may look with interest and with curiosity upon Liszt the genius, those only who have been privileged to come within his personal influence and friendship can know the whole charm of Liszt the man. May he be spared as long as life has aught of joy and interest to offer him, and may he still be present—a crown of glory—at the next performances of the "Weihfestspiel!"

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE Glasgow Choral Union Committee is engaged in completing arrangements for the eleventh season of Choral and Orchestral Concerts, to take place during the period from December 8, 1884, to February 14, 1885, and particulars are expected to be announced very shortly. From what I have heard, there is every reason to conclude that the high position these Concerts have hitherto held will be fully maintained during the forthcoming season. Mr. Manns will, of course, again be the Conductor, and the orchestra will be utilised in Edinburgh, Dundee, and other principal towns in Scotland as formerly.

The Glasgow Select Choir, under the careful and experienced bâton of Mr. James Allan, has long enjoyed the confidence of the musical public, not only of Scotland, but in many places in England, as an exponent of high-class vocal compositions. This season, I learn, the Choir's engagements are quite as numerous as formerly, and Concerts are arranged for in Glasgow and numerous other towns in Scotland, as also in Sheffield, Nottingham, and various other English centres, including the great metropolis itself, where, through the enterprise and foresight of Mr. Ambrose Austin, the Choir will appear in St. James's Hall in November and January for the fifth and second times respectively on the days sacred to the memory of St. Andrew and Robert Burns. The reputation of the Choir, I would like to explain, however, is not at all limited to the interpretation of Scottish music, as might not unnaturally be inferred by this latter reference to Scottish national celebrations. On the contrary, the Choir has shown itself a very worthy exponent of the best English part-music, past and present; and in their programmes for next season such compositions as Eaton Fanning's "Miller's Daughter" (likely to be a feature of the season), Champneys's "Rustic Coquette," Silas's "Softly fall the shades of evening," and Macfarren's "Break, break" will find a place. These, with numerous others of a similar character, will doubtless be produced by the Choir with the utmost success, affording, as may be said, an acknowledged model for interpretation by amateur Societies far and near. The Choir has, moreover, given exceptionally fine renderings of Dr. Stainer's "Daughter of Jairus" and of Henry Smart's "Jacob," and this season it is intended to produce F. Cowen's "Rose Maiden," Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion," and, probably, Zingarelli's "Laudate." The same earnest and conscientious attention to expression being given in the case of these larger works that is bestowed in regard to what curiously so commonly receives the greater amount of choral study—the smaller vocal pieces. The Glasgow Select Choir is especially rich in the male voice element—tenors and basses—and the fact has suggested the giving a little more prominence in their programmes than hitherto to part-music for men's voices. It is intended to include such highly esteemed, though hardly in our day sufficiently practised, male voice part-songs as, for example, "The Sabbath Call" and "The Chapel" from the "Orpheus" collection.

The Musical Union, located on the South side of the Clyde, and numbering upwards of a hundred male and female voices, announces its scheme for next season. The Society will devote itself chiefly to the interpretation of glees, part-songs, and anthems, especially those that are effective with a large body of singers. It is announced that several specially written compositions and arrangements will be produced. Mr. William Moodie, a musician of ability, is again the Conductor of the Society.

Another transpontine musical Society, the Glasgow South-side Choral Association, which is under the energetic care of Mr. James McKean, has announced its intention to bring forward Handel's "Samson," and practice has accordingly commenced with that view.

The City Hall Saturday Evening Concerts, carried on under the management of the Glasgow Abstiners' Union, will be resumed for the season on the 13th inst. This is the thirty-first year of these entertainments. Of their kind, chiefly consisting of ballads, they are always among the best. The engagements include such distinguished vocalists as Madame Patey and Miss Anna Williams, while among instrumental performers are Miss Bertha Brousil and Signor Tito Mattei, the Glasgow Select Choir also appearing during the Season. A duplicate series of the Concerts will begin, as before, later on, in St. Andrew's Hall, under the same management, though the success of these is hardly yet established.

A NEW SYSTEM OF ORGAN BUILDING.

WHILE much thought and skill have of late years been devoted to improvements in the construction of organs, no great change has taken place in their general arrangements, which still remain in their main features the German instrument of two hundred years ago; that is to say, they consist of a certain number of manual organs, with one pedal organ for bass, together with various mechanical aids. This one-pedal organ, originally intended as a bass for the great organ only (as shown by the music of the period), is not sufficiently sympathetic when used in the modern fashion as a bass to several manual organs of varied character.

It occurred to Mr. Thomas Casson, of Denbigh, an amateur of considerable mechanical skill, that the solution of this difficulty was to provide a separate pedal organ for each manual organ, and, with the advice of Mr. W. T. Best, this method has just been successfully applied by him to the organ at St. Mary's Church in that town.

The organ, which was opened by Mr. Best on July 29, now contains the following stops:—

GREAT ORGAN.

In order to follow out logically the theory mentioned above, since it was found impracticable to have more than one pedal clavier, each pedal organ (or pedaller) is attachable to the one clavier by means of a "help," consisting of a pneumatic stud under its respective manual. The help attaches its own pedaller and detaches the remaining ones. In each case the pedal couplers belong to their respective pedaliers, and if drawn they are simultaneously attached and detached. Each pedaller is under the control of the combination movements which govern the stops of its respective manual organs. It thus follows that the worry of constantly changing the pedal stops and couplers with every variation of manual power is entirely abolished. The pedal stops and couplers, however numerous, are under perfect and absolute control. The separate pedal organs afford means for providing exactly appropriate basses—e.g., the Bourdon and Trombone of the swell pedaller are in the swell box. The system allows of, but does not necessarily involve, recourse to a considerable amount of "borrowing," as practised by Walcker, Schultze, and other eminent foreign builders, though in a much more legitimate way—e.g., the trombone has but 12 pipes, the remainder being borrowed from the 17 lowest notes of the trumpet. This saves a great deal in room and cost. The "swell to great" coupler unites the respective pedal organs, as well as those of the manuals. Mr. Best was very much pleased with the organ, pronouncing it, for its size, one of the most effective that he had ever touched. He considers that Mr. Casson's system is beyond all question the correct one, an opinion in which Mr. Stimpson, of Birmingham, concurred. Amongst those who have watched the experiment with approbation and sympathy are—Sir F. A. Gore Ouseley, Dr. Rogers (of Bangor), Messrs. Lloyd (of St. Asaph), Bartholomew (of Ludlow), J. R. Alsop, H. A. Branscombe, D. C. Browne, W. H. Jude, J. S. Monk, E. T. Driffield (of Liverpool), &c.

THEIR Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales will honour the approaching musical Festival at Norwich with their presence, and will attend two performances. The Festival will commence on Tuesday, October 14, and will last until the following Friday. Tuesday evening will be devoted to Mendelssohn's "Elijah"; Wednesday morning, to Gounod's "Redemption"; Thursday morning, to Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's dramatic Oratorio "The Rose of Sharon," composed expressly for the Festival; and Friday morning to "The Messiah." The evenings of Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday will be occupied with miscellaneous Concerts, including an Elegiac Ode, composed expressly for the Festival by Mr. C. Villiers Stanford. It is probable that the Prince and Princess of Wales will attend the Wednesday morning and Friday evening performances.

We are informed that the programme of the Sacred Harmonic Society for the ensuing season will include the first performance in London of Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's new Oratorio "The Rose of Sharon," conducted by the composer; Berlioz's "Childhood of Christ"; a revival of Handel's "Belshazzar," as a commemoration of the bi-centenary of the composer's birth; Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," and other masterpieces of Oratorio. The leading artists engaged are Miss Emma Nevada, who comes to London expressly to sing in Mr. Mackenzie's new Oratorio, Miss Anna Williams, Miss Carlotta Elliot, Miss Annie Marriott, Madame Valleria, Madame Patey, Madame Isabel Fasset, Miss Marian Mackenzie, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Maas, Mr. Bridson, Mr. Thorndike, and Mr. Santley. Mr. Charles Hallé retains his post as Conductor, and Mr. W. H. Cummings as Assistant Conductor.

THE new organ erected by Mr. T. Fincham in St. Philip's Church, Dalston, was opened on Friday, the 1st ult. After a short service, and an address by the vicar, the Rev. F. Cox, M.A., an Organ Recital was given by Herr Leopold, Organist of Moorfields, the programme including compositions by Bach, Handel, and Guilmant. On the following Thursday a second Recital was given by Mr. T. Fincham, builder of the organ, and Organist of St. James's, Pentonville, who displayed the qualities of the various stops to great advantage. The instrument, which is much admired for its sweet and powerful tone, has two complete manuals and pedal, and contains twenty-two sounding stops, three of which are on the pedal.

We are informed that arrangements have been made by the Committee of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society for the production of Wagner's "Parsifal" at the opening of their season in November next, when they will have the assistance of four of the distinguished German artists who were selected by the late Herr Wagner for the original performances of the work given under his own direction at Bayreuth. By thus affording the English public an opportunity of hearing as an oratorio a composition which, in all probability, will never be given as an opera in this country, the Society will add one more to the many examples of that spirited policy which has ever characterised its management.

THE International Inventions Exhibition, to be held next year in the Exhibition Buildings, Royal Horticultural Gardens, South Kensington, is, according to the prospectus, to be divided into two distinct departments:—1. Inventions. 2. Music. The following is a detailed description of the second of these divisions, which promises to be of the highest interest to musicians: Instruments and appliances constructed or in use since 1800—Organs: details of construction; machines for blowing, hydraulic or otherwise; details of mechanism and the construction of pipes; pneumatic apparatus for keyboards and couplers, electric appliances, designs for organs, designs for organ cases. Harmoniums: American organs, vocalions, concertinas, accordions, varieties of reeds and air channels, details of construction. Wind orchestral instruments: (a) wood; (b) brass. Pianofortes (Grand, square, and upright): models of framings, castings, models of actions, pedal appliances, mechanical devices for tuning and transposing, wire and other material used in construction, designs for cases. Violins and instruments of the violin family: bows, strings, and inventions connected with these instruments. Harps. Automatic and barrel instruments. Drums, cymbals, and other instruments of percussion. Bells and carillons. National instruments of all countries not ordinarily used in orchestras. Sirens, tuning forks, pitch pipes, tonometers, and appliances for the determination of pitch. Miscellaneous musical appliances: metronomes, desks, seats, appliances for forming the hand; instruments for recording improvisation. Music engraving and printing—printed and engraved music and machines and appliances for its production. Historic collections—musical instruments and appliances; pictures, engravings, and drawings of musical subjects.

THE musical library of Julian Marshall, Esq., was sold by auction at the rooms of Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson, and Hodge, Wellington Street, Strand, on Tuesday, July 29, and two following days. The entire collection consisted of 1,339 lots, among which were many works of the greatest rarity. The whole collection, too, was remarkable for the fine condition of the books and the beauty of the bindings, both ancient and modern. A number of the choicest books were purchased for the British Museum. Mr. W. H. Cummings and Mr. J. E. Matthews secured many rare gems, as also did Mr. W. Reeves, of Fleet Street, the well known dealer in musical antiquarian works, no less than 496 lots falling to his share. Among the scarce works were Elwy Bevan's "Instruction of the Art of Musick," 1631; J. Croce, "Septem Psalmi pœnitentiales sex Vacuum," 1599; Carey's "Musical Century," 1739-40; Couperin, "Pieces de Clavecin," 1713; Frescobaldi, "Tociate," 1637; Gafori, "Practica Musica," 1496; D'Urfe's "Pills to purge melancholy," 1719-20; Hilton, "Catch that catch can," 1652; Locke, "Melothesia," 1673; Locke, "Vocal Musick in Psyche," 1675; Ravenscroft, "Melismata," 1611; Scarlatti, "Essereize per Gravicembalo," and Warren's "Thirty-two Collections of Canons, Catches, and Glees." The Collection had evidently been made with great care and judgment, and was undoubtedly one of the finest ever sold by auction.

THE Directors elected for the next (seventy-third) season of the Philharmonic Society are Messrs. W. H. Cummings, Gardner, Mount, and Stephens, and Dr. Gladstone; hon. sec., Mr. Francesco Berger. Sir Arthur Sullivan is appointed Conductor for the entire series of six Concerts, to be given February 26, March 12 and 26, April 22, May 6 and 20. Two rehearsals will precede each Concert, and to the second of these rehearsals subscribers will be admitted. Special interest will be felt in the production of a new Symphony, to be written for the Society by the celebrated composer, Anton Dvorák, who will conduct the first performance of the work. In the hope of encouraging the recognition of rising talent, the Directors announce a prize of twenty guineas for the best Concert Overture, the nationality of the competitors being unlimited; and as it is understood that other arrangements are in progress for the purpose of securing as many illustrations as possible of modern art, whilst paying due homage to the great masters, there is every prospect of a thoroughly satisfactory artistic season, its financial safety being assured by a guarantee fund which already approaches £1,000.

THE Apollo Musical Club at Chicago offers the following prizes for the two best four-part songs, with English text, for male voices unaccompanied: first prize, 100 dollars; second prize, 50 dollars. The accepted songs will become the property of the club, and will be sung at one of the Subscription Concerts of the coming season (1884-5). The competition is open only to composers now residing in America, in accordance with the following conditions: 1. The songs must not occupy more than eight minutes in performance. 2. All MSS. accompanied by a sealed letter must be sent to the Chairman of the Committee of Award, No. 152, La Salle Street, Chicago, Illinois, on or before January 1, 1885. The MSS. must not contain the name of the author, but must bear a fictitious name. The accompanying sealed letter must bear the same fictitious name on the outside, and also a return address, and must contain within the full name and address of the author. No letters will be opened until a decision has been arrived at awarding the prizes, and then only the letters of the successful competitors. The other compositions and letters will be returned to the return address indicated on the outside of the sealed envelopes. The Committee of Award reserves the right to reject all MSS. The following gentlemen have kindly consented to act as Committee of Award: Mr. William L. Tomlins (Director of the Apollo Musical Club), Mr. Hans Balatka, Mr. Clarence Eddy, and Mr. Philo A. Otis (Chairman).

A NORMAL class for the training of Music Teachers, held under the auspices of the Tonic Sol-fa College, at their premises, Forest Gate, closed on the 9th ult., after a session of one month. It was attended by about forty students and junior teachers from all parts of England, Wales, and Scotland, and special attention was given to the study of method in training choral societies, church choirs, and in managing the singing in elementary schools. The curriculum included the delivery of model singing lessons to classes of children, voice-training, harmony, and the writing of chords from dictation, musical composition, elocution, sight-singing, acoustics, vocal physiology, &c. The professors included Messrs. Proudman, McNaught, Venables, W. C. Harris, T. F. Harris, B. Sc., Behnke, Kestin, and Oakey, Mus. Bac., the whole being under the superintendence of Mr. Curwen, the president, and Mr. Griffiths, the secretary of the Tonic Sol-fa College.

THE 187th Monthly Concert of the St. George's Glee Union was held at the Pimlico Rooms, on the 1st ult. The programme was miscellaneous, and included solos by Miss Maud Cameron, Miss Edith Phillips, Miss Jeanie Rosse, Mr. Orlando Harley, Mr. W. Nicholl, and Mr. Pelham Roof, and several part-songs by the choir, among which were:—"Parting and meeting" (Hatton), "The welcome home" (Haking), "The sea hath its pearls" (Pinsuti), and "Good-night, farewell" (Garrett), the solos in the latter being taken by Miss Watts and Mr. H. Hannant. The pianoforte accompaniments were contributed by Miss Matilda Crimp, Mr. A. J. Hadrill, and Mr. Edwin Shute, and Mr. Joseph Monday conducted.

THE Chelsea Musical Society gave its seventh Concert on Tuesday evening, the 12th ult., in the Girl's School Room, Park Walk. The programme comprised part-songs, solos, &c., the first part being sacred and the second secular. In the former, Miss Ollive's rendering of "O rest in the Lord," and the duet "I waited for the Lord," by Miss F. Hughes and Miss Ollive, were greatly applauded. In the second part, Miss F. Hughes, Mr. J. Catten, and Mr. W. Powell were successful in their respective selections. The part singing was very good. Miss Amy Adams contributed two pianoforte solos.

FOUR Subscription Concerts will be given during the ensuing season by Mr. Willing's Choir, and an extra Concert is under consideration. The complete prospectus is not yet issued, but amongst the important works that will be given are Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's Cantata "Jason" and a Patriotic Hymn for Chorus and Orchestra, by Herr Anton Dvorák, which will be performed for the first time. The Choir will be considerably augmented, and the orchestra will, as before, be an especial feature. The list of Vice-Presidents has been increased, and includes, among others, the Earls of Northesk and Verulam, the Bishops of St. Albans and Bedford, Sir Fred. Ouseley, Sir J. Benedict, &c.

At the annual General Meeting of the Cheltenham Musical Society the Committee elected Mr. A. Von Holst Conductor, in place of Dr. A. E. Dyer, who resigned at the close of the season. A vote of thanks to Dr. Dyer for his invaluable services as Conductor of the Society for the last nine years was unanimously passed, accompanied by an expression of regret at his resignation of the office. With a view to enlarging the Society—which will commence its twenty-ninth season next month—it is now thrown open as regards membership.

A CONCERT was given at the Beethoven Rooms, Harley Street, on July 24, by Mdles. Schow-Rosing and Otta Brønnum (vocalists), and Mdle. Thekla Nathan (pianist), assisted by Messrs. Clifford Hallé and J. T. Hutchinson, and Mr. Kornfeld (violin). The Concert-givers received much applause for their selections and the Concert was an artistic success. Sir Julius Benedict and Mr. W. Ganz acted as Conductors.

MR. EDWIN BARNES, Organist of Holy Trinity Church, Paddington, gave an Organ Recital at the Royal Albert Hall, on July 31, when an excellent programme of works by Mendelssohn, Spohr, Handel, Rossini, &c., was provided. On the 13th ult. the same artist played a selection of classical organ compositions at St. James's, Westgate, Margate, in aid of the organ fund for the church.

MR. SINCLAIR DUNN gave an interesting lecture on the Jacobite times, illustrated by the songs of the period, at the Birkbeck Institution on the 6th ult. Mr. Dunn, who sang the well-known old ballads with much effect, was assisted by the Misses Fenn, and Messrs. Noldwitt and Fenton. The entertainment was received with marked favour throughout.

The monthly Organ Recital at St. John the Evangelist's, Waterloo Road, was given, on the 12th ult., by the Organist of the Church, Mr. Henry J. B. Dart, who played an interesting selection from the works of Bach, Mendelssohn, Raff, Smart, Hiles, and Guilman, and the whole of Barnett's Orchestral Suite, "The Lay of the Last Minstrel."

A LIST of the principal lyrical works written by Mr. Edward Oxenford, just published, contains the names of 60 operas, &c., and 900 songs and ballads. We doubt whether any author of Mr. Oxenford's age can produce so extensive a catalogue of the productions of his own pen.

We understand that Messrs. Ward, Lock and Co. are on the point of publishing an exhaustive treatise on the Violin and Violin-making, by Mr. Ed. Heron-Allen, the author of "The Ancestry of the Violin," "Violin-making; as it was, and is," &c.

In the list of successful candidates for the A.C.O. diploma at the Midsummer Examination of the College of Organists, given in our last number, "J. Firth, Shirley," should be J. Firth, Shipley.

THE Rev. Dr. Simpson, Sub-Dean of St. Paul's Cathedral, has consented to become President of the London Church Choir Association, in the room of the late Right Rev. Bishop Claughton.

REVIEWS.

Das moderne Musikdrama. Für gebildete Laien. By Ludwig Nohl. [Wien: Karl Prochaska, 1884.]

DR. NOHL, it must be admitted, wields a most prolific pen. Throughout the length and breadth of the field of musical history there is scarcely a topic upon which, in books, pamphlets, or journalistic contributions, he has not enlarged. He has moreover written a meritorious, if somewhat lengthy, life of Beethoven, and a sympathetic biographical portrait of Mozart; and he would undoubtedly have presented the world of amateurs likewise with a "Handel," a "Bach," and a "Haydn," had he not been forestalled by standard biographies of these great masters from other authors. Such, however, being the case, Dr. Nohl's literary energies have in a great measure become diverted into channels where he can scarcely hope to do justice to his undoubted ability—viz., the columns of not one, but of almost every existing German, and of many foreign, music journals. Literature of this description, however able it may be, is proverbially of an ephemeral character, and when individual literary labour has to be distributed over so extensive an area it is scarcely to be wondered at if Dr. Nohl's multitudinous journalistic efforts frequently bear the impress of a mind fully conscious of this ephemeral nature of his task.

We should scarcely have prefaced our notice of Dr. Nohl's book with these remarks were it not for the sincere regard which we entertain for his ability as an exponent of musico-historical subjects; an ability which, whenever fully engaged and brought to bear upon a given task, as in the case of the present volume, is sure to meet with due recognition. The perusal of the work before us has afforded us the most unqualified pleasure. The man who could thus enthusiastically, yet lucidly and concisely state the case and plead the cause of modern musical development, and more especially of the Musikdrama, should reserve his enthusiasm and powers of exposition for similar concentrated efforts, for by so doing he would render far greater justice both to himself and to the art he reveres. We have, as yet, but few able advocates of advanced musical thought, as represented in the works of Wagner and Liszt. Nor, we feel confident, will the admonition conveyed in these lines be disregarded by a writer of Dr. Nohl's far-sightedness and elasticity of mind. The present work, as its title indicates, addresses in the first place the "educated layman," but it may also be read with advantage by the professional musician to whom the most modern views in regard to the ultimate capacity of musical art are as yet "a mystery and a myth." In his survey of the progress of the cultivation of our art, the author proceeds with laudable impartiality. He even finds a place for Handel, side by side with Bach, which, it should be stated, is a concession not to be overlooked on the part of a writer of the Wagnerian school which, as a rule, all but ignores Handel, tracing true musical progress in a direct line from Bach to Beethoven, and thence to Wagner; the three forming the great landmarks of conscious artistic development. In a similar sense, it is refreshing to meet here with passages like the following: "As in nature the elementary and unconscious animal world by no means disappears after the crowning act of creation had produced man, so likewise are all those different forms and styles, which have preceded our present most directly appealing (persönlichste Rede) musical language, not lost, nor even are they mere preparatory steps, but co-existing, independent, and enduring"; an assertion which, if open to a charge of arrogance, from some quarters, at least shows the breadth of the author's treatment of the subject from his own standpoint. That by far the greater portion of the book is devoted to Richard Wagner—the originator of the "musikdrama" specially so called—need scarcely be said. Here again the "educated layman" in matters musical will meet with a great deal that is interesting and instructive, calculated to initiate him into the somewhat complex musical strivings of the present day. Among the chapters likely to afford him most direct information in this respect may be instanced those entitled "Der Musikalische Styl R. Wagners," "Die Idee eines Deutschen National-Dramas," and "R. Wagner und die Religion." Some interesting letters of Wagner, addressed to the author and published here for the first time, complete the attractiveness of a volume which cannot fail to be widely read and appreciated.

Mozart's Klavier Sonaten. Phrasirungs-Ausgabe von Dr. Hugo Riemann. [Berlin: N. Simrock.]

THIS is an interesting addition to the many existing editions of the great master's pianoforte Sonatas. Its distinguishing characteristic consist in a number of ingeniously devised signs interspersed in the text, by the due observance of which the pupil cannot go far wrong in interpreting these gems of classical musical literature much as they were presumably intended to be rendered by their composer. At all events, he will do so intelligibly, if not intelligently. The latter will depend very much upon the capacity of his teacher, and upon his own qualifications. There are marks here for absolute expression, as well as for the mere mechanical aids to it, such as staccato, mezzo-staccato, tenuto, &c. But what pleases us most in Dr. Riemann's system is the careful phrasing, or grouping, of the composer's ideas (his motive, as the Germans say), which is effected by means of curved lines, enabling the intelligent pupil to comprehend at a glance the whole structure of the miniature art-work before him, and which, moreover, should be an invaluable assistance to the teacher. Of course, it need hardly be said that the curved lines introduced for the purpose of grouping have done away with the accustomed slurs of former editions, the editor having invented other signs, answering the same purpose, in their stead. Whatever doubts may be raised as to the advisability of thus adding to the already sufficiently complex nature of our present musical notation, from the tyro's point of view, there can be no doubt that Dr. Riemann's "Phrasing Edition" of Mozart's Sonatas (which is shortly to be followed by a similar one of Beethoven's Sonatas) will prove a great boon to those teachers of the instrument who take a higher view of their art than that of merely reproducing the notes as they are placed before them; and to them we confidently recommend it. The edition is dedicated to Hans von Bülow, and is printed in exceedingly clear type.

21 Études Spéciales. Pour préparer à l'exécution des Ouvrages de Fr. Chopin. Par Stephen Heller.
[Edwin Ashdown.]

As the author of this work truly says, "It must, of course, be understood that these Studies apply only to mechanical difficulties. The secret of Chopin's style and expression can be discovered only by an earnest study of his works." What can be done, however, to help the student in mastering the executive portions of these compositions has certainly been most successfully shown in the Studies before us, which we cannot too strongly recommend to advanced pianists. The design of the publication will be best explained in Heller's own words: "Chopin is a writer of such masterly originality, not only in his creations, but also in his manner of composing for the pianoforte, in the structure of his accompaniments, in his treatment of scales, arpeggi, and combinations of all kinds, that a preliminary labour, with a view of acquiring a special technical power, is indispensable to the student of his works. With this view, I have chosen a certain number of passages from the works of Chopin, remarkable either in their construction or in the difficulties to be surmounted in their execution, and I have written a study on each, developing the theme and its technical peculiarities." It would be impossible for us to follow the Studies one by one and show how admirably the salient points of Chopin's various compositions are, we may say, imitated, in these technical exercises; but assuredly any student who can perform with accuracy and smoothness the passages in this work will encounter few formidable obstacles in the writings of Chopin. No one is more competent to produce such a volume than Stephen Heller; and certainly we could not name an artist who could more conscientiously and satisfactorily have fulfilled the task.

A Rhine Legend. A Cantata for Ladies' Voices. The Poetry by Edwin Oxenford. The music composed by Alfred J. Caldicott, Mus. Bac., Cantab.
[Robert Cocks and Co.]

THE legend upon which this Cantata is founded may be briefly described. In years long gone by a Princess was so indiscreet as to attempt to excel in sweetness the voices of the Water-fairies, who were in the habit of rising to the surface of the water to sing in the still evening. For some time they endured this insult to their vocal powers, but at length, in a fit of rage, they dragged the unfortunate Princess to their dwelling beneath the waters, the conditions of her release being that some maiden should be found who can really out-rival the Water-fairies in song. On Midsummer Eve, therefore, the maidens of the surrounding country assemble on the banks of the river, and endeavour by the exercise of their voices to procure the liberation of the Princess. To this pleasing little story Mr. Caldicott has wedded some appropriate and melodious music, written throughout with much artistic feeling, but simple enough to commend it to the attention of drawing-room amateurs. The Introduction and Chorus of Maidens at Sunset—commenced by the clock striking eight upon the dominant of G major—is attractive both in the voice parts and accompaniment; and without laying claim to any contrapuntal effects, the Chorus well expresses the unpretending words of the text. A Bolero, too, in E minor, with an effective change into the tonic major, two Choruses of Water-fairies, and the Trio, Chorus, and Finale, "Alas! no hope," may be cited as amongst the best pieces in the Cantata; but the solos have also considerable merit, and the figures in the accompaniment of all the vocal pieces show the practised hand of a musician throughout.

The Harmonium Album. Edited by J. S. Curwen. Vol. V. [J. Curwen and Sons.]

The American Organ Journal. Edited by J. M. Coward. Nos. 5, 9, and 10.

Arrangements for the American Organ. By F. Archer. Books I. and III.

Andante. By Beethoven.

Voluntary. By Chopin.

Ave Maria. By Schubert. Arranged for the American Organ by Louis Engel.

[Metzler and Co.]

Meditation for Harmonium. By W. H. Gavertal.

[Swan and Co.]

THE present instalment of Mr. Curwen's publication contains fifteen allegro movements for use as concluding voluntaries, by John E. West. The composer is unquestionably an excellent musician and possesses considerable fluency of idea. Within their range his pieces are as varied in style as possible, and are all well developed movements, not mere trifles of a few bars each. Mr. West has not always remembered that very full chords are ineffective on the harmonium, but for the most part he writes exceedingly well for the instrument. There are no directions for registering, this matter being left to the discretion of the player, as in Mendelssohn's organ music.

The American Organ arrangements of Mr. Coward and Mr. Archer are excellent, both as to selection and the manner in which the task of transcription has been carried out. One exception, however, must be noted in which Mr. Coward has added a feeble coda to the bridal chorus from "Lohengrin" to make the piece end in a pompous manner. For the rest the books consist of standard marches, airs, choruses, and instrumental movements from the best composers, with directions for registering according to stop nomenclature employed in the Mason and Hamlin organs. We regret that similar commendation cannot be bestowed on Mr. Engel's transcriptions. They are full of very grave errors—that is to say, arbitrary and uncalled for alterations of the composer's ideas, and passages so faultily written that the veriest tyro in harmony would feel ashamed of them. If the intention had been to bring discredit on arrangements and transcriptions generally it could not have been more effectively accomplished. The Meditation is a quiet, unpretentious piece of no great intrinsic value, but melodious and agreeable as far as it goes.

Elsie. Serenade for the Pianoforte. By Charles Gardner.
[Weekes and Co.]

THE small amount of original thought to be found in what, for want of a better name, we must term the "Drawing-room" music of the day, does not in the slightest degree prevent our clinging to the hope that in our hunt amongst the load of compositions of this class forwarded for review we may light upon at least two or three which deserve a good and encouraging word. Mr. Gardner's graceful "Serenade" has, in our last search, amply rewarded us for our labour, and we at once cordially commend it to the lovers of refined and unpretentious pianoforte music. "Elsie" indeed should be proud of her name, being associated with such a musical tribute. The theme is extremely attractive; and the appropriately simple arpeggio which accompanies it throughout materially heightens its effect. We particularly admire the interrupted close in the last line of page 4, the full close on the dominant being prolonged for three bars, and the original subject following, after a modulation into the key of the piece. Mr. Gardner need not doubt that any amount of such well considered trifles will receive a welcome.

Overture to "The Martyrdom of St. Polycarp." Arranged by B. W. Horner. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]
Postlude. By G. Gardiner.
Processional March. By Larlie.
Andante Cantabile. By E. Dearle.
Allegretto in F. By A. B. Plant.
Chopin's Prelude, No. 4. Transcribed by E. H. Turpin. [Weekes and Co.]
Marche, Le Cortège de Noces. Arranged by A. H. Brown. [B. Williams.]
Autrefois. Arranged by J. Partridge.
Three Pieces. By Dr. W. J. Westbrook. [R. Cocks and Co.]
Andantino. Arranged by H. Drew. [Duncan Davison.]

THE brilliant march from Sir Frederick Ouseley's Oratorio "St. Polycarp" is a popular organ piece; but we have here for the first time the overture from the same work. It is quite distinct from the march in style, being a dignified, though vigorous movement, in D minor, in strict form, and undoubtedly inspired by Mozart. The transcription has been so skilfully carried out that it might well pass for an original organ piece, and is equally suitable for a service voluntary, or an item in a recital programme. Mr. Gardiner's Postlude is in the form of a first movement in E flat, 9-8 time. It is bright and rather florid for the hands, but the pedal part is comparatively simple. The next piece on the list can only be considered in the light of a musical joke. The composer apparently does not know the compass of organ manuals, nor the method of writing for the instrument. As abstract music his piece is also destitute of any good quality. Mr. Dearle's Andante opens quietly, but develops in somewhat elaborate fashion. Some of the passages are rather crude, but on the whole the movement is clever and effective. The Allegretto with choral is rather vague and patchy in construction, the principal theme, in F minor, 3-4 time, being alternated with the choral in A flat, without any apparent design. The Chopin Prelude, which is known to all pianists, has been neatly arranged by Mr. Turpin. The piece was played at the funeral of the composer in 1849, and also at the obsequies of the late Duke of Albany. We never remember to have heard the march "Le Cortège de Noces," which Mr. Brown has transcribed for the organ, and it scarcely repays the trouble expended upon it. It is a flippant, not to say vulgar piece, and quite unsuited to the king of instruments, the lack of dignity being not compensated for by any melodic beauty. "Autrefois" is a transcription of a pianoforte piece by Mr. Brinley Richards. It is in the manner of a gavotte, and therefore not likely to be used as a voluntary by organists of taste. The idea of a flood of gavottes, bourrées, minuets, &c., as preludes and postludes, in our chaste Church of England service is too dreadful to contemplate. Dr. Westbrook's compositions consist of a March in G, an Air with variations in C, and a Pastoral in D. They are all written in a straightforward musicianly style, without any pretensions to individuality, but with ample knowledge of effect. Organists of moderate technical attainments will find them well within their means. The last piece is an arrangement of a movement by Sir Julius Benedict, originally composed for four performers on two pianofortes. It is elegantly and showily written, and if played with taste and finish would be extremely effective; but it should not be attempted by any except executants of the first rank.

The Music-Trades' Pocket Directory for 1883-4.
 [G. D. Ernest and Co.]

THIS little compilation is intended apparently as a supplement rather than a rival of the musical directories. It concerns itself exclusively with music trades as distinct from the profession, and contains alphabetical and classified lists of firms in London, and a provincial list arranged under the headings of towns in alphabetical order. So far as we have tested it, the information appears to be accurate, and the book will undoubtedly prove useful for purposes of reference. But in future editions it will be well to keep the contents proper clear of advertisements. In the case of a hurried consultation it is irritating and confusing to have to wade through pages of the latter before arriving at the spot where the desired information is given.

Reveries Caractéristiques. For the Pianoforte. Composed by Claudius H. Couldery. [Lamborn Cock.]

WE are glad to welcome Mr. Couldery's Reveries as worthy additions to the solid music of the time. We can scarcely say that the twelve pieces are equal in merit; but there is certainly not one weak number amongst them. No. 1, in A minor and major, with a flowing arpeggio accompaniment throughout; No. 4, in D flat major; No. 5, an Andante in A flat major, melodious and graceful in the extreme; No. 8, in D major, apart from its intrinsic merit, an excellent study for touch; and No. 10, a "Lento" in A major, are our especial favourites; but this, of course, is a mere matter of opinion; for, as we have said, they are all attractive in character and musician-like in treatment. We have on many former occasions spoken of Mr. Couldery's compositions for the pianoforte in terms of commendation, and are glad to find that he still adheres to the principle of displaying his inventive, rather than his scholastic, powers. There is so much music-making in the present day that we experience some difficulty in selecting from the mass of works forwarded to us anything which shows individuality in the writer; and although Mr. Couldery sometimes wanders too much in the beaten track, we have hopes that he will some day strike out a path for himself.

Thirty Preparatory Studies for the Pianoforte. By J. Hoffmann. [Edwin Ashdown.]

CONSIDERING the multiplicity of Studies written by past and present composers, it is difficult indeed to think of any novelty in the form of passages especially designed to train the hand. These Preparatory Exercises, however, if not evidencing originality, are so well planned and so carefully considered as to merit warm praise. The idea of giving Preliminary Exercises upon the figure which runs through the following Study is extremely good; and although perhaps there are somewhat too many in the key of C, we can conscientiously praise the manner in which both hands are written for in every number. The method of playing a turn upon a dotted note is well shown in No. 21—the way in which it is written being placed above—No. 29 is a good study for the acciaccatura, and we have also some refined little pieces, which will be found good exercises for variety of touch. As merely Preparatory Studies we can most cordially commend the selection under notice.

A Practical School for the Organ. By William Spark, Mus. Doc. [Edwin Ashdown.]

THIS work is the first instalment of an ambitious scheme to consist of a "curriculum of organ study," modelled on the plan of Mr. Charles Hallé's "Practical Organ School." Although instruction books and cheap editions of organ classics have been multiplied of late years there is always room for new works of merit, and Dr. Spark's undertaking will not fail to meet with such recognition as it deserves. The organist of the Leeds Town Hall has had ample experience, and he has furnished a useful tutor, which, with some necessary explanations from a teacher, will serve its purpose fairly well. The literary portion, however, is rather slipshod, the following quotation being by no means unfair as an example of the author's style: "It is assumed that before commencing to study the organ the student has learnt to play the pianoforte tolerably well at least, and that he is acquainted with the manual scales, as well as being possessed of some amount of reading power."

Gavotte in F. For the Pianoforte.

Composed by E. Silas.

[Weekes and Co.]

GAVOTTES are perhaps somewhat too plentiful in the present day, but Mr. Silas has earned his right to welcome in this class of composition; and although we scarcely consider the one before us amongst the happiest of his efforts, it is in every respect a musician-like and well-written piece. The Air de Ballet is attractive, and we conscientiously commend it to the notice of all who cultivate good solid music.

Where is my lov'd one? Song. Poetry by Miss Pardoe.
My Sweetheart. Song. Words by D. C. Hasbrouk.
 Composed by Charles Salaman.
 [Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.]

EVEN amongst the multitude of vocal compositions daily flooding the market, these two beautiful songs should make their way. Mr. Salaman has been long known as one of the most refined and poetical writers for the voice in this country; and we have here ample evidence that his powers are ripening with years. In the first song the charming conversational phrases for voice and pianoforte give the utmost interest to a composition replete with melody sufficient to attract, even with a conventional accompaniment; and the setting of the quaint words in the second song neither receives nor requires more than a sympathetic support from the instrument. If vocalists care to exhibit a composer at his best, we predict a lasting popularity for these unpretentious little poems.

Lips that beguile. Song. Composed by Popsie Rowe.
 [Alfred Hays.]

WE do not know who is responsible for the words of this song, but certainly music and poetry are sufficiently in sympathy to make us believe that they are from the same mind. A quaint phrase, in G minor, with appropriately simple harmonies, colours the verses effectively enough; but some little variety in the accompaniment would be welcome, especially on the return of the theme. The composer, however, whose name is new to us, sufficiently proves that she has feeling for melody; and we shall be glad, therefore, again to welcome her in something, we hope, of more importance.

Songs of Youth; for Voice and Pianoforte. By Mrs. Tom Taylor.

[Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.]

THIS volume of Songs is a welcome contribution to the high-class vocal music of the day. With the exception of No. 1, "The Owls," the words of which are by the composer, the poetry is not selected from the works of any living authors; but all the subjects are well chosen, and admirably adapted for musical setting. "Mariana's Song," from Shakespeare's "Measure for Measure," and the Dirge, "Yes, thou may'st sigh," from Scott's "Fair Maid of Perth," are excellent compositions; but all will fully repay that earnest study which they demand both from the vocalist and the pianist.

Why do I love Thee. Song. Words by Charles Mackay.
 Music by Cécile Hartog.

[Edwin Ashdown.]

MISS HARTOG is rapidly making her name as a song writer, one secret of her success being that her music is neither too popular nor too pedantic. Her artistic acquirements are shown just when they are wanted; and having the gift of melody, she appeals powerfully to all classes. The song before us must support, if it do not extend, her fame, and will no doubt command the attention it deserves.

Élégie. Pour Violoncelle, avec accompagnement de Piano. Par J. Hollmann.

[Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.]

So little good violoncello music is written in the present day that amateurs will be glad to hear of the clever and unpretentious Sketch before us, composed by the eminent soloist, M. Hollmann. The subject is simple and extremely melodious; and, although but little trouble will be demanded from the performer on either instrument, the composition will be certain to give pleasure to a mixed audience.

Inamorata. Valse Rondo. Words by Cedric. Composed by F. R. Barratt.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

VOCALISTS in search of melodies, even in the form of a waltz, will no doubt be attracted by Mr. Barratt's song. It is extremely pleasing, well accompanied, and has the merit of being a really excellent setting of the words, the short phrase in the relative minor, especially, most happily expressing the feeling of loneliness.

FOREIGN NOTES.

THIS year's "Parsifal" performances at Bayreuth came to a close with the tenth representation of this noble work, on the 8th ult. The house was crowded, and an enthusiasm more intense even than usual was displayed, both on the part of the executive artists in the rendering of their difficult task and on that of the audience upon the conclusion of the "Festspiele." When the curtain had closed for the last time, the assembled artists were addressed on the stage by the poet-composer's son, Siegfried, who, in the name of his mother, thanked them for their never-failing devotion to the cause of a worthy realisation of the national "Kunstwerk." Herr Gross, the staunch supporter of the "Festspiele" in former years, and now the trustee of the Wagner family, hereupon stated, "that the artistic success of this year's 'Parsifal' representations had likewise been accompanied by a material one. Nevertheless, it was not thought advisable—pending the decision of a question at law, which had since been raised—to renew the "Festspiele" until the year after next, when 'Tristan und Isolde' would be alternately performed with 'Parsifal' during the space of two months." The reason why "Tristan" should thus be singled out and placed side by side with "Parsifal" will be found in the fact that the former work may be summed up as an exaltation of earthly or human love, while the latter is concerned solely with the triumph of superhuman or divine love.

Thus, then, it would seem that the famous little town of Bayreuth will have to dispense with its annual influx of art-loving visitors next year. But the decision of Herr Gross, the banker, who appears to have become the impresario of the "national" undertaking since the death of its great originator, may yet be countermanded. It seems to us scarcely a wise or diplomatic step to allow an important element in the propaganda for the modern "Kunstwerk," such as the "Festspiele" undoubtedly are, to drop out of the ranks for the space of two years. Unless, therefore, Herr Gross be really the prime mover in the matter, as representative of Wagner's heirs, the German nation or its musical representatives, should take it in hand, or else cease to talk of the "Festspiele" as a "national" concern. The alleged question at law resolves itself, so far as we are aware, to a matter of difference between the heirs of the composer of "Parsifal" and the holders of the copyright of that work, Messrs. Schott, of Mayence; not, however, as affecting the stage performances at Bayreuth, but in regard to the representation of the entire music of "Parsifal" in the concert-room. Herr Pollini, the Hamburg opera director, had acquired this privilege of the publishers, as stated in these columns some time ago, but Herr Gross, in the supposed interests of the Wagner family, disputes the right, on the part of the eminent Mayence firm, to grant such privilege, since only certain fragments of the work were, according to the composer's intentions, to be produced apart from stage surroundings—i.e., in the concert-room. Can anything more detrimental to a cause be imagined? Here are some thousands of amateurs, both in Germany and elsewhere, anxious to become acquainted with this, the latest manifestation of Wagner's genius, but unable to go to Bayreuth in order to obtain a complete impression of the work. We should have thought that an entire musical representation thereof, albeit detrimental to the dramatic intentions of its author, would be infinitely preferable to an acquaintance with the few fragments at present granted to the public outside Bayreuth. There may, indeed, be other questions pending, bearing even upon the repetition of the stage performances at Bayreuth, that we know not of, and to which the above remarks of Herr Gross may have had reference. According to our present lights, however, it appears to us that the last production of the most stupendous musical genius of modern days belongs to the world in general, and that, its stage representation apart, if it is to be reserved to Bayreuth, the music should at least not be withheld from the public generally. The sooner, therefore, the heirs of Wagner settle the dispute with the publishers, the better for their cause.

In connection with the recent "Parsifal" performances, and under the auspices of the central committee of the "Allgemeine Richard Wagner Verein," an interesting volume has been published, entitled "Bayreuther Festblätter in Wort und Bild," the proceeds of which are intended to swell the general fund for the preservation of the "Festspiele." The volume contains a number of papers concerning the poet-composer and his art, and is moreover adorned by numerous artistically executed illustrations. Artists and litterati of various nationalities have contributed to the work.

Wagner's "Meistersinger" will be produced next season at the Brussels Opera, with the French translation of the book by M. Victor Wilder. During the same season Weber's "Oberon" will be performed at the same establishment, after an interval of over thirty years.

The projected "model-performances" of Beethoven's "Fidelio" took place on the 15th and 17th ult., at the Munich Hof-Theater, with Fräulein Malten as Fidelio, and Herr Niemann, as Florestan. Two complete performances of Wagner's "Ring des Nibelungen" were announced to take place at the same establishment, from the 19th to the 24th and the 26th to the 31st of the same month, with an ensemble composed of the leading Wagner interpreters of the day.

The competition of the Male Choirs of Germany, in connection with the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Männer-Gesangverein of Bonn (alluded to in our June number), resulted in the victory of the "Hilaria" Association of Aachen (Aix-la-Chapelle), who were awarded the gold medal, offered by the German Emperor, and a handsome vase on the part of the Empress.

The new building in which the famous "Gewandhaus" Concerts, of Leipzig, will in future be given is approaching its completion. During the coming season twelve of the usual twenty-two Subscription Concerts are to take place in the new and ten in the old building.

The third part of Dr. Riemann's "Opern-Handbuch" has just been published, extending as far as "Don Quixote" in its enumeration of operatic works.

The fact of a commemorative tablet having been placed against the former residence of a once celebrated musician, 350 years after his death, speaks well both for the solidity of the structure itself, and for the generations by whom his memory has been kept green so long; and is, moreover, an unquestionable sign of the times. The house we speak of is situate in the Pfeifergasse, at Salzburg, and the tablet recently placed on its venerable walls bears the following inscription:—"Here lived and died Paul Hofhaymer, in his time music's greatest master, born at Radstadt in 1459, died at Salzburg in 1537." Turning to our old friend and counsellor in such cases—viz., the "Dictionary of Musicians," London, 1824 (Grove's work does not contain the name at all), we are told that "Hothaimer (John?), organist to the Emperor Maximilian I., in the fifteenth century, is stated by the musical historians of Germany to have been a very skilful performer." To this scanty information the Wiener Signale adds the following: "Paul Hofhaymer devoted himself from an early age to the study of music, more especially to that of organ playing, and so distinguished himself that he was considered by his contemporaries the greatest master of his art. 'Princeps musicorum, qui in Germania parem non habet,' as his biographer describes him. Hofhaymer, at one time in the service of the Duke Sigmund, of Tyrol, after the death of the latter entered the service of the Emperor Maximilian I., who, in recognition of his exceptional merits, raised him to the rank of his nobility." We are not told how the claim of this princeps musicorum to a commemorative tablet came to be publicly recognised at last by the good people of Salzburg, but are nevertheless glad to be able to record the fact, albeit some 350 years have elapsed since the death of their illustrious citizen.

An opera, entitled "Frithjof" (an often-treated subject), by Heinrich Zöllner, at present musical director at the University of Dorpat, has found much favour at a first reading with the authorities of the Cologne Stadt-Theater, and will shortly be produced there for the first time.

Herr Victor Nessler's latest opera, "Der Trompeter von Säkkingen," successfully produced at Leipzig some few months ago, is likewise to be brought out at Hamburg, where the tenor engaged for the title character, Herr Brucks, will introduce a new feature by executing in propria persona the trumpet solos assigned to the itinerant hero whom he is to represent. Assuming the versatile singer to acquit himself creditably of his self-imposed task, a step forward will, at any rate, have been made, from an æsthetic point of view, in the matter of extraneous operatic stage business since the days when the tenor Wachtel first created a marked effect by the scientific manner in which he cracked his whip in the "Postillon de Lonjumeau."

At a two days' Music Festival held last month at Saarbrück, Handel's Oratorio "Samson" was performed on the first day, the second being devoted to the execution of a miscellaneous programme.

Herr Bilsse, the famous Berlin Conductor, is just now engaged with his excellent orchestra upon a Concert tour throughout Germany and Holland, meeting everywhere with a most enthusiastic reception. Considerably over one hundred Concerts have already been given, and many more will have been added to this number before the indefatigable capellmeister will resume his orchestral performances at Berlin, on the 1st of October next.

We again draw the attention of our readers to the forthcoming festivities at Eisenach, in connection with the unveiling of the Bach monument, the date of which has been definitely fixed for the 28th inst.

The last composition by Friedrich von Flotow, the composer of "Martha," has just been published by his widow at Darmstadt. It is a song entitled "Der blinde Musikant" ("The Blind Musician"), the words to which have been written, at the express desire of the composer, by G. L. Mohr. Flotow, as may not be generally known had himself become all but blind during the last few years of his life.

An opera by the late Otto Claudius, whilom Cathedral Organist at Naumburg, entitled "Der Gang nach der Eisenhammer" (founded upon Schiller's poem of that title was produced at that town on the 4th ult. for the first time, though composed in the year 1847, and very favourably received. The opera is said to be conceived in the spirit of C. M. von Weber, and thoroughly dramatic in its effects. Claudius, who had hitherto been chiefly known as a successful composer of songs for male choir, was an old friend of Richard Wagner, who had spoken in terms of the highest praise of the opera now submitted for public judgment, some seven years after the death of its composer. The work, which has since also been produced at Hal, is likely to be placed on the répertoire of many other German establishments.

An address, signed by German musicians, instrument makers, and others interested in the matter, has been presented to Prince Bismarck, as Chancellor of the Empire, embodying a petition for the early introduction throughout Germany of a normal musical diapason, similar to that already adopted in France and Italy. The same subject as regards Belgium, was discussed during the recent Congress of Musicians at Brussels.

Anton Rubinstein is just now engaged upon the completion of the score of a new opera entitled "Der Papag (The Parrot). The libretto is from the pen of Herr H. Wittmann, and is founded upon a humorous story of Oriental origin. The opera will, it is stated, be first brought out in November next by Director Pollini, of the Hamburg Stadt-Theater, where the same composer's Biblical drama "Sulamith" was also produced for the first time last year under the personal direction of Rubinstein. Both Antwerp and at Ghent, Rubinstein's opera "Nero" being prepared for a first performance during the coming season.

M. Camille Saint-Saëns's Opera "Henri VIII." will be produced, as the first novelty of the season, during the coming winter, at the German Theatre at Prague, under the direction of the composer. M. Saint-Saëns will then proceed to Vienna, where his Cantata "La Lyre et la Harpe" is to be performed, and where also he will part in some other Concerts in his capacity of pianist.

The new Grand Theatre at Geneva is to be opened about the middle of this month with a performance of Massenet's Opera "Hérodiade," under the direction of its composer. The four succeeding operas to be produced at the new establishment—amongst them Wagner's "Lohengrin," in a French version—are to be conducted by four of the most eminent French composers, though they are, and which of them is to conduct "Lohengrin," has not as yet been definitely stated.

Our French contemporary, L'Art Musical, insists upon Mr. Gilbert A'Beckett, the able author of the libretto of "Savonarola," being two persons. In a recent number of that journal the opera in question, on the occasion of its performance at Covent Garden Theatre, was referred to as the joint production of "Messrs. Gilbert and Beckett." A "correction" of this notice follows in a subsequent number of L'Art Musical (August 15) to the effect that M. Villiers Stanford had, in fact, written the music of that work, while "Messrs. Gilbert and Beckett are the authors of the libretto." The difficulty in this case, of course, lies in the problem of how to make corrections, if they are to be made, correctly. Our esteemed contemporary's colleague, Le Ménestrel, has been much wiser in this respect, by taking no further notice of its own jeu d'esprit, contained in No. 22 of its present issue, wherein it makes the following announcement concerning Dr. Stanford's "The Canterbury Pilgrims," viz., "Le directeur, Carl Rosa, va représenter la semaine prochaine une œuvre nouvelle du docteur Stanford. Si les médecins (sic) se mettent à présent à traiter la musique, nul doute qu'elle ne succombe à brève échéance." Let us hope that modern English music will be better understood, before long, in La belle France than the names and the titles of its composers appear to be at present.

Subscriptions have been opened in Paris for the erection of a monument to Rudolph Kreutzer at his native town, Versailles. Kreutzer, who was born in 1766, of German parents, was a distinguished violin player and professor of that instrument at the Paris Conservatoire, for which institution he wrote, in conjunction with "Les citoyens Baillot et Rode," as its title states, a valuable "Méthode de Violon." It was to him Beethoven dedicated his Op. 47, the world-famed "Kreutzer Sonata." He died in 1831 at Geneva.

The theatres of Marseilles and Toulon, in consequence of the cholera epidemic, are closed, and the artists engaged at these establishments are consequently thrown out of employment, finding it almost impossible to obtain engagements elsewhere. The fourth general meeting of French Choral Societies, which was to be held at Paris about this time, has, for the like reason, been postponed until May, 1885.

Two pupils of that successful professor of vocal art, Madame Mathilde Marchesi—formerly of Vienna, now of Paris—have recently met with a most enthusiastic reception at Siena (Tuscany) in the title-roles of Bellini's "Romeo e Giulietta." The ladies in question are Signora Vittoria Coppi (of Florence) and Miss Alice Neyma (of Chicago), and their success has been such that twelve representations of the opera were announced.

From the annual Report of the national Conservatoire at Madrid it appears that the number of pupils of both sexes at that institution during the year 1883 has amounted to 2,190.

A question, of little importance in itself, but interesting to the compilers of biographical dictionaries, appears at last to have been finally settled. The age of the Maestro Verdi has been variously stated in books of reference, some fixing the date of the composer's birth as October 9, 1814, while others state that event to have taken place on October 9, 1813. Both dates, however (as has been recently ascertained from the civil registers of Busseto, in the former Duchy of Parma), are incorrect. Verdi was actually born on October 10, 1813. He received the baptismal names of Joseph Fortunin François, and is now in the seventy-first year of his age.

The world-famed theatre, Della Scala, of Milan, is at present closed for an indefinite period, and is undergoing extensive repairs, which for some time past it has stood in need of.

Our Turin correspondent writes: "The projected musical Festival, to be held here in connection with the present Exhibition, has been abandoned on account of the prevailing cholera scare. The Orchestral Concerts of the Exhibition have, however, to a great extent made up for the loss, both the Neapolitan and the Bolognese orchestras having produced a most marked effect under the conductorship of the Maestro Mancinelli. Boito's 'Mefistofele' and Rossini's 'Tell' are being rehearsed at the Regio Theatre here for its opening next month (September), but what with the quarantine and the dread of the epidemic (though the death-rate here is, as a matter of fact, much lower than usual at this time of the year), there appears to be little chance of an exceptional influx of foreign visitors this season."

The death is announced, on the 1st ult., at Währing, near Vienna, of Ernst Löwenberg, professor at the Vienna Conservatorium, and an eminent pianist, who had rapidly made his way to public favour. He was only twenty-eight years of age.

C. A. Buchholz, the senior of German organ-builders of the present day, a man of superior culture and technical knowledge of his art, died at Berlin last month at the age of eighty-eight years.

We have also to record the death, at the age of seventy-five, of Johann Andreas Grabau, a virtuoso of the violoncello, and for over fifty years an esteemed member of the orchestras of the "Gewandhaus" and "Euterpe" Concerts of Leipzig.

CORRESPONDENCE.

RIEMANN'S OPERN-HANDBUCH.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—You will doubtless permit me to add a few words of my own to the letter which has appeared in the current number of your esteemed journal concerning my "Opern-Handbuch."

When I first undertook the compilation of this work, both my publisher and myself were agreed that I should confine myself to the operas en vogue, and to those of recent date. But, as is usually the case with undertakings of this description, the work grew under my hands, and I can now confidently assert that, although relative completeness can only be attained in future editions, a sufficient mass of information will be conveyed in my book to justify its title, and which will, moreover, be supplemented by the final part, which is to complete the volume. I have, as a matter of course, made frequent use of Clément's "Dictionnaire Lyrique," as I have of many other sources of information for my purpose. Unfortunately, however, Clément's work is very misleading, being crowded with errors, both of omission and commission, literally copying, as it does in many instances, the mistakes of Fétis in all particulars. Notwithstanding this, I should be sorry to appear as if underrating the assistance which Clément's compilation has afforded to my work. I shall, moreover, find space, at the conclusion of the "Handbuch," to enumerate all those sources of information which have been made use of by me.

Concerning the various settings of Goethe's "Claudine von Villa Bella" referred to by me, I may mention that a number of these are entirely omitted by Clément, while, as correctly stated in your review, the composition attributed to Gottfried Weber should have been ascribed to Christian Godfried Weber (born in 1758), whilom Court-musician at Stuttgart, several other works of whom will be found enumerated in the fourth part of my "Handbuch." These and other corrections and additions will find a place in the final part of my laborious undertaking, while any suggestions in this direction will be gratefully received by

Your obedient servant,

THE LATE JOHN ALCOCK, MUS. DOC.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—In answer to your correspondent "O. D." in your July number, I should like to say that the words of the anthem "Behold, how good," by Dr. Alcock, are to be found in Mr. Joule's anthem book, published in 1859; but I do not know where the music is to be seen. I should think Mr. Joule could inform your correspondent.

I should wish, with your permission, to avail myself of this opportunity of apprising the composers of anthems that I have made a catalogue of every anthem that I can hear of; I have used the contents of about fifty anthem books, and collected the names of rather more than 5,000 anthems, representing nearly 1,000 composers. My object in compiling this catalogue is that I may make the second edition of my anthem book (if ever it is required) as complete as possible. Therefore if composers will kindly let me know the names of their anthems, and where the music of the same can be seen, I shall feel much obliged. In my catalogue I have the names of thirty-four anthems by Dr. Alcock, and copies of the music of twenty-nine of them.—I am, yours faithfully,

A. H. MANN.

EFFECT OF GAS ON CHURCH ORGANS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—The idea which Mr. Swinbourne proposes—of enclosing the whole organ with thin calico, in order to keep out the heat of the gas, &c.—was carried out several years ago at St. Margaret's Church, and although the organ is in the most favourable situation, being in the North transept, with walls on three sides, and the canvas was carried the whole way to the ceiling, it was practically useless. It no doubt was useful in keeping the dust out of the organ, but, in its turn, got so dirty that I am now having it taken away. My enquiry was whether wire gauze would be more effective, as perhaps the hot air might be cooled in passing through; and as the complaint of the organ being put out of tune by the gas, &c., is so general, it would be of great use if some one could suggest some practical plan to remedy the evil.—Yours truly, Altrincham.

J. MATTHIAS FIELD.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

*.* Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all Subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

E. W.—It is not correct to take breath after the word "right." The phrase should be sung in one breath; but if this cannot be done, breath must be taken after the word "defence."

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

BOLTON.—The various bands of instrumentalists in Bolton and the neighbourhood have recently formed themselves into an Association for the purpose of giving music in the public park every Wednesday evening, and to lend countenance to the movement the Mayor of the Borough and several influential gentlemen have become patrons. On the 6th ult. open-air Concerts were given at intervals, and greatly enjoyed by large audiences. No collection is made, the bands being satisfied with the receipts from the sale of printed programmes.

BRISBANE.—On Monday evening, July 7, a Lecture on "Music" was delivered at the rooms of the Young Men's Christian Association, by Mr. W. H. Wilson. The lecturer traced in an interesting manner the growth of the art from the earliest times down to the period of Beethoven, dealing fully with the English ballad and madrigal, and giving an admirable sketch of the work of Bach and Handel, and the rise of instrumental music. The interest of the Lecture was much enhanced by the illustrations of the various styles of music which were rendered by Mr. Simmonds's choir and a lady amateur.

CAPE TOWN.—The success of the Diocesan Choir Festival held in the Cathedral on All Saints' Day, 1883, was fully repeated on the evening of July 22, in the rendering of Dr. Stainer's new Oratorio St. Mary Magdalen. As on the previous occasion, this satisfactory result is owing almost entirely to the efforts of the Precursor, the Rev. E. Bury; and the energy and enthusiasm which he threw into the by no means small undertaking appears to have been infused into all who gave their assistance. Including the supplied choir, there were about 150 voices in the choruses, the soloists being Miss Bergh, Mrs. Roskelly, Mr. Stapleton, and Mr. Allen. The work is well worthy of the name of Dr. Stainer, and those who listened to it could not but have admired the appropriate and judicious selection the Rev. Mr. Bury had made for his second great musical service in the Cathedral. The soloists had evidently most carefully studied both the music and the words. In the opening the recitative descriptive of the Magdalen anointing the feet of Jesus was given with taste and feeling by Mr. Allen, the tremolo passages in the organ accompaniment adding a peculiarly pathetic effect to this and several of the subsequent numbers. The song (St. Mary Magdalen) "Ah, woe is me! What tho' my voice of wailing Through the long night ascends to Angel ears," was beautifully sung by Miss Bergh, whose sympathetic soprano is admirably adapted to bring out the charming music to which the words of this song are set. Mrs. Roskelly also acquitted herself with success in the contralto song, "Happy art thou, Magdalena; Happy are thy woes and fears"; and Mr. Stapleton did full justice to the tenor recitatives and song "Oh! thou that weepst." The choruses were smoothly rendered, and among them may be specially noticed "Rest in peace, Thou thorn-crown'd King"; the solo and chorus of the angelic choir, "He is not here! Death's solemn doom Could ne'er the Lord of death retain," in which the words "He is not here" are reiterated pianissimo with excellent effect. The concluding chorus with quartet, "Magdalena, past is wailing," with its joyous refrain of "Hallelujah! Christ is King," was finely given and artistically led-up to by a series of short bass, tenor, and soprano recitatives. The Oratorio produced a most favourable impression on all who heard it, and those who gave their services on the occasion deserve every credit for the manner in which they rendered so fine a work for the first time in this country. It must be mentioned, in conclusion, that Miss Stephenson at the pianoforte and Mr. Thomas at the organ displayed much ability as accompanists.

LAMBOURN.—Mr. G. H. Swift, Organist and Director of the Church Choir and Choral Society, on his leaving for a similar appointment at Hungerford, was presented with an illuminated address and a purse of money in appreciation of his valuable services during the last four years. The presentation was made by Mr. H. Hippesley, who presided on the occasion.

LEEDS.—A crowded audience assembled in the Victoria Hall on Saturday evening, July 26, at the last Concert of the season. Not only was the body of the Hall completely filled, but the balcony and orchestra were also crowded, and about 1,000 persons were unable to obtain admission. Dr. Spark had provided an attractive programme, comprising, in addition to his own Recitals on the organ, vocal performances by Miss Emilie Marshall, Mr. H. Gilbert Jackson, and the Leeds Harmonic Union of eight singers. During an interval between the parts, Canon Bullock paid a high compliment to the talent and energy of Dr. Spark, whose Free Organ Recitals, he said, had been listened to with the utmost pleasure by about 30,000 people since September last.

NEWNHAM-ON-SEVERN.—A Concert, in aid of the Church Choir Fund, was given at the Town Hall, on Monday, the 17th ult., before a large audience. Miss Mary Morgan, R.A.M., greatly pleased by her rendering of two songs; and Miss Agnes Barling, Miss Gwynneth Morgan, and Mr. E. C. Jones were also highly successful in all their vocal pieces, the applause after every solo being both warm and well deserved. Amongst other singers who appeared were Miss Annie Morgan, Messrs. William Frank and John Morgan, Simmonds, Trotter, and Jennings. Mr. Ernest Colville contributed some violin solos with much effect, and part-songs by the Church Choir were exceedingly well rendered.

REDRUTH.—A very interesting Organ Recital was given in the Methodist Free Church, Illogan Highway, on the 7th ult., by Mr. W. H. Jewell, Organist Congregational Church, Heywood, Manchester, formerly Organist of the above church. The selection included works by Herman, Vincent, Resch, Bach, Scotson Clark, and the Organist. Miss H. Rogers, Miss J. Jewell, and Mr. W. H. Trelease rendered able assistance vocally, the latter gentleman contributing a composition of his own, "Neath the old oak tree."

SHANKLIN. I. W.—Mrs. Bishop gave a Concert in the Hall of the Literary Institute on Thursday, the 14th ult. The artists were Mr. Bishop, pianoforte; Mr. F. Baker, harmonium; Miss Riley, violin; and Lady Rose, Miss Wilmers, Messrs. Levy and D'Arcy Fernis, vocalists. The Hall was well filled, and the performance highly successful.

SHEFFIELD.—An excellent performance of Mr. G. F. Root's popular Cantata The Haymakers was given in the Albert Hall on Saturday evening, the 16th ult., by the members of the Philharmonic Society. The choruses were well sung, and the solo vocalists, Misses A. Hill, L. Hales, and Sprawson, Messrs. Wooding, Kirby, and Mounsey, were highly efficient. Mr. Arthur Kaye, the Society's Conductor, directed the performance; Mr. G. H. Rimmington presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. Charles Best at the harmonium.

SIBBERTOFT.—The members of the Choral Society gave their annual Morning Concert on Thursday, the 21st ult., when was performed for the first time a Cantata entitled The Little Mermaid, founded on Andersen's Fairy Tale, words and music by the Rev. J. C. Berkeley (formerly Organist of Lancing College). The work was very well received, the numbers which pleased the audience most being the Chorus of Invisible Spirits, "Oh! Muriel," and the song "Farewell, dear love," admirably sung by Miss Rose Berkeley. The first part was miscellaneous, comprising solos and duets by Chopin, Schubert, and Brahms, played by the Rev. J. C. Berkeley and Mr. M. Berkeley, R.A.M., and two songs, by Beethoven and M. V. White, sung in finished style by Miss Boys.

SOUTHPORT.—A very successful competition for amateur reed bands was held in the Winter Gardens, on Monday, the 4th ult. The event is more worthy of note inasmuch as it is the first competition of this class of band held in Southport, if not, indeed, in this part of the country. There were ten entries, and seven bands put in an appearance—viz., Moorside Mills, Oldham; Heywood Unitarian Temperance; Saddleworth; Droylsden Village; Leeds Constabulary; Crewe Railway Works; and Wigan Borough. The conditions were that each band should play a selection of its own choosing, and a new vase by H. Round. The judges were Mr. Joseph Gags, professor of music, Manchester; and Mr. T. C. Jones, Conductor of the Liverpool Vocalists' Union. The playing of the bands generally was marked by sound musical taste, the combination of reed and brass instruments for amateur bands being a pleasing feature. At the conclusion of the contest, the bands, en masse, played a new march, "The Tempest," under the conductorship of the composer, Mr. H. Round. The first prize was awarded to Moorside Mills (Conductor, Mr. J. Wadsworth); second prize, Droyladen (Herr Grosse); third prize, Saddleworth (Mr. J. Gladney); fourth prize, Heywood Unitarian (Mr. J. Gladney); fifth prize, Wigan Borough (Signor Nifossi). The value of the prizes amounted to £72 7s. 6d., and included two very valuable clarinets, by Rudall, Carte, and Co., and Cubitt and Co., London. The instruments went with the first and second prizes.

SOUTHSEA.—On Monday evening, the 18th ult., the Pavilion on Clarence Pier was crowded to overflowing, the occasion being one of the most successful Concerts ever given in the building. The vocalists were Madame Clara West, Madame Joyce Maas, Miss Lottie West, and Mr. Horcroft. Orchestral selections were given by the band of the Royal Marine Artillery, under the direction of Mr. J. Winterbottom, and Mr. Godwin Fowles acted as pianoforte accompanist.

STAFFORD.—An Organ Recital was given by Dr. Taylor in St. Mary's Church on Tuesday, the 12th ult. The programme included compositions by Handel, Smart, Stainer, Guilman, and Lemmens, all of which were excellently rendered. Miss Annie Lea was the vocalist.

WILMSLOW.—On Sunday, July 27, the organ which has been fitted up by Messrs. Stringer and Co., of Hanley, in the Methodist New Connexion Chapel, Hawthorn Street, was opened by Mr. Samuel Moss, of Macclesfield. The instrument formerly stood in the old church of Astbury, and was originally built at a cost of about £700 for King George the Fourth, in 1829, by Messrs. Flight and Robson, for the pavilion at Brighton. A few years ago the instrument was reconstructed and modern improvements added, and it now contains two manuals, about 1,000 pipes, and 20 stops, with three composition pedals. Special services were held afternoon and evening, the preacher being the Rev. J. White Ridley, of Southport. Mr. Moss played during the day a selection of pieces by Handel, Haydn, Scotson Clark, and an "Extempore" Andante of his own.

WOLVERHAMPTON.—An Organ Recital was given by Mr. J. C. Clarke, on Friday, July 25, on the organ erected by Messrs. Nicholson and Lord for the Wolverhampton Fine Art and Industrial Exhibition. The programme included Bach's Fugue on St. Anne's Tune; Weber's Jubilee Overture; Fantaisie Pastorale (Wély); Chant Seraphique (Guilmant), &c. Miss de Surencourt and Mr. Bott were the vocalists. Mr. Clarke's playing was much appreciated.

WORCESTER.—Thanks to the exertions of some energetic gentlemen and the contributions of others, the citizens of Worcester now possess as fine an organ as any community could desire to grace its Public Hall. When the Hall was destroyed by fire some two years and a half ago, the organ placed therein shared the same fate as the building. The Town Council, however, having received the sum for which the late instrument was insured, voted a certain amount of money for a new one; but this not being sufficient, the good offices of the Rev. Canon Cattley, whose efforts in this direction are so well known, were at once enlisted to procure subscriptions; and the result is the erection of a magnificent instrument by Mr. J. Nicholson, at a cost of about £2,200. The organ is admirably adapted for Concert use, which was the aim of all connected with the scheme. Indeed, for solos and orchestral purposes it will rank among the best instruments in the provinces. The balance of power is so perfect that in "building up" not one single stop is found discordant among the others. Special provision has been made for solos by the construction of a splendid solo organ, but in addition to the stops in the solo portion of the instrument, the choir organ also contains many which can be used for solo purposes in combination with stops in the solo organ. The orchestral effects are such that there is hardly any instrument which cannot be imitated by one or other of the stops. The inaugural ceremony took place on July 31, when an excellent Concert was given, the powers of the organ being most advantageously displayed by Mr. A. J. Caldicott, Mus. Bac. (who suggested the plans for the construction of the instrument), Mr. Quarterman, and Mr. Waring, Mus. Bac. During an interval the Dean of Worcester (Lord Alwyne Compton) handed the key of the organ to the Mayor, and paid a well-merited compliment to the Rev. Canon Cattley, whose indefatigable services in the cause were also acknowledged in a speech by the Mayor, Mr. W. B. Williamson.

S. CHILDS CLARKE; Music by Dr. DYKES, DEAN ALFORD, Mr.
LANGRAN, and the editor, Mr. A. H. BROWN. Price 2d.; words only, 2s. per 100.

"The hymns, which include a fine Processional, are excellently written, and as suitably set; and if music is ever to win its way, will assuredly become great favourites at harvest festivals. They vary considerably in metre; but gladness and thanksgiving are the twin keynotes of all."—Western Morning News.

"A very excellent set of hymns, and most suitable for country parishes."—Church Times.

"The tunes are much in the current vein of thought, pleasant, tuneful, and having a part-song flavour. Nos. 1 and 3, by the editor, are fresh and effective, and No. 5, by the same composer, is elegant in its melody, and smooth in its harmony. No. 6, by that man of many accomplishments, Dean Alford, has a not unpleasant flavour of mixed antique and modern thought. Mr. Langran's (No. 4), a plain note against note tune, will be found to sing well. Dr. Dykes's (No. 2) is elegant and melodious, and set in the quasi-ecclesiastical measure, six-four, a time borrowed by the church from an early period of modern dramatic music. The tunes will not fail to please modern choirs."—Musical Standard.

"We would specially draw attention to the unusually good common metre tune 'St. Angelus,' No. 5, which might well pass for a composition of 250 years ago."—Church Herald.

NEW HARVEST ANTHEM.

FEAR NOT, O LAND. Composed by S. C. COOKE
Easy and effective. Price 3d.

UNISON ANTHEMS for VILLAGE CHOIRS Composed by ROWLAND BRIANT. Though your sins be

THE HOLY CITY

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"The work is an honour to English Art, and has elevated its composer into a place of distinction amongst native musicians."—Queen.

"A good sound musical work is this 'Holy City.' I have no hesitation in saying that it creditably represents English art, and does honour not only to the skill but to the judgment and taste of Mr. Gaul." Daily Telegraph.

"The reception was favourable in the extreme, and the Cantata must henceforth be classed among the successes which the Birmingham Musical Festivals have brought to light."—Standard.

"The Holy City' is evidently the work of a thoughtful as well as a clever composer, and should make its mark among thoroughly English productions of a sacred character."—Musical Times.

"We hope and believe that the reception given last night to Mr. Gaul and to his 'Holy City' Cantata will prove an earnest of its popularity and acceptance throughout the length and breadth of the land."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"A most interesting, tuneful, and scholarly work."—Manchester Courier.

"This fine work will considerably enhance Mr. Gaul's reputation as a musician."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

Vocal Score, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; Ditto, paper boards, 3s.; Ditto, scarlet cloth, 4s.; Voice parts, for the use of Choral Societies, each 1s. A selection of Soprano and Contralto Movements for School Use, 1s. 3d. Band Parts on Loan. Tonic Sol-fa Edition, 1s.

RUTH

MUSIC BY ALFRED R. GAUL.

"Ruth' is a work of sterling power; its musical form is that of perfect tunefulness combined with simplicity and strength. There is nothing involved about it, nor the least straining after unattainable effects. The composer has grasped his theme in a thoroughly sympathetic manner, and has produced a work which is worthy of the subject. . . . One of the sweetest numbers in the cantata is Ruth's solo, 'Entreat me not to leave thee,' which is instinct with pathetic expression. . . . Boaz's solo, 'Go not from hence, my daughter,' is another effective number. . . . A chorale, 'Nightfall,' is an exquisitely beautiful conception; and the intermezzo, 'Daybreak,' and the jubilant Wedding Chorus which follows, are full of spirit and vivacity, rushing forward with a joyous bound that carries the audience completely away. An enthusiastic encore was given to the intermezzo and chorus."—Bradford Observer.

"That the idyllic story of Ruth is one admirably adapted for artistic illustration is unquestionable, and poets, painters, and musicians have over and over again made it a subject for the exercise of their talents, and we have no hesitation in saying that in its poetical and musical treatment by Mr. Oxenford and our townsman, it has been invested with increased interest. . . . Pieces such as Mr. Gaul's Opus 34 are much wanted, and we believe that when the 'Ruth' Cantata is heard in our Town Hall it will be at once accepted as a valuable addition to our stock of music suitable for performance by fairly advanced and advancing societies."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"Bright, tuneful, fresh, and musically—this work will be a great favourite, and will add to Mr. Gaul's reputation. The second part will be liked better than the first; it opens in the harvest-field, and here the real idyll begins, and with it the charm and grace and freshness of Mr. Gaul's inspiration. The maidens' chorus, bright as the morning it greets, and the men's robust and vigorous reply, well introduce the fresh and melodious joy-breathing music of Ruth, the chastened yet hopeful address of Naomi, and the hearty generous welcome of Boaz. . . . The work closes with a short but spirited chorus, 'Rejoice, for blessings round us fall,' which will bear comparison with anything Mr. Gaul has written. An effective fugal passage carefully worked out, but not overdone, is inserted between strains of joyful acclamation of considerable freshness and vigour."—Birmingham Weekly Dart.

"Ruth' has been set to music by several composers; none, however, has become so worthily popular as the Cantata under notice. Although somewhat simple in parts it contains some charming music, and is highly characteristic of the story it so vividly illustrates."—South Wilt Express.

"Full of flowing melody."—Salisbury Times.

PROSPECTUS.

Some years have passed since Mr. Joseph Bennett began, in the Musical Times, a series of biographical notices which are still far from ended. The original purpose was a limited one—namely, to throw light upon the personality of famous musicians by means of extracts selected and arranged from their letters and other writings. Hence the series had for first title "The Great Composers, sketched by themselves."

Consequent upon the remarkable favour with which the notices were received, it was determined to extend their scope, and, while making prominent the Masters' own testimony, to deal with each subject in a complete biographical form, as far as allowed by the limits necessarily imposed. The words "sketched by themselves" were therefore dropped from the title.

It was further resolved to make additions in the case of the composers dealt with under the original idea, and to issue the notices separately as "Primers of Musical Biography."

The intention of "Novello's Primers of Musical Biography" is to convey, as clearly as the limits of an elementary work will allow, a just idea of each composer's personality, and to record the principal events of his life. Knowledge of what a man is helps the understanding of what he does. These little books may serve, therefore, as a first step towards acquaintance with the genius and compositions of the masters to whom they are devoted.

For the copious extracts made from letters, &c., throughout the series, no apology is offered. They are the best material upon which to base an estimate of character.

LIFE OF MOZART

BY

OTTO JAHN

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN

BY

PAULINE D. TOWNSEND.

THREE VOLUMES, CLOTH,

WITH FIVE PORTRAITS,

AND

PREFACE BY SIR GEORGE GROVE, D.C.L.

Price £1 11s. 6d.

THE TIMES.

"Mr. Grove, in his brief and able preface, calls the publication in an English dress of Otto Jahn's famous biography of Mozart 'an event in our musical history,' and his statement cannot be considered an exaggeration. . . . The English public is to be congratulated upon a translation of his monumental effort which may without exaggeration be called excellent. Miss Townsend has done her work with skill and conscientiousness, and we doubt whether a much more careful comparison with the original than we have thought it necessary to undertake would discover many, or any, serious blunders."

DAILY NEWS.

"He (Jahn) has made admirable use of Nissen, with his laborious compilation, and of all other authorities, and he has succeeded in producing a work which is complete without being confusing through excess of detail, and in which the interest of the narrative is not broken by undue reference to other writers who, treating of the same points, have treated them differently and often incorrectly. . . . The work has been well translated, and it is prefaced by a brief but interesting introduction from the pen of Mr. George Grove."

THE ATHENÆUM.

"It is with great pleasure that we are able to speak in terms of the highest praise of the manner in which Miss Townsend has acquitted herself of the by no means easy task of translation. In so voluminous a work as the present it is almost inevitable that a few slips should be found; but those that we have noted are not only extremely rare, but mostly of slight importance. . . . We have done inadequate justice in this review to one of the most important works in the whole domain of musical literature; our excuse must be the absolute impossibility of dealing fully with it within reasonable bounds. We conclude by most cordially recommending it to all who are interested in music, and need only add that the printing and general appearance of the volumes are worthy alike of their contents and of the reputation of the firm which publishes them."

HERO AND LEANDER
A DRAMATIC CANTATA

FOR SOPRANO AND BARYTONE SOLOS, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

THE LIBRETTO WRITTEN BY F. E. WEATHERLY

THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY

CHARLES HARFORD LLOYD.

Price One Shilling and Sixpence.

TIMES.

"Throughout this well constructed piece the music is impressive and very delicately scored. Among the remainder of the numbers Hero's monologue and the final elegy on the death of the lovers deserve special mention.
Mr. Lloyd's cantata earned the applause it fully deserved."

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"Judged as a whole, 'Hero and Leander' strengthens hope of the young Oxford musician, who should now be numbered amongst our coming men."

STANDARD.

"'Hero and Leander' was received with signs of unequivocal gratification, and at the conclusion Mr. Lloyd was heartily called back to the platform to receive the plaudits of the public and the executants who had laboured in his behalf."

DAILY NEWS.

"The work is replete with musical interest, and is well written in its choral and orchestral details, which were thoroughly well realised. 'Hero and Leander' will doubtless be in request by choral societies."

MORNING POST.

"The vocal portion is elegantly written, the expression of hope to which the music leads is admirably brought in, and the work ends in a fashion which leaves the hearer well pleased both at the design and the execution. Unlike many of the works written for like occasions and heard no more, 'Hero and Leander' will occupy a permanent place in the répertoires of choral societies, as its many merits will increase with better acquaintance."

DAILY CHRONICLE.

"The chief characteristic of Mr. Lloyd's music is its entire suitability to the subject. Its melody is fluent and rhythmical, the instrumentation is not so heavy or complicated as to throw the vocal parts into a secondary position, and over all there is the warmth and glow of color appropriate to the incidents and the scene."

ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

"There is much merit in the music—sufficient indeed justify its repetition in London, and its wide acceptance by choral societies."

ACADEMY.

"Is a work of much charm and considerable merit."

THE MUSICAL TIMES

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.

OCTOBER 1, 1884.

OUR FIVE HUNDREDTH NUMBER.

THERE are times in the life of every man when circumstances invite him to halt on the road of life, look back upon the distance he has traversed, and gather up experiences for help along the path yet to be trodden. As with men, in relation to themselves, so as regards the things with which they are connected. Wise retrospection is never out of place; in its very nature it cannot be profitless. "The Past," says Captain Marryat, "is the text-book of tyrants." That may be, but the Past is also, for sensible souls, a store-house of wisdom—a manual crammed with lessons written, not by the flowing pen, but the slow finger of Time, which does nothing in a hurry, and, though often misinterpreted, never makes mistakes. Happy those who, looking back, gather sage counsel without self-reproach; still happier they who see cause for thankfulness in that their way has no memories of clouds and darkness, only of sunshine and pleasant travel.

This is the Five Hundredth Number of THE MUSICAL TIMES, and, surely, here, if anywhere, we may be pardoned for indulging in a harmless form of egotism, and devoting a page or two to the journal whose voice we are. Our faithful readers, at any rate, will look leniently upon such a course. They have shown a real and personal interest in the journal, which has reached so interesting a stage in its career, and will be quick to sympathise as we review its past, and look forward with hope to its future. Five hundred issues represent in this case more than forty years of life and activity. This is a long time in the history of a class paper, and entitles us to claim for THE MUSICAL TIMES whatever honour belongs to age. But the period, regarded as an art-period, is longer than its years. It covers almost the entire era of what we now call modern music, and runs parallel with the actual popularising of the art in England. No small interest—may we add no small profit?—can fail, therefore, to attend ever so brief a retrospect of our journal's existence.

THE MUSICAL TIMES is the child of the great movement towards musical education which began nearly half-a-century ago, and the fact, we are proud to say, has ever been remembered by its conductors, not as a mere matter of sentiment, but as the basis of a principle. Our journal, in its modest beginning, was popular and educational; as such it has continued to the time present; as such it will remain in the future. It has grown with the growth and strengthened with the strength of music amongst the masses. Let the reader be good enough to remember this as he follows our remarks. There is significance in it, not to say comfort and encouragement for all who are really concerned about the advance amongst us of the most humanising influence, next to religion, with which Providence has blessed the world. It has been said that THE MUSICAL TIMES had a modest beginning, but how modest very few may know, and still fewer remember. About the year 1840 there was a stirring in the valley of dry bones. Till that time music—we refer to it, of course, as an art—had acquired no sort of popularity. It was not taught in schools, or practised among the people by more than a small minority, made superior to circumstances by the energy of a God-given passion. Those were the days of professional choristers, and generally of musicians as a class apart, somewhat looked down upon, in the spirit of Lord Chesterfield, and by multitudes regarded as people whose parents and guardians had failed to bring them up in the way they should go. It is a fact that signs of musical endowments in a lad were then commonly regarded as a just cause for alarm and precaution. The path of music led sooner or later into the much travelled road whose gate is wide and whose way is broad. So thought thousands of anxious, loving parents, acting up to the light of that Puritanism which has left so ineradicable a mark upon our England. But for long years before 1840, growing intelligence and the wider sympathies resulting from the operation of many civilising agencies, had been preparing a great change. At length came the hour, and with it the man—nay, two men, one of whom has only just gone to well-earned rest. Our present concern does not lie with the late Mr. Hullah. He did his part, and no mean one, towards the awakening of the nation to musical life, but took no such step as that with which his fellow-worker and rival, Joseph Mainzer, built himself an enduring memorial. Every reader of musical history knows that Dr. Mainzer and his "Singing for the Million" speedily became a household word throughout the length and breadth of England. Mr. Hullah's labours were, for the most part, confined to the metropolis, but those of Mainzer, either in person or vicariously, embraced the whole country. Hence it was that "Singing-Classes," on one system or the other, sprang up everywhere, from big towns to small villages; thousands rushing to join them under the idea that a "royal road" had at length been found into the very secrets of the art. Enthusiasm, of course, did not survive disappointment, but at the outset it spread through the country like a flame, and then occurred to Dr. Mainzer the happy notion of, in some sort, binding the detached classes into one by the connecting link of a journal. For those days, the step was bold. It was also prophetic, since now no cause, whether in trade or profession, religion, science, or art, is complete without a special organ in the press. August, 1841, saw the birth of Mainzer's National Singing Circular, and before August came round again that venture had merged into one of a more ambitious character, namely, Mainzer's Musical Times and Singing-Class Circular. We have used the word "ambitious" in connection with the beginning of THE MUSICAL TIMES; but it must be taken merely in a comparative sense. Truth to tell, nothing could be more unpretending than the first series of our journal, even when, as happened with the issue of the third number, a piece of vocal music, adapted to singing-class use, became a feature. But though a modest little sheet, THE MUSICAL TIMES of that day met the want which Mainzer discerned. A more comprehensive and costly journal would, perhaps, have missed its mark entirely, because the only public wish was for cheap singable music, combined with news of the movement in which so many people took a lively interest. Presently, the enterprise passed into the hands of Mr. J. Alfred Novello, and entered upon the course of steady development it has ever since pursued.

The circumstances of this journal, in the hands of an active publisher, exceptionally qualified, by the possession of valuable copyrights, for carrying it on to advantage, were all that the most sanguine could have desired. It was not merely that the mass of the nation had begun to feel interested in music, but also that the available supply of unhackneyed important works was practically inexhaustible. The era of the great classical masters had ended but a short time before, if it could be said to have ended at all with Mendelssohn, Schumann, and Spohr still alive. These composers were actively at work in 1842, while the bulk of the music written by their immediate predecessors was practically unknown to the multitudes taught by Mainzer, Hullah, and their assistants. Here, then, was a mighty new public, charged with the eagerness of neophytes, on the one hand; on the other, a young journal, cheap, unhampered by traditions, and in a position to supply just what the multitude wanted. It would not have been easy to miss success under conditions so favourable, but the actual result was largely brought about by a circumstance which might almost be called fortuitous. We refer to the popularising of good music by issuing it at a price that brought copies within the means of well-nigh all. This, as everybody knows, was the work of Mr. Novello, who, with rare intuition, saw that the moment had arrived when he would be safe in thus appealing to the general love of art. No one can measure the impulse which Mr. Novello thus gave to musical education and attainment, or the claim he consequently established upon national gratitude. Some will say, perhaps, "It was all in the way of his business." That is true enough, but surely we are not to stop at the immediate purpose, or direct outcome of a man's labours, when engaged in estimating their value. Mr. Novello will always be credited by just and generous minds with the immense merit of having made familiar to our English public the works of the great masters, and also with powerfully stimulating a demand for musical literature. Appetite for knowledge really increases in proportion as its requirements are met, and familiarity with the compositions of the great masters created a progressive desire for further acquaintance with them and their art. Hence, THE MUSICAL TIMES could not long remain within the limits that once properly bounded it. Its readers were ready for an advance, and step by step the journal became a journal of musical literature as well as a record of passing events. It expanded to twelve pages, to sixteen, to twenty-four, to thirty-two, and, seven years ago, to forty-eight, a number which has generally been exceeded since. These stages, we believe, have been reached simultaneously with a corresponding onward movement in general musical intelligence. The conductors of THE MUSICAL TIMES have never reduced it to the level of a speculative enterprise. They have felt the artistic pulse of the country, and sought to adapt the nature and extent of the supply to the demand, but always—and this is important—upon a popular basis. Our journal appeals now to the classes who supported it at the outset, and even retains, in its "Brief Summary of Country News," that which was in early days well-nigh its sole raison d'être. Having this in mind, who can look without complacency upon an issue bearing date 1844 and that which the reader now holds in his hand? The contrast represents forty years of genuine progress—not rapid progress, perhaps, but sure, solid, and in the right direction.

Keeping touch with our readers, we have never discovered on their part any desire for identification with a "cause," and the fact is remarkable seeing how furiously have raged the flames of controversy during these latter years. No one has reproached us for undue championship of the classical, or waxed angry because we have supported the romantic. No voice has begged us to fight against "Wagnerism," or, on the other hand, to set our face like a flint in support of its doctrines. There are good reasons for this non-disturbance of peaceful and quiet work. It is doubtful—more than doubtful, even—whether the causes of musical controversy affect in any appreciable degree the bulk of those who are interested in the art. Men in the midst of the conflict naturally conclude that events momentous to them are at the same time deeply moving every one else. So, when viewing a storm at sea, ourselves tossed upon the raging waters, we cannot make obvious to our minds the fact that all the hurly-burly is but superficial—that the fierce wind moves no more than the upper waters, and that the mighty mass of the ocean remains calm enough for the pleasant existence in its depths of tender creatures, which even a slight disturbance would annihilate. To the multitude of amateurs who hear "the thunder of the captains and the shouting" very far off, the controversies of Tweedle-dum and Tweedle-dee have no real interest. They are satisfied to take from the store-house of art, as far as it is open to them, whatever seems good in their eyes, and to enjoy it without troubling themselves about collateral and ultimate issues. The masses are always eclectic. They do not understand Shibboleths, and from their steady, slow and silent action, perhaps, arises the true well-being of music, which has ever known how to appropriate the good, come from what quarter it may, and how to reject the bad, though recommended by authority and power. On this principle, as a faithful exponent of the popular mind, THE MUSICAL TIMES has consistently acted. We also know no Shibboleths, and seek to appropriate good wherever we find it. If a contributor speak through our columns in his own name, he is always allowed fair liberty of utterance; and those columns are open to the proper expression of any opinion recommended by its "sweet reasonableness" or the personal authority of him who has formed it. But we should be flying in the face of our readers were we to identify THE MUSICAL TIMES with any particular school of faith and practice. The success of our journal rests upon its eclecticism, and from that sure foundation it is not likely that we shall be moved.

With regard to the literary position of THE MUSICAL TIMES, it is obviously not for us to speak ex cathedra. That matter falls to the decision of a multitudinous and impartial tribunal, with whose verdict we have had much reason to be content. At the same time, it is not for us to assume the robe of mock-modesty—an always unbecoming and unworthy garment. We have no reason to fear criticism upon the subject just mentioned, and this is the more gratifying because a combination of literary excellence and technical knowledge is hard to obtain. Few are better aware of the fact than the conductors of musical journals, for, while music, unlike many subjects having a scientific connection, invites all the graces of imagination, and all the felicities of diction, it demands an amount of special knowledge which only a cultured musician can supply. Hence it comes that, while in other branches of literary labour there are fitting workers and to spare, in musical literature of a high class the demand is greater than the supply. Crowds of musicians have plenty to say which the public would profit by hearing, but the grace of expression is denied them; and many men possess that grace but are not musicians. These facts should be borne in mind by critics of musical journalism when, as is often the case, they accuse it of dulness, or charge it with the possession of more technical knowledge than literary attraction.

We shall be expected to say a word or two here with regard to the future, and the nature of the only utterance possible to us has, no doubt, been anticipated. We have insisted upon the close connection of THE MUSICAL TIMES with the popular appreciation of music. With the growth of the one in breadth, depth, and height has moved pari passu the development of the other. That association will certainly not be disturbed by any act of ours. The reader sees at once what this implies. It is not likely, it is not possible, that the general condition of music will remain at the point now reached, satisfactory though that be on many grounds. In this case "the goal of yesterday is the starting-point of to-morrow"; and the onward movement must increase in speed as the force behind it augments. It follows that we shall have to move also, or lose the position hitherto carefully preserved. Our readers will not find us laggard, but of course the period and the nature of future changes cannot now be determined. They will have to depend upon the circumstances of the time, and all that can positively be said is that, when they come, they will be changes for the better. A state of things is conceivable in which our journal would assume an importance that, as yet, scarcely enters into practical consideration. We must approach it, if at all, step by step, just as the conditions of the past regulated the onward movement of THE MUSICAL TIMES to the stage at present reached. Meanwhile there is no lack of desire on our part to meet the fullest demands of an increasing and increasingly enlightened public.

Thus much and no more concerning ourselves, but, as concerning our readers, the large and faithful body who have practically made this journal what it is, we are bound to add an expression of the gratitude due from us to them for steady encouragement, unflinching patience, and ready sympathy with every special effort from time to time put forth. In this respect few enterprises of the kind have been more fortunate, and it is impossible to recall the fact without feeling stimulated to continued and higher endeavour.

THE "ROSE OF SHARON."

UNTIL Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's Oratorio has been heard we cannot, for reasons of fairness and justice, offer any criticism upon its merits. As, however, the publication of the work takes place almost simultaneously with the issue of our present number, we shall be expected to convey some information on points of design, scope, and character. This we now propose doing.

It was announced some time ago that the compiler of the book of words, Mr. Joseph Bennett, had adopted the reading of the "Song of Songs" put forward by the German commentator Ewald, and generally accepted by M. Rénan. It will now be interesting to state briefly what that reading is.

Ewald contends that the poem is dramatic, having a continuous plot and distinct characters; moreover, that it is in five acts corresponding to as many days. (Let us say, for the sake of accuracy, that Rénan is by no means at one with his fellow Hebraist as to the excellence of the work in this respect, but their points of variance do not greatly concern us here.) The action of the First Day opens in Solomon's Palace, and in the course of the dialogue we gather the nature of certain connected and preceding events—to wit, that King Solomon, while making a progress through the north of his realm, has encountered a young maiden, a vineyard keeper of the village of Sulam, and, struck with her grace and beauty, has caused her to be conveyed to his palace. The maiden—the Sulamite, as we must henceforth call her—loves a young shepherd of Lebanon, and, unmoved by the splendours of her new life, remains faithful to plighted troth. In the First Day she dwells upon her absent swain; crying for deliverance amid the taunts of the Women who surround her. Solomon then enters and addresses her in words inspired by sensual love. She, in turn, invokes the absent shepherd—henceforth to be called the Beloved—and, overcome with emotion, faints away, declaring that she is "sick of love." The Second Day is passed with the Women much in the same manner as the First, but the King does not renew his addresses. In the Third Day Solomon makes a supreme effort to subdue the Sulamite's faithful heart. He has resolved to number her among his Queens, and a public marriage procession takes place, after which the King leaves the Sulamite, promising to return and claim his bride. But the maiden more and more cherishes the memory of her shepherd, and an access of the "love sickness" interrupts the royal designs. In the Fourth Day Solomon renews his wooing, but without avail; the Sulamite again lapsing into unconsciousness, after a passionate invocation of her Beloved. The Fifth Day sees her restored to her native mountains, Solomon having found her unconquerable, and the drama ends with the happy re-union of the lovers.

Such, in merest outline, is the "Song of Songs" according to Ewald, and with this material Mr. Bennett elected to deal. He has divided the book of the Oratorio into four Parts, cast in dramatic form, and having a Prologue and Epilogue wherein is recognised the spiritual application of the story. No doubt, the large majority of commentators decline to recognise in "Solomon's Song" anything whatever of a spiritual character, claiming it as purely a love tale; but while the poem remains among the canonical books of Holy Scripture, and especially when treated as the subject of an oratorio, recognition of its generally accepted meaning could not be avoided, even had a disposition to avoid it existed. These are the words of the Prologue:—

We will open our mouth in a parable;
We will utter dark sayings of old,
Which we have heard and known;
Which our fathers have told us.
We will not hide them from our children,
That the generation to come may know them,
Who shall declare them to their children.

This is a great mystery, but we speak concerning Christ and His Church.

The text of the Epilogue runs as follows:—

Blessed is he that readeth, and they that hear the words of this prophecy.

These things saith the First and the Last, which was dead and is alive:—

To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the Tree of Life, which is in the midst of the Paradise of God.

He shall be clothed in white raiment, and I will confess His Name before my Father and His holy angels.

We will now sketch the four Parts in order.

The first opens in the village of Sulam as the people come out of their houses for the work of the day, singing "Let us go forth into the field," &c. Among them is the Beloved, who pauses under the lattice of the Sulamite, and calls upon her to rise, and come away:—

For, lo! the winter is past,
The rain is over and gone.

The maiden gladly recognises her lover's tones, and when he entreats "Let me hear thy voice," she sings a snatch of a vineyard song: "We will take the foxes, the little foxes that ravage the vines." Presently she joins him in the street, and, with mutual invitations, they proceed to the vineyards and nut-gardens, the people meanwhile resuming their chorus. The scene now changes to the vineyards, and a musical picture of a "Spring Morning on Lebanon" is presented by the orchestra. Suddenly a woman, looking down the road, asks "Who is this that cometh up from the valley like a pillar of smoke?" The people at once recognise the cortege of the King, and dwell in animated language upon the splendour of his equipment. As all crowd towards the royal route, shouting "God save the King," the beauty of the Sulamite is noticed by Solomon's princes and nobles, who direct attention to her, declaring, as Solomon praises her, that she should be "clothed in purple and dwell in the palace of the King." Hearing this the Beloved, taking alarm, entreats the Sulamite to fly with him "from the haunts of the leopard," and both hasten away, but are commanded to return, the people asking with wonder, "What do ye see in the Sulamite?" Solomon then showers compliments and promises upon the maiden, who clings to her lover, immovable even as a village Elder and all her people enjoin obedience to the royal mandate. The Beloved makes another attempt to save her, and she exclaims, in words frequently to be repeated, "My Beloved is mine, and I am his"; but the nobles haughtily demand, "Would ye rebel against the King?" Thereupon the Sulamite is placed in a chariot, and the royal progress is resumed, amid fresh cries of "God save the King!" So the first Part ends.

The second Part begins in Solomon's palace at Jerusalem, with an expression of the Sulamite's trust in God: "The Lord is my Shepherd," &c. Some Women of the Court enter offering salutations, and, looking curiously at the sun-burnt stranger, who, having frankly told them that she has been a vineyard keeper, fervently invokes her Beloved:—

Tell me where thou reatest with thy flocks at noon,
That I be not as one who wanders forgotten.

The Women half-tauntingly ask: "What is thy Beloved more than another?" and receive a glowing description of his personal beauty. At this the Women exclaim, "Art thou so simple?" and advise her to go and follow the flocks, if she prefer that life to courtly splendours. The First Woman, however, dwells upon the grandeur that awaits her whom the King delights to honour. At this juncture a Court official enters, inviting all to witness the procession which is about to escort the Ark up to the new Temple built by the gorgeous King. The scene changes here to an open place before the Palace, where are assembled a crowd of citizens waiting for the procession; the Sulamite and the Women meanwhile looking down from the lattice. After an elaborate chorus for the People: "Make a joyful noise unto the Lord," the approach of the Procession is heard. First pass the Maidens of Jerusalem with timbrels and dances, singing "We will praise His name in the dance," &c.; then come the Elders of the city, followed by Shepherds and Vinedressers, Soldiers and Priests, after whom is borne the Ark, the King himself bringing up the rear. Each section of the pageant has an appropriate chorus, and the whole ends with "God save the King." When all is over, the First Woman significantly reminds the Sulamite that equal honour awaits her if she choose. But the maiden answers:—

My Beloved pastures his flocks among the lilies;
Lo! Solomon in all his glory
Is not arrayed like one of these.
My Beloved is mine, and I am his.

With this the second Part comes to an end.

During Part III. the scene still lies in Solomon's Palace. At its opening the Sulamite is sleeping in the noontide heat—the orchestra having a movement entitled "Sleep"—and presently she dreams. In her dream she hears the Beloved calling from without "Open to me, my sister, my love." At first she hesitates, but when the entreaty is renewed, "My head is filled with dew and my locks with the drops of night," she opens the door. The Beloved is no longer there. In her distress she descends into the streets, calling upon her lover and begging the Watchmen to tell her where he is. The Watchmen repulse her rudely. She renews her plea, whereupon they threaten to strike her, and then she awakes. But so strong is the influence of the dream that her first conscious words are:—

I charge ye, O daughters of Jerusalem,
If ye find my Love
That ye tell him I am sick of love.

Solomon now appears, the First Woman again dwelling upon the exalted grandeur that awaits her if she yield. This time the King avows his preference for the Sulamite over all the inmates of his harem: "Yet one is my dove, mine undefiled," &c. To this the maiden makes a beautiful figurative reply:—

Lo! a vineyard hath Solomon at Baal-hamon;
He let out the vineyard unto keepers.
Every one for the fruit thereof
Was to bring him a thousand pieces of silver.
But my vineyard, mine, is before me.
Thou, O Solomon, must have a thousand,
And those that keep the fruit thereof two hundred.
My Beloved is mine, and I am his;
And unto me his desire.

Then, with all emphasis, she makes her final declaration: "My love is strong as death and unconquerable as the grave." On this the Women repeat, "Art thou so simple?" &c., and the King joins them, even to bidding the Sulamite go and "pasture her flocks by the huts of the shepherds." The third Part here ends.

When the fourth Part begins we are back again in Lebanon, and amongst the vinedressers, who now lament the loss of the beautiful maiden and her lover. Here we are tempted to quote the exquisite (adapted) Scriptural text, sung partly in chorus, partly by a contralto soloist:—

The fields of the Beloved languish,
And the vine of the Sulamite maiden;
Therefore will we bewail them,
We will water them with our tears.
Gladness is taken away,
And joy out of the pleasurable field;
In the vineyard there is no singing,
Neither is there any shouting.
The treaders tread out no wine,
And the noise of the vintage hath ceased.
All the merry-hearted do sigh;
The mirthful tabret is silent,
And the joy of the harp unheard.

After this lament, an Elder speaks words of hope and trust, and the people join in prayer for Divine guidance and protection. At that moment a cry arises: "Who is this that cometh up from the valley, leaning on her Beloved?" The Sulamite and her faithful Shepherd are soon recognised with songs of praise, and presently they stand again among their friends and acquaintance. Called upon to speak by her lover, the Sulamite dwells upon his excellencies, begging him to lead her among the trellised vines, and let his banner over her be love. He answers in the same spirit, and then comes the finale:—

For the flame of love is as fire,
Even the fire of God.
Many waters cannot quench it,
Neither can floods drown it.
Yea, love is strong as death,
And unconquerable as the grave.

A detailed analysis of Mr. Mackenzie's music cannot be entered upon here with propriety, because points may be missed and effects miscalculated which only a performance correctly shows. It is possible, however, to describe the salient features of the work with sufficient accuracy. To begin, Mr. Mackenzie employs "representative themes" for the first time in oratorio. He uses a motive expressive of the motto "Love is strong as death"; another in connection with the words "My Beloved is mine"; another taken from the Vineyard Song; another that everywhere stands for King Solomon, and so on. But as all are quite distinctive and easily apprehended, no confusion is likely to arise from their somewhat liberal employment. In his treatment of those parts of the story where action takes place, he follows the method adopted in "Colomba"; subordinating everything to dramatic expression. Here, however, we have but an advance upon the plan followed by Mendelssohn in corresponding parts of "Elijah." For the rest, there is no variance from the usual rule of developed movements in accepted form. As a result, we have an interesting combination of modern device and classic method; the modern element being for the most part associated with dramatic features, but not exclusively so, since the Prologue, a contralto solo, is based upon the Leimotiv which represents unconquerable love. In distributing the voices of his characters, Mr. Mackenzie makes the Sulamite a soprano; the Beloved a tenor; Solomon a baritone; the Elder a bass; and the First Woman a contralto. All the soloists are well provided with music; the largest share of work falling naturally to the soprano. The contralto airs are specially effective; while those for the tenor, baritone, and bass are all more or less important and graceful. A feature of the Oratorio, indeed, is the admirable balance preserved by the composer in dealing with the great divisions of his executive force. Although the solo vocalists have much to do, the task of the chorus and orchestra is scarcely less weighty or less prominent. It may even be that the choristers engaged will complain of too heavy a burden. Choral movements in great variety are frequent; and at the close of the second Part, where the procession of the Ark takes place, no less than fifty-four consecutive pages of the pianoforte score are taken up by a string of concerted pieces. We venture to say that Mr. Mackenzie will be praised for the admirable resource he has shown in discharging a most exacting duty. Some of the choruses are undoubtedly difficult, but, as a rule, they are grateful to sing, and so distinguished by varied merits as never to become monotonous and, consequently, wearisome. The orchestra is throughout treated in the most approved modern fashion, playing a part in the drama by means of its "representative themes," and being mostly distinctive and conspicuous in accompaniment. It has two movements to itself—one describing a "Spring Morning on Lebanon," a softly flowing Adagio tranquillo; the other, entitled "Sleep," being a beautiful Larghetto continued into and all through the Sulamite's dream, the events of which are seen, so to speak, through its translucent veil. The Oratorio contains no regular fugue, that form being obviously unfitted for the subject, but contrapuntal writing abounds, in quantity more than sufficient to satisfy the scientific ear, and in ability more than able to please it. We believe that the melodies of the work show a marked advance upon anything yet done by Mr. Mackenzie. They are, many of them, fully developed, well sustained, and thoroughly vocal. As for the handling of the ensembles, it will be found, we have not the smallest doubt, that Mr. Mackenzie has reached a very high standard, and shows the masterfulness of a master.

We have now advanced all the points demanded in a preliminary notice, and leave till after the performance at Norwich, on the 16th inst., the full analysis deserved by a work of the noblest purpose and highest achievement.

THE GREAT COMPOSERS

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

No. XV.—GLUCK (continued from page 515).

SUCCESS never lacks friends, and the great and growing favour shown to "Iphigénie en Aulide" by the Parisians brought many to the side of the composer who otherwise, perhaps, would have stood aloof. Among these was the Abbé Arnaud, a famous and influential littérateur of the time, who passed, also, as a musical critic. Arnaud published a long detailed notice of the opera in the Gazette de littérature, and, at that particular juncture, did the cause of Gluck's reforms no small amount of good. It was not for him, however, to enter into the very heart of the master's method, simply because no connoisseur of the day could conceive, much less understand, the extreme to which Gluck's ideas were carried. Some notion of that extreme can be gathered from a document written by Corancez, the friend who was the means of introducing Gluck to Rousseau. Corancez, though a man of taste and feeling, was not a musician, and on that account, perhaps, the German master talked to him freely, answering questions with a readiness by no means his usual characteristic. One day Corancez observed that in "Iphigénie," when Agamemnon first sang the line, "Je n'obéira point à cet ordre inhumain," he dwelt upon the "je," but subsequently passed the word without such emphasis. Questioned as to this, Gluck answered:—

"I had a strong reason to put a long note on the 'je' as first pronounced by Agamemnon, and also to avoid doing so whenever the word was repeated. Observe that this Prince stands between two most powerful opposing forces—nature and religion. He yields to nature, but before pronouncing the terrible word of disobedience against the gods he hesitates. My long note marks his hesitation, but, the word once uttered, let him repeat it as often as he may, there is no longer cause for hesitation; and a long note would simply be a fault in prosody."

Again, Corancez demanded why the piece in which the anger of Achilles is expressed thrilled him to the core, although when singing it himself he was conscious of nothing but a melody agreeable to the ear. Gluck replied:—

"You will seek in vain among the notes that make a tune for any character proper to certain passions. It does not exist. The composer has the resource of harmony, but even that is insufficient. In the piece of which you speak, my magic consists in the nature of the preceding air and its accompaniment. You have heard for some time nothing but the tender regrets of Iphigénie and her adieux to Achilles; the flutes and the lugubrious tone of the horns there play the principal part. It is not marvellous if your reposeful ears, struck suddenly by the sharp sound of all the military instruments together, cause within you an extraordinary movement—one which, in truth, it was my duty to bring about, but which, nevertheless, owes its principal force to a physical effect."

Other questions and answers might be cited, but the foregoing serve to show the vast amount of thought and the great faculty of taking pains which Gluck brought to the exercise of his art. He sought the accents of nature, and held everything subordinate to perfected and true expression. All this was, of course, lost upon a section of the public who could see nothing good in what was new. Gluck's critics rejected his melody as no melody at all because it lacked the ornaments and "passages" to which they had been accustomed. Another grievance was the absence of dance music in the usual form of sarabande, chaconne, &c. At that time it was the fashion to conclude an opera with a brilliant display of saltatory art, and one can easily imagine the disappointment of the Vestris worshippers on finding that their idol had nothing to do. As for Vestris himself, he went, both in sorrow and in anger, to remonstrate with Gluck upon the enormity of his offence against the established proprieties. Vainly did the master point out to the dancer that he could hardly introduce pirouettes into a sombre Greek tragedy. Vestris insisted: "I must have my chaconne."

"A chaconne!" retorted Gluck, "do you suppose the Greeks knew of such a thing?"

"They had no chaconne!" exclaimed Vestris, "so much the worse for them!"

The prosperous run of "Iphigénie" was ended by the death of Louis XV., an event which closed the theatres from May 11 till June 13, and Gluck then addressed himself to the task of bringing out Moline's French version of "Orfeo," under the title "Orphée et Eurydice." This work, coming after the success of "Iphigénie," excited the greatest possible interest. Thousands were unavailingly eager to attend the rehearsals, and we are told that the composer was as much an attraction as his music. Even the high nobility thought themselves honoured by doing the master little acts of service, such as handing him his surtout, his cane, or his wig—Gluck always conducted the rehearsals in his night-cap. On his part, the composer kept his head from being turned by so much homage. He went everywhere in society, making himself as agreeable as possible, and carefully, by personal address, fanning the flame of his own popularity. A few lines in the Memoirs of M<sup>me</sup>. de Genlis enable us to see him at this work. The lady was at the time a social power, owing to her relations with the Duc d'Orleans, and Gluck had, no doubt, a shrewd appreciation of the fact. M<sup>me</sup>. de Genlis writes:—"Gluck came twice a week with Monsigny, M. de Monville, and Jarnovitz, the celebrated violinist, to make music at my house. He made me sing all his beautiful airs, and play upon the harp his overtures, among others that of 'Iphigénie,' which I love to enthusiasm." In carrying out his social policy the master was not very particular as to the repute of those with whom he associated. He was often found in the salon of the notorious Duchess of Kingston, who "received him with all the regard due to his immortal talents," and parted from him at the last with keen regret.

"Orphée" was produced on August 2 with the greatest success, the audience, it is said, being moved to tears by the beauty and pathos of the music—which the composer, by the way, had considerably altered and touched up for the French version. Among the illustrious persons present was Jean Jacques Rousseau, whose feelings on the occasion are not strange to the readers of his "Œuvres Complètes," where a single scene is discussed through eight pages. Rousseau declared that the possibility of two hours' enjoyment such as he had experienced made life worth living, and when some one, in his presence, reproached Gluck for wanting melody, he exclaimed, "I find that melody comes from him through every pore." Gluck was now at the apex of good fortune. Marie Antoinette settled upon him a pension of 6,000 livres, with 6,000 more for every new work represented; and even the royal locksmith, her husband, having attended a revival of "Iphigénie," was moved out of his habitual dulness to write, "I was delighted yesterday with the opera of 'Iphigénie en Aulide' of Chevalier Gluck, which I heard in Paris. The Queen, Madame, and my two brothers were enchanted like myself. It is a work of the greatest beauty. I expressed my satisfaction to the composer after the performance, and will send him a present to show how I regard his person and talents."

During this sojourn in Paris, Gluck attempted a somewhat unworthy task—he prepared for performance, in connection with the visit of the Archduke Maximilian, a slight comic opera "Le Poirier ou l'Arbre enchané." He also wrote, at this time, "Cythère assiégé," which was brought out at the Opéra as an opera-ballet. The master thought nothing of such a trifle, but his enemies saw in it a great deal, and loud was the outcry against the work on the score of faults quite needless to recapitulate here. That it had faults seems evident since Abbé Arnaud, Gluck's foremost champion, said in reference to it: "Hercules wielded the club better than he handled the distaff."

The master had, at this time, plenty of work in hand. He had undertaken to prepare "Alceste" for performance in French, and also to write a couple of operas on the subjects of "Roland" and "Armide." Soon, however, his equanimity was sorely disturbed by an event which foreshadowed what he could not have anticipated, namely, the Gluck-Piccinni war. The directors of the Opéra, for some reason or other, charged Piccinni also to compose a "Roland," and, on learning this, the German master so far lost his temper as to destroy what had been completed of his own work. In the following letter, addressed to the Bailli du Roulet, we shall see a little into his mind on the point:

"I have received your letter of January 15, in which you press me to go on working at 'Roland.' That is not possible, because, when I learned that the administration of the Opéra, who knew I was engaged upon 'Roland,' had given the same task to M. Piccinni, I burnt all that I had already done, which, perhaps, was not worth much, and, in that case, the public should be obliged to M. Marmontel for keeping from them bad music. Besides, I am no longer a man disposed to enter into competition. M. Piccinni would have the advantage of me, for, as well as his personal merit, which is undoubtedly very great, he would have that of novelty. . . . I am sure that a certain politician of my acquaintance will dine and sup three quarters of Paris in order to make proselytes, and that Marmontel, who knows how to tell stories, will hold forth to the whole kingdom about the exclusive merits of Signor Piccinni."

In this way did Gluck meet the first onset of the storm that was soon to rage round him, and the echoes of which we hear whenever a French chronicle of the period is opened. But the composer did not allow his anger to stop business altogether. In the letter from which we have just quoted he expresses his willingness to proceed with "Armide," on certain conditions, imperious enough in their way:—

"I must have at least two months in Paris to prepare my artists; I must have power to order as many rehearsals as I think proper; no rôle must be understudied, and an opera must always be held ready in case a performer should be unable to appear. These are my stipulations, without which I shall keep 'Armide' to myself. I have so written the music as that it will not grow old very soon."

With reference to understudying, and Gluck's strong objection against it, a passage from Rousseau's "Nouvelle Héloïse" will show that the composer had reason on his side:—"All the rôles are doubled or tripled; that is to say, there are always one or two subaltern actors ready to replace the principal performer, and paid to do nothing till it pleases him to do nothing in his turn—a state of things never slow to arrive. After a few representations, the principal artists, who are important personages, no longer honour the public with their presence; they abandon the stage to their substitutes, and to the substitutes of their substitutes. The same money is always taken at the doors, but the same performance is not always given in return." Gluck was undoubtedly right in firmly putting down his foot on a state of things barely equalled by the worst modern development of the "star" system.

The French version of "Alceste" was produced on April 23, 1776, in presence of the composer's royal friend, Marie Antoinette, and, of course, all the quidnuncs of Paris. It failed almost absolutely, and the story goes that Gluck, in a state of distraction, rushed into the lobby to gain the street, but ran against his friend, the Abbé Arnaud. "'Alceste' has fallen!" exclaimed the master, and the happy reply was, "Yes, fallen from heaven." Gluck would not believe that the misfortune arose from any defect in the work. Speaking one day to Corancez, he said: "'Alceste' simply does not please just now, and while it is new. It has not had time. I affirm, however, that it will please 200 years hence, if the French language does not change, and my reason is that I have laid its foundations in nature, which never submits to fashion." On the other hand, let us give Rousseau's criticism upon the Italian version of the same work, a criticism written after studying the score so rudely fetched away by the composer:—

"I know no opera where the passions are less varied than in 'Alceste.' Everything there turns upon two feelings—affliction and fear, and these, prolonged throughout, must have given incredible trouble to the musician in avoiding a most lamentable monotony. In general, the greater the warmth of situations and expressions, the more rapidly they should pass, else the force of the emotion will diminish among the audience. . . . It results from this defect that the interest, instead of increasing by degrees with the progress of the opera, cools as the dénouement is approached, which is cold, flat, and nearly laughable in its simplicity."

In the midst of the trouble caused by the hostile reception of his "Alceste," Gluck was struck heavily by the death of his beloved niece, the accomplished young lady whom Dr. Burney speaks of having seen and admired. She had accompanied her uncle to Paris, and gone largely into society with him, everywhere creating a very favourable impression. One who met her in Paris, says: "She was extremely delicate, almost ethereal, but the tone of her voice penetrated to the soul." Another adds: "Her voice was but a breath, but the breath of the soul, and never did a singer, even a prima donna, no matter of what gifts, cause in the hearer such touching and profound emotions." Gluck and his accomplished niece left the French capital for Vienna, at the end of February, 1775, stopping en route at Strasburg, where the young lady fairly conquered Klopstock, who called her "The enchantress of the Holy Roman empire as well as of the profane French Kingdom." Returning to Paris for "Alceste," the composer was unaccompanied by his niece, whom he was never again to see. A violent attack of small-pox carried the poor girl off in the bloom of her youth the very day before her uncle's opera was produced. Distracted with grief Madame Gluck fled to Paris that she might mingle her tears with those of her husband, who felt his loss most bitterly. "The sorrow of the German Orpheus," says M. Desnoires-terres, "was without bounds. He loved his niece passionately, and gave way to agonising complaints; alarming his friends by the violence of his emotion." Gluck could not remain in the French capital after this. Its gay life became a burden to him, and, longing to visit the grave of his lost one, he set out for Vienna, arriving there in the middle of September.

No sooner had the composer gone than the authorities at the Opéra began cutting and trimming "Alceste," to make it suit public taste. Gossec was the musician chosen for this doubtful task, and by him an air was interpolated, as well as other changes effected. Circumstances scarcely called for this interference with the work. In Paris, as in Vienna,

"Alceste" made its way surely to the public heart, at first hardened against it, and a threatened withdrawal of the opera called forth energetic remonstrances. Away in Vienna, Gluck received news of all this with immense satisfaction, and was moved to address his interpreters in a letter of thanks, saying:—

"I am told that you perform the opera of 'Alceste' with astonishing perfection, bringing to it extraordinary zeal. I cannot tell you what pleasure this mark of your friendship gives me, but I beg you to rest assured that I shall lose no opportunity of showing my gratitude. Meanwhile, dear friends and comrades, accept my very best thanks."

The master soon returned to Paris, and assisted at the thirty-eighth representation of "Alceste," his bust, purchased by subscription, having meanwhile been placed in the foyer of the Opéra. He was now, indeed, Gluck the Conqueror. When "Alceste" wore itself out, no work from any other pen could be tolerated, and "Iphigénie en Aulide" again occupied the stage. It was not the composer's fault that some of his friends had more zeal than discretion, among them Suard and the Abbé Arnaud, who between them owned the Journal de Paris. In that paper appeared, one eventful day, a little paragraph which lighted up the flames of a controversy not soon to be extinguished. Here it is:—

"Do you know," said someone yesterday, in the amphitheatre of the Opéra, "that Chevalier Gluck arrives immediately with the music of 'Armide' and 'Roland' in his portfolio?" "Of 'Roland'!" exclaimed one of his neighbours; "M. Piccinni is at this moment setting it to music!" "So much the better," replied the other, "we shall have an Orlando and an Orlandino. It is well known that these two poems are much esteemed in Italy."

The sting of this paragraph lies in its tail, the word "Orlandino" being a reference to some burlesque verses by one Teofilo Folingo, described as a "macaroni poet." It is not surprising that the friends of Piccinni keenly resented the affront offered to their hero by Gluck's injudicious partisans. A contemporary author (Abbé Morellet), thus describes a scene which took place in the salon of Madame Necker, wife of Louis XVth's once popular minister:—

"We arrived at the house and found Suard there. Marmontel stepped forward, and addressing Madame Necker, said: 'What think you, Madame, of the stupid and wicked jest which they have had the cowardice to utter against Piccinni, a man whose works are attacked before they are known, and whom they try to injure while he is doing his best to please, a stranger, father of a family, who needs work to sustain his children. Only scoundrels would be guilty—' Madame Necker, knowing who were guilty, and myself tried in vain to calm him; he became hotter than ever."

Abbé Arnaud, no doubt, chuckled with satisfaction on learning that his shaft had gone home. He had no special desire to hurt Piccinni, but through him struck at Marmontel who, in his Essai sur les Révolutions de la musique en France had struck at Gluck. It is curious to see, looking back upon the controversy thus begun, what a resemblance it bears to an artistic dispute much nearer our own time, particularly as regards fierceness. Writing to Garrick, Madame Riccoboni said: "They tear each other's eyes here, for or against Gluck," and like combatants in a mêlée, each doughty warrior singled out a foeman worthy of his steel. Suard engaged La Harpe, and Marmontel encountered the Abbé Arnaud, while a host of minor personages added to the din. Literary men, as a rule, were on the side of Piccinni, who thus had an advantage in the Press, although it was said that the two proprietors of the Journal de Paris made noise enough for ten. At any rate, Arnaud and Suard knew something of the subject, upon which many who took part in the controversy were profoundly ignorant. Let us cite an example from the higher ranks of society. In her Souvenirs de Felicie, Madame de Genlis writes:—

"I am sorry to hear the Chevalier de Chastelux, who has not the least notion of music, declaim in so extravagant a manner against 'Alceste' and 'Iphigénie,' contending that Gluck is a barbarian. The other day in presence of many witnesses, he tried to get up a dispute with the Marquis de Clermont, who is a good musician. 'My friend,' said the Marquis, 'I will sing an air and if you can correctly beat the measure, I will argue with you as much as you like about Gluck and Piccinni.' The Chevalier was prudent enough to decline this embarrassing proposition, much doubting the correctness of his ear, and it is this delicate organ which cannot endure the uncouth music of 'Iphigénie.'"

There were plenty of Chevaliers among the journalists, who wielded their pens with no less energy and perseverance because they really could not distinguish the essential differences between the severe music of the German and the ornate strains of the Italian.

Meanwhile, the rehearsals of "Armide" went steadily on, and that work was produced September 23, 1777. As might have been expected, its reception was "mixed." Certain numbers evoked applause, but the bulk of the opera was heard in frigid silence. Now came the turn of the Piccinnists, and they did not neglect the opportunity, reinforced as they were by the admirers of Lulli, they having taken offence at Gluck's choice of a subject which their favourite master had treated. La Harpe, especially, selected his keenest weapon, and thus lectured Gluck magisterially:—

"In 'Armide,' which is a good poem but a bad opera, you seek to establish the reign of your melopée, sustained by your choruses and your orchestra. I admire your choruses and the resources of your harmony. I would that your melopée were less lavish and more adapted to the French language, that it were less abrupt and less noisy; above all, I would that there were airs. For I love music that is sung, and verse that one remembers."

Stung by this lofty tone, Gluck replied in a furiously ironical letter, which the Journal de Paris was delighted to publish. Here is an extract from it:—

"I am confounded at seeing that you have learned more of my art in a few hours of reflection than I who have practised it for forty years. You prove to me, Monsieur, that to speak of everything it is only needful to be a man of letters. I agree with you that, of all my operas, 'Orphée' is the only supportable one; I sincerely ask heaven to pardon me for having deafened my auditors in the other operas, whose worthlessness the number of their representations and the applause of the public do not prevent me from seeing. Of this I am so convinced that I shall re-write them, and, as you love tender music, I will put into the mouth of furious Achilles a song so sweet and touching that everybody shall be moved to tears. Then, the rôle of Armide will no longer be a monotonous and fatiguing clamour; Medea will no longer be a sorceress but an enchantress, and in her despair she will sing you a song so regular, so periodic, and, at the same time, so tender, that the most lackadaisical petite maîtresse shall hear it without the least disturbance of her nerves. Should some evil genius say to me, 'Monsieur, take care that Armide in a passion does not express herself like Armide in love,' I shall answer, 'Monsieur, I will not alarm the ear of M. de la Harpe; I will not imitate nature but embellish her; instead of making Armide cry out, I desire that she shall enchant you.' Should he insist and observe that Sophocles, in the finest of his tragedies, dared present Œdipus to the Athenians with blood-stained eyes, and that the declamation by which were expressed the eloquent complaints of that unfortunate king had, without doubt, the accent of keen suffering, I should still answer that M. de la Harpe desires not to hear the cry of a man who suffers. Have I not well grasped, Monsieur, the spirit of the doctrine laid down in your observations?"

Judging from the above extract, Gluck was well able to take his own part in controversy. He may have felt, however, that it did not become an artist to enter the lists of controversy on the subject of his own works. At any rate, he publicly called upon an anonymous writer, who had championed him before, to draw sword again in the same cause:—

"It would seem that these gentlemen (the journalists) are more happy when writing about other matters, for, if I may judge by the reception that the public have kindly given to my works, the public set no great store by their phrases or their opinion. But what think you, Monsieur, of the new attack made upon me by one of them—M. de la Harpe? He is an amusing doctor this M. de la Harpe; he speaks of music in a manner which would make all the choir-boys in Europe shrug their shoulders, and he says 'I will,' and he talks about 'my doctrine.' 'Et pueri nasum rhinocerotis habent.' Have you not a little word to say, Monsieur, you who once defended me against him so successfully. Ah! I pray you, if my music has given you the smallest pleasure, put yourself in a position to prove to friendly connoisseurs in Germany and Italy that, among the literary men of France, there are some who, when speaking of art, know at least what they say."

Giving an ear to this appeal, the anonymous one came down upon La Harpe like a thunderbolt. La Harpe replied with the adroitness of a practised pen, and so the wordy war went on. But there was no mutual enmity in the hearts of Gluck and Piccinni, and when Berton, the director of the Opéra, sought to bring them together at the supper table, he apparently found the task by no means difficult. The two composers met, embraced, and sat peacefully by each other's side. Presently Gluck, who took his wine with freedom, entered into the demonstratively affectionate state sometimes brought about by the "flowing bowl," and, in the fulness of his heart, he began making embarrassing remarks to Piccinni about the people whose favour they both enjoyed. "The French are good fellows," he said, "but I can't help laughing at them. They want us to make songs for them, although they don't know how to sing. My dear friend, you are famous all over Europe. You study only your glory; but when you make good music for these people, how much further are you advanced? Believe me, one should think of money here and nothing else." Piccinni, in a state of extreme uncomfortableness, sensibly replied: "You have yourself proved that it is possible, at the same time, to study both glory and fortune." Out of his cups, the German was as discreet, perhaps even more wary, than the Italian. It is said that they once met in society, when the talk ran upon operas. "How many have you written, M. le Chevalier?" said someone to Gluck. "Not many" was the answer, "rather more than twenty, I think, and I did not compose that small number without much study and effort." "For my part," observed Piccinni, "I have written more than a hundred, and they have not given me much trouble." Watching his opportunity, Gluck whispered in Piccinni's ear: "You are wrong to say that, my dear friend." Of course Berton's supper did not end the war. It brought together men who had no quarrel themselves, and were only a cause of strife to others. The others were not there.

HEINRICH MARSCHNER.

By J. S. SHEDLOCK, B.A.

ON the wondrous rock of ice on which lay the Temple of Fame the poet viewed inscriptions of various names:

The greater part by hostile time subdued.

Sixty-six years ago a young composer sent the score of an opera to Weber, then Capellmeister at Dresden. The work so pleased him that he decided to produce it, and, after long delay, Marschner (for this was the name of the young musician) received in 1820 a letter from Weber informing him that his opera "Heinrich IV und d'Aubigné" had been successfully given at Dresden, and accompanying the letter was an honorarium of 10 ducats. Three years later we find Marschner appointed joint Capellmeister with Weber and Morlacchi of the German and Italian opera at Dresden. On Weber's death in 1826 he resigned his post and went to Leipzig. Here in 1828 he produced the "Vampyr." Great was the success of the work: it went the round of the principal German theatres, was performed at the Lyceum Theatre, London, in 1829, and but for some hitch in the arrangements, would have been given at Paris in the following year. Then we have the production of "Hans Heiling" at Berlin and at Leipzig, a work generally regarded as his best. But "hostile time" has subdued that name which once was so full of promise: seldom is it to be found on any Concert programme. At Hanover, for so many years the scene of his labours (he was appointed Court Capellmeister there in 1831 and retained this post till his death, December 14, 1861), three of his operas, the "Vampyr," the "Templer," and "Hans Heiling," are still given, and also in other parts of Germany; but in England and France his name is all but ignored. At one of the Richter Concerts last season the overture to "Hans Heiling" was performed, and then surprise was expressed by Mr. C. A. Barry in the analytical programme-book that so little should be known or heard of a composer who had written so much and whose reputation at one time was so considerable. We do not know the exact number of his published works, but a set of six songs bears the Opus number 191. Some of his part-songs for male voices (and of these he wrote a great quantity) are to be heard occasionally in Germany, but his instrumental music may be described as completely overlooked.

There are two ways in which a writer and his works may be forgotten: for a time or for ever. For many years most of Bach's manuscripts lay untouched and unheeded; more especially was this the case with the vocal ones. When Mendelssohn revived the Passion music in 1829, it had not been heard for well-nigh a century. The "Wohltemperirte Clavier," now as much known and, in its way, admired as Beethoven's sonatas, was not published till half a century after the composer's death. We are soon about to celebrate the 200th anniversary of the birth of the mighty master, and yet of the treasures which he bequeathed to posterity many are still unpublished. Then passing on to the nineteenth century we call to mind the great contemporary of Beethoven—viz., Franz Schubert. For years some of his finest works were hidden away in a cupboard. It was quite by chance that Schumann found the great Symphony in C in 1838; and it was after much trouble and research that other treasures were discovered about thirty years later by Sir George Grove. And there is still another name we would mention, that of Hector Berlioz. The revival of his music is, however, an event of such recent occurrence that we need not enter into detail about it. When one hears how masterpieces have thus lain for many a long year unnoticed and unknown, one is disposed to imagine that perhaps hostile time has subdued other geniuses whose works may yet be discovered by some other wanderer amongst the tombs, or by some enthusiastic searcher after hidden treasures. It is not difficult to explain how Bach, Schubert and Berlioz came to suffer neglect. Their aim in writing was not merely to gratify the tastes and fancies of their contemporaries; and so, when they died, they were mourned by the few who appreciated them, and forgotten or ignored by the many who failed to understand them. The performance of the "Passion" music by a comparatively small choral society, and the accidental visit of Schumann to Ferdinand Schubert were of course the immediate causes of the Bach and Schubert revivals—and for this the names of Mendelssohn and Schumann must ever be held in honour—yet we believe that with the spread of musical knowledge and the increased interest in the lives and labours of the great musicians resulting therefrom, the lost treasures would anyhow have been recovered and the composers have had fit, though tardy honours paid to them.

But what about authors and their works being forgotten for ever? To say of any writer who once acquired fame—for of such only are we speaking—that his reputation has vanished never more to return is, no doubt, a serious matter; but surely works which have no depth of thought cannot take root; they grow quickly into favour, but as quickly fade and wither away. We could point to operas, oratorios, symphonies, and sonatas written within the last twenty years which flourished for a time and yet, to all appearances, are dead for evermore; but it will be more discreet, and, at the same time, more profitable, to speak of events which happened, as they say in story books, "a long time ago." Look at the popularity of Hasse's operas in the 18th century, and at the brilliant reception of his "Artaserse" in London. Look at the successes of Dittersdorf and Salieri at Vienna, and think of Gluck, who left the city in disgust at the reception given to his "Orfeo" and "Alceste," and of Mozart, who found in the author of "Tarare" a formidable rival. These men owed success to the fact that they wrote on a level with the epoch in which they lived; their object was to please and amuse. Their operas certainly showed talent, tact, and taste, but possessed no lasting merit; and they have passed away like the men and women who listened to, and applauded them. Does anyone believe in their revival? The very success which they obtained speaks against them. As their authors sowed, so did they reap; they wrote for their day and generation, and posterity takes no notice of works not addressed to it.

Marschner appears to us a composer whose aims and aspirations were not of the highest. Fétis tells us that the successes of Rossini made him resolve to give a free course to melody, and to attach less value to harmonic and contrapuntal complications. And again, that in his opera entitled "Der Holzdieb" he aimed "at a style of music less severe than that of the dramas of the German stage then in vogue, but more vigorous than that of simple operettas." If those statements be true—and we must confess that a study of his best known works leads us to believe them—then, perhaps, we shall not be wrong in classing Marschner among the composers whose reputation will not increase as years advance. But let us at once say that, as he is one of the moderns, we must form no hasty judgment; and, indeed, we think that if Mr. Carl Rosa or Herr Richter were to produce "Hans Heiling," musicians would be grateful for the opportunity of hearing a work which, at any rate, forms a prominent feature in the period between the death of Weber and the commencement of Wagner's public career at Dresden.

Not having heard Marschner's operas, and knowing only the principal ones from vocal scores, we are, of course, unable to say what effect they produce when given on the stage, and equally difficult would it be for us to say what impression they would now make upon the public. But though orchestration, acting and scenic effects are wanting, we may perhaps venture one or two words about the libretti of the "Templer" and "Hans Heiling," about the music with respect to form and character, and about the position which Marschner seems to occupy as an opera writer. After the "Vampyr" had been successfully produced at the Lyceum Theatre in 1829, where it ran for sixty nights, the composer received an invitation to write an opera for Covent Garden. His attention therefore was turned to English literature, and Walter Scott's "Ivanhoe," then in the zenith of its fame, was fixed upon as the ground-work of a libretto. The "Templer und Jüdin" was quickly composed, but the burning of Covent Garden Theatre put an end to the London scheme. Apart from any merits which the music possessed, the popularity of the novel would most probably have ensured, at any rate for a time, the success of Marschner's opera. With respect to this music, its Weberish character has often been the subject of comment. How far Marschner has imitated the composer of "Der Freischütz" in his orchestration, we cannot say; but play almost any page of the opera, and you will trace the influence of the great romanticist. The fact cannot surprise anyone who remembers how Marschner for many years worked with Weber, nay lived, we might almost say, under the same roof. The "Templer" was not an early work, and, therefore, after granting the composer absolution for his close copy of Weber, we naturally look for some sign or manifestation of individuality, yet of that we can find but little trace. There is a certain charm and freshness about most of his melodies, and his harmonies are at times interesting, but we meet with nothing which strikes us, nothing which makes us feel we are in presence of a master mind. And then frequently occurring and monotonous iteration of sections of a phrase, the squareness of form of the various pieces, and the thin style of accompaniment, show that the composer was at times obliged to eke out scanty material; that with him form determined the matter and not matter the form; and that he troubled himself little about the higher function and capabilities of the orchestra. If the "Templer" were now given in London it would be sure to interest musicians who have been taught to think of Marschner as the connecting link between Weber and Wagner, and the simplicity and grace of the music would be likely to appeal to a certain section of the public; but the curiosity of the former would, we imagine, soon be satisfied, and the latter would transfer its affections to the first novelty, whether of equal or even less merit.

"Hans Heiling" is generally spoken of as Marschner's masterpiece. The Bohemian legend of the king of the earth spirits is a curious one. For the love of a fair maiden he renounced his kingdom and power, but, finding the young lady as fickle as she was fair, he appeals to his subjects, asking them to assist him in his projects of vengeance. A terrible catastrophe however is averted by the queen of the earth spirits persuading her son, Hans Heiling, to cease from strife, and return quietly to his kingdom. The story is a sensational one, and the opera, as a spectacle, if well put upon the stage, might very probably prove a draw. But not one of the characters in the piece really attracts our interest or excites our sympathy; and we can well understand that Mendelssohn, to use Devrient's words, "could not warm to the subject." The king is neither substance nor shadow, while the other dramatis personæ are very ordinary folk: they make love, they dance, they sing hymns, and play at blind man's buff. The music is far more interesting than that of the "Templer"; of its kind, indeed, it is very successful. Great we cannot call it, but its cleverness, charm, and general effectiveness, must be acknowledged. Thus frankly do we record the impressions made upon us by a study of the vocal scores of the "Templer" and "Hans Heiling." Though, as we have said, it is not possible to judge of the exact effect which they would have in performance, yet the music is so simple in character and construction that one can gain a fair idea of the composer's musical powers. If "Hans Heiling" had not the high-sounding title of "Romantic Opera"; if we could forget the lavish praise which has been bestowed on it in certain quarters, then perhaps we should speak of it in different terms and think more highly of it. It was Marschner's misfortune to come between two great men, Weber and Wagner. He possessed neither the originality or soul of the former nor the independence or intellectual power of the latter; and if musicians expect to find in him the connecting link between the two, they will, we think, be disappointed. For what would a "connecting link" in this case mean? Why, something more than a copy of the former, and some foreshadowing, however faint, of the latter. Marschner, it is true, makes use of Leitmotiv, but Weber had already done as much.

In reading the "Templer" and "Hans Heiling" one fact particularly strikes us, and that is the intimate acquaintance Wagner had with these operas. Take, for example, the Finale of the second act of the "Templer." Compare it with the first act of "Lohengrin," and some passages in the latter will (though only vaguely) recall some of the former. In the same way passages in "Hans Heiling" remind one of parts of the "Nibelungen." However faint these reminiscences may be, they show that Wagner had not overlooked the works of a musician who at one time seemed destined to be Weber's successor.

One of Marschner's contemporaries has recorded the impressions which his music made upon him. Among the articles contributed by Schumann to the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik we find several relating to Marschner's instrumental compositions, and thus get an interesting glimpse of works well-nigh forgotten. Schumann writes about the second grand pianoforte Trio in G minor—Marschner composed seven, all "grand" except the fourth in D (Op. 135)—and in reading his critique one thoroughly understands why that Trio and its companions are no longer heard of. The Trio contains themes of a certain charm and freshness, but they are treated in a weak and at times careless fashion; works of this kind stand no chance by the side of Mendelssohn's chamber compositions with their elegant and finished workmanship, and Schumann's, with their earnest thoughts and interesting developments. The account of another work, the "Klänge aus Osten" is also valuable. These "Klänge," consisting of an overture, solos, and choruses, and illustrating an Eastern love story, were set in a "new form" which met with Schumann's approval, and seem to have suggested the "Paradise and the Peri." But in his "Theaterbüchlein," in which he wrote down the impressions made on him by certain operas, we find a few lines about Marschner's "Templer und Jüdin" which he heard in 1847. Only a few lines, so we give a translation of them:—

"Thoroughly enjoyed the work. The composition here and there restless, not quite clearly scored; a lot of sprightly melodies. Great dramatic talent; some reminiscences of Weber. A jewel which cannot quite disentangle itself from its rough envelope. Treatment of the voice-parts at times thankless, and covered by the orchestra. Excessive use of trombones.

"The choruses went disgracefully; some of them must produce greater effect. To sum up: after Weber it is the most important opera of modern times."

And then Mendelssohn had something to say about Marschner. The libretto of "Hans Heiling" had originally been offered to him by E. Devrient. But he rejected it. In 1831 he wrote to his friend as follows: "I am uncommonly glad that Marschner is composing 'Heiling.' . . . The fault you justly charge him with—of dependence on Weber—is one to which your poem, in its very nature, tends; but if this circumstance should rouse him to avoid the temptation of being quite so Weberish as heretofore, the opera will have a more natural flow, and become his best."

In the following year we read of Mendelssohn, Taubert, and Devrient and his wife looking over the score of "Heiling." Devrient, in his "Recollections," gives us more of his own remarks than those of Mendelssohn; we gather, however, from one observation which fell from the latter's lips that the music impressed him favourably.

We should like to have concluded with some criticism of Berlioz, but the following extract from a letter to Mr. G. A. Osborne is the only notice of Marschner we have found in his writings. It says but little, yet perhaps as much as Berlioz cared to say: "I was unable to get to know much about the Capellmeister Marschner, for the difficulty he has in expressing himself in French rendered any conversation with him rather troublesome; he is, besides, very busy. At the present moment he is actually one of the first composers of Germany. You appreciate, as we all do, the eminent merit of his scores of the 'Vampyr' and the 'Templer.'"

THE FUTURE OF OPERA

By H. F. FROST.

IN certain religious circles a time is occasionally set apart for retirement from the world and indulgence in pure and uninterrupted meditation. This practice is known to devotées as a retreat, and it is usual to fix it at a period of the year when it will not interfere with the due observance of the fasts and feasts prescribed in the calendar. We appear to have arrived at a stage in our musical progress when it will be possible, if not profitable, to observe, metaphorically, "a retreat." Two or three years ago we were apparently advancing by leaps and bounds; but the effort was too exhausting to last, and some of those who were most eager to lead the way stumbled therein, and are now sadder if not wiser men. It is not intended in the present article to review the whole situation, but to glance briefly at a difficult problem as interesting to art-lovers in other countries as to ourselves. Nor will any attempt be made to solve the problem; that can only be done in a practical way by the appearance of another of those "epoch-making" possessors of genius who arise during times of transition, when men are crying "lo! here" and "lo! there," and show them a more excellent way. By common consent we have reached a period of doubt and uncertainty in regard to opera, and the question has been asked in all seriousness whether the lyric drama is not an exhausted form of art. More than a decade since an eminent writer* declared that the popular opera of the day suggested to him "the last ghastly grin of a galvanised corpse"; and about the same time it was said that "opera is dead and M. Offenbach is dancing the cancon on its remains." But these were the words of special pleaders zealous chiefly for the furtherance of Wagnerian theories and the cause of the "new art." The new art has now been before the world a sufficient time to permit us to estimate in some degree the power it is likely to exercise for good or evil. So far, the most potent result of the popularisation of Wagner's works has been to paralyse production. Only in France is there anything like a continuance of activity, simply because in that country the precepts and practice of the Bayreuth reformer have scarcely as yet commenced to exercise much influence over composers and the public. For the purpose of the present argument France may therefore be excluded from consideration, though it may be remarked in passing that the most talented Gallic musicians of the day are not producing works of permanent value. The operas of M. Saint-Saëns and M. Massenet are eclectic rather than original, and it is difficult to imagine that they will be often heard beyond their own generation.

In Germany matters have come to a deadlock. Though conservative critics may be loth to fully admit the fact, the influence of Wagner is complete and crushing. In every lyric theatre his works take an enormous lead in the repertory and we look in vain for the appearance of a composer capable of challenging the supremacy of the master. At home things are somewhat different because the decay of Italian opera and the enterprise of a foreign impresario—whose labours among us demand the sincerest gratitude—have given encouragement to our most talented young musicians to turn their attention to operatic composition. Let it not be supposed that we undervalue the successes they have already achieved. Compared with the poverty of the past, the improvement in this direction of musical labour is remarkable, and, from the public standpoint, the outcome must be wholly beneficial. The art feeling which has been already sufficiently powerful to counteract the natural tendency to propitiate the bugbear known as popular taste must also be recognised with hearty approval. But if we are to believe our advisers, little or no progress has as yet been made towards the formation of a national school of opera; in other words, young musical England has eagerly assimilated some portions of the revolutionary creed without engrafting thereon any features giving distinctiveness to its own work.
